An apartment, or apartment complex, is normally a small self-contained home unit that occupies only a part of a multi-story construction, typically on a first or second level. There are several common names for such multi-level dwellings, see below for a list. Building complexes consist of flats in 1 level, whether connected or not. Apartment buildings consist of flats in one level only, whether connected or not.

Apartment buildings are very popular with families as it's usually much smaller than houses but frequently more spacious than a traditional residence. The lack of square footage does not prevent flat buildings from being highly desired. Many apartment buildings have at least two levels, and a few have more than three levels. The apartment units are usually classified as apartments, townhouses, rowhouses, condos, and penthouses.

Normally, flat complexes have one to three apartment units on each floor. Townhouses are located on the floor level of multi-family buildings, whereas condos and penthouses are located on the first and second floors of these buildings. Condos are also occasionally known as apartments, despite the fact that they do not contain real apartment units.

Amenities included in flat complexes vary greatly based on the building. Some buildings could have all of the basic amenities including a kitchen and bathroom, but might be lacking in other regions. Other buildings might have no utilities in any way, such as power. Some buildings may offer laundry facilities and contain cleaning. More affluent buildings might even provide live entertainment and multiple televisions.

Amenities are a determining factor in how much a renter will pay to lease an apartment complex or house. If the complex has conveniences, then a landlord will often charge a higher monthly lease. For example, if the building doesn't offer a swimming pool, the monthly rent will be higher. In the same way, if the apartment complex includes a fitness center, a resident will likely pay more a month. Tenants should take some time to research the amenities offered by various apartment complexes in their region.
