Craghus Drahar, also known as Crabfeeder to his friends, was introduced in Episode 2 as a new antagonist to compete with the ruthless Prince Daemon. Craghus Drahar, played by Daniel Scott-Smith, is a scaly-skinned Marauder who works with the Triarchy to secure the Stepstones region and whose victims are turned into chowder for thousands of tiny crustaceans.

King Viserys, played by Paddy Considine, is dangerously reluctant to deal with the threat posed by Craghus, and as a result, an enraged Lord Corlys, played by Steve Toussaint, has formed an alliance with the spurned Daemon.

Craghus is a threat. King Viserys. While this was going on, his daughter displayed the fearlessness that is required of a good leader by swooping onto Dragonstone atop her scaly steed Syrax to prevent a violent altercation between her scheming uncle and Ser Otto Hightower (Rhys Ifans) and his men.

This week's episode will take place one year later, and it promises to be a bloodbath. Lord Corlys will be attempting to flush out the Crabfeeder and his men from the Stepstones, and he will be doing so by letting dragons loose on the battlefield and turning soldiers into charred toast. That is something that should make the fans of Game of Thrones very happy.
