I dove right in, and from there I began to clear a path to the hallway. Once she was inside, she abruptly changed direction and began to push in the opposite direction while yelling "Eik! Eik!" in the meantime. Uzdaryk-duris!" in tones that made the uproar of the orchestra sound like it was being performed by fairies. "Z. Graiczunas, Pasilinksminimams darzas."

It was written like this on the signs: "Vynas. Sznapsas. Wines and Liquors. Union Headquarters." The explanation that the location was the back room of a saloon in the neighborhood of Chicago known as "back of the yards" will likely come as a relief to the reader, who may never have engaged in much conversation in the language of faraway Lithuania.

This information is definite and appropriate to the matter at hand; however, how pitifully inadequate it would have seemed to someone who understood that it was also the supreme hour of ecstasy in the life of one of God's gentlest creatures, the scene of the wedding feast and the joy-transfiguration of little Ona Lukoszaite! This was the happy ending to an otherwise dreadful journey. Because it had been so many years since Jokubas Szedvilas had spoken with a man from his region of Lithuania, the two families practically piled on top of each other in greeting. In less than an hour, they became inseparable companions. Jokubas was aware of every potential pitfall that awaited him in this new world and was able to decipher every one of its mysteries.

He was able to explain the actions they should have taken in each of the crises, and what was even more important was that he could also explain what they should do right now. He would take them to poni Aniele, who ran a boardinghouse on the opposite side of the yards; he explained that she was the elderly Mrs. Jukniene.

Had accommodations that could not be described as desirable, but for the time being, they would have to do. Teta Elzbieta quickly retorted to this by saying that nothing could be too affordable for them at the moment because they were quite terrified over the amounts of money they had been forced to spend. The harsh reality that this land of high wages was also a land of high prices and that the poor man was almost as poor as in any other corner of the earth had been made clear to them after only a few short days of practical experience in this land, and as a result, all of the wonderful dreams of wealth that had been haunting Jurgis vanished in the space of a single night.

The fact that they were spending, at American prices, money that they had earned at home rates of wages, which meant that they were actually being cheated by the world, had made the discovery that much more painful. They had nearly starved themselves over the course of the previous two days because the prices that the railroad people demanded from them for food made them feel quite ill.

However, when they arrived at the Widow Jukniene's house, they were unable to contain their horror. Despite this, throughout their entire journey, they had not encountered anything nearly as terrible as this. Poni Aniele had a flat that was four rooms in size and was located in the "back of the yards," which is a wilderness of two-story frame tenements. The Jungle, in PDF Format

There were four apartments of this type in each building, and each one served as a "boardinghouse" for people from other countries, such as Lithuanians, Poles, Slovaks, or Bohemians. Some of these establishments were privately run, while others were run by a cooperative.

On average, there would be six boarders in each room, but there could be as many as thirteen or fourteen in a single room, and as many as fifty or sixty in an apartment. Every individual who resided there was responsible for providing his or her own sleeping arrangements, which consisted of a mattress and various types of bedding.

There would be nothing else in the room besides a single stove, and the mattresses would be arranged in rows across the floor. It was not at all unusual for two men to share the same mattress, with either one of them working during the day and sleeping on it at night, or the other working during the night and sleeping on it during the day. It was very common practice for the proprietor of a lodging house to rent the same beds to men working double shifts. Upon entering one of the Durham buildings, they discovered a number of other visitors waiting; and not long after that, a guide arrived to lead them through the location. They make it a point to walk complete strangers through the packing plants because they know it's great advertising for their business.

Ponas Jokubas, however, spread the malicious rumor that the visitors did not see any more than the packers desired for them to see. They reached the top of the building by ascending a winding staircase that was located outside the structure, which had five or six stories. Here was the chute, with its river of hogs, all patiently toiling their way upward; there was a place for them to rest and cool off after their exertion.

Then, via yet another corridor, they entered a room from which hogs are forbidden to emerge again under any circumstances. It was a lengthy and confined space, with a gallery for guests running along its length. A massive iron wheel measuring approximately twenty feet in circumference and adorned with rings at various points along its edge could be found at the very top. Downloadable PDF Version of the Book "The Jungle"

The hogs, having completed their journey, entered the confined area that was located on both sides of the wheel. In the midst of the hogs stood a large, burly African man who was unclothed from the chest down. He was able to relax for the time being because the wheel had stopped turning while the other men cleaned up the mess.

After a minute or two, however, it started turning slowly, and the men who were standing on either side of it immediately got to work. They utilized chains, one end of which was hooked into one of the rings located on the wheel, and the other end was secured around the leg of the nearest pig. As a result, a pig was suddenly lifted off the ground and carried into the air as the wheel turned.

The guests were taken there and shown them, all of which were neatly hung in rows, labeled conspicuously with the tags of the government inspectors—and some of them, which had been killed by a special process, were marked with the sign of the kosher rabbi, certifying that it was suitable for sale to the orthodox. And after that, the guests were taken to the other parts of the building to see what became of each particle of the waste material that had vanished through the floor; and to the pickling rooms, and the salting rooms, and the canning rooms, and the packing rooms, where choice meat was prepared for shipping in refrigerator cars.

Ultimately destined to be consumed in every nook and cranny of civilized society. After that, they went outside and wandered around among the mazes of buildings that were used for the work that was ancillary to this major industry. There was hardly anything that could be required for the company's operations that Durham and Company did not produce on their own.

There was a massive steam power plant in addition to an electric power plant. In addition, there was a boiler repair shop and a barrel factory. There was a building to which the grease was piped in order to make soap and lard; there was also a factory for making lard cans, as well as another factory for making soap boxes. There was a building where the skins were dried and tanned, there was another building where the heads and feet were used to make glue, and there was another building where the bones were used to make fertilizer.

There was not the slightest bit of organic matter that was thrown away in Durham's. Out of the horns of the cattle, they fashioned combs, buttons, hairpins, and an imitation of ivory; out of the shinbones and other large bones, they fashioned handles for knives and toothbrushes, as well as mouthpieces for pipes; and out of the hoofs, they fashioned hairpins and buttons, before turning the remainder of the hoofs into glue.

Gelatin, isinglass, phosphorus, bone black, shoe blacking, and bone oil are just some of the strange and unlikely byproducts that originated from things like feet, knuckles, hide clippings, and sinews. Other byproducts include bone black, shoe blacking, and bone oil. They produced pepsin from the stomachs of the pigs, and they had curled-hair works for the tails of the cattle and a "wool pullery" for the wool of the sheep. And albumen made from the blood, along with violin strings made from the putrid internal organs. When there was nothing else that could be done with something, the first thing that was done was to put it into a tank and then remove all of the tallow and grease from it before turning it into fertilizer. All of these different types of businesses were consolidated into a few nearby buildings, which were linked to the primary establishment by galleries and railroads.

In addition, it was estimated that they had worked with close to a quarter of a billion animals ever since the plant was established by the senior Durham more than a generation ago. It was, so Jokubas informed them, the greatest aggregation of labor and capital that had ever been gathered in one place, if you counted it together with the other large plants (which were now really all one), Jokubas said.

It was responsible for the direct financial support of two hundred and fifty thousand people in the surrounding area, as well as the indirect financial support of a half a million. It supplied at least thirty million people with food and exported its goods to every country in the civilized world. The Jungle, a Book Available in PDF Format

A more favorable turn of events than all of this could hardly have been wished for; there was only one of them left to look for a spot. Jurgis was adamant that Teta Elzbieta should not leave the house and that Ona should provide assistance to her in this endeavor. Ona would not be allowed to work for him because, in his words, both he and she were not the type of people who would do such a thing.

It would be a peculiar occurrence if a man of his stature were unable to provide for his family with the assistance of Jonas and Marija serving as board members. Jurgis had heard that there were schools in the United States specifically designed for children where they did not have to pay tuition in order to attend. Jurgis was adamant that the children would not be allowed to work under any circumstances.

That the priest would object to these schools was something that he did not yet have any idea of, and for the time being, he had made up his mind that the children of Teta Elzbieta should have as fair a chance as any other children. The eldest of them all, little Stanislovas, had just turned thirteen but was still quite young for his age. The Jungle, a Book Available in PDF Format

And despite the fact that Szedvilas's eldest son, Stanislovas, was only twelve years old when he started working at Jones's, Jurgis was adamant that Stanislovas study English and develop into a capable adult. So there was only Dede Antanas in his old age; Jurgis would have given him some rest as well, but he was forced to admit that this was not possible.

It was the old man's whim to insist that he was as lively as any boy, but he would not hear it spoken of because he did not want it mentioned. He had arrived in the United States with just as much optimism as the rest of them, but now he was the primary source of concern for his son. Because everyone that Jurgis talked to told him that looking for work in Packingtown for the elderly man was a waste of time, Jurgis decided not to pursue this option.

Szedvilas told him that the packers did not even keep the men who had grown old in their own service, so it is safe to assume that they do not take on any new employees. Not only was it the rule around here, but as far as he was aware, it was the rule everywhere in the United States. In order to appease Jurgis, he inquired of the policeman and brought back the information that the matter was not to be considered. The Jungle, a Book Available in PDF Format

They had failed to tell old Anthony this information, and as a result, he had spent the past two days aimlessly wandering from one part of the yards to another. He had now returned home to learn about the success of the others, smiling bravely and saying that it would be his turn one day in the future.
