The young man entered the study and sat slouched in a chair. Why was he so determined to reject the philosopher's theories? His reasons were abundantly clear. He lacked self-condence and, ever since childhood, this had been compounded by deep-seated feelings of inferiority with regard to his personal and academic backgrounds, as well as his physical appearance.

It's possible that this was the cause of his tendency to be overly self-conscious whenever other people looked at him. The majority of the time, he appeared incapable of genuinely appreciating the joy that other people experienced and was perpetually pitying himself. The claims made by the philosopher appeared to him to be nothing more than the figment of his imagination.

It seems reasonable to assume that you are unfamiliar with the name Adler. According to what he said himself, "There may come a time when one will not remember my name; one may even have forgotten that our school was ever in existence." After that, he continued by stating that it was of no consequence. The implication here is that if his school were to become forgotten, it would be because his ideas concerning scholarship have become commonplace and a feeling that is shared by everyone.

For instance, Dale Carnegie, author of the international best-selling books How to Win Friends and Influence People and How to Stop Worrying and Start Living, referred to Adler as "a great psychologist who devoted his life to researching humans and their latent abilities." Carnegie's books How to Win Friends and Influence People and How to Stop Worrying and Start Living have sold millions of copies around the world. There is no question that Adler's way of thinking had a significant impact on all of his writings.

And a significant portion of the information presented in Stephen Covey's book, The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People, is strikingly similar to that presented by Adler. In other words, Adlerian psychology is generally accepted as a realization, a culmination of truths and of human understanding rather than as a specific field of academic study. On the other hand, it is said that Adler's ideas were one hundred years ahead of their time, and even now, we have not been able to fully comprehend them.
