Cash's head turns slowly as we approach, his pale empty sad composed and questioning face following the red and empty curve; beside the back wheel Jewel sits the horse, gazing straight ahead.

The land runs out of Darl's eyes; they swim to pinpoints. They begin at my feet and rise along my body to my face, and then my dress is gone: I sit naked on the seat above the unhurrying mules, above the travail. Suppose I tell him to turn. He will do what I say. Dont you know he will do what I say? Once I waked with a black void rushing under me. I could not see. I saw Vardaman rise and go to the window and strike the knife into the fish, the blood gushing, hissing like steam but I could not see. He'll do as I say. He always does. I can persuade him to anything. You know I can. Suppose I say Turn here. That was when I died that time. Suppose I do. We'll go to New Hope. We wont have to go to town. I rose and took the knife from the streaming fish still hissing and I killed Darl.

When I used to sleep with Vardaman I had a nightmare once I thought I was awake but I couldn't see and couldn't feel I couldn't feel the bed under me and I couldn't think what I was I couldn't think of my name I couldn't even think I am a girl I couldn't even think I nor even think I want to wake up nor remember what was opposite to awake so I could do that I knew that something was passing but I couldn't even think of time then all of a sudden I knew that something was it was wind blowing over me it was like the wind came and blew me back from where it was I was not blowing the room and Vardaman asleep and all of them back under me again and going on like a piece of cool silk dragging across my naked legs

It blows cool out of the pines, a sad steady sound. New Hope. Was 3 mi. Was 3 mi. I believe in God I believe in God.

"Why didn't we go to New Hope, pa?" Vardaman says. "Mr Samson said we was, but we done passed the road."

Darl says, "Look, Jewel." But he is not looking at me. He is looking at the sky. The buzzard is as still as if he were nailed to it.

We turn into Tull's lane. We pass the barn and go on, the wheels whispering in the mud, passing the green rows of cotton in the wild earth, and Vernon little across the field behind the plow. He lifts his hand as we pass and stands there looking after us for a long while.

"Look, Jewel," Darl says. Jewel sits on his horse like they were both made out of wood, looking straight ahead.

I believe in God, God. God, I believe in God.

Tull

After they passed I taken the mule out and looped up the trace chains and followed. They was setting in the wagon at the end of the levee when I caught up with them. Anse was setting there, looking at the bridge where it was swagged down into the river with just the two ends in sight. He was looking at it like he had believed all the time that folks had been lying to him about it being gone, but like he was hoping all the time it really was. Kind of pleased astonishment he looked, setting on the wagon in his Sunday pants, mumbling his mouth. Looking like a uncurried horse dressed up: I dont know.

The boy was watching the bridge where it was mid-sunk and logs and such drifted up over it and it swagging and shivering like the whole thing would go any minute, big-eyed he was watching it, like he was to a circus. And the gal too. When I come up she looked around at me, her eyes kind of blaring up and going hard like I had made to touch her. Then she looked at Anse again and then back at the water again.

It was nigh up to the levee on both sides, the earth hid except for the tongue of it we was on going out to the bridge and then down into the water, and except for knowing how the road and the bridge used to look, a fellow couldn't tell where was the river and where the land. It was just a tangle of yellow and the levee not less wider than a knife-back kind of, with us setting in the wagon and on the horse and the mule.

Darl was looking at me, and then Cash turned and looked at me with that look in his eyes like when he was figuring on whether the planks would fit her that night, like he was measuring them inside of him and not asking you to say what you thought and not even letting on he was listening if you did say it, but listening all right. Jewel hadn't moved. He sat there on the horse, leaning a little forward, with that same look on his face when him and Darl passed the house yesterday, coming back to get her.

"If it was just up, we could drive across," Anse says. "We could drive right on across it."

Sometimes a log would get shoved over the jam and float on, rolling and turning, and we could watch it go on to where the ford used to be. It would slow up and whirl crossways and hang out of water for a minute, and you could tell by that that the ford used to be there.

"But that dont show nothing," I say. "It could be a bar of quicksand built up there." We watch the log. Then the gal is looking at me again.

"Mr Whitfield crossed it," she says.

"He was a-horseback," I say. "And three days ago. It's a riz five foot since."

"If the bridge was just up," Anse says.

The log bobs up and goes on again. There is a lot of trash and foam, and you can hear the water.

"But it's down," Anse says.

Cash says, "A careful fellow could walk across yonder on the planks and logs."

"But you couldn't tote nothing," I say. "Likely time you set foot on that mess, it'll all go, too. What you think, Darl?"

He is looking at me. He dont say nothing; just looks at me with them queer eyes of hisn that makes folks talk. I always say it aint never been what he done so much or said or anything so much as how he looks at you. It's like he had got into the inside of you, someway. Like somehow you was looking at yourself and your doings outen his eyes. Then I can feel that gal watching me like I had made to touch her. She says something to Anse. “. . . Mr Whitfield. . .” she says.

“I give her my promised word in the presence of the Lord,” Anse says. “I reckon it aint no need to worry.”

But still he does not start the mules. We set there above the water. Another log bobs up over the jam and goes on; we watch it check up and swing slow for a minute where the ford used to be. Then it goes on.

“It might start falling tonight,” I say. “You could lay over one more day.”

Then Jewel turns sideways on the horse. He has not moved until then, and he turns and looks at me. His face is kind of green, then it would go red and then green again. “Get to hell on back to your damn plowing,” he says. “Who the hell asked you to follow us here?”

“I never meant no harm,” I say.

“Shut up, Jewel,” Cash says. Jewel looks back at the water, his face gritted, going red and green and then red. “Well,” Cash says after a while, “what you want to do?”

Anse dont say nothing. He sets humped up, mumbling his mouth. “If it was just up, we could drive across it,” he says.

“Come on,” Jewel says, moving the horse.

“Wait,” Cash says. He looks at the bridge. We look at him, except Anse and the gal. They are looking at the water. “Dewey Dell and Vardaman and pa better walk across on the bridge,” Cash says.

“Vernon can help them,” Jewel says. “And we can hitch his mule ahead of ourn.”

“You ain’t going to take my mule into that water,” I say.

Jewel looks at me. His eyes look like pieces of a broken plate. “I’ll pay for your damn mule. I’ll buy it from you right now.”

“My mule aint going into that water,” I say.

“Jewel’s going to use his horse,” Darl says. “Why wont you risk your mule, Vernon?”

“Shut up, Darl,” Cash says. “You and Jewel both.”

“My mule aint going into that water,” I say.

Darl

He sits the horse, glaring at Vernon, his lean face suffused up to and beyond the pale rigidity of his eyes. The summer when he was fifteen, he took a spell of sleeping. One morning when I went to feed the mules the cows were still in the tie-up and then I heard pa go back to the house and call him. When we came on back to the house for breakfast he passed us, carrying the milk buckets, stumbling along like he was drunk, and he was milking when we put the mules in and went on to the field without him. We had been there an hour and still he never showed up. When Dewey Dell came with our lunch, pa sent her back to find Jewel. They found him in the tie-up, sitting on the stool, asleep.

After that, every morning pa would go in and wake him. He would go to sleep at the supper table and soon as supper was finished he would go to bed, and when I came in to bed he would be lying there like a dead man. Yet still pa would have to wake him in the morning. He would get up, but he wouldn't hardly have half sense: he would stand for pa's jawing and complaining without a word and take the milk buckets and go to the barn, and once I found him asleep at the cow, the bucket in place and half full and his hands up to the wrists in the milk and his head against the cow's flank.

After that Dewey Dell had to do the milking. He still got up when pa waked him, going about what we told him to do in that dazed way. It was like he was trying hard to do them; that he was as puzzled as anyone else.

"Are you sick?" ma said. "Dont you feel all right?"

"Yes," Jewel said. "I feel all right."

"He's just lazy, trying me," pa said, and Jewel standing there, asleep on his feet like as not. "Ain't you?" he said, waking Jewel up again to answer.

"No," Jewel said.

"You take off and stay in the house today," ma said.

"With that whole bottom piece to be busted out?"⁷ pa said. "If you aint sick, what's the matter with you?"

"Nothing," Jewel said. "I'm all right."

"All right?" pa said. "You're asleep on your feet this minute."

"No," Jewel said. "I'm all right."

"I want him to stay at home today," ma said.

"I'll need him," pa said. "It's tight enough, with all of us to do it."

"You'll just have to do the best you can with Cash and Darl," ma said. "I want him to stay in today."

But he wouldn't do it. "I'm all right," he said, going on. But he wasn't all right. Anybody could see it. He was losing flesh, and I have seen him go to sleep chopping; watched the hoe going slower and slower up and down, with less and less of an arc, until it stopped and he leaning on it motionless in the hot shimmer of the sun.

Ma wanted to get the doctor, but pa didn't want to spend the money without it was needful, and Jewel did seem all right except for his thinness and his way of dropping off to sleep at any moment. He ate hearty enough, except for his way of going to sleep in his plate, with a piece of bread half-way to his mouth and his jaws still chewing. But he swore he was all right.

It was ma that got Dewey Dell to do his milking, paid her somehow, and the other jobs around the house that Jewel had been doing before supper she found some way for Dewey Dell and Vardaman to do them. And doing them herself when pa wasn't there. She would fix him special things to eat and hide them for him. And that may have been when I first found it out, that Addie Bundren should be hiding anything she did, who had tried to teach us that deceit was such that, in a world where it was, nothing else could be very bad or very important, not even poverty. And at times when I went in to go to bed she would be sitting in the dark by Jewel where he was asleep. And I knew that she was hating herself for that deceit and hating Jewel because she had to love him so that she had to act the deceit.

One night she was taken sick and when I went to the barn to put the team in and drive to Tull's, I couldn't find the lantern. I remembered noticing it on the nail the night before, but it wasn't there now at midnight. So I hitched in the dark and went on and came back with Mrs Tull just after daylight.

7. Plowed.

And there the lantern was, hanging on the nail where I remembered it and couldn't find it before. And then one morning while Dewey Dell was milking just before the sunup, Jewel came into the barn from the back, through the hole in the back wall, with the lantern in his hand.

I told Cash, and Cash and I looked at one another.

"Rutting," Cash said.

"Yes," I said. "But why the lantern? And every night, too. No wonder he's losing flesh. Are you going to say anything to him?"

"Wont do any good," Cash said.

"What he's doing now wont do any good, either."

"I know. But he'll have to learn that himself. Give him time to realise that it'll save, that there'll be just as much more tomorrow, and he'll be all right. I wouldn't tell anybody, I reckon."

"No," I said. "I told Dewey Dell not to. Not ma, anyway."

"No. Not ma."

After that I thought it was right comical: he acting so bewildered and willing and dead for sleep and gaunt as a bean-pole, and thinking he was so smart with it. And I wondered who the girl was. I thought of all I knew that it might be, but I couldn't say for sure.

"Taint any girl," Cash said. "It's a married woman somewhere. Aint any young girl got that much daring and staying power. That's what I dont like about it."

"Why?" I said. "She'll be safer for him than a girl would. More judgment."

He looked at me, his eyes fumbling, the words fumbling at what he was trying to say. "It ain't always the safe things in this world that a fellow . . ."

"You mean, the safe things are not always the best things?"

"Ay; best," he said, fumbling again. "It aint the best things, the things that are good for him. . . . A young boy. A fellow kind of hates to see . . . wallowing in somebody else's mire . . ." That's what he was trying to say. When something is new and hard and bright, there ought to be something a little better for it than just being safe, since the safe things are just the things that folks have been doing so long they have worn the edges off and there's nothing to the doing of them that leaves a man to say, That was not done before and it cannot be done again.

So we didn't tell, not even when after a while he'd appear suddenly in the field beside us and go to work, without having had time to get home and make out he had been in bed all night. He would tell ma that he hadn't been hungry at breakfast or that he had eaten a piece of bread while he was hitching up the team. But Cash and I knew that he hadn't been home at all on those nights and he had come up out of the woods when we got to the field. But we didn't tell. Summer was almost over then; we knew that when the nights began to get cool, she would be done if he wasn't.

But when fall came and the nights began to get longer, the only difference was that he would always be in bed for pa to wake him, getting him up at last in that first state of semi-idiocy like when it first started, worse than when he had stayed out all night.

"She's sure a stayer," I told Cash. "I used to admire her, but I downright respect her now."

"It aint a woman," he said.

"You know," I said. But he was watching me. "What is it, then?"

"That's what I aim to find out," he said.

"You can trail him through the woods all night if you want to," I said. "I'm not."

"I aint trailing him," he said.

"What do you call it, then?"

"I aint trailing him," he said. "I dont mean it that way."

And so a few nights later I heard Jewel get up and climb out the window, and then I heard Cash get up and follow him. The next morning when I went to the barn, Cash was already there, the mules fed, and he was helping Dewey Dell milk. And when I saw him I knew that he knew what it was. Now and then I would catch him watching Jewel with a queer look, like having found out where Jewel went and what he was doing had given him something to really think about at last. But it was not a worried look; it was the kind of look I would see on him when I would find him doing some of Jewel's work around the house, work that pa still thought Jewel was doing and that ma thought Dewey Dell was doing. So I said nothing to him, believing that when he got done digesting it in his mind, he would tell me. But he never did.

One morning—it was November then, five months since it started—Jewel was not in bed and he didn't join us in the field. That was the first time ma learned anything about what had been going on. She sent Vardaman down to find where Jewel was, and after a while she came down too. It was as though, so long as the deceit ran along quiet and monotonous, all of us let ourselves be deceived, abetting it unawares or maybe through cowardice, since all people are cowards and naturally prefer any kind of treachery because it has a bland outside. But now it was like we had all—and by a kind of telepathic agreement of admitted fear—flung the whole thing back like covers on the bed and we all sitting bolt upright in our nakedness, staring at one another and saying "Now is the truth. He hasn't come home. Something has happened to him. We let something happen to him."

Then we saw him. He came up along the ditch and then turned straight across the field, riding the horse. Its mane and tail were going, as though in motion they were carrying out the splotchy pattern of its coat: he looked like he was riding on a big pinwheel, barebacked, with a rope bridle, and no hat on his head. It was a descendant of those Texas ponies Flem Snopes brought here twenty-five years ago and auctioned off for two dollars a head and nobody but old Lon Quick ever caught his and still owned some of the blood because he could never give it away.

He galloped up and stopped, his heels in the horse's ribs and it dancing and swirling like the shape of its mane and tail and the splotches of its coat had nothing whatever to do with the flesh-and-bone horse inside them, and he sat there, looking at us.

"Where did you get that horse?" pa said.

"Bought it," Jewel said. "From Mr. Quick."

"Bought it?" pa said. "With what? Did you buy that thing on my word?"

"It was my money," Jewel said. "I earned it. You wont need to worry about it."

"Jewel," ma said; "Jewel."

"It's all right," Cash said. "He earned the money. He cleaned up that forty acres of new ground Quick laid out last spring. He did it single handed, working at night by lantern. I saw him. So I dont reckon that horse cost anybody anything except Jewel. I dont reckon we need worry.”

“Jewel,” ma said. “Jewel . . .” Then she said: “You come right to the house and go to bed.”

“Not yet,” Jewel said. “I aint got time. I got to get me a saddle and bridle. Mr. Quick says he . . .”

“Jewel,” ma said, looking at him. “I’ll give—I’ll give . . . give . . .” Then she began to cry. She cried hard, not hiding her face, standing there in her faded wrapper, looking at him and him on the horse, looking down at her, his face growing cold and a little sick looking, until he looked away quick and Cash came and touched her.

“You go on to the house,” Cash said. “This here ground is too wet for you. You go on, now.” She put her hands to her face then and after a while she went on, stumbling a little on the plow-marks. But pretty soon she straightened up and went on. She didn’t look back. When she reached the ditch she stopped and called Vardaman. He was looking at the horse, kind of dancing up and down by it.

“Let me ride, Jewel,” he said. “Let me ride, Jewel.”

Jewel looked at him, then he looked away again, holding the horse reined back. Pa watched him, mumbling his lip.

“So you bought a horse,” he said. “You went behind my back and bought a horse. You never consulted me; you know how tight it is for us to make by, yet you bought a horse for me to feed. Taken the work from your flesh and blood and bought a horse with it.”

Jewel looked at pa, his eyes paler than ever. “He wont never eat a mouthful of yours,” he said. “Not a mouthful. I’ll kill him first. Dont you never think it. Dont you never.”

“Let me ride, Jewel,” Vardaman said. “Let me ride, Jewel.” He sounded like a cricket in the grass, a little one. “Let me ride, Jewel.”

That night I found ma sitting beside the bed where he was sleeping, in the dark. She cried hard, maybe because she had to cry so quiet; maybe because she felt the same way about tears she did about deceit, hating herself for doing it, hating him because she had to. And then I knew that I knew. I knew that as plain on that day as I knew about Dewey Dell on that day.

Tull

So they finally got Anse to say what he wanted to do, and him and the gal and the boy got out of the wagon. But even when we were on the bridge Anse kept on looking back, like he thought maybe, once he was outen the wagon, the whole thing would kind of blow up and he would find himself back yonder in the field again and her laying up there in the house, waiting to die and it to do all over again.

“You ought to let them taken your mule,” he says, and the bridge shaking and swaying under us, going down into the moiling water like it went clean through to the other side of the earth, and the other end coming up outen the water like it wasn’t the same bridge a-tall and that them that would walk up outen the water on that side must come from the bottom of the earth. But it was still whole; you could tell that by the way when this end swagged, it didn't look like the other end swagged at all: just like the other trees and the bank yonder were swinging back and forth slow like on a big clock. And them logs scraping and bumping at the sunk part and tilting end-up and shooting clean outen the water and tumbling on toward the ford and the waiting, slick, whirling, and foamy.

"What good would that a done?" I says. "If your team cant find the ford and haul it across, what good would three mules or even ten mules do?"

"I aint asking it of you," he says. "I can always do for me and mine. I aint asking you to risk your mule. It aint your dead; I am not blaming you."

"They ought to went back and laid over until tomorrow," I says. The water was cold. It was thick, like slush ice. Only it kind of lived. One part of you knowed it was just water, the same thing that had been running under this same bridge for a long time, yet when them logs would come spewing up outen it, you were not surprised, like they was a part of water, of the waiting and the threat.

It was like when we was across, up out of the water again and the hard earth under us, that I was surprised. It was like we hadn't expected the bridge to end on the other bank, on something tame like the hard earth again that we had tromped on before this time and knowed well. Like it couldn't be me here, because I'd have had better sense than to done what I just done. And when I looked back and saw the other bank and saw my mule standing there where I used to be and knew that I'd have to get back there someway, I knew it couldn't be, because I just couldn't think of anything that could make me cross that bridge ever even once. Yet here I was, and the fellow that could make himself cross it twice, couldn't be me, not even if Cora told him to.

It was that boy. I said "Here; you better take a holt of my hand" and he waited and held to me. I be durn if it wasn't like he come back and got me; like he was saying They wont nothing hurt you. Like he was saying about a fine place he knowed where Christmas come twice with Thanksgiving and lasts on through the winter and the spring and the summer, and if I just stayed with him I'd be all right too.

When I looked back at my mule it was like he was one of these here spy-glasses and I could look at him standing there and see all the broad land and my house sweated outen it like it was the more the sweat, the broader the land; the more the sweat, the tighter the house because it would take a tight house for Cora, to hold Cora like a jar of milk in the spring: you've got to have a tight jar or you'll need a powerful spring, so if you have a big spring, why then you have the incentive to have tight, wellmade jars, because it is your milk, sour or not, because you would rather have milk that will sour than to have milk that wont, because you are a man.

And him holding to my hand, his hand that hot and confident, so that I was like to say: Look-a-here. Cant you see that mule yonder? He never had no business over here, so he never come, not being nothing but a mule. Because a fellow can see ever now and then that children have more sense than him. But he dont like to admit it to them until they have beards. After they have a beard, they are too busy because they dont know if they'll ever quite make it back to where they were in sense before they was haired, so you dont mind admitting then to folks that are worrying about the same thing that aint worth the worry that you are yourself.

Then we was over and we stood there, looking at Cash turning the wagon around. We watched them drive back down the road to where the trail turned off into the bottom. After a while the wagon was out of sight.

"We better get on down to the ford and git ready to help," I said.

"I give her my word," Anse says. "It is sacred on me. I know you begrudge it, but she will bless you in heaven."

"Well, they got to finish circumventing the land before they can dare the water," I said. "Come on."

"It's the turning back," he said. "It ain't no luck in turning back."

He was standing there, humped, mournful, looking at the empty road beyond the swagging and swaying bridge. And that gal, too, with the lunch basket on one arm and that package under the other. Just going to town. Bent on it. They would risk the fire and the earth and the water and all just to eat a sack of bananas. "You ought to laid over a day," I said. "It would a fell some by morning. It mought not a rained tonight. And it cant get no higher."

"I give my promise," he says. "She is counting on it."

Darl

Before us the thick dark current runs. It talks up to us in a murmur become ceaseless and myriad, the yellow surface dimpled monstrously into fading swirls travelling along the surface for an instant, silent, impermanent and profoundly significant, as though just beneath the surface something huge and alive waked for a moment of lazy alertness out of and into light slumber again.

It clucks and murmurs among the spokes and about the mules' knees, yellow, skummed with flotsam and with thick soiled gouts of foam as though it had sweat, lathering, like a driven horse. Through the undergrowth it goes with a plaintive sound, a musing sound; in it the unwinded cane and saplings lean as before a little gale, swaying without reflections as though suspended on invisible wires from the branches overhead. Above the ceaseless surface they stand—trees, cane, vines—rootless, severed from the earth, spectral above a scene of immense yet circumscribed desolation filled with the voice of the waste and mournful water.

Cash and I sit in the wagon; Jewel sits the horse at the off rear wheel. The horse is trembling, its eye rolling wild and baby-blue in its long pink face, its breathing stertorous like groaning. He sits erect, poised, looking quietly and steadily and quickly this way and that, his face calm, a little pale, alert. Cash's face is also gravely composed; he and I look at one another with long probing looks, looks that plunge unimpeded through one another's eyes and into the ultimate secret place where for an instant Cash and Darl crouch flagrant and unabashed in all the old terror and the old foreboding, alert and secret and without shame. When we speak our voices are quiet, detached.

"I reckon we're still in the road, all right."

"Tull taken and cut them two big whiteoaks. I heard tell how at high water in the old days they used to line up the ford by them trees."

"I reckon he did that two years ago when he was logging down here. I reckon he never thought that anybody would ever use this ford again."

"I reckon not. Yes, it must have been then. He cut a sight of timber outen here then. Payed off that mortgage with it, I hear tell."

"Yes. Yes, I reckon so. I reckon Vernon could have done that."

"That's a fact. Most folks that logs in this here country, they need a durn good farm to support the sawmill. Or maybe a store. But I reckon Vernon could."

"I reckon so. He's a sight."

"Ay. Vernon is. Yes, it must still be here. He never would have got that timber out of here if he hadn't cleaned out that old road. I reckon we are still on it." He looks about quietly, at the position of the trees, leaning this way and that, looking back along the floorless road shaped vaguely high in air by the position of the lopped and felled trees, as if the road too had been soaked free of earth and floated upward, to leave in its spectral tracing a monument to a still more profound desolation than this above which we now sit, talking quietly of old security and old trivial things. Jewel looks at him, then at me, then his face turns in in that quiet, constant, questing about the scene, the horse trembling quietly and steadily between his knees.

"He could go on ahead slow and sort of feel it out," I say.

"Yes," Cash says, not looking at me. His face is in profile as he looks forward where Jewel has moved on ahead.

"He cant miss the river," I say. "He couldn't miss seeing it fifty yards ahead."

Cash does not look at me, his face in profile. "If I'd just suspicioned it, I could a come down last week and taken a sight on it."

"The bridge was up then," I say. He does not look at me. "Whitfield crossed it a-horseback."

Jewel looks at us again, his expression sober and alert and subdued. His voice is quiet. "What you want me to do?"

"I ought to come down last week and taken a sight on it," Cash says.

"We couldn't have known," I say. "There wasn't any way for us to know."

"I'll ride on ahead," Jewel says. "You can follow where I am." He lifts the horse. It shrinks, bowed; he leans to it, speaking to it, lifting it forward almost bodily, it setting its feet down with gingerly splashings, trembling, breathing harshly. He speaks to it, murmurs to it. "Go on," he says. "I aint going to let nothing hurt you. Go on, now."

"Jewel," Cash says. Jewel does not look back. He lifts the horse on.

"He can swim," I say. "If he'll just give the horse time, anyhow . . ." When he was born, he had a bad time of it. Ma would sit in the lamp-light, holding him on a pillow on her lap. We would wake and find her so. There would be no sound from them.

"That pillow was longer than him," Cash says. He is leaning a little forward. "I ought to come down last week and sighted. I ought to done it."

"That's right," I say. "Neither his feet nor his head would reach the end of it. You couldn't have known," I say.

"I ought to done it," he says. He lifts the reins. The mules move, into the traces; the wheels murmur alive in the water. He looks back and down at Addie. "It aint on a balance," he says.

At last the trees open; against the open river Jewel sits the horse, half turned, it belly deep now. Across the river we can see Vernon and pa and Vardaman and Dewey Dell. Vernon is waving at us, waving us further downstream.

"We are too high up," Cash says. Vernon is shouting too, but we cannot make out what he says for the noise of the water. It runs steady and deep now, unbroken, without sense of motion until a log comes along, turning slowly. "Watch it," Cash says. We watch it and see it falter and hang for a moment, the current building up behind it in a thick wave, submerging it for an instant before it shoots up and tumbles on.

"There it is," I say.

"Ay," Cash says. "It's there." We look at Vernon again. He is now flapping his arms up and down. We move on downstream, slowly and carefully, watching Vernon. He drops his hands. "This is the place," Cash says.

"Well, goddamn it, let's get across, then," Jewel says. He moves the horse on.

"You wait," Cash says. Jewel stops again.

"Well, by God—" he says. Cash looks at the water, then he looks back at Addie. "It aint on a balance," he says.

"Then go on back to the goddamn bridge and walk across," Jewel says. "You and Darl both. Let me on that wagon."

Cash does not pay him any attention. "It aint on a balance," he says. "Yes, sir. We got to watch it."

"Watch it, hell," Jewel says. "You get out of that wagon and let me have it. By God, if you're afraid to drive it over . . ." His eyes are pale as two bleached chips in his face. Cash is looking at him.

"We'll get it over," he says. "I tell you what you do. You ride on back and walk across the bridge and come down the other bank and meet us with the rope. Vernon'll take your horse home with him and keep it till we get back."

"You go to hell," Jewel says.

"You take the rope and come down the bank and be ready with it," Cash says. "Three cant do no more than two can—one to drive and one to steady it."

"Goddamn you," Jewel says.

"Let Jewel take the end of the rope and cross upstream of us and brace it," I say. "Will you do that, Jewel?"

Jewel watches me, hard. He looks quick at Cash, then back at me, his eyes alert and hard. "I dont give a damn. Just so we do something. Setting here, not lifting a goddamn hand . . ."

"Let's do that, Cash," I say.

"I reckon we'll have to," Cash says.

The river itself is not a hundred yards across, and pa and Vernon and Vardaman and Dewey Dell are the only things in sight not of that single monotony of desolation leaning with that terrific quality a little from right to left, as though we had reached the place where the motion of the wasted world accelerates just before the final precipice. Yet they appear dwarfed. It is as though the space between us were time: an irrevocable quality. It is as though time, no longer running straight before us in a diminishing line, now runs parallel between us like a looping string, the distance between the doubling accretion of the thread and not the interval between. The mules stand, their fore quarters already sloped a little, their rumps high. They too are breathing now with a deep groaning sound; looking back once, their gaze sweeps across us with in their eyes a wild, sad, profound and despairing quality as though they had already seen in the thick water the shape of the disaster which they could not speak and we could not see.

Cash turns back into the wagon. He lays his hands flat on Addie, rocking her a little. His face is calm, down-sloped, calculant, concerned. He lifts his box of tools and wedges it forward under the seat; together we shove Addie forward, wedging her between the tools and the wagon bed. Then he looks at me.

“No,” I say. “I reckon I’ll stay. Might take both of us.”

From the tool box he takes his coiled rope and carries the end twice around the seat stanchion and passes the end to me without tying it. The other end he pays out to Jewel, who takes a turn about his saddle horn.

He must force the horse down into the current. It moves, highkneed, archnecked, boring and chafing. Jewel sits lightly forward, his knees lifted a little; again his swift alert calm gaze sweeps upon us and on. He lowers the horse into the stream, speaking to it in a soothing murmur. The horse slips, goes under to the saddle, surges to its feet again, the current building up against Jewel’s thighs.

“Watch yourself,” Cash says.

“I’m on it now,” Jewel says. “You can come ahead now.”

Cash takes the reins and lowers the team carefully and skillfully into the stream.

I felt the current take us and I knew we were on the ford by that reason, since it was only by means of that slipping contact that we could tell that we were in motion at all. What had once been a flat surface was now a succession of troughs and hillocks lifting and falling about us, shoving at us, teasing at us with light lazy touches in the vain instants of solidity underfoot. Cash looked back at me, and then I knew that we were gone. But I did not realise the reason for the rope until I saw the log. It surged up out of the water and stood for an instant upright upon that surging and heaving desolation like Christ. Get out and let the current take you down to the bend, Cash said, You can make it all right. No, I said, I’d get just as wet that way as this

The log appears suddenly between two hills, as if it had rocketed suddenly from the bottom of the river. Upon the end of it a long gout of foam hangs like the beard of an old man or a goat. When Cash speaks to me I know that he has been watching it all the time, watching it and watching Jewel ten feet ahead of us. “Let the rope go,” he says. With his other hand he reaches down and reeves the two turns from the stanchion. “Ride on, Jewel,” he says; “see if you can pull us ahead of the log.”

Jewel shouts at the horse; again he appears to lift it bodily between his knees. He is just above the top of the ford and the horse has a purchase of some sort for it surges forward, shining wetly half out of water, crashing on in a succession of lunges. It moves unbelievably fast; by that token Jewel realises at last that the rope is free, for I can see him sawing back on the reins, his head turned, as the log rears in a long sluggish lunge between us, bearing down upon the team. They see it too; for a moment they also shine black out of water. Then the downstream one vanishes, dragging the other with him; the wagon sheers crosswise, poised on the crest of the ford as the log strikes it, tilting it up and on. Cash is half turned, the reins running taut from his hand and disappearing into the water, the other hand reached back upon Addie, holding her jammed over against the high side of the wagon. “Jump clear,” he says quietly. “Stay away from the team and dont try to fight it. It’ll swing you into the bend all right.”

"You come too," I say. Vernon and Vardaman are running along the bank, pa and Dewey Dell stand watching us, Dewey Dell with the basket and the package in her arms. Jewel is trying to fight the horse back. The head of one mule appears, its eyes wide; it looks back at us for an instant, making a sound almost human. The head vanishes again.

"Back, Jewel," Cash shouts. "Back, Jewel." For another instant I see him leaning to the tilting wagon, his arm braced back against Addie and his tools; I see the bearded head of the rearing log strike up again, and beyond it Jewel holding the horse upreared, its head wrenched around, hammering its head with his fist. I jump from the wagon on the downstream side. Between two hills I see the mules once more. They roll up out of the water in succession, turning completely over, their legs stiffly extended as when they had lost contact with the earth.

Vardaman

Cash tried but she fell off and Darl jumped going under he went under and Cash hollering to catch her and I hollering running and hollering and Dewey Dell hollering at me Vardaman you vardaman you vardaman and Vernon passed me because he was seeing her come up and she jumped into the water again and Darl hadn't caught her yet

He came up to see and I hollering catch her Darl catch her and he didn't come back because she was too heavy he had to go on catching at her and I hollering catch her darl catch her darl because in the water she could go faster than a man and Darl had to grabble for her so I knew he could catch her because he is the best grabber even with the mules in the way again they dived up rolling their feet stiff rolling down again and their backs up now and Darl had to again because in the water she could go faster than a man or a woman and I passed Vernon and he wouldn't get in the water and help Darl he wouldn't grabble for her with Darl he knew but he wouldn't help.

The mules dived up again diving their legs stiff their stiff legs rolling slow and then Darl again and I hollering catch her darl catch her head her into the bank darl and Vernon wouldn't help and then Darl dodged past the mules where he could he had her under the water coming in to the bank coming in slow because in the water she fought to stay under the water but Darl is strong and he was coming in slow and so I knew he had her because he came slow and I ran down into the water to help and I couldn't stop hollering because Darl was strong and steady holding her under the water even if she did fight he would not let her go he was seeing me and he would hold her and it was all right now it was all right now it was all right

Then he comes up out of the water. He comes a long way up slow before his hands do but he's got to have her got to so I can bear it. Then his hands come up and all of him above the water. I cant stop. I have not got time to try. I will try to when I can but his hands came empty out of the water emptying the water emptying away

"Where is ma, Darl?" I said. "You never got her. You knew she is a fish but you let her get away. You never got her. Darl. Darl. Darl." I began to run along the bank, watching the mules dive up slow again and then down again.

Tull

When I told Cora how Darl jumped out of the wagon and left Cash sitting there trying to save it and the wagon turning over, and Jewel that was almost to the bank fighting that horse back where it had more sense than to go, she says "And you're one of the folks that says Darl is the queer one, the one that aint bright, and him the only one of them that had sense enough to get off that wagon. I notice Anse was too smart to been on it a-tall."

"He couldn't a done no good, if he'd been there," I said. "They was going about it right and they would have made it if it hadn't a been for that log."

"Log, fiddlesticks," Cora said. "It was the hand of God."

"Then how can you say it was foolish?" I said. "Nobody cant guard against the hand of God. It would be sacrilege to try to."

"Then why dare it?" Cora says. "Tell me that."

"Anse didn't," I said. "That's just what you faulted him for."

"His place was there," Cora said. "If he had been a man, he would a been there instead of making his sons do what he dursn't."

"I dont know what you want, then," I said. "One breath you say they was daring the hand of God to try it, and the next breath you jump on Anse because he wasn't with them." Then she begun to sing again, working at the washtub, with that singing look in her face like she had done give up folks and all their foolishness and had done went on ahead of them, marching up the sky, singing.

The wagon hung for a long time while the current built up under it, shoving it off the ford, and Cash leaning more and more, trying to keep the coffin braced so it wouldn't slip down and finish tilting the wagon over. Soon as the wagon got tilted good, to where the current could finish it, the log went on. It headed around the wagon and went on good as a swimming man could have done. It was like it had been sent there to do a job and done it and went on.

When the mules finally kicked loose, it looked for a minute like maybe Cash would get the wagon back. It looked like him and the wagon wasn't moving at all, and just Jewel fighting that horse back to the wagon. Then that boy passed me, running and hollering at Darl and the gal trying to catch him, and then I see the mules come rolling slow up out of the water, their legs spraddled stiff like they had balked upside down, and roll on into the water again.

Then the wagon tilted over and then it and Jewel and the horse was all mixed up together. Cash went outen sight, still holding the coffin braced, and then I couldn't tell anything for the horse lunging and splashing. I thought that Cash had give up then and was swimming for it and I was yelling at Jewel to come on back and then all of a sudden him and the horse went under too and I thought they was all going. I knew that the horse had got dragged off the ford too, and with that wild drowning horse and that wagon and that loose box, it was going to be pretty bad, and there I was, standing knee-deep in the water, yelling at Anse behind me: "See what you done now? See what you done now?"

The horse come up again. It was headed for the bank now, throwing its head up, and then I saw one of them holding to the saddle on the downstream side, so I started running along the bank, trying to catch sight of Cash because he couldn't swim, yelling at Jewel where Cash was like a durn fool, bad as that boy that was on down the bank still hollering at Darl.

So I went down into the water so I could still keep some kind of a grip in the mud, when I saw Jewel. He was middle deep, so I knew he was on the ford, anyway, leaning hard upstream, and then I see the rope, and then I see the water building up where he was holding the wagon snubbed just below the ford.

So it was Cash holding to the horse when it come splashing and scrambling up the bank, moaning and groaning like a natural man. When I come to it it was just kicking Cash loose from his holt on the saddle. His face turned up a second when he was sliding back into the water. It was gray, with his eyes closed and a long swipe of mud across his face. Then he let go and turned over in the water. He looked just like a old bundle of clothes kind of washing up and down against the bank. He looked like he was laying there in the water on his face, rocking up and down a little, looking at something on the bottom.

We could watch the rope cutting down into the water, and we could feel the weight of the wagon kind of blump and lunge lazy like, like it just as soon as not, and that rope cutting down into the water hard as a iron bar. We could hear the water hissing on it like it was red hot. Like it was a straight iron bar stuck into the bottom and us holding the end of it, and the wagon lazing up and down, kind of pushing and prodding at us like it had come around and got behind us, lazy like, like it just as soon as not when it made up its mind. There was a shoat come by, blowed up like a balloon: one of them spotted shoats of Lon Quick's. It bumped against the rope like it was a iron bar and bumped off and went on, and us watching that rope slanting down into the water. We watched it.

Darl

Cash lies on his back on the earth, his head raised on a rolled garment. His eyes are closed, his face is gray, his hair plastered in a smooth smear across his forehead as though done with a paint brush. His face appears sunken a little, sagging from the bony ridges of eye sockets, nose, gums, as though the wetting had slacked the firmness which had held the skin full; his teeth, set in pale gums, are parted a little as if he had been laughing quietly. He lies pole-thin in his wet clothes, a little pool of vomit at his head and a thread of it running from the corner of his mouth and down his cheek where he couldn't turn his head quick or far enough, until Dewey Dell stoops and wipes it away with the hem of her dress.

Jewel approaches. He has the plane. "Vernon just found the square," he says. He looks down at Cash, dripping too. "Aint he talked none yet?"

"He had his saw and hammer and chalk-line and rule," I say. "I know that."

Jewel lays the square down. Pa watches him. "They cant be far away," pa says. "It all went together. Was there ere a such misfortunate man."

Jewel does not look at Pa. "You better call Vardaman back here," he says. He looks at Cash. Then he turns and goes away. "Get him to talk soon as he can," he says, "so he can tell us what else there was."

We return to the river. The wagon is hauled clear, the wheels chocked (carefully: we all helped; it is as though upon the shabby, familiar, inert shape of the wagon there lingered somehow, latent yet still immediate, that violence which had slain the mules that drew it not an hour since) above the edge of the flood. In the wagon bed it lies profoundly, the long pale planks hushed a little with wetting yet still yellow, like gold seen through water, save for two long muddy smears. We pass it and go on to the bank.

One end of the rope is made fast to a tree. At the edge of the stream, knee-deep, Vardaman stands, bent forward a little, watching Vernon with rapt absorption. He has stopped yelling and he is wet to the armpits. Vernon is at the other end of the rope, shoulder-deep in the river, looking back at Vardaman. "Further back than that," he says. "You git back by the tree and hold the rope for me, so it cant slip."

Vardaman backs along the rope, to the tree, moving blindly, watching Vernon. When we come up he looks at us once, his eyes round and a little dazed. Then he looks at Vernon again in that posture of rapt alertness.

"I got the hammer too," Vernon says. "Looks like we ought to done already got that chalk-line. It ought to floated."

"Floated clean away," Jewel says. "We wont get it. We ought to find the saw, though."

"I reckon so," Vernon says. He looks at the water. "That chalk-line, too. What else did he have?"

"He aint talked yet," Jewel says, entering the water. He looks back at me. "You go back and get him roused up to talk," he says.

"Pa's there," I say. I follow Jewel into the water, along the rope. It feels alive in my hand, bellied faintly in a prolonged and resonant arc. Vernon is watching me.

"You better go," he says. "You better be there."

"Let's see what else we can get before it washes on down," I say.

We hold to the rope, the current curling and dimpling about our shoulders. But beneath that false blandness the true force of it leans against us lazily. I had not thought that water in July could be so cold. It is like hands molding and prodding at the very bones. Vernon is still looking back toward the bank.

"Reckon it'll hold us all?" he says. We too look back, following the rigid bar of the rope as it rises from the water to the tree and Vardaman crouched a little beside it, watching us. "Wish my mule wouldn't strike out for home," Vernon says.

"Come on," Jewel says. "Let's get outen here."

We submerge in turn, holding to the rope, being clutched by one another while the cold wall of the water sucks the slanting mud backward and upstream from beneath our feet and we are suspended so, groping along the cold bottom. Even the mud there is not still. It has a chill, scouring quality, as though the earth under us were in motion too. We touch and fumble at one another's extended arms, letting ourselves go cautiously against the rope; or, erect in turn, watch the water suck and boil where one of the other two gropes beneath the surface. Pa has come down to the shore, watching us.

Vernon comes up, streaming, his face sloped down into his pursed blowing mouth. His mouth is bluish, like a circle of weathered rubber. He has the rule.

"He'll be glad of that," I say. "It's right new. He bought it just last month out of the catalogue."

"If we just knowed for sho what else," Vernon says, looking over his shoulder and then turning to face where Jewel had disappeared. "Didn't he go down fore me?" Vernon says.

"I dont know," I say. "I think so. Yes. Yes, he did."

We watch the thick curling surface, streaming away from us in slow whorls.

"Give him a pull on the rope," Vernon says.

"He's on your end of it," I say.

"Aint nobody on my end of it," he says.

"Pull it in," I say. But he has already done that, holding the end above the water; and then we see Jewel. He is ten yards away; he comes up, blowing, and looks at us, tossing his long hair back with a jerk of his head, then he looks toward the bank; we can see him filling his lungs.

"Jewel," Vernon says, not loud, but his voice going full and clear along the water, peremptory yet tactful. "It'll be back here. Better come back."

Jewel dives again. We stand there, leaning back against the current, watching the water where he disappeared, holding the dead rope between us like two men holding the nozzle of a fire hose, waiting for the water. Suddenly Dewey Dell is behind us in the water. "You make him come back," she says. "Jewel!" she says. He comes up again, tossing his hair back from his eyes. He is swimming now, toward the bank, the current sweeping him downstream quartering. "You, Jewel!" Dewey Dell says. We stand holding the rope and see him gain the bank and climb out. As he rises from the water, he stoops and picks up something. He comes back along the bank. He has found the chalk-line. He comes opposite us and stands there, looking about as if he were seeking something. Pa goes on down the bank. He is going back to look at the mules again where their round bodies float and rub quietly together in the slack water within the bend.

"What did you do with the hammer, Vernon?" Jewel says.

"I give it to him," Vernon says, jerking his head at Vardaman. Vardaman is looking after pa. Then he looks at Jewel. "With the square." Vernon is watching Jewel. He moves toward the bank, passing Dewey Dell and me.

"You get on out of here," I say. She says nothing, looking at Jewel and Vernon.

"Where's the hammer?" Jewel says. Vardaman scuttles up the bank and fetches it.

"It's heavier than the saw," Vernon says. Jewel is tying the end of the chalk-line about the hammer shaft.

"Hammer's got the most wood in it," Jewel says. He and Vernon face one another, watching Jewel's hands.

"And flatter, too," Vernon says, "It'd float three to one, almost. Try the plane."

Jewel looks at Vernon. Vernon is tall, too; long and lean, eye to eye they stand in their close wet clothes. Lon Quick could look even at a cloudy sky and tell the time to ten minutes. Big Lon I mean, not little Lon.

"Why dont you get out of the water?" I say.

"It wont float like a saw," Jewel says.

"It'll float nigher to a saw than a hammer will," Vernon says.

"Bet you," Jewel says.

"I wont bet," Vernon says.

They stand there, watching Jewel's still hands.

"Hell," Jewel says. "Get the plane, then."

So they get the plane and tie it to the chalk-line and enter the water again. Pa comes back along the bank. He stops for a while and looks at us, hunched, mournful, like a failing steer or an old tall bird.

Vernon and Jewel return, leaning against the current. "Get out of the way," Jewel says to Dewey Dell. "Get out of the water."

She crowds against me a little so they can pass, Jewel holding the plane high as though it were perishable, the blue string trailing back over his shoulder. They pass us and stop; they fall to arguing quietly about just where the wagon went over.

"Darl ought to know," Vernon says. They look at me.

"I dont know," I says. "I wasn't there that long."

"Hell," Jewel says. They move on, gingerly, leaning against the current, reading the ford with their feet.

"Have you got a holt of the rope?" Vernon says. Jewel does not answer. He glances back at the shore, calculat, then at the water. He flings the plane outward, letting the string run through his fingers, his fingers turning blue where it runs over them. When the line stops, he hands it back to Vernon.

"Better let me go this time," Vernon says. Again Jewel does not answer; we watch him duck beneath the surface.

"Jewel," Dewey Dell whimpers.

"It aint so deep there," Vernon says. He does not look back. He is watching the water where Jewel went under.

When Jewel comes up he has the saw.

When we pass the wagon pa is standing beside it, scrubbing at the two mud smears with a handful of leaves. Against the jungle Jewel's horse looks like a patchwork quilt hung on a line.

Cash has not moved. We stand above him, holding the plane, the saw, the hammer, the square, the rule, the chalk-line, while Dewey Dell squats and lifts Cash's head. "Cash," she says; "Cash."

He opens his eyes, staring profoundly up at our inverted faces.

"If ever was such a misfortunate man," pa says.

"Look, Cash," we say, holding the tools up so he can see; "what else did you have?"

He tries to speak, rolling his head, shutting his eyes.

"Cash," we say; "Cash."

It is to vomit he is turning his head. Dewey Dell wipes his mouth on the wet hem of her dress; then he can speak.

"It's his saw-set," Jewel says. "The new one he bought when he bought the rule." He moves, turning away. Vernon looks up after him, still squatting. Then he rises and follows Jewel down to the water.

"If ever was such a misfortunate man," pa says. He looms tall above us as we squat; he looks like a figure carved clumsily from tough wood by a drunken caricaturist. "It's a trial," he says. "But I dont begrudge her it. No man can say I begrudge her it." Dewey Dell has laid Cash's head back on the folded coat, twisting his head a little to avoid the vomit. Beside him his tools lie. "A fellow might call it lucky it was the same leg he broke when he fell offen that church," pa says. "But I dont begrudge her it."

Jewel and Vernon are in the river again. From here they do not appear to violate the surface at all; it is as though it had severed them both at a single blow, the two torsos moving with infinitesimal and ludicrous care upon the surface. It looks peaceful, like machinery does after you have watched it and listened to it for a long time. As though the clotting which is you had dissolved into the myriad original motion, and seeing and hearing in themselves blind and deaf; fury in itself quiet with stagnation. Squatting, Dewey Dell's wet dress shapes for the dead eyes of three blind men those mammalian ludicrosities which are the horizons and the valleys of the earth.

Cash

It wasn't on a balance. I told them that if they wanted it to tote and ride on a balance, they would have to

Cora

One day we were talking. She had never been pure religious, not even after that summer at the camp meeting when Brother Whitfield wrestled with her spirit, singled her out and strove with the vanity in her mortal heart, and I said to her many a time, "God gave you children to comfort your hard human lot and for a token of His own suffering and love, for in love you conceived and bore them." I said that because she took God's love and her duty to Him too much as a matter of course, and such conduct is not pleasing to Him. I said, "He gave us the gift to raise our voices in His undying praise" because I said there is more rejoicing in heaven over one sinner than over a hundred that never sinned.⁸ And she said "My daily life is an acknowledgment and expiation of my sin" and I said "Who are you, to say what is sin and what is not sin? It is the Lord's part to judge; ours to praise His mercy and His holy name in the hearing of our fellow mortals" because He alone can see into the heart, and just because a woman's life is right in the sight of man, she cant know if there is no sin in her heart without she opens her heart to the Lord and receives His grace. I said, "Just because you have been a faithful wife is no sign that there is no sin in your heart, and just because your life is hard is no sign that the Lord's grace is absolving you." And she said, "I know my own sin. I know that I deserve my punishment. I do not begrudge it." And I said, "It is out of your vanity that you would judge sin and salvation in the Lord's place. It is our mortal lot to suffer and to raise our voices in praise of Him who judges the sin and offers the salvation through our trials and tribulations time out of mind amen. Not even after Brother Whitfield, a godly man if ever one breathed God's breath, prayed for you and strove as never a man could except him," I said.

Because it is not us that can judge our sins or know what is sin in the Lord's eyes. She has had a hard life, but so does every woman. But you'd think from the way she talked that she knew more about sin and salvation than the Lord God Himself, than them who have strove and labored with the sin

8. Cf. Luke 15:7: "I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance."

in this human world. When the only sin she ever committed was being partial to Jewel that never loved her and was its own punishment, in preference to Darl that was touched by God Himself and considered queer by us mortals and that did love her. I said, "There is your sin. And your punishment too. Jewel is your punishment. But where is your salvation? And life is short enough," I said, "to win eternal grace in. And God is a jealous God. It is His to judge and to mete; not yours."

"I know," she said. "I—" Then she stopped, and I said, "Know what?"

"Nothing," she said. "He is my cross and he will be my salvation. He will save me from the water and from the fire. Even though I have laid down my life, he will save me."

"How do you know, without you open your heart to Him and lift your voice in His praise?" I said. Then I realised that she did not mean God. I realised that out of the vanity of her heart she had spoken sacrilege. And I went down on my knees right there. I begged her to kneel and open her heart and cast from it the devil of vanity and cast herself upon the mercy of the Lord. But she wouldn't. She just sat there, lost in her vanity and her pride, that had closed her heart to God and set that selfish mortal boy in His place. Kneeling there I prayed for her. I prayed for that poor blind woman as I had never prayed for me and mine.

Addie

In the afternoon when school was out and the last one had left with his little dirty snuffling nose, instead of going home I would go down the hill to the spring where I could be quiet and hate them. It would be quiet there then, with the water bubbling up and away and the sun slanting quiet in the trees and the quiet smelling of damp and rotting leaves and new earth; especially in the early spring, for it was worst then.

I could just remember how my father used to say that the reason for living was to get ready to stay dead a long time. And when I would have to look at them day after day, each with his and her secret and selfish thought, and blood strange to each other blood and strange to mine, and think that this seemed to be the only way I could get ready to stay dead, I would hate my father for having ever planted me. I would look forward to the times when they faulted, so I could whip them. When the switch fell I could feel it upon my flesh; when it welted and ridged it was my blood that ran, and I would think with each blow of the switch: Now you are aware of me! Now I am something in your secret and selfish life, who have marked your blood with my own for ever and ever.

And so I took Anse. I saw him pass the school house three or four times before I learned that he was driving four miles out of his way to do it. I noticed then how he was beginning to hump—a tall man and young—so that he looked already like a tall bird hunched in the cold weather, on the wagon seat. He would pass the school house, the wagon creaking slow, his head turning slow to watch the door of the school house as the wagon passed, until he went on around the curve and out of sight. One day I went to the door and stood there when he passed. When he saw me he looked quickly away and did not look back again.

In the early spring it was worst. Sometimes I thought that I could not bear it, lying in bed at night, with the wild geese going north and their honking coming faint and high and wild out of the wild darkness, and during the day it would seem as though I couldn't wait for the last one to go so I could go down to the spring. And so when I looked up that day and saw Anse standing there in his Sunday clothes, turning his hat round and round in his hands, I said:

"If you've got any womenfolks, why in the world dont they make you get your hair cut?"

"I aint got none," he said. Then he said suddenly, driving his eyes at me like two hounds in a strange yard: "That's what I come to see you about."

"And make you hold your shoulders up," I said. "You haven't got any? But you've got a house. They tell me you've got a house and a good farm. And you live there alone, doing for yourself, do you?" He just looked at me, turning the hat in his hands. "A new house," I said. "Are you going to get married?"

And he said again, holding his eyes to mine: "That's what I come to see you about."

Later he told me, "I aint got no people. So that wont be no worry to you. I dont reckon you can say the same."

"No. I have people. In Jefferson."

His face fell a little. "Well, I got a little property. I'm forehanded; I got a good honest name. I know how town folks are, but maybe when they talk to me . . ."

"They might listen," I said. "But they'll be hard to talk to." He was watching my face. "They're in the cemetery."

"But your living kin," he said. "They'll be different."

"Will they?" I said. "I dont know. I never had any other kind."

So I took Anse. And when I knew that I had Cash, I knew that living was terrible and that this was the answer to it. That was when I learned that words are no good; that words dont ever fit even what they are trying to say at. When he was born I knew that motherhood was invented by someone who had to have a word for it because the ones that had the children didn't care whether there was a word for it or not. I knew that fear was invented by someone that had never had the fear; pride, who never had the pride. I knew that it had been, not that they had dirty noses, but that we had had to use one another by words like spiders dangling by their mouths from a beam, swinging and twisting and never touching, and that only through the blows of the switch could my blood and their blood flow as one stream. I knew that it had been, not that my aloneness had to be violated over and over each day, but that it had never been violated until Cash came. Not even by Anse in the nights.

He had a word, too. Love, he called it. But I had been used to words for a long time. I knew that that word was like the others: just a shape to fill a lack; that when the right time came, you wouldn't need a word for that any more than for pride or fear. Cash did not need to say it to me nor I to him, and I would say, Let Anse use it, if he wants to. So that it was Anse or love; love or Anse: it didn't matter.

I would think that even while I lay with him in the dark and Cash asleep in the cradle within the swing of my hand. I would think that if he were to wake and cry, I would suckle him, too. Anse or love: it didn't matter. My aloneness had been violated and then made whole again by the violation: time, Anse, love, and what you will, outside the circle.

Then I found that I had Darl. At first I would not believe it. Then I believed that I would kill Anse. It was as though he had tricked me, hidden within a word like within a paper screen and struck me in the back through it. But then I realised that I had been tricked by words older than Anse or love, and that the same word had tricked Anse too, and that my revenge would be that he would never know I was taking revenge. And when Darl was born I asked Anse to promise to take me back to Jefferson when I died, because I knew that father had been right, even when he couldn't have known he was right anymore than I could have known I was wrong.

"Nonsense," Anse said; "you and me aint nigh done chapping yet, with just two."

He did not know that he was dead, then. Sometimes I would lie by him in the dark, hearing the land that was now of my blood and flesh, and I would think: Anse. Why Anse. Why are you Anse. I would think about his name until after a while I could see the word as a shape, a vessel, and I would watch him liquify and flow into it like cold molasses flowing out of the darkness into the vessel, until the jar stood full and motionless: a significant shape profoundly without life like an empty door frame; and then I would find that I had forgotten the name of the jar. I would think: The shape of my body where I used to be a virgin is in the shape of a and I couldn't think Anse, couldn't remember Anse. It was not that I could think of myself as no longer unvirgin, because I was three now. And when I would think Cash and Darl that way until their names would die and solidify into a shape and then fade away, I would say, All right. It doesn't matter. It doesn't matter what they call them.

And so when Cora Tull would tell me I was not a true mother, I would think how words go straight up in a thin line, quick and harmless, and how terribly doing goes along the earth, clinging to it, so that after a while the two lines are too far apart for the same person to straddle from one to the other; and that sin and love and fear are just sounds that people who never sinned nor loved nor feared have for what they never had and cannot have until they forget the words. Like Cora, who could never even cook.

She would tell me what I owed to my children and to Anse and to God. I gave Anse the children. I did not ask for them. I did not even ask him for what he could have given me: not-Anse. That was my duty to him, to not ask that, and that duty I fulfilled. I would be I; I would let him be the shape and echo of his word. That was more than he asked, because he could not have asked for that and been Anse, using himself so with a word.

And then he died. He did not know he was dead. I would lie by him in the dark, hearing the dark land talking of God's love and His beauty and His sin; hearing the dark voicelessness in which the words are the deeds, and the other words that are not deeds, that are just the gaps in peoples' lacks, coming down like the cries of the geese out of the wild darkness in the old terrible nights, fumbling at the deeds like orphans to whom are pointed out in a crowd two faces and told, That is your father, your mother.

I believed that I had found it. I believed that the reason was the duty to the alive, to the terrible blood, the red bitter flood boiling through the land. I would think of sin as I would think of the clothes we both wore in the world's face, of the circumspection necessary because he was he and I was I; the sin the more utter and terrible since he was the instrument ordained by God who created the sin, to sanctify that sin He had created. While I waited for him in the woods, waiting for him before he saw me, I would think of him as dressed in sin. I would think of him as thinking of me as dressed also in sin, he the more beautiful since the garment which he had exchanged for sin was sanctified. I would think of the sin as garments which we would remove in order to shape and coerce the terrible blood to the forlorn echo of the dead word high in the air. Then I would lay with Anse again—I did not lie to him: I just refused, just as I refused my breast to Cash and Darl after their time was up—hearing the dark land talking the voiceless speech.

I hid nothing. I tried to deceive no one. I would not have cared. I merely took the precautions that he thought necessary for his sake, not for my safety, but just as I wore clothes in the world's face. And I would think then when Cora talked to me, of how the high dead words in time seemed to lose even the significance of their dead sound.

Then it was over. Over in the sense that he was gone and I knew that, see him again though I would, I would never again see him coming swift and secret to me in the woods dressed in sin like a gallant garment already blowing aside with the speed of his secret coming.

But for me it was not over. I mean, over in the sense of beginning and ending, because to me there was no beginning nor ending to anything then. I even held Anse refraining still, not that I was holding him recessional, but as though nothing else had ever been. My children were of me alone, of the wild blood boiling along the earth, of me and of all that lived; of none and of all. Then I found that I had Jewel. When I waked to remember to discover it, he was two months gone.

My father said that the reason for living is getting ready to stay dead. I knew at last what he meant and that he could not have known what he meant himself, because a man cannot know anything about cleaning up the house afterward. And so I have cleaned my house. With Jewel—I lay by the lamp, holding up my own head, watching him cap and suture it before he breathed—the wild blood boiled away and the sound of it ceased. Then there was only the milk, warm and calm, and I lying calm in the slow silence, getting ready to clean my house.

I gave Anse Dewey Dell to negative Jewel. Then I gave him Vardaman to replace the child I had robbed him of. And now he has three children that are his and not mine. And then I could get ready to die.

One day I was talking to Cora. She prayed for me because she believed I was blind to sin, wanting me to kneel and pray too, because people to whom sin is just a matter of words, to them salvation is just words too.

Whitfield

When they told me she was dying, all that night I wrestled with Satan, and I emerged victorious. I woke to the enormity of my sin; I saw the true light at last, and I fell on my knees and confessed to God and asked His guidance and received it. "Rise," He said; "repair to that home in which you have put a living lie, among those people with whom you have outraged My Word; confess your sin aloud. It is for them, for that deceived husband, to forgive you: not I."

So I went. I heard that Tull's bridge was gone; I said "Thanks, O Lord, O Mighty Ruler of all;" for by those dangers and difficulties which I should have to surmount I saw that He had not abandoned me; that my reception again into His holy peace and love would be the sweeter for it. "Just let me not perish before I have begged the forgiveness of the man whom I betrayed," I prayed; "let me not be too late; let not the tale of mine and her transgression come from her lips instead of mine. She had sworn then that she would never tell it, but eternity is a fearsome thing to face: have I not wrestled thigh to thigh with Satan myself? let me not have also the sin of her broken vow upon my soul. Let not the waters of Thy Mighty Wrath encompass me until I have cleansed my soul in the presence of them whom I injured."

It was His hand that bore me safely above the flood, that fended from me the dangers of the waters. My horse was frightened, and my own heart failed me as the logs and the uprooted trees bore down upon my littleness. But not my soul: time after time I saw them averted at destruction's final instant, and I lifted my voice above the noise of the flood: "Praise to Thee, O Mighty Lord and King. By this token shall I cleanse my soul and gain again into the fold of Thy undying love."

I knew then that forgiveness was mine. The flood, the danger, behind, and as I rode on across the firm earth again and the scene of my Gethsemane drew closer and closer, I framed the words which I should use. I would enter the house; I would stop her before she had spoken; I would say to her husband: "Anse, I have sinned. Do with me as you will."

It was already as though it were done. My soul felt freer, quieter than it had in years; already I seemed to dwell in abiding peace again as I rode on. To either side I saw His hand; in my heart I could hear His voice: "Courage. I am with thee."

Then I reached Tull's house. His youngest girl came out and called to me as I was passing. She told me that she was already dead.

I have sinned, O Lord. Thou knowest the extent of my remorse and the will of my spirit. But He is merciful; He will accept the will for the deed, Who knew that when I framed the words of my confession it was to Anse I spoke them, even though he was not there. It was He in His infinite wisdom that restrained the tale from her dying lips as she lay surrounded by those who loved and trusted her; mine the travail by water which I sustained by the strength of His hand. Praise to Thee in Thy bounteous and omnipotent love; O praise.

I entered the house of bereavement, the lowly dwelling where another erring mortal lay while her soul faced the awful and irrevocable judgment, peace to her ashes.

"God's grace upon this house," I said.

Darl

On the horse he rode up to Armstid's and came back on the horse, leading Armstid's team. We hitched up and laid Cash on top of Addie. When we laid him down he vomited again, but he got his head over the wagon bed in time.

"He taken a lick in the stomach, too," Vernon said.

"The horse may have kicked him in the stomach too," I said. "Did he kick you in the stomach, Cash?"

He tried to say something. Dewey Dell wiped his mouth again.

"What's he say?" Vernon said.

"What is it, Cash?" Dewey Dell said. She leaned down. "His tools," she said. Vernon got them and put them into the wagon. Dewey Dell lifted Cash's head so he could see. We drove on, Dewey Dell and I sitting beside Cash to steady him and he riding on ahead on the horse. Vernon stood watching us for a while. Then he turned and went back toward the bridge. He walked gingerly, beginning to flap the wet sleeves of his shirt as though he had just got wet.

He was sitting the horse before the gate. Armstid was waiting at the gate. We stopped and he got down and we lifted Cash down and carried him into the house, where Mrs Armstid had the bed ready. We left her and Dewey Dell undressing him.

We followed pa out to the wagon. He went back and got into the wagon and drove on, we following on foot, into the lot. The wetting had helped, because Armstid said, "You're welcome to the house. You can put it there." He followed, leading the horse, and stood beside the wagon, the reins in his hand.

"I thank you," pa said. "We'll use in the shed yonder. I know it's a imposition on you."

"You're welcome to the house," Armstid said. He had that wooden look on his face again; that bold, surly, high-colored rigid look like his face and eyes were two colors of wood, the wrong one pale and the wrong one dark. His shirt was beginning to dry, but it still clung close upon him when he moved.

"She would appreciate it," pa said.

We took the team out and rolled the wagon back under the shed. One side of the shed was open.

"It wont rain under," Armstid said. "But if you'd rather . . ."

Back of the barn was some rusted sheets of tin roofing. We took two of them and propped them against the open side.

"You're welcome to the house," Armstid said.

"I thank you," pa said. "I'd take it right kind if you'd give them a little snack."

"Sho," Armstid said. "Lula'll have supper ready soon as she gets Cash comfortable." He had gone back to the horse and he was taking the saddle off, his damp shirt lapping flat to him when he moved.

Pa wouldn't come in the house.

"Come in and eat," Armstid said. "It's nigh ready."

"I wouldn't crave nothing," pa said. "I thank you."

"You come in and dry and eat," Armstid said. "It'll be all right here."

"It's for her," pa said. "It's for her sake I am taking the food. I got no team, no nothing. But she will be grateful to ere a one of you."

"Sho," Armstid said. "You folks come in and dry."

But after Armstid gave pa a drink, he felt better, and when we went in to see about Cash he hadn't come in with us. When I looked back he was leading the horse into the barn he was already talking about getting another team, and by supper time he had good as bought it. He is down there in the barn, sliding fluidly past the gaudy lunging swirl, into the stall with it. He climbs onto the manger and drags the hay down and leaves the stall and seeks and finds the curry-comb. Then he returns and slips quickly past the single crashing thump and up against the horse, where it cannot overreach. He applies the curry-comb, holding himself within the horse's striking radius with the agility of an acrobat, cursing the horse in a whisper of obscene caress. Its head flashes back, tooth-cropped; its eyes roll in the dusk like marbles on a gaudy velvet cloth as he strikes it upon the face with the back of the curry-comb.

Armstid

But time I give him another sup of whiskey and supper was about ready, he had done already bought a team from somebody, on a credit. Picking and choosing he were by then, saying how he didn't like this span and wouldn't put his money in nothing so-and-so owned, not even a hen coop.

"You might try Snopes," I said. "He's got three-four span. Maybe one of them would suit you."

Then he begun to mumble his mouth, looking at me like it was me that owned the only span of mules in the county and wouldn't sell them to him, when I knew that like as not it would be my team that would ever get them out of the lot at all. Only I dont know what they would do with them, if they had a team. Littlejohn had told me that the levee through Haley bottom had done gone for two miles and that the only way to get to Jefferson would be to go around by Mottson. But that was Anse's business.

"He's a close man to trade with," he says, mumbling his mouth. But when I give him another sup after supper, he cheered up some. He was aiming to go back to the barn and set up with her. Maybe he thought that if he just stayed down there ready to take out, Santa Claus would maybe bring him a span of mules. "But I reckon I can talk him around," he says. "A man'll always help a fellow in a tight, if he's got ere a drop of Christian blood in him."

"Of course you're welcome to the use of mine," I said, me knowing how much he believed that was the reason.

"I thank you," he said. "She'll want to go in ourn," and him knowing how much I believed that was the reason.

After supper Jewel rode over to the Bend to get Peabody. I heard he was to be there today at Varner's. Jewel come back about midnight. Peabody had gone down below Inverness somewhere, but Uncle Billy come back with him, with his satchel of horse-physic. Like he says, a man aint so different from a horse or a mule, come long come short, except a mule or a horse has got a little more sense. "What you been into now, boy?" he says, looking at Cash. "Get me a mattress and a chair and a glass of whisky," he says.

He made Cash drink the whiskey, then he run Anse out of the room. "Lucky it was the same leg he broke last summer," Anse says, mournful, mumbling and blinking. "That's something."

We folded the mattress across Cash's legs and set the chair on the mattress and me and Jewel set on the chair and the gal held the lamp and Uncle Billy taken a chew of tobacco and went to work. Cash fought pretty hard for a while, until he fainted. Then he laid still, with big balls of sweat standing on his face like they had started to roll down and then stopped to wait for him.

When he waked up, Uncle Billy had done packed up and left. He kept on trying to say something until the gal leaned down and wiped his mouth. "It's his tools," she said.

"I brought them in," Darl said. "I got them."

He tried to talk again; she leaned down. "He wants to see them," she said. So Darl brought them in where he could see them. They shoved them under the side of the bed, where he could reach his hand and touch them when he felt better. Next morning Anse taken that horse and rode over to the Bend to see Snopes. Him and Jewel stood in the lot talking a while, then Anse got on the horse and rode off. I reckon that was the first time Jewel ever let anybody ride that horse, and until Anse come back he hung around in that swole-up way, watching the road like he was half a mind to take out after Anse and get the horse back.

Along toward nine oclock it begun to get hot. That was when I see the first buzzard. Because of the wetting, I reckon. Anyway it wasn't until well into the day that I see them. Lucky the breeze was setting away from the house, so it wasn't until well into the morning. But soon as I see them it was like I could smell it in the field a mile away from just watching them, and them circling and circling for everybody in the county to see what was in my barn.

I was still a good half a mile from the house when I heard that boy yelling. I thought maybe he might have fell into the well or something, so I whipped up and come into the lot on the lope.

There must have been a dozen of them setting along the ridge-pole of the barn, and that boy was chasing another one around the lot like it was a turkey and it just lifting enough to dodge him and go flopping back to the roof of the shed again where he had found it setting on the coffin. It had got hot then, right, and the breeze had dropped or changed or something, so I went and found Jewel, but Lulu come out.

"You got to do something," she said. "It's a outrage."

"That's what I aim to do," I said.

"It's a outrage," she said. "He should be lawed for treating her so."

"He's getting her into the ground the best he can," I said. So I found Jewel and asked him if he didn't want to take one of the mules and go over to the Bend and see about Anse. He didn't say nothing. He just looked at me with his jaws going bone-white and them bone-white eyes of hisn, then he went and begun to call Darl.

"What you fixing to do?" I said.

He didn't answer. Darl come out. "Come on," Jewel said.

"What you aim to do?" Darl said.

"Going to move the wagon," Jewel said over his shoulder.

"Dont be a fool," I said. "I never meant nothing. You couldn't help it." And Darl hung back too, but nothing wouldn't suit Jewel.

"Shut your goddamn mouth," he says.

"It's got to be somewhere," Darl said. "We'll take out soon as pa gets back."

"You wont help me?" Jewel says, them white eyes of hisn kind of blaring and his face shaking like he had a aguer.⁹

"No," Darl said. "I wont. Wait till pa gets back."

So I stood in the door and watched him push and haul at that wagon. It was on a downhill, and once I thought he was fixing to beat out the back end of the shed. Then the dinner bell rung. I called him, but he didn't look around. "Come on to dinner," I said. "Tell that boy." But he didn't answer, so

9. Ague or fever.

I went on to dinner. The gal went down to get that boy, but she come back without him. About half through dinner we heard him yelling again, running that buzzard out.

"It's a outrage," Lula said; "a outrage."

"He's doing the best he can," I said. "A fellow dont trade with Snopes in thirty minutes. They'll set in the shade all afternoon to dicker."

"Do?" she says. "Do? He's done too much, already."

And I reckon he had. Trouble is, his quitting was just about to start our doing. He couldn't buy no team from nobody, let alone Snopes, withouten he had something to mortgage he didn't know would mortgage yet. And so when I went back to the field I looked at my mules and same as told them goodbye for a spell. And when I come back that evening and the sun shining all day on that shed, I wasn't so sho I would regret it.

He come riding up just as I went out to the porch, where they all was. He looked kind of funny: kind of more hang-dog than common, and kind of proud too. Like he had done something he thought was cute but wasn't so sho now how other folks would take it.

"I got a team," he said.

"You bought a team from Snopes?" I said.

"I reckon Snopes aint the only man in this country that can drive a trade," he said.

"Sho," I said. He was looking at Jewel, with that funny look, but Jewel had done got down from the porch and was going toward the horse. To see what Anse had done to it, I reckon.

"Jewel," Anse says. Jewel looked back. "Come here," Anse says. Jewel come back a little and stopped again.

"What you want?" he said.

"So you got a team from Snopes," I said. "He'll send them over tonight, I reckon? You'll want a early start tomorrow, long as you'll have to go by Mottson."

Then he quit looking like he had been for a while. He got that badgered look like he used to have, mumbling his mouth.

"I do the best I can," he said. "Fore God, if there were ere a man in the living world suffered the trials and floutings I have suffered."

"A fellow that just beat Snopes in a trade ought to feel pretty good," I said. "What did you give him, Anse?"

He didn't look at me. "I give a chattel mortgage on my cultivator and seeder," he said.

"But they aint worth forty dollars. How far do you aim to get with a forty dollar team?"

They were all watching him now, quiet and steady. Jewel was stopped, halfway back, waiting to go on to the horse. "I give other things," Anse said. He begun to mumble his mouth again, standing there like he was waiting for somebody to hit him and him with his mind already made up not to do nothing about it.

"What other things?" Darl said.

"Hell," I said. "You take my team. You can bring them back. I'll get along someway."

"So that's what you were doing in Cash's clothes last night," Darl said. He said it just like he was reading it outen the paper. Like he never give a durn himself one way or the other. Jewel had come back now, standing there, looking at Anse with them marble eyes of hisn. "Cash aimed to buy that talking machine from Suratt with that money," Darl said.

Anse stood there, mumbling his mouth. Jewel watched him. He aint never blinked yet.

"But that's just eight dollars more," Darl said, in that voice like he was just listening and never give a darn himself. "That still wont buy a team."

Anse looked at Jewel, quick, kind of sliding his eyes that way, then he looked down again. "God knows, if there were ere a man," he says. Still they didn't say nothing. They just watched him, waiting, and him sliding his eyes toward their feet and up their legs but no higher. "And the horse," he says.

"What horse?" Jewel said. Anse just stood there. I be darn, if a man cant keep the upper hand of his sons, he ought to run them away from home, no matter how big they are. And if he cant do that, I be darn if he oughtn't to leave himself. I be darn if I wouldn't. "You mean, you tried to swap my horse?" Jewel says.

Anse stands there, dangle-armed. "For fifteen years I aint had a tooth in my head," he says. "God knows it. He knows in fifteen years I aint et the victuals He aimed for man to eat to keep his strength up, and me saving a nickel here and nickel there so my family wouldn't suffer it, to buy them teeth so I could eat God's appointed food. I give that money. I thought that if I could do without eating, my sons could do without riding. God knows I did."

Jewel stands with his hands on his hips, looking at Anse. Then he looks away. He looked out across the field, his face still as a rock. Like it was somebody else talking about somebody else's horse and him not even listening. Then he spit, slow, and said "Hell" and he turned and went on to the gate and unhitched the horse and got on it. It was moving when he come into the saddle and by the time he was on it they was tearing down the road like the Law might have been behind them. They went out of sight that way, the two of them looking like some kind of a spotted cyclone.

"Well," I says. "You take my team," I said. But he wouldn't do it. And they wouldn't even stay, and that boy chasing them buzzards all day in the hot sun until he was nigh as crazy as the rest of them. "Leave Cash here, anyway," I said. But they wouldn't do that. They made a pallet for him with quilts on top of the coffin and laid him on it and set his tools by him, and we put my team in and hauled the wagon about a mile down the road.

"If we'll bother you here," Anse says, "just say so."

"Sho," I said. "It'll be fine here. Safe, too. Now let's go back and eat supper."

"I thank you," Anse said. "We got a little something in the basket. We can make out."

"Where'd you get it?" I said.

"We brought it from home."

"But it'll be stale now," I said. "Come and get some hot victuals."

But they wouldn't come. "I reckon we can make out," Anse said. So I went home and et and taken a basket back to them and tried again to make them come back to the house.

"I thank you," he said. "I reckon we can make out." So I left them there, squatting around a little fire, waiting; God knows what for.

I come on home. I kept thinking about them there, and about that fellow tearing away on that horse. And that would be the last they would see of him. And I be durn if I could blame him. Not for wanting to not give up his horse, but for getting shut of such a durn fool as Anse.

Or that's what I thought then. Because be durn if there aint something about a durn fellow like Anse that seems to make a man have to help him, even when he knows he'll be wanting to kick himself next minute. Because about a hour after breakfast next morning Eustace Grimm that works Snopes' place come up with a span of mules, hunting Anse.

"I thought him and Anse never traded," I said.

"Sho," Eustace said. "All they liked was the horse. Like I said to Mr Snopes, he was letting this team go for fifty dollars, because if his uncle Flem had a just kept them Texas horses when he owned them, Anse wouldn't a never—"

"The horse?" I said. "Anse's boy taken that horse and cleared out last night, probably halfway to Texas by now, and Anse—"

"I didn't know who brung it," Eustace said. "I never see them. I just found the horse in the barn this morning when I went to feed, and I told Mr Snopes and he said to bring the team on over here."

Well, that'll be the last they'll ever see of him now, sho enough. Come Christmas time they'll maybe get a postal card from him in Texas, I reckon. And if it hadn't been Jewel, I reckon it'd a been me; I owe him that much, myself. I be durn if Anse dont conjure a man, some way. I be durn if he aint a sight.

Vardaman

Now there are seven of them, in little tall black circles.

"Look, Darl," I say; "see?"

He looks up. We watch them in little tall black circles of not-moving.

"Yesterday there were just four," I say.

There were more than four on the barn.

"Do you know what I would do if he tries to light on the wagon again?" I say.

"What would you do?" Darl says.

"I wouldn't let him light on her," I say. "I wouldn't let him light on Cash, either."

Cash is sick. He is sick on the box. But my mother is a fish.

"We got to get some medicine in Mottson," pa says. "I reckon we'll just have to."

"How do you feel, Cash?" Darl says.

"It dont bother none," Cash says.

"Do you want it propped a little higher?" Darl says.

Cash has a broken leg. He has had two broken legs. He lies on the box with a quilt rolled under his head and a piece of wood under his knee.

"I reckon we ought to left him at Armstid's," pa says.

I haven't got a broken leg and pa hasn't and Darl hasn't and "It's just the bumps," Cash says. "It kind of grinds together a little on a bump. It dont bother none." Jewel has gone away. He and his horse went away one supper time

"It's because she wouldn't have us beholden," pa says. "Fore God, I do the best that ere a man" Is it because Jewel's mother is a horse Darl? I said.

"Maybe I can draw the ropes a little tighter," Darl says. That's why Jewel and I were both in the shed and she was in the wagon because the horse lives in the barn and I had to keep on running the buzzard away from

"If you just would," Cash says. And Dewey Dell hasn't got a broken leg and I haven't. Cash is my brother.

We stop. When Darl loosens the rope Cash begins to sweat again. His teeth look out.

"Hurt?" Darl says.

"I reckon you better put it back," Cash says.

Darl puts the rope back, pulling hard. Cash's teeth look out.

"Hurt?" Darl says.

"It dont bother none," Cash says.

"Do you want pa to drive slower?" Darl says.

"No," Cash says. "Aint no time to hang back. It dont bother none."

"We'll have to get some medicine at Mottson," pa says. "I reckon we'll have to."

"Tell him to go on," Cash says. We go on. Dewey Dell leans back and wipes Cash's face. Cash is my brother. But Jewel's mother is a horse. My mother is a fish. Darl says that when we come to the water again I might see her and Dewey Dell said, She's in the box; how could she have got out? She got out through the holes I bored, into the water I said, and when we come to the water again I am going to see her. My mother is not in the box. My mother does not smell like that. My mother is a fish

"Those cakes will be in fine shape by the time we get to Jefferson," Darl says.

Dewey Dell does not look around.

"You better try to sell them in Mottson," Darl says.

"When will we get to Mottson, Darl?" I say.

"Tomorrow," Darl says. "If this team dont rack to pieces. Snopes must have fed them on sawdust."

"Why did he feed them on sawdust, Darl?" I say.

"Look," Darl says. "See?"

Now there are nine of them, tall in little tall black circles.

When we come to the foot of the hill pa stops and Darl and Dewey Dell and I get out. Cash cant walk because he has a broken leg. "Come up, mules," pa says. The mules walk hard; the wagon creaks. Darl and Dewey Dell and I walk behind the wagon, up the hill. When we come to the top of the hill pa stops and we get back into the wagon.

Now there are ten of them, tall in little tall black circles on the sky.

Moseley

I happened to look up, and saw her outside the window, looking in. Not close to the glass, and not looking at anything in particular; just standing there with her head turned this way and her eyes full on me and kind of blank too, like she was waiting for a sign. When I looked up again she was moving toward the door.

She kind of bumbled at the screen door a minute, like they do, and came in. She had on a stiff-brimmed straw hat setting on the top of her head and she was carrying a package wrapped in newspaper: I thought that she had a quarter or a dollar at the most, and that after she stood around a while she would maybe buy a cheap comb or a bottle of nigger toilet water, so I never disturbed her for a minute or so except to notice that she was pretty in a kind of sullen, awkward way, and that she looked a sight better in her gingham dress and her own complexion than she would after she bought whatever she would finally decide on. Or tell that she wanted. I knew that she had already decided before she came in. But you have to let them take their time. So I went on with what I was doing, figuring to let Albert wait on her when he caught up at the fountain, when he came back to me.

"That woman," he said. "You better see what she wants."

"What does she want?" I said.

"I dont know. I cant get anything out of her. You better wait on her."

So I went around the counter. I saw that she was barefooted, standing with her feet flat and easy on the floor, like she was used to it. She was looking at me, hard, holding the package; I saw she had about as black a pair of eyes as ever I saw, and she was a stranger. I never remembered seeing her in Mottson before. "What can I do for you?" I said.

Still she didn't say anything. She stared at me without winking. Then she looked back at the folks at the fountain. Then she looked past me, toward the back of the store.

"Do you want to look at some toilet things?" I said. "Or is it medicine you want?"

"That's it," she said. She looked quick back at the fountain again. So I thought maybe her ma or somebody had sent her in for some of this female dope and she was ashamed to ask for it. I knew she couldn't have a complexion like hers and use it herself, let alone not being much more than old enough to barely know what it was for. It's a shame, the way they poison themselves with it. But a man's got to stock it or go out of business in this country.

"Oh," I said. "What do you use? We have—" She looked at me again, almost like she had said hush, and looked toward the back of the store again.

"I'd liefer go back there," she said.

"All right," I said. You have to humor them. You save time by it. I followed her to the back. She put her hand on the gate. "There's nothing back there but the prescription case," I said. "What do you want?" She stopped and looked at me. It was like she had taken some kind of a lid off her face, her eyes. It was her eyes: kind of dumb and hopeful and sullenly willing to be disappointed all at the same time. But she was in trouble of some sort; I could see that. "What's your trouble?" I said. "Tell me what it is you want. I'm pretty busy." I wasn't meaning to hurry her, but a man just hasn't got the time they have out there.

"It's the female trouble," she said.

"Oh," I said. "Is that all?" I thought maybe she was younger than she looked, and her first one had scared her, or maybe one had been a little abnormal as it will in young women. "Where's your ma?" I said. "Haven't you got one?"

"She's out yonder in the wagon," she said.

"Why not talk to her about it before you take any medicine," I said. "Any woman would have told you about it." She looked at me, and I looked at her again and said, "How old are you?"

"Seventeen," she said.

"Oh," I said. "I thought maybe you were . . ." She was watching me. But then, in the eyes all of them look like they had no age and knew everything in the world, anyhow. "Are you too regular, or not regular enough?"

She quit looking at me but she didn't move. "Yes," she said. "I reckon so. Yes."

"Well, which?" I said. "Dont you know?" It's a crime and a shame; but after all, they'll buy it from somebody. She stood there, not looking at me. "You want something to stop it?" I said. "Is that it?"

"No," she said. "That's it. It's already stopped."

"Well, what—" Her face was lowered a little, still, like they do in all their dealings with a man so he dont ever know just where the lightning will strike next. "You are not married, are you?" I said.

"No."

"Oh," I said. "And how long has it been since it stopped? about five months maybe?"

"It aint been but two," she said.

"Well, I haven't got anything in my store you want to buy," I said, "unless it's a nipple. And I'd advise you to buy that and go back home and tell your pa, if you have one, and let him make somebody buy you a wedding license. Was that all you wanted?"

But she just stood there, not looking at me.

"I got the money to pay you," she said.

"Is it your own, or did he act enough of a man to give you the money?"

"He give it to me. Ten dollars. He said that would be enough."

"A thousand dollars wouldn't be enough in my store and ten cents wouldn't be enough," I said. "You take my advice and go home and tell your pa or your brothers if you have any or the first man you come to in the road."

But she didn't move. "Lafe said I could get it at the drugstore. He said to tell you me and him wouldn't never tell nobody you sold it to us."

"And I just wish your precious Lafe had come for it himself; that's what I wish. I dont know: I'd have had a little respect for him then. And you can go back and tell him I said so—if he aint halfway to Texas by now, which I dont doubt. Me, a respectable druggist, that's kept store and raised a family and been a church-member for fifty-six years in this town. I'm a good mind to tell your folks myself, if I can just find who they are."

She looked at me now, her eyes and face kind of blank again like when I first saw her through the window. "I didn't know," she said. "He told me I could get something at the drugstore. He said they might not want to sell it to me, but if I had ten dollars and told them I wouldn't never tell nobody . . ."

"He never said this drugstore," I said. "If he did or mentioned my name, I defy him to prove it. I defy him to repeat it or I'll prosecute him to the full extent of the law, and you can tell him so."

"But maybe another drugstore would," she said.

"Then I dont want to know it. Me, that's—" Then I looked at her. But it's a hard life they have; sometimes a man . . . if there can ever be any excuse for sin, which it cant be. And then, life wasn't made to be easy on folks: they wouldn't ever have any reason to be good and die. "Look here," I said. "You get that notion out of your head. The Lord gave you what you have, even if He did use the devil to do it; you let Him take it away from you if it's His will to do so. You go on back to Lafe and you and him take that ten dollars and get married with it."

"Lafe said I could get something at the drugstore," she said.

"Then go and get it," I said. "You wont get it here."

She went out, carrying the package, her feet making a little hissing on the floor. She bumped again at the door and went out. I could see her through the glass going on down the street.

It was Albert told me about the rest of it. He said the wagon was stopped in front of Grummet's hardware store, with the ladies all scattering up and down the street with handkerchiefs to their noses, and a crowd of hard-nosed men and boys standing around the wagon, listening to the marshal arguing with the man. He was a kind of tall, gaunted man sitting on the wagon, saying it was a public street and he reckoned he had as much right there as anybody, and the marshal telling him he would have to move on; folks couldn't stand it. It had been dead eight days, Albert said. They came from some place out in Yoknapatawpha county, trying to get to Jefferson with it. It must have been like a piece of rotten cheese coming into an ant-hill, in that ramshackle wagon that Albert said folks were scared would fall all to pieces before they could get it out of town, with that home-made box and another fellow with a broken leg lying on a quilt on top of it, and the father and a little boy sitting in the seat and the marshal trying to make them get out of town.

"It's a public street," the man says. "I reckon we can stop to buy something same as airy other man. We got the money to pay for hit, and hit aint airy law that says a man cant spend his money where he wants."

They had stopped to buy some cement. The other son was in Grummet's, trying to make Grummet break a sack and let him have ten cents' worth, and finally Grummet broke the sack to get him out. They wanted the cement to fix the fellow's broken leg, someway.

"Why, you'll kill him," the marshal said. "You'll cause him to lose his leg. You take him on to the doctor, and you get this thing buried soon as you can. Dont you know you're liable to jail for endangering the public health?"

"We're doing the best we can," the father said. Then he told a long tale about how they had to wait for the wagon to come back and how the bridge was washed away and how they went eight miles to another bridge and it was gone too so they came back and swum the ford and the mules got drowned and how they got another team and found that the road was washed out and they had to come clean around by Mottson, and then the one with the cement came back and told him to shut up.

"We'll be gone in a minute," he told the marshal.

"We never aimed to bother nobody," the father said.

"You take that fellow to a doctor," the marshal told the one with the cement.

"I reckon he's all right," he said.

"It aint that we're hard-hearted," the marshal said. "But I reckon you can tell yourself how it is."

"Sho," the other said. "We'll take out soon as Dewey Dell comes back. She went to deliver a package."

So they stood there with the folks backed off with handkerchiefs to their faces, until in a minute the girl came up with that newspaper package.

"Come on," the one with the cement said, "we've lost too much time." So they got in the wagon and went on. And when I went to supper it still seemed like I could smell it. And the next day I met the marshal and I begun to sniff and said, “Smell anything?”

“I reckon they’re in Jefferson by now,” he said.

“Or in jail. Well, thank the Lord it’s not our jail.”

“That’s a fact,” he said.

Darl

“Here’s a place,” pa says. He pulls the team up and sits looking at the house. “We could get some water over yonder.”

“All right,” I say. “You’ll have to borrow a bucket from them, Dewey Dell.”

“God knows,” pa says. “I wouldn’t be beholden, God knows.”

“If you see a good-sized can, you might bring it,” I say. Dewey Dell gets down from the wagon, carrying the package. “You had more trouble than you expected, selling those cakes in Mottson,” I say. How do our lives ravel out into the no-wind, no-sound, the weary gestures wearily recapitulant: echoes of old compulsions with no-hand on no-strings: in sunset we fall into furious attitudes, dead gestures of dolls. Cash broke his leg and now the sawdust is running out. He is bleeding to death is Cash.

“I wouldn’t be beholden,” pa says. “God knows.”

“Then make some water yourself,” I say. “We can use Cash’s hat.”

When Dewey Dell comes back the man comes with her. Then he stops and she comes on and he stands there and after a while he goes back to the house and stands on the porch, watching us.

“We better not try to lift him down,” pa says. “We can fix it here.”

“Do you want to be lifted down, Cash?” I say.

“Wont we get to Jefferson tomorrow?” he says. He is watching us, his eyes interrogatory, intent, and sad. “I can last it out.”

“It’ll be easier on you,” pa says. “It’ll keep it from rubbing together.”

“I can last it,” Cash says. “We’ll lose time stopping.”

“We done bought the cement now,” pa says.

“I could last it,” Cash says. “It aint but one more day. It dont bother to speak of.” He looks at us, his eyes wide in his thin gray face, questioning. “It sets up so,” he says.

“We done bought it now,” pa says.

I mix the cement in the can, stirring the slow water into the pale green thick coils. I bring the can to the wagon where Cash can see. He lies on his back, his thin profile in silhouette, ascetic and profound against the sky. “Does that look about right?” I say.

“You dont want too much water, or it wont work right,” he says.

“Is this too much?”

“Maybe if you could get a little sand,” he says. “It aint but one more day,” he says. “It dont bother me none.”

Vardaman goes back down the road to where we crossed the branch and returns with sand. He pours it slowly into the thick coiling in the can. I go to the wagon again.

“Does that look all right?”

“Yes,” Cash says. “I could have lasted. It dont bother me none.”

We loosen the splints and pour the cement over his leg, slow.

"Watch out for it," Cash says. "Dont get none on it if you can help."

"Yes," I say. Dewey Dell tears a piece of paper from the package and wipes the cement from the top of it as it drips from Cash's leg.

"How does that feel?"

"It feels fine," he says. "It's cold. It feels fine."

"If it'll just help you," pa says. "I asks your forgiveness. I never foreseen it no more than you."

"It feels fine," Cash says.

If you could just ravel out into time. That would be nice. It would be nice if you could just ravel out into time.

We replace the splints, the cords, drawing them tight, the cement in thick pale green slow surges among the cords, Cash watching us quietly with that profound questioning look.

"That'll steady it," I say.

"Ay," Cash says. "I'm obliged."

Then we all turn on the wagon and watch him. He is coming up the road behind us, wooden-backed, wooden-faced, moving only from his hips down. He comes up without a word, with his pale rigid eyes in his high sullen face, and gets into the wagon.

"Here's a hill," pa says. "I reckon you'll have to get out and walk."

Vardaman

Darl and Jewel and Dewey Dell and I are walking up the hill, behind the wagon. Jewel came back. He came up the road and got into the wagon. He was walking. Jewel hasn't got a horse anymore. Jewel is my brother. Cash is my brother. Cash has a broken leg. We fixed Cash's leg so it doesn't hurt. Cash is my brother. Jewel is my brother too, but he hasn't got a broken leg.

Now there are five of them, tall in little tall black circles.

"Where do they stay at night, Darl?" I say. "When we stop at night in the barn, where do they stay?"

The hill goes off into the sky. Then the sun comes up from behind the hill and the mules and the wagon and pa walk on the sun. You cannot watch them, walking slow on the sun. In Jefferson it is red on the track behind the glass. The track goes shining round and round. Dewey Dell says so.

Tonight I am going to see where they stay while we are in the barn.

Darl

"Jewel" I say, "whose son are you?"

The breeze was setting up from the barn, so we put her under the apple tree, where the moonlight can dapple the apple tree upon the long slumbering flanks within which now and then she talks in little trickling bursts of secret and murmurous bubbling. I took Vardaman to listen. When we came up the cat leaped down from it and flicked away with silver claw and silver eye into the shadow.

"Your mother was a horse, but who was your father, Jewel?"

"You goddamn lying son of a bitch."

"Dont call me that," I say.

"You goddamn lying son of a bitch."

"Dont you call me that, Jewel." In the tall moonlight his eyes look like spots of white paper pasted on a high small football.

After supper Cash began to sweat a little. "It's getting a little hot," he said. "It was the sun shining on it all day, I reckon."

"You want some water poured on it?" we say. "Maybe that will ease it some."

"I'd be obliged," Cash said. "It was the sun shining on it, I reckon. I ought to thought and kept it covered."

"We ought to thought," we said. "You couldn't have suspicioned."

"I never noticed it getting hot," Cash said. "I ought to minded it."

So we poured the water over it. His leg and foot below the cement looked like they had been boiled. "Does that feel better?" we said.

"I'm obliged," Cash said. "It feels fine."

Dewey Dell wipes his face with the hem of her dress.

"See if you can get some sleep," we say.

"Sho," Cash says. "I'm right obliged. It feels fine now."

Jewel, I say, Who was your father, Jewel?

Goddamn you. Goddamn you.

Vardaman

She was under the apple tree and Darl and I go across the moon and the cat jumps down and runs and we can hear her inside the wood.

"Hear?" Darl says. "Put your ear close."

I put my ear close and I can hear her. Only I cant tell what she is saying.

"What is she saying, Darl?" I say. "Who is she talking to?"

"She's talking to God," Darl says. "She is calling on Him to help her."

"What does she want Him to do?" I say.

"She wants Him to hide her away from the sight of man," Darl says.

"Why does she want to hide her away from the sight of man, Darl?"

"So she can lay down her life," Darl says.

"Why does she want to lay down her life, Darl?"

"Listen," Darl says. We hear her. We hear her turn over on her side. "Listen," Darl says.

"She's turned over," I say. "She's looking at me through the wood."

"Yes," Darl says.

"How can she see through the wood, Darl?"

"Come," Darl says. "We must let her be quiet. Come."

"She cant see out there, because the holes are in the top," I say. "How can she see, Darl?"

"Let's go see about Cash," Darl says.

And I saw something Dewey Dell told me not to tell nobody

Cash is sick in his leg. We fixed his leg this afternoon, but he is sick in it again, lying on the bed. We pour water on his leg and then he feels fine.

"I feel fine," Cash says. "I'm obliged to you."

"Try to get some sleep," we say.

"I feel fine," Cash says. "I'm obliged to you."

And I saw something Dewey Dell told me not to tell nobody. It is not about pa and it is not about Cash and it is not about Jewel and it is not about Dewey Dell and it is not about me

Dewey Dell and I are going to sleep on the pallet. It is on the back porch, where we can see the barn, and the moon shines on half of the pallet and we will lie half in the white and half in the black, with the moonlight on our legs. And then I am going to see where they stay at night while we are in the barn. We are not in the barn tonight but I can see the barn and so I am going to find where they stay at night.

We lie on the pallet, with our legs in the moon.

"Look," I say, "my legs look black. Your legs look black, too."

"Go to sleep," Dewey Dell says.

Jefferson is a far piece.

"Dewey Dell."

"What."

"If it's not Christmas now, how will it be there?"

It goes round and round on the shining track. Then the track goes shining round and round.

"Will what be there?"

"That train. In the window."

"You go to sleep. You can see tomorrow if it's there."

Maybe Santa Claus wont know they are town boys.

"Dewey Dell."

"You go to sleep. He aint going to let none of them town boys have it."

It was behind the window, red on the track, the track shining round and round. It made my heart hurt. And then it was pa and Jewel and Darl and Mr Gillespie's boy. Mr Gillespie's boy's legs come down under his night-shirt. When he goes into the moon, his legs fuzz. They go on around the house toward the apple tree.

"What are they going to do, Dewey Dell?"

They went around the house toward the apple tree.

"I can smell her," I say. "Can you smell her, too?"

"Hush," Dewey Dell says. "The wind's changed. Go to sleep."

And so I am going to know where they stay at night soon. They come around the house, going across the yard in the moon, carrying her on their shoulders. They carry her down to the barn, the moon shining flat and quiet on her. Then they come back and go into the house again. While they were in the moon, Mr Gillespie's boy's legs fuzzed. And then I waited and I said Dewey Dell? and then I waited and then I went to find where they stay at night and I saw something that Dewey Dell told me not to tell nobody.

Darl

Against the dark doorway he seems to materialise out of darkness, lean as a race horse in his underclothes in the beginning of the glare. He leaps to the ground with on his face an expression of furious unbelief. He has seen me without even turning his head or his eyes in which the glare swims like two small torches. "Come on," he says, leaping down the slope toward the barn.

For an instant longer he runs silver in the moonlight, then he springs out like a flat figure cut leanly from tin against an abrupt and soundless explosion as the whole loft of the barn takes fire at once, as though it had been stuffed with powder. The front, the conical façade with the square orifice of doorway broken only by the square squat shape of the coffin on the saw-horses like a cubistic bug, comes into relief. Behind me pa and Gillespie and Mack and Dewey Dell and Vardaman emerge from the house.

He pauses at the coffin, stooping, looking at me, his face furious. Overhead the flames sound like thunder; across us rushes a cool draft: there is no heat in it at all yet, and a handful of chaff lifts suddenly and sucks swiftly along the stalls where a horse is screaming. "Quick," I say; "the horses."

He glares a moment longer at me, then at the roof overhead, then he leaps toward the stall where the horse screams. It plunges and kicks, the sound of the crashing blows sucking up into the sound of the flames. They sound like an interminable train crossing an endless trestle. Gillespie and Mack pass me, in knee-length nightshirts, shouting, their voices thin and high and meaningless and at the same time profoundly wild and sad: ". . . cow . . . stall . . ." Gillespie's nightshirt rushes ahead of him on the draft, ballooning about his hairy thighs.

The stall door has swung shut. Jewel thrusts it back with his buttocks and he appears, his back arched, the muscles ridged through his garment as he drags the horse out by its head. In the glare its eyes roll with soft, fleet, wild opaline fire; its muscles bunch and run as it flings its head about, lifting Jewel clear of the ground. He drags it on, slowly, terrifically; again he gives me across his shoulder a single glare furious and brief. Even when they are clear of the barn the horse continues to fight and lash backward toward the doorway until Gillespie passes me, stark-naked, his nightshirt wrapped about the mule's head, and beats the maddened horse on out of the door.

Jewel returns, running; again he looks down at the coffin. But he comes on. "Where's cow?" he cries, passing me. I follow him. In the stall Mack is struggling with the other mule. When its head turns into the glare I can see the wild rolling of its eye too, but it makes no sound. It just stands there, watching Mack over its shoulder, swinging its hind quarters toward him whenever he approaches. He looks back at us, his eyes and mouth three round holes in his face on which the freckles look like English peas on a plate. His voice is thin, high, faraway.

"I cant do nothing . . ." It is as though the sound had been swept from his lips and up and away, speaking back to us from an immense distance of exhaustion. Jewel slides past us; the mule whirls and lashes out, but he has already gained its head. I lean to Mack's ear:

"Nightshirt. Around his head."

Mack stares at me. Then he rips the nightshirt off and flings it over the mule's head, and it becomes docile at once. Jewel is yelling at him: "Cow? Cow?"

"Back," Mack cries. "Last stall."

The cow watches us as we enter. She is backed into the corner, head lowered, still chewing though rapidly. But she makes no move. Jewel has paused, looking up, and suddenly we watch the entire floor to the loft dissolve. It just turns to fire; a faint litter of sparks rains down. He glances about. Back under the trough is a three-legged milking stool. He catches it up and swings it into the planking of the rear wall. He splinters a plank, then another, a third; we tear the fragments away. While we are stooping at the opening something charges into us from behind. It is the cow; with a single whistling breath she rushes between us and through the gap and into the outer glare, her tail erect and rigid as a broom nailed upright to the end of her spine.

Jewel turns back into the barn. "Here," I say; "Jewel!" I grasp at him; he strikes my hand down. "You fool," I say, "dont you see you cant make it back yonder?" The hallway looks like a searchlight turned into rain. "Come on," I say, "around this way."

When we are through the gap he begins to run. "Jewel," I say, running. He darts around the corner. When I reach it he has almost reached the next one, running against the glare like that figure cut from tin. Pa and Gillespie and Mack are some distance away, watching the barn, pink against the darkness where for the time the moonlight has been vanquished. "Catch him!" I cry; "stop him!"

When I reach the front, he is struggling with Gillespie; the one lean in underclothes, the other stark naked. They are like two figures in a Greek frieze, isolated out of all reality by the red glare. Before I can reach them he has struck Gillespie to the ground and turned and run back into the barn.

The sound of it has become quite peaceful now, like the sound of the river did. We watch through the dissolving proscenium of the doorway as Jewel runs crouching to the far end of the coffin and stoops to it. For an instant he looks up and out at us through the rain of burning hay like a portiere of flaming beads, and I can see his mouth shape as he calls my name.

"Jewel!" Dewey Dell cries; "Jewel!" It seems to me that I now hear the accumulation of her voice through the last five minutes, and I hear her scuffling and struggling as pa and Mack hold her, screaming "Jewel! Jewel!" But he is no longer looking at us. We see his shoulders strain as he upends the coffin and slides it single-handed from the sawhorses. It looms unbelievably tall, hiding him: I would not have believed that Addie Bundren would have needed that much room to lie comfortable in; for another instant it stands upright while the sparks rain on it in scattering bursts as though they engendered other sparks from the contact. Then it topples forward, gaining momentum, revealing Jewel and the sparks raining on him too in engendering gusts, so that he appears to be enclosed in a thin nimbus of fire. Without stopping it overends and rears again, pauses, then crashes slowly forward and through the curtain. This time Jewel is riding upon it, clinging to it, until it crashes down and flings him forward and clear and Mack leaps forward into the thin smell of scorching meat and slaps at the widening crimson-edged holes that bloom like flowers in his undershirt.

Vardaman

When I went to find where they stay at night, I saw something They said, "Where is Darl? Where did Darl go?"

They carried her back under the apple tree.

The barn was still red, but it wasn't a barn now. It was sunk down, and the red went swirling up. The barn went swirling up in little red pieces, against the sky and the stars so that the stars moved backward.

And then Cash was still awake. He turned his head from side to side, with sweat on his face.

"Do you want some more water on it, Cash?" Dewey Dell said.

Cash's leg and foot turned black. We held the lamp and looked at Cash's foot and leg where it was black.

"Your foot looks like a nigger's foot, Cash," I said.

"I reckon we'll have to bust it off," pa said.

"What in the tarnation you put it on there for," Mr Gillespie said.

"I thought it would steady it some," pa said. "I just aimed to help him."

They got the flat iron and the hammer. Dewey Dell held the lamp. They had to hit it hard. And then Cash went to sleep.

"He's asleep now," I said. "It cant hurt him while he's asleep."

It just cracked. It wouldn't come off.

"It'll take the hide, too," Mr Gillespie said. "Why in the tarnation you put it on there. Didn't none of you think to grease his leg first?"

"I just aimed to help him," pa said. "It was Darl put it on."

"Where is Darl?" they said.

"Didn't none of you have more sense than that?" Mr Gillespie said. "I'd a thought he would, anyway."

Jewel was lying on his face. His back was red. Dewey Dell put the medicine on it. The medicine was made out of butter and soot, to draw out the fire. Then his back was black.

"Does it hurt, Jewel?" I said. "Your back looks like a nigger's, Jewel," I said. Cash's foot and leg looked like a nigger's. Then they broke it off. Cash's leg bled.

"You go on back and lay down," Dewey Dell said. "You ought to be asleep."

"Where is Darl?" they said.

He is out there under the apple tree with her, lying on her. He is there so the cat wont come back. I said, "Are you going to keep the cat away, Darl?"

The moonlight dappled on him too. On her it was still, but on Darl it dappled up and down.

"You needn't to cry," I said. "Jewel got her out. You needn't to cry, Darl."

The barn is still red. It used to be redder than this. Then it went swirling, making the stars run backward without falling. It hurt my heart like the train did.

When I went to find where they stay at night, I saw something that Dewey Dell says I mustn't never tell nobody

Darl

We have been passing the signs for some time now: the drug stores, the clothing stores, the patent medicine and the garages and cafes, and the mile-boards diminishing, becoming more starkly reaccruent: 3 mi. 2 mi. From the crest of a hill, as we get into the wagon again, we can see the smoke low and flat, seemingly unmoving in the unwinded afternoon.

"Is that it, Darl?" Vardaman says. "Is that Jefferson?" He too has lost flesh; like ours, his face has an expression strained, dreamy, and gaunt.

"Yes," I say. He lifts his head and looks at the sky. High against it they hang in narrowing circles, like the smoke, with an outward semblance of form and purpose, but with no inference of motion, progress or retrograde. We mount the wagon again where Cash lies on the box, the jagged shards of cement cracked about his leg. The shabby mules droop rattling and clanking down the hill.

"We'll have to take him to the doctor," pa says. "I reckon it aint no way around it." The back of Jewel's shirt, where it touches him, stains slow and black with grease. Life was created in the valleys. It blew up onto the hills on the old terrors, the old lusts, the old despairs. That's why you must walk up the hills so you can ride down.

Dewey Dell sits on the seat, the newspaper package on her lap. When we reach the foot of the hill where the road flattens between close walls of trees, she begins to look about quietly from one side of the road to the other.

At last she says,

"I got to stop."

Pa looks at her, his shabby profile that of anticipant and disgruntled annoyance. He does not check the team. "What for?"

"I got to go to the bushes," Dewey Dell says.

Pa does not check the team. "Cant you wait till we get to town? It aint over a mile now."

"Stop," Dewey Dell says. "I got to go to the bushes."

Pa stops in the middle of the road and we watch Dewey Dell descend, carrying the package. She does not look back.

"Why not leave your cakes here?" I say. "We'll watch them."

She descends steadily, not looking at us.

"How would she know where to go if she waited till we get to town?" Vardaman says. "Where would you go to do it in town, Dewey Dell?"

She lifts the package down and turns and disappears among the trees and undergrowth.

"Dont be no longer than you can help," pa says. "We aint got no time to waste." She does not answer. After a while we cannot hear her even. "We ought to done like Armstid and Gillespie said and sent word to town and had it dug and ready," he says.

"Why didn't you?" I say. "You could have telephoned."

"What for?" Jewel says. "Who the hell cant dig a hole in the ground?"

A car comes over the hill. It begins to sound the horn, slowing. It runs along the roadside in low gear, the outside wheels in the ditch, and passes us and goes on. Vardaman watches it until it is out of sight.

"How far is it now, Darl?" he says.

"Not far," I say.

"We ought to done it," pa says. "I just never wanted to be beholden to none except her flesh and blood."

"Who the hell cant dig a damn hole in the ground?" Jewel says.

"It aint respectful, talking that way about her grave," pa says. "You all dont know what it is. You never pure loved her, none of you." Jewel does not answer. He sits a little stiffly erect, his body arched away from his shirt. His high-colored jaw juts.

Dewey Dell returns. We watch her emerge from the bushes, carrying the package, and climb into the wagon. She now wears her Sunday dress, her beads, her shoes and stockings.

"I thought I told you to leave them clothes to home," pa says. She does not answer, does not look at us. She sets the package in the wagon and gets in. The wagon moves on.

"How many more hills now, Darl?" Vardaman says.

"Just one," I say. "The next one goes right up into town."

This hill is red sand, bordered on either hand by negro cabins; against the sky ahead the massed telephone lines run, and the clock on the courthouse lifts among the trees. In the sand the wheels whisper, as though the very earth would hush our entry. We descend as the hill commences to rise.

We follow the wagon, the whispering wheels, passing the cabins where faces come suddenly to the doors, white-eyed. We hear sudden voices, ejaculant. Jewel has been looking from side to side; now his head turns forward and I can see his ears taking on a still deeper tone of furious red. Three negroes walk beside the road ahead of us; ten feet ahead of them a white man walks. When we pass the negroes their heads turn suddenly with that expression of shock and instinctive outrage. "Great God," one says; "what they got in that wagon?"

Jewel whirls. "Son of a bitches," he says. As he does so he is abreast of the white man, who has paused. It is as though Jewel had gone blind for the moment, for it is the white man toward whom he whirls.

"Darl!" Cash says from the wagon. I grasp at Jewel. The white man has fallen back a pace, his face still slack-jawed; then his jaw tightens, claps to. Jewel leans above him, his jaw muscles gone white.

"What did you say?" he says.

"Here," I say. "He dont mean anything, mister. Jewel," I say. When I touch him he swings at the man. I grasp his arm; we struggle. Jewel has never looked at me. He is trying to free his arm. When I see the man again he has an open knife in his hand.

"Hold on, mister," I say; "I've got him. Jewel," I say.

"Thinks because he's a goddamn town fellow," Jewel says, panting, wrenching at me. "Son of a bitch," he says.

The man moves. He begins to edge around me, watching Jewel, the knife low against his flank. "Cant no man call me that," he says. Pa has got down, and Dewey Dell is holding Jewel, pushing at him. I release him and face the man.

"Wait," I say. "He dont mean nothing. He's sick; got burned in a fire last night, and he aint himself."

"Fire or no fire," the man says, "cant no man call me that."

"He thought you said something to him," I say.

"I never said nothing to him. I never see him before."

"Fore God," pa says; "fore God."

"I know," I say. "He never meant anything. He'll take it back."

"Let him take it back, then."

"Put up your knife, and he will."

The man looks at me. He looks at Jewel. Jewel is quiet now.

"Put up your knife," I say.

The man shuts the knife.

"Fore God," pa says. "Fore God."

"Tell him you didn't mean anything, Jewel," I say.

"I thought he said something," Jewel says. "Just because he's—"

"Hush," I say. "Tell him you didn't mean it."

"I didn't mean it," Jewel says.

"He better not," the man says. "Calling me a—"

"Do you think he's afraid to call you that?" I say.

The man looks at me. "I never said that," he said.

"Don't think it, neither," Jewel says.

"Shut up," I say. "Come on. Drive on, pa."

The wagon moves. The man stands watching us. Jewel does not look back. "Jewel would a whipped him," Vardaman says.

We approach the crest, where the street runs, where cars go back and forth; the mules haul the wagon up and onto the crest and the street. Pa stops them. The street runs on ahead, where the square opens and the monument stands before the courthouse. We mount again while the heads turn with that expression which we know; save Jewel. He does not get on, even though the wagon has started again. "Get in, Jewel," I say. "Come on. Let's get away from here." But he does not get in. Instead he sets his foot on the turning hub of the rear wheel, one hand grasping the stanchion, and with the hub turning smoothly under his sole he lifts the other foot and squats there, staring straight ahead, motionless, lean, wooden-backed, as though carved squatting out of the lean wood.

Cash

It wasn't nothing else to do. It was either send him to Jackson, or have Gillespie sue us, because he knowed some way that Darl set fire to it. I dont know how he knowed, but he did. Vardaman see him do it, but he swore he never told nobody but Dewey Dell and that she told him not to tell nobody. But Gillespie knowed it. But he would a suspicioned it sooner or later. He could have done it that night just watching the way Darl acted.

And so pa said, "I reckon there aint nothing else to do," and Jewel said, "You want to fix him now?"

"Fix him?" pa said.

"Catch him and tie him up," Jewel said. "Goddamn it, do you want to wait until he sets fire to the goddamn team and wagon?"

But there wasn't no use in that. "There aint no use in that," I said. "We can wait till she is underground." A fellow that's going to spend the rest of his life locked up, he ought to be let to have what pleasure he can have before he goes.

"I reckon he ought to be there," pa says. "God knows, it's a trial on me. Seems like it aint no end to bad luck when once it starts."

Sometimes I aint so sho who's got ere a right to say when a man is crazy and when he aint. Sometimes I think it aint none of us pure crazy and aint none of us pure sane until the balance of us talks him that-a-way. It's like it aint so much what a fellow does, but it's the way the majority of folks is looking at him when he does it.

Because Jewel is too hard on him. Of course it was Jewel's horse was traded to get her that nigh to town, and in a sense it was the value of his horse Darl tried to burn up. But I thought more than once before we crossed the river and after, how it would be God's blessing if He did take her outen our hands and get shut of her in some clean way, and it seemed to me that when Jewel worked so to get her outen the river, he was going against God in a way, and then when Darl seen that it looked like one of us would have to do something, I can almost believe he done right in a way. But I dont reckon nothing excuses setting fire to a man's barn and endangering his stock and destroying his property. That's how I reckon a man is crazy. That's how he cant see eye to eye with other folks. And I reckon they aint nothing else to do with him but what the most folks says is right.

But it's a shame, in a way. Folks seems to get away from the olden right teaching that says to drive the nails down and trim the edges well always like it was for your own use and comfort you were making it. It's like some folks has the smooth, pretty boards to build a courthouse with and others dont have no more than rough lumber fitten to build a chicken coop. But it's better to build a tight chicken coop than a shoddy courthouse, and when they both build shoddy or build well, neither because it's one or tother is going to make a man feel the better nor the worse.

So we went up the street, toward the square, and he said, "We better take Cash to the doctor first. We can leave him there and come back for him." That's it. It's because me and him was born close together, and it nigh ten years before Jewel and Dewey Dell and Vardaman begun to come along. I feel kin to them, all right, but I dont know. And me being the oldest, and thinking already the very thing that he done: I dont know.

Pa was looking at me, then at him, mumbling his mouth.

"Go on," I said. "We'll get it done first."

"She would want us all there," pa says.

"Let's take Cash to the doctor first," Darl said. "She'll wait. She's already waited nine days."

"You all dont know," pa says. "The somebody you was young with and you growed old in her and she growed old in you, seeing the old coming on and it was the one somebody you could hear say it dont matter and know it was the truth outen the hard world and all a man's grief and trials. You all dont know."

"We got the digging to do, too," I said.

"Armstid and Gillespie both told you to send word ahead," Darl said. "Dont you want to go to Peabody's now, Cash?"

"Go on," I said. "It feels right easy now. It's best to get things done in the right place."

"If it was just dug," pa says. "We forgot our spade, too."

"Yes," Darl said. "I'll go to the hardware store. We'll have to buy one."

"It'll cost money," pa says.

"Do you begrudge her it?" Darl says.

"Go on and get a spade," Jewel said. "Here. Give me the money."

But pa didn't stop. "I reckon we can get a spade," he said. "I reckon there are Christians here." So Darl set still and we went on, with Jewel squatting on the tail-gate, watching the back of Darl's head. He looked like one of these bull dogs, one of these dogs that dont bark none, squatting against the rope, watching the thing he was waiting to jump at.

He set that way all the time we was in front of Mrs Bundren's house, hearing the music, watching the back of Darl's head with them hard white eyes of hisn.

The music was playing in the house. It was one of them graphophones.¹ It was natural as a music-band.

"Do you want to go to Peabody's?" Darl said. "They can wait here and tell pa, and I'll drive you to Peabody's and come back for them."

1. Trademark of an early machine for playing recorded music using wax platters.

"No," I said. It was better to get her underground, now we was this close, just waiting until pa borrowed the shovel. He drove along the street until we could hear the music.

"Maybe they got one here," he said. He pulled up at Mrs Bundren's. It was like he knowed. Sometimes I think that if a working man could see work as far ahead as a lazy man can see laziness. So he stopped there like he knowed, before that little new house, where the music was. We waited there, hearing it. I believe I could have dickered Suratt down to five dollars on that one of his. It's a comfortable thing, music is. "Maybe they got one here," pa says.

"You want Jewel to go," Darl says, "or do you reckon I better?"

"I reckon I better," pa says. He got down and went up the path and around the house to the back. The music stopped, then it started again.

"He'll get it, too," Darl said.

"Ay," I said. It was just like he knowed, like he could see through the walls and into the next ten minutes.

Only it was more than ten minutes. The music stopped and never commenced again for a good spell, where her and pa was talking at the back. We waited in the wagon.

"You let me take you back to Peabody's," Darl said.

"No," I said. "We'll get her underground."

"If he ever gets back," Jewel said. He begun to cuss. He started to get down from the wagon. "I'm going," he said.

Then we saw pa coming back. He had two spades, coming around the house. He laid them in the wagon and got in and we went on. The music never started again. Pa was looking back at the house. He kind of lifted his hand a little and I saw the shade pulled back a little at the window and her face in it.

But the curiouesest thing was Dewey Dell. It surprised me. I see all the while how folks could say he was queer, but that was the very reason couldn't nobody hold it personal. It was like he was outside of it too, same as you, and getting mad at it would be kind of like getting mad at a mud-puddle that splashed you when you stepped in it. And then I always kind of had a idea that him and Dewey Dell kind of knowed things betwixt them. If I'd a said it was ere a one of us she liked better than ere a other, I'd a said it was Darl. But when we got it filled and covered and drove out the gate and turned into the lane where them fellows was waiting, when they come out and come on him and he jerked back, it was Dewey Dell that was on him before even Jewel could get at him. And then I believed I knowed how Gillespie knowed about how his barn taken fire.

She hadn't said a word, hadn't even looked at him, but when them fellows told him what they wanted and that they had come to get him and he throwed back, she jumped on him like a wild cat so that one of the fellows had to quit and hold her and her scratching and clawing at him like a wild cat, while the other one and pa and Jewel throwed Darl down and held him lying on his back, looking up at me.

"I thought you would have told me," he said. "I never thought you wouldn't have."

"Darl," I said. But he fought again, him and Jewel and the fellow, and the other one holding Dewey Dell and Vardaman yelling and Jewel saying,

"Kill him. Kill the son of a bitch."

It was bad so. It was bad. A fellow cant get away from a shoddy job. He cant do it. I tried to tell him, but he just said, "I thought you'd a told me. It's not that I," he said, then he begun to laugh. The other fellow pulled Jewel off of him and he sat there on the ground, laughing.

I tried to tell him. If I could have just moved, even set up. But I tried to tell him and he quit laughing, looking up at me.

"Do you want me to go?" he said.

"It'll be better for you," I said. "Down there it'll be quiet, with none of the bothering and such. It'll be better for you, Darl," I said.

"Better," he said. He begun to laugh again. "Better," he said. He couldn't hardly say it for laughing. He sat on the ground and us watching him, laughing and laughing. It was bad. It was bad so. I be durn if I could see anything to laugh at. Because there just aint nothing justifies the deliberate destruction of what a man has built with his own sweat and stored the fruit of his sweat into.

But I aint so sho that ere a man has the right to say what is crazy and what aint. It's like there was a fellow in every man that's done a-past the sanity or the insanity, that watches the sane and the insane doings of that man with the same horror and the same astonishment.

Peabody

I said, "I reckon a man in a tight might let Bill Varner patch him up like a damn mule, but I be damned if the man that'd let Anse Bundren treat him with raw cement aint got more spare legs than I have."

"They just aimed to ease hit some," he said.

"Aimed, hell," I said. "What in hell did Armstid mean by even letting them put you on that wagon again?"

"Hit was gittin right noticeable," he said. "We never had time to wait." I just looked at him. "Hit never bothered me none," he said.

"Dont you lie there and try to tell me you rode six days on a wagon without springs, with a broken leg and it never bothered you."

"It never bothered me much," he said.

"You mean, it never bothered Anse much," I said. "No more than it bothered him to throw that poor devil down in the public street and handcuff him like a damn murderer. Dont tell me. And dont tell me it aint going to bother you to lose sixty-odd square inches of skin to get that concrete off. And dont tell me it aint going to bother you to have to limp around on one short leg for the balance of your life—if you walk at all again. Concrete," I said. "God Amighty, why didn't Anse carry you to the nearest sawmill and stick your leg in the saw? That would have cured it. Then you all could have stuck his head into the saw and cured a whole family . . . Where is Anse, anyway? What's he up to now?"

"He's takin back them spades he borrowed," he said.

"That's right," I said. "Of course he'd have to borrow a spade to bury his wife with. Unless he could borrow a hole in the ground. Too bad you all didn't put him in it too . . . Does that hurt?"

"Not to speak of," he said, and the sweat big as marbles running down his face and his face about the color of blotting paper.

"Course not," I said. "About next summer you can hobble around fine on this leg. Then it wont bother you, not to speak of . . . If you had anything you could call luck, you might say it was lucky this is the same leg you broke before," I said.

"Hit's what paw says," he said.

MacGowan

It happened I am back of the prescription case, pouring up some chocolate sauce, when Jody comes back and says, "Say, Skeet, there's a woman up front that wants to see the doctor and when I said What doctor you want to see, she said she wants to see the doctor that works here and when I said There aint any doctor works here, she just stood there, looking back this way."

"What kind of a woman is it?" I says. "Tell her to go upstairs to Alford's office."

"Country woman," he says.

"Send her to the courthouse," I says. "Tell her all the doctors have gone to Memphis to a Barbers' Convention."

"All right," he says, going away. "She looks pretty good for a country girl," he says.

"Wait," I says. He waited and I went and peeped through the crack. But I couldn't tell nothing except she had a good leg against the light. "Is she young, you say?" I says.

"She looks like a pretty hot mamma, for a country girl," he says.

"Take this," I says, giving him the chocolate. I took off my apron and went up there. She looked pretty good. One of them black eyed ones that look like she'd as soon put a knife in you as not if you two-timed her. She looked pretty good. There wasn't nobody else in the store; it was dinner time.

"What can I do for you?" I says.

"Are you the doctor?" she says.

"Sure," I says. She quit looking at me and was kind of looking around.

"Can we go back yonder?" she says.

It was just a quarter past twelve, but I went and told Jody to kind of watch out and whistle if the old man come in sight, because he never got back before one.

"You better lay off of that," Jody says. "He'll fire your stern out of here so quick you cant wink."

"He dont never get back before one," I says. "You can see him go into the postoffice. You keep your eye peeled, now, and give me a whistle."

"What you going to do?" he says.

"You keep your eye out. I'll tell you later."

"Aint you going to give me no seconds on it?" he says.

"What the hell do you think this is?" I says; "a stud-farm? You watch out for him. I'm going into conference."

So I go on to the back. I stopped at the glass and smoothed my hair, then I went behind the prescription case, where she was waiting. She is looking at the medicine cabinet, then she looks at me.

"Now madam," I says; "what is your trouble?"

"It's the female trouble," she says, watching me. "I got the money," she says.

"Ah," I says. "Have you got female troubles or do you want female troubles? If so, you come to the right doctor." Them country people. Half the time they dont know what they want, and the balance of the time they cant tell it to you. The clock said twenty past twelve.

"No," she says.

"No which?" I says.

"I aint had it," she says. "That's it." She looked at me. "I got the money," she says.

So I knew what she was talking about.

"Oh," I says. "You got something in your belly you wish you didn't have." She looks at me. "You wish you had a little more or a little less, huh?"

"I got the money," she says. "He said I could git something at the drug-store for hit."

"Who said so?" I says.

"He did," she says, looking at me.

"You dont want to call no names," I says. "The one that put the acorn in your belly? He the one that told you?" She dont say nothing. "You aint married, are you?" I says. I never saw no ring. But like as not, they aint heard yet out there that they use rings.

"I got the money," she says. She showed it to me, tied up in her handkerchief: a ten spot.

"I'll swear you have," I says. "He give it to you?"

"Yes," she says.

"Which one?" I says. She looks at me. "Which one of them give it to you?"

"It aint but one," she says. She looks at me.

"Go on," I says. She dont say nothing. The trouble about the cellar is, it aint but one way out and that's back up the inside stairs. The clock says twenty-five to one. "A pretty girl like you," I says.

She looks at me. She begins to tie the money back up in the handkerchief. "Excuse me a minute," I says. I go around the prescription case. "Did you hear about that fellow sprained his ear?" I says. "After that he couldn't even hear a belch."

"You better get her out from back there before the old man comes," Jody says.

"If you'll stay up there in front where he pays you to stay, he wont catch nobody but me," I says.

He goes on, slow, toward the front. "What you doing to her, Skeet?" he says.

"I cant tell you," I says. "It wouldn't be ethical. You go on up there and watch."

"Say, Skeet," he says.

"Ah, go on," I says. "I aint doing nothing but filling a prescription."

"He may not do nothing about that woman back there, but if he finds you monkeying with that prescription case, he'll kick your stern clean down them cellar stairs."

"My stern has been kicked by bigger bastards than him," I says. "Go back and watch out for him, now."

So I come back. The clock said fifteen to one. She is tying the money in the handkerchief. "You aint the doctor," she says.

"Sure I am," I says. She watches me. "Is it because I look too young, or am I too handsome?" I says. "We used to have a bunch of old water-jointed doctors here," I says; "Jefferson used to be a kind of Old Doctors' Home for them. But business started falling off and folks stayed so well until one day they found out that the women wouldn't never get sick at all. So they run all the old doctors out and got us young good-looking ones that the women would like and then the women begun to get sick again and so business picked up. They're doing that all over the country. Hadn't you heard about it? Maybe it's because you aint never needed a doctor."

"I need one now," she says.

"And you come to the right one," I says. "I already told you that."

"Have you got something for it?" she says. "I got the money."

"Well," I says, "of course a doctor has to learn all sorts of things while he's learning to roll calomel; he cant help himself. But I dont know about your trouble."

"He told me I could get something. He told me I could get it at the drug-store."

"Did he tell you the name of it?" I says. "You better go back and ask him."

She quit looking at me, kind of turning the handkerchief in her hands. "I got to do something," she says.

"How bad do you want to do something?" I says. She looks at me. "Of course, a doctor learns all sorts of things folks dont think he knows. But he aint supposed to tell all he knows. It's against the law."

Up front Jody says, "Skeet."

"Excuse me a minute," I says. I went up front. "Do you see him?" I says.

"Aint you done yet?" he says. "Maybe you better come up here and watch and let me do that consulting."

"Maybe you'll lay a egg," I says. I come back. She is looking at me. "Of course you realise that I could be put in the penitentiary for doing what you want," I says. "I would lose my license and then I'd have to go to work. You realise that?"

"I aint got but ten dollars," she says. "I could bring the rest next month, maybe."

"Pooh," I says, "ten dollars? You see, I cant put no price on my knowledge and skill. Certainly not for no little paltry sawbuck."

She looks at me. She dont even blink. "What you want, then?"

The clock said four to one. So I decided I better get her out. "You guess three times and then I'll show you," I says.

She dont even blink her eyes. "I got to do something," she says. She looks behind her and around, then she looks toward the front. "Gimme the medicine first," she says.

"You mean, you're ready to right now?" I says. "Here?"

"Gimme the medicine first," she says.

So I took a graduated glass and kind of turned my back to her and picked out a bottle that looked all right, because a man that would keep poison setting around in a unlabelled bottle ought to be in jail, anyway. It smelled like turpentine. I poured some into the glass and give it to her. She smelled it, looking at me across the glass.

"Hit smells like turpentine," she says.

"Sure," I says. "That's just the beginning of the treatment. You come back at ten oclock tonight and I'll give you the rest of it and perform the operation."

“Operation?” she says.

“It wont hurt you. You’ve had the same operation before. Ever hear about the hair of the dog?”

She looks at me. “Will it work?” she says.

“Sure it’ll work. If you come back and get it.”

So she drunk whatever it was without batting a eye, and went out. I went up front.

“Didn’t you get it?” Jody says.

“Get what?” I says.

“Ah, come on,” he says. “I aint going to try to beat your time.”

“Oh, her,” I says. “She just wanted a little medicine. She’s got a bad case of dysentery and she’s a little ashamed about mentioning it with a stranger there.”

It was my night, anyway, so I helped the old bastard check up and I got his hat on him and got him out of the store by eight-thirty. I went as far as the corner with him and watched him until he passed under two street lamps and went on out of sight. Then I come back to the store and waited until nine-thirty and turned out the front lights and locked the door and left just one light burning at the back, and I went back and put some talcum powder into six capsules and kind of cleared up the cellar and then I was all ready.

She come in just at ten, before the clock had done striking. I let her in and she come in, walking fast. I looked out the door, but there wasn’t nobody but a boy in overalls sitting on the curb. “You want something?” I says. He never said nothing, just looking at me. I locked the door and turned off the light and went on back. She was waiting. She didn’t look at me now.

“Where is it?” she said.

I gave her the box of capsules. She held the box in her hand, looking at the capsules.

“Are you sure it’ll work?” she says.

“Sure,” I says. “When you take the rest of the treatment.”

“Where do I take it?” she says.

“Down in the cellar,” I says.

Vardaman

Now it is wider and lighter, but the stores are dark because they have all gone home. The stores are dark, but the lights pass on the windows when we pass. The lights are in the trees around the courthouse. They roost in the trees, but the courthouse is dark. The clock on it looks four ways, because it is not dark. The moon is not dark too. Not very dark. Darl he went to Jackson is my brother Darl is my brother Only it was over that way, shining on the track.

“Let’s go that way, Dewey Dell,” I say.

“What for?” Dewey Dell says. The track went shining around the window, it red on the track. But she said he would not sell it to the town boys. “But it will be there Christmas,” Dewey Dell says. “You’ll have to wait till then, when he brings it back.”

Darl went to Jackson. Lots of people didn’t go to Jackson. Darl is my brother. My brother is going to Jackson

While we walk the lights go around, roosting in the trees. On all sides it is the same. They go around the courthouse and then you cannot see them. But you can see them in the black windows beyond. They have all gone home to bed except me and Dewey Dell.

Going on the train to Jackson. My brother

There is a light in the store, far back. In the window are two big glasses of soda water, red and green. Two men could not drink them. Two mules could not. Two cows could not. Darl

A man comes to the door. He looks at Dewey Dell.

"You wait out here," Dewey Dell says.

"Why cant I come in?" I say. "I want to come in, too."

"You wait out here," she says.

"All right," I say.

Dewey Dell goes in.

Darl is my brother. Darl went crazy

The walk is harder than sitting on the ground. He is in the open door. He looks at me. "You want something?" he says. His head is slick. Jewel's head is slick sometimes. Cash's head is not slick. Darl he went to Jackson my brother Darl In the street he ate a banana. Wouldn't you rather have bananas? Dewey Dell said. You wait till Christmas. It'll be there then. Then you can see it. So we are going to have some bananas. We are going to have a bag full, me and Dewey Dell. He locks the door. Dewey Dell is inside. Then the light winks out.

He went to Jackson. He went crazy and went to Jackson both. Lots of people didn't go crazy. Pa and Cash and Jewel and Dewey Dell and me didn't go crazy. We never did go crazy. We didn't go to Jackson either. Darl

I hear the cow a long time, clopping on the street. Then she comes into the square. She goes across the square, her head down clopping. She lows. There was nothing in the square before she lowed, but it wasn't empty. Now it is empty after she lowed. She goes on, clopping. She lows. My brother is Darl. He went to Jackson on the train. He didn't go on the train to go crazy. He went crazy in our wagon. Darl She has been in there a long time. And the cow is gone too. A long time. She has been in there longer than the cow was. But not as long as empty. Darl is my brother. My brother Darl

Dewey Dell comes out. She looks at me.

"Let's go around that way now," I say.

She looks at me. "It aint going to work," she says. "That son of a bitch."

"What aint going to work, Dewey Dell?"

"I just know it wont," she says. She is not looking at anything. "I just know it."

"Let's go that way," I say.

"We got to go back to the hotel. It's late. We got to slip back in."

"Cant we go by and see, anyway?"

"Hadn't you rather have bananas? Hadn't you rather?"

"All right." My brother he went crazy and he went to Jackson too. Jackson is further away than crazy

"It wont work," Dewey Dell says. "I just know it wont."

"What wont work?" I say. He had to get on the train to go to Jackson. I have not been on the train, but Darl has been on the train. Darl. Darl is my brother. Darl. Darl

Darl

Darl has gone to Jackson. They put him on the train, laughing, down the long car laughing, the heads turning like the heads of owls when he passed. "What are you laughing at?" I said.

"Yes yes yes yes yes."

Two men put him on the train. They wore mismatched coats, bulging behind over their right hip pockets. Their necks were shaved to a hairline, as though the recent and simultaneous barbers had had a chalk-line like Cash's. "Is it the pistols you're laughing at?" I said. "Why do you laugh?" I said. "Is it because you hate the sound of laughing?"

They pulled two seats together so Darl could sit by the window to laugh. One of them sat beside him, the other sat on the seat facing him, riding backward. One of them had to ride backward because the state's money has a face to each backside and a backside to each face, and they are riding on the state's money which is incest. A nickel has a woman on one side and a buffalo on the other; two faces and no back. I don't know what that is. Darl had a little spy-glass he got in France at the war. In it it had a woman and a pig with two backs and no face. I know what that is. "Is that why you are laughing, Darl?"

"Yes yes yes yes yes."

The wagon stands on the square, hitched, the mules motionless, the reins wrapped about the seat-spring, the back of the wagon toward the courthouse. It looks no different from a hundred other wagons there; Jewel standing beside it and looking up the street like any other man in town that day, yet there is something different, distinctive. There is about it that unmistakable air of definite and imminent departure that trains have, perhaps due to the fact that Dewey Dell and Vardaman on the seat and Cash on a pallet in the wagon bed are eating bananas from a paper bag. "Is that why you are laughing, Darl?"

Darl is our brother, our brother Darl. Our brother Darl in a cage in Jackson where, his grimed hands lying light in the quiet interstices, looking out he foams.

"Yes yes yes yes yes yes yes yes."

Dewey Dell

When he saw the money I said, "It's not my money, it doesn't belong to me."

"Whose is it, then?"

"It's Cora Tull's money. It's Mrs Tull's. I sold the cakes for it."

"Ten dollars for two cakes?"

"Don't you touch it. It's not mine."

"You never had them cakes. It's a lie. It was them Sunday clothes you had in that package."

"Don't you touch it! If you take it you are a thief."

"My own daughter accuses me of being a thief. My own daughter."

"Pa. Pa."

"I have fed you and sheltered you. I give you love and care, yet my own daughter, the daughter of my dead wife, calls me a thief over her mother's grave."

"Its not mine, I tell you. If it was, God knows you could have it."

"Where did you get ten dollars?"

"Pa. Pa."

"You wont tell me. Did you come by it so shameful you dare not?"

"It's not mine, I tell you. Cant you understand it's not mine?"

"It's not like I wouldn't pay it back. But she calls her own father a thief."

"I cant, I tell you. I tell you it's not my money. God knows you could have it."

"I wouldn't take it. My own born daughter that has et my food for seventeen years, begrudges me the loan of ten dollars."

"It's not mine. I cant."

"Whose is it, then?"

"It was give to me. To buy something with."

"To buy what with?"

"Pa. Pa."

"It's just a loan. God knows, I hate for my blooden children to reproach me. But I give them what was mine without stint. Cheerful I give them, without stint. And now they deny me. Addie. It was lucky for you you died, Addie."

"Pa. Pa."

"God knows it is."

He took the money and went out.

Cash

So when we stopped there to borrow the shovels we heard the graphophone playing in the house, and so when we got done with the shovels pa says, "I reckon I better take them back."

So we went back to the house. "We better take Cash on to Peabody's," Jewel said.

"It wont take but a minute," pa said. He got down from the wagon. The music was not playing now.

"Let Vardaman do it," Jewel said. "He can do it in half the time you can. Or here, you let me—"

"I reckon I better do it," pa says. "Long as it was me that borrowed them."

So we set in the wagon, but the music wasn't playing now. I reckon it's a good thing we aint got ere a one of them. I reckon I wouldn't never get no work done a-tall for listening to it. I dont know if a little music aint about the nicest thing a fellow can have. Seems like when he comes in tired of a night, it aint nothing could rest him like having a little music played and him resting. I have see them that shuts up like a hand-grip, with a handle and all, so a fellow can carry it with him wherever he wants.

"What you reckon he's doing?" Jewel says. "I could a toted them shovels back and forth ten times by now."

"Let him take his time," I said. "He aint as spry as you, remember."

"Why didn't he let me take them back, then? We got to get your leg fixed up so we can start home tomorrow."

"We got plenty of time," I said. "I wonder what them machines costs on the installment."

"Installment of what?" Jewel said. "What you got to buy it with?"

"A fellow cant tell," I said. "I could a bought that one from Suratt for five dollars, I believe."

And so pa come back and we went to Peabody's. While we was there pa said he was going to the barbershop and get a shave. And so that night he said he had some business to tend to, kind of looking away from us while he said it, with his hair combed wet and slick and smelling sweet with perfume, but I said leave him be; I wouldn't mind hearing a little more of that music myself.

And so next morning he was gone again, then he come back and told us to get hitched up and ready to take out and he would meet us and when they was gone he said,

"I dont reckon you got no more money."

"Peabody just give me enough to pay the hotel with," I said. "We dont need nothing else, do we?"

"No," pa said; "no. We dont need nothing." He stood there, not looking at me.

"If it is something we got to have, I reckon maybe Peabody," I said.

"No," he said; "it aint nothing else. You all wait for me at the corner."

So Jewel got the team and come for me and they fixed me a pallet in the wagon and we drove across the square to the corner where pa said, and we was waiting there in the wagon, with Dewey Dell and Vardaman eating bananas, when we see them coming up the street. Pa was coming along with that kind of daresome and hangdog look all at once like when he has been up to something he knows ma aint going to like, carrying a grip in his hand, and Jewel says,

"Who's that?"

Then we see it wasn't the grip that made him look different; it was his face, and Jewel says, "He got them teeth."

It was a fact. It made him look a foot taller, kind of holding his head up, hangdog and proud too, and then we see her behind him, carrying the other grip—a kind of duck-shaped woman all dressed up, with them kind of hard-looking pop eyes like she was daring ere a man to say nothing. And there we set watching them, with Dewey Dell's and Vardaman's mouth half open and half-et bananas in their hands and her coming around from behind pa, looking at us like she dared ere a man. And then I see that the grip she was carrying was one of them little graphophones. It was for a fact, all shut up as pretty as a picture, and everytime a new record would come from the mail order and us setting in the house in the winter, listening to it, I would think what a shame Darl couldn't be to enjoy it too. But it is better so for him. This world is not his world; this life his life.

"It's Cash and Jewel and Vardaman and Dewey Dell," pa says, kind of hangdog and proud too, with his teeth and all, even if he wouldn't look at us. "Meet Mrs Bundren," he says.

A Rose for Emily

I

When Miss Emily Grierson died, our whole town went to her funeral: the men through a sort of respectful affection for a fallen monument, the women mostly out of curiosity to see the inside of her house, which no one save an old manservant—a combined gardener and cook—had seen in at least ten years.

It was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins had encroached and obliterated even the august names of that neighborhood; only Miss Emily's house was left, lifting its stubborn and coquettish decay above the cotton wagons and the gasoline pumps—an eyesore among eyesores. And now Miss Emily had gone to join the representatives of those august names where they lay in the cedar-bemused cemetery among the ranked and anonymous graves of Union and Confederate soldiers who fell at the battle of Jefferson.

Alive, Miss Emily had been a tradition, a duty, and a care; a sort of hereditary obligation upon the town, dating from that day in 1894 when Colonel Sartoris, the mayor—he who fathered the edict that no Negro woman should appear on the streets without an apron—remitted her taxes, the dispensation dating from the death of her father on into perpetuity. Not that Miss Emily would have accepted charity. Colonel Sartoris invented an involved tale to the effect that Miss Emily's father had loaned money to the town, which the town, as a matter of business, preferred this way of repaying. Only a man of Colonel Sartoris' generation and thought could have invented it, and only a woman could have believed it.

When the next generation, with its more modern ideas, became mayors and aldermen, this arrangement created some little dissatisfaction. On the first of the year they mailed her a tax notice. February came, and there was no reply. They wrote her a formal letter, asking her to call at the sheriff's office at her convenience. A week later the mayor wrote her himself, offering to call or to send his car for her, and received in reply a note on paper of an archaic shape, in a thin, flowing calligraphy in faded ink, to the effect that she no longer went out at all. The tax notice was also enclosed, without comment.

They called a special meeting of the Board of Aldermen. A deputation waited upon her, knocked at the door through which no visitor had passed since she ceased giving china-painting lessons eight or ten years earlier. They were admitted by the old Negro into a dim hall from which a stairway mounted into still more shadow. It smelled of dust and disuse—a close, dank smell. The Negro led them into the parlor. It was furnished in heavy, leather-covered furniture. When the Negro opened the blinds of one window, they could see that the leather was cracked; and when they sat down, a faint dust rose sluggishly about their thighs, spinning with slow motes in the single sunray. On a tarnished gilt easel before the fireplace stood a crayon portrait of Miss Emily's father.

They rose when she entered—a small, fat woman in black, with a thin gold chain descending to her waist and vanishing into her belt, leaning on an ebony cane with a tarnished gold head. Her skeleton was small and spare; perhaps that was why what would have been merely plumpness in another was obesity in her. She looked bloated, like a body long submerged in motionless water, and of that pallid hue. Her eyes, lost in the fatty ridges of her face, looked like two small pieces of coal pressed into a lump of dough as they moved from one face to another while the visitors stated their errand.

She did not ask them to sit. She just stood in the door and listened quietly until the spokesman came to a stumbling halt. Then they could hear the invisible watch ticking at the end of the gold chain.

Her voice was dry and cold. "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Colonel Sartoris explained it to me. Perhaps one of you can gain access to the city records and satisfy yourselves."

"But we have. We are the city authorities, Miss Emily. Didn't you get a notice from the sheriff, signed by him?"

"I received a paper, yes," Miss Emily said. "Perhaps he considers himself the sheriff I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But there is nothing on the books to show that, you see. We must go by the—"

"See Colonel Sartoris. I have no taxes in Jefferson."

"But, Miss Emily—"

"See Colonel Sartoris." (Colonel Sartoris had been dead almost ten years.) "I have no taxes in Jefferson. Tobe!" The Negro appeared. "Show these gentlemen out."

II

So she vanquished them, horse and foot, just as she had vanquished their fathers thirty years before about the smell. That was two years after her father's death and a short time after her sweetheart—the one we believed would marry her—had deserted her. After her father's death she went out very little; after her sweetheart went away, people hardly saw her at all. A few of the ladies had the temerity to call, but were not received, and the only sign of life about the place was the Negro man—a young man then—going in and out with a market basket.

"Just as if a man—any man—could keep a kitchen properly," the ladies said; so they were not surprised when the smell developed. It was another link between the gross, teeming world and the high and mighty Griersons.

A neighbor, a woman, complained to the mayor, Judge Stevens, eighty years old.

"But what will you have me do about it, madam?" he said.

"Why, send her word to stop it," the woman said. "Isn't there a law?"

"I'm sure that won't be necessary," Judge Stevens said. "It's probably just a snake or a rat that nigger of hers killed in the yard. I'll speak to him about it."

The next day he received two more complaints, one from a man who came in diffident deprecation. "We really must do something about it, Judge. I'd be the last one in the world to bother Miss Emily, but we've got to do something." That night the Board of Aldermen met—three gray-beards and one younger man, a member of the rising generation.

"It's simple enough," he said. "Send her word to have her place cleaned up. Give her a certain time to do it in, and if she don't"

"Dammit, sir," Judge Stevens said, "will you accuse a lady to her face of smelling bad?"

So the next night, after midnight, four men crossed Miss Emily's lawn and slunk about the house like burglars, sniffing along the base of the brickwork and at the cellar openings while one of them performed a regular sowing motion with his hand out of a sack slung from his shoulder. They broke open the cellar door and sprinkled lime there, and in all the outbuildings. As they recrossed the lawn, a window that had been dark was lighted and Miss Emily sat in it, the light behind her, and her upright torso motionless as that of an idol. They crept quietly across the lawn and into the shadow of the locusts that lined the street. After a week or two the smell went away.

That was when people had begun to feel really sorry for her. People in our town, remembering how old lady Wyatt, her great-aunt, had gone completely crazy at last, believed that the Griersons held themselves a little too high for what they really were. None of the young men were quite good enough for Miss Emily and such. We had long thought of them as a tableau; Miss Emily a slender figure in white in the background, her father a spraddled silhouette in the foreground, his back to her and clutching a horsewhip, the two of them framed by the back-flung front door. So when she got to be thirty and was still single, we were not pleased exactly, but vindicated; even with insanity in the family she wouldn't have turned down all of her chances if they had really materialized.

When her father died, it got about that the house was all that was left to her; and in a way, people were glad. At last they could pity Miss Emily. Being left alone, and a pauper, she had become humanized. Now she too would know the old thrill and the old despair of a penny more or less.

The day after his death all the ladies prepared to call at the house and offer condolence and aid, as is our custom. Miss Emily met them at the door, dressed as usual and with no trace of grief on her face. She told them that her father was not dead. She did that for three days, with the ministers calling on her, and the doctors, trying to persuade her to let them dispose of the body. Just as they were about to resort to law and force, she broke down, and they buried her father quickly.

We did not say she was crazy then. We believed she had to do that. We remembered all the young men her father had driven away, and we knew that with nothing left, she would have to cling to that which had robbed her, as people will.

III

She was sick for a long time. When we saw her again, her hair was cut short, making her look like a girl, with a vague resemblance to those angels in colored church windows—sort of tragic and serene.

The town had just let the contracts for paving the sidewalks, and in the summer after her father's death they began to work. The construction company came with niggers and mules and machinery, and a foreman named Homer Barron, a Yankee—a big, dark, ready man, with a big voice and eyes lighter than his face. The little boys would follow in groups to hear him cuss the niggers, and the niggers singing in time to the rise and fall of picks. Pretty soon he knew everybody in town. Whenever you heard a lot of laughing anywhere about the square, Homer Barron would be in the center of the group. Presently we began to see him and Miss Emily on Sunday afternoons driving in the yellow-wheeled buggy and the matched team of bays from the livery stable.

At first we were glad that Miss Emily would have an interest, because the ladies all said, "Of course a Grierson would not think seriously of a Northerner, a day laborer." But there were still others, older people, who said that even grief could not cause a real lady to forget noblesse oblige—without calling it noblesse oblige. They just said, "Poor Emily. Her kinsfolk should come to her." She had some kin in Alabama; but years ago her father had fallen out with them over the estate of old lady Wyatt, the crazy woman, and there was no communication between the two families. They had not even been represented at the funeral.

And as soon as the old people said, "Poor Emily," the whispering began. "Do you suppose it's really so?" they said to one another. "Of course it is. What else could" This behind their hands; rustling of craned silk and satin behind jealousies closed upon the sun of Sunday afternoon as the thin, swift clop-clop-clop of the matched team passed: "Poor Emily."

She carried her head high enough—even when we believed that she was fallen. It was as if she demanded more than ever the recognition of her dignity as the last Grierson; as if it had wanted that touch of earthiness to reaffirm her imperviousness. Like when she bought the rat poison, the arsenic. That was over a year after they had begun to say "Poor Emily," and while the two female cousins were visiting her.

"I want some poison," she said to the druggist. She was over thirty then, still a slight woman, though thinner than usual, with cold, haughty black eyes in a face the flesh of which was strained across the temples and about the eyesockets as you imagine a lighthouse-keeper's face ought to look. "I want some poison," she said.

"Yes, Miss Emily. What kind? For rats and such? I'd recom—"

"I want the best you have. I don't care what kind."

The druggist named several. "They'll kill anything up to an elephant. But what you want is—"

"Arsenic," Miss Emily said. "Is that a good one?"

"Is arsenic? Yes ma'am. But what you want—"

"I want arsenic."

The druggist looked down at her. She looked back at him, erect, her face like a strained flag. "Why, of course," the druggist said. "If that's what you want. But the law requires you to tell what you are going to use it for."

Miss Emily just stared at him, her head tilted back in order to look him eye for eye, until he looked away and went and got the arsenic and wrapped it up. The Negro delivery boy brought her the package; the druggist didn't come back. When she opened the package at home there was written on the box, under the skull and bones: "For rats."

IV

So the next day we all said, "She will kill herself"; and we said it would be the best thing. When she had first begun to be seen with Homer Barron, we had said, "She will marry him." Then we said, "She will persuade him yet," because Homer himself had remarked—he liked men, and it was known that he drank with the younger men in the Elks' Club—that he was not a marrying man. Later we said, "Poor Emily," behind the jalousies as they passed on Sunday afternoon in the glittering buggy, Miss Emily with her head high and Homer Barron with his hat cocked and a cigar in his teeth, reins and whip in a yellow glove.

Then some of the ladies began to say that it was a disgrace to the town and a bad example to the young people. The men did not want to interfere, but at last the ladies forced the Baptist minister—Miss Emily's people were Episcopal—to call upon her. He would never divulge what happened during that interview, but he refused to go back again. The next Sunday they again drove about the streets, and the following day the minister's wife wrote to Miss Emily's relations in Alabama.

So she had blood-kin under her roof again and we sat back to watch developments. At first nothing happened. Then we were sure that they were to be married. We learned that Miss Emily had been to the jeweler's and ordered a man's toilet set in silver, with the letters H. B. on each piece. Two days later we learned that she had bought a complete outfit of men's clothing, including a nightshirt, and we said, "They are married." We were really glad. We were glad because the two female cousins were even more Grierson than Miss Emily had ever been.

So we were not surprised when Homer Barron—the streets had been finished some time since—was gone. We were a little disappointed that there was not a public blowing-off, but we believed that he had gone on to prepare for Miss Emily's coming, or to give her a chance to get rid of the cousins. (By that time it was a cabal, and we were all Miss Emily's allies to help circumvent the cousins.) Sure enough, after another week they departed. And, as we had expected all along, within three days Homer Barron was back in town. A neighbor saw the Negro man admit him at the kitchen door at dusk one evening.

And that was the last we saw of Homer Barron. And of Miss Emily for some time. The Negro man went in and out with the market basket, but the front door remained closed. Now and then we would see her at a window for a moment, as the men did that night when they sprinkled the lime, but for almost six months she did not appear on the streets. Then we knew that this was to be expected too; as if that quality of her father which had thwarted her woman's life so many times had been too virulent and too furious to die.

When we next saw Miss Emily, she had grown fat and her hair was turning gray. During the next few years it grew grayer and grayer until it attained an even pepper-and-salt iron-gray, when it ceased turning. Up to the day of her death at seventy-four it was still that vigorous iron-gray, like the hair of an active man.

From that time on her front door remained closed, save for a period of six or seven years, when she was about forty, during which she gave lessons in china-painting. She fitted up a studio in one of the downstairs rooms, where the daughters and granddaughters of Colonel Sartoris' contemporaries were sent to her with the same regularity and in the same spirit that they were sent on Sundays with a twenty-five-cent piece for the collection plate. Meanwhile her taxes had been remitted.

Then the newer generation became the backbone and the spirit of the town, and the painting pupils grew up and fell away and did not send their children to her with boxes of color and tedious brushes and pictures cut from the ladies' magazines. The front door closed upon the last one and remained closed for good. When the town got free postal delivery Miss Emily alone refused to let them fasten the metal numbers above her door and attach a mailbox to it. She would not listen to them.

Daily, monthly, yearly we watched the Negro grow grayer and more stooped, going in and out with the market basket. Each December we sent her a tax notice, which would be returned by the post office a week later, unclaimed. Now and then we would see her in one of the downstairs windows—she had evidently shut up the top floor of the house—like the carved torso of an idol in a niche, looking or not looking at us, we could never tell which. Thus she passed from generation to generation—dear, inescapable, impervious, tranquil, and perverse.

And so she died. Fell ill in the house filled with dust and shadows, with only a doddering Negro man to wait on her. We did not even know she was sick; we had long since given up trying to get any information from the Negro. He talked to no one, probably not even to her, for his voice had grown harsh and rusty, as if from disuse.

She died in one of the downstairs rooms, in a heavy walnut bed with a curtain, her gray head propped on a pillow yellow and moldy with age and lack of sunlight.

V

The Negro met the first of the ladies at the front door and let them in, with their hushed, sibilant voices and their quick, curious glances, and then he disappeared. He walked right through the house and out the back and was not seen again.

The two female cousins came at once. They held the funeral on the second day, with the town coming to look at Miss Emily beneath a mass of bought flowers, with the crayon face of her father musing profoundly above the bier and the ladies sibilant and macabre; and the very old men—some in their brushed Confederate uniforms—on the porch and the lawn, talking of Miss Emily as if she had been a contemporary of theirs, believing that they had danced with her and courted her perhaps, confusing time with its mathematical progression, as the old do, to whom all the past is not a diminishing road, but, instead, a huge meadow which no winter ever quite touches, divided from them now by the narrow bottle-neck of the most recent decade of years.

Already we knew that there was one room in that region above stairs which no one had seen in forty years, and which would have to be forced. They waited until Miss Emily was decently in the ground before they opened it.

The violence of breaking down the door seemed to fill this room with pervading dust. A thin, acrid pall as of the tomb seemed to lie everywhere upon this room decked and furnished as for a bridal: upon the valance curtains of faded rose color, upon the rose-shaded lights, upon the dressing table, upon the delicate array of crystal and the man's toilet things backed with tarnished silver, silver so tarnished that the monogram was obscured. Among them lay a collar and tie, as if they had just been removed, which, lifted, left upon the surface a pale crescent in the dust. Upon a chair hung the suit, carefully folded; beneath it the two mute shoes and the discarded socks.

The man himself lay in the bed.

For a long while we just stood there, looking down at the profound and fleshless grin. The body had apparently once lain in the attitude of an embrace, but now the long sleep that outlasts love, that conquers even the grimace of love, had cuckolded him. What was left of him, rotted beneath what was left of the nightshirt, had become inextricable from the bed in which he lay; and upon him and upon the pillow beside him lay that even coating of the patient and biding dust.

Then we noticed that in the second pillow was the indentation of a head. One of us lifted something from it, and leaning forward, that faint and invisible dust dry and acrid in the nostrils, we saw a long strand of iron-gray hair.

1931

Barn Burning

The store in which the Justice of the Peace's court was sitting smelled of cheese. The boy, crouched on his nail keg at the back of the crowded room, knew he smelled cheese, and more: from where he sat he could see the ranked shelves close-packed with the solid, squat, dynamic shapes of tin cans whose labels his stomach read, not from the lettering which meant nothing to his mind but from the scarlet devils and the silver curve of fish—this, the cheese which he knew he smelled and the hermetic meat which his intestines believed he smelled coming in intermittent gusts momentary and brief between the other constant one, the smell and sense just a little of fear because mostly of despair and grief, the old fierce pull of blood. He could not see the table where the Justice sat and before which his father and his father's enemy (our enemy he thought in that despair; ourn! mine and hisn both! He's my father!) stood, but he could hear them, the two of them that is, because his father had said no word yet:

"But what proof have you, Mr. Harris?"

"I told you. The hog got into my corn. I caught it up and sent it back to him. He had no fence that would hold it. I told him so, warned him. The next time I put the hog in my pen. When he came to get it I gave him enough wire to patch up his pen. The next time I put the hog up and kept it. I rode down to his house and saw the wire I gave him still rolled on to the spool in his yard. I told him he could have the hog when he paid me a dollar pound fee. That evening a nigger came with the dollar and got the hog. He was a strange nigger. He said, 'He say to tell you wood and hay kin burn.' I said, 'What?' 'That whut he say to tell you,' the nigger said. 'Wood and hay kin burn.' That night my barn burned. I got the stock out but I lost the barn."

"Where is the nigger? Have you got him?"

"He was a strange nigger, I tell you. I don't know what became of him."

"But that's not proof. Don't you see that's not proof?"

"Get that boy up here. He knows." For a moment the boy thought too that the man meant his older brother until Harris said, "Not him. The little one.

The boy," and, crouching, small for his age, small and wiry like his father, in patched and faded jeans even too small for him, with straight, uncombed, brown hair and eyes gray and wild as storm scud, he saw the men between himself and the table part and become a lane of grim faces, at the end of which he saw the Justice, a shabby, collarless, graying man in spectacles, beckoning him. He felt no floor under his bare feet; he seemed to walk beneath the palpable weight of the grim turning faces. His father, stiff in his black Sunday coat donned not for the trial but for the moving, did not even look at him. He aims for me to lie, he thought, again with that frantic grief and despair. And I will have to do hit.

"What's your name, boy?" the Justice said.

"Colonel Sartoris Snopes,"¹ the boy whispered.

"Hey?" the Justice said. "Talk louder. Colonel Sartoris? I reckon anybody named for Colonel Sartoris in this country can't help but tell the truth, can they?" The boy said nothing. Enemy! Enemy! he thought; for a moment he could not even see, could not see that the Justice's face was kindly nor discern that his voice was troubled when he spoke to the man named Harris: "Do you want me to question this boy?" But he could hear, and during those subsequent long seconds while there was absolutely no sound in the crowded little room save that of quiet and intent breathing it was as if he had swung outward at the end of a grape vine, over a ravine, and at the top of the swing had been caught in a prolonged instant of mesmerized gravity, weightless in time.

"No!" Harris said violently, explosively. "Damnation! Send him out of here!" Now time, the fluid world, rushed beneath him again, the voices coming to him again through the smell of cheese and sealed meat, the fear and despair and the old grief of blood:

"This case is closed. I can't find against you, Snopes, but I can give you advice. Leave this country and don't come back to it."

His father spoke for the first time, his voice cold and harsh, level, without emphasis: "I aim to. I don't figure to stay in a country among people who . . ." he said something unprintable and vile, addressed to no one.

"That'll do," the Justice said. "Take your wagon and get out of this country before dark. Case dismissed."

His father turned, and he followed the stiff black coat, the wiry figure walking a little stiffly from where a Confederate provost's man's musket ball had taken him in the heel on a stolen horse thirty years ago, followed the two backs now, since his older brother had appeared from somewhere in the crowd, no taller than the father but thicker, chewing tobacco steadily, between the two lines of grim-faced men and out of the store and across the worn gallery and down the sagging steps and among the dogs and half-grown boys in the mild May dust, where as he passed a voice hissed:

"Barn burner!"

Again he could not see, whirling; there was a face in a red haze, moonlike, bigger than the full moon, the owner of it half again his size, he leaping in

1. The boy is named for Colonel Sartoris, a leading citizen of Jefferson (the fictional town that Faulkner based on his hometown of Oxford, Mississippi) and an officer in the Confederate Army.

The Snopeses are a poor white family from the same area. Both families appear in other works by Faulkner.

the red haze toward the face, feeling no blow, feeling no shock when his head struck the earth, scrabbling up and leaping again, feeling no blow this time either and tasting no blood, scrabbling up to see the other boy in full flight and himself already leaping into pursuit as his father's hand jerked him back, the harsh, cold voice speaking above him: "Go get in the wagon."

It stood in a grove of locusts and mulberries across the road. His two hulking sisters in their Sunday dresses and his mother and her sister in calico and sunbonnets were already in it, sitting on and among the sorry residue of the dozen and more movings which even the boy could remember—the battered stove, the broken beds and chairs, the clock inlaid with mother-of-pearl, which would not run, stopped at some fourteen minutes past two o'clock of a dead and forgotten day and time, which had been his mother's dowry. She was crying, though when she saw him she drew her sleeve across her face and began to descend from the wagon. "Get back," the father said.

"He's hurt. I got to get some water and wash his . . ."

"Get back in the wagon," his father said. He got in too, over the tail-gate. His father mounted to the seat where the older brother already sat and struck the gaunt mules two savage blows with the peeled willow, but without heat. It was not even sadistic; it was exactly that same quality which in later years would cause his descendants to over-run the engine before putting a motor car into motion, striking and reining back in the same movement. The wagon went on, the store with its quiet crowd of grimly watching men dropped behind; a curve in the road hid it. Forever he thought. Maybe he's done satisfied now, now that he has . . . stopping himself, not to say it aloud even to himself. His mother's hand touched his shoulder.

"Does hit hurt?" she said.

"Naw," he said. "Hit don't hurt. Lemme be."

"Can't you wipe some of the blood off before hit dries?"

"I'll wash to-night," he said. "Lemme be, I tell you."

The wagon went on. He did not know where they were going. None of them ever did or ever asked, because it was always somewhere, always a house of sorts waiting for them a day or two days or even three days away. Likely his father had already arranged to make a crop on another farm before he . . . Again he had to stop himself. He (the father) always did. There was something about his wolflike independence and even courage when the advantage was at least neutral which impressed strangers, as if they got from his latent ravening ferocity not so much a sense of dependability as a feeling that his ferocious conviction in the rightness of his own actions would be of advantage to all whose interest lay with his.

That night they camped, in a grove of oaks and beeches where a spring ran. The nights were still cool and they had a fire against it, of a rail lifted from a nearby fence and cut into lengths—a small fire, neat, niggard almost, a shrewd fire; such fires were his father's habit and custom always, even in freezing weather. Older, the boy might have remarked this and wondered why not a big one; why should not a man who had not only seen the waste and extravagance of war, but who had in his blood an inherent voracious prodigality with material not his own, have burned everything in sight? Then he might have gone a step farther and thought that that was the reason: that niggard blaze was the living fruit of nights passed during those four years in the woods hiding from all men, blue or gray, with his strings of horses (captured horses, he called them). And older still, he might have divined the true reason: that the element of fire spoke to some deep mainspring of his father's being, as the element of steel or of powder spoke to other men, as the one weapon for the preservation of integrity, else breath were not worth the breathing, and hence to be regarded with respect and used with discretion.

But he did not think this now and he had seen those same niggard blazes all his life. He merely ate his supper beside it and was already half asleep over his iron plate when his father called him, and once more he followed the stiff back, the stiff and ruthless limp, up the slope and on to the starlit road where, turning, he could see his father against the stars but without face or depth—a shape black, flat, and bloodless as though cut from tin in the iron folds of the frockcoat which had not been made for him, the voice harsh like tin and without heat like tin:

"You were fixing to tell them. You would have told him." He didn't answer. His father struck him with the flat of his hand on the side of the head, hard but without heat, exactly as he had struck the two mules at the store, exactly as he would strike either of them with any stick in order to kill a horse fly, his voice still without heat or anger: "You're getting to be a man. You got to learn. You got to learn to stick to your own blood or you ain't going to have any blood to stick to you. Do you think either of them, any man there this morning, would? Don't you know all they wanted was a chance to get at me because they knew I had them beat? Eh?" Later, twenty years later, he was to tell himself, "If I had said they wanted only truth, justice, he would have hit me again." But now he said nothing. He was not crying. He just stood there. "Answer me," his father said.

"Yes," he whispered. His father turned.

"Get on to bed. We'll be there to-morrow."

To-morrow they were there. In the early afternoon the wagon stopped before a paintless two-room house identical almost with the dozen others it had stopped before even in the boy's ten years, and again, as on the other dozen occasions, his mother and aunt got down and began to unload the wagon, although his two sisters and his father and brother had not moved.

"Likely hit ain't fitten for hawgs," one of the sisters said.

"Nevertheless, fit it will and you'll hog it and like it," his father said. "Get out of them chairs and help your Ma unload."

The two sisters got down, big, bovine, in a flutter of cheap ribbons; one of them drew from the jumbled wagon bed a battered lantern, the other a worn broom. His father handed the reins to the older son and began to climb stiffly over the wheel. "When they get unloaded, take the team to the barn and feed them." Then he said, and at first the boy thought he was still speaking to his brother: "Come with me."

"Me?" he said.

"Yes," his father said. "You."

"Abner," his mother said. His father paused and looked back—the harsh level stare beneath the shaggy, graying, irascible brows.

"I reckon I'll have a word with the man that aims to begin to-morrow owning me body and soul for the next eight months."

They went back up the road. A week ago—or before last night, that is—he would have asked where they were going, but not now. His father had struck him before last night but never before had he paused afterward to explain why; it was as if the blow and the following calm, outrageous voice still rang, reperculated, divulging nothing to him save the terrible handicap of being young, the light weight of his few years, just heavy enough to prevent his soaring free of the world as it seemed to be ordered but not heavy enough to keep him footed solid in it, to resist it and try to change the course of its events.

Presently he could see the grove of oaks and cedars and the other flowering trees and shrubs where the house would be, though not the house yet. They walked beside a fence massed with honeysuckle and Cherokee roses and came to a gate swinging open between two brick pillars, and now, beyond a sweep of drive, he saw the house for the first time and at that instant he forgot his father and the terror and despair both, and even when he remembered his father again (who had not stopped) the terror and despair did not return. Because, for all the twelve movings, they had sojourned until now in a poor country, a land of small farms and fields and houses, and he had never seen a house like this before. Hit's big as a courthouse he thought quietly, with a surge of peace and joy whose reason he could not have thought into words, being too young for that: They are safe from him. People whose lives are a part of this peace and dignity are beyond his touch, he no more to them than a buzzing wasp: capable of stinging for a little moment but that's all; the spell of this peace and dignity rendering even the barns and stable and cribs which belong to it impervious to the puny flames he might contrive . . . this, the peace and joy, ebbing for an instant as he looked again at the stiff black back, the stiff and implacable limp of the figure which was not dwarfed by the house, for the reason that it had never looked big anywhere and which now, against the serene columned backdrop, had more than ever that impervious quality of something cut ruthlessly from tin, depthless, as though, sidewise to the sun, it would cast no shadow. Watching him, the boy remarked the absolutely undeviating course which his father held and saw the stiff foot come squarely down in a pile of fresh droppings where a horse had stood in the drive and which his father could have avoided by a simple change of stride. But it ebbed only for a moment, though he could not have thought this into words either, walking on in the spell of the house, which he could even want but without envy, without sorrow, certainly never with that ravening and jealous rage which unknown to him walked in the ironlike black coat before him: Maybe he will feel it too. Maybe it will even change him now from what maybe he couldn't help but be.

They crossed the portico. Now he could hear his father's stiff foot as it came down on the boards with clocklike finality, a sound out of all proportion to the displacement of the body it bore and which was not dwarfed either by the white door before it, as though it had attained to a sort of vicious and ravening minimum not to be dwarfed by anything—the flat, wide, black hat, the formal coat of broadcloth which had once been black but which had now that friction-gazed greenish cast of the bodies of old house flies, the lifted sleeve which was too large, the lifted hand like a curled claw. The door opened so promptly that the boy knew the Negro must have been watching them all the time, an old man with neat grizzled hair, in a linen jacket, who stood barring the door with his body, saying, “Wipe yo foots, white man, fo you come in here. Major ain't home nohow.”

“Get out of my way, nigger,” his father said, without heat too, flinging the door back and the Negro also and entering, his hat still on his head. And now the boy saw the prints of the stiff foot on the doorjamb and saw them appear on the pale rug behind the machinelike deliberation of the foot which seemed to bear (or transmit) twice the weight which the body compassed. The Negro was shouting “Miss Lula! Miss Lula!” somewhere behind them, then the boy, deluged as though by a warm wave by a suave turn of carpeted stair and a pendant glitter of chandeliers and a mute gleam of gold frames, heard the swift feet and saw her too, a lady—perhaps he had never seen her like before either—in a gray, smooth gown with lace at the throat and an apron tied at the waist and the sleeves turned back, wiping cake or biscuit dough from her hands with a towel as she came up the hall, looking not at his father at all but at the tracks on the blond rug with an expression of incredulous amazement.

“I tried,” the Negro cried. “I tole him to . . .”

“Will you please go away?” she said in a shaking voice. “Major de Spain is not at home. Will you please go away?”

His father had not spoken again. He did not speak again. He did not even look at her. He just stood stiff in the center of the rug, in his hat, the shaggy iron-gray brows twitching slightly above the pebble-colored eyes as he appeared to examine the house with brief deliberation. Then with the same deliberation he turned; the boy watched him pivot on the good leg and saw the stiff foot drag round the arc of the turning, leaving a final long and fading smear. His father never looked at it, he never once looked down at the rug. The Negro held the door. It closed behind them, upon the hysteric and indistinguishable woman-wail. His father stopped at the top of the steps and scraped his boot clean on the edge of it. At the gate he stopped again. He stood for a moment, planted stiffly on the stiff foot, looking back at the house. “Pretty and white, ain’t it?” he said. “That’s sweat. Nigger sweat. Maybe it ain’t white enough yet to suit him. Maybe he wants to mix some white sweat with it.”

Two hours later the boy was chopping wood behind the house within which his mother and aunt and the two sisters (the mother and aunt, not the two girls, he knew that; even at this distance and muffled by walls the flat loud voices of the two girls emanated an incorrigible idle inertia) were setting up the stove to prepare a meal, when he heard the hooves and saw the linen-clad man on a fine sorrel mare, whom he recognized even before he saw the rolled rug in front of the Negro youth following on a fat bay carriage horse—a suffused, angry face vanishing, still at full gallop, beyond the corner of the house where his father and brother were sitting in the two tilted chairs; and a moment later, almost before he could have put the axe down, he heard the hooves again and watched the sorrel mare go back out of the yard, already galloping again. Then his father began to shout one of the sisters’ names, who presently emerged backward from the kitchen door dragging the rolled rug along the ground by one end while the other sister walked behind it.

“If you ain’t going to tote, go on and set up the wash pot,” the first said.

“You, Sarty!” the second shouted. “Set up the wash pot!” His father appeared at the door, framed against that shabbiness, as he had been against that other bland perfection, impervious to either, the mother’s anxious face at his shoulder.

“Go on,” the father said. “Pick it up.” The two sisters stooped, broad, lethargic; stooping, they presented an incredible expanse of pale cloth and a flutter of tawdry ribbons.

“If I thought enough of a rug to have to git hit all the way from France I wouldn’t keep hit where folks coming in would have to tromp on hit,” the first said. They raised the rug.

“Abner,” the mother said. “Let me do it.”

“You go back and git dinner,” his father said. “I’ll tend to this.”

From the woodpile through the rest of the afternoon the boy watched them, the rug spread flat in the dust beside the bubbling wash-pot, the two sisters stooping over it with that profound and lethargic reluctance, while the father stood over them in turn, implacable and grim, driving them though never raising his voice again. He could smell the harsh homemade lye they were using; he saw his mother come to the door once and look toward them with an expression not anxious now but very like despair; he saw his father turn, and he fell to with the axe and saw from the corner of his eye his father raise from the ground a flattish fragment of field stone and examine it and return to the pot, and this time his mother actually spoke: “Abner. Abner. Please don’t. Please, Abner.”

Then he was done too. It was dusk; the whippoorwills had already begun. He could smell coffee from the room where they would presently eat the cold food remaining from the mid-afternoon meal, though when he entered the house he realized they were having coffee again probably because there was a fire on the hearth, before which the rug now lay spread over the backs of the two chairs. The tracks of his father’s foot were gone. Where they had been were now long, water-cloudy scoriations resembling the sporadic course of a lilliputian mowing machine.

It still hung there while they ate the cold food and then went to bed, scattered without order or claim up and down the two rooms, his mother in one bed, where his father would later lie, the older brother in the other, himself, the aunt, and the two sisters on pallets on the floor. But his father was not in bed yet. The last thing the boy remembered was the depthless, harsh silhouette of the hat and coat bending over the rug and it seemed to him that he had not even closed his eyes when the silhouette was standing over him, the fire almost dead behind it, the stiff foot prodding him awake. “Catch up the mule,” his father said.

When he returned with the mule his father was standing in the black door, the rolled rug over his shoulder. “Ain’t you going to ride?” he said.

“No. Give me your foot.”

He bent his knee into his father’s hand, the wiry, surprising power flowed smoothly, rising, he rising with it, on to the mule’s bare back (they had owned a saddle once; the boy could remember it though not when or where) and with the same effortlessness his father swung the rug up in front of him. Now in the starlight they retraced the afternoon’s path, up the dusty road rife with honeysuckle, through the gate and up the black tunnel of the drive to the lightless house, where he sat on the mule and felt the rough warp of the rug drag across his thighs and vanish.

“Don’t you want me to help?” he whispered. His father did not answer and now he heard again that stiff foot striking the hollow portico with that wooden and clocklike deliberation, that outrageous overstatement of the weight it carried. The rug, hunched, not flung (the boy could tell that even in the darkness) from his father's shoulder, struck the angle of wall and floor with a sound unbelievably loud, thunderous, then the foot again, unhurried and enormous; a light came on in the house and the boy sat, tense, breathing steadily and quietly and just a little fast, though the foot itself did not increase its beat at all, descending the steps now; now the boy could see him.

"Don't you want to ride now?" he whispered. "We kin both ride now," the light within the house altering now, flaring up and sinking. He's coming down the stairs now, he thought. He had already ridden the mule up beside the horse block; presently his father was up behind him and he doubled the reins over and slashed the mule across the neck, but before the animal could begin to trot the hard, thin arm came round him, the hard, knotted hand jerking the mule back to a walk.

In the first red rays of the sun they were in the lot, putting plow gear on the mules. This time the sorrel mare was in the lot before he heard it at all, the rider collarless and even bareheaded, trembling, speaking in a shaking voice as the woman in the house had done, his father merely looking up once before stooping again to the hame he was buckling, so that the man on the mare spoke to his stooping back:

"You must realize you have ruined that rug. Wasn't there anybody here, any of your women . . ." he ceased, shaking, the boy watching him, the older brother leaning now in the stable door, chewing, blinking slowly and steadily at nothing apparently. "It cost a hundred dollars. But you never had a hundred dollars. You never will. So I'm going to charge you twenty bushels of corn against your crop. I'll add it in your contract and when you come to the commissary you can sign it. That won't keep Mrs. de Spain quiet but maybe it will teach you to wipe your feet off before you enter her house again."

Then he was gone. The boy looked at his father, who still had not spoken or even looked up again, who was now adjusting the logger-head in the hame.

"Pap," he said. His father looked at him—the inscrutable face, the shaggy brows beneath which the gray eyes glinted coldly. Suddenly the boy went toward him, fast, stopping as suddenly. "You done the best you could!" he cried. "If he wanted hit done different why didn't he wait and tell you how? He won't git no twenty bushels! He won't git none! We'll gether hit and hide hit! I kin watch . . ."

"Did you put the cutter back in that straight stock like I told you?"

"No, sir," he said.

"Then go do it."

That was Wednesday. During the rest of that week he worked steadily, at what was within his scope and some which was beyond it, with an industry that did not need to be driven nor even commanded twice; he had this from his mother, with the difference that some at least of what he did he liked to do, such as splitting wood with the half-size axe which his mother and aunt had earned, or saved money somehow, to present him with at Christmas. In company with the two older women (and on one afternoon, even one of the sisters), he built pens for the shoat and the cow which were a part of his father's contract with the landlord, and one afternoon, his father being absent, gone somewhere on one of the mules, he went to the field.

They were running a middle buster now, his brother holding the plow straight while he handled the reins, and walking beside the straining mule, the rich black soil shearing cool and damp against his bare ankles, he thought Maybe this is the end of it. Maybe even that twenty bushels that seems hard to have to pay for just a rug will be a cheap price for him to stop forever and always from being what he used to be; thinking, dreaming now, so that his brother had to speak sharply to him to mind the mule: Maybe he even won't collect the twenty bushels. Maybe it will all add up and balance and vanish—corn, rug, fire; the terror and grief, the being pulled two ways like between two teams of horses—gone, done with for ever and ever.

Then it was Saturday; he looked up from beneath the mule he was harnessing and saw his father in the black coat and hat. "Not that," his father said. "The wagon gear." And then, two hours later, sitting in the wagon bed behind his father and brother on the seat, the wagon accomplished a final curve, and he saw the weathered paintless store with its tattered tobacco- and patent-medicine posters and the tethered wagons and saddle animals below the gallery. He mounted the gnawed steps behind his father and brother, and there again was the lane of quiet, watching faces for the three of them to walk through. He saw the man in spectacles sitting at the plank table and he did not need to be told this was a Justice of the Peace; he sent one glare of fierce, exultant, partisan defiance at the man in collar and cravat now, whom he had seen but twice before in his life, and that on a galloping horse, who now wore on his face an expression not of rage but of amazed unbelief which the boy could not have known was at the incredible circumstance of being sued by one of his own tenants, and came and stood against his father and cried at the Justice: "He ain't done it! He ain't burnt . . ."

"Go back to the wagon," his father said.

"Burnt?" the Justice said. "Do I understand this rug was burned too?"

"Does anybody here claim it was?" his father said. "Go back to the wagon." But he did not, he merely retreated to the rear of the room, crowded as that other had been, but not to sit down this time, instead, to stand pressing among the motionless bodies, listening to the voices:

"And you claim twenty bushels of corn is too high for the damage you did to the rug?"

"He brought the rug to me and said he wanted the tracks washed out of it. I washed the tracks out and took the rug back to him."

"But you didn't carry the rug back to him in the same condition it was in before you made the tracks on it."

His father did not answer, and now for perhaps half a minute there was no sound at all save that of breathing, the faint, steady suspiration of complete and intent listening.

"You decline to answer that, Mr. Snopes?" Again his father did not answer. "I'm going to find against you, Mr. Snopes. I'm going to find that you were responsible for the injury to Major de Spain's rug and hold you liable for it. But twenty bushels of corn seems a little high for a man in your circumstances to have to pay. Major de Spain claims it cost a hundred dollars. October corn will be worth about fifty cents. I figure that if Major de Spain can stand a ninety-five-dollar loss on something he paid cash for, you can stand a five-dollar loss you haven't earned yet. I hold you in damages to Major de Spain to the amount of ten bushels of corn over and above your contract with him, to be paid to him out of your crop at gathering time. Court adjourned."

It had taken no time hardly, the morning was but half begun. He thought they would return home and perhaps back to the field, since they were late, far behind all other farmers. But instead his father passed on behind the wagon, merely indicating with his hand for the older brother to follow with it, and crossed the road toward the blacksmith shop opposite, pressing on after his father, overtaking him, speaking, whispering up at the harsh, calm face beneath the weathered hat: "He won't git no ten bushels neither. He won't git one. We'll . . ." until his father glanced for an instant down at him, the face absolutely calm, the grizzled eyebrows tangled above the cold eyes, the voice almost pleasant, almost gentle:

"You think so? Well, we'll wait till October anyway."

The matter of the wagon—the setting of a spoke or two and the tightening of the tires—did not take long either, the business of the tires accomplished by driving the wagon into the spring branch behind the shop and letting it stand there, the mules nuzzling into the water from time to time, and the boy on the seat with the idle reins, looking up the slope and through the sooty tunnel of the shed where the slow hammer rang and where his father sat on an upended cypress bolt, easily, either talking or listening, still sitting there when the boy brought the dripping wagon up out of the branch and halted it before the door.

"Take them on to the shade and hitch," his father said. He did so and returned. His father and the smith and a third man squatting on his heels inside the door were talking, about crops and animals; the boy, squatting too in the ammoniac dust and hoof-parings and scales of rust, heard his father tell a long and unhurried story out of the time before the birth of the older brother even when he had been a professional horsetrader. And then his father came up beside him where he stood before a tattered last year's circus poster on the other side of the store, gazing rapt and quiet at the scarlet horses, the incredible poisonings and convolutions of tulle and tights and the painted leers of comedians, and said "It's time to eat."

But not at home. Squatting beside his brother against the front wall, he watched his father emerge from the store and produce from a paper sack a segment of cheese and divide it carefully and deliberately into three with his pocket knife and produce crackers from the same sack. They all three squatted on the gallery and ate, slowly, without talking; then in the store again, they drank from a tin dipper tepid water smelling of the cedar bucket and of living beech trees. And still they did not go home. It was a horse lot this time, a tall rail fence upon and along which men stood and sat and out of which one by one horses were led, to be walked and trotted and then cantered back and forth along the road while the slow swapping and buying went on and the sun began to slant westward, they—the three of them—watching and listening, the older brother with his muddy eyes and his steady, inevitable tobacco, the father commenting now and then on certain of the animals, to no one in particular.

It was after sundown when they reached home. They ate supper by lamplight, then, sitting on the doorstep, the boy watched the night fully accomplish, listening to the whippoorwills and the frogs, when he heard his mother's voice: "Abner! No! No! Oh, God. Oh, God. Abner!" and he rose, whirled, and saw the altered light through the door where a candle stub now burned in a bottle neck on the table and his father, still in the hat and coat, at once formal and burlesque as though dressed carefully for some shabby and ceremonial violence, emptying the reservoir of the lamp back into the five-gallon kerosene can from which it had been filled, while the mother tugged at his arm until he shifted the lamp to the other hand and flung her back, not savagely or viciously, just hard, into the wall, her hands flung out against the wall for balance, her mouth open and in her face the same quality of hopeless despair as had been in her voice. Then his father saw him standing in the door.

"Go to the barn and get that can of oil we were oiling the wagon with," he said. The boy did not move. Then he could speak.

"What . . ." he cried. "What are you . . ."

"Go get that oil," his father said. "Go."

Then he was moving, running, outside the house, toward the stable: this is the old habit, the old blood which he had not been permitted to choose for himself, which had been bequeathed him willy nilly and which had run for so long (and who knew where, battenning on what of outrage and savagery and lust) before it came to him. I could keep on, he thought. I could run on and on and never look back, never need to see his face again. Only I can't. I can't, the rusted can in his hand now, the liquid splashing in it as he ran back to the house and into it, into the sound of his mother's weeping in the next room, and handed the can to his father.

"Ain't you going to even send a nigger?" he cried. "At least you sent a nigger before!"

This time his father didn't strike him. The hand came even faster than the blow had, the same hand which had set the can on the table with almost excruciating care flashing from the can toward him too quick for him to follow it, gripping him by the back of his shirt and on to tiptoe before he had seen it quit the can, the face stooping at him in breathless and frozen ferocity, the cold, dead voice speaking over him to the older brother who leaned against the table, chewing with that steady, curious, sidewise motion of cows:

"Empty the can into the big one and go on. I'll catch up with you."

"Better tie him up to the bedpost," the brother said.

"Do like I told you," the father said. Then the boy was moving, his bunched shirt and the hard, bony hand between his shoulder-blades, his toes just touching the floor, across the room and into the other one, past the sisters sitting with spread heavy thighs in the two chairs over the cold hearth, and to where his mother and aunt sat side by side on the bed, the aunt's arms about his mother's shoulders.

"Hold him," the father said. The aunt made a startled movement. "Not you," the father said. "Lennie. Take hold of him. I want to see you do it." His mother took him by the wrist. "You'll hold him better than that. If he gets loose don't you know what he is going to do? He will go up yonder." He jerked his head toward the road. "Maybe I'd better tie him."

"I'll hold him," his mother whispered.

"See you do then." Then his father was gone, the stiff foot heavy and measured upon the boards, ceasing at last.

Then he began to struggle. His mother caught him in both arms, he jerking and wrenching at them. He would be stronger in the end, he knew that.

But he had no time to wait for it. "Lemme go!" he cried. "I don't want to have to hit you!"

"Let him go!" the aunt said. "If he don't go, before God, I am going there myself!"

"Don't you see I can't!" his mother cried. "Sarty! Sarty! No! No! Help me, Lizzie!"

Then he was free. His aunt grasped at him but it was too late. He whirled, running, his mother stumbled forward on to her knees behind him, crying to the nearer sister: "Catch him, Net! Catch him!" But that was too late too, the sister (the sisters were twins, born at the same time, yet either of them now gave the impression of being, encompassing as much living meat and volume and weight as any other two of the family) not yet having begun to rise from the chair, her head, face, alone merely turned, presenting to him in the flying instant an astonishing expanse of young female features untroubled by any surprise even, wearing only an expression of bovine interest. Then he was out of the room, out of the house, in the mild dust of the starlit road and the heavy rifeness of honeysuckle, the pale ribbon unspooling with terrific slowness under his running feet, reaching the gate at last and turning in, running, his heart and lungs drumming, on up the drive toward the lighted house, the lighted door. He did not knock, he burst in, sobbing for breath, incapable for the moment of speech; he saw the astonished face of the Negro in the linen jacket without knowing when the Negro had appeared.

"De Spain!" he cried, panted. "Where's . . ." then he saw the white man too emerging from a white door down the hall. "Barn!" he cried. "Barn!"

"What?" the white man said. "Barn?"

"Yes!" the boy cried. "Barn!"

"Catch him!" the white man shouted.

But it was too late this time too. The Negro grasped his shirt, but the entire sleeve, rotten with washing, carried away, and he was out that door too and in the drive again, and had actually never ceased to run even while he was screaming into the white man's face.

Behind him the white man was shouting, "My horse! Fetch my horse!" and he thought for an instant of cutting across the park and climbing the fence into the road, but he did not know the park nor how high the vine-massed fence might be and he dared not risk it. So he ran on down the drive, blood and breath roaring; presently he was in the road again though he could not see it. He could not hear either: the galloping mare was almost upon him before he heard her, and even then he held his course, as if the very urgency of his wild grief and need must in a moment more find him wings, waiting until the ultimate instant to hurl himself aside and into the weed-choked roadside ditch as the horse thundered past and on, for an instant in furious silhouette against the stars, the tranquil early summer night sky which, even before the shape of the horse and rider vanished, stained abruptly and violently upward: a long, swirling roar incredible and soundless, blotting the stars, and he springing up and into the road again, running again, knowing it was too late yet still running even after he heard the shot and, an instant later, two shots, pausing now without knowing he had ceased to run, crying "Pap! Pap!", running again before he knew he had begun to run, stumbling, tripping over something and scrabbling up again without ceasing to run, looking backward over his shoulder at the glare as he got up, running on among the invisible trees, panting, sobbing, "Father! Father!"

At midnight he was sitting on the crest of a hill. He did not know it was midnight and he did not know how far he had come. But there was no glare behind him now and he sat now, his back toward what he had called home for four days anyhow, his face toward the dark woods which he would enter when breath was strong again, small, shaking steadily in the chill darkness, hugging himself into the remainder of his thin, rotten shirt, the grief and despair now no longer terror and fear but just grief and despair. Father. My father, he thought. "He was brave!" he cried suddenly, aloud but not loud, no more than a whisper: "He was! He was in the war! He was in Colonel Sartoris' cav'ry!" not knowing that his father had gone to that war a private in the fine old European sense, wearing no uniform, admitting the authority of and giving fidelity to no man or army or flag, going to war as Malbrouck² himself did: for booty—it meant nothing and less than nothing to him if it were enemy booty or his own.

The slow constellations wheeled on. It would be dawn and then sun-up after a while and he would be hungry. But that would be to-morrow and now he was only cold, and walking would cure that. His breathing was easier now and he decided to get up and go on, and then he found that he had been asleep because he knew it was almost dawn, the night almost over. He could tell that from the whippoorwills. They were everywhere now among the dark trees below him, constant and inflectioned and ceaseless, so that, as the instant for giving over to the day birds drew nearer and nearer, there was no interval at all between them. He got up. He was a little stiff, but walking would cure that too as it would the cold, and soon there would be the sun. He went on down the hill, toward the dark woods within which the liquid silver voices of the birds called unceasing—the rapid and urgent beating of the urgent and quiring heart of the late spring night. He did not look back.

1938

2. Figure in an 18th-century French ballad, "Malbrouck Has Gone to the War," popularly identified with John Churchill, First Duke of Marlborough (1650–1722), who rose through the ranks from private to become a famous commander. Despite his military genius, he was often accused of greed and disloyalty.

HART CRANE

1899–1932

Before his suicide at the age of thirty-two, Hart Crane led a life of extremes: he wrote poetry of frequently ecstatic intensity, drank uncontrollably, had bitterly ambivalent relations with his quarreling parents; he relished the comparative erotic freedom of post–World War I Greenwich Village while enduring his literary friends' disapproval of his homosexuality. Born and raised in Ohio, Crane went to New York City in 1917, ostensibly to prepare for college but in fact to investigate the possibility of a literary career. Returning to Cleveland for four years (1919–23), he tried unsuccessfully to enter business as a means of financing an after-hours literary life. During these years he read widely and developed a large circle of intellectual friends and correspondents. He also published some of the poems that made his early reputation: “My Grandmother’s Love Letters” in 1920, “Chaplinesque” in 1921, and “For the Marriage of Faustus and Helen” in 1922. He also began work on the love sequence Voyages. By 1923, believing himself ready to succeed as a writer, he moved back to New York City.

His most productive years came between 1923 and 1927. He completed Voyages in 1924, published his first collection, White Buildings, in 1926, and composed ten of the fifteen poems that were to make up The Bridge in 1926. He held occasional jobs, but received most of his support from his parents, friends, and above all from the patronage of a banker, Otto Kahn. Crane defined himself as a follower of Walt Whitman in the visionary, prophetic, affirmative American tradition, aiming at nothing less than to master the techniques of modernism while reversing its direction—to make it positive, celebratory, and deeply meshed with contemporary American life without sacrificing technical complexity or richness. For him as for the somewhat older William Carlos Williams, T. S. Eliot’s The Waste Land was both threat and model. That poem could become an “absolute impasse,” he wrote, unless one could “go through it to a different goal,” leaving its negations behind. This was the task he attempted in The Bridge.

Crane’s practice centered on metaphor—the device that, in his view, represented the difference between poetry and expository prose. He believed that metaphor had preceded logic in the development of human thought and that it still remained the primary mode in which human knowledge was acquired and through which experience was connected to mind. The center of The Bridge, for example, is the Brooklyn Bridge—a tangible object transformed metaphorically into the sign of connection, technology, America, history, and the future. The poem, published in 1930, was not particularly well received by the critics; this was a great disappointment to Crane, and even though Poetry magazine awarded it a prize and the Guggenheim Foundation gave him a fellowship in the same year, he was perplexed about his future. In Mexico he completed work for a third book, Key West, but on the return trip to New York City he jumped overboard and drowned.

The Bridge is a visionary poem made up of fifteen individual sections of varying lengths. It encapsulates a heroic quest, at once personal and epic, to find and enunciate “America.” Like Walt Whitman’s “Song of the Open Road,” which also focused on a symbol of expansion and dynamism, The Bridge moves westward in imagination from Brooklyn to California. It also goes back into the American past, dwelling on historical or legendary figures such as Columbus, Pocahontas, and Rip Van Winkle. It moves upward under the guidance of Whitman; down in “The Tunnel” it meets the wandering spirit of Edgar Allan Poe. The material bridge stands at the center of all this motion and stands, finally, for the poem and poetry itself. The separate lyrics making up The Bridge are arranged like music, with recurring, modulated themes rather than a narrative or an expository line. As in most modernist poems, the verse is open and varied, the syntax complicated and often ambiguous, the references often dependent on a personal, sometimes inaccessible train of thought. Like his model Whitman, Crane wrote from the paradoxical, conflicted position of the outsider claiming to speak from and for the very center of America.

The text of the poems included here is that of Complete Poems of Hart Crane, edited by Marc Simon (1993).

Chaplinsque¹

We make our meek adjustments,
 Contented with such random consolations
 As the wind deposits
 In slithered and too ample pockets.

For we can still love the world, who find 5
 A famished kitten on the step, and know
 Recesses for it from the fury of the street,
 Or warm torn elbow coverts.

We will sidestep, and to the final smirk
 Dally the doom of that inevitable thumb 10
 That slowly chafes its puckered index toward us,
 Facing the dull squint with what innocence
 And what surprise!

And yet these fine collapses are not lies
 More than the pirouettes of any pliant cane; 15
 Our obsequies² are, in a way, no enterprise.
 We can evade you, and all else but the heart:
 What blame to us if the heart live on.

The game enforces smirks; but we have seen
 The moon in lonely alleys make 20
 A grail of laughter of an empty ash can,
 And through all sound of gaiety and quest
 Have heard a kitten in the wilderness.

1921, 1926

At Melville's Tomb¹

Often beneath the wave, wide from this ledge
 The dice of drowned men's bones he saw bequeath
 An embassy. Their numbers as he watched,
 Beat on the dusty shore and were obscured.²

1. Crane wrote of seeing Charlie Chaplin's film The Kid (1921) and said that he aimed "to put in words some of the Chaplin pantomime, so beautiful, and so full of eloquence, and so modern." The film "made me feel myself, as a poet, as being 'in the same boat' with him," Crane wrote.

2. In the double sense of "funeral rites" and "obsequiousness."

1. This poem was published in Poetry magazine only after Crane provided the editor, Harriet Monroe, with a detailed explanation of its images. His letter and Monroe's inquiries and comments were published with the poem. Crane's detailed comments in the letter are incorporated in the notes to the poem. Herman Melville (1819–1891), American author.

2. "Dice bequeath an embassy, in the first place, by being ground (in this connection only, of course) in little cubes from the bones of drowned men by the action of the sea, and are finally thrown up on the sand, having 'numbers' but no identification. These being the bones of dead men who never completed their voyage, it seems legitimate to refer to them as the only surviving evidence of certain messages undelivered, mute evidence of certain things. . . . Dice as a symbol of chance and circumstance is also implied" [Crane's note].

And wrecks passed without sound of bells, 5
 The calyx of death's bounty giving back
 A scattered chapter, livid hieroglyph,
 The portent wound in corridors of shells.³

Then in the circuit calm of one vast coil, 10
 Its lashings charmed and malice reconciled,
 Frosted eyes there were that lifted altars;⁴
 And silent answers crept across the stars.

Compass, quadrant and sextant contrive
 No farther tides⁵ . . . High in the azure steeps
 Monody shall not wake the mariner. 15
 This fabulous shadow only the sea keeps.

1926

FROM THE BRIDGE

From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.
 —The Book of Job¹

To Brooklyn Bridge

*How many dawns, chill from his rippling rest
 The seagull's wings shall dip and pivot him,
 Shedding white rings of tumult, building high
 Over the chained bay waters Liberty—*

*Then, with inviolate curve, forsake our eyes 5
 As apparitional as sails that cross
 Some page of figures to be filed away;
 —Till elevators drop us from our day . . .*

3. "This calyx refers in a double ironic sense both to a cornucopia and the vortex made by a sinking vessel. As soon as the water has closed over a ship this whirlpool sends up broken spars, wreckage, etc., which can be alluded to as livid hieroglyphs, making a scattered chapter so far as any complete record of the recent ship and crew is concerned. In fact, about as much definite knowledge might come from all this as anyone might gain from the roar of his own veins, which is easily heard (haven't you ever done it?) by holding a shell close to one's ear" [Crane's note]. A calyx is a whorl of leaves forming the outer casing of the bud of a plant.

4. "Refers simply to a conviction that a man, not knowing perhaps a definite god yet being endowed with a reverence for deity—such a man naturally postulates a deity somehow, and the altar of that deity by the very action of the eyes lifted in searching" [Crane's note].

5. "Hasn't it often occurred that instruments originally invented for record and computation have inadvertently so extended the concepts of the entity they were invented to measure (concepts of space, etc.) in the mind and imagination that employed them, that they may metaphorically be said to have extended the original boundaries of the entity measured? This little bit of 'relativity' ought not to be discredited in poetry now that scientists are proceeding to measure the universe on principles of pure ratio, quite as metaphorical, so far as previous standards of scientific methods extended, as some of the axioms in Job" [Crane's note].

1. Satan's answer to Jehovah when asked where he has been (Job 1.7).

*I think of cinemas, panoramic sleights
 With multitudes bent toward some flashing scene 10
 Never disclosed, but hastened to again,
 Foretold to other eyes on the same screen;*

*And Thee, across the harbor, silver-paced
 As though the sun took step of thee, yet left 15
 Some motion ever unspent in thy stride,— Implicitly thy freedom staying thee!*

*Out of some subway scuttle, cell or loft
 A bedlamite² speeds to thy parapets,
 Tilting there momentarily, shrill shirt ballooning,
 A jest falls from the speechless caravan. 20*

*Down Wall, from girder into street noon leaks,
 A rip-tooth of the sky's acetylene;
 All afternoon the cloud-flown derricks turn . . .
 Thy cables breathe the North Atlantic still.*

*And obscure as that heaven of the Jews, 25
 Thy guerdon . . . Accolade thou dost bestow
 Of anonymity time cannot raise:
 Vibrant reprieve and pardon thou dost show.*

*O harp and altar, of the fury fused,
 (How could mere toil align thy choring strings!) 30
 Terrific threshold of the prophet's pledge,
 Prayer of pariah, and the lover's cry,—*

*Again the traffic lights that skim thy swift Unfractioned idiom, immaculate sigh of stars,
 Beading thy path—condense eternity: 35
 And we have seen night lifted in thine arms.*

*Under thy shadow by the piers I waited;
 Only in darkness is thy shadow clear.
 The City's fiery parcels all undone,
 Already snow submerges an iron year . . . 40*

*O Sleepless as the river under thee,
 Vaulting the sea, the prairies' dreaming sod,
 Unto us lowliest sometime sweep, descend
 And of the curvship lend a myth to God.*

1927, 1930

2. Insane person, patient in a hospital for the mentally ill.

*From II. Powhatan's Daughter*¹

* * *

*The River*²

Stick your patent name on a signboard brother—all over—going west—young man
 Tintex—Japalac—Certain-teed Overalls ads³ and lands sakes! under the new playbill ripped 5 in the guaranteed corner—see Bert Williams⁴ what?
 Minstrels when you steal a chicken just save me the wing for if it isn't Erie it ain't for miles around a
 Mazda—and the telegraphic night coming on Thomas 10 a Ediford⁵—and whistling down the tracks a headlight rushing with the sound—can you imagine—while an express makes time like
 SCIENCE—COMMERCE AND THE HOLYGHOST
 15 WALLSTREET AND VIRGINBIRTH WITHOUT STONES OR WIRES OR EVEN RUNNING brooks connecting ears and no more sermons windows flashing roar breathtaking—as you like it⁶ . . . eh?

. . . and past the din and slogans of the year—

20 So the 20th Century—so whizzed the Limited—roared by and left three men, still hungry on the tracks, ploddingly watching the tail lights wizen and converge, slipping gimleted and neatly out of sight.

• • • • •

25 The last bear, shot drinking in the Dakotas
 Loped under wires that span the mountain stream.
 Keen instruments,⁷ strung to a vast precision
 Bind town to town and dream to ticking dream.
 But some men take their liquor slow—and count
 —Though they'll confess no rosary nor clue—

to those whose addresses are never near

1. Powhatan was the Native American chief with whom English settlers in Virginia (1607) had to deal. Pocahontas (1595–1617) was his daughter, whom Crane associated with the American “continent,” a “nature symbol” comparable to the “traditional Hertha of ancient Teutonic mythology.”

2. Crane wrote the following in a letter: “I’m trying in this part of the poem to chart the pioneer experience of our forefathers—and to tell the story backwards . . . on the ‘backs’ of hoboos. These hoboos are simply ‘psychological ponies’ to carry the reader across the country and back to the Mississippi, which you will notice is described as a great River of Time. I also unlatch the door to the pure Indian world which opens out in ‘The Dance’ section, so the reader is gradually led back in time to the pure savage world, while existing at the same time in the present.” In the opening lines the image of a subway is translated into an image of a luxury express train, the Twentieth Century Limited, traveling from New York City to Chicago.

3. Advertising slogans: trade names of a dye, a varnish, and a brand of overalls.

4. Egbert A. Williams (1876–1922), popular black minstrel show performer.

5. A combined reference to Thomas Edison (1847–1931), inventor of the electric lightbulb (trade name “Mazda”), and Henry Ford (1863–1947), automobile manufacturer.

6. An echo of Shakespeare’s As You Like It 2.1.16–17: “Books in the running brooks, / Sermons in stones.”

7. The telephone and telegraph.

30 The river's minute by the far brook's year.
 Under a world of whistles, wires and steam
 Caboose-like they go ruminating through Ohio, Indiana—blind baggage—
 To Cheyenne tagging . . . Maybe Kalamazoo.

35 Time's rendings, time's blendings they construe
 As final reckonings of fire and snow;
 Strange bird-wit, like the elemental gist
 Of unwall'd winds they offer, singing low
My Old Kentucky Home and Casey Jones,
 40 Some Sunny Day. I heard a road-gang chanting so.

And afterwards, who had a colt's eyes—one said,
 "Jesus! Oh I remember watermelon days!" And sped High in a cloud of merriment, recalled
 "—And when my Aunt Sally Simpson smiled," he drawled—45 "It was almost Louisiana, long ago."
 "There's no place like Booneville though, Buddy,"
 One said, excising a last burr from his vest,
 "—For early trout-ing." Then peering in the can,
 "—But I kept on the tracks." Possessed, resigned,
 50 He trod the fire down pensively and grinned,
 Spreading dry shingles of a beard. . . .

Behind

My father's cannery works I used to see
 Rail-squatters ranged in nomad raiillery,
 55 The ancient men—wifeless or runaway
 Hobo-trekkers that forever search
 An empire wilderness of freight and rails.
 Each seemed a child, like me, on a loose perch,
 Holding to childhood like some termless play.
 60 John, Jake or Charley, hopping the slow freight —Memphis to Tallahassee—riding the rods,
 Blind fists of nothing, humpty-dumpty clods.

Yet they touch something like a key perhaps.
 From pole to pole across the hills, the states
 65 —They know a body under the wide rain;
 Youngsters with eyes like fjords, old reprobates
 With racetrack jargon,—dotting immensity
 They lurk across her, knowing her yonder breast
 Snow-silvered, sumac-stained or smoky blue—70 Is past the valley-sleepers, south or west.
 —As I have trod the rumorous midnights, too,

but who have touched her, knowing her without name

And past the circuit of the lamp's thin flame
 (O Nights that brought me to her body bare!)
 Have dreamed beyond the print that bound her name.
 75 Trains sounding the long blizzards out—I heard
 Wail into distances I knew were hers.

Papooses crying on the wind's long mane
 Screamed redskin dynasties that fled the brain, —Dead echoes! But I knew her body there,
 80 Time like a serpent down her shoulder, dark,
 And space, an eaglet's wing, laid on her hair.

Under the Ozarks, domed by Iron Mountain,
 The old gods of the rain lie wrapped in pools
 Where eyeless fish curvet a sunken fountain
 85 And re-descend with corn from querulous crows.
 Such pilferings make up their timeless eatage,
 Propitiate them for their timber torn
 By iron, iron—always the iron dealt cleavage!
 They doze now, below axe and powder horn.

nor the myths of her fathers . . .

90 And Pullman breakfasters glide glistening steel
 From tunnel into field—iron strides the dew—
 Straddles the hill, a dance of wheel on wheel.
 You have a half-hour's wait at Siskiyou,
 Or stay the night and take the next train through.
 95 Southward, near Cairo passing, you can see
 The Ohio merging,—borne down Tennessee;
 And if it's summer and the sun's in dusk
 Maybe the breeze will lift the River's musk
 —As though the waters breathed that you might know 100 Memphis Johnny, Steamboat Bill, Missouri Joe.
 Oh, lean from the window, if the train slows down,
 As though you touched hands with some ancient clown,
 —A little while gaze absently below
 And hum Deep River with them while they go.

105 Yes, turn again and sniff once more—look see,
 O Sheriff, Brakeman and Authority—
 Hitch up your pants and crunch another quid,⁸
 For you, too, feed the River timelessly.

And few evade full measure of their fate;
 110 Always they smile out eerily what they seem.
 I could believe he joked at heaven's gate—
 Dan Midland—jolted from the cold brake-beam.⁹

Down, down—born pioneers in time's despite,
 Grimed tributaries to an ancient flow—
 115 They win no frontier by their wayward plight,
 But drift in stillness, as from Jordan's¹ brow.

You will not hear it as the sea; even stone
 Is not more hushed by gravity . . . But slow,
 As loth to take more tribute—sliding prone

8. Chunk of chewing tobacco.

9. Structure on a railroad car where hoboes ride.
 Dan Midland was a legendary hobo who fell to his death from a train.

1. River mentioned frequently in the Bible.

120 Like one whose eyes were buried long ago
 The River, spreading, flows—and spends your dream.
 What are you, lost within this tideless spell?
 You are your father's father, and the stream—
 A liquid theme that floating niggers swell.

125 Damp tonnage and alluvial march of days—
 Nights turbid, vascular with silted shale
 And roots surrendered down of moraine clays:
 The Mississippi drinks the farthest dale.

130 O quarrying passion, undertowed sunlight!
 The basalt surface drags a jungle grace
 Ochreous and lynx-barred in lengthening might;
 Patience! and you shall reach the biding place!

Over De Soto's bones the freighted floors
 Throb past the City storied of three thrones.²
 135 Down two more turns the Mississippi pours
 (Anon tall ironsides³ up from salt lagoons)

And flows within itself, heaps itself free.
 All fades but one thin skyline 'round . . . Ahead
 No embrace opens but the stinging sea;
 140 The River lifts itself from its long bed,

Poised wholly on its dream, a mustard glow
 Tortured with history, its one will—flow!
 —The Passion spreads in wide tongues, choked and slow,
 Meeting the Gulf, hosannas silently below.

1930

VII. The Tunnel

To Find the Western path Right thro' the Gates of Wrath.
 —Blake¹

Performances, assortments, résumés—
 Up Times Square to Columbus Circle lights
 Channel the congresses, nightly sessions,
 Refractions of the thousand theatres, faces—
 Mysterious kitchens. . . You shall search them all. 5
 Someday by heart you'll learn each famous sight
 And watch the curtain lift in hell's despite;
 You'll find the garden in the third act dead,

2. New Orleans, at various times under Spanish, French, and English rule. The body of the Spanish explorer Hernándo de Soto (1500–1542) was consigned to the Mississippi River. In 1862 Admiral David G. Farragut (1801–1870) led a Union fleet up the Mississippi from the Gulf and captured New Orleans.

3. Warships.

1. The opening lines of "Morning," by the visionary English poet William Blake (1757–1827).

Finger your knees—and wish yourself in bed
With tabloid crime-sheets perched in easy sight. 10

Then let you reach your hat and go.
As usual, let you—also walking down—exclaim to twelve upward leaving 15 a subscription praise for what time slays.

Or can't you quite make up your mind to ride;
A walk is better underneath the L² a brisk
Ten blocks or so before? But you find yourself 20
Preparing penguin flexions of the arms,—
As usual you will meet the scuttle yawn:
The subway yawns the quickest promise home.

Be minimum, then, to swim the hiving swarms
Out of the Square, the Circle burning bright³— 25
Avoid the glass doors gyring at your right,
Where boxed alone a second, eyes take fright
—Quite unprepared rush naked back to light:
And down beside the turnstile press the coin
Into the slot. The gongs already rattle. 30

And so of cities you bespeak subways, rivered under streets and rivers. . . . In the car the overtone of motion 35 underground, the monotone of motion is the sound of other faces, also underground—

“Let's have a pencil Jimmy—living now at Floral Park 40
Flatbush—on the fourth of July—like a pigeon's muddy dream—potatoes to dig in the field—travlin the town—too—night after night—the Culver line—the girls all shaping up—it used to be—” 45

Our tongues recant like beaten weather vanes.
This answer lives like verdigris,⁴ like hair
Beyond extinction, surcease of the bone;
And repetition freezes—“What “what do you want? getting weak on the links?
fandaddle daddy don't ask for change—IS THIS 50
FOURTEENTH? it's half past six she said—if

2. Elevated railway.

3. An echo of Blake's poem “The Tyger”; also the lighted sign indicating a subway station.

4. Green coating or stain on copper.

you don't like my gate why did you swing on it, why didja swing on it anyhow—” 55

And somehow anyhow swing—

The phonographs of hades in the brain
 Are tunnels that re-wind themselves, and love
 A burnt match skating in a urinal— 60
 Somewhere above Fourteenth TAKE THE EXPRESS
 To brush some new presentiment of pain—
 “But I want service in this office SERVICE
 I said—after the show she cried a little afterwards but—” 65

Whose head is swinging from the swollen strap?
 Whose body smokes along the bitten rails,
 Bursts from a smoldering bundle far behind
 In back forks of the chasms of the brain,— Puffs from a riven stump far out behind 70
 In interborough fissures of the mind . . . ?

And why do I often meet your visage here,
 Your eyes like agate lanterns—on and on Below the toothpaste and the dandruff ads?
 —And did their riding eyes right through your side, 75
 And did their eyes like unwashed platters ride?
 And Death, aloft,—gigantically down
 Probing through you—toward me, O evermore!⁵
 And when they dragged your retching flesh,
 Your trembling hands that night through Baltimore— 80
 That last night on the ballot rounds, did you,
 Shaking, did you deny the ticket, Poe?

For Gravesend Manor change at Chambers Street.
 The platform hurries along to a dead stop.

The intent escalator lifts a serenade 85
 Stilly
 Of shoes, umbrellas, each eye attending its shoe, then Bolting outright somewhere above where streets
 Burst suddenly in rain. . . . The gongs recur:
 Elbows and levers, guard and hissing door. 90
 Thunder is galvothermic⁶ here below. . . . The car Wheels off. The train rounds, bending to a scream,
 Taking the final level for the dive
 Under the river—

5. Echoes of “the agate lamp within thy hand” from “To Helen,” “Death looks gigantically down” from “The City in the Sea,” and the refrain “Nevermore” in “The Raven” —poems by Edgar Allan

Poe (1809–1849).

6. I.e., galvanothermic, producing heat by electricity.

And somewhat emptier than before, 95
 Demented, for a hitching second, humps; then Lets go. . . . Toward corners of the floor
 Newspapers wing, revolve and wing.
 Blank windows gargle signals through the roar.

And does the Daemon take you home, also, 100
 Wop washerwoman, with the bandaged hair?
 After the corridors are swept, the cuspidors—
 The gaunt sky-barracks cleanly now, and bare,
 O Genoese, do you bring mother eyes and hands
 Back home to children and to golden hair? 105

Daemon, demurring and eventful yawn!
 Whose hideous laughter is a bellows mirth
 —Or the muffled slaughter of a day in birth—
 O cruelly to inoculate the brinking dawn
 With antennae toward worlds that glow and sink;— 110
 To spoon us out more liquid than the dim
 Locution of the eldest star, and pack
 The conscience navelled in the plunging wind,
 Umbilical to call—and straightway die!

O caught like pennies beneath soot and steam, 115
 Kiss of our agony thou gatherest;
 Condensed, thou takest all—shrill ganglia
 Impassioned with some song we fail to keep.
 And yet, like Lazarus,⁷ to feel the slope,
 The sod and billow breaking,—lifting ground, 120
 —A sound of waters bending astride the sky
 Unceasing with some Word that will not die . . . !

• • • • •

A tugboat, wheezing wreaths of steam,
 Lunged past, with one galvanic blare stove up the River.
 I counted the echoes assembling, one after one, 125
 Searching, thumbing the midnight on the piers.
 Lights, coasting, left the oily tympanum of waters;
 The blackness somewhere gouged glass on a sky.
 And this thy harbor, O my City, I have driven under,
 Tossed from the coil of ticking towers. . . . Tomorrow, 130
 And to be. . . . Here by the River that is East—
 Here at the waters' edge the hands drop memory;
 Shadowless in that abyss they unaccounting lie.
 How far away the star has pooled the sea—
 Or shall the hands be drawn away, to die? 135
 Kiss of our agony Thou gatherest,

O Hand of Fire
 gatherest—

1927, 1930

7. He was resurrected from the grave by Jesus in John 11.43–44.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY

1899–1961

The narrator in Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms, reflecting on his war experiences, observes at one point, "I was always embarrassed by the words sacred, glorious, and sacrifice and the expression in vain. . . . I had seen nothing sacred, and the things that were glorious had no glory and the sacrifices were like the stockyards at Chicago if nothing was done with the meat except to bury it. There were many words that you could not stand to hear." Hemingway's aim and achievement as a novelist and short-story writer were to convey his concerns in a prose style built from what was left after eliminating all the words one "could not stand to hear." As flamboyant in his personal style as he was severe in his writing, Hemingway became an international celebrity after the publication in 1926 of his first novel, The Sun Also Rises. At the time of his death, he was probably the most famous writer in the world.

He was born and raised in Oak Park, Illinois, one of six children. His mother was a music teacher, director of the church choir, and a lover of high culture who had contemplated a career as an opera singer. His father was a successful physician, prone to depression, who enjoyed hunting, fishing, and cooking and who shared in household responsibilities more than most men of his era. The family spent summers at their cottage in northern Michigan, where many of Hemingway's stories are set. After high school, Hemingway took a job on the Kansas City Star. When the United States entered the war in 1917, Hemingway was eager to go. An eye problem barred him from the army, so he joined the ambulance corps. Within three weeks he was wounded by shrapnel. After six months in the hospital Hemingway went home as a decorated hero: when wounded, he had carried a comrade more badly hurt than he to safety (see p. 204). He found readjustment difficult and became increasingly estranged from his family, especially his mother. Years later, when his father committed suicide, Hemingway blamed his mother for that death.

In 1920 he married Hadley Richardson and went to Paris. Supported partly by her money and partly by his journalism, Hemingway worked at becoming a writer. He came to know Gertrude Stein, Sherwood Anderson, Ezra Pound, F. Scott Fitzgerald, and others in the large community of expatriate artistic and literary Americans. Besides reading his manuscripts and advising him, Fitzgerald and Anderson, better known than he, used their influence to get his book of short stories In Our Time published in the United States in 1925. In this book, stories about the adolescent Nick Adams as he grows up in northern Michigan alternate with very brief, powerful vignettes of war and crime.

In 1926 his novel The Sun Also Rises appeared; it presents the stripped-down "Hemingway style" at its finest. "I always try to write on the principle of the iceberg," he told an interviewer. "There is seven-eighths of it under water for every part that shows." Narrated by Jake Barnes, whose World War I wounds have left him sexually impotent, The Sun Also Rises depicts Jake's efforts to live according to a self-conscious code of dignity, of "grace under pressure," in the midst of a circle of self-seeking American and English expatriates in Paris—the "lost generation," as Gertrude Stein dubbed them. He finds an ideal in the rich tradition of Spanish peasant life, especially as epitomized in bullfighting and the bullfighter. The Sun Also Rises was directly responsible for a surge of American tourism to Pamplona, Spain, where the novel's bullfights are set.

In 1927 Hemingway brought out his second collection of stories, Men without Women. Adapting journalistic techniques in telegraphic prose that minimized narrator commentary and depended heavily on uncontextualized dialogue, these stories developed the modern, speeded-up, streamlined style exemplified in “Hills Like White Elephants.” His second novel, A Farewell to Arms, appeared in 1929. It described a romance between an American army officer, Frederic Henry, and a British nurse, Catherine Barkley. The two run away from war, trying to make “a separate peace,” but their idyll is shattered when Catherine dies in childbirth. Hemingway’s work has been much criticized for its depictions of women. The wholly good Catherine lives for Frederic Henry alone; and Maria, in his Spanish Civil War novel (For Whom the Bell Tolls, 1940), is a fantasy figure of total submissiveness. Characters like Brett Ashley in The Sun Also Rises and Pilar in For Whom the Bell Tolls, however, are strong, complex figures. Overall, Hemingway identified the rapid change in women’s status after World War I and the general blurring of sex roles that accompanied the new sexual freedom as aspects of modernity that men were simultaneously attracted to and found hard to deal with. More recently, especially in light of the themes of some of his posthumously published writings, critics have begun to reinterpret Hemingway’s work as preoccupied with the cultural and psychological meanings of masculinity in a way that bespeaks considerable sexual ambivalence.

As Hemingway aged, his interest in exclusively masculine forms of self-assertion and self-definition became more pronounced. War, hunting, and similar pursuits that he had used at first to show men manifesting dignity in the face of certain defeat increasingly became depicted (in his life as well as his writing) as occasions for competitive masculine display and triumph. Soon after the publication of The Sun Also Rises, his first marriage broke up; in all he was married four times. In the 1930s and 1940s he adopted the style of life of a celebrity. Some of his best-known work from these years, such as “The Snows of Kilimanjaro” (1936), treats the theme of the successful writer losing his talent in an atmosphere of success, adulation, and wealth.

A political loner distrustful of all ideological abstractions, Hemingway was nevertheless drawn into antifascist politics by the Spanish Civil War. In To Have and Have Not (1937), the earliest of his political novels, the good characters are working-class people and the antagonists are idle rich. For Whom the Bell Tolls draws on Hemingway’s experiences in Spain as a war correspondent, celebrating both the peasant antifascists and the Americans who fought on their behalf. Hemingway’s opposition to fascism did not, however, keep him from viewing the pro-Loyalist communists, who were also active in the Spanish Civil War, with considerable skepticism. His one play, The Fifth Column—which was printed along with his collected stories in 1938 and staged in 1940—specifically blames the communists for betraying the cause.

Hemingway was fiercely anti-Nazi during World War II. As well as working as a war correspondent, work that sent him often to Europe, he used his fishing boat to keep watch for German submarines off the coast of Cuba, where he had a home. After the war ended, he continued his travels and was badly hurt in Africa in January 1954 in the crash of a small plane. He had already published his allegorical fable The Old Man and the Sea (1952), in the mass-circulation weekly magazine Life; this, his last major work published during his lifetime, won a Pulitzer Prize in 1953 and was central to his winning the Nobel Prize in 1954. The plane crash had damaged his mental and physical health, and he never fully recovered. Subject increasingly to depression and an incapacitating paranoia—afflictions that seem to have run in his family—he was hospitalized several times before killing himself in 1961. Yet it does appear that some of his suspicions about being watched by U.S. government agents may have been justified. Many writers associated with radical causes had dossiers compiled on them by the FBI. Several books have been published posthumously based on the voluminous manuscript collections he left. These include a book of reminiscences about his life in 1920s Paris, A Moveable Feast (1964); a novel about literary fame and sexual ambiguity constructed from several unfinished drafts, The Garden of Eden (1986); and The Nick Adams Stories (1972), a collection that added eight previously unpublished stories to the group.

From The Sun Also Rises¹

Chapter III

[IT WAS A WARM SPRING NIGHT]

It was a warm spring night and I sat at a table on the terrace of the Napolitain after Robert² had gone, watching it get dark and the electric signs come on, and the red and green stop-and-go traffic-signal, and the crowd going by, and the horse-cabs clippety-clopping along at the edge of the solid taxi traffic, and the *poules*³ going by, singly and in pairs, looking for the evening meal. I watched a good-looking girl walk past the table and watched her go up the street and lost sight of her, and watched another, and then saw the first one coming back again. She went by once more and I caught her eye, and she came over and sat down at the table. The waiter came up.

"Well, what will you drink?" I asked.

"Pernod."

"That's not good for little girls."

"Little girl yourself. Dites garçon, un pernod."⁴

"A pernod for me, too."

"What's the matter?" she asked. "Going on a party?"

"Sure. Aren't you?"

"I don't know. You never know in this town."

"Don't you like Paris?"

"No."

"Why don't you go somewhere else?"

"Isn't anywhere else."

"You're happy, all right."

"Happy, hell!"

Pernod is greenish imitation absinthe.⁵ When you add water it turns milky. It tastes like licorice and it has a good uplift, but it drops you just as far. We sat and drank it, and the girl looked sullen.

"Well," I said, "are you going to buy me a dinner?"

She grinned and I saw why she made a point of not laughing. With her mouth closed she was a rather pretty girl. I paid for the saucers and we walked out to the street. I hailed a horse-cab and the driver pulled up at the curb. Settled back in the slow, smoothly rolling fiacre we moved up the Avenue de

1. The text is that of the first edition (1926), published by Charles Scribner's Sons. Hemingway's two epigraphs to the novel cite a remark by Gertrude Stein—"You are all a lost generation"—and Ecclesiastes 1.4–7: "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever. . . . The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose. . . . The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. . . . All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again."

2. Robert Cohn, an American expatriate writer with whom the narrator, Jake Barnes, has a barbed, competitive friendship. Barnes like Cohn is an aspiring author, but Cohn has just had his first novel accepted for publication. Cohn also has family money backing his literary career, while Barnes supports himself as a journalist. Cohn has recently become romantically interested in Lady Brett Ashley, a British divorcée whom Barnes met during World War I at a military hospital where she was a volunteer. Although Jake and Brett are intensely attracted to one another, his war wound has left him unable to consummate a sexual relationship. As the chapter begins, Barnes and Cohn have just had a drink together following the end of Barnes's working day, much of which Cohn spent loitering in Barnes's office.

3. Hens (French, literal trans.); slang for prostitutes.

4. Tell the waiter, a pernod (French).

5. An anise- and herb-flavored, highly alcoholic spirit.

l'Opéra,⁶ passed the locked doors of the shops, their windows lighted, the Avenue broad and shiny and almost deserted. The cab passed the New York Herald bureau with the window full of clocks.

"What are all the clocks for?" she asked.

"They show the hour all over America."

"Don't kid me."

We turned off the Avenue up the Rue des Pyramides, through the traffic of the Rue de Rivoli, and through a dark gate into the Tuileries.⁷ She cuddled against me and I put my arm around her. She looked up to be kissed. She touched me with one hand and I put her hand away.

"Never mind."

"What's the matter? You sick?"

"Yes."

"Everybody's sick. I'm sick, too."

We came out of the Tuileries into the light and crossed the Seine and then turned up the Rue des Saints Pères.⁸

"You oughtn't to drink pernod if you're sick."

"You neither."

"It doesn't make any difference with me. It doesn't make any difference with a woman."

"What are you called?"

"Georgette. How are you called?"

"Jacob."

"That's a Flemish name."

"American too."

"You're not Flamand?"

"No, American."

"Good, I detest Flamands."

By this time we were at the restaurant. I called to the *cocher*⁹ to stop. We got out and Georgette did not like the looks of the place. "This is no great thing of a restaurant."

"No," I said. "Maybe you would rather go to Foyot's.¹ Why don't you keep the cab and go on?"

I had picked her up because of a vague sentimental idea that it would be nice to eat with some one. It was a long time since I had dined with a poule, and I had forgotten how dull it could be. We went into the restaurant, passed Madame Lavigne at the desk and into a little room. Georgette cheered up a little under the food.

"It isn't bad here," she said. "It isn't chic, but the food is all right."

"Better than you eat in Liège."

"Brussels,² you mean."

We had another bottle of wine and Georgette made a joke. She smiled and showed all her bad teeth, and we touched glasses.

6. Major Parisian thoroughfare running from the Louvre to the Palais Garnier, Paris's central opera house. "Fiacre": a small horse carriage.

7. The large formal garden in the center of Paris. The streets are also in central Paris.

8. St. Peter's Street, on the Left Bank. The Seine divides Paris into the Right Bank, associated with business, wealth, and the state, and the Left Bank, traditionally the neighborhood of artists and students.

9. Coachman.

1. A famous, luxurious restaurant on the Right Bank, frequented by politicians and businessmen.

2. Belgian cities. Liège is historically French speaking; Brussels historically Dutch speaking.

"You're not a bad type," she said. "It's a shame you're sick. We get on well. What's the matter with you, anyway?"

"I got hurt in the war," I said.

"Oh, that dirty war."

We would probably have gone on and discussed the war and agreed that it was in reality a calamity for civilization, and perhaps would have been better avoided. I was bored enough. Just then from the other room some one called: "Barnes! I say, Barnes! Jacob Barnes!"

"It's a friend calling me," I explained, and went out.

There was Braddocks at a big table with a party: Cohn, Frances Clyne,³ Mrs. Braddocks, several people I did not know.

"You're coming to the dance, aren't you?" Braddocks asked.

"What dance?"

"Why, the dancings. Don't you know we've revived them?" Mrs. Braddocks put in.

"You must come, Jake. We're all going," Frances said from the end of the table. She was tall and had a smile.

"Of course, he's coming," Braddocks said. "Come in and have coffee with us, Barnes."

"Right."

"And bring your friend," said Mrs. Braddocks laughing. She was a Canadian and had all their easy social graces.

"Thanks, we'll be in," I said. I went back to the small room.

"Who are your friends?" Georgette asked.

"Writers and artists."

"There are lots of those on this side of the river."

"Too many."

"I think so. Still, some of them make money."

"Oh, yes."

We finished the meal and the wine. "Come on," I said. "We're going to have coffee with the others."

Georgette opened her bag, made a few passes at her face as she looked in the little mirror, re-defined her lips with the lipstick, and straightened her hat.

"Good," she said.

We went into the room full of people and Braddocks and the men at his table stood up.

"I wish to present my fiancée, Mademoiselle Georgette Leblanc," I said. Georgette smiled that wonderful smile, and we shook hands all round.

"Are you related to Georgette Leblanc,⁴ the singer?" Mrs. Braddocks asked.

"Connais pas,"⁵ Georgette answered.

"But you have the same name," Mrs. Braddocks insisted cordially.

"No," said Georgette. "Not at all. My name is Hobin."

"But Mr. Barnes introduced you as Mademoiselle Georgette Leblanc. Surely he did," insisted Mrs. Braddocks, who in the excitement of talking French was liable to have no idea what she was saying.

3. Cohn's possessive partner in a fading romantic relationship. Henry Braddocks is another writer in Barnes and Cohn's circle.

4. A noted French opera singer (1869–1941).

5. I don't know (French).

"He's a fool," Georgette said.

"Oh, it was a joke, then," Mrs. Braddocks said.

"Yes," said Georgette. "To laugh at."

"Did you hear that, Henry?" Mrs. Braddocks called down the table to Braddocks. "Mr. Barnes introduced his fiancée as Mademoiselle Leblanc, and her name is actually Hobin."

"Of course, darling. Mademoiselle Hobin, I've known her for a very long time."

"Oh, Mademoiselle Hobin," Frances Clyne called, speaking French very rapidly and not seeming so proud and astonished as Mrs. Braddocks at its coming out really French. "Have you been in Paris long? Do you like it here? You love Paris, do you not?"

"Who's she?" Georgette turned to me. "Do I have to talk to her?"

She turned to Frances, sitting smiling, her hands folded, her head poised on her long neck, her lips pursed ready to start talking again.

"No, I don't like Paris. It's expensive and dirty."

"Really? I find it so extraordinarily clean. One of the cleanest cities in all Europe."

"I find it dirty."

"How strange! But perhaps you have not been here very long."

"I've been here long enough."

"But it does have nice people in it. One must grant that."

Georgette turned to me. "You have nice friends."

Frances was a little drunk and would have liked to have kept it up but the coffee came, and Lavigne with the liqueurs, and after that we all went out and started for Braddocks's dancing-club.

The dancing-club was a bal musette in the Rue de la Montagne Sainte Geneviève.⁶ Five nights a week the working people of the Pantheon quarter⁷ danced there. One night a week it was the dancing-club. On Monday nights it was closed. When we arrived it was quite empty, except for a policeman sitting near the door, the wife of the proprietor back of the zinc bar, and the proprietor himself. The daughter of the house came down-stairs as we went in. There were long benches, and tables ran across the room, and at the far end a dancing-floor.

"I wish people would come earlier," Braddocks said. The daughter came up and wanted to know what we would drink. The proprietor got up on a high stool beside the dancing-floor and began to play the accordion. He had a string of bells around one of his ankles and beat time with his foot as he played. Every one danced. It was hot and we came off the floor perspiring.

"My God," Georgette said. "What a box to sweat in!"

"It's hot."

"Hot, my God!"

"Take off your hat."

"That's a good idea."

Some one asked Georgette to dance, and I went over to the bar. It was really very hot and the accordion music was pleasant in the hot night. I drank

6. Street in the Latin Quarter of the Left Bank, known for its universities and nightlife. "Bal musette": a dance hall with an accordion band.

7. The Left Bank neighborhood surrounding the Pantheon. Designed in 1755 as a church, the building was later converted into a secular memorial and burial place for notable French citizens.

a beer, standing in the doorway and getting the cool breath of wind from the street. Two taxis were coming down the steep street. They both stopped in front of the Bal.⁸ A crowd of young men, some in jerseys and some in their shirtsleeves, got out. I could see their hands and newly washed, wavy hair in the light from the door. The policeman standing by the door looked at me and smiled. They came in. As they went in, under the light I saw white hands, wavy hair, white faces, grimacing, gesturing, talking. With them was Brett. She looked very lovely and she was very much with them.

One of them saw Georgette and said: "I do declare. There is an actual harlot. I'm going to dance with her, Lett. You watch me."

The tall dark one, called Lett, said: "Don't you be rash."

The wavy blond one answered: "Don't you worry, dear." And with them was Brett.

I was very angry. Somehow they always made me angry. I know they are supposed to be amusing, and you should be tolerant, but I wanted to swing on one, any one, anything to shatter that superior, simpering composure. Instead, I walked down the street and had a beer at the bar at the next Bal. The beer was not good and I had a worse cognac to take the taste out of my mouth. When I came back to the Bal there was a crowd on the floor and Georgette was dancing with the tall blond youth, who danced big-hippily, carrying his head on one side, his eyes lifted as he danced. As soon as the music stopped another one of them asked her to dance. She had been taken up by them. I knew then that they would all dance with her. They are like that.

I sat down at a table. Cohn was sitting there. Frances was dancing. Mrs. Braddocks brought up somebody and introduced him as Robert Prentiss. He was from New York by way of Chicago, and was a rising new novelist. He had some sort of an English accent. I asked him to have a drink.

"Thanks so much," he said, "I've just had one."

"Have another."

"Thanks, I will then."

We got the daughter of the house over and each had a fine à l'eau.⁹

"You're from Kansas City, they tell me," he said.

"Yes."

"Do you find Paris amusing?"

"Yes."

"Really?"

I was a little drunk. Not drunk in any positive sense but just enough to be careless.

"For God's sake," I said, "yes. Don't you?"

"Oh, how charmingly you get angry," he said. "I wish I had that faculty."

I got up and walked over toward the dancing-floor. Mrs. Braddocks followed me. "Don't be cross with Robert," she said. "He's still only a child, you know."

"I wasn't cross," I said. "I just thought perhaps I was going to throw up."

"Your fiancée is having a great success," Mrs. Braddocks looked out on the floor where Georgette was dancing in the arms of the tall, dark one, called Lett.

"Isn't she?" I said.

8. I.e., the bal musette.

9. Cognac and water.

“Rather,” said Mrs. Braddocks.

Cohn came up. “Come on, Jake,” he said, “have a drink.” We walked over to the bar. “What’s the matter with you? You seem all worked up over something?”

“Nothing. This whole show makes me sick is all.”

Brett came up to the bar.

“Hello, you chaps.”

“Hello, Brett,” I said. “Why aren’t you tight?”

“Never going to get tight any more. I say, give a chap a brandy and soda.”

She stood holding the glass and I saw Robert Cohn looking at her. He looked a great deal as his compatriot must have looked when he saw the promised land.¹ Cohn, of course, was much younger. But he had that look of eager, deserving expectation.

Brett was damned good-looking. She wore a slipover jersey sweater and a tweed skirt, and her hair was brushed back like a boy’s. She started all that. She was built with curves like the hull of a racing yacht, and you missed none of it with that wool jersey.

“It’s a fine crowd you’re with, Brett,” I said.

“Aren’t they lovely? And you, my dear. Where did you get it?”

“At the Napolitain.”

“And have you had a lovely evening?”

“Oh, priceless,” I said.

Brett laughed. “It’s wrong of you, Jake. It’s an insult to all of us. Look at Frances there, and Jo.”

This for Cohn’s benefit.

“It’s in restraint of trade,” Brett said. She laughed again.

“You’re wonderfully sober,” I said.

“Yes. Aren’t I? And when one’s with the crowd I’m with, one can drink in such safety, too.”

The music started and Robert Cohn said: “Will you dance this with me, Lady Brett?”

Brett smiled at him. “I’ve promised to dance this with Jacob,” she laughed. “You’ve a hell of a biblical name, Jake.”

“How about the next?” asked Cohn.

“We’re going,” Brett said. “We’ve a date up at Montmartre.”²

Dancing, I looked over Brett’s shoulder, and saw Cohn, standing at the bar, still watching her.

“You’ve made a new one there,” I said to her.

“Don’t talk about it. Poor chap. I never knew it till just now.”

“Oh, well,” I said. “I suppose you like to add them up.”

“Don’t talk like a fool.”

“You do.”

“Oh, well. What if I do?”

“Nothing,” I said. We were dancing to the accordion and some one was playing the banjo. It was hot and I felt happy. We passed close to Georgette dancing with another one of them.

“What possessed you to bring her?”

“I don’t know, I just brought her.”

1. I.e., like Moses, who was allowed to see but not to enter the promised land (Deuteronomy 34.4). Barnes here and elsewhere in the novel mocks Cohn’s Jewish identity.

2. Parisian neighborhood associated with avant-garde artists.

"You're getting damned romantic."

"No, bored."

"Now?"

"No, not now."

"Let's get out of here. She's well taken care of."

"Do you want to?"

"Would I ask you if I didn't want to?"

We left the floor and I took my coat off a hanger on the wall and put it on. Brett stood by the bar. Cohn was talking to her. I stopped at the bar and asked them for an envelope. The patronne found one. I took a fifty-franc note from my pocket, put it in the envelope, sealed it, and handed it to the patronne.³

"If the girl I came with asks for me, will you give her this?" I said. "If she goes out with one of those gentlemen, will you save this for me?"

"C'est entendu, Monsieur,"⁴ the patronne said. "You go now? So early?"

"Yes," I said.

We started out the door. Cohn was still talking to Brett. She said good night and took my arm. "Good night, Cohn," I said. Outside in the street we looked for a taxi.

"You're going to lose your fifty francs," Brett said.

"Oh, yes."

"No taxis."

"We could walk up to the Pantheon and get one."

"Come on and we'll get a drink in the pub next door and send for one."

"You wouldn't walk across the street."

"Not if I could help it."

We went into the next bar and I sent a waiter for a taxi.

"Well," I said, "we're out away from them."

We stood against the tall zinc bar and did not talk and looked at each other. The waiter came and said the taxi was outside. Brett pressed my hand hard. I gave the waiter a franc and we went out. "Where should I tell him?" I asked.

"Oh, tell him to drive around."

I told the driver to go to the Parc Montsouris,⁵ and got in, and slammed the door. Brett was leaning back in the corner, her eyes closed. I sat beside her. The cab started with a jerk.

"Oh, darling, I've been so miserable," Brett said.

1926

Hills Like White Elephants¹

The hills across the valley of the Ebro² were long and white. On this side there was no shade and no trees and the station was between two lines of rails in the sun. Close against the side of the station there was the warm shadow of the building and a curtain, made of strings of bamboo beads, hung across the open door into the bar, to keep out flies. The American and

3. Landlady, barkeeper (French). In 1925, 50 francs was equivalent to about $2.50 in U.S. dollars, roughly $30.00 in today's money.

4. Understood, sir (French).

5. Large public park on the Left Bank.

1. The text is from Men without Women (1927), published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

2. Spain's largest river.

the girl with him sat at a table in the shade, outside the building. It was very hot and the express from Barcelona would come in forty minutes. It stopped at this junction for two minutes and went on to Madrid.

"What should we drink?" the girl asked. She had taken off her hat and put it on the table.

"It's pretty hot," the man said.

"Let's drink beer."

"Dos cervezas,"³ the man said into the curtain.

"Big ones?" a woman asked from the doorway.

"Yes. Two big ones."

The woman brought two glasses of beer and two felt pads. She put the felt pads and the beer glasses on the table and looked at the man and the girl. The girl was looking off at the line of hills. They were white in the sun and the country was brown and dry.

"They look like white elephants," she said.

"I've never seen one," the man drank his beer.

"No, you wouldn't have."

"I might have," the man said. "Just because you say I wouldn't have doesn't prove anything."

The girl looked at the bead curtain. "They've painted something on it," she said. "What does it say?"

"Anis del Toro.⁴ It's a drink."

"Could we try it?"

The man called "Listen" through the curtain. The woman came out from the bar.

"Four reales."⁵

"We want two Anis del Toro."

"With water?"

"Do you want it with water?"

"I don't know," the girl said. "Is it good with water?"

"It's all right."

"You want them with water?" asked the woman.

"Yes, with water."

"It tastes like licorice," the girl said and put the glass down.

"That's the way with everything."

"Yes," said the girl. "Everything tastes of licorice. Especially all the things you've waited so long for, like absinthe."⁶

"Oh, cut it out."

"You started it," the girl said. "I was being amused. I was having a fine time."

"Well, let's try and have a fine time."

"All right. I was trying. I said the mountains looked like white elephants. Wasn't that bright?"

"That was bright."

"I wanted to try this new drink. That's all we do, isn't it—look at things and try new drinks?"

"I guess so."

3. Two beers (Spanish).

4. Bull's anisette (Spanish, literal trans.); a brand of anise-flavored liqueur.

5. Small Spanish coins. In 1925, 4 reales were worth about 15 cents in U.S. money.

6. Anise- and herb-flavored, highly alcoholic spirit, associated with Parisian life and banned in the United States in 1912.

The girl looked across at the hills.

"They're lovely hills," she said. "They don't really look like white elephants. I just meant the coloring of their skin through the trees."

"Should we have another drink?"

"All right."

The warm wind blew the bead curtain against the table.

"The beer's nice and cool," the man said.

"It's lovely," the girl said.

"It's really an awfully simple operation, Jig," the man said. "It's not really an operation at all."

The girl looked at the ground the table legs rested on.

"I know you wouldn't mind it, Jig. It's really not anything. It's just to let the air in."

The girl did not say anything.

"I'll go with you and I'll stay with you all the time. They just let the air in and then it's all perfectly natural."

"Then what will we do afterward?"

"We'll be fine afterward. Just like we were before."

"What makes you think so?"

"That's the only thing that bothers us. It's the only thing that's made us unhappy."

The girl looked at the bead curtain, put her hand out and took hold of two of the strings of beads.

"And you think then we'll be all right and be happy."

"I know we will. You don't have to be afraid. I've known lots of people that have done it."

"So have I," said the girl. "And afterward they were all so happy."

"Well," the man said, "if you don't want to you don't have to. I wouldn't have you do it if you didn't want to. But I know it's perfectly simple."

"And you really want to?"

"I think it's the best thing to do. But I don't want you to do it if you don't really want to."

"And if I do it you'll be happy and things will be like they were and you'll love me?"

"I love you now. You know I love you."

"I know. But if I do it, then it will be nice again if I say things are like white elephants, and you'll like it?"

"I'll love it. I love it now but I just can't think about it. You know how I get when I worry."

"If I do it you won't ever worry?"

"I won't worry about that because it's perfectly simple."

"Then I'll do it. Because I don't care about me."

"What do you mean?"

"I don't care about me."

"Well, I care about you."

"Oh, yes. But I don't care about me. And I'll do it and then everything will be fine."

"I don't want you to do it if you feel that way."

The girl stood up and walked to the end of the station. Across, on the other side, were fields of grain and trees along the banks of the Ebro. Far away, beyond the river, were mountains. The shadow of a cloud moved across the field of grain and she saw the river through the trees.

"And we could have all this," she said. "And we could have everything and every day we make it more impossible."

"What did you say?"

"I said we could have everything."

"We can have everything."

"No, we can't."

"We can have the whole world."

"No, we can't."

"We can go everywhere."

"No, we can't. It isn't ours any more."

"It's ours."

"No, it isn't. And once they take it away, you never get it back."

"But they haven't taken it away."

"We'll wait and see."

"Come on back in the shade," he said. "You mustn't feel that way."

"I don't feel any way," the girl said. "I just know things."

"I don't want you to do anything that you don't want to do——"

"Nor that isn't good for me," she said. "I know. Could we have another beer?"

"All right. But you've got to realize——"

"I realize," the girl said. "Can't we maybe stop talking?"

They sat down at the table and the girl looked across at the hills on the dry side of the valley and the man looked at her and at the table.

"You've got to realize," he said, "that I don't want you to do it if you don't want to. I'm perfectly willing to go through with it if it means anything to you."

"Doesn't it mean anything to you? We could get along."

"Of course it does. But I don't want anybody but you. I don't want any one else. And I know it's perfectly simple."

"Yes, you know it's perfectly simple."

"It's all right for you to say that, but I do know it."

"Would you do something for me now?"

"I'd do anything for you."

"Would you please please please please please please stop talking?"

He did not say anything but looked at the bags against the wall of the station. There were labels on them from all the hotels where they had spent nights.

"But I don't want you to," he said, "I don't care anything about it."

"I'll scream," the girl said.

The woman came out through the curtains with two glasses of beer and put them down on the damp felt pads. "The train comes in five minutes," she said.

"What did she say?" asked the girl.

"That the train is coming in five minutes."

The girl smiled brightly at the woman, to thank her.

"I'd better take the bags over to the other side of the station," the man said. She smiled at him.

"All right. Then come back and we'll finish the beer."

He picked up the two heavy bags and carried them around the station to the other tracks. He looked up the tracks but could not see the train. Coming back, he walked through the barroom, where people waiting for the train were drinking. He drank an Anis at the bar and looked at the people.

They were all waiting reasonably for the train. He went out through the bead curtain. She was sitting at the table and smiled at him.

“Do you feel better?” he asked.

“I feel fine,” she said. “There’s nothing wrong with me. I feel fine.”

1927

THOMAS WOLFE

1900–1938

Thomas Wolfe’s writing was diametrically opposed to the suggestive conciseness of such modernist prose writers as F. Scott Fitzgerald and Ernest Hemingway. He wanted to write about America, he said, “not the government, or the Revolutionary War, or the Monroe Doctrine,” but rather “the ten million seconds and moments of your life.” Elsewhere he said, “I want to write about everything and say all that can be said about each particular.” As a result his manuscripts were vast scrawls that had to be shaped into books by his editors and agents.

Wolfe was born in Asheville, North Carolina, the seventh and youngest child of O. W. and Julia Westall Wolfe. His father, who had been married before, was a stonemason. His mother came from a Carolina mountain family. When Wolfe was about six years old, she opened a boardinghouse a few blocks from the family home. Thereafter, the family divided its time between these two residences. Later, Julia Wolfe began to invest in real estate, and between the earnings of the two parents, the family was financially comfortable. All its members were highly individualistic, emotional, and self-expressive; the passionate family drama was both Wolfe’s inspiration and his burden. His youth was punctuated by loss as well: his brother Grover died when Wolfe was four, his beloved brother Ben when he was eighteen, and his father when he was twenty-two.

There was no tradition of higher education on either side of the family, but some of Wolfe’s teachers persuaded his parents to send him to the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. After graduating he took a year of additional study at Harvard University, working with George Pierce Baker, who at that time gave one of the very few courses in playwriting in the nation, the famous “47 Workshop,” where Eugene O’Neill also studied. In 1924 Wolfe moved to New York City, where he taught composition at New York University while trying to write salable plays.

At about this time, Wolfe met and became involved with Aline Bernstein, a successful scene designer for the Neighborhood Playhouse, a New York theater group. She persuaded the young writer to try writing prose fiction, and with her encouragement he turned to the subject of his own life. A three-hundred-thousand-word manuscript—i.e., about a thousand typed pages—titled O Lost made the rounds of several publishers before coming to the attention of Maxwell Perkins at Scribner. Perkins, a leading editor of the day, had made it his life’s work to identify major American talents—Fitzgerald and Hemingway were among those he published—and he found in Wolfe a writer who equaled his highest idea of American genius. Reorganized and cut by about a third, the book appeared as Look Homeward, Angel in 1929. Despite the fact that book sales were generally down because of the Great Depression, it was a popular success and made Wolfe a celebrity.

Look Homeward, Angel is an extensive fictional re-creation of Wolfe's youth and of the members of his family; the hero, Eugene Gant, is Wolfe himself. Its picture of the mountain South is a substantial contribution to American regional writing. A sequel, Of Time and the River, came out in 1935 and was even more popular. Wolfe's autobiographical revelations offended some readers, including residents of Asheville and his own family. Only his mother appeared unperturbed by the merciless way in which he had put living people into print. Pro-German statements that he made in the mid-1930s angered many others, and he made numerous enemies. Maxwell Perkins's role came under critical scrutiny—one reviewer going so far as to suggest that Wolfe was only part author of his own books. In distress, Wolfe changed publishers.

In the summer of 1938 Wolfe, before a visit to the West Coast, delivered a crate of manuscript to his new editor, Edward Aswell of Harper's. The crate, he said, contained his next book. What it really contained were thousands of handwritten pages in no particular order. In Seattle, Wolfe contracted a case of pneumonia that developed serious complications. He died of a brain infection in September, and it was left to Aswell to work up two more books from the manuscript material, The Web and the Rock, published in 1939, and You Can't Go Home Again, published in 1940. Although these books have a new hero, George Webber, they continue Wolfe's autobiographical saga. Wolfe's reputation suffered after his death for what was deemed his lack of artistry: his formlessness and prolixity in an age where criticism called for tight structure and verbal economy. Those who admire his work point to his treatment of childhood and adolescence, his depiction of the mountain South, and his romantically nostalgic evocations of lost happiness.

"The Lost Boy" is a segment of the Gant saga, with different names for the characters, that was not used in the novels. It was published as a short story in 1937. As noted, Grover Cleveland Wolfe, Thomas Wolfe's brother, died at the age of eleven when the author-to-be was just four. In 1904 Julia Wolfe took some of the children, including Tom and Grover, to St. Louis, where the World's Fair was being held; there she ran a boardinghouse, the Carolina House, for some months. It was in St. Louis that Grover died of typhoid fever. In "The Lost Boy," Grover is called Robert. The story offers a four-angled view of him: (1) an episode involving Robert and his father, (2) a view of Robert through his mother's eyes, (3) an older sister's account of his illness and death, and (4) the attempt of the author-brother to recapture time and his lost brother by returning years later to the house in St. Louis where they had lived.

The text is from The Complete Short Stories of Thomas Wolfe (1987).

The Lost Boy¹

The light came and went, the booming strokes of three o'clock beat out across the town in thronging bronze, light winds of April blew the fountain out in rainbow sheets, until the plume returned and pulsed, as Robert turned into the Square. He was a child dark-eyed and grave, birthmarked upon his neck—a berry of warm brown—and with a gentle face, perhaps too quiet and listening for his years. The scuffed boy's shoes, the thick-ribbed stockings gartered at the knees, the short knee pants cut straight with three small useless buttons at the side, the sailor blouse, the old cap battered out of shape, perched sideways up on top the raven head—these friendly shabby garments, shaped by Robert, uttered him. He turned and passed along the north side of the Square, and in that moment felt the union of Forever and Now.

1. The text reproduces the story as it appeared in Redbook magazine in 1937. The story as collected in The Hills Beyond (1941) differs in many particulars from the version that appeared in Wolfe's lifetime.

Light came and went and came again; the great plume of the fountain pulsed, and the winds of April sheeted it across the Square in rainbow gossamer of spray. The street-cars ground into the Square from every portion of the town's small compass and halted briefly like wound toys in their old quarter-hourly formula of assembled Eight. The courthouse bell boomed out its solemn warning of immediate Three, and everything was just the same as it had always been.

He saw with quiet eyes that haggis² of vexed shapes, that hodge-podge of ill-sorted masonries, and he did not feel lost. For "Here," thought Robert, "here's the Square as it has always been—and Papa's shop, the fire department and the city hall, the fountain pulsing with its plume, the drug-store on the corner there, the row of old brick buildings on this side, the people passing and the cars that come and go, the light that comes and changes and that always will come back again, and everything that comes and goes and changes in the Square, and yet will be the same—here," Robert thought, "here is the Square that never changes; here is Robert almost twelve—and here is Time."

For so it seemed to him: small center of his little universe, itself the accidental masonry of twenty years, the chance agglomerate of time and of disrupted strivings, it was for him earth's pivot and the granite core of changelessness, the eternal Place where all things came and passed, the Place that would abide forever and would never change.

The Square walked past him then with steady steps—plume, pulse, and fountain, and the sheeting spray, the open arches of the fire department doors, the wooden stomp of the great hoofs, the casual whiskings of the dry coarse tails. He passed the firetrap of a wiener stand; and the Singer³ shop, the steel-bright smartness of the new machines, with their swift evocations of the house, the whir, the treadle, and the mounting hum—the vague monotony of women's work. He passed the music-store, the confined splendor of piano shapes, the deep-toned richness, and the smell of proud dark wood, the stale yet pleasant memory of parlors.

He passed the grocery store then, the gaunt gray horse, the old head leaning to its hitching block; within, the pickle-barrels, the fans, the sultry coffee and the cloven cheese, the musty compost of cool plenty, the delicious All-Smell, and the buttered unction of the grocer with his straw-cuffed sleeves.

He was going past the hardware store now. He always had to stop by places that had shining perfect things in them, and windows full of geometric tools, of hammers, saws, and planing-boards, and strong new rakes and hoes with unworn handles of white perfect wood, stamped hard and vivid with the maker's seal. Ah, how he loved such things as these, strong perfect shapes and pungent smells, the great integrities of use and need, the certitude of this unchanging pattern, set to the grand assurance of the everlasting Square. He turned a corner, and he was caught, held. A waft of air, warm, chocolate-laden, filled his nostrils. He tried to pass the white front of the little eight-foot shop; he paused, struggling with conscience; he could not go on. It was the little candy-shop run by old Crocker and his wife. And Robert could not pass.

"Old stingy Crockers!" he thought scornfully. "I'll not go there again. They're so stingy they stop the clocks at night. But—" The maddening fragrance of rich cooking chocolate touched him once again. "I'll just look in the window and see what they've got." He paused a moment, looking with his dark and quiet eyes into the window of the candy shop. His dark eyes rested for a moment on a tray of chocolate drops. Unconsciously he licked his lips. Put one of them upon your tongue and it just melted there like honey. And then the trays full of rich home-made fudge. He looked longingly at the deep body of the chocolate fudge, reflectively at the maple walnut, more critically, yet with longing, at the mints, the nougatines, and all the other tempters.

2. I.e., pudding.

3. Manufacturer of sewing machines.

"Old stingy Crockers!" Robert muttered once again, and turned to go. "I wouldn't go in there again."

And yet—he did not go away. "Old stingy Crockers," it was true; still, they did make the best candy in town, the best, in fact, that he had ever tasted.

He looked through the window back into the little shop and saw Mrs. Crocker there. A customer had made a purchase, and as Robert looked, he saw Mrs. Crocker, with her little wrenny⁴ face, lean over and peer primly at the scales. She had a piece of fudge in her clean bony fingers—and now she broke it, primly, in her little bony hands. She dropped a morsel down into the scales. They weighted down alarmingly, and her thin lips tightened. She snatched a piece of fudge out of the scales and broke it carefully once again. This time the scale wavered, went down very slowly, and came back again. Mrs. Crocker carefully put the reclaimed piece of fudge back in the tray, put the remainder in a paper bag, folded it and gave it to the customer, counted the money carefully, and doled it out into the till.

Robert stood there, looking scornfully. "Old stingy Crocker—afraid that she might give a crumb away."

He grunted, and again he turned to go. But now Mr. Crocker came out from the little partitioned place behind, bearing a tray of fresh-made candy in his skinny hands. Old man Crocker rocked along the counter to the front and put it down. He was a cripple. One leg was inches shorter than the other, and on this leg there was an enormous thick-soled boot, with a kind of wooden rocker-like arrangement, six inches high at least, to make up for the deficiency of his game right leg. And on this wooden cradle Mr. Crocker rocked along. He was a little pinched and skinny figure of a man with bony hands and meager features, and when he walked, he really rocked along, with a kind of prim and apprehensive little smile, as if he was afraid he was going to lose something.

"Old stingy Crocker," muttered Robert. "Humph! He wouldn't give you anything."

And yet he did not go away. He hung there curiously, peering through the window, with his dark and gentle face now focused and intent, flattening his nose against the glass. Unconsciously he scratched the thick-ribbed fabric of one stockinged leg with the scuffed toe of his old shoe. The fresh warm odor of the new-made fudge had reached him. It was delicious. It was a little maddening. Half-consciously, he began to fumble in one trouser pocket and pulled out his purse, a shabby worn old black one with a twisted clasp. He opened it and prowled about inside.

4. Wrenlike; Wolfe's invented word. The wren is a small, wide-eyed, active bird.

What he found was not inspiring: a nickel and two pennies and—he had forgotten them—the stamps. He took the stamps out and unfolded them. There were five twos, eight ones, all that remained of the dollar and sixty cents' worth which Reed, the pharmacist, had given him for running errands a week or two before.

"Old Crocker," Robert thought, looked somberly at the grotesque little form and—"Well—" indefinitely—"He's had all the rest of them. He might as well take these."

So, soothing conscience with this sop of scorn, he went into the shop, and pointing with a slightly grimy finger at the fresh-made tray of chocolate fudge, he said: "I'll take fifteen cents' worth of this, Mr. Crocker."

He paused a moment, fighting with embarrassment; then he lifted his dark face and said quietly: "And please, I'll have to give you stamps again."

Mr. Crocker made no answer. He pressed his lips together. Then he got the candy scoop, slid open the door of the glass case, put fudge into the scoop, and rocking to the scales, began to weigh the candy out. Robert watched him as he peered and squinted, watched him purse his lips together, saw him take a piece of fudge and break it into two parts. And then old Crocker broke two parts in two. He weighed, he squinted, he hovered, until it seemed to Robert that by calling Mrs. Crocker stingy he had been guilty of a rank injustice. But finally the scales hung there, quivering apprehensively, upon the very hair-line of nervous balance, as if even the scales were afraid that one more move from old man Crocker and they would be undone.

Mr. Crocker took the candy, dumped it into a paper bag, and rocking back along the counter toward the boy, he said: "Where are the stamps?" Robert gave them to him. Mr. Crocker relinquished his claw-like hold on the bag and set it down upon the counter. Robert took the bag and then remembered. "Mr. Crocker,"—again he felt the old embarrassment that was almost like strong pain,—"I gave you too much," Robert said. "There were eighteen cents in stamps. You—you can just give me three ones back."

Mr. Crocker did not answer for a moment. He was busy unfolding the stamps and flattening them out on top of the glass counter. When he had done so, he peered at them sharply, for a moment, thrusting his scrawny neck forward and running his eye up and down, as a bookkeeper who tots up rows of figures.

Then he said tartly: "I don't like this kind of business. I'm not a post office. The next time you come in here and want anything, you'll have to have the money for it."

Hot anger rose in Robert's throat. His olive face suffused with angry color. His tarry eyes got black and bright. For a moment he was on the verge of saying: "Then why did you take my other stamps? Why do you tell me now, when you have taken all the stamps I had, that you don't want them?"

But he was a quiet, gentle, gravely thoughtful boy, and he had been taught how to respect his elders. So he just stood there looking with his tar-black eyes. Old Man Crocker took the stamps up in his thin, parched fingers, and turning, rocked away down to the till.

He took the twos and laid them in one rounded scallop, then took the ones and folded them and put them in the one next to it. Then he closed the till and started to rock off, down toward the other end. Robert kept looking at him, but Mr. Crocker did not look at Robert. Instead, he began to take some cardboard shapes and fold them into boxes.

In a moment Robert said: "Mr. Crocker, will you give me the three ones, please?"

Mr. Crocker did not answer. But Mrs. Crocker, also folding boxes with her parsley hands, muttered tartly: "Hm! I'd give him nothing!"

Mr. Crocker looked at Robert: "What are you waiting for?"

"Will you give me the three ones, please?" Robert said.

"I'll give you nothing," Mr. Crocker said. "Now you get out of here! And don't you come here with any more of those stamps."

"I should like to know where he gets them, that's what I should like to know," said Mrs. Crocker.

"You get out of here," said Mr. Crocker. "And don't you come back here with any stamps. . . . Where did you get those stamps?" he said.

"That's just what I've been thinking," Mrs. Crocker said.

"You've been coming in here for the last two weeks with stamps," said Mr. Crocker. "I don't like the look of it. Where did you get those stamps?" he said.

"That's what I've been thinking all along," said Mrs. Crocker.

Robert had got white underneath his olive skin. His eyes had lost their luster. They looked like dull, stunned balls of tar. "From Mr. Reed," he said. "I got the stamps from Mr. Reed." He burst out desperately: "Mr. Crocker, Mr. Reed will tell you how I got the stamps. I did some work for Mr. Reed; he gave me those stamps two weeks ago."

"Mr. Reed," said Mrs. Crocker acidly. "I call it mighty funny."

"Mr. Crocker," Robert said, "if you'll just let me have the three ones—"

"You get out of here, boy!" cried Mr. Crocker. "Now don't you come in here again! There's something funny about this whole business! If you can't pay as other people do, then I don't want your trade."

"Mr. Crocker," Robert said again, and underneath the olive skin his face was gray, "if you'll just let me have those three—"

"You get out of here," Mr. Crocker cried, and began to rock forward toward the boy. "If you don't get out—"

"I'd call a policeman, that's what I'd do," Mrs. Crocker said.

Mr. Crocker came rocking up to Robert, took the boy and pushed him with his bony little hands. Robert felt sick and gray down to the hollow pit of his stomach.

"You've got to give me those three ones," he said.

"You get out of here!" shrilled Mr. Crocker. He seized the screen door, pulled it open and pushed Robert out. "Don't you come back in here," he said, pausing for a moment, working thinly at the lips. Then he turned and rocked back in the shop again. Robert stood there on the pavement. And light came and went and came again.

The boy stood there for a moment, and a wagon rattled past. There were some people passing by, but Robert did not notice them. He stood there blindly, in the watches of the sun, but something had gone out of the day.

He felt the soul-sickening guilt that all the children, all the good men of the earth, have felt since time began. And even anger had been drowned out, in the swelling tide of guilt. "There is the Square," thought Robert as before.

“This is Now. There is my father’s shop. And all of it is as it has always been—save I.”

And the Square reeled drunkenly around him, light went in blind gray motes before his eyes, the fountain sheeted out to rainbow iridescence and returned to its proud pulsing plume again. But all the brightness had gone out of day.

The scuffed boots of the lost boy moved and stumbled blindly over. The numb feet crossed the pavement—reached the sidewalk, crossed the plotted central Square—the grass plots, the flower-beds, so soon with red and packed geraniums.

“I want to be alone,” thought Robert, “where I can not go near him. Oh, God, I hope he never hears, that no one ever tells him—”

The plume blew out; the iridescent sheet of spray blew over him. He passed through, found the other side and crossed the street. “Oh, God, if Papa ever hears,” thought Robert, as his numb feet started up the steps into his father’s shop.

He found and felt the steps—the thickness of old lumber twenty feet in length. He saw it all: the iron columns on his father’s porch, painted with the dull anomalous black-green that all such columns in this land and weather come to; two angels, fly-specked, and the waiting stones. Beyond and all around, in the stonecutter’s shop, cold shapes of white and marble, rounded stone, the limestone base, the languid angel with strong marble hands of love.

He went on down the aisle; the white shapes stood around him. He went on back into the workroom. This he knew—the little cast-iron stove in the left-hand corner, the high, dirty window, looking down across the market square, the rude old shelves, upon the shelves the chisels and a layer of stone dust; an emery wheel with pump tread, and two trestles of coarse wood upon which rested gravestones. At one trestle was a man, at work.

The boy looked numbly, saw the name was Creasman: the carved analysis of John, the symmetry of S, the fine finality of Creasman—November, Nineteen-Three.

The man looked up and then returned to work. He was a man of fifty-three, immensely long and tall and gaunt. He wore good dark clothes, save he had no coat. He worked in shirt-sleeves with his vest on, a strong watch-chain stretching across his vest; wing collar and black tie, Adam’s apple, bony forehead, bony nose, light eyes, gray-green, undeep and cold, and somehow lonely-looking, a striped apron going up around his shoulders, and starched cuffs. And in one hand a tremendous rounded wooden mallet like a butcher’s bole; and in his other hand, implacable and cold, the chisel.

“How are you, son?”

He did not look up as he spoke. He spoke quietly, absently. He worked upon the chisel and the wooden mallet as delicately as a jeweler might work upon a watch, except that in the man and the wooden mallet there was power, too.

“What is it, son?” he said.

He moved around the table from the head, and started up on J again.

“Papa, I never stole the stamps,” said Robert.

The man put down the mallet, laid the chisel down. He came around the trestle.

"What?" he said. And Robert winked his tar-black eyes; they brightened; the hot tears shot out. "I never stole the stamps," he said.

"Hey? What is this?" the man said. "What stamps?"

"That Mr. Reed gave to me, when the other boy was sick and I worked there for three days. . . . And old man Crocker," Robert said, "he took all the stamps. And I told him Mr. Reed had given them to me. And now he owes me three ones—and old man Crocker says—he says—I must have taken them."

"The stamps that Reed gave to you—hey?" the stonecutter said. "The stamps you had—" He wet his great thumb briefly on his lips, strode from his workshop out into the storeroom aisle.

The man came back, cleared his throat, and as he passed the old gray board-partition of his office, he cleared his throat and wet his thumb, and said: "I tell you, now—"

Then he turned and strode up toward the front again and cleared his throat and said: "I tell you, now—" And coming back, along the aisle between the rows of marshaled gravestones, he muttered underneath his breath: "By God, now—"

He took Robert by the hand. They went out flying down along the aisle by all the gravestones, the fly-specked angels waiting there, the wooden steps, across the cobbles and the central plot—across the whole thing, but they did not notice it.

And the fountain pulsed, the plume blew out in sheeted spray and swept across them, and an old gray horse, with a peaceful look about its torn lips, swucked up the cool, the flowing mountain water from the trough as Robert and his father went across the Square.

They went across the Square through the sheeted iridescence of the spray and to the other street and to the candy-shop. The man was dressed in his striped apron still; he was still holding Robert by the hand. He opened the screen door and stepped inside. "Give him the stamps," he said.

Mr. Crocker came rocking forward behind the counter, with a prim and careful look that now was somewhat like a smile. "It was just—" he said.

"Give him the stamps," the man said, and threw some coins down on the counter.

Mr. Crocker rocked away and got the stamps. "I just didn't know—" he said.

The stonecutter took the stamps and gave them to the boy. And Mr. Crocker took the coins.

"It was just that—" Mr. Crocker said, and smiled.

The man in the apron cleared his throat: "You never were a father," the man said. "You never knew the feeling of a child. And that is why you acted as you did. But a judgment is upon you. God has cursed you. He has afflicted you. He has made you lame and childless—and miserable as you are, you will go lame and childless to your grave—and be forgotten!"

And Crocker's wife kept kneading her bony little hands and said imploringly: "Oh, no—oh, don't say that! Please don't say that!"

The stonecutter, the breath still hoarse in him, left the store. Light came again into the day.

"Well, son," he said, and laid his hand on the boy's back. "Now don't you mind."

They walked across the Square, the sheeted spray of iridescent light swept out on them; a horse swizzled at the water-trough.

"Well, son," the gaunt man said again, "now don't you mind."

And he trod his own steps then with his great stride and went back again into his shop.

The lost boy stood upon the Square, close by the porch of his father's shop: light came again into the Square. A car curved in, upon the billboard of the car-end was a poster and some words: "St. Louis" and "Excursion" and "The Fair."

And light came and went into the Square, and Robert stood there thinking quietly: "Here is the Square that never changes; here is Time."

And light came and went and came again into the Square—but now not quite the same as it had done before. He saw that pattern of familiar shapes, and knew that they were just the same as they had always been. But something had gone out of the day, and something had come in again: out of the vision of those quiet eyes some brightness had been lost; into their vision some deeper color come. He could not say, he did not know through what transforming shadows life had passed within that quarter-hour. He only knew that something had been gained forever—something lost.

As we went down through Indiana—you were too young, child, to remember it, but I always think of all of you, the way you looked that morning, when we went down through Indiana, going to the Fair. All of the apple trees were coming out, and it was April; all of the trees were coming out; it was the beginning of the spring in Indiana, and everything was getting green. Of course we don't have farms at home like those in Indiana. The children had never seen such farms as those, and I reckon, kid-like, had to take it in.

So all of them kept running up and down the aisle—well, no, except for you and Robert—you were too young; you were just three; I kept you with me. As for Robert: well, I'm going to tell you about that. But the rest of them kept running up and down the aisle and from one window to another. They kept calling out and hollering to each other every time they saw something new. They kept trying to look out on all sides in every way at once, as if they wished they had eyes in the back of their heads. It was the first time any of them had been in Indiana, and I reckon, that, kid-like, it all seemed strange and new.

And so it seemed they couldn't get enough. It seemed they never could be still.

You see, they were excited about going to St. Louis and so curious over everything they saw. They couldn't help it, and they wanted to see everything. But "I'll vow," I said, "if you children don't sit down and rest, you'll be worn to a frazzle before we ever get to see St. Louis and the Fair!"

Except for Robert! He—no sir, not him! Now, boy, I want to tell you—I've raised the lot of you, and if I do say so, there wasn't a numbskull in the lot. But Robert! Well, you've all grown up now, all of you have gone away, and none of you are children any more. . . . And of course, I hope that, as the fellow says, you have reached the dignity of man's estate. . . . I suppose you have the judgment of a grown man. . . . But Robert! Robert had it, even then!

Oh, even as a child, you know—at a time I was almost afraid to trust the rest of you out of my sight—I could depend on Robert. I could send him anywhere, and I'd always know he'd get back safe, and do exactly what I told him to!

Why, I didn't even have to tell him—you could send that child to market and tell him what you wanted, and he'd come home with twice as much as you could get yourself for the same money.

Now you know, I've always been considered a good trader, but Robert! Why, it got so finally that your papa said to me: "You'd be better off if you just tell him what you want and leave the rest to him. For," your papa says, "damned if I don't believe he's a better trader than you are. . . . He gets more for the money than anyone I ever saw."

Well, I had to admit it, you know. . . . I had to own up then. . . . Robert, even as a child, was a far better trader than I was. . . . Why, yes, they told it on him all over town, you know. . . . They said all of the market men, all of the farmers, would begin to laugh when they saw him coming. They'd say, "Look out! Here's Robert! Here's one trader you're not going to fool!"

And they were right! . . . That child! . . . I'd say: "Robert, suppose you run uptown and see if they've got anything good to eat today. Suppose you take this dollar and just see what you can do with it."

Well, sir, that was all that was needed. The minute that you told that child that you depended on his judgment, he'd have gone to the ends of the earth for you—and let me tell you something, he wouldn't miss, either!

His eyes would get black as coals—oh, the way that child would look at you, the intelligence and sense in his expression! He'd say, "Yes, ma'am! Now don't you worry, Mamma, you leave it all to me—and I'll do good!" said Robert.

And he'd be off like a streak of lightning and oh, Lord! As your father said to me, "I've been living in this town for almost thirty years," he said, "and I thought I knew everything there was to know about it—but that child," your papa says, "he knows places that I never heard of!" Oh, he'd go right down there to that place below your papa's shop where the draymen used to park their wagons—or he'd go down there to those old lots on Concord Street where the farmers used to keep their wagons. And child that he was, he'd go right in among them, sir—Robert would!—go right in and barter with them like a grown man!

And he'd come home with things he'd bought that would make your eyes stick out. . . . Here he comes one time with another boy, dragging a great bushel basket full of ripe termaters⁵ between them. "Why, Robert," I says, "how on earth are we ever going to use them? Why, they'll go bad on us before we're half-way through them." "Well, Mamma," he says, "I know,"—oh, just as solemn as a judge—"but they were the last the man had," he says, "and he wanted to go home, and so I got them for ten cents," he says. "I thought it was a shame to let 'em go, and I figgered what we couldn't eat—why," says Robert, "you could put up!" Well, the way he said it, so earnest and so serious, I had to laugh. "But I'll vow," I said, "if you don't beat all!" . . . But that was Robert the way he was in those days! As everyone said, boy that he was, he had the sense and judgment of a grown man. . . . Child, child, I've seen you all grow up, and all of you were bright enough, but for all-round intelligence, judgment, and general ability, Robert surpassed the whole crowd. . . . I've never seen his equal, and everyone who knew him as a child will say the same.

5. Tomatoes.

So that's what I tell them now, when they ask me about all of you. I have to tell the truth. I always said that you were smart enough—but when they come around and brag to me about you, and I reckon how you have got on and have a kind of name—I don't let on to them, I never say a word. Why, yes! Why, here, you know—oh, 'long about a month ago, this feller comes. He said he came from New Jersey, or somewhere up in that part of the country—and he began to ask me all sorts of questions, what you were like when you were a boy and all such stuff as that.

I just pretended to study it all over; then I said, "Well, yes," real serious-like, you know. "Well, yes—I reckon I ought to know a little something about him: he was my child, just the same as all the others were; I brought him up just the the way I brought up all the others. And," I says—oh, just as solemn as you please, "he wasn't a bad sort of a boy. Why," I says, "up to the time that he was twelve years old he was just about the same as any other boy—a good average normal sort of fellow."

"Oh," he says. "But didn't you notice something? Didn't you notice how brilliant he was? He must have been more brilliant than the rest!"

"Well, now," I says, and pretended to study that all over, too. "Now let me see. . . . Yes," I says—I just looked him in the eye, as solemn as you please. "I guess he was a fairly bright sort of a boy. I never had no complaints to make of him on that score. He was bright enough," I says. "The only trouble with him was that he was lazy."

"Lazy!" he says—oh, you should have seen the look upon his face, you know—he jumped like someone had stuck a pin in him. "Lazy!" he says, "Why, you don't mean to tell me—"

"Yes," I says, "I was telling him the same thing myself the last time that I saw him. I told him it was a mighty lucky thing for him that he had the gift of gab. Of course, he went off to college and read a lot of books, and I reckon that's where he got this flow of language they say he has. . . . But as I said to him, 'Now look a-here,' I said, 'if you can earn your living doing a light easy class of work like this you do,' I says, 'you're mighty lucky, because none of the rest of your people had any such luck as that. They had to work hard for a living.'"

Oh, I told him, you know. I made no bones about it. And I tell you what—I wish you could have seen his face. It was a study.

"Well," he says, at last, "you've got to admit this, haven't you—he was the brightest boy you had, now wasn't he?"

I just looked at him a moment. I had to tell the truth. I couldn't fool him any longer. "No," I says. "He was a good bright boy—I have no complaint to make about him on that score; but the brightest boy I had, the one that surpassed all the rest of them in sense, and in understanding, and in judgment—the best boy that I had, the smartest boy I ever saw, was—well, it wasn't him," I said. "It was another one."

He looked at me a moment; then he said: "Which boy was that?"

Well, I just looked at him, and smiled. I shook my head. I wouldn't tell him. "I never brag about my own," I said. "You'll have to find out for yourself."

But—I'll have to tell you: the best one of the whole lot was—Robert!

. . . And when I think of Robert as he was long about that time, I always see him sitting there, so grave and earnest-like, with his nose pressed to the window, as we went down through Indiana in the morning, to the Fair.

So Robert sat beside this gentleman and looked out the window. I never knew the man—I never asked his name—but I tell you what! He was certainly a fine-looking, well-dressed, good substantial sort of man, and I could see that he had taken a great liking to Robert, and Robert sat there looking out, and then turned to this gentleman, as grave and earnest as a grown-up man, and says: “What kind of crops grow here, sir?” Well, this gentleman threw his head back and just ha-ha-ed. “Well, I’ll see if I can tell you,” says this gentleman, and then, you know, he talked to him, and Robert took it all in, as solemn as you please, and asked this gentleman every sort of question—what the trees were, what was growing there, how big the farms were—all sorts of questions, which this gentleman would answer, until I said: “I’ll vow, Robert! You’ll bother the very life out of this gentleman.”

The gentleman threw his head back and laughed right out. “Now you leave that boy alone. He’s all right,” he said. “He doesn’t bother me a bit, and if I know the answers to his questions, I will answer him. And if I don’t know, why, then, I’ll tell him so. But he’s all right,” he said, and put his arm around Robert’s shoulders. “You leave him alone. He doesn’t bother me a bit.”

And I can still remember how he looked, that morning, with his black eyes, his black hair, and with the birthmark on his neck—so grave, so serious, so earnest-like—as he looked out the windows at the apple trees, the farms, the barns, the houses, and the orchards, taking it all in because it was, I reckon, strange and new to him.

It was so long ago, but when I think of it, it all comes back, as if it happened yesterday. And all of you have grown up and gone away, and nothing is the same as it was then. But all of you were there with me that morning, and I guess I should remember how the others looked, but every time I think of it, I still see Robert just the way he was, the way he looked that morning when we went down through Indiana, by the river, to the Fair.

Can you remember how Robert used to look? . . . I mean the birthmark, the black eyes, the olive skin—the birthmark always showed because of those open sailor blouses kids used to wear. . . . But I guess you must have been too young. . . . I was looking at that old photograph the other day—that picture showing all of us before the house in Orchard Street? . . . You weren’t there. . . . You hadn’t arrived. . . . You remember how mad you used to get when we used to tell you that you were only a dish-rag hanging out in Heaven, when something happened?

I was looking at that old picture just the other day. There we were. . . . And my God, what is it all about? . . . I mean, when you see the way you were—Mary and Dick and Robert, Bill and all of us—and then—look at us now! Do you ever get to feeling funny? You know what I mean—do you ever get to feeling queer?—when you try to figure these things out. . . . You’ve been to college, and you ought to know the answer. . . . And I wish you’d tell me if you know. . . .

My Lord, when I think sometimes of the way I used to be—the dreams I used to have. . . . Taking singing lessons from Aunt Nell because I felt that some day I was going to have a great career in opera. . . . Can you beat it now? . . . Can you imagine it? . . . Me! In grand opera! . . . Now I want to ask you. . . . I'd like to know. . . .

My Lord! When I go uptown and look at all these funny-looking little boys and girls hanging around the drug-store—do you suppose any of them have ambitions the way we did? . . . Do you suppose any of these funny-looking little girls are thinking about a big career in opera? . . . Didn't you ever see that picture of us? It was made before the old house down on Orchard Street, with Papa standing there in his swallow-tail,⁶ and Mamma there beside him—and Robert and Dick and Jim, and Mary, Bill, and me, with our feet up on our bicycles.

Well, there I was, and my poor old skinny legs and long white dress, and two pigtails hanging down my back. And all the funny-looking clothes we wore, with the doo-lolly⁷ business on them. . . . But I guess you can't remember. You weren't born.

But—well, we were a right nice-looking set of people, if I do say so. And there was 86 the way it used to be, with the front porch, the grape-vines, and the flower-beds before the house. And Miss Martha standing there by Papa with a watch-charm pinned to her waist. . . . I shouldn't laugh, but Miss Martha. . . . Well, Mamma was a pretty woman then—and Papa in his swallow-tail was a good-looking man. Do you remember how he used to get dressed up on Sunday? And how grand he thought he was? And how wonderful that dinky little shop on the Square looked to us! . . . Can you beat it now? . . . Why, we thought that Papa was the biggest man in town and—oh, you can't tell me! You can't tell me! He had his faults, but Papa was a wonderful man. You know he was!

And there was Jim and Dick and Robert, Mary, Bill, and me lined up there before the house with one foot on our bicycles. . . . And I got to thinking back about it all. It all came back.

Do you remember anything about St. Louis? You were only three or four years old then, but you must remember something. . . . Do you remember how you used to bawl when I would scrub you? How you'd bawl for Robert? . . . Poor kid, you used to yell for Robert every time I'd get you in the tub. He was a sweet kid, and he was crazy about you: he almost brought you up.

That year Robert was working at the Inside Inn out on the Fair Grounds . . . Do you remember the old Inside Inn? That big old wooden thing inside the Fair? . . . And how I used to take you there to wait for Robert when he got through working? . . . And Billy Pelham at the news-stand, how he used to give you a stick of chewing-gum?

They were all crazy about Robert. . . . Everybody liked him. . . . And how proud Robert was of you! . . . Don't you remember how he used to show you off? . . . How he used to take you around and make you talk to Billy Pelham? . . . And Mr. Curtis at the desk? . . . And how Robert would try to make you talk and get you to say, "Robert"? And you couldn't pronounce the "r"—and you'd say "Wobbut." Have you forgotten that? . . . You shouldn't forget that, because . . . you were a cute kid, then . . . Ho-ho-ho-ho. . . . I don't know where it's gone to, but you were a big hit in those days. . . .

6. Formal coat.

7. Dressy, showy (colloquial).

And I was thinking of it all the other day: how we used to go and meet Robert there and how he'd take us to the Midway. . . . Do you remember the Midway? The Snake-Eater and the Living Skeleton, the Fat Woman and the Shoot the Chute, the Scenic Railway and the Ferris Wheel? . . . How you bawled the night we took you up on the Ferris Wheel! You yelled your head off. . . . I tried to laugh it off, but I tell you, I was scared myself. . . . And how Robert laughed at us and told us there was no danger. . . . My Lord, poor little Robert! He was only twelve years old at the time, but he seemed so grown-up to us. I was two years older, but I thought he knew it all.

It was always that way with him. . . . Looking back now, it sometimes seems that it was Robert who brought us up. He was always looking after us, telling us what to do, bringing us something—some ice-cream or some candy, something he had bought out of the poor little money he'd got at the Inn. . . .

Then I got to thinking of the afternoon we sneaked away from home. . . . Mamma had gone out somewhere. And Robert and I got on the street-car and came downtown. . . . And my Lord, in those days, that was what we called a trip. A ride on the street-car was something to write home about in those days. . . . I hear that it's all built up around there now.

So we got on the car and rode the whole way down into the business section of St. Louis. Robert took me into a drug-store and set me up to⁸ soda-water. Then we came out and walked around some, down to the Union Station and clear over to the river. . . . And both of us half scared to death at what we'd done and wondering what Mamma would say if she found out.

We stayed there till it was getting dark, and we passed by a lunch-room—an old joint with one-armed chairs and people eating at the counter. . . . We read all the signs to see what they had to eat and how much it cost, and I guess nothing on the menu was more than fifteen cents, but it couldn't have looked grander to us if it had been Delmonico's.⁹ . . . So we stood there with our noses pressed against the window, looking in. . . . Two skinny little kids, both of us scared half to death, getting the thrill of a lifetime out of it. . . . You know what I mean? . . . And smelling everything with all our might and thinking how good it all smelled. . . . Then Robert turned to me and whispered, "Come on, Sue. . . . Let's go in. . . . It says fifteen cents for pork and beans. And I've got money," Robert said. "I've got sixty cents."

I was so scared I couldn't speak. . . . I'd never been in a place like that before. . . . But I kept thinking, "Oh, Lord, if Mamma should find out!" . . . Don't you know how it is when you're a kid? It was the thrill of a lifetime. . . . I couldn't resist. So we both went in and ordered pork and beans and a cup of coffee. . . . I suppose we were too frightened at what we'd done really to enjoy anything. We just gobbled it all up in a hurry, and gulped our coffee down. And I don't know whether it was the excitement—I guess the poor kid was already sick when we came in there and didn't know it. But I turned and looked at him, and he was as white as death. . . . And when I asked him what was the matter, he wouldn't tell me. . . . He was too proud. He said he was all right, but I could see that he was sick as a dog. . . . So

8. Treated me to (slang).

9. A famous and expensive restaurant in New York City.

he paid the bill. . . . It came to forty cents; I'll never forget that as long as I live. . . . And sure enough, we no more than got out the door—he'd hardly time to reach the curb—before it all came up. . . .

And the poor kid was so scared and so ashamed. What scared him so was not that he had got sick but that he had spent all that money, and it had come to nothing. And Mamma would find out. . . . Poor kid, he just stood there looking at me and he whispered, "Oh, Sue, don't tell Mamma. She'll be mad if she finds out." Then we hurried home, and he was still white as a sheet when we got there.

Mamma was waiting for us. . . . She looked at us—you know how Miss Martha looks at you, when she thinks you've been doing something that you shouldn't? . . . Mamma said: "Why, where on earth have you two children been?" I guess she was all set to lay us out. Then she took one look at Robert's face. That was enough for her. She said: "Why, child, what in the world—" She was white as a sheet herself. . . . And all that Robert said was "Mamma, I feel sick."

He was sick as a dog. He fell over on the bed, and we undressed him, and Mamma put her hand upon his forehead and came out in the hall—she was so white you could have made a black mark on her face with chalk—and whispered to me:

"Go and get the doctor quick; he's burning up."

And I went running, my pigtails flying, to get Dr. Packer. I brought him back with me. When he came out of Robert's room, he told Mamma what to do, but I don't know if she even heard him.

Her face was white as a sheet. She looked at me and looked right through me. . . . And oh, my Lord, I'll never forget the way she looked, the way my heart stopped and came up in my throat. . . . I was only a skinny little kid of fourteen. But she looked as if she was dying right before my eyes. . . . And I knew that if anything happened to him, she'd never get over it, if she lived to be a hundred.

Poor old Mamma. You know, he always was her eyeballs¹—you know that, don't you?—Not the rest of us!—No, sir! I know what I'm talking about. It always has been Robert—she always thought more of him than she did of any of the others and—Poor kid! I can see him lying there white as a sheet and remember how sick he was, and how scared I was! . . . I don't know why—all we'd done had been to sneak away from home and go to a lunch-room—but I felt guilty about the whole thing, as if it was my fault. . . .

It all came back to me the other day when I was looking at that picture, and I thought, my God, we were two kids together, and I was only two years older than Robert was. . . . And now I'm forty-six. . . . Can you imagine that—the way we all grow up and change and go away? . . . And my Lord, Robert seemed so grown-up to me even then. He was only a kid; yet he seemed older than the rest of us.

I was thinking of it just the other day, and I wonder what Robert would say now if he could see that picture. For when you look at it, it all comes back—the boarding house, St. Louis and the Fair. . . . And all of it is just the same as it has always been, as if it happened yesterday. . . . And all of us have grown up and gone away. And nothing has turned out the way we thought it would. . . . And all my hopes and dreams and big ambitions have come to nothing.

1. Favorite (slang).

It's all so long ago, as if it happened in another world. And then it all comes back, as if it happened yesterday. . . . And sometimes I will lie awake at night and think of all the people who have come and gone, and all the things that happened. And hear the trains down by the river, and the whistles and the bell. . . . And how we went to St. Louis back in 1904.

And then I go out into the street and see the faces of the people that I pass. . . . Don't you see something funny in their eyes, as if they were wondering what had happened to them since they were kids—what it was that they had lost? . . . Now am I crazy, or do they look that way to you?

My God, I'd like to find out what is wrong. . . . What has changed since then. . . . And if we have that same queer funny look in our eyes, too. . . . And if it happens to us all, to everyone. . . . Robert and Jim and Dick and me—all standing there before that house on Orchard Street—and then you see the way we were—and how it all gets lost. . . .

The way it all turns out is nothing like the way we thought that it would be. . . . And how it all gets lost, until it seems that it has never happened—that it is something that we dreamed somewhere. . . . You see what I mean now? . . . That it is something that we hear somewhere, that it happened to someone else. . . . And then it all comes back again.

And there you are, two funny, frightened, skinny little kids with their noses pressed against a dirty window thirty years ago. . . . The way it felt, the way it smelled, even the funny smell in that old pantry of our house. And the steps before the house, the way the rooms looked. Those two little boys in sailor suits who used to ride up and down before the house on their tricycles. . . . And the birthmark on Robert's neck. . . . The Inside Inn. . . . St. Louis and the Fair. . . . It all comes back as if it happened yesterday. And then it goes away and seems farther off and stranger than if it happened in a dream.

"This is King's Highway," a man said. I looked and saw that it was just a street. There were some new buildings, and a big hotel; some restaurants, "bar-grill" places of the modern kind, the livid monotone of neon lights, the ceaseless traffic of the motorcars—all this was new, but it was just a street. And I knew that it had always been a street and nothing more. But somehow—I stood there looking at it, wondering what else I had expected to find.

The man kept looking at me, and I asked him if the Fair had been out this way.

"Sure, the Fair was out beyond here," the man said. "Where the park is now. But this street you're looking for? Don't you remember the name of the street or nothing?"

I said I thought the name was Edgemont Street, but that I was not sure. And I said the house was on the corner of this street and another street. And then the man said, "What street was that?" I said I did not know, but that King's Highway was a block or so away and that an interurban line ran past about a block or so from where we lived.

"What line was this?" the man said, and stared at me.

"The interurban line," I said.

Then he stared at me again and finally, “I don’t know no interurban line,” he said.

I said it was a line that ran behind some houses and that there were board fences there and grass beside the tracks. But somehow I could not say that it was summer in those days and that you could smell the ties, a kind of wooden tarry smell, and feel a kind of absence in the afternoon, after the car had gone. I could not say that King’s Highway had not been a street in those days but a kind of road that wound from magic out of some dim land, and that along the way it had got mixed with Tom the Piper’s son, with hot cross buns,² with all the light that came and went, and with cloud shadows passing on the mountains, with coming down through Indiana in the morning, and the smell of engine smoke, the Union Station, and most of all with voices lost and far and long ago that said, “King’s Highway.”

I didn’t say those things about King’s Highway because I looked about me and I saw what King’s Highway was. I left him then and went on till I found the place. And again, again, I turned into the street, finding the place where the two corners meet, the huddled block, the turret, and the steps, and paused a moment, looking back, as if the street was Time.

So I waited for a moment for a word, for a door to open, for the child to come. I waited, but no words were spoken; no one came.

Yet all of it was just as it had always been except the steps were lower and the porch less high, the strip of grass less wide than I had thought. A gray-stone front, St. Louis style, three-storied, with a slant slate roof, the side red brick and windowed, still with the old arched entrance in the center for the doctor’s use.

There was a tree in front, a lamp-post, and behind and to the side more trees than I had known there would be. And all the slaty turret gables, all the slaty window gables going into points, the two arched windows, in strong stone, in the front room.

It was all so strong, so solid and so ugly—and so enduring and good, the way I had remembered it, except I did not smell the tar, the hot and caulky dryness of the old cracked ties, the boards of backyard fences and the coarse and sultry grass, and absence in the afternoon when the street-car had gone, and the feel of the hot afternoon, and that everyone was absent at the Fair.

It was a hot day. Darkness had come; the heat hung and sweltered like a sodden blanket in St. Louis. The heat soaked down, and the people sweltered in it; the faces of the people were pale and greasy with the heat. And in their faces was a kind of patient wretchedness, and one felt the kind of desolation that one feels at the end of a hot day in a great city in America—when one’s home is far away across the continent, and he thinks of all that distance, all that heat, and feels: “Oh, God, but it’s a big country!”

Then he hears the engine and the wheel again, the wailing whistle and the bell, the sound of shifting in the sweltering yard, and walks the street, and walks the street, beneath the clusters of hard lights, and by the people with sagged faces, and is drowned in desolation and no belief.

He feels the way one feels when one comes back, and knows that he should not have come, and when he sees that, after all, King’s Highway is—a street; and St. Louis—the enchanted name—a big hot common town upon the river, sweltering in wet dreary heat, and not quite South, and nothing else enough to make it better.

2. I.e., Mother Goose nursery rhymes.

It had not been like this before. I could remember how it got hot in the afternoons, and how I would feel a sense of absence and vague sadness when everyone had gone away. The house would seem so lonely, and sometimes I would sit inside, on the second step of the hall stairs, and listen to the sound of silence and absence in the afternoon. I could smell the oil upon the floor and on the stairs, and see the sliding doors with their brown varnish and the beady chains across the door, and thrust my hand among the beady chains, and gather them together in my arms, and let them clash, and swish with light beady swishings all round me. I could feel darkness, absence, and stained light, within the house, through the stained glass of the window on the stairs, through the small stained glasses by the door, stained light and absence, and vague sadness in the house in a hot mid-afternoon. And all these things themselves would have a kind of life: would seem to wait attentively, to be most living and most still.

Then I would long for evening and return, the slant of light, and feet along the street, the sharp-faced twins in sailor-suits upon their tricycles, the smell of supper and the sound of voices in the house again, and Robert coming from the Fair.

And again, again, I turned into the street, finding the place where two corners meet, turning at last to see if Time was there. I passed the house; some lights were burning in the house; the door was open, and a woman sat upon the porch. And presently I turned and stopped before the house again. I stood looking at it for a moment, and I put my foot upon the step.

Then I said to the woman who was sitting on the porch: "This house—excuse me, but could you tell me, please, who lives here?"

I know my words were strange and hollow and I had not said what I wished to say. She stared at me a moment, puzzled.

Then she said: "I live here. Who are you looking for?"

I said, "Why, I am looking for—There used to be a house—" I said.

The woman was now staring hard at me.

"I used to live here in this house," I said.

She was silent for a moment; then she said: "When was it that you lived here?"

"In 1904."

Again she was silent, looking at me for a moment. Then presently: "Oh. . . . That was the year of the Fair. You were here then?"

"Yes." I now spoke rapidly, with more confidence: "My mother had the house, and we were here for seven months. . . . And the house belonged to Dr. Packer," I went on. "We rented it from him."

"Yes," the woman said, and nodded now. "This was Dr. Packer's house. He's been dead for many years. But this was the Packer house, all right."

"That entrance on the side," I said, "where the steps go up—that was for Dr. Packer's patients. That was the entrance to his office."

"Oh," the woman said, "I didn't know that. I've often wondered what it was. I didn't know what it was for."

"And this big room here in front," I said, "that was the office. And there were sliding doors, and next to it a kind of alcove for his patients."

"Yes, the alcove is still there, only all of it has been made into one room now—and I never knew just what the alcove was for."

"And there were sliding doors on this side, too, that opened on the hall—and a stairway going up upon this side. And halfway up the stairway, at the landing, a little window of stained glass—and across the sliding doors here in the hall a kind of curtain made of strings of beads."

She nodded, smiling. "Yes, it's just the same—we still have the sliding doors and the stained glass window on the stairs. There's no bead curtain any more," she said, "but I remember when people had them. I know what you mean."

"When we were here," I said, "we used the Doctor's office for a parlor—except later on, the last month or two; and then we used it for a bedroom."

"It is a bedroom now," she said. "I rent rooms—all of the rooms upstairs are rented—but I have two brothers and they sleep in this front room."

And we were silent for a moment; then I said, "My brother stayed there, too."

"In the front room?" the woman said.

I answered: "Yes."

She paused a moment; then she said: "Won't you come in? I don't believe it's changed much. Would you like to see?"

I thanked her and said I would, and I went up the steps. She opened the screen door, and I went in.

And it was just the same—the stairs, the hallway, and the sliding doors, the window of stained glass upon the stairs. All of it was just the same except the stained light of absence in the afternoon, and the child who sat there, waiting on the stairs, and something fading like a dream, something coming like a light, something going, passing, fading like the shadows of a wood. And then it would be gone again, fading like cloud shadows in the hills, coming like the vast, the drowsy rumors of the distant enchanted Fair, and coming, going, coming, being found and lost, possessed and held and never captured, like lost voices in the mountains, long ago, like the dark eyes and the quiet face, the dark lost boy, my brother, who himself like shadows, or like absence in the house, would come, would go, and would return again.

The woman took me into the house and through the hall. I told her of the pantry, and I told her where it was and pointed to the place, but now it was no longer there. And I told her of the back yard, and the old board fence around the yard. But the old board fence was gone. And I told her of the carriage-house, and told her it was painted red. But now there was a small garage. And the back yard was still there, but smaller than I thought, and now there was a tree.

"I did not know there was a tree," I said. "I do not remember any tree."

"Perhaps it wasn't there," she said. "A tree could grow in thirty years." And then we came back through the house and paused a moment at the sliding doors.

"And could I see this room?" I said.

She slid the doors back. They slid open smoothly, with a kind of rolling heaviness, as they used to do. And then I saw the room again. It was the same. There was a window to the side, the two arched windows to the front, the alcove and the sliding doors, the fireplace with the tiles of mottled green, the mantel of dark mission wood, a dresser and a bed, just where the dresser and the bed had been so long ago.

"Is this the room?" the woman said. "It hasn't changed?"

I told her it was the same.

"And your brother slept here where my brothers sleep?"

"This was his room," I said.

And we were silent for a moment. Then I turned to go, and said: "Well, thank you. I appreciate your showing me."

The woman said that she was glad and that it was no trouble. And she said, "And when you see your family, you can tell them that you saw the house," she said. "And my name is Mrs. Bell. You can tell your mother that a Mrs. Bell has got the house. And when you see your brother, you can tell him that you saw the room he slept in, and that you found it just the same."

I told her then that he was dead.

The woman was silent for a moment. Then she looked at me and said: "He died here, didn't he? In this room?"

I told her that he did.

"Well, then," she said, "I knew it. I don't know how. But when you told me he was here, I knew it."

I said nothing. In a moment the woman said: "What did he die of?"

"Typhoid."

She looked shocked and troubled, and began involuntarily:

"My two brothers—"

"That was so long ago," I said. "I don't think you need to worry now."

"Oh, I wasn't thinking about that," she said. . . . "It was just hearing that a little boy—your brother—was—was in this room that my two brothers sleep in now—"

"Well, maybe I shouldn't have told you then. But he was a good boy—and if you'd known him, you wouldn't mind."

She said nothing, and I added quickly: "Besides, he didn't stay here long. This wasn't really his room—but the night he came back with my sister, he was so sick—they didn't move him."

"Oh," the woman said, "I see." And in a moment: "Are you going to tell your mother you were here?"

"I don't think so."

"I—I wonder how she feels about this room."

"I don't know. She never speaks of it."

"Oh. . . . How old was he?"

"He was twelve."

"You must have been pretty young yourself."

"I was four."

"And—you just wanted to see the room, didn't you? Is that why you came back?"

"Yes."

"Well"—indefinitely—"I guess you've seen it now."

"Yes, thank you."

"I guess you don't remember much about him, do you? I shouldn't think you would."

"No, not much."

The years dropped off like fallen leaves: the face came back again—the soft dark oval, the dark eyes, the soft brown berry on the neck, the raven hair, all bending down, approaching—the whole ghost-wise, intent and instant, like faces from a haunted wood.

“Now say it: Robert!”

“Wobbut.”

“No, not Wobbut: Robert. . . . Say it.”

“Wobbut.”

“Ah-h—you didn't say it. . . . You said Wobbut: Robert! . . . Now say it.”

“Wobbut.”

“Look, I'll tell you what I'll do if you say it right. . . . Would you like to go down to King's Highway? Would you like Robert to set you up? All right, then. . . . If you say Robert right, I'll take you to King's Highway and set you up to ice-cream. . . . Now say it right: Say Robert.”

“Wobbut.”

“Ah-h you-u! . . . Old tongue-tie, that's what you are. Some day I'm going to. . . . Well, come on, then. I'll set you up, anyway.”

It all came back and faded and was lost again. I turned to go, and thanked the woman, and I said: “Good-bye.”

“Well, then, good-bye,” the woman said, and we shook hands. “I'm glad if I could show you. I'm glad if—” She did not finish, and at length she said: “Well, then, that was a long time ago. You'll find it all changed now, I guess. It's all built up around here now—way out beyond here, out beyond where the Fair grounds used to be. I guess you'll find it changed,” she said.

We could find no more to say. We stood there for a moment on the steps, and shook hands once more.

“Well, then, good-bye.”

And again, again, I turned into the street, finding the place where corners meet, turning to look again to see where Time had gone. And all of it was just the same, it seemed that it had never changed since then, except all had been found and caught and captured for forever. And so, finding all, I knew all had been lost.

I knew that I would never come again, and that lost magic would not come again, and that the light that came, that passed and went and that returned again, the memory of lost voices in the hills, cloud shadows passing in the mountains, the voices of our kinsmen long ago, the street, the heat, King's Highway, and the piper's son, the vast and drowsy murmur of the distant Fair—oh, strange and bitter miracle of Time—come back again.

But I knew that it could not come back—the cry of absence in the afternoon, the house that waited and the child that dreamed; and through the thicket of man's memory, from the enchanted wood, the dark eye and the quiet face,—poor child, life's stranger and life's exile, lost, like all of us, a cipher in blind mazes, long ago—my parent, friend, and brother, the lost boy, was gone forever and would not return.

STERLING BROWN

1901–1989

For much of his long and distinguished career Sterling Brown presented himself to the public mainly as a teacher and scholar of African American folk culture and written literature. During the Harlem Renaissance movement, however, he was also hailed as a technically accomplished and eloquent poet. Rediscovered by younger black poets in the late 1960s, Brown has since been called, to quote the poet Michael S. Harper, “a trustee of consciousness, and a national treasure.”

Born in Washington, D.C., and never resident in New York, Brown identified himself with the “New Negro” movement in general rather than with its particular manifestation in Harlem during the 1920s. “The New Negro,” he wrote in 1955, “is not to me a group of writers centered in Harlem during the second half of the twenties. Most of the writers were not Harlemites; much of the best writing was not about Harlem, which was the show-window, the cashier’s till, but no more Negro America than New York is America.” Brown viewed Harlem as the place where African American writing was publicized rather than produced, believing that the cosmopolitan and sophisticated New York writers themselves had not written representatively about, or from the perspective of, ordinary black people. While he himself was well educated and of middle-class background, Brown immersed himself deeply in the full range of African American popular expression—jazz, blues, spirituals, work songs, folk tales—so that his writing could reach beyond his own experience.

Brown’s father was the Reverend Sterling Nelson Brown, who had been born a slave but eventually attended Fisk University and Oberlin College and later became professor of religion at Howard University in Washington, D.C. Brown attended the academically oriented Dunbar High School, went to Williams College in 1918, and took a master’s degree at Harvard. He won a prize in 1925 for his first nationally published essay—a sketch of the tenor Roland Hayes that appeared in Opportunity—and thereby came to the attention of black intellectuals. While teaching at Virginia Seminary and College between 1926 and 1928, he met and married Daisy Turnbull. After brief teaching jobs at Fisk, Lincoln University in Missouri, and Atlanta University, he joined the faculty at Howard University in 1929, where he continued to teach until retirement. His first book, Outline for the Study of the Poetry of American Negroes (1931), was a pedagogical supplement to James Weldon Johnson’s Book of American Negro Poetry, including paper topics, study questions, definitions, and other material. Having published individual poems in magazines and newspapers, Brown brought out a collection of this work called Southern Road in 1932. It was highly praised by influential critics, many of whom were especially impressed with Brown’s technical virtuosity. Alain Locke, the major theorist of the New Negro movement, believed that the book came very close to his ideal of the “poetic portrayal of Negro folk-life . . . true in both letter and spirit to the idiom of the folk’s own way of feeling and thinking.” Despite such acclaim, the book did not sell widely—1932 was not a good year for publishing, and the Harlem Renaissance movement had ended abruptly with the onset of the Great Depression in 1929. Brown’s planned second book of poems, tentatively called No Hiding Place and ready for the press in 1935, was rejected by publishers for economic reasons.

After this setback Brown made little further effort to publish poetry and turned his energies into academic and administrative channels, always retaining his focus on African American culture. From 1936 to 1939 he was Negro affairs editor for the Federal Writers' Project, a government funding source for writers during the Depression years; he also worked on the staff of the "Carnegie-Myrdal Study of the Negro," the basis of a landmark study of race relations, An American Dilemma, written by the Swedish sociologists Gunnar Myrdal and Alva Myrdal and published shortly after the end of World War II. The Negro in American Fiction, a book of critical essays, and Negro Poetry and Drama, a literary history, both appeared in 1938. Together with Ulysses Lee and Arthur P. Davis, Brown edited the important anthology Negro Caravan (1941), collecting important examples of African American literature from its folk foundations to 1940. Over the years he published numerous essays, notes, and commentaries on African American literature, the role of blacks in American writing, black folklore, and black music; he was an acknowledged expert on all of these topics.

The civil rights movement of the 1960s motivated him to conduct lectures and poetry readings that brought him and his poetry back into national view. It became clear at this time that Alain Locke's earlier assessment of Brown was only partly true. Although in some sense Brown strove in his poetry to make a literary form appropriate to authentic black folk voices, he saw these voices not as raw folk data but as already artistically self-conscious. Blues, jazz, and spirituals were complex, expressive, culturally sophisticated forms. In addition, Brown deployed his speakers' voices not for the main purpose of celebrating the black folk tradition—though this was certainly part of his aim—but to expose and criticize racial injustice. Both his scholarly writing and his poetry call attention to African American achievements and deplore American racism.

The text of the poems printed here is from Collected Poems (1996).

Mister Samuel and Sam

Mister Samuel, he belong to Rotary,¹
 Sam to de Sons of Rest;²
 Both wear red hats³ lak monkey men,
 An' you cain't say which is de best.

Mister Samuel ride in a Cadillac, 5
 Sam ride in a Tin Lizzie Fo'd;
 Both spend their jack fo' gas an' oil,
 An' both git stuck on de road.

Mister Samuel speak in de Chamber of Commerce,
 Sam he speak in ch'uch; 10
 Both of 'em talk for a mighty long time,
 Widout sayin', Lawd knows, ve'y much.

Mister Samuel deal wid high finance,
 Sam deal in a two-bit game;
 Mister Samuel crashes, Sam goes broke, 15
 But deys busted jes' de same.

Mister Samuel wife speak sof' an' low,
 When dey gits in their weekly fight;

1. The National Association of Rotary Clubs, service clubs founded to bring together businessmen and professionals, was established in the United States in 1910.

2. A social club for industrial workers and retirees that emerged in the United Kingdom and the United States in the early 20th century. Colloquially, any group of idlers or hobos.

3. Associated with the Shriners, a fraternal organization founded in 1870, as well as with the monkeys who often accompanied organ grinders in the streets of U.S. cities.

Sam catches a broomstick crost his rear,
An' both of 'em's henpecked right. 20

Mister Samuel drinks his Canadian Rye,
Sam drinks his bootleg gin;
Both gits as high as a Georgia pine,
And both calls de doctor in.

Mister Samuel die, an' de folks all know, 25
Sam die widout no noise;
De worl' go by in de same ol' way,
And dey's both of 'em po' los' boys. . . .

1932, 1980

He Was a Man

It wasn't about no woman,
It wasn't about no rape,
He wasn't crazy, and he wasn't drunk,
An' it wasn't no shooting scrape,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 5

He wasn't no quarrelsome feller,
And he let other folks alone,
But he took a life, as a man will do,
In a fight for to save his own,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 10

He worked on his little homeplace
Down on the Eastern Shore;
He had his family, and he had his friends,
And he didn't expect much more,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 15

He wasn't nobody's great man,
He wasn't nobody's good,
Was a po' boy tried to get from life
What happiness he could,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 20

He didn't abuse Tom Wickley,
Said nothing when the white man curst,
But when Tom grabbed his gun, he pulled his own,
And his bullet got there first,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 25

Didn't catch him in no manhunt,
But they took him from a hospital bed,
Stretched on his back in the nigger ward,
With a bullet wound in his head,
He was a man, and they laid him down. 30

It didn't come off at midnight
Nor yet at the break of day,

It was in the broad noon daylight,
 When they put po' Will away,
 He was a man, and they laid him down. 35

Didn't take him to no swampland,
 Didn't take him to no woods,
 Didn't hide themselves, didn't have no masks,
 Didn't wear no Ku Klux hoods,
 He was a man, and they laid him down. 40

They strung him up on Main Street,
 On a tree in the Court House Square,
 And people came from miles around
 To enjoy a holiday there,
 He was a man, and they laid him down. 45

They hung him and they shot him,
 They piled packing cases around,
 They burnt up Will's black body,
 'Cause he shot a white man down;
 "He was a man, and we'll lay him down." 50

It wasn't no solemn business,
 Was more like a barbecue,
 The crackers yelled when the fire blazed,
 And the women and the children too—
 "He was a man, and we laid him down." 55

The Coroner and the Sheriff
 Said "Death by Hands Unknown."
 The mob broke up by midnight,
 "Another uppity Nigger gone—
 He was a man, an' we laid him down." 60

1932, 1980

Master and Man

The yellow ears are crammed in Mr. Cromartie's bin
 The wheat is tight sacked in Mr. Cromartie's barn.
 The timothy is stuffed in Mr. Cromartie's loft.
 The ploughs are lined up in Mr. Cromartie's shed.
 The cotton has gone to Mr. Cromartie's factor. 5
 The money is in Mr. Cromartie's bank.
 Mr. Cromartie's son made his frat at the college.
 Mr. Cromartie's daughter has got her new car.
 The veranda is old, but the fireplace is rosy.
 Well done, Mr. Cromartie. Time now for rest. 10

Blackened sticks line the furrows that Uncle Ned laid.
 Bits of fluff are in the corners where Uncle Ned ginned.
 The mules he ploughed are sleek in Mr. Cromartie's pastures.
 The hoes grow dull in Mr. Cromartie's shed.

His winter rations wait on the commissary shelves; 15
 Mr. Cromartie's ledger is there for his service.
 Uncle Ned daubs some mortar between the old logs.
 His children have traipsed off to God knows where.
 His old lady sits patching the old, thin denims;
 She's got a new dress, and his young one a doll, 20
 He's got five dollars. The year has come round.
 The harvest is over: Uncle Ned's harvesting,
 Mr. Cromartie's harvest. Time now for rest.

1936, 1980

Break of Day

Big Jess fired on the Alabama Central,
 Man in full, babe, man in full.
 Been throwing on coal for Mister Murphy
 From times way back, baby, times way back.

Big Jess had a pleasing woman, name of Mamie, 5
 Sweet-hipted Mama, sweet-hipted Mame;
 Had a boy growing up for to be a fireman,
 Just like his pa, baby, like his pa.

Out by the roundhouse Jess had his cabin,
 Longside the tracks, babe, long the tracks, 10
 Jess pulled the whistle when they high-balled past it
 "I'm on my way, baby, on my way."

Crackers craved the job what Jess was holding,
 Times right tough, babe, times right tough,
 Warned Jess to quit his job for a white man, 15
 Jess he laughed, baby, he jes' laughed.

He picked up his lunch-box, kissed his sweet woman,
 Sweet-hipted Mama, sweet-hipted Mame,
 His son walked with him to the white-washed palings,
 "Be seeing you soon, son, see you soon." 20

Mister Murphy let Big Jess talk on the whistle
 "So long sugar baby, so long babe";
 Train due back in the early morning
 Breakfast time, baby, breakfast time.

Mob stopped the train crossing Black Bear Mountain 25
 Shot rang out, babe, shot rang out.
 They left Big Jess on the Black Bear Mountain, Break of day, baby, break of day.

Sweet Mame sits rocking, waiting for the whistle
 Long past due, babe, long past due. 30
 The grits are cold, and the coffee's boiled over,
 But Jess done gone, baby he done gone.

1938, 1980

Bitter Fruit of the Tree

They said to my grandmother: "Please do not be bitter,"
 When they sold her first-born and let the second die,
 When they drove her husband till he took to the swamplands,
 And brought him home bloody and beaten at last.
 They told her, "It is better you should not be bitter, 5
 Some must work and suffer so that we, who must, can live,
 Forgiving is noble, you must not be heathen bitter;
 These are your orders: you are not to be bitter."
 And they left her shack for their porticoed house.

They said to my father: "Please do not be bitter," 10
 When he ploughed and planted a crop not his,
 When he weatherstripped a house that he could not enter,
 And stored away a harvest he could not enjoy.
 They answered his questions: "It does not concern you,
 It is not for you to know, it is past your understanding, 15
 All you need know is: you must not be bitter."
 And they laughed on their way to reckon the crop,
 And my father walked over the wide garnered acres
 Where a cutting wind warned him of the cold to come.

They said to my brother: "Please do not be bitter, 20
 Is it not sad to see the old place go to ruin?
 The eaves are sprung and the chimney tower is leaning,
 The sills, joists, and columns are rotten in the core;
 The blinds hang crazy and the shingles blow away,
 The fields have gone back to broomsedge and pine, 25
 And the soil washes down the red gully scars.
 With so much to be done, there's no time for being bitter.
 Your father made it for us, it is up to you to save it,
 What is past is over, and you should not be bitter."
 But my brother is bitter, and he does not hear. 30

1939, 1980

Sterling Brown: "Bitter Fruit of the Tree" from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF STERLING A BROWN, selected by Michael S. Harper. Copyright © 1980 by Sterling A. Brown. Reprinted by permission of Elizabeth A. Dennis.

LANGSTON HUGHES

1902–1967

Langston Hughes was the most popular and versatile of the many writers connected with the Harlem Renaissance. Along with Zora Neale Hurston, and in contrast to Jean Toomer and Countee Cullen (who wanted to work with the patterns of written literary forms, whether traditional or experimental), he wanted to capture the oral and improvisatory traditions of black culture in written form.

Hughes was born in Joplin, Missouri; as a child, since his parents were separated, he lived mainly with his maternal grandmother in Lawrence, Kansas. He did, however, live intermittently both with his mother in Detroit and Cleveland, where he finished high school and began to write poetry, and with his father, who, disgusted with American racism, had gone to Mexico. Like other poets in this era—T. S. Eliot, Hart Crane, Edgar Lee Masters, and Robert Frost—Hughes had a mother sympathetic to his poetic ambitions and a businesslike father with whom he was in deep, scarring conflict.

Hughes entered Columbia University in 1920 but left after a year. Traveling and drifting, he shipped out as a merchant seaman and worked at a nightclub in Paris (France) and as a busboy in Washington, D.C. All this time he was writing and publishing poetry, chiefly in the two important African American periodicals Opportunity and the Crisis. Eleven of Hughes's poems were published in Alain Locke's pioneering anthology, The New Negro (1925), and he was also well represented in Countee Cullen's 1927 anthology, Caroling Dusk. Carl Van Vechten, one of the white patrons of African American writing, helped get The Weary Blues, Hughes's first volume of poems, published in 1926. It was in this year, too, that his important essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" appeared in the Nation (see p. 328); in that essay Hughes described the immense challenges to be faced by the serious black artist "who would produce a racial art" but insisted on the need for courageous artists to make the attempt. Other patrons appeared: Amy Spingarn financed his college education at Lincoln University (Pennsylvania), and Charlotte Mason subsidized him in New York City between 1928 and 1930. The publication of his novel Not without Laughter in 1930 solidified his reputation and sales, enabling him to support himself. By the 1930s he was being called "the bard of Harlem."

The Great Depression brought an abrupt end to much African American literary activity, but Hughes was already a public figure. In the activist 1930s he was much absorbed in radical politics. Hughes and other blacks were drawn by the American Communist Party, which made racial justice an important plank in its platform, promoting an image of working-class solidarity that nullified racial boundaries. He visited the Soviet Union in 1932 and produced a significant amount of radical writing up to the eve of World War II. He covered the Spanish civil war for the Baltimore Afro-American in 1937. By the end of the decade he had also been involved in drama and screenplay writing and had begun an autobiography, all the while publishing poetry. In 1943 he invented the folksy, streetwise character Jesse B. Semple, whose commonsense prose monologues on race were eventually collected in four volumes, and Alberta K. Johnson, Semple's female equivalent, in his series of "Madam" poems.

In the 1950s and 1960s Hughes published a variety of anthologies for children and adults, including First Book of Negroes (1952), The First Book of Jazz (1955), and The Book of Negro Folklore (1958). In 1953 he was called to testify before Senator Joseph McCarthy's committee on subversive activities in connection with his 1930s radicalism. The FBI listed him as a security risk until 1959; and during these years, when he could not travel outside the United States because he would not have been allowed to reenter the country, Hughes worked to rehabilitate his reputation as a good American by producing patriotic poetry. From 1960 to the end of his life he was again on the international circuit.

Within the spectrum of artistic possibilities open to writers of the Harlem Renaissance—drawing on African American rural folk forms; on literary traditions and forms that entered the United States from Europe and Great Britain; or on the new cultural forms of blacks in American cities—Hughes chose to focus his work on modern, urban black life. He modeled his stanza forms on the improvisatory rhythms of jazz music and adapted the vocabulary of everyday black speech to poetry. He also acknowledged finding inspiration for his writing in the work of white American poets who preceded him. Like Walt Whitman he heard America singing, and he asserted his right to sing America back; he also learned from Carl Sandburg's earlier attempts to work jazz into poetry. Hughes did not confuse his pride in African American culture with complacency toward the material deprivations of black life in the United States. He was keenly aware that the modernist “vogue in things Negro” among white Americans was potentially exploitative and voyeuristic; he confronted such racial tourists with the misery as well as the jazz of Chicago’s South Side. Early and late, Hughes’s poems demanded that African Americans be acknowledged as owners of the culture they gave to the United States and as fully enfranchised American citizens.

The source of the poems printed here is Collected Poems (1994).

The Negro Speaks of Rivers

I’ve known rivers:
I’ve known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young.
I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep. 5
I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.
I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I’ve seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset

I’ve known rivers:
Ancient, dusky rivers.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers. 10

1921, 1926

Mother to Son

Well, son, I’ll tell you:
Life for me ain’t been no crystal stair.
It’s had tacks in it,
And splinters,
And boards torn up, 5
And places with no carpet on the floor—
Bare.
But all the time
I’ve been a-climbin’ on,
And reachin’ landin’s, 10
And turnin’ corners,
And sometimes goin’ in the dark
Where there ain’t been no light.
So boy, don’t you turn back.
Don’t you set down on the steps 15
’Cause you finds it’s kinder hard.

Don't you fall now—
 For I'se still goin', honey,
 I'se still climbin',
 And life for me ain't been no crystal stair. 20

1922, 1926

I, Too

I, too, sing America.

I am the darker brother.
 They send me to eat in the kitchen
 When company comes,
 But I laugh, 5
 And eat well,
 And grow strong.

Tomorrow,
 I'll be at the table
 When company comes. 10
 Nobody'll dare
 Say to me,
 "Eat in the kitchen,"
 Then.

Besides, 15
 They'll see how beautiful I am
 And be ashamed—

I, too, am America.

1925, 1959

The Weary Blues

Droning a drowsy syncopated tune,
 Rocking back and forth to a mellow croon,
 I heard a Negro play.
 Down on Lenox Avenue the other night
 By the pale dull pallor of an old gas light 5
 He did a lazy sway. . . .
 He did a lazy sway. . . .
 To the tune o' those Weary Blues.
 With his ebony hands on each ivory key.
 He made that poor piano moan with melody. 10
 O Blues!
 Swaying to and fro on his rickety stool

He played that sad raggy tune like a musical fool.
 Sweet Blues!
 Coming from a black man's soul. 15
 O Blues!
 In a deep song voice with a melancholy tone
 I heard that Negro sing, that old piano moan—
 "Ain't got nobody in all this world,
 Ain't got nobody but ma self. 20
 I's gwine to quit ma frownin'
 And put ma troubles on de shelf."
 Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor.
 He played a few chords then he sang some more—
 "I got de Weary Blues 25
 And I can't be satisfied.
 Got de Weary Blues
 And can't be satisfied—
 I ain't happy no mo'
 And I wish that I had died." 30
 And far into the night he crooned that tune.
 The stars went out and so did the moon.
 The singer stopped playing and went to bed.
 While the Weary Blues echoed through his head
 He slept like a rock or a man that's dead. 35

1925

Mulatto

I am your son, white man!

Georgia dusk
 And the turpentine woods.
 One of the pillars of the temple fell.

You are my son!
Like hell! 5

The moon over the turpentine woods.
 The Southern night
 Full of stars,
 Great big yellow stars. 10
 What's a body but a toy?
 Juicy bodies
 Of nigger wenches
 Blue black
 Against black fences. 15
 O, you little bastard boy,
 What's a body but a toy?
 The scent of pine wood stings the soft night air.

What's the body of your mother?
Silver moonlight everywhere. 20

What's the body of your mother?
Sharp pine scent in the evening air.
A nigger night,
A nigger joy,
A little yellow 25
Bastard boy.

Naw, you ain't my brother.
Niggers ain't my brother.
Not ever.
Niggers ain't my brother. 30
The Southern night is full of stars,
Great big yellow stars.
O, sweet as earth,
Dusk dark bodies
Give sweet birth 35
To little yellow bastard boys.

Git on back there in the night,
You ain't white.

The bright stars scatter everywhere.
Pine wood scent in the evening air. 40
A nigger night,
A nigger joy.

I am your son, white man!

A little yellow
Bastard boy. 45

1927

Song for a Dark Girl

Way Down South in Dixie¹
(Break the heart of me)
They hung my black young lover
To a cross roads tree.

Way Down South in Dixie 5
(Bruised body high in air)
I asked the white Lord Jesus
What was the use of prayer.

1. Last line of "Dixie," the popular minstrel song, probably composed by Daniel D. Emmett (1815–1904).

Way Down South in Dixie
 (Break the heart of me) 10
 Love is a naked shadow
 On a gnarled and naked tree.

1927

Genius Child

This is a song for the genius child.
 Sing it softly, for the song is wild.
 Sing it softly as ever you can—
 Lest the song get out of hand.

Nobody loves a genius child. 5

Can you love an eagle,
 Tame or wild?
 Can you love an eagle,
 Wild or tame?
 Can you love a monster 10
 Of frightening name?

Nobody loves a genius child.

Kill him—and let his soul run wild!

1937, 1947

Visitors to the Black Belt

You can talk about
Across the railroad tracks—
 To me it's here
 On this side of the tracks.

You can talk about 5
Up in Harlem—
 To me it's here
 In Harlem.

You can say
 Jazz on the South Side¹— 10
 To me it's hell
 On the South Side:

1. African American neighborhood in Chicago. See also Archibald J. Motley's 1934 painting, Black Belt, in the color insert to this volume.

Kitchenettes
 With no heat
 And garbage
 In the halls. 15

Who're you, outsider?

Ask me who am I.

1940, 1943

Note on Commercial Theatre

You've taken my blues and gone—
 You sing 'em on Broadway
 And you sing 'em in Hollywood Bowl,¹
 And you mixed 'em up with symphonies
 And you fixed 'em 5
 So they don't sound like me.
 Yep, you done taken my blues and gone.

You also took my spirituals and gone.
 You put me in Macbeth and *Carmen Jones*²
 And all kinds of *Swing Mikados*³ 10
 And in everything but what's about me—
 But someday somebody'll
 Stand up and talk about me,
 And write about me—

Black and beautiful— 15
 And sing about me,
 And put on plays about me!

I reckon it'll be Me myself!

Yes, it'll be me. 20

1940, 1959

1. Outdoor concert amphitheater constructed in the 1920s.

2. An all-black musical (1943), loosely based on the opera Carmen by French composer George Bizet (1838–1875), focused on African American life during World War II. An all-black production of Shakespeare's Macbeth (1606), set in Haiti, was a Broadway success in 1936.

3. During 1939, two different all-black versions of The Mikado (1885), a comic opera by the British team of W. S. Gilbert (1836–1911) and Arthur Sullivan (1842–1900), competed on Broadway: The Swing Mikado (which premiered in Chicago in 1938) and The Hot Mikado.

Vagabonds

We are the desperate
 Who do not care,
 The hungry
 Who have nowhere
 To eat, 5
 No place to sleep,
 The tearless
 Who cannot Weep.

1941, 1947

Words Like Freedom¹

There are words like Freedom
 Sweet and wonderful to say.
 On my heart-strings freedom sings
 All day everyday.

There are words like Liberty 5
 That almost make me cry.
 If you had known what I know
 You would know why.

1943, 1967

Madam and Her Madam

I worked for a woman,
 She wasn't mean—
 But she had a twelve-room
 House to clean.

Had to get breakfast, 5
 Dinner, and supper, too—
 Then take care of her children
 When I got through.

Wash, iron, and scrub,
 Walk the dog around— 10
 It was too much,
 Nearly broke me down.

1. Originally published under the title "Refugee in America."

I said, Madam,
 Can it be
 You trying to make a
 Pack-horse out of me? 15

She opened her mouth.
 She cried, Oh, no!
 You know, Alberta,
 I love you so! 20

I said, Madam,
 That may be true—
 But I'll be dogged
 If I love you!

1943

Freedom [1]¹

Freedom will not come
 Today, this year
 Nor ever
 Through compromise and fear.

I have as much right
 As the other fellow has
 To stand
 On my two feet
 And own the land. 5

I tire so of hearing people say,
Let things take their course.
Tomorrow is another day.
 I do not need my freedom when I'm dead.
 I cannot live on tomorrow's bread. 10

Freedom
 Is a strong seed
 Planted
 In a great need. 15

I live here, too.
 I want freedom
 Just as you. 20

1943, 1967

1. Originally published under the title "Democracy."

Madam's Calling Cards

I had some cards printed
The other day.
They cost me more
Than I wanted to pay.

I told the man 5
I wasn't no mint,
But I hankered to see
My name in print.

MADAM JOHNSON,
ALBERTA K. 10
He said, Your name looks good
Madam'd that way.

Shall I use Old English
Or a Roman letter?
I said, Use American. 15
American's better.

There's nothing foreign
To my pedigree:
Alberta K. Johnson—
American that's me. 20

1943, 1949

Silhouette

Southern gentle lady,
Do not swoon.
They've just hung a black man
In the dark of the moon.

They've hung a black man 5
To a roadside tree
In the dark of the moon
For the world to see How Dixie protects
Its white womanhood. 10

Southern gentle lady,
Be good!
Be good!

1944, 1949

Theme for English B

The instructor said,

*Go home and write a page tonight.
And let that page come out of you—
Then, it will be true.*

5

I wonder if it's that simple?

I am twenty-two, colored, born in Winston-Salem.

I went to school there, then Durham, then here to this college on the hill above Harlem.¹

I am the only colored student in my class.

10

The steps from the hill lead down into Harlem, through a park, then I cross St. Nicholas, Eighth Avenue, Seventh, and I come to the Y,
the Harlem Branch Y, where I take the elevator up to my room, sit down, and write this page:

15

It's not easy to know what is true for you or me at twenty-two, my age. But I guess I'm what I feel and see and hear, Harlem, I hear you:
hear you, hear me—we two—you, me, talk on this page.
(I hear New York, too.) Me—who?

20

Well, I like to eat, sleep, drink, and be in love.

I like to work, read, learn, and understand life.

I like a pipe for a Christmas present, or records—Bessie, bop, or Bach.²

I guess being colored doesn't make me not like the same things other folks like who are other races.

25

So will my page be colored that I write?

Being me, it will not be white.

But it will be a part of you, instructor.

30

You are white—

yet a part of me, as I am a part of you.

That's American.

Sometimes perhaps you don't want to be a part of me.

Nor do I often want to be a part of you.

35

But we are, that's true!

As I learn from you,

I guess you learn from me—
although you're older—and white—and somewhat more free.

40

This is my page for English B.

1949

1. The City College of the City University of New York. Winston-Salem and Durham are cities in North Carolina.

2. Johann Sebastian Bach (1685–1750), German composer of the Baroque era. Bessie Smith (1894–1937), noted blues singer. “Bop”: jazz form developed in Harlem during World War II.

JOHN STEINBECK

1902–1968

Most of John Steinbeck's best writing is set in the region of California that he called home, the Salinas Valley and Monterey peninsula of California, where visitors today will find official remembrances of him everywhere. Steinbeck believed in the American promise of opportunity for all, but believed also that social injustices and economic inequalities had put opportunity beyond reach for many. His work merged literary modernism with literary realism, celebrated traditional rural communities along with social outcasts and immigrant cultures, and endorsed conservative values and radical politics at the same time.

Steinbeck's father managed a flour mill and later became treasurer of Monterey County; his mother, who had taught school before marriage, was active in local civic affairs. Their home was full of books, and Steinbeck read avidly from an early age. After graduating from Salinas High School in 1919, he began to study at Stanford University but took time off for a variety of short-term jobs at local mills, farms, and estates. During this period he developed an abiding respect for people who worked on farms and in factories, and committed his literary abilities to their cause. He left college for good in 1925, having completed less than three years of coursework, and continued his roving life.

With financial help from his father, Steinbeck spent most of 1929 writing. He moved to the seaside town of Pacific Grove, on the Monterey coast, and in 1930 was married (the first of three times). In 1935 he achieved commercial success with his third novel, Tortilla Flat, a celebration of the Mexican-American culture of the "paisanos" who lived in the Monterey hills. Steinbeck's next novel, In Dubious Battle (1936), contrasted the decency of striking migratory farm workers both to the cynicism of landowners and their vigilantes, and to the equal cynicism of Communist labor union organizers who exploit the workers' plight for their own purposes. Sympathy for the underdog appears again in Of Mice and Men (1937), a best-selling short novel about two itinerant ranch hands, and yet again in The Grapes of Wrath (1939), his most famous and most ambitious novel. The Long Valley (1938) brought together a number of his stories set in the Salinas Valley, including "The Chrysanthemums."

Inspired by the devastating 1930s drought in the southern plains states and the exodus of thousands of farmers from their homes in the so-called Dust Bowl, The Grapes of Wrath told the story of the Joad family, who, after losing their land in Oklahoma, migrated westward to California on U.S. Highway 66 looking for, but not finding, a better life. Because of its supposed radicalism, the novel was banned or burned in several states, but even so, it became the nation's number one best seller and won a Pulitzer Prize in 1940. Cannery Row (1945), a local-color novel about workers in the sardine canneries of Monterey, also became a best seller.

During and after World War II, the film industry began paying serious attention to Steinbeck's writing. Of Mice and Men was adapted as a film in 1939, and The Grapes of Wrath followed in 1940. The family saga East of Eden (1952), Steinbeck's longest novel, was filmed in 1955 with the electric young actor James Dean (1931–1955) in a starring role. The qualities that made Steinbeck's fiction so adaptable to the screen were also those for which he won the Nobel Prize in 1962; the prize committee praised his work for "combining sympathetic humour and keen social perception."

The text of "The Chrysanthemums" is that of its first printing, in Harper's (1937).

The Chrysanthemums

The high grey-flannel fog of winter closed off the Salinas Valley from the sky and from all the rest of the world. On every side it sat like a lid on the mountains and made of the great valley a closed pot. On the broad, level land floor the gang plows¹ bit deep and left the black earth shining like metal where the shares had cut. On the foothill ranches across the Salinas River, the yellow stubble fields seemed to be bathed in pale cold sunshine, but there was no sunshine in the valley now in December. The thick willow scrub along the river flamed with sharp and positive yellow leaves.

It was a time of quiet and of waiting. The air was cold and tender. A light wind blew up from the southwest so that the farmers were mildly hopeful of a good rain before long; but fog and rain do not go together.

Across the river, on Henry Allen's foothill ranch there was little work to be done, for the hay was cut and stored and the orchards were plowed up to receive the rain deeply when it should come. The cattle on the higher slopes were becoming shaggy and rough-coated.

Elisa Allen, working in her flower garden, looked down across the yard and saw Henry, her husband, talking to two men in business suits. The three of them stood by the tractor shed, each man with one foot on the side of the little Fordson.² They smoked cigarettes and studied the machine as they talked.

Elisa watched them for a moment and then went back to her work. She was thirty-five. Her face was lean and strong and her eyes were as clear as water. Her figure looked blocked and heavy in her gardening costume, a man's black hat pulled low down over her eyes, clodhopper shoes, a figured print dress almost completely covered by a big corduroy apron with four big pockets to hold the snips, the trowel and scratcher, the seeds and the knife she worked with. She wore heavy leather gloves to protect her hands while she worked.

She was cutting down the old year's chrysanthemum stalks with a pair of short and powerful scissors. She looked down toward the men by the tractor shed now and then. Her face was eager and mature and handsome; even her work with the scissors was over-eager, over-powerful. The chrysanthemum stems seemed too small and easy for her energy.

She brushed a cloud of hair out of her eyes with the back of her glove, and left a smudge of earth on her cheek in doing it. Behind her stood the neat white farm house with red geraniums close-banked around it as high as the windows. It was a hard-swept looking little house with hard-polished windows, and a clean mud-mat on the front steps.

Elisa cast another glance toward the tractor shed. The strangers were getting into their Ford coupe.³ She took off a glove and put her strong fingers down into the forest of new green chrysanthemum sprouts that were growing around the old roots. She spread the leaves and looked down among the close-growing stems. No aphids were there, no sowbugs or snails or cutworms. Her terrier fingers destroyed such pests before they could get started.

1. Plows with multiple plowshares, or plowing blades.

2. Brand of tractor made by the Ford Motor Company.

3. Closed-roof, two-door automobile.

Elisa started at the sound of her husband's voice. He had come near quietly, and he leaned over the wire fence that protected her flower garden from cattle and dogs and chickens.

"At it again," he said. "You've got a strong new crop coming."

Elisa straightened her back and pulled on the gardening glove again. "Yes. They'll be strong this coming year." In her tone and on her face there was a little smugness.

"You've got a gift with things," Henry observed. "Some of those yellow chrysanthemums you had this year were ten inches across. I wish you'd work out in the orchard and raise some apples that big."

Her eyes sharpened. "Maybe I could do it, too. I've a gift with things, all right. My mother had it. She could stick anything in the ground and make it grow. She said it was having planters' hands that knew how to do it."

"Well, it sure works with flowers," he said.

"Henry, who were those men you were talking to?"

"Why, sure, that's what I came to tell you. They were from the Western Meat Company. I sold those thirty head of three-year-old steers. Got nearly my own price, too."

"Good," she said. "Good for you."

"And I thought," he continued, "I thought how it's Saturday afternoon, and we might go into Salinas for dinner at a restaurant, and then to a picture show—to celebrate, you see."

"Good," she repeated. "Oh, yes. That will be good."

Henry put on his joking tone. "There's fights tonight. How'd you like to go to the fights?"

"Oh, no," she said breathlessly. "No, I wouldn't like fights."

"Just fooling, Elisa. We'll go to a movie. Let's see. It's two now. I'm going to take Scotty and bring down those steers from the hill. It'll take us maybe two hours. We'll go in town about five and have dinner at the Cominos Hotel. Like that?"

"Of course I'll like it. It's good to eat away from home."

"All right, then. I'll go get up a couple of horses."

She said, "I'll have plenty of time to transplant some of these sets, I guess."

She heard her husband calling Scotty down by the barn. And a little later she saw the two men ride up the pale yellow hillside in search of the steers.

There was a little square sandy bed kept for rooting the chrysanthemums. With her trowel she turned the soil over and over, and smoothed it and patted it firm. Then she dug ten parallel trenches to receive the sets. Back at the chrysanthemum bed she pulled out the little crisp shoots, trimmed off the leaves of each one with her scissors and laid it on a small orderly pile.

A squeak of wheels and plod of hoofs came from the road. Elisa looked up. The country road ran along the dense bank of willows and cottonwoods that bordered the river, and up this road came a curious vehicle, curiously drawn. It was an old spring-wagon, with a round canvas top on it like the cover of a prairie schooner. It was drawn by an old bay horse and a little grey-and-white burro. A big stubble-bearded man sat between the cover flaps and drove the crawling team. Underneath the wagon, between the hind wheels, a lean and rangy mongrel dog walked sedately. Words were painted on the canvas, in clumsy, crooked letters. "Pots, pans, knives, sisors, lawn mores, Fixed." Two rows of articles, and the triumphantly definitive “Fixed” below. The black paint had run down in little sharp points beneath each letter.

Elisa, squatting on the ground, watched to see the crazy, loose-jointed wagon pass by. But it didn’t pass. It turned into the farm road in front of her house, crooked old wheels skirling and squeaking. The rangy dog darted from between the wheels and ran ahead. Instantly the two ranch shepherds flew out at him. Then all three stopped, and with stiff and quivering tails, with taut straight legs, with ambassadorial dignity, they slowly circled, sniffing daintily. The caravan pulled up to Elisa’s wire fence and stopped. Now the newcomer dog, feeling out-numbered, lowered his tail and retired under the wagon with raised hackles and bared teeth.

The man on the wagon seat called out, “That’s a bad dog in a fight when he gets started.”

Elisa laughed. “I see he is. How soon does he generally get started?”

The man caught up her laughter and echoed it heartily. “Sometimes not for weeks and weeks,” he said. He climbed stiffly down, over the wheel. The horse and the donkey drooped like unwatered flowers.

Elisa saw that he was a very big man. Although his hair and beard were greying, he did not look old. His worn black suit was wrinkled and spotted with grease. The laughter had disappeared from his face and eyes the moment his laughing voice ceased. His eyes were dark, and they were full of the brooding that gets in the eyes of teamsters and of sailors. The calloused hands he rested on the wire fence were cracked, and every crack was a black line. He took off his battered hat.

“I’m off my general road, ma’am,” he said. “Does this dirt road cut over across the river to the Los Angeles highway?”

Elisa stood up and shoved the thick scissors in her apron pocket. “Well, yes, it does, but it winds around and then fords the river. I don’t think your team could pull through the sand.”

He replied with some asperity, “It might surprise you what them beasts can pull through.”

“When they get started?” she asked.

He smiled for a second. “Yes. When they get started.”

“Well,” said Elisa, “I think you’ll save time if you go back to the Salinas road and pick up the highway there.”

He drew a big finger down the chicken wire and made it sing. “I ain’t in any hurry, ma’am. I go from Seattle to San Diego and back every year. Takes all my time. About six months each way. I aim to follow nice weather.”

Elisa took off her gloves and stuffed them in the apron pocket with the scissors. She touched the under edge of her man’s hat, searching for fugitive hairs. “That sounds like a nice kind of a way to live,” she said.

He leaned confidentially over the fence. “Maybe you noticed the writing on my wagon. I mend pots and sharpen knives and scissors. You got any of them things to do?”

“Oh, no,” she said quickly. “Nothing like that.” Her eyes hardened with resistance.

“Scissors is the worst thing,” he explained. “Most people just ruin scissors trying to sharpen ’em, but I know how. I got a special tool. It’s a little bobbit kind of thing, and patented. But it sure does the trick.”

"No. My scissors are all sharp."

"All right, then. Take a pot," he continued earnestly, "a bent pot, or a pot with a hole. I can make it like new so you don't have to buy no new ones. That's a saving for you."

"No," she said shortly. "I tell you I have nothing like that for you to do."

His face fell to an exaggerated sadness. His voice took on a whining undertone. "I ain't had a thing to do today. Maybe I won't have no supper tonight. You see I'm off my regular road. I know folks on the highway clear from Seattle to San Diego. They save their things for me to sharpen up because they know I do it so good and save them money."

"I'm sorry," Elisa said irritably. "I haven't anything for you to do."

His eyes left her face and fell to searching the ground. They roamed about until they came to the chrysanthemum bed where she had been working. "What's them plants, ma'am?"

The irritation and resistance melted from Elisa's face. "Oh, those are chrysanthemums, giant whites and yellows. I raise them every year, bigger than anybody around here."

"Kind of a long-stemmed flower? Looks like a quick puff of colored smoke?" he asked.

"That's it. What a nice way to describe them."

"They smell kind of nasty till you get used to them," he said.

"It's a good bitter smell," she retorted, "not nasty at all."

He changed his tone quickly. "I like the smell myself."

"I had ten-inch blooms this year," she said.

The man leaned farther over the fence. "Look. I know a lady down the road a piece, has got the nicest garden you ever seen. Got nearly every kind of flower but no chrysanthemums. Last time I was mending a copper-bottom washtub for her (that's a hard job but I do it good), she said to me, 'If you ever run across some nice chrysanthemums I wish you'd try to get me a few seeds.' That's what she told me."

Elisa's eyes grew alert and eager. "She couldn't have known much about chrysanthemums. You can raise them from seed, but it's much easier to root the little sprouts you see there."

"Oh," he said. "I s'pose I can't take none to her, then."

"Why yes you can," Elisa cried. "I can put some in damp sand, and you can carry them right along with you. They'll take root in the pot if you keep them damp. And then she can transplant them."

"She'd sure like to have some, ma'am. You say they're nice ones?"

"Beautiful," she said. "Oh, beautiful." Her eyes shone. She tore off the battered hat and shook out her dark pretty hair. "I'll put them in a flower pot, and you can take them right with you. Come into the yard."

While the man came through the picket gate Elisa ran excitedly along the geranium-bordered path to the back of the house. And she returned carrying a big red flower pot. The gloves were forgotten now. She kneeled on the ground by the starting bed and dug up the sandy soil with her fingers and scooped it into the bright new flower pot. Then she picked up the little pile of shoots she had prepared. With her strong fingers she pressed them into the sand and tamped around them with her knuckles. The man stood over her. "I'll tell you what to do," she said. "You remember so you can tell the lady."

"Yes, I'll try to remember."

"Well, look. These will take root in about a month. Then she must set them out, about a foot apart in good rich earth like this, see?" She lifted a handful of dark soil for him to look at. "They'll grow fast and tall. Now remember this: In July tell her to cut them down, about eight inches from the ground."

"Before they bloom?" he asked.

"Yes, before they bloom." Her face was tight with eagerness. "They'll grow right up again. About the last of September the buds will start."

She stopped and seemed perplexed. "It's the budding that takes the most care," she said hesitantly. "I don't know how to tell you." She looked deep into his eyes, searchingly. Her mouth opened a little, and she seemed to be listening. "I'll try to tell you," she said. "Did you ever hear of planting hands?"

"Can't say I have, ma'am."

"Well, I can only tell you what it feels like. It's when you're picking off the buds you don't want. Everything goes right down into your fingertips. You watch your fingers work. They do it themselves. You can feel how it is. They pick and pick the buds. They never make a mistake. They're with the plant. Do you see? Your fingers and the plant. You can feel that, right up your arm. They know. They never make a mistake. You can feel it. When you're like that you can't do anything wrong. Do you see that? Can you understand that?"

She was kneeling on the ground looking up at him. Her breast swelled passionately.

The man's eyes narrowed. He looked away self-consciously. "Maybe I know," he said. "Sometimes in the night in the wagon there—"

Elisa's voice grew husky. She broke in on him, "I've never lived as you do, but I know what you mean. When the night is dark—why, the stars are sharp-pointed, and there's quiet. Why, you rise up and up! Every pointed star gets driven into your body. It's like that. Hot and sharp and—lovely."

Kneeling there, her hand went out toward his legs in the greasy black trousers. Her hesitant fingers almost touched the cloth. Then her hand dropped to the ground. She crouched low like a fawning dog.

He said, "It's nice, just like you say. Only when you don't have no dinner, it ain't."

She stood up then, very straight, and her face was ashamed. She held the flower pot out to him and placed it gently in his arms. "Here. Put it in your wagon, on the seat, where you can watch it. Maybe I can find something for you to do."

At the back of the house she dug in the can pile and found two old and battered aluminum saucepans. She carried them back and gave them to him. "Here, maybe you can fix these."

His manner changed. He became professional. "Good as new I can fix them." At the back of his wagon he set a little anvil, and out of an oily tool box dug a small machine hammer. Elisa came through the gate to watch him while he pounded out the dents in the kettles. His mouth grew sure and knowing. At a difficult part of the work he sucked his under-lip.

"You sleep right in the wagon?" Elisa asked.

"Right in the wagon, ma'am. Rain or shine I'm dry as a cow in there."

"It must be nice," she said. "It must be very nice. I wish women could do such things."

"It ain't the right kind of a life for a woman."

Her upper lip raised a little, showing her teeth. "How do you know? How can you tell?" she said.

"I don't know, ma'am," he protested. "Of course I don't know. Now here's your kettles, done. You don't have to buy no new ones."

"How much?"

"Oh, fifty cents'll do. I keep my prices down and my work good. That's why I have all them satisfied customers up and down the highway."

Elisa brought him a fifty-cent piece from the house and dropped it in his hand. "You might be surprised to have a rival some time. I can sharpen scissors, too. And I can beat the dents out of little pots. I could show you what a woman might do."

He put his hammer back in the oily box and shoved the little anvil out of sight. "It would be a lonely life for a woman, ma'am, and a scary life, too, with animals creeping under the wagon all night." He climbed over the single-tree, steadying himself with a hand on the burro's white rump. He settled himself in the seat, picked up the lines. "Thank you kindly, ma'am," he said. "I'll do like you told me; I'll go back and catch the Salinas road."

"Mind," she called, "if you're long in getting there, keep the sand damp."

"Sand, ma'am? . . . Sand? Oh, sure. You mean around the chrysanthemums. Sure I will." He clucked his tongue. The beasts leaned luxuriously into their collars. The mongrel dog took his place between the back wheels. The wagon turned and crawled out the entrance road and back the way it had come, along the river.

Elisa stood in front of her wire fence watching the slow progress of the caravan. Her shoulders were straight, her head thrown back, her eyes half-closed, so that the scene came vaguely into them. Her lips moved silently, forming the words "Good-bye—good-bye." Then she whispered, "That's a bright direction. There's a glowing there." The sound of her whisper startled her. She shook herself free and looked about to see whether anyone had been listening. Only the dogs had heard. They lifted their heads toward her from their sleeping in the dust, and then stretched out their chins and settled asleep again. Elisa turned and ran hurriedly into the house.

In the kitchen she reached behind the stove and felt the water tank. It was full of hot water from the noonday cooking. In the bathroom she tore off her soiled clothes and flung them into the corner. And then she scrubbed herself with a little block of pumice, legs and thighs, loins and chest and arms, until her skin was scratched and red. When she had dried herself she stood in front of a mirror in her bedroom and looked at her body. She tightened her stomach and threw out her chest. She turned and looked over her shoulder at her back.

After a while she began to dress, slowly. She put on her newest under-clothing and her nicest stockings and the dress which was the symbol of her prettiness. She worked carefully on her hair, penciled her eyebrows and rouged her lips.

Before she was finished she heard the little thunder of hoofs and the shouts of Henry and his helper as they drove the red steers into the corral. She heard the gate bang shut and set herself for Henry's arrival.

His step sounded on the porch. He entered the house calling, "Elisa, where are you?"

"In my room, dressing. I'm not ready. There's hot water for your bath. Hurry up. It's getting late."

When she heard him splashing in the tub, Elisa laid his dark suit on the bed, and shirt and socks and tie beside it. She stood his polished shoes on the floor beside the bed. Then she went to the porch and sat primly and stiffly down. She looked toward the river road where the willow-line was still yellow with frosted leaves so that under the high grey fog they seemed a thin band of sunshine. This was the only color in the grey afternoon. She sat unmoving for a long time. Her eyes blinked rarely.

Henry came banging out of the door, shoving his tie inside his vest as he came. Elisa stiffened and her face grew tight. Henry stopped short and looked at her. "Why—why, Elisa. You look so nice!"

"Nice? You think I look nice? What do you mean by 'nice'?"

Henry blundered on. "I don't know. I mean you look different, strong and happy."

"I am strong? Yes, strong. What do you mean 'strong'?"

He looked bewildered. "You're playing some kind of a game," he said helplessly. "It's a kind of a play. You look strong enough to break a calf over your knee, happy enough to eat it like a watermelon."

For a second she lost her rigidity. "Henry! Don't talk like that. You didn't know what you said." She grew complete again. "I'm strong," she boasted. "I never knew before how strong."

Henry looked down toward the tractor shed, and when he brought his eyes back to her, they were his own again. "I'll get out the car. You can put on your coat while I'm starting."

Elisa went into the house. She heard him drive to the gate and idle down his motor, and then she took a long time to put on her hat. She pulled it here and pressed it there. When Henry turned the motor off she slipped into her coat and went out.

The little roadster bounced along on the dirt road by the river, raising the birds and driving the rabbits into the brush. Two cranes flapped heavily over the willow-line and dropped into the river-bed.

Far ahead on the road Elisa saw a dark speck. She knew.

She tried not to look as they passed it, but her eyes would not obey. She whispered to herself sadly, "He might have thrown them off the road. That wouldn't have been much trouble, not very much. But he kept the pot," she explained. "He had to keep the pot. That's why he couldn't get them off the road."

The roadster turned a bend and she saw the caravan ahead. She swung full around toward her husband so she could not see the little covered wagon and the mismatched team as the car passed them.

In a moment it was over. The thing was done. She did not look back.

She said loudly, to be heard above the motor, "It will be good, tonight, a good dinner."

"Now you've changed again," Henry complained. He took one hand from the wheel and patted her knee. "I ought to take you in to dinner oftener. It would be good for both of us. We get so heavy out on the ranch."

"Henry," she asked, "could we have wine at dinner?"

"Sure we could. Say! That will be fine."

She was silent for a while; then she said, "Henry, at those prize fights, do the men hurt each other very much?"

“Sometimes a little, not often. Why?”

“Well, I’ve read how they break noses, and blood runs down their chests. I’ve read how the fighting gloves get heavy and soggy with blood.”

He looked around at her. “What’s the matter, Elisa? I didn’t know you read things like that.” He brought the car to a stop, then turned to the right over the Salinas River bridge.

“Do any women ever go to the fights?” she asked.

“Oh, sure, some. What’s the matter, Elisa? Do you want to go? I don’t think you’d like it, but I’ll take you if you really want to go.”

She relaxed limply in the seat. “Oh, no. No. I don’t want to go. I’m sure I don’t.” Her face was turned away from him. “It will be enough if we can have wine. It will be plenty.” She turned up her coat collar so he could not see that she was crying weakly—like an old woman.

1937

COUNTEE CULLEN

1903–1946

More than most poets of the Harlem Renaissance, Countee Cullen valued traditional poetic forms in English—the sonnet, rhymed couplets, and quatrains—over modernist free verse or rhythms suggested by jazz and popular culture. Never one to shy away from controversy, Cullen prefaced his important anthology of African American poetry, Caroling Dusk (1927), with the assertion, “As heretical as it may sound, there is the probability that Negro poets, dependent as they are on the English language, may have more to gain from the rich background of English and American poetry than from any nebulous atavistic yearnings toward an African inheritance.” Cullen demanded that black poets be considered as American poets, ultimately without any special racial designation. Nevertheless, the titles of his books of poetry—Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), The Ballad of the Brown Girl (1928)—showed that, like Claude MacKay and Jean Toomer, he felt a responsibility to write about being black even if he did so in modes outside of black folk traditions. Although he clashed with a number of his contemporaries in the Harlem Renaissance, Cullen could also be generous to black writers whose poetics differed from his. What mattered to Cullen was appreciating the full range of black literary writing, a range as great, he insisted, as that found among white poets in English, and resisting every “attempt to corral the ebony muse into some definite mold” to which all black writers should conform.

Although Cullen’s birthplace and early years are obscure, he was adopted at some point in his childhood by a Harlem-based minister and given a good education, first in New York public schools and then at New York University, where he received his B.A. in 1925, and at Harvard, where he took an M.A. in 1926. In high school, Cullen earned a citywide poetry prize for “I Have a Rendezvous with Life,” a rejoinder to Alan Seeger’s sentimental World War I poem (see p. 203). His first book of poems, Color, appeared in his senior year at college; it established him as the “black Keats,” a prodigy.

From 1926 to 1928, Cullen was assistant editor at the important black journal Opportunity, for which he also wrote a feature column, “The Dark Tower.” In 1928 he married Nina Yolande Du Bois, the daughter of W. E. B. Du Bois, and won a Guggenheim fellowship that took him to Paris and enabled him to complete another book of poems, The Black Christ (1929). His marriage quickly disintegrated, however, over Cullen's attraction to men, and the couple was divorced in 1930. Neither The Black Christ nor the novel that followed, One Way to Heaven (1932), earned the acclaim of Cullen's earlier books. He spent the last years of his life teaching at New York's Frederick Douglass Junior High School, where his pupils included the future novelist James Baldwin. With the revival of scholarly interest in the Harlem Renaissance, Cullen's distinctive combination of traditionalist poetic skill with acerbic self-questioning on matters of racism and racial identity has once again brought his poetry to critical attention.

The text of "From the Dark Tower" is that of Copper Sun (1927); the text of other poems included here is that of Color (1925).

Yet Do I Marvel

I doubt not God is good, well-meaning, kind,
 And did He stoop to quibble could tell why
 The little buried mole continues blind,
 Why flesh that mirrors Him must some day die,
 Make plain the reason tortured Tantalus 5
 Is baited by the fickle fruit, declare
 If merely brute caprice dooms Sisyphus!
 To struggle up a never-ending stair.
 Inscrutable His ways are, and immune
 To catechism by a mind too strewn 10
 With petty cares to slightly understand
 What awful brain compels His awful hand.
 Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:
 To make a poet black, and bid him sing!

1925

Incident

Once riding in old Baltimore,
 Heart-filled, head-filled with glee,
 I saw a Baltimorean
 Keep looking straight at me.

Now I was eight and very small, 5
 And he was no whit bigger,
 And so I smiled, but he poked out
 His tongue, and called me, "Nigger."

1. Tantalus and Sisyphus are figures in Greek mythology who were punished in Hades. Tantalus was offered food and water that was then instantly snatched away. Sisyphus had to roll a heavy stone to the top of a hill and, after it rolled back down, repeat the ordeal perpetually.

I saw the whole of Baltimore
 From May until December;
 Of all the things that happened there
 That's all that I remember.

1925

Heritage

What is Africa to me:
 Copper sun or scarlet sea,
 Jungle star or jungle track,
 Strong bronzed men, or regal black
 Women from whose loins I sprang
 When the birds of Eden sang?
*One three centuries removed
 From the scenes his fathers loved,
 Spicy grove, cinnamon tree,
 What is Africa to me?*

So I lie, who all day long
 Want no sound except the song
 Sung by wild barbaric birds
 Goading massive jungle herds,
 Juggernauts¹ of flesh that pass
 Trampling tall defiant grass
 Where young forest lovers lie,
 Plighting troth beneath the sky.
 So I lie, who always hear,
 Though I cram against my ear
 Both my thumbs, and keep them there,
 Great drums throbbing through the air.
 So I lie, whose fount of pride,
 Dear distress, and joy allied,
 Is my somber flesh and skin,
 With the dark blood dammed within
 Like great pulsing tides of wine
 That, I fear, must burst the fine
 Channels of the chafing net
 Where they surge and foam and fret.

Africa? A book one thumbs Listlessly, till slumber comes.
 Unremembered are her bats
 Circling through the night, her cats
 Crouching in the river reeds,

1. The juggernaut is a sacred Hindu idol dragged on a huge car in the path of which devotees were believed to throw themselves—hence any power demanding blind sacrifice, here spliced with the image of elephants.

Stalking gentle flesh that feeds
 By the river brink; no more
 Does the bugle-throated roar
 Cry that monarch claws have leapt
 From the scabbards where they slept. 40
 Silver snakes that once a year
 Doff the lovely coats you wear,
 Seek no covert in your fear
 Lest a mortal eye should see;
 What's your nakedness to me? 45
 Here no leprous flowers rear
 Fierce corollas² in the air;
 Here no bodies sleek and wet,
 Dripping mingled rain and sweat,
 Tread the savage measures of 50
 Jungle boys and girls in love.
 What is last year's snow to me,³
 Last year's anything? The tree
 Budding yearly must forget
 How its past arose or set— 55
 Bough and blossom, flower, fruit,
 Even what shy bird with mute
 Wonder at her travail there,
 Meekly labored in its hair.
One three centuries removed 60
From the scenes his fathers loved,
Spicy grove, cinnamon tree,
What is Africa to me?

So I lie, who find no peace
 Night or day, no slight release 65
 From the unremitant beat
 Made by cruel padded feet
 Walking through my body's street.
 Up and down they go, and back,
 Treading out a jungle track. 70
 So I lie, who never quite Safely sleep from rain at night—
 I can never rest at all
 When the rain begins to fall;
 Like a soul gone mad with pain 75
 I must match its weird refrain;
 Ever must I twist and squirm,
 Writhing like a baited worm,
 While its primal measures drip
 Through my body, crying, "Strip! 80
 Doff this new exuberance.
 Come and dance the Lover's Dance!"

2. The whorl of petals forming the inner envelope of a flower.

3. An echo of the lament "Where are the snows of yesteryear?" from "Grand Testament" by the 15th-century French poet François Villon.

In an old remembered way
Rain works on me night and day.

Quaint, outlandish heathen gods 85
Black men fashion out of rods,
Clay, and brittle bits of stone,
In a likeness like their own,
My conversion came high-priced;
I belong to Jesus Christ, 90
Preacher of humility;
Heathen gods are naught to me.

Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
So I make an idle boast;
Jesus of the twice-turned cheek⁴ 95
Lamb of God, although I speak
With my mouth thus, in my heart
Do I play a double part.
Ever at Thy glowing altar
Must my heart grow sick and falter, 100
Wishing He I served were black,
Thinking then it would not lack Precedent of pain to guide it,
Let who would or might deride it;
Surely then this flesh would know 105
Yours had borne a kindred woe.
Lord, I fashion dark gods, too,
Daring even to give You
Dark despairing features where,
Crowned with dark rebellious hair, 110
Patience wavers just so much as Mortal grief compels, while touches
Quick and hot, of anger, rise
To smitten cheek and weary eyes.
Lord, forgive me if my need 115
Sometimes shapes a human creed.
*All day long and all night through,
One thing only must I do:
Quench my pride and cool my blood,
Lest I perish in the flood.* 120
*Lest a hidden ember set
Timber that I thought was wet
Burning like the driest flax,
Melting like the merest wax,
Lest the grave restore its dead.* 125
*Not yet has my heart or head
In the least way realized
They and I are civilized.*

1925

4. In his Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5.39), Jesus declared that when struck on the cheek, one should turn the other cheek rather than strike back.

From the Dark Tower¹

We shall not always plant while others reap
 The golden increment of bursting fruit,
 Not always countenance, abject and mute,
 That lesser men should hold their brothers cheap;
 Not everlastingly while others sleep 5
 Shall we beguile their limbs with mellow flute,
 Not always bend to some more subtle brute;
 We were not made eternally to weep.

The night whose sable breast relieves the stark,
 White stars is no less lovely being dark, 10
 And there are buds that cannot bloom at all
 In light, but crumple, piteous, and fall;
 So in the dark we hide the heart that bleeds,
 And wait, and tend our agonizing seeds.

1927

Uncle Jim

“White folks is white,” says uncle Jim;
 “A platitude,” I sneer;
 And then I tell him so is milk,
 And the froth upon his beer.

His heart walled up with bitterness, 5
 He smokes his pungent pipe,
 And nods at me as if to say,
 “Young fool, you’ll soon be ripe!”

I have a friend who eats his heart
 Away with grief of mine, 10
 Who drinks my joy as tipplers drain
 Deep goblets filled with wine.

I wonder why here at his side,
 Face-in-the-grass with him,
 My mind should stray the Grecian urn¹ 15
 To muse on uncle Jim.

1927

1. An allusion to “Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came” by the British Victorian poet Robert Browning (1812–1889). Cullen also titled his Opportunity column after Browning’s poem.

1. An allusion to “Ode on a Grecian Urn” by the British Romantic poet John Keats (1795–1821). Cullen was particularly fond of Keats’s poetry.

NATHANAEL WEST

1903–1940

Born Nathan Weinstein to a prosperous Jewish family living in the Upper East Side neighborhood of New York City, Nathanael West assumed his new legal name in 1926, on the eve of departing for Paris to sample its legendary Bohemian artistic life. It was not his first attempt at self-reinvention. While still in his teens, Weinstein had altered his high school transcript in order to get into Tufts University, where for one brief, giddy semester he made the most of the college's social life—pledging a Jewish fraternity, attending plays in Boston—while meeting none of his academic obligations. Having withdrawn from Tufts, he used the transcript of another student named Nathan Weinstein to apply to Brown University, where he was accepted and from which he managed to graduate in 1924.

Unlike Tufts, Brown at this time had no fraternities open to Jewish men. Weinstein and his friends at Brown created their own social alternatives, based on their appetite for immersion in modern culture in all its forms, both popular and elite. He attended movies; helped found a campus literary magazine, Casements, to which he contributed poetry and cover art; acted in plays satirizing college life; and pursued a vigorous reading program outside of the classroom that included writers from the leading edge of American modernism—William Carlos Williams (1883–1963), F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896–1940), E. E. Cummings (1894–1962)—as well as international figures like James Joyce (1882–1941), Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), and Gustave Flaubert (1821–1880).

Nathanael West's brief postgraduate sojourn in Paris bore little immediate fruit. His family could not support his stab at the expatriate artistic life, and he returned to New York in January 1927. There he renewed contacts with college friends such as S. J. Perelman (1904–1979), who was then at the beginning of his prolific career as a contributor to The New Yorker, and through them made his way into a range of New York literary circles, including those of John Dos Passos and other writers associated with the Communist publications New Masses and The Daily Worker. He worked as a manager at residential hotels in the city, a position that allowed him to find rooms for literary friends and that supplied as well the experience of the seamy side of transient city life later reflected in the characters of The Day of the Locust (1939).

Unlike his better-established literary friends, however, West still struggled to break into print. His efforts at magazine stories found no buyers. In 1929 he completed revisions to The Dream Life of Balso Snell, a surrealistic novelette begun during his time at Brown and in Paris. Its dreaming antihero, an aspiring writer, passes through the anus of the Trojan horse and wends his way through the horse's guts, encountering other authors along the way; through this device, West's narrative becomes a miniature encyclopedia of literary styles and periods. In this respect, in its application of Greek myth to modern life, and in its ending with a sexual coupling, The Dream Life of Balso Snell nods to Joyce's Ulysses (1918–22). In contrast to Joyce's broad view of modernity, though, West offered a narrower satire on authors in search of an audience; few readers, then or later, found the book's obscene energies rewarding. With the backing of William Carlos Williams, The Dream of a Balso Snell finally appeared in 1931 in a limited edition, to little critical fanfare.

In the meantime, however, West had been handed more promising material. His friend Perelman in 1929 introduced him to a woman who contributed an advice column to the Brooklyn Eagle under the pseudonym of "Susan Chester"; the letters from her readers that she shared with West became the basis for his next novel, Miss Lonelyhearts (1933). Here, what starts out as a purely commercial “stunt”—a young newspaperman writing an advice column intended to increase his paper’s circulation—becomes sinister, as the columnist finds himself unable to maintain his ironic distance from the suffering that bombards him. Empathy, cultivated as a primary social virtue in the tradition of classic nineteenth-century realist fiction, comes to a disastrous end in Miss Lonelyhearts with the columnist’s death at the hands of one of his readers. William Carlos Williams, in a laudatory review, compared the “dreadful logic” of West’s plotting to the “classical precedent” set by Greek and Shakespearean tragedy.

Hollywoodland sign, c. 1935. Erected in 1923, the sign originally advertised a housing development.

Miss Lonelyhearts was a modest critical success, but one that left its author, like its protagonist, faced with the need to make a living. The novel’s first publisher went bankrupt just as the book was released, and its rescue and reissue by another firm failed to recapture lost momentum in terms of either sales or publicity. West did, however, sell the movie rights for Miss Lonelyhearts to Twentieth Century Pictures (it appeared in late 1933 as Advice to the Lovelorn, much altered from the original). In July 1933 West followed the path that William Faulkner before him had taken, and that F. Scott Fitzgerald would take after him: he went to Hollywood to write for the movies, on contract with Columbia Pictures.

West would return to New York several times before the end of his life, but the financial attractions of Hollywood life proved substantial, if not always predictable. The movie rights to Miss Lonelyhearts brought him $4,000; by contrast, from 1931 through 1934 West earned a total of only $780 in royalties from his first three novels, including one more that sold poorly and failed to move critics, A Cool Million (1934). In 1936 he was able to earn a weekly salary of $250 as a screenwriter from a second-rate studio, Republic Productions; by 1940 he was collaborating on screenplays and adaptations that commanded as much as $25,000 from major studios. A member of the Screen Writers Guild from his earliest years in Hollywood, West was elected to the guild’s executive board in 1939.

Hollywood supplied West not only with an income, but also with a memorable subject for fiction, most fully realized in The Day of the Locust. West's final novel paints a cruel, raw, and memorable picture of late 1930s American popular culture—its new visual culture, oriented to the movies and stardom, lit by searchlights and neon; its new soundscape, saturated with radio and recordings—and of the multilayered, multiethnic, burgeoning city of Los Angeles, overlaid on an earlier Spanish California. At the center of this panorama hulks the movie industry, vehicle of the hopes and dreams of most of West's characters. Where The Dream Life of Balso Snell represents all of Western literary history as living inside the guts of a graffiti-defaced Trojan horse, Tod Hackett, the protagonist of The Day of the Locust, encounters a Trojan horse next to a Mayan temple and a Dutch windmill and a thirty-foot-high Buddha—all of them stage sets, sitting in storage on a movie studio's back lot. Although The Day of the Locust sold modestly (only 1,164 copies in its first year of publication), West's characterization of Hollywood as a “dream dump,” graveyard of both personal and high cultural ambition, remains resonant to this day. So too does the novel's style, modeled in part after the movies West regarded with love and loathing: fast-paced, assembled through cutting and collage, avid for the hard-boiled insider's knowledge of this new modern world.

West died in a car crash, along with his wife, Eileen McKenney, an aspiring actress, in 1940. The text of The Day of the Locust printed here is that of the first edition of 1939, published by Random House.

The Day of the Locust¹

I

Around quitting time, Tod Hackett heard a great din on the road outside his office. The groan of leather mingled with the jangle of iron and over all beat the tattoo of a thousand hooves. He hurried to the window.

An army of cavalry and foot² was passing. It moved like a mob; its lines broken, as though fleeing from some terrible defeat. The dolmans of the hussars,³ the heavy shakos of the guards, Hanoverian⁴ light horse, with their flat leather caps and flowing red plumes, were all jumbled together in bobbing disorder. Behind the cavalry came the infantry, a wild sea of waving sabertaches,⁵ sloped muskets, crossed shoulder belts and swinging cartridge boxes. Tod recognized the scarlet infantry of England with their white shoulder pads, the black infantry of the Duke of Brunswick,⁶ the French grenadiers with their enormous white gaiters, the Scotch with bare knees under plaid skirts.

1. Moses calls a plague of locusts upon Egypt when Pharaoh refuses to let the enslaved Israelites depart: “they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land” (Exodus 10.15). In the Book of Revelation (9.4–6), locusts return to torment “those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads. . . . And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.”

2. Costumed actors playing extras in a historical movie being filmed about the Battle of Waterloo (1815), which ended the drive of Napoleon (1769–1821) to return to power as emperor of France.

3. Cavalrymen. “Dolmans”: short-cut jackets worn as part of the hussars' uniforms.

4. From the German city-state of Hanover, allied with England against Napoleon. “Shakos”: high, cylindrical military hats.

5. Flat pouches worn alongside swords.

6. One of the commanders of the multinational army, serving under the general command of the Duke of Wellington of England, that defeated Napoleon's forces.

While he watched, a little fat man, wearing a cork sun-helmet, polo shirt and knickers, darted around the corner of the building in pursuit of the army.

“Stage Nine—you bastards—Stage Nine!” he screamed through a small megaphone.

The cavalry put spur to their horses and the infantry broke into a dog-trot. The little man in the cork hat ran after them, shaking his fist and cursing.

Tod watched until they had disappeared behind half a Mississippi steamboat, then put away his pencils and drawing board, and left the office. On the sidewalk outside the studio he stood for a moment trying to decide whether to walk home or take a streetcar. He had been in Hollywood less than three months and still found it a very exciting place, but he was lazy and didn’t like to walk. He decided to take the streetcar as far as Vine Street⁷ and walk the rest of the way.

A talent scout for National Films had brought Tod to the Coast after seeing some of his drawings in an exhibit of undergraduate work at the Yale School of Fine Arts. He had been hired by telegram. If the scout had met Tod, he probably wouldn’t have sent him to Hollywood to learn set and costume designing. His large, sprawling body, his slow blue eyes and sloppy grin made him seem completely without talent, almost doltish in fact.

Yet, despite his appearance, he was really a very complicated young man with a whole set of personalities, one inside the other like a nest of Chinese boxes. And “The Burning of Los Angeles,” a picture he was soon to paint, definitely proved he had talent.

He left the car at Vine Street. As he walked along, he examined the evening crowd. A great many of the people wore sports clothes which were not really sports clothes. Their sweaters, knickers, slacks, blue flannel jackets with brass buttons were fancy dress. The fat lady in the yachting cap was going shopping, not boating; the man in the Norfolk jacket and Tyrolean hat⁸ was returning, not from a mountain, but an insurance office; and the girl in slacks and sneaks with a bandanna around her head had just left a switchboard, not a tennis court.

Scattered among these masqueraders were people of a different type. Their clothing was somber and badly cut, bought from mail-order houses. While the others moved rapidly, darting into stores and cocktail bars, they loitered on the corners or stood with their backs to the shop windows and stared at everyone who passed. When their stare was returned, their eyes filled with hatred. At this time Tod knew very little about them except that they had come to California to die.

He was determined to learn much more. They were the people he felt he must paint. He would never again do a fat red barn, old stone wall or sturdy Nantucket fisherman. From the moment he had seen them, he had

7. A major thoroughfare in Hollywood.

8. Items of sports clothing associated, respectively, with the English countryside and the Alps. Norfolk jackets feature pockets and patches for the convenience of hunters and shooters. Tyrolean hats typically feature narrow brims, decorative bands, and a spray of feathers.

known that, despite his race, training and heritage, neither Winslow Homer nor Thomas Ryder could be his masters and he turned to Goya and Daumier.⁹

He had learned this just in time. During his last year in art school, he had begun to think that he might give up painting completely. The pleasures he received from the problems of composition and color had decreased as his facility had increased and he had realized that he was going the way of all his classmates, toward illustration or mere handsomeness. When the Hollywood job had come along, he had grabbed it despite the arguments of his friends who were certain that he was selling out and would never paint again.

He reached the end of Vine Street and began the climb into Pinyon Canyon.¹ Night had started to fall.

The edges of the trees burned with a pale violet light and their centers gradually turned from deep purple to black. The same violet piping, like a Neon tube,² outlined the tops of the ugly, humpbacked hills and they were almost beautiful.

But not even the soft wash of dusk could help the houses. Only dynamite would be of any use against the Mexican ranch houses, Samoan huts, Mediterranean villas, Egyptian and Japanese temples, Swiss chalets, Tudor cottages, and every possible combination of these styles that lined the slopes of the canyon.

When he noticed that they were all of plaster, lath and paper, he was charitable and blamed their shape on the materials used. Steel, stone and brick curb a builder's fancy a little, forcing him to distribute his stresses and weights and to keep his corners plumb, but plaster and paper know no law, not even that of gravity.

On the corner of La Huerta Road was a miniature Rhine castle with tarpaper turrets pierced for archers. Next to it was a little highly colored shack with domes and minarets out of the Arabian Nights.³ Again he was charitable. Both houses were comic, but he didn't laugh. Their desire to startle was so eager and guileless.

It is hard to laugh at the need for beauty and romance, no matter how tasteless, even horrible, the results of that need are. But it is easy to sigh. Few things are sadder than the truly monstrous.

2

The house he lived in was a nondescript affair called the San Bernardino Arms. It was an oblong three stories high, the back and sides of which

9. Honoré Daumier (1808–1879), French printmaker and painter known for his scathing caricatures of French life. Francisco Goya (1746–1828), Spanish painter and printmaker whose increasingly dark later work included images of madness and war. Homer (1836–1910), American painter noted for his seascapes. Ryder (1746–1810), English engraver noted for his illustrated Shakespeare and for engraving a famous portrait of Benjamin Franklin. The context also suggests the American painter Albert Pinkham

Ryder (1847–1917), noted for his seascapes, who was admired by early modernists.

1. Fictional, modeled after Beachwood Canyon, developed for housing in the 1920s.

2. Pioneered in France in 1910, neon lighting came into wide use in the United States in the 1920s.

3. First English edition (1706) of a famous collection of ancient and medieval Middle Eastern stories and folk tales.

were of plain, unpainted stucco, broken by even rows of unadorned windows. The façade was the color of diluted mustard and its windows, all double, were framed by pink Moorish columns which supported turnip-shaped lintels.

His room was on the third floor, but he paused for a moment on the landing of the second. It was on that floor that Faye Greener lived, in 208. When someone laughed in one of the apartments he started guiltily and continued upstairs.

As he opened his door a card fluttered to the floor. "Honest Abe Kusich," it said in large type, then underneath in smaller italics were several endorsements, printed to look like press notices.

'... the Lloyds⁴ of Hollywood' . . . Stanley Rose.

'Abe's word is better than Morgan's⁵ bonds'—Gail Brenshaw.

On the other side was a penciled message:

"Kingpin fourth, Solitair sixth. You can make some real dough on those nags."⁶

After opening the window, he took off his jacket and lay down on the bed. Through the window he could see a square of enameled sky and a spray of eucalyptus. A light breeze stirred its long, narrow leaves, making them show first their green side, then their silver one.

He began to think of "Honest Abe Kusich" in order not to think of Faye Greener. He felt comfortable and wanted to remain that way.

Abe was an important figure in a set of lithographs called "The Dancers" on which Tod was working. He was one of the dancers. Faye Greener was another and her father, Harry, still another. They changed with each plate, but the group of uneasy people who formed their audience remained the same. They stood staring at the performers in just the way that they stared at the masqueraders on Vine Street. It was their stare that drove Abe and the others to spin crazily and leap into the air with twisted backs like hooked trout.

Despite the sincere indignation that Abe's grotesque depravity aroused in him, he welcomed his company. The little man excited him and in that way made him feel certain of his need to paint.

He had first met Abe when he was living on Ivar Street,⁷ in a hotel called the Chateau Mirabella. Another name for Ivar Street was "Lysol⁸ Alley," and the Chateau was mainly inhabited by hustlers, their managers, trainers and advance agents.

In the morning its halls reeked of antiseptic. Tod didn't like this odor. Moreover, the rent was high because it included police protection, a service for which he had no need. He wanted to move, but inertia and the fact that he didn't know where to go kept him in the Chateau until he met Abe. The meeting was accidental.

He was on the way to his room late one night when he saw what he supposed was a pile of soiled laundry lying in front of the door across the hall

4. A famous London-based insurer and banker.

5. J. P. Morgan (1837–1913), the leading American financier at the turn of the 20th century.

6. Advice for betting on a horse race.

7. I.e., Ivar Avenue; runs off Hollywood Boulevard.

8. Brand name of a popular disinfectant, introduced in 1889, that came into widespread use during the 1918 flu pandemic.

from his own. Just as he was passing it, the bundle moved and made a peculiar noise. He struck a match, thinking it might be a dog wrapped in a blanket. When the light flared up, he saw it was a tiny man.

The match went out and he hastily lit another. It was a male dwarf rolled up in a woman's flannel bathrobe. The round thing at the end was his slightly hydrocephalic⁹ head. A slow, choked snore bubbled from it.

The hall was cold and draughty. Tod decided to wake the man and stirred him with his toe. He groaned and opened his eyes.

"You oughn't to sleep there."

"The hell you say," said the dwarf, closing his eyes again.

"You'll catch cold."

This friendly observation angered the little man still more.

"I want my clothes!" he bellowed.

The bottom of the door next to which he was lying filled with light. Tod decided to take a chance and knock. A few seconds later a woman opened it part way.

"What the hell do you want?" she demanded.

"There's a friend of yours out here who . . ."

Neither of them let him finish.

"So what!" she barked, slamming the door.

"Give me my clothes, you bitch!" roared the dwarf.

She opened the door again and began to hurl things into the hall. A jacket and trousers, a shirt, socks, shoes and underwear, a tie and hat followed each other through the air in rapid succession. With each article went a special curse.

Tod whistled with amazement.

"Some gal!"

"You bet," said the dwarf. "A lollapalooza—all slut and a yard wide."

He laughed at his own joke, using a high-pitched cackle more dwarflike than anything that had come from him so far, then struggled to his feet and arranged the voluminous robe so that he could walk without tripping. Tod helped him gather his scattered clothing.

"Say, mister," he asked, "could I dress in your place?"

Tod let him into his bathroom. While waiting for him to reappear, he couldn't help imagining what had happened in the woman's apartment. He began to feel sorry for having interfered. But when the dwarf came out wearing his hat, Tod felt better.

The little man's hat fixed almost everything. That year Tyrolean hats were being worn a great deal along Hollywood Boulevard and the dwarf's was a fine specimen. It was the proper magic green color and had a high, conical crown. There should have been a brass buckle on the front, but otherwise it was quite perfect.

The rest of his outfit didn't go well with the hat. Instead of shoes with long points and a leather apron, he wore a blue, double-breasted suit and a black shirt with a yellow tie. Instead of a crooked thorn stick, he carried a rolled copy of the Daily Running Horse.

9. Enlarged because of fluid accumulating inside the skull.

"That's what I get for fooling with four-bit broads," he said by way of greeting.

Tod nodded and tried to concentrate on the green hat. His ready acquiescence seemed to irritate the little man.

"No quiff can give Abe Kusich the fingeroo and get away with it," he said bitterly. "Not when I can get her leg broke for twenty bucks and I got twenty."

He took out a thick billfold and shook it at Tod.

"So she thinks she can give me the fingeroo, hah? Well, let me tell . . ."

Tod broke in hastily.

"You're right, Mr. Kusich."

The dwarf came over to where Tod was sitting and for a moment Tod thought he was going to climb into his lap, but he only asked his name and shook hands. The little man had a powerful grip.

"Let me tell you something, Hackett, if you hadn't come along, I'da broke in the door. That dame thinks she can give me the fingeroo, but she's got another thinkola coming. But thanks anyway."

"Forget it."

"I don't forget nothing. I remember. I remember those who do me dirt and those who do me favors."

He wrinkled his brow and was silent for a moment.

"Listen," he finally said, "seeing as you helped me, I got to return it. I don't want anybody going around saying Abe Kusich owes him anything. So I'll tell you what. I'll give you a good one for the fifth at Caliente.¹ You put a fiver on its nose and it'll get you twenty smackeroos. What I'm telling you is strictly correct."

Tod didn't know how to answer and his hesitation offended the little man.

"Would I give you a bum steer?" he demanded, scowling. "Would I?"

Tod walked toward the door to get rid of him.

"No," he said.

"Then why won't you bet, hah?"

"What's the name of the horse?" Tod asked, hoping to calm him.

The dwarf had followed him to the door, pulling the bathrobe after him by one sleeve. Hat and all, he came to a foot below Tod's belt.

"Tragopan. He's a certain, sure winner. I know the guy who owns him and he gave me the office."

"Is he a Greek?" Tod asked.

He was being pleasant in order to hide the attempt he was making to maneuver the dwarf through the door.

"Yeh, he's a Greek. Do you know him?"

"No."

"No?"

"No," said Tod with finality.

"Keep your drawers on," ordered the dwarf, "all I want to know is how you know he's a Greek if you don't know him?"

1. The Agua Caliente racetrack in Baja California, which opened in 1929, was popular with Hollywood celebrities.

His eyes narrowed with suspicion and he clenched his fists.

Tod smiled to placate him.

"I just guessed it."

"You did?"

The dwarf hunched his shoulders as though he were going to pull a gun or throw a punch. Tod backed off and tried to explain.

"I guessed he was a Greek because Tragopan is a Greek word that means pheasant."

The dwarf was far from satisfied.

"How do you know what it means? You ain't a Greek?"

"No, but I know a few Greek words."

"So you're a wise guy, hah, a know-it-all."

He took a short step forward, moving on his toes, and Tod got set to block a punch.

"A college man, hah? Well, let me tell . . ."

His foot caught in the wrapper and he fell forward on his hands. He forgot Tod and cursed the bathrobe, then got started on the woman again.

"So she thinks she can give me the fingeroo."

He kept poking himself in the chest with his thumbs.

"Who gave her forty bucks for an abortion? Who? And another ten to go to the country for a rest that time. To a ranch I sent her. And who got her fiddle out of hock that time in Santa Monica? Who?"

"That's right," Tod said, getting ready to give him a quick shove through the door.

But he didn't have to shove him. The little man suddenly darted out of the room and ran down the hall, dragging the bathrobe after him.

A few days later, Tod went into a stationery store on Vine Street to buy a magazine. While he was looking through the rack, he felt a tug at the bottom of his jacket. It was Abe Kusich, the dwarf, again.

"How's things?" he demanded.

Tod was surprised to find that he was just as truculent as he had been the other night. Later, when he got to know him better, he discovered that Abe's pugnacity was often a joke. When he used it on his friends, they played with him like one does with a growling puppy, staving off his mad rushes and then baiting him to rush again.

"Fair enough," Tod said, "but I think I'll move."

He had spent most of Sunday looking for a place to live and was full of the subject. The moment he mentioned it, however, he knew that he had made a mistake. He tried to end the matter by turning away, but the little man blocked him. He evidently considered himself an expert on the housing situation. After naming and discarding a dozen possibilities without a word from Tod, he finally hit on the San Bernardino Arms.

"That's the place for you, the San Berdoo. I live there, so I ought to know. The owner's strictly from hunger. Come on, I'll get you fixed up swell."

"I don't know, I . . ." Tod began.

The dwarf bridled instantly, and appeared to be mortally offended.

"I suppose it ain't good enough for you. Well, let me tell you something, you . . ."

Tod allowed himself to be bullied and went with the dwarf to Pinyon Canyon. The rooms in the San Berdoo were small and not very clean. He rented one without hesitation, however, when he saw Faye Greener in the hall.

3

Tod had fallen asleep. When he woke again, it was after eight o'clock. He took a bath and shaved, then dressed in front of the bureau mirror. He tried to watch his fingers as he fixed his collar and tie, but his eyes kept straying to the photograph that was pushed into the upper corner of the frame.

It was a picture of Faye Greener, a still from a two-reel farce in which she had worked as an extra. She had given him the photograph willingly enough, had even autographed it in a large, wild hand, "Affectionately yours, Faye Greener," but she refused his friendship, or, rather, insisted on keeping it impersonal. She had told him why. He had nothing to offer her, neither money nor looks, and she could only love a handsome man and would only let a wealthy man love her. Tod was a "good-hearted man," and she liked "good-hearted men," but only as friends. She wasn't hard-boiled. It was just that she put love on a special plane, where a man without money or looks couldn't move.

Tod grunted with annoyance as he turned to the photograph. In it she was wearing a harem costume, full Turkish trousers, breastplates and a monkey jacket, and lay stretched out on a silken divan. One hand held a beer bottle and the other a pewter stein.

He had gone all the way to Glendale to see her in that movie. It was about an American drummer who gets lost in the seraglio² of a Damascus merchant and has a lot of fun with the female inmates. Faye played one of the dancing girls. She had only one line to speak, "Oh, Mr. Smith!" and spoke it badly.

She was a tall girl with wide, straight shoulders and long, swordlike legs. Her neck was long, too, and columnar. Her face was much fuller than the rest of her body would lead you to expect and much larger. It was a moon face, wide at the cheek bones and narrow at chin and brow. She wore her "platinum"³ hair long, letting it fall almost to her shoulders in back, but kept it away from her face and ears with a narrow blue ribbon that went under it and was tied on top of her head with a little bow.

She was supposed to look drunk and she did, but not with alcohol. She lay stretched out on the divan with her arms and legs spread, as though welcoming a lover, and her lips were parted in a heavy, sullen smile. She was supposed to look inviting, but the invitation wasn't to pleasure.

Tod lit a cigarette and inhaled with a nervous gasp. He started to fool with his tie again, but had to go back to the photograph.

Her invitation wasn't to pleasure, but to struggle, hard and sharp, closer to murder than to love. If you threw yourself on her, it would be like throwing yourself from the parapet of a skyscraper. You would do it with a scream. You couldn't expect to rise again. Your teeth would be driven into your skull

2. Harem.

3. Bleached blond. Frank Capra's film Platinum Blonde (1931) featured Jean Harlow in the title role and popularized the damaging bleaching process used to achieve her dramatic white-blond hair color.

like nails into a pine board and your back would be broken. You wouldn't even have time to sweat or close your eyes.

He managed to laugh at his language, but it wasn't a real laugh and nothing was destroyed by it.

If she would only let him, he would be glad to throw himself, no matter what the cost. But she wouldn't have him. She didn't love him and he couldn't further her career. She wasn't sentimental and she had no need for tenderness, even if he were capable of it.

When he had finished dressing, he hurried out of the room. He had promised to go to a party at Claude Estee's.

4

Claude was a successful screen writer who lived in a big house that was an exact reproduction of the old Dupuy mansion near Biloxi, Mississippi. When Tod came up the walk between the boxwood hedges, he greeted him from the enormous, two-story porch by doing the impersonation that went with the Southern colonial architecture. He teetered back and forth on his heels like a Civil War colonel and made believe he had a large belly.

He had no belly at all. He was a dried-up little man with the rubbed features and stooped shoulders of a postal clerk. The shiny mohair coat and nondescript trousers of that official would have become him, but he was dressed, as always, elaborately. In the buttonhole of his brown jacket was a lemon flower. His trousers were of reddish Harris tweed with a hound tooth check and on his feet were a pair of magnificent, rust-colored blüchers.⁴ His shirt was ivory flannel and his knitted tie⁵ a red that was almost black.

While Tod mounted the steps to reach his outstretched hand, he shouted to the butler.

"Here, you black rascal! A mint julep."

A Chinese servant came running with a Scotch and soda.

After talking to Tod for a moment, Claude started him in the direction of Alice, his wife, who was at the other end of the porch.

"Don't run off," he whispered. "We're going to a sporting house."⁶

Alice was sitting in a wicker swing with a woman named Mrs. Joan Schwartzen. When she asked him if he was playing any tennis, Mrs. Schwartzen interrupted her.

"How silly, batting an inoffensive ball across something that ought to be used to catch fish on account of millions are starving for a bite of herring."

"Joan's a female tennis champ," Alice explained.

Mrs. Schwartzen was a big girl with large hands and feet and square, bony shoulders. She had a pretty, eighteen-year-old face and a thirty-five-year-old neck that was veined and sinewy. Her deep sunburn, ruby colored with a slight blue tint, kept the contrast between her face and neck from being too startling.

4. Lace-up men's shoes.

5. Tweed, flannel, and knitted ties are typically associated with casual, cold-weather men's clothing.

6. A brothel.

"Well, I wish we were going to a brothel this minute," she said. "I adore them."

She turned to Tod and fluttered her eyelids.

"Don't you, Mr. Hackett?"

"That's right, Joan darling," Alice answered for him. "Nothing like a bagnio⁷ to set a fellow up. Hair of the dog that bit you."

"How dare you insult me!"

She stood up and took Tod's arm.

"Convoy me over there."

She pointed to the group of men with whom Claude was standing.

"For God's sake, convoy her," Alice said. "She thinks they're telling dirty stories."

Mrs. Schwartzen pushed right among them, dragging Tod after her.

"Are you talking smut?" she asked. "I adore smut."

They all laughed politely.

"No, shop," said someone.

"I don't believe it. I can tell from the beast in your voices. Go ahead, do say something obscene."

This time no one laughed.

Tod tried to disengage her arm, but she kept a firm grip on it. There was a moment of awkward silence, then the man she had interrupted tried to make a fresh start.

"The picture business is too humble," he said. "We ought to resent people like Coombes."

"That's right," said another man. "Guys like that come out here, make a lot of money, grouse all the time about the place, flop on their assignments, then go back East and tell dialect stories about producers they've never met."

"My God," Mrs. Schwartzen said to Tod in a loud, stagey whisper, "they are talking shop."

"Let's look for the man with the drinks," Tod said.

"No. Take me into the garden. Have you seen what's in the swimming pool?"

She pulled him along.

The air of the garden was heavy with the odor of mimosa and honeysuckle. Through a slit in the blue serge sky poked a grained moon that looked like an enormous bone button. A little flagstone path, made narrow by its border of oleander, led to the edge of the sunken pool. On the bottom, near the deep end, he could see a heavy, black mass of some kind.

"What is it?" he asked.

She kicked a switch that was hidden at the base of a shrub and a row of submerged floodlights illuminated the green water. The thing was a dead horse, or, rather, a life-size, realistic reproduction of one. Its legs stuck up stiff and straight and it had an enormous, distended belly. Its hammerhead lay twisted to one side and from its mouth, which was set in an agonized grin, hung a heavy, black tongue.

7. A brothel.

"Isn't it marvelous!" exclaimed Mrs. Schwartz, clapping her hands and jumping up and down excitedly like a little girl.

"What's it made of?"

"Then you weren't fooled? How impolite! It's rubber, of course. It cost lots of money."

"But why?"

"To amuse. We were looking at the pool one day and somebody, Jerry Appis, I think, said that it needed a dead horse on the bottom, so Alice got one. Don't you think it looks cute?"

"Very."

"You're just an old meanie. Think how happy the Estees must feel, showing it to people and listening to their merriment and their oh's and ah's of unconfined delight."

She stood on the edge of the pool and "ohed and ahed" rapidly several times in succession.

"Is it still there?" someone called.

Tod turned and saw two women and a man coming down the path.

"I think its belly's going to burst," Mrs. Schwartz shouted to them gleefully.

"Goody," said the man, hurrying to look.

"But it's only full of air," said one of the women.

Mrs. Schwartz made believe she was going to cry.

"You're just like that mean Mr. Hackett. You just won't let me cherish my illusions."

Tod was half way to the house when she called after him. He waved but kept going.

The men with Claude were still talking shop.

"But how are you going to get rid of the illiterate mockies⁸ that run it? They've got a strangle hold on the industry. Maybe they're intellectual stumblebums, but they're damn good business men. Or at least they know how to go into receivership and come up with a gold watch in their teeth."

"They ought to put some of the millions they make back into the business again. Like Rockefeller does with his Foundation.⁹ People used to hate the Rockefellers, but now instead of hollering about their ill-gotten oil dough, everybody praises them for what the Foundation does. It's a swell stunt and pictures could do the same thing. Have a Cinema Foundation and make contributions to Science and Art. You know, give the racket a front."

Tod took Claude to one side to say good night, but he wouldn't let him go. He led him into the library and mixed two double Scotches. They sat down on the couch facing the fireplace.

"You haven't been to Audrey Jennings's place?" Claude asked.

"No, but I've heard tell of it."

"Then you've got to come along."

8. Derogatory slang for Jews.

9. American oil tycoon J. D. Rockefeller (1839– 1937) established the Rockefeller Foundation in 1913.

"I don't like pro-sport."

"We won't indulge in any. We're just going to see a movie."

"I get depressed."

"Not at Jennings's you won't. She makes vice attractive by skillful packaging. Her dive's a triumph of industrial design."

Tod liked to hear him talk. He was master of an involved comic rhetoric that permitted him to express his moral indignation and still keep his reputation for worldliness and wit.

Tod fed him another lead. "I don't care how much cellophane she wraps it in," he said—"nautch joints¹ are depressing, like all places for deposit, banks, mail boxes, tombs, vending machines."

"Love is like a vending machine, eh? Not bad. You insert a coin and press home the lever. There's some mechanical activity inside the bowels of the device. You receive a small sweet, frown at yourself in the dirty mirror, adjust your hat, take a firm grip on your umbrella and walk away, trying to look as though nothing had happened. It's good, but it's not for pictures."

Tod played straight again.

"That's not it. I've been chasing a girl and it's like carrying something a little too large to conceal in your pocket, like a briefcase or a small valise. It's uncomfortable."

"I know, I know. It's always uncomfortable. First your right hand gets tired, then your left. You put the valise down and sit on it, but people are surprised and stop to stare at you, so you move on. You hide it behind a tree and hurry away, but someone finds it and runs after you to return it. It's a small valise when you leave home in the morning, cheap and with a bad handle, but by evening it's a trunk with brass corners and many foreign labels. I know. It's good, but it won't film. You've got to remember your audience. What about the barber in Purdue? He's been cutting hair all day and he's tired. He doesn't want to see some dope carrying a valise or fooling with a nickel machine. What the barber wants is armor and glamor."

The last part was for himself and he sighed heavily. He was about to begin again when the Chinese servant came in and said that the others were ready to leave for Mrs. Jennings's.

5

They started out in several cars. Tod rode in the front of the one Claude drove and as they went down Sunset Boulevard he described Mrs. Jennings for him. She had been a fairly prominent actress in the days of silent films, but sound made it impossible for her to get work.² Instead of becoming an extra or a bit player like many other old stars, she had shown excellent business sense and had opened a callhouse.³ She wasn't vicious. Far from it. She ran her business just as other women run lending libraries, shrewdly and with taste.

1. Brothels.

2. The arrival of films with recorded sound, beginning in 1927, ended the careers of many performers who had marked accents or voices otherwise not acceptable in the new medium.

3. Brothel.

None of the girls lived on the premises. You telephoned and she sent a girl over. The charge was thirty dollars for a single night of sport and Mrs. Jennings kept fifteen of it. Some people might think that fifty per cent is a high brokerage fee, but she really earned every cent of it. There was a big overhead. She maintained a beautiful house for the girls to wait in and a car and a chauffeur to deliver them to the clients.

Then, too, she had to move in the kind of society where she could make the right contacts. After all, not every man can afford thirty dollars. She permitted her girls to service only men of wealth and position, not to say taste and discretion. She was so particular that she insisted on meeting the prospective sportsman before servicing him. She had often said, and truthfully, that she would not let a girl of hers go to a man with whom she herself would not be willing to sleep.

And she was really cultured. All the most distinguished visitors considered it quite a lark to meet her. They were disappointed, however, when they discovered how refined she was. They wanted to talk about certain lively matters of universal interest, but she insisted on discussing Gertrude Stein and Juan Gris.⁴ No matter how hard the distinguished visitor tried, and some had been known to go to really great lengths, he could never find a flaw in her refinement or make a breach in her culture.

Claude was still using his peculiar rhetoric on Mrs. Jennings when she came to the door of her house to greet them.

"It's so nice to see you again," she said. "I was telling Mrs. Prince at tea only yesterday—the Estees are my favorite couple."

She was a handsome woman, smooth and buttery, with fair hair and a red complexion.

She led them into a small drawing room whose color scheme was violet, gray and rose. The Venetian blinds were rose, as was the ceiling, and the walls were covered with a pale gray paper that had a tiny, widely spaced flower design in violet. On one wall hung a silver screen, the kind that rolls up, and against the opposite wall, on each side of a cherry-wood table, was a row of chairs covered with rose and gray glazed chintz⁵ bound in violet piping. There was a small projection machine on the table and a young man in evening dress was fumbling with it.

She waved them to their seats. A waiter then came in and asked what they wanted to drink. When their orders had been taken and filled, she flipped the light switch and the young man started his machine. It whirred merrily, but he had trouble in getting it focused.

"What are we going to see first?" Mrs. Schwartz asked.

"Le Predicament de Marie."

"That sounds ducky."

"It's charming, utterly charming," said Mrs. Jennings.

"Yes," said the cameraman, who was still having trouble. "I love Le Predicament de Marie. It has a marvelous quality that is too exciting."

There was a long delay, during which he fussed desperately with his machine. Mrs. Schwartz started to whistle and stamp her feet and the

4. Members of the modernist art community of Paris. Gris (1887–1927), Spanish painter. Stein (1874–1946), American writer.

5. Cotton fabric, usually printed in floral patterns, popular in 19th-century clothing and décor.

others joined in. They imitated a rowdy audience in the days of the nickel-odeon.⁶

“Get a move on, slow poke.”

“What’s your hurry? Here’s your hat.”

“Get a horse!”

“Get out and get under!”

The young man finally found the screen with his light beam and the film began.

LE PREDICAMENT DE MARIE

ou

LA BONNE DISTRAIT⁷

Marie, the “bonne,” was a buxom young girl in a tight-fitting black silk uniform with very short skirts. On her head was a tiny lace cap. In the first scene, she was shown serving dinner to a middle-class family in an oak-paneled dining room full of heavy, carved furniture. The family was very respectable and consisted of a bearded, frock-coated father, a mother with a whalebone collar and a cameo brooch, a tall, thin son with a long mustache and almost no chin and a little girl wearing a large bow in her hair and a crucifix on a gold chain around her neck.

After some low comedy with father’s beard and the soup, the actors settled down seriously to their theme. It was evident that while the whole family desired Marie, she only desired the young girl. Using his napkin to hide his activities, the old man pinched Marie, the son tried to look down the neck of her dress and the mother patted her knee. Marie, for her part, surreptitiously fondled the child.

The scene changed to Marie’s room. She undressed and got into a chiffon negligee, leaving on only her black silk stockings and high-heeled shoes. She was making an elaborate night toilet when the child entered. Marie took her on her lap and started to kiss her. There was a knock on the door. Consternation. She hid the child in the closet and let in the bearded father. He was suspicious and she had to accept his advances. He was embracing her when there was another knock. Again consternation and tableau.⁸ This time it was the mustachioed son. Marie hid the father under the bed. No sooner had the son begun to grow warm than there was another knock. Marie made him climb into a large blanket chest. The new caller was the lady of the house. She, too, was just settling down to work when there was another knock.

Who could it be? A telegram? A policeman? Frantically Marie counted the different hiding places. The whole family was present. She tiptoed to the door and listened.

“Who can it be that wishes to enter now?” read the title card.

And there the machine stuck. The young man in evening dress became as frantic as Marie. When he got it running again, there was a flash of light and the film whizzed through the apparatus until it had all run out.

6. In the early years of film, a movie theater charging 5 cents for admission.

7. Marie’s Predicament; or the Distracted Maid (French); the correct French feminine form would be “Distraite.”

8. Pause in the action during which the performers remain motionless.

"I'm sorry, extremely," he said. "I'll have to rewind."

"It's a frameup," someone yelled.

"Fake!"

"Cheat!"

"The old teaser routine!"

They stamped their feet and whistled.

Under cover of the mock riot, Tod sneaked out. He wanted to get some fresh air. The waiter, whom he found loitering in the hall, showed him to the patio in back of the house.

On his return, he peeked into the different rooms. In one of them he found a large number of miniature dogs in a curio cabinet. There were glass pointers, silver beagles, porcelain schnauzers, stone dachshunds, aluminum bulldogs, onyx whippets, china bassets, wooden spaniels. Every recognized breed was represented and almost every material that could be sculptured, cast or carved.

While he was admiring the little figures, he heard a girl singing. He thought he recognized her voice and peeked into the hall. It was Mary Dove, one of Faye Greener's best friends.

Perhaps Faye also worked for Mrs. Jennings. If so, for thirty dollars . . .

He went back to see the rest of the film.

6

Tod's hope that he could end his trouble by paying a small fee didn't last long. When he got Claude to ask Mrs. Jennings about Faye, that lady said she had never heard of the girl. Claude then asked her to inquire through Mary Dove. A few days later she phoned him to say there was nothing doing. The girl wasn't available.

Tod wasn't really disappointed. He didn't want Faye that way, not at least while he still had a chance some other way. Lately, he had begun to think he had a good one. Harry, her father, was sick and that gave him an excuse for hanging around their apartment. He ran errands and kept the old man company. To repay his kindness, she permitted him the intimacies of a family friend. He hoped to deepen her gratitude and make it serious.

Apart from this purpose, he was interested in Harry and enjoyed visiting him. The old man was a clown and Tod had all the painter's usual love of clowns. But what was more important, he felt that his clownship was a clue to the people who stared (a painter's clue, that is—a clue in the form of a symbol), just as Faye's dreams were another.

He sat near Harry's bed and listened to his stories by the hour. Forty years in vaudeville and burlesque had provided him with an infinite number of them. As he put it, his life had consisted of a lightning series of "nip-ups," "high-gruesomes," "flying-W's" and "hundred-and-eights"⁹ done to escape a barrage of "exploding stoves." An "exploding stove" was any catastrophe, natural or human, from a flood in Medicine Hat, Wyoming, to an angry policeman in Moose Factory, Ontario.

When Harry had first begun his stage career, he had probably restricted his clowning to the boards,¹ but now he clowned continuously. It was his

9. Acrobatic maneuvers.

1. I.e., to the stage.

sole method of defense. Most people, he had discovered, won't go out of their way to punish a clown.

He used a set of elegant gestures to accent the comedy of his bent, hopeless figure and wore a special costume, dressing like a banker, a cheap, unconvincing, imitation banker. The costume consisted of a greasy derby with an unusually high crown, a wing collar and polka dot four-in-hand, a shiny double-breasted jacket and gray-striped trousers. His outfit fooled no one, but then he didn't intend it to fool anyone. His slyness was of a different sort.

On the stage he was a complete failure and knew it. Yet he claimed to have once come very close to success. To prove how close, he made Tod read an old clipping from the theatrical section of the Sunday Times.

"BEDRAGGLED HARLEQUIN," it was headed.

"The commedia del' arte² is not dead, but lives on in Brooklyn, or was living there last week on the stage of the Oglethorpe Theatre in the person of one Harry Greener. Mr. Greener is of a troupe called 'The Flying Lings,' who, by the time this reaches you, have probably moved on to Mystic, Connecticut, or some other place more fitting than the borough of large families. If you have the time and really love the theatre, by all means seek out the Lings wherever they may be.

"Mr. Greener, the bedraggled Harlequin of our caption, is not bedraggled but clean, neat and sweet when he first comes on. By the time the Lings, four muscular Orientals, finish with him, however, he is plenty bedraggled. He is tattered and bloody, but still sweet.

"When Mr. Greener enters the trumpets are properly silent. Mama Ling is spinning a plate on the end of a stick held in her mouth, Papa Ling is doing cartwheels, Sister Ling is juggling fans and Sonny Ling is hanging from the proscenium arch by his pigtail. As he inspects his strenuous colleagues, Mr. Greener tries to hide his confusion under some much too obvious worldliness. He ventures to tickle Sister and receives a powerful kick in the belly in return for this innocent attention. Having been kicked, he is on familiar ground and begins to tell a dull joke. Father Ling sneaks up behind him and tosses him to Brother, who looks the other way. Mr. Greener lands on the back of his neck. He shows his mettle by finishing his dull story from a recumbent position. When he stands up, the audience, which failed to laugh at his joke, laughs at his limp, so he continues lame for the rest of the act.

"Mr. Greener begins another story, even longer and duller than his first. Just before he arrives at the gag line, the orchestra blares loudly and drowns him out. He is very patient and very brave. He begins again, but the orchestra will not let him finish. The pain that almost, not quite, thank God, crumples his stiff little figure would be unbearable if it were not obviously make-believe. It is gloriously funny.

"The finale is superb. While the Ling Family flies through the air, Mr. Greener, held to the ground by his sense of reality and his knowledge of gravitation, tries hard to make the audience think that he is neither surprised nor worried by the rocketing Orientals. It's familiar stuff, his hands signal, but his face denies this. As time goes on and no one is hurt, he regains his assurance. The acrobats ignore him, so he ignores the acrobats. His is the final victory; the applause is for him.

2. Italian popular theater form, originating in the 16th century, in which Harlequin, a comic servant traditionally dressed in a checkered costume, is a stock character.

“My first thought was that some producer should put Mr. Greener into a big revue against a background of beautiful girls and glittering curtains. But my second was that this would be a mistake. I am afraid that Mr. Greener, like certain humble field plants which die when transferred to richer soil, had better be left to bloom in vaudeville against a background of ventriloquists and lady bicycle riders.”

Harry had more than a dozen copies of this article, several on rag paper.³ After trying to get a job by inserting a small advertisement in *Variety*⁴ (“. . . ‘some producer should put Mr. Greener into a big revue . . .’ The Times”), he had come to Hollywood, thinking to earn a living playing comedy bits in films. There proved to be little demand for his talents, however. As he himself put it, he “stank from hunger.” To supplement his meagre income from the studios, he peddled silver polish which he made in the bathroom of the apartment out of chalk, soap and yellow axle grease. When Faye wasn’t at Central Casting, she took him around on his peddling trips in her Model T Ford. It was on their last expedition together that he had fallen sick.

It was on this trip that Faye acquired a new suitor by the name of Homer Simpson. About a week after Harry had taken to his bed, Tod met Homer for the first time. He was keeping the old man company when their conversation was interrupted by a light knock on the apartment door. Tod answered it and found a man standing in the hall with flowers for Faye and a bottle of port wine for her father.

Tod examined him eagerly. He didn’t mean to be rude but at first glance this man seemed an exact model for the kind of person who comes to California to die, perfect in every detail down to fever eyes and unruly hands.

“My name is Homer Simpson,” the man gasped, then shifted uneasily and patted his perfectly dry forehead with a folded handkerchief.

“Won’t you come in?” Tod asked.

He shook his head heavily and thrust the wine and flowers at Tod. Before Tod could say anything, he had lumbered off.

Tod saw that he was mistaken. Homer Simpson was only physically the type. The men he meant were not shy.

He took the gifts in to Harry, who didn’t seem at all surprised. He said Homer was one of his grateful customers.

“That Miracle Polish of mine sure does fetch ‘em.”

Later, when Faye came home and heard the story, she was very much amused. They both told Tod how they had happened to meet Homer, interrupting themselves and each other every few seconds to laugh.

The next night Tod saw Homer staring at the apartment house from the shadow of a date palm on the opposite side of the street. He watched him for a few minutes, then called out a friendly greeting. Without replying, Homer ran away. On the next day and the one after, Tod again saw him lurking near the palm tree. He finally caught him by approaching the tree silently from the rear.

3. Heavy, expensive paper.

4. A major trade journal of the entertainment industry since its launch in 1905.

“Hello, Mr. Simpson,” Tod said softly. “The Greeners were very grateful for your gift.”

This time Simpson didn’t move, perhaps because Tod had him backed against the tree.

“That’s fine,” he blurted out. “I was passing . . . I live up the street.”

Tod managed to keep their conversation going for several minutes before he escaped again.

The next time Tod was able to approach him without the stalk. From then on, he responded very quickly to his advances. Sympathy, even of the most obvious sort, made him articulate, almost garrulous.

7

Tod was right about one thing at least. Like most of the people he was interested in, Homer was a Middle-Westerner. He came from a little town near Des Moines, Iowa, called Wayneville, where he had worked for twenty years in a hotel.

One day, while sitting in the park in the rain, he had caught cold and his cold developed into pneumonia. When he came out of the hospital, he found that the hotel had hired a new bookkeeper. They offered to take him on again, but his doctor advised him to go to California for a rest. The doctor had an authoritative manner, so Homer left Wayneville for the Coast.

After living for a week in a railroad hotel in Los Angeles, he rented a cottage in Pinyon Canyon. It was only the second house the real estate agent showed him, but he took it because he was tired and because the agent was a bully.

He rather liked the way the cottage was located. It was the last house in the canyon and the hills rose directly behind the garage. They were covered with lupines, Canterbury bells, poppies, and several varieties of large yellow daisy. There were also some scrub pines, Joshua and eucalyptus trees. The agent told him that he would see doves and plumed quail, but during all the time he lived there, he saw only a few large, black velvet spiders and a lizard. He grew very fond of the lizard.

The house was cheap because it was hard to rent. Most of the people who took cottages in that neighborhood wanted them to be “Spanish” and this one, so the agent claimed, was “Irish.” Homer thought that the place looked kind of queer, but the agent insisted that it was cute.

The house was queer. It had an enormous and very crooked stone chimney, little dormer windows with big hoods and a thatched roof that came down very low on both sides of the front door. This door was of gumwood painted like fumed oak and it hung on enormous hinges. Although made by machine, the hinges had been carefully stamped to appear hand-forged. The same kind of care and skill had been used to make the roof thatching, which was not really straw but heavy fireproof paper colored and ribbed to look like straw.

The prevailing taste had been followed in the living room. It was “Spanish.” The walls were pale orange flecked with pink and on them hung several silk armorial banners in red and gold. A big galleon stood on the mantel-piece. Its hull was plaster, its sails paper and its rigging wire. In the fireplace was a variety of cactus in gaily colored Mexican pots. Some of the plants were made of rubber and cork; others were real.

The room was lit by wall fixtures in the shape of galleons with pointed amber bulbs projecting from their decks. The table held a lamp with a paper shade, oiled to look like parchment, that had several more galleons painted on it. On each side of the windows red velvet draperies hung from black, double-headed spears.

The furniture consisted of a heavy couch that had fat monks for legs and was covered with faded red damask, and three swollen armchairs, also red. In the center of the room was a very long mahogany table. It was of the trestle type and studded with large-headed bronze nails. Beside each of the chairs was a small end table, the same color and design as the big one, but with a colored tile let into the top.

In the two small bedrooms still another style had been used. This the agent had called "New England." There was a spool bed made of iron grained like wood, a Windsor chair of the kind frequently seen in tea shops, and a Governor Winthrop dresser⁵ painted to look like unpainted pine. On the floor was a small hooked rug. On the wall facing the dresser was a colored etching of a snowbound Connecticut farmhouse, complete with wolf. Both of these rooms were exactly alike in every detail. Even the pictures were duplicates.

There was also a bathroom and a kitchen.

8

It took Homer only a few minutes to get settled in his new home. He unpacked his trunk, hung his two suits, both dark gray, in the closet of one of his bedrooms and put his shirts and underclothes into the dresser drawers. He made no attempt to rearrange the furniture.

After an aimless tour of the house and the yard, he sat down on the couch in the living room. He sat as though waiting for someone in the lobby of a hotel. He remained that way for almost half an hour without moving anything but his hands, then got up and went into the bedroom and sat down on the edge of the bed.

Although it was still early in the afternoon, he felt very sleepy. He was afraid to stretch out and go to sleep. Not because he had bad dreams, but because it was so hard for him to wake again. When he fell asleep, he was always afraid that he would never get up.

But his fear wasn't as strong as his need. He got his alarm clock and set it for seven o'clock, then lay down with it next to his ear. Two hours later, it seemed like seconds to him, the alarm went off. The bell rang for a full minute before he began to work laboriously toward consciousness. The struggle was a hard one. He groaned. His head trembled and his feet shot out. Finally his eyes opened, then widened. Once more the victory was his.

He lay stretched out on the bed, collecting his senses and testing the different parts of his body. Every part was awake but his hands. They still slept. He was not surprised. They demanded special attention, had always demanded it. When he had been a child, he used to stick pins into them and once had even thrust them into a fire. Now he used only cold water.

5. A dresser typically set on short legs and featuring a fold-down desktop, named for John Winthrop (1587/8–1649), first governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony from 1630 to 1633. "Windsor chair": a wooden chair with a curved bentwood back.

He got out of bed in sections, like a poorly made automaton, and carried his hands into the bathroom. He turned on the cold water. When the basin was full, he plunged his hands in up to the wrists. They lay quietly on the bottom like a pair of strange aquatic animals. When they were thoroughly chilled and began to crawl about, he lifted them out and hid them in a towel.

He was cold. He ran hot water into the tub and began to undress, fumbling with the buttons of his clothing as though he were undressing a stranger. He was naked before the tub was full enough to get in and he sat down on a stool to wait. He kept his enormous hands folded quietly on his belly. Although absolutely still, they seemed curbed rather than resting.

Except for his hands, which belonged on a piece of monumental sculpture, and his small head, he was well proportioned. His muscles were large and round and he had a full, heavy chest. Yet there was something wrong. For all his size and shape, he looked neither strong nor fertile. He was like one of Picasso's great sterile athletes, who brood hopelessly on pink sand, staring at veined marble waves.⁶

When the tub was full, he got in and sank down in the hot water. He grunted his comfort. But in another moment he would begin to remember, in just another moment. He tried to fool his memory by overwhelming it with tears and brought up the sobs that were always lurking uneasily in his chest. He cried softly at first, then harder. The sound he made was like that of a dog lapping gruel. He concentrated on how miserable and lonely he was, but it didn't work. The thing he was trying so desperately to avoid kept crowding into his mind.

One day when he was working in the hotel, a guest called Romola Martin had spoken to him in the elevator.

"Mr. Simpson, you're Mr. Simpson, the bookkeeper?"

"Yes."

"I'm in six-eleven."

She was small and childlike, with a quick, nervous manner. In her arms she coddled a package which obviously contained a square gin bottle.

"Yes," said Homer again, working against his natural instinct to be friendly. He knew that Miss Martin owed several weeks' rent and had heard the room clerk say she was a drunkard.

"Oh! . . ." the girl went on coquettishly, making obvious their difference in size, "I'm sorry you're worried about your bill, I . . ."

The intimacy of her tone embarrassed Homer.

"You'll have to speak to the manager," he rapped out, turning away.

He was trembling when he reached his office.

How bold the creature was! She was drunk, of course, but not so drunk that she didn't know what she was doing. He hurriedly labeled his excitement disgust.

Soon afterwards the manager called and asked him to bring in Miss Martin's credit card. When he went into the manager's office, he found Miss Carlisle, the room clerk, there. Homer listened to what the manager was saying to her.

"You roomed six-eleven?"

6. Suggests figures from the paintings of Pablo Picasso (1881–1973) around the early 1920s.

"I did, yes, sir."

"Why? She's obvious enough, isn't she?"

"Not when she's sober."

"Never mind that. We don't want her kind in this hotel."

"I'm sorry."

The manager turned to Homer and took the credit card he was holding.

"She owes thirty-one dollars," Homer said.

"She'll have to pay up and get out. I don't want her kind around here." He smiled. "Especially when they run up bills. Get her on the phone for me."

Homer asked the telephone operator for six-eleven and after a short time was told that the room didn't answer.

"She's in the house," he said. "I saw her in the elevator."

"I'll have the housekeeper look."

Homer was working on his books some minutes later when his phone rang. It was the manager again. He said that six-eleven had been reported in by the housekeeper and asked Homer to take her a bill.

"Tell her to pay up or get out," he said.

His first thought was to ask that Miss Carlisle be sent because he was busy, but he didn't dare to suggest it. While making out the bill, he began to realize how excited he was. It was terrifying. Little waves of sensation moved along his nerves and the base of his tongue tingled.

When he got off at the sixth floor, he felt almost gay. His step was buoyant and he had completely forgotten his troublesome hands. He stopped at six-eleven and made as though to knock, then suddenly took fright and lowered his fist without touching the door.

He couldn't go through with it. They would have to send Miss Carlisle.

The housekeeper, who had been watching from the end of the hall, came up before he could escape.

"She doesn't answer," Homer said hurriedly.

"Did you knock hard enough? That slut is in there."

Before Homer could reply, she pounded on the door.

"Open up!" she shouted.

Homer heard someone move inside, then the door opened a few inches.

"Who is it, please?" a light voice asked.

"Mr. Simpson, the bookkeeper," he gasped.

"Come in, please."

The door opened a little wider and Homer went in without daring to look around at the housekeeper. He stumbled to the center of the room and stopped. At first he was conscious only of the heavy odor of alcohol and stale tobacco, but then underneath he smelled a metallic perfume. His eyes moved in a slow circle. On the floor was a litter of clothing, newspapers, magazines, and bottles. Miss Martin was huddled up on a corner of the bed. She was wearing a man's black silk dressing gown with light blue cuffs and lapel facings. Her close-cropped hair was the color and texture of straw and she looked like a little boy. Her youthfulness was heightened by her blue button eyes, pink button nose and red button mouth.

Homer was too busy with his growing excitement to speak or even think. He closed his eyes to tend it better, nursing carefully what he felt. He had to be careful, for if he went too fast, it might wither and then he would be cold again. It continued to grow.

“Go away, please, I’m drunk,” Miss Martin said.

Homer neither moved nor spoke.

She suddenly began to sob. The coarse, broken sounds she made seemed to come from her stomach. She buried her face in her hands and pounded the floor with her feet.

Homer’s feelings were so intense that his head bobbed stiffly on his neck like that of a toy Chinese dragon.

“I’m broke. I haven’t any money. I haven’t a dime. I’m broke, I tell you.”

Homer pulled out his wallet and moved on the girl as though to strike her with it.

She cowered away from him and her sobs grew stronger.

He dropped the wallet in her lap and stood over her, not knowing what else to do. When she saw the wallet, she smiled, but continued sobbing.

“Sit down,” she said.

He sat down on the bed beside her.

“You strange man,” she said coyly. “I could kiss you for being so nice.”

He caught her in his arms and hugged her. His suddenness frightened her and she tried to pull away, but he held on and began awkwardly to caress her. He was completely unconscious of what he was doing. He knew only that what he felt was marvelously sweet and that he had to make the sweetness carry through to the poor, sobbing woman.

Miss Martin’s sobs grew less and soon stopped altogether. He could feel her fidget and gather strength.

The telephone rang.

“Don’t answer it,” she said, beginning to sob once more.

He pushed her away gently and stumbled to the telephone. It was Miss Carlisle.

“Are you all right?” she asked, “or shall we send for the cops?”

“All right,” he said, hanging up.

It was all over. He couldn’t go back to the bed.

Miss Martin laughed at his look of acute distress.

“Bring the gin, you enormous cow,” she shouted gaily. “It’s under the table.”

He saw her stretch herself out in a way that couldn’t be mistaken. He ran out of the room.

Now in California, he was crying because he had never seen Miss Martin again. The next day the manager had told him that he had done a good job and that she had paid up and checked out.

Homer tried to find her. There were two other hotels in Wayneville, small run-down houses, and he inquired at both of them. He also asked in the few rooming places, but with no success. She had left town.

He settled back into his regular routine, working ten hours, eating two, sleeping the rest. Then he caught cold and had been advised to come to California. He could easily afford not to work for a while. His father had left him about six thousand dollars and during the twenty years he had kept books in the hotel, he had saved at least ten more.⁷

7. Homer’s assets are worth about $275,000 in current U.S. dollars.

He got out of the tub, dried himself hurriedly with a rough towel, then went into the bedroom to dress. He felt even more stupid and washed out than usual. It was always like that. His emotions surged up in an enormous wave, curving and rearing, higher and higher, until it seemed as though the wave must carry everything before it. But the crash never came. Something always happened at the very top of the crest and the wave collapsed to run back like water down a drain, leaving, at the most, only the refuse of feeling.

It took him a long time to get all his clothing on. He stopped to rest after each garment with a desperation far out of proportion to the effort involved.

There was nothing to eat in the house and he had to go down to Hollywood Boulevard for food. He thought of waiting until morning, but then, although he was not hungry, decided against waiting. It was only eight o'clock and the trip would kill some time. If he just sat around, the temptation to go to sleep again would become irresistible.

The night was warm and very still. He started down hill, walking on the outer edge of the pavement. He hurried between lamp-posts, where the shadows were heaviest, and came to a full stop for a moment at every circle of light. By the time he reached the boulevard, he was fighting the desire to run. He stopped for several minutes on the corner to get his bearings. As he stood there, poised for flight, his fear made him seem almost graceful.

When several other people passed without paying any attention to him, he quieted down. He adjusted the collar of his coat and prepared to cross the street. Before he could take two steps someone called to him.

"Hey, you, mister."

It was a beggar who had spotted him from the shadow of a doorway. With the infallible instinct of his kind, he knew that Homer would be easy.

"Can you spare a nickel?"

"No," Homer said without conviction.

The beggar laughed and repeated his question, threateningly.

"A nickel, mister!"

He poked his hand into Homer's face.

Homer fumbled in his change pocket and dropped several coins on the sidewalk. While the man scrambled for them, he made his escape across the street.

The SunGold Market into which he turned was a large, brilliantly lit place. All the fixtures were chromium and the floor and walls were lined with white tile. Colored spotlights played on the showcases and counters, heightening the natural hues of the different foods. The oranges were bathed in red, the lemons in yellow, the fish in pale green, the steaks in rose and the eggs in ivory.

Homer went directly to the canned goods department and bought a can of mushroom soup and another of sardines. These and a half a pound of soda crackers would be enough for his supper.

Out on the street again with his parcel, he started to walk home. When he reached the corner that led to Pinyon Canyon and saw how steep and black the hill looked, he turned back along the lighted boulevard. He thought of waiting until someone else started up the hill, but finally took a taxicab.

10

Although Homer had nothing to do but prepare his scanty meals, he was not bored. Except for the Romola Martin incident and perhaps one or two other widely spaced events, the forty years of his life had been entirely without variety or excitement. As a bookkeeper, he had worked mechanically, totaling figures and making entries with the same impersonal detachment that he now opened cans of soup and made his bed.

Someone watching him go about his little cottage might have thought him sleep-walking or partially blind. His hands seemed to have a life and a will of their own. It was they who pulled the sheets tight and shaped the pillows.

One day, while opening a can of salmon for lunch, his thumb received a nasty cut. Although the wound must have hurt, the calm, slightly querulous expression he usually wore did not change. The wounded hand writhed about on the kitchen table until it was carried to the sink by its mate and bathed tenderly in hot water.

When not keeping house, he sat in the back yard, called the patio by the real estate agent, in an old broken deck chair. He went out to it immediately after breakfast to bake himself in the sun. In one of the closets he had found a tattered book and he held it in his lap without looking at it.

There was a much better view to be had in any direction other than the one he faced. By moving his chair in a quarter circle he could have seen a large part of the canyon twisting down to the city below. He never thought of making this shift. From where he sat, he saw the closed door of the garage and a patch of its shabby, tarpaper roof. In the foreground was a sooty, brick incinerator and a pile of rusty cans. A little to the right of them were the remains of a cactus garden in which a few ragged, tortured plants still survived.

One of these, a clump of thick, paddlelike blades, covered with ugly needles, was in bloom. From the tip of several of its topmost blades protruded a bright yellow flower, somewhat like a thistle blossom but coarser. No matter how hard the wind blew, its petals never trembled.

A lizard lived in a hole near the base of this plant. It was about five inches long and had a wedge-shaped head from which darted a fine, forked tongue. It earned a hard living catching the flies that strayed over to the cactus from the pile of cans.

The lizard was self-conscious and irritable, and Homer found it very amusing to watch. Whenever one of its elaborate stalks was foiled, it would shift about uneasily on its short legs and puff out its throat. Its coloring matched the cactus perfectly, but when it moved over to the cans where the flies were thick, it stood out very plainly. It would sit on the cactus by the hour without moving, then become impatient and start for the cans. The flies would spot it immediately and after several misses, it would sneak back sheepishly to its original post.

Homer was on the side of the flies. Whenever one of them, swinging too widely, would pass the cactus, he prayed silently for it to keep on going or turn back. If it lighted, he watched the lizard begin its stalk and held his breath until it had killed, hoping all the while that something would warn the fly. But no matter how much he wanted the fly to escape, he never thought of interfering, and was careful not to budge or make the slightest noise. Occasionally the lizard would miscalculate. When that happened Homer would laugh happily.

Between the sun, the lizard and the house, he was fairly well occupied. But whether he was happy or not is hard to say. Probably he was neither, just as a plant is neither. He had memories to disturb him and a plant hasn't, but after the first bad night his memories were quiet.

11

He had been living this way for almost a month, when, one day, just as he was about to prepare his lunch, the door bell rang. He opened it and found a man standing on the step with a sample case in one hand and a derby hat in the other. Homer hurriedly shut the door again.

The bell continued to ring. He put his head out of the window nearest the door to order the fellow away, but the man bowed very politely and begged for a drink of water. Homer saw that he was old and tired and thought that he looked harmless. He got a bottle of water from the icebox, then opened the door and asked him in.

"The name, sir, is Harry Greener," the man announced in sing-song, stressing every other syllable.

Homer handed him a glass of water. He swallowed it quickly, then poured himself another.

"Much obliged," he said with an elaborate bow. "That was indeed refreshing."

Homer was astonished when he bowed again, did several quick jig steps, then let his derby hat roll down his arm. It fell to the floor. He stooped to retrieve it, straightening up with a jerk as though he had been kicked, then rubbed the seat of his trousers ruefully.

Homer understood that this was to amuse, so he laughed.

Harry thanked him by bowing again, but something went wrong. The exertion had been too much for him. His face blanched and he fumbled with his collar.

"A momentary indisposition," he murmured, wondering himself whether he was acting or sick.

"Sit down," Homer said.

But Harry wasn't through with his performance. He assumed a gallant smile and took a few unsteady steps toward the couch, then tripped himself. He examined the carpet indignantly, made believe he had found the object that had tripped him and kicked it away. He then limped to the couch and sat down with a whistling sigh like air escaping from a toy balloon.

Homer poured more water. Harry tried to stand up, but Homer pressed him back and made him drink sitting. He drank this glass as he had the other two, in quick gulps, then wiped his mouth with his handkerchief, imitating a man with a big mustache who had just drunk a glass of foamy beer.

"You are indeed kind, sir," he said. "Never fear, some day I'll repay you a thousandfold."

Homer clucked.

From his pocket Harry brought out a small can and held it out for him to take.

"Compliments of the house," he announced. "'Tis a box of Miracle Solvent, the modern polish par excellence, the polish without peer or parallel, used by all the movie stars . . ."

He broke off his spiel with a trilling laugh.

Homer took the can.

"Thank you," he said, trying to appear grateful. "How much is it?"

"The ordinary price, the retail price, is fifty cents, but you can have it for the extraordinary price of a quarter, the wholesale price, the price I pay at the factory."

"A quarter?" asked Homer, habit for the moment having got the better of his timidity. "I can buy one twice that size for a quarter in the store."

Harry knew his man.

"Take it, take it for nothing," he said contemptuously.

Homer was tricked into protesting.

"I guess maybe this is a much better polish."

"No," said Harry, as though he were spurning a bribe. "Keep your money. I don't want it."

He laughed, this time bitterly.

Homer pulled out some change and offered it.

"Take it, please. You need it, I'm sure. I'll have two cans."

Harry had his man where he wanted him. He began to practice a variety of laughs, all of them theatrical, like a musician tuning up before a concert. He finally found the right one and let himself go. It was a victim's laugh.

"Please stop," Homer said.

But Harry couldn't stop. He was really sick. The last block that held him poised over the runway of self-pity had been knocked away and he was sliding down the chute, gaining momentum all the time. He jumped to his feet and began doing Harry Greener, poor Harry, honest Harry, well-meaning, humble, deserving, a good husband, a model father, a faithful Christian, a loyal friend.

Homer didn't appreciate the performance in the least. He was terrified and wondered whether to phone the police. But he did nothing. He just held up his hand for Harry to stop.

At the end of his pantomime, Harry stood with his head thrown back, clutching his throat, as though waiting for the curtain to fall. Homer poured him still another glass of water. But Harry wasn't finished. He bowed, sweeping his hat to his heart, then began again. He didn't get very far this time and had to gasp painfully for breath. Suddenly, like a mechanical toy that had been overwound, something snapped inside of him and he began to spin through his entire repertoire. The effort was purely muscular, like the dance of a paralytic. He jiggled, juggled his hat, made believe he had been kicked, tripped, and shook hands with himself. He went through it all in one dizzy spasm, then reeled to the couch and collapsed.

He lay on the couch with his eyes closed and his chest heaving. He was even more surprised than Homer. He had put on his performance four or five times already that day and nothing like this had happened. He was really sick.

"You've had a fit," Homer said when Harry opened his eyes.

As the minutes passed, Harry began to feel better and his confidence returned. He pushed all thought of sickness out of his mind and even went so far as to congratulate himself on having given the finest performance of his career. He should be able to get five dollars out of the big dope who was leaning over him.

"Have you any spirits in the house?" he asked weakly.

The grocer had sent Homer a bottle of port wine on approval and he went to get it. He filled a tumbler half full and handed it to Harry, who drank it in small sips, making the faces that usually go with medicine.

Speaking slowly, as though in great pain, he then asked Homer to bring in his sample case.

"It's on the doorstep. Somebody might steal it. The greater part of my small capital is invested in those cans of polish."

When Homer stepped outside to obey, he saw a girl near the curb. It was Faye Greener. She was looking at the house.

"Is my father in there?" she called out.

"Mr. Greener?"

She stamped her foot.

"Tell him to get a move on, damn it. I don't want to stay here all day."

"He's sick."

The girl turned away without giving any sign that she either heard or cared.

Homer took the sample case back into the house with him. He found Harry pouring himself another drink.

"Pretty fair stuff," he said, smacking his lips over it. "Pretty fair, all right, all right. Might I be so bold as to ask what you pay for a . . ."

Homer cut him short. He didn't approve of people who drank and wanted to get rid of him.

"Your daughter's outside," he said with as much firmness as he could muster. "She wants you."

Harry collapsed on the couch and began to breathe heavily. He was acting again.

"Don't tell her," he gasped. "Don't tell her how sick her old daddy is. She must never know."

Homer was shocked by his hypocrisy.

"You're better," he said as coldly as he could. "Why don't you go home?"

Harry smiled to show how offended and hurt he was by the heartless attitude of his host. When Homer said nothing, his smile became one expressing boundless courage. He got carefully to his feet, stood erect for a minute, then began to sway weakly and tumbled back on the couch.

"I'm faint," he groaned.

Once again he was surprised and frightened. He was faint.

"Get my daughter," he gasped.

Homer found her standing at the curb with her back to the house. When he called her, she whirled and came running toward him. He watched her for a second, then went in, leaving the door unlatched.

Faye burst into the room. She ignored Homer and went straight to the couch.

"Now what in hell's the matter?" she exploded.

"Darling daughter," he said. "I have been badly taken, and this gentleman has been kind enough to let me rest for a moment."

"He had a fit or something," Homer said.

She whirled around on him so suddenly that he was startled.

"How do you do?" she said, holding her hand forward and high up.

He shook it gingerly.

"Charmed," she said, when he mumbled something.

She spun around once more.

"It's my heart," Harry said. "I can't stand up."

The little performance he put on to sell polish was familiar to her and she knew that this wasn't part of it. When she turned to face Homer again, she looked quite tragic. Her head, instead of being held far back, now drooped forward.

"Please let him rest there," she said.

"Yes, of course."

Homer motioned her toward a chair, then got her a match for her cigarette. He tried not to stare at her, but his good manners were wasted. Faye enjoyed being stared at.

He thought her extremely beautiful, but what affected him still more was her vitality. She was taut and vibrant. She was as shiny as a new spoon.

Although she was seventeen, she was dressed like a child of twelve in a white cotton dress with a blue sailor collar. Her long legs were bare and she had blue sandals on her feet.

"I'm so sorry," she said when Homer looked at her father again.

He made a motion with his hand to show that it was nothing.

"He has a vile heart, poor dear," she went on. "I've begged and begged him to go to a specialist, but you men are all alike."

"Yes, he ought to go to a doctor," Homer said.

Her odd mannerisms and artificial voice puzzled him.

"What time is it?" she asked.

"About one o'clock."

She stood up suddenly and buried both her hands in her hair at the sides of her head, making it bunch at the top in a shiny ball.

"Oh," she gasped prettily, "and I had a luncheon date."

Still holding her hair, she turned at the waist without moving her legs, so that her snug dress twisted even tighter and Homer could see her dainty, arched ribs and little, dimpled belly. This elaborate gesture, like all her others, was so completely meaningless, almost formal, that she seemed a dancer rather than an affected actress.

"Do you like salmon salad?" Homer ventured to ask.

"Salmon sal-ahde?"

She seemed to be repeating the question to her stomach. The answer was yes.

"With plenty of mayonnaise, huh? I adore it."

"I was going to have some for lunch. I'll finish making it."

"Let me help."

They looked at Harry, who appeared to be asleep, then went into the kitchen. While he opened a can of salmon, she climbed on a chair and straddled it with her arms folded across the top of its back and rested her chin on her arms. Whenever he looked at her, she smiled intimately and tossed her pale, glittering hair first forward, then back.

Homer was excited and his hands worked quickly. He soon had a large bowl of salad ready. He set the table with his best cloth and his best silver and china.

“It makes me hungry just to look,” she said.

The way she said this seemed to mean that it was Homer who made her hungry and he beamed at her. But before he had a chance to sit down, she was already eating. She buttered a slice of bread, covered the butter with sugar and took a big bite. Then she quickly smeared a gob of mayonnaise on the salmon and went to work. Just as he was about to sit down, she asked for something to drink. He poured her a glass of milk and stood watching her like a waiter. He was unaware of her rudeness.

As soon as she had gobbled up her salad, he brought her a large red apple. She ate the fruit more slowly, nibbling daintily, her smallest finger curled away from the rest of her hand. When she had finished it, she went back to the living room and Homer followed her.

Harry still lay as they had left him, stretched out on the sofa. The heavy noon-day sun hit directly on his face, beating down on him like a club. He hardly felt its blows, however. He was busy with the stabbing pain in his chest. He was so busy with himself that he had even stopped trying to plan how to get money out of the big dope.

Homer drew the window curtain to shade his face. Harry didn't even notice. He was thinking about death. Faye bent over him. He saw, from under his partially closed eyelids, that she expected him to make a reassuring gesture. He refused. He examined the tragic expression that she had assumed and didn't like it. In a serious moment like this, her ham sorrow was insulting.

“Speak to me, Daddy,” she begged.

She was baiting him without being aware of it.

“What the hell is this,” he snarled, “a Tom show?”⁸

His sudden fury scared her and she straightened up with a jerk. He didn't want to laugh, but a short bark escaped before he could stop it. He waited anxiously to see what would happen. When it didn't hurt he laughed again. He kept on, timidly at first, then with growing assurance. He laughed with his eyes closed and the sweat pouring down his brow. Faye knew only one way to stop him and that was to do something he hated as much as she hated his laughter. She began to sing.

*“Jeepers Creepers!
Where'd ya get those peepers? . . .”*⁹

She trucked, jerking her buttocks and shaking her head from side to side.

Homer was amazed. He felt that the scene he was witnessing had been rehearsed. He was right. Their bitterest quarrels often took this form; he laughing, she singing.

*“Jeepers Creepers!
Where'd ya get those eyes?
Gosh, all git up!
How'd they get so lit up?
Gosh all git . . .”*

When Harry stopped, she stopped and flung herself into a chair. But Harry was only gathering strength for a final effort. He began again. This new laugh was not critical; it was horrible. When she was a child, he used to punish her with it. It was his masterpiece. There was a director who always called on him to give it when he was shooting a scene in an insane asylum or a haunted castle.

8. Popular performances based on the novel Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) by Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811–1896).

9. Popular song introduced by the jazz trumpeter and singer Louis Armstrong (1901–1971) in the film Going Places (1938).

It began with a sharp, metallic crackle, like burning sticks, then gradually increased in volume until it became a rapid bark, then fell away again to an obscene chuckle. After a slight pause, it climbed until it was the nicker of a horse, then still higher to become a machinelike screech.

Faye listened helplessly with her head cocked on one side. Suddenly, she too laughed, not willingly, but fighting the sound.

"You bastard!" she yelled.

She leaped to the couch, grabbed him by the shoulders and tried to shake him quiet.

He kept laughing.

Homer moved as though he meant to pull her away, but he lost courage and was afraid to touch her. She was so naked under her skimpy dress.

"Miss Greener," he pleaded, making his big hands dance at the end of his arms. "Please, please . . ."

Harry couldn't stop laughing now. He pressed his belly with his hands, but the noise poured out of him. It had begun to hurt again.

Swinging her hand as though it held a hammer, she brought her fist down hard on his mouth. She hit him only once. He relaxed and was quiet.

"I had to do it," she said to Homer when he took her arm and led her away.

He guided her to a chair in the kitchen and shut the door. She continued to sob for a long time. He stood behind her chair, helplessly, watching the rhythmical heave of her shoulders. Several times his hands moved forward to comfort her, but he succeeded in curbing them.

When she was through crying, he handed her a napkin and she dried her face. The cloth was badly stained by her rouge and mascara.

"I've spoilt it," she said, keeping her face averted. "I'm very sorry."

"It was dirty," Homer said.

She took a compact from her pocket and looked at herself in its tiny mirror.

"I'm a fright."

She asked if she could use the bathroom and he showed her where it was. He then tiptoed into the living room to see Harry. The old man's breathing was noisy but regular and he seemed to be sleeping quietly. Homer put a cushion under his head without disturbing him and went back into the kitchen. He lit the stove and put the coffeepot on the flame, then sat down to wait for the girl to return. He heard her go into the living room. A few seconds later she came into the kitchen.

She hesitated apologetically in the doorway.

"Won't you have some coffee?"

Without waiting for her to reply, he poured a cup and moved the sugar and cream so that she could reach them.

"I had to do it," she said. "I just had to."

"That's all right."

To show her that it wasn't necessary to apologize, he busied himself at the sink.

"No, I had to," she insisted. "He laughs that way just to drive me wild. I can't stand it. I simply can't."

“Yes.”

“He’s crazy. We Greeners are all crazy.”

She made this last statement as though there were merit in being crazy.

“He’s pretty sick,” Homer said, apologizing for her. “Maybe he had a sunstroke.”

“No, he’s crazy.”

He put a plate of gingersnaps on the table and she ate them with her second cup of coffee. The dainty crunching sound she made chewing fascinated him.

When she remained quiet for several minutes, he turned from the sink to see if anything was wrong. She was smoking a cigarette and seemed lost in thought.

He tried to be gay.

“What are you thinking?” he said awkwardly, then felt foolish.

She sighed to show how dark and foreboding her thoughts were, but didn’t reply.

“I’ll bet you would like some candy,” Homer said. “There isn’t any in the house, but I could call the drugstore and they’d send it right over. Or some ice cream?”

“No, thanks, please.”

“It’s no trouble.”

“My father isn’t really a peddler,” she said, abruptly. “He’s an actor. I’m an actress. My mother was also an actress, a dancer. The theatre is in our blood.”

“I haven’t seen many shows. I . . .”

He broke off because he saw that she wasn’t interested.

“I’m going to be a star some day,” she announced as though daring him to contradict her.

“I’m sure you . . .”

“It’s my life. It’s the only thing in the whole world that I want.”

“It’s good to know what you want. I used to be a book-keeper in a hotel, but . . .”

“If I’m not, I’ll commit suicide.”

She stood up and put her hands to her hair, opened her eyes wide and frowned.

“I don’t go to shows very often,” he apologized, pushing the gingersnaps toward her. “The lights hurt my eyes.”

She laughed and took a cracker.

“I’ll get fat.”

“Oh, no.”

“They say fat women are going to be popular next year. Do you think so? I don’t. It’s just publicity for Mae West.”¹

He agreed with her.

She talked on and on, endlessly, about herself and about the picture business. He watched her, but didn’t listen, and whenever she repeated a question in order to get a reply, he nodded his head without saying anything.

His hands began to bother him. He rubbed them against the edge of the table to relieve their itch, but it only stimulated them. When he clasped them behind his back, the strain became intolerable. They were hot and swollen. Using the dishes as an excuse, he held them under the cold water tap of the sink.

1. American actress (1893–1980), known for her statuesque figure and racy jokes. Her film career was in decline by 1939.

Faye was still talking when Harry appeared in the doorway. He leaned weakly against the doorjamb. His nose was very red, but the rest of his face was drained white and he seemed to have grown too small for his clothing. He was smiling, however.

To Homer's amazement, they greeted each other as though nothing had happened.

"You okay now, Pop?"

"Fine and dandy, baby. Right as rain, fit as a fiddle and lively as a flea, as the feller says."

The nasal twang he used in imitation of a country yokel made Homer smile.

"Do you want something to eat?" he asked. "A glass of milk, maybe?"

"I could do with a snack."

Faye helped him over to the table. He tried to disguise how weak he was by doing an exaggerated Negro shuffle.

Homer opened a can of sardines and sliced some bread. Harry smacked his lips over the food, but ate slowly and with an effort.

"That hit the spot, all righty right," he said when he had finished.

He leaned back and fished a crumpled cigar butt out of his vest pocket. Faye lit it for him and he playfully blew a puff of smoke in her face.

"We'd better go, Daddy," she said.

"In a jiffy, child."

He turned to Homer.

"Nice place you've got here. Married?"

Faye tried to interfere.

"Dad!"

He ignored her.

"Bachelor, eh?"

"Yes."

"Well, well, a young fellow like you."

"I'm here for my health," Homer found it necessary to say.

"Don't answer his questions," Faye broke in.

"Now, now, daughter, I'm just being friendly like. I don't mean no harm."

He was still using exaggerated backwoods accent. He spat dry into an imaginary spittoon and made believe he was shifting a cud of tobacco from cheek to cheek.

Homer thought his mimicry funny.

"I'd be lonesome and scared living alone in a big house like this," Harry went on. "Don't you ever get lonesome?"

Homer looked at Faye for his answer. She was frowning with annoyance.

"No," he said, to prevent Harry from repeating the uncomfortable question.

"No? Well, that's fine."

He blew several smoke rings at the ceiling and watched their behavior judiciously.

"Did you ever think of taking boarders?" he asked. "Some nice, sociable folks, I mean. It'll bring in a little extra money and make things more homey."

Homer was indignant, but underneath his indignation lurked another idea, a very exciting one. He didn't know what to say.

Faye misunderstood his agitation.

"Cut it out, Dad," she exclaimed before Homer could reply. "You've been a big enough nuisance already."

"Just chinning," he protested innocently. "Just chewing the fat."

"Well, then, let's get going," she snapped.

"There's plenty of time," Homer said.

He wanted to add something stronger, but didn't have the courage. His hands were braver. When Faye shook good-bye, they clutched and refused to let go.

Faye laughed at their warm insistence.

"Thanks a million, Mr. Simpson," she said. "You've been very kind. Thanks for the lunch and for helping Daddy."

"We're very grateful," Harry chimed in. "You've done a Christian deed this day. God will reward you."

He had suddenly become very pious.

"Please look us up," Faye said. "We live close-by in the San Berdoo Apartments, about five blocks down the canyon. It's the big yellow house."

When Harry stood, he had to lean against the table for support. Faye and Homer each took him by the arm and helped him into the street. Homer held him erect, while Faye went to get their Ford which was parked across the street.

"We're forgetting your order of Miracle Salve," Harry said, "the polish without peer or parallel."

Homer found a dollar and slipped it into his hand. He hid the money quickly and tried to become businesslike.

"I'll leave the goods tomorrow."

"Yes, that'll be fine," Homer said. "I really need some silver polish."

Harry was angry because it hurt him to be patronized by a sucker. He made an attempt to re-establish what he considered to be their proper relationship by bowing ironically, but didn't get very far with the gesture and began to fumble with his Adam's apple. Homer helped him into the car and he slumped down in the seat beside Faye.

They drove off. She turned to wave, but Harry didn't even look back.

12

Homer spent the rest of the afternoon in the broken deck chair. The lizard was on the cactus, but he took little interest in its hunting. His hands kept his thoughts busy. They trembled and jerked, as though troubled by dreams. To hold them still, he clasped them together. Their fingers twined like a tangle of thighs in miniature. He snatched them apart and sat on them.

When the days passed and he couldn't forget Faye, he began to grow frightened. He somehow knew that his only defense was chastity, that it served him, like the shell of a tortoise, as both spine and armor. He couldn't shed it even in thought. If he did, he would be destroyed.

He was right. There are men who can lust with parts of themselves. Only their brain or their hearts burn and then not completely. There are others, still more fortunate, who are like the filaments of an incandescent lamp. They burn fiercely, yet nothing is destroyed. But in Homer's case it would be like dropping a spark into a barn full of hay. He had escaped in the Romola Martin incident, but he wouldn't escape again. Then, for one thing, he had had his job in the hotel, a daily all-day task that protected him by tiring him, but now he had nothing.

His thoughts frightened him and he bolted into the house, hoping to leave them behind like a hat. He ran into his bedroom and threw himself down on the bed. He was simple enough to believe that people don't think while asleep.

In his troubled state, even this delusion was denied him and he was unable to fall asleep. He closed his eyes and tried to make himself drowsy. The approach to sleep which had once been automatic had somehow become a long, shining tunnel. Sleep was at the far end of it, a soft bit of shadow in the hard glare. He couldn't run, only crawl toward the black patch. Just as he was about to give up, habit came to his rescue. It collapsed the shining tunnel and hurled him into the shadow.

When he awoke it was without a struggle. He tried to fall asleep once more, but this time couldn't even find the tunnel. He was thoroughly awake. He tried to think of how very tired he was, but he wasn't tired. He felt more alive than he had at any time since Romola Martin.

Outside a few birds still sang intermittently, starting and breaking off, as though sorry to acknowledge the end of another day. He thought that he heard the lisp of silk against silk, but it was only the wind playing in the trees. How empty the house was! He tried to fill it by singing.

*"Oh, say can you see,
By the dawn's early light . . ."*

It was the only song he knew. He thought of buying a victrola² or a radio. He knew, however, that he would buy neither. This fact made him very sad. It was a pleasant sadness, very sweet and calm.

But he couldn't let well enough alone. He was impatient and began to prod at his sadness, hoping to make it acute and so still more pleasant. He had been getting pamphlets in the mail from a travel bureau and he thought of the trips he would never take. Mexico was only a few hundred miles away. Boats left daily for Hawaii.

His sadness turned to anguish before he knew it and became sour. He was miserable again. He began to cry.

Only those who still have hope can benefit from tears. When they finish, they feel better. But to those without hope, like Homer, whose anguish is basic and permanent, no good comes from crying. Nothing changes for them. They usually know this, but still can't help crying.

Homer was lucky. He cried himself to sleep.

But he awoke again in the morning with Faye uppermost in his mind. He bathed, ate breakfast and sat in his deck chair. In the afternoon, he decided to go for a walk. There was only one way for him to go and that led past the San Bernardino Apartments.

Some time during his long sleep, he had given up the battle. When he came to the apartment house, he peered into the amber-lit hallway and read the Greener card on the letter box, then turned and went home. On the next night, he repeated the trip, carrying a gift of flowers and wine.

2. An early phonograph record player.

13

Harry Greener's condition didn't improve. He remained in bed, staring at the ceiling with his hands folded on his chest.

Tod went to see him almost every night. There were usually other guests. Sometimes Abe Kusich, sometimes Anna and Annabelle Lee, a sister act of the nineteen-tens, more often the four Gingos, a family of performing Eskimos from Point Barrow, Alaska.

If Harry were asleep or there were visitors, Faye usually invited Tod into her room for a talk. His interest in her grew despite the things she said and he continued to find her very exciting. Had any other girl been so affected, he would have thought her intolerable. Faye's affectations, however, were so completely artificial that he found them charming.

Being with her was like being backstage during an amateurish, ridiculous play. From in front, the stupid lines and grotesque situations would have made him squirm with annoyance, but because he saw the perspiring stagehands and the wires that held up the tawdry summerhouse with its tangle of paper flowers, he accepted everything and was anxious for it to succeed.

He found still another way to excuse her. He believed that while she often recognized the falseness of an attitude, she persisted in it because she didn't know how to be simpler or more honest. She was an actress who had learned from bad models in a bad school.

Yet Faye did have some critical ability, almost enough to recognize the ridiculous. He had often seen her laugh at herself. What was more, he had even seen her laugh at her dreams.

One evening they talked about what she did with herself when she wasn't working as an extra. She told him that she often spent the whole day making up stories. She laughed as she said it. When he questioned her, she described her method quite willingly.

She would get some music on the radio, then lie down on her bed and shut her eyes. She had a large assortment of stories to choose from. After getting herself in the right mood, she would go over them in her mind, as though they were a pack of cards, discarding one after another until she found the one that suited. On some days, she would run through the whole pack without making a choice. When that happened, she would either go to Vine Street for an ice cream soda or, if she was broke, thumb over the pack again and force herself to choose.

While she admitted that her method was too mechanical for the best results and that it was better to slip into a dream naturally, she said that any dream was better than no dream and beggars couldn't be choosers. She hadn't exactly said this, but he was able to understand it from what she did say. He thought it important that she smiled while telling him, not with embarrassment, but critically. However, her critical powers ended there. She only smiled at the mechanics.

The first time he had ever heard one of her dreams was late at night in her bedroom. About half an hour earlier, she had knocked on his door and had asked him to come and help her with Harry because she thought he was dying. His noisy breathing, which she had taken for the death rattle, had awakened her and she was badly frightened. Tod put on his bathrobe and followed her downstairs. When he got to the apartment, Harry had managed to clear his throat and his breathing had become quiet again.

She invited him into her room for a smoke. She sat on the bed and he sat beside her. She was wearing an old beach robe of white toweling over her pajamas and it was very becoming.

He wanted to beg her for a kiss but was afraid, not because she would refuse, but because she would insist on making it meaningless. To flatter her, he commented on her appearance. He did a bad job of it. He was incapable of direct flattery and got bogged down in a much too roundabout observation. She didn't listen and he broke off feeling like an idiot.

"I've got a swell idea," she said suddenly. "An idea how we can make some real money."

He made another attempt to flatter her. This time by assuming an attitude of serious interest.

"You're educated," she said. "Well, I've got some swell ideas for pictures. All you got to do is write them up and then we'll sell them to the studios."

He agreed and she described her plan. It was very vague until she came to what she considered would be its results, then she went into concrete details. As soon as they had sold one story, she would give him another. They would make loads and loads of money. Of course she wouldn't give up acting, even if she was a big success as a writer, because acting was her life.

He realized as she went on that she was manufacturing another dream to add to her already very thick pack. When she finally got through spending the money, he asked her to tell him the idea he was to "write up," keeping all trace of irony out of his voice.

On the wall of the room beyond the foot of her bed was a large photograph that must have once been used in the lobby of a theatre to advertise a Tarzan picture.³ It showed a beautiful young man with magnificent muscles, wearing only a narrow loin cloth, who was ardently squeezing a slim girl in a torn riding habit. They stood in a jungle clearing and all around the pair writhed great vines loaded with fat orchids. When she told her story, he knew that this photograph had a lot to do with inspiring it.

A young girl is cruising on her father's yacht in the South Seas. She is engaged to marry a Russian count, who is tall, thin and old, but with beautiful manners. He is on the yacht, too, and keeps begging her to name the day. But she is spoiled and won't do it. Maybe she became engaged to him in order to spite another man. She becomes interested in a young sailor who is far below her in station, but very handsome. She flirts with him because she is bored. The sailor refuses to be toyed with no matter how much money she's got and tells her that he only takes orders from the captain and to go back to her foreigner. She gets sore as hell and threatens to have him fired, but he only laughs at her. How can he be fired in the middle of the ocean? She falls in love with him, although maybe she doesn't realize it herself, because he is the first man who has ever said no to one of her whims and because he is so handsome. Then there is a big storm and the yacht is wrecked near an island. Everybody is drowned, but she manages to swim to shore. She makes herself

3. Based on the character created by the American novelist Edgar Rice Burroughs (1875–1950) in Tarzan of the Apes (1912). Raised by a group of apes as one of them after the death of his parents, Tarzan eventually becomes their king. In the 1930s several Tarzan pictures were made starring the Olympic swimmer Johnny Weissmuller.

a hut of boughs and lives on fish and fruit. It's the tropics. One morning, while she is bathing naked in a brook, a big snake grabs her. She struggles but the snake is too strong for her and it looks like curtains. But the sailor, who has been watching her from behind some bushes, leaps to her rescue. He fights the snake for her and wins.

Tod was to go on from there. He asked her how she thought the picture should end, but she seemed to have lost interest. He insisted on hearing, however.

"Well, he marries her, of course, and they're rescued. First they're rescued and then they're married, I mean. Maybe he turns out to be a rich boy who is being a sailor just for the adventure of it, or something like that. You can work it out easy enough."

"It's sure-fire," Tod said earnestly, staring at her wet lips and the tiny point of her tongue which she kept moving between them.

"I've got just hundreds and hundreds more."

He didn't say anything and her manner changed. While telling the story, she had been full of surface animation and her hands and face were alive with little illustrative grimaces and gestures. But now her excitement narrowed and became deeper and its play internal. He guessed that she must be thumbing over her pack and that she would soon select another card to show him.

He had often seen her like this, but had never before understood it. All these little stories, these little day-dreams of hers, were what gave such extraordinary color and mystery to her movements. She seemed always to be struggling in their soft grasp as though she were trying to run in a swamp. As he watched her, he felt sure that her lips must taste of blood and salt and that there must be a delicious weakness in her legs. His impulse wasn't to aid her to get free, but to throw her down in the soft, warm mud and to keep her there.

He expressed some of his desire by a grunt. If he only had the courage to throw himself on her. Nothing less violent than rape would do. The sensation he felt was like that he got when holding an egg in his hand. Not that she was fragile or even seemed fragile. It wasn't that. It was her completeness, her egglike self-sufficiency, that made him want to crush her.

But he did nothing and she began to talk again.

"I've got another swell idea that I want to tell you. Maybe you had better write this one up first. It's a backstage story and they're making a lot of them this year."

She told him about a young chorus girl who gets her big chance when the star of the show falls sick. It was a familiar version of the Cinderella theme, but her technique was much different from the one she had used for the South Sea tale. Although the events she described were miraculous, her description of them was realistic. The effect was similar to that obtained by the artists of the Middle Ages, who, when doing a subject like the raising of Lazarus from the dead or Christ walking on water,⁴ were careful to keep all the details intensely realistic. She, like them, seemed to think that fantasy could be made plausible by a humdrum technique.

"I like that one, too," he said when she had finished.

4. Miracles performed by Jesus Christ; see John 11.1–44 and 6.16–21.

“Think them over and do the one that has the best chance.”

She was dismissing him and if he didn't act at once the opportunity would be gone. He started to lean toward her, but she caught his meaning and stood up. She took his arm with affectionate brusqueness—they were now business partners—and guided him to the door.

In the hall, when she thanked him for coming down and apologized for having disturbed him, he tried again. She seemed to melt a little and he reached for her. She kissed him willingly enough, but when he tried to extend the caress, she tore free.

“Whoa there, palsy-walsy,” she laughed. “Mama spank.”

He started for the stairs.

“Good-bye now,” she called after him, then laughed again.

He barely heard her. He was thinking of the drawings he had made of her and of the new one he would do as soon as he got to his room.

In “The Burning of Los Angeles” Faye is the naked girl in the left foreground being chased by the group of men and women who have separated from the main body of the mob. One of the women is about to hurl a rock at her to bring her down. She is running with her eyes closed and a strange half-smile on her lips. Despite the dreamy repose of her face, her body is straining to hurl her along at top speed. The only explanation for this contrast is that she is enjoying the release that wild flight gives in much the same way that a game bird must when, after hiding for several tense minutes, it bursts from cover in complete, unthinking panic.

14

Tod had other and more successful rivals than Homer Simpson. One of the most important was a young man called Earle Shoop.

Earle was a cowboy from a small town in Arizona. He worked occasionally in horse-operas⁵ and spent the rest of his time in front of a saddlery store on Sunset Boulevard. In the window of this store was an enormous Mexican saddle covered with carved silver, and around it was arranged a large collection of torture instruments. Among other things there were fancy, braided quirts, spurs with great spiked wheels, and double bits that looked as though they could break a horse's jaw without trouble. Across the back of the window ran a low shelf on which was a row of boots, some black, some red and some a pale yellow. All of the boots had scalloped tops and very high heels.

Earle always stood with his back to the window, his eyes fixed on a sign on the roof of a one-story building across the street that read: “MalTED MILKS TOO THICK FOR A STRAW.” Regularly, twice every hour, he pulled a sack of tobacco and a sheaf of papers from his shirt pocket and rolled a cigarette. Then he tightened the cloth of his trousers by lifting his knee and struck a match along the underside of his thigh.

He was over six feet tall. The big Stetson⁶ hat he wore added five inches more to his height and the heels of his boots still another three. His pole-like appearance was further exaggerated by the narrowness of his shoulders and by his lack of either hips or buttocks. The years he had spent in the saddle had not made him bowlegged. In fact, his legs were so straight that his dungarees, bleached a very light blue by the sun and much washing, hung down without a wrinkle, as though they were empty.

5. Western-themed films.

6. A famous brand of cowboy hats.

Tod could see why Faye thought him handsome. He had a two-dimensional face that a talented child might have drawn with a ruler and a compass. His chin was perfectly round and his eyes, which were wide apart, were also round. His thin mouth ran at right angles to his straight, perpendicular nose. His reddish tan complexion was the same color from hairline to throat, as though washed in by an expert, and it completed his resemblance to a mechanical drawing.

Tod had told Faye that Earle was a dull fool. She agreed laughing, but then said that he was “criminally handsome,” an expression she had picked up in the chatter column of a trade paper.

Meeting her on the stairs one night, Tod asked if she would go to dinner with him.

“I can’t. I’ve got a date. But you can come along.”

“With Earle?”

“Yes, with Earle,” she repeated, mimicking his annoyance.

“No, thanks.”

She misunderstood, perhaps on purpose, and said, “He’ll treat this time.”

Earle was always broke and whenever Tod went with them he was the one who paid.

“That isn’t it, and you damn well know it.”

“Oh, isn’t it?” she asked archly, then, absolutely sure of herself, added, “Meet us at Hodge’s around five.”

Hodge’s was the saddlery store. When Tod got there, he found Earle Shoop at his usual post, just standing and just looking at the sign across the street. He had on his ten-gallon hat and his high-heeled boots. Neatly folded over his left arm was a dark gray jacket. His shirt was navy-blue cotton with large polka dots, each the size of a dime. The sleeves of his shirt were not rolled, but pulled to the middle of his forearm and held there by a pair of fancy, rose armbands. His hands were the same clean reddish tan as his face.

“Lo, thar,” was the way he returned Tod’s salute.

Tod found his Western accent amusing. The first time he had heard it, he had replied, “Lo, thar, stranger,” and had been surprised to discover that Earle didn’t know he was being kidded. Even when Tod talked about “cayuses,” “mean hombres” and “rustlers,”⁷ Earle took him seriously.

“Howdy, partner,” Tod said.

Next to Earle was another Westerner in a big hat and boots, sitting on his heels and chewing vigorously on a little twig. Close behind him was a battered paper valise held together by heavy rope tied with professional-looking knots.

Soon after Tod arrived a third man came along. He made a thorough examination of the merchandise in the window, then turned and began to stare across the street like the other two.

He was middle-aged and looked like an exercise boy from a racing stable. His face was completely covered with a fine mesh of wrinkles, as though he had been sleeping with it pressed against a roll of rabbit wire. He was very shabby and had probably sold his big hat, but he still had his boots.

7. Cattle thieves. “Cayuses”: members of a northwestern American Indian people. “Hombres”: men (Spanish).

“Lo, boys,” he said.

“Lo, Hink,” said the man with the paper valise.

Tod didn’t know whether he was included in the greeting, but took a chance and replied.

“Howdy.”

Hink prodded the valise with his toe.

“Goin’ some place, Calvin?” he asked.

“Azusa,⁸ there’s a rodeo.”

“Who’s running it?”

“A fellow calls himself ‘Badlands Jack.’”

“That grifter! . . . You goin’, Earle?”

“Nope.”

“I gotta eat,” said Calvin.

Hink carefully considered all the information he had received before speaking again.

“Mono’s makin’ a new Buck Stevens,”⁹ he said. “Will Ferris told me they’d use more than forty riders.”

Calvin turned and looked up at Earle.

“Still got the piebald vest?”¹ he asked slyly.

“Why?”

“It’ll cinch you a job as a road agent.”²

Tod understood that this was a joke of some sort because Calvin and Hink chuckled and slapped their thighs loudly while Earle frowned.

There was another long silence, then Calvin spoke again.

“Ain’t your old man still got some cows?” he asked Earle.

But Earle was wary this time and refused to answer.

Calvin winked at Tod, slowly and elaborately, contorting one whole side of his face.

“That’s right, Earle,” Hink said. “Your old man’s still got some stock. Why don’t you go home?”

They couldn’t get a rise out of Earle, so Calvin answered the question.

“He dassint. He got caught in a sheep car with a pair of rubber boots on.”

It was another joke. Calvin and Hink slapped their thighs and laughed, but Tod could see that they were waiting for something else. Earle, suddenly, without even shifting his weight, shot his foot out and kicked Calvin solidly in the rump. This was the real point of the joke. They were delighted by Earle’s fury. Tod also laughed. The way Earle had gone from apathy to action without the usual transition was funny. The seriousness of his violence was even funnier.

A little while later, Faye drove by in her battered Ford touring car³ and pulled into the curb some twenty feet away. Calvin and Hink waved, but Earle didn’t budge. He took his time, as befitted his dignity. Not until she tooted her horn did he move. Tod followed a short distance behind him.

“Hi, cowboy,” said Faye gaily.

8. In 1939, a small city, still surrounded by citrus groves, at the foot of the San Gabriel Mountains northeast of Los Angeles.

9. Suggests Buck Jones (1891–1942), an American actor known for starring in Westerns.

1. Made from the hide of a horse with large patches of color.

2. A stagecoach robber.

3. Open-topped car, like Ford’s Model T, out of fashion by the 1930s.

"Lo, honey," he drawled, removing his hat carefully and replacing it with even greater care.

Faye smiled at Tod and motioned for them both to climb in. Tod got in the back. Earle unfolded the jacket he was carrying, slapped it a few times to remove the wrinkles, then put it on and adjusted its collar and shaped the roll of its lapels. He then climbed in beside Faye.

She started the car with a jerk. When she reached LaBrea, she turned right to Hollywood Boulevard and then left along it. Tod could see that she was watching Earle out of the corner of her eye and that he was preparing to speak.

"Get going," she said, trying to hurry him. "What is it?"

"Looka here, honey, I ain't got any dough for supper."

She was very much put out.

"But I told Tod we'd treat him. He's treated us enough times."

"That's all right," Tod interposed. "Next time'll do. I've got plenty of money."

"No, damn it," she said without looking around. "I'm sick of it."

She pulled into the curb and slammed on the brakes.

"It's always the same story," she said to Earle.

He adjusted his hat, his collar and his sleeves, then spoke.

"We've got some grub at camp."

"Beans, I suppose."

"Nope."

She prodded him.

"Well, what've you got?"

"Mig and me's set some traps."

Faye laughed.

"Rat traps, eh? We're going to eat rats."

Earle didn't say anything.

"Listen, you big, strong, silent dope," she said, "either make sense, or God damn it, get out of this car."

"They're quail traps," he said without the slightest change in his wooden, formal manner.

She ignored his explanation.

"Talking to you is like pulling teeth. You wear me out."

Tod knew that there was no hope for him in this quarrel. He had heard it all before.

"I didn't mean nothing," Earle said. "I was only funning. I wouldn't feed you rats."

She slammed off the emergency brake and started the car again. At Zacarias Street, she turned into the hills. After climbing steadily for a quarter of a mile, she reached a dirt road and followed it to its end. They all climbed out, Earle helping Faye.

"Give me a kiss," she said, smiling her forgiveness.

He took his hat off ceremoniously and placed it on the hood of the car, then wrapped his long arms around her. They paid no attention to Tod, who was standing off to one side watching them. He saw Earle close his eyes and pucker up his lips like a little boy. But there was nothing boyish about what he did to her. When she had had as much as she wanted, she pushed him away.

"You, too?" she called gaily to Tod, who had turned his back.

“Oh, some other time,” he replied, imitating her casualness.

She laughed, then took out a compact and began to fix her mouth. When she was ready, they started along a little path that was a continuation of the dirt road. Earle led, Faye came next and Tod brought up the rear.

It was full spring. The path ran along the bottom of a narrow canyon and wherever weeds could get a purchase in its steep banks they flowered in purple, blue and yellow. Orange poppies bordered the path. Their petals were wrinkled like crepe and their leaves were heavy with talcumlike dust.

They climbed until they reached another canyon. This one was sterile, but its bare ground and jagged rocks were even more brilliantly colored than the flowers of the first. The path was silver, grained with streaks of rose-gray, and the walls of the canyon were turquoise, mauve, chocolate and lavender. The air itself was vibrant pink.

They stopped to watch a humming bird chase a blue jay. The jay flashed by squawking with its tiny enemy on its tail like a ruby bullet. The gaudy birds burst the colored air into a thousand glittering particles like metal confetti.

When they came out of this canyon, they saw below them a little green valley thick with trees, mostly eucalyptus, with here and there a poplar and one enormous black live-oak. Sliding and stumbling down a dry wash, they made for the valley.

Tod saw a man watching their approach from the edge of the wood. Faye also saw him and waved.

“Hi, Mig!” she shouted.

“Chinita!” he called back.

She ran the last ten yards of the slope and the man caught her in his arms.

He was toffee-colored with large Armenian eyes and pouting black lips. His head was a mass of tight, ordered curls. He wore a long-haired sweater, called a “gorilla” in and around Los Angeles, with nothing under it. His soiled duck trousers were held up by a red bandanna handkerchief. On his feet were a pair of tattered tennis sneakers.

They moved on to the camp which was located in a clearing in the center of the wood. It consisted of little more than a ramshackle hut patched with tin signs that had been stolen from the highway and a stove without legs or bottom set on some rocks. Near the hut was a row of chicken coops.

Earle started a fire under the stove while Faye sat down on a box and watched him. Tod went over to look at the chickens. There was one old hen and half a dozen game cocks. A great deal of pains had been taken in making the coops, which were of grooved boards, carefully matched and joined. Their floors were freshly spread with peat moss.

The Mexican came over and began to talk about the cocks. He was very proud of them.

“That’s Hermano, five times winner. He’s one of Street’s Butcher Boys. Pepe and El Negro are still stags.⁴ I fight them next week in San Pedro. That’s Villa, he’s a blinker,⁵ but still good. And that one’s Zapata, twice winner, a Tassel Dom⁶ he is. And that’s Jjutla. My champ.”

4. Immature roosters.

5. A gamecock blinded in one eye.

6. A breed of gamecock.

He opened the coop and lifted the bird out for Tod.

"A murderer is what the guy is. Speedy and how!"

The cock's plumage was green, bronze and copper. Its beak was lemon and its legs orange.

"He's beautiful," Tod said.

"I'll say."

Mig tossed the bird back into the coop and they went back to join the others at the fire.

"When do we eat?" Faye asked.

Miguel tested the stove by spitting on it. He next found a large iron skillet and began to scour it with sand. Earle gave Faye a knife and some potatoes to peel, then picked up a burlap sack.

"I'll get the birds," he said.

Tod went along with him. They followed a narrow path that looked as though it had been used by sheep until they came to a tiny field covered with high, tufted grass. Earle stopped behind a gum bush and held up his hand to warn Tod.

A mocking bird was singing near by. Its song was like pebbles being dropped one by one from a height into a pool of water. Then a quail began to call, using two soft guttural notes. Another quail answered and the birds talked back and forth. Their call was not like the cheerful whistle of the Eastern bobwhite. It was full of melancholy and weariness, yet marvelously sweet. Still another quail joined the duet. This one called from near the center of the field. It was a trapped bird, but the sound it made had no anxiety in it, only sadness, impersonal and without hope.

When Earle was satisfied that no one was there to spy on his poaching, he went to the trap. It was a wire basket about the size of a washtub with a small door in the top. He stooped over and began to fumble with the door. Five birds ran wildly along the inner edge and threw themselves at the wire. One of them, a cock, had a dainty plume on his head that curled forward almost to his beak.

Earle caught the birds one at a time and pulled their heads off before dropping them into his sack. Then he started back. As he walked along, he held the sack under his left arm. He lifted the birds out with his right hand and plucked them one at a time. Their feathers fell to the ground, point first, weighed down by the tiny drop of blood that trembled on the tips of their quills.

The sun went down before they reached the camp again. It grew chilly and Tod was glad of the fire. Faye shared her seat on the box with him and they both leaned forward into the heat.

Mig brought a jug of tequila from the hut. He filled a peanut butter jar for Faye and passed the jug to Tod. The liquor smelled like rotten fruit, but he liked the taste. When he had had enough, Earle took it and then Miguel. They continued to pass it from hand to hand.

Earle tried to show Faye how plump the game was, but she wouldn't look. He gutted the birds, then began cutting them into quarters with a pair of heavy tin shears. Faye held her hands over her ears in order not to hear the soft click made by the blades as they cut through flesh and bone. Earle wiped the pieces with a rag and dropped them into the skillet where a large piece of lard was already sputtering.

For all her squeamishness, Faye ate as heartily as the men did. There was no coffee and they finished with tequila. They smoked and kept the jug moving. Faye tossed away the peanut butter jar and drank like the others, throwing her head back and tilting the jug.

Tod could sense her growing excitement. The box on which they were sitting was so small that their backs touched and he could feel how hot she was and how restless. Her neck and face had turned from ivory to rose. She kept reaching for his cigarettes.

Earle's features were hidden in the shadow of his big hat, but the Mexican sat full in the light of the fire. His skin glowed and the oil in his black curls sparkled. He kept smiling at Faye in a manner that Tod didn't like. The more he drank, the less he liked it.

Faye kept crowding Tod, so he left the box to sit on the ground where he could watch her better. She was smiling back at the Mexican. She seemed to know what he was thinking and to be thinking the same thing. Earle, too, became aware of what was passing between them. Tod heard him curse softly and saw him lean forward into the light and pick up a thick piece of firewood.

Mig laughed guiltily and began to sing.

*"Las palmeras lloran por tu ausencia,
Las laguna se seco—ay!
La cerca de alambre que estaba en
El patio tambien se cayo!"*⁷

His voice was a plaintive tenor and it turned the revolutionary song into a sentimental lament, sweet and cloying. Faye joined in when he began another stanza. She didn't know the words, but she was able to carry the melody and to harmonize.

*"Pues mi madre las cuidaba, ay!
Toditito se acabo—ay!"*⁸

Their voices touched in the thin, still air to form a minor chord and it was as though their bodies had touched. The song was transformed again. The melody remained the same, but the rhythm broke and its beat became ragged. It was a rumba now.

Earle shifted uneasily and played with his stick. Tod saw her look at him and saw that she was afraid, but instead of becoming wary, she grew still more reckless. She took a long pull at the jug and stood up. She put one hand on each of her buttocks and began to dance.

Mig seemed to have completely forgotten Earle. He clapped his hands, cupping them to make a hollow, drumlike sound, and put all he felt into his voice. He had changed to a more fitting song.

*"Tony's wife,
The boys in Havana love Tony's wife . . ."*⁹

7. "The palmtrees cry for your absence, / The lake has dried up—ay! / The wire fence that was around / The patio has fallen as well" (Spanish); from "Las cuatro milpas" (The four corn patches), a popular ballad about a farm lost during the Mexican revolution (1910–20), recorded by American singer Lydia Mendoza (1916–2007) in 1934.

8. "Then my mother took care of them, ay! / Everything has come to an end" (Spanish).

9. From "Tony's Wife" (1933), a popular song by Russian-born American songwriter Irving Berlin (1888–1989).

Faye had her hands clasped behind her head now and she rolled her hips to the broken beat. She was doing the “bump.”

“Tony’s wife, They’re fightin’ their duels about Tony’s wife . . .”

Perhaps Tod had been mistaken about Earle. He was using his club on the back of the skillet, using it to bang out the rhythm.

The Mexican stood up, still singing, and joined her in the dance. They approached each other with short mincing steps. She held her skirt up and out with her thumbs and forefingers and he did the same with his trousers. They met head on, blue-black against pale-gold, and used their heads to pivot, then danced back to back with their buttocks touching, their knees bent and wide apart. While Faye shook her breasts and her head, holding the rest of her body rigid, he struck the soft ground heavily with his feet and circled her. They faced each other again and made believe they were cradling their behinds in a shawl.

Earle pounded the skillet harder and harder until it rang like an anvil. Suddenly he, too, jumped up and began to dance. He did a crude hoe-down. He leaped into the air and knocked his heels together. He whooped. But he couldn’t become part of their dance. Its rhythm was like a smooth glass wall between him and the dancers. No matter how loudly he whooped or threw himself around, he was unable to disturb the precision with which they retreated and advanced, separated and came together again.

Tod saw the blow before it fell. He saw Earle raise his stick and bring it down on the Mexican’s head. He heard the crack and saw the Mexican go to his knees still dancing, his body unwilling or unable to acknowledge the interruption.

Faye had her back to Mig when he fell, but she didn’t turn to look. She ran. She flashed by Tod. He reached for her ankle to pull her down, but missed. He scrambled to his feet and ran after her.

If he caught her now, she wouldn’t escape. He could hear her on the hill a little way ahead of him. He shouted to her, a deep, agonized bellow, like that a hound makes when it strikes a fresh line after hours of cold trailing. Already he could feel how it would be when he pulled her to the ground.

But the going was heavy and the stones and sand moved under his feet. He fell prone with his face in a clump of wild mustard that smelled of the rain and sun, clean, fresh and sharp. He rolled over on his back and stared up at the sky. The violent exercise had driven most of the heat out of his blood, but enough remained to make him tingle pleasantly. He felt comfortably relaxed, even happy.

Somewhere farther up the hill a bird began to sing. He listened. At first the low rich music sounded like water dripping on something hollow, the bottom of a silver pot perhaps, then like a stick dragged slowly over the strings of a harp. He lay quietly, listening.

When the bird grew silent, he made an effort to put Faye out of his mind and began to think about the series of cartoons¹ he was making for his canvas of Los Angeles on fire. He was going to show the city burning at high noon, so that the flames would have to compete with the desert sun and thereby appear less fearful, more like bright flags flying from roofs and windows than a terrible holocaust. He wanted the city to have quite a gala air as it burned, to appear almost gay. And the people who set it on fire would be a holiday crowd.

1. Preliminary studies for a painting.

The bird began to sing again. When it stopped, Faye was forgotten and he only wondered if he weren't exaggerating the importance of the people who come to California to die. Maybe they weren't really desperate enough to set a single city on fire, let alone the whole country. Maybe they were only the pick of America's madmen and not at all typical of the rest of the land.

He told himself that it didn't make any difference because he was an artist, not a prophet. His work would not be judged by the accuracy with which it foretold a future event but by its merit as painting. Nevertheless, he refused to give up the role of Jeremiah.² He changed "pick of America's madmen" to "cream" and felt almost certain that the milk from which it had been skimmed was just as rich in violence. The Angelenos³ would be first, but their comrades all over the country would follow. There would be civil war.

He was amused by the strong feeling of satisfaction this dire conclusion gave him. Were all prophets of doom and destruction such happy men?

He stood up without trying to answer. When he reached the dirt road at the top of the canyon Faye and the car were gone.

15

"She went to the pictures with that Simpson guy," Harry told him when he called to see her the next night.

He sat down to wait for her. The old man was very ill and lay on the bed with extreme care as though it were a narrow shelf from which he might fall if he moved.

"What are they making on your lot?" he asked slowly, rolling his eyes toward Tod without budging his head.

"'Manifest Destiny,' 'Sweet and Low Down,' 'Waterloo,' 'The Great Divide,' 'Begging Your . . .'"

"'The Great Divide'—" Harry said, interrupting eagerly. "I remember that vehicle."⁴

Tod realized he shouldn't have got him started, but there was nothing he could do about it now. He had to let him run down like a clock.

"When it opened I was playing the Irving in a little number called 'Enter Two Gents,' a trifle, but entertainment, real entertainment. I played a Jew comic, a Ben Welch⁵ effect, derby and big pants—'Pat, dey offered me a chob in de Heagle Laundreh' . . . 'Faith now, Ikey, and did you take it?' . . . 'No, who wants to vash heagles?' Joe Parvos played straight for me in a cop's suit. Well, the night 'The Great Divide' opened, Joe was laying up with a whisker in the old Fifth Avenue when the stove exploded. It was the broad's husband who blew the whistle. He was . . ."

He hadn't run down. He had stopped and was squeezing his left side with both hands.

2. Biblical prophet who foretold the fall of the kingdom of Judah; generically, someone who denounces a corrupt society and predicts its collapse.

3. Residents of Los Angeles.

4. In the entertainment industry, a production designed around the drawing power of its star. None of the titles were in fact being shot in Hollywood in the late 1930s.

5. Comedian (d. 1926) on the early-20th-century American vaudeville circuit.

Tod leaned over anxiously.
 “Some water?”

Harry framed the word “no” with his lips, then groaned skillfully. It was a second-act curtain groan, so phony that Tod had to hide a smile. And yet, the old man’s pallor hadn’t come from a box.

Harry groaned again, modulating from pain to exhaustion, then closed his eyes. Tod saw how skillfully he got the maximum effect out of his agonized profile by using the pillow to set it off. He also noticed that Harry, like many actors, had very little back or top to his head. It was almost all face, like a mask, with deep furrows between the eyes, across the forehead and on either side of the nose and mouth, plowed there by years of broad grinning and heavy frowning. Because of them, he could never express anything either subtly or exactly. They wouldn’t permit degrees of feeling, only the furthest degree.

Tod began to wonder if it might not be true that actors suffer less than other people. He thought about this for a while, then decided that he was wrong. Feeling is of the heart and nerves and the crudeness of its expression has nothing to do with its intensity. Harry suffered as keenly as anyone, despite the theatricality of his groans and grimaces.

He seemed to enjoy suffering. But not all kinds, certainly not sickness. Like many people, he only enjoyed the sort that was self-inflicted. His favorite method was to bare his soul to strangers in bar-rooms. He would make believe he was drunk, and stumble over to where some strangers were sitting. He usually began by reciting a poem.

*“Let me sit down for a moment,
 I have a stone in my shoe.
 I was once blithe and happy,
 I was once young like you.”*

If his audience shouted, “scram, bum!” he only smiled humbly and went on with his act.

“Have pity, folks, on my gray hair . . .”

The bartender or someone else had to stop him by force, otherwise he would go on no matter what was said to him. Once he got started everyone in the bar usually listened, for he gave a great performance. He roared and whispered, commanded and cajoled. He imitated the whimper of a little girl crying for her vanished mother, as well as the different dialects of the many cruel managers he had known. He even did the off-stage noises, twittering like birds to herald the dawn of Love and yelping like a pack of bloodhounds when describing how an Evil Fate ever pursued him.

He made his audience see him start out in his youth to play Shakespeare in the auditorium of the Cambridge Latin School,⁶ full of glorious dreams, burning with ambition. Follow him, as still a mere stripling, he starved in a Broadway rooming house, an idealist who desires only to share his art with the world. Stand with him, as, in the prime of manhood, he married a beautiful dancer, a headliner on the Gus Sun⁷ time. Be close behind him as, one night, he returned

6. Public high school in Cambridge, Massachusetts, named for its classical curriculum.

7. Owner of a chain of theaters and well-known booking agent for minor vaudeville acts (1868–1959).

home unexpectedly to find her in the arms of a head usher. Forgive, as he forgave, out of the goodness of his heart and the greatness of his love. Then laugh, tasting the bitter gall, when the very next night he found her in the arms of a booking agent. Again he forgave her and again she sinned. Even then he didn't cast her out, no, though she jeered, mocked and even struck him repeatedly with an umbrella. But she ran off with a foreigner, a swarthy magician fellow. Behind she left memories and their baby daughter. He made his audience shadow him still as misfortune followed misfortune and, a middle-aged man, he haunted the booking offices, only a ghost of his former self. He who had hoped to play Hamlet, Lear, Othello,⁸ must needs become the Co. in an act called Nat Plumstone & Co., light quips and breezy patter. He made them dog his dragging feet as, an aged and trembling old man, he . . .

Faye came in quietly. Tod started to greet her, but she put her finger to her lips for him to be silent and motioned toward the bed.

The old man was asleep. Tod thought his worn, dry skin looked like eroded ground. The few beads of sweat that glistened on his forehead and temples carried no promise of relief. It might rot, like rain that comes too late to a field, but could never refresh.

They both tiptoed out of the room.

In the hall he asked if she had had a good time with Homer.

"That dope!" she exclaimed, making a wry face. "He's strictly home-cooking."

Tod started to ask some more questions, but she dismissed him with a curt, "I'm tired, honey."

16

The next afternoon, Tod was on his way upstairs when he saw a crowd in front of the door to the Greeners' apartment. They were excited and talked in whispers.

"What's happened?" he asked.

"Harry's dead."

He tried the door of the apartment. It wasn't locked, so he went in. The corpse lay stretched out on the bed, completely covered with a blanket. From Faye's room came the sound of crying. He knocked softly on her door. She opened it for him, then turned without saying a word, and stumbled to her bed. She was sobbing into a face towel.

He stood in the doorway, without knowing what to do or say. Finally, he went over to the bed and tried to comfort her. He patted her shoulder.

"You poor kid."

She was wearing a tattered, black lace negligee that had large rents in it. When he leaned over her, he noticed that her skin gave off a warm, sweet odor, like that of buckwheat in flower.

He turned away and lit a cigarette. There was a knock on the door. When he opened it, Mary Dove rushed past him to take Faye in her arms.

Mary also told Faye to be brave. She phrased it differently than he had done, however, and made it sound a lot more convincing.

"Show some guts, kid. Come on now, show some guts."

8. The titular heroes of Shakespeare's major tragedies.

Faye shoved her away and stood up. She took a few wild steps, then sat down on the bed again.

"I killed him," she groaned.

Mary and he both denied this emphatically.

"I killed him, I tell you! I did! I did!"

She began to call herself names. Mary wanted to stop her, but Tod told her not to. Faye had begun to act and he felt that if they didn't interfere she would manage an escape for herself.

"She'll talk herself quiet," he said.

In a voice heavy with self-accusation, she began to tell what had happened. She had come home from the studio and found Harry in bed. She asked him how he was, but didn't wait for an answer. Instead, she turned her back on him to examine herself in the wall mirror. While fixing her face, she told him that she had seen Ben Murphy and that Ben had said that if Harry were feeling better he might be able to use him in a Bowery⁹ sequence. She had been surprised when he didn't shout as he always did when Ben's name was mentioned. He was jealous of Ben and always shouted, "To hell with that bastard; I knew him when he cleaned spittoons in a nigger bar-room."

She realized that he must be pretty sick. She didn't turn around because she noticed what looked like the beginning of a pimple. It was only a speck of dirt and she wiped it off, but then she had to do her face all over again. While she was working at it, she told him that she could get a job as a dress extra if she had a new evening gown. Just to kid him, she looked tough and said, "If you can't buy me an evening gown, I'll find someone who can."

When he didn't say anything, she got sore and began to sing, "Jeepers Creepers." He didn't tell her to shut up, so she knew something must be wrong. She ran over to the couch. He was dead.

As soon as she had finished telling all this, she began to sob in a lower key, almost a coo, and rocked herself back and forth.

"Poor papa . . . Poor darling . . ."

The fun they used to have together when she was little. No matter how hard up he was, he always bought her dolls and candy, and no matter how tired, he always played with her. She used to ride piggy-back and they would roll on the floor and laugh and laugh.

Mary's sobs made Faye speed up her own and they both began to get out of hand.

There was a knock on the door. Tod answered it and found Mrs. Johnson, the janitress. Faye shook her head for him not to let her in.

"Come back later," Tod said.

He shut the door in her face. A minute later it opened again and Mrs. Johnson entered boldly. She had used a pass-key.

"Get out," he said.

She tried to push past him, but he held her until Faye told him to let her go.

He disliked Mrs. Johnson intensely. She was an officious, bustling woman with a face like a baked apple, soft and blotched. Later he found out that her hobby was funerals. Her preoccupation with them wasn't morbid; it was formal. She was interested in the arrangement of the flowers, the order of the procession, the clothing and deportment of the mourners.

9. A run-down, disreputable neighborhood in New York.

She went straight to Faye and stopped her sobs with a firm, "Now, Miss Greener."

There was so much authority in her voice and manner that she succeeded where Mary and Tod had failed.

Faye looked up at her respectfully.

"First, my dear," Mrs. Johnson said, counting one with the thumb of her right hand on the index finger of her left, "first, I want you to understand that my sole desire in this matter is to help you."

She looked hard at Mary, then at Tod.

"I don't get anything out of it, and it's just a lot of trouble."

"Yes," Faye said.

"All right. There are several things I have to know, if I'm to help you. Did the deceased leave any money or insurance?"

"No."

"Have you any money?"

"No."

"Can you borrow any?"

"I don't think so."

Mrs. Johnson sighed.

"Then the city will have to bury him."

Faye didn't comment.

"Don't you understand, child, the city will have to bury him in a pauper's grave?"

She put so much contempt into "city" and horror into "pauper" that Faye flushed and began to sob again.

Mrs. Johnson made as though to walk out, even took several steps in the direction of the door, then changed her mind and came back.

"How much does a funeral cost?" Faye asked.

"Two hundred dollars. But you can pay on the installment plan—fifty dollars down and twenty-five a month."

Mary and Tod both spoke together.

"I'll get the money."

"I've got some."

"That's fine," Mrs. Johnson said. "You'll need at least fifty more for incidental expenses. I'll go ahead and take care of everything. Mr. Holsepp will bury your father. He'll do it right."

She shook hands with Faye, as though she were congratulating her, and hurried out of the room.

Mrs. Johnson's little business talk had apparently done Faye some good. Her lips were set and her eyes dry.

"Don't worry," Tod said. "I can raise the money."

"No, thanks," she said.

Mary opened her purse and took out a roll of bills.

"Here's some."

"No," she said, pushing it away.

She sat thinking for a while, then went to the dressing table and began to fix her tear-stained face. She wore a hard smile as she worked. Suddenly she turned, lipstick in air, and spoke to Mary.

"Can you get me into Mrs. Jennings'?"

"What for?" Tod demanded. "I'll get the money."

Both girls ignored him.

"Sure," said Mary, "you ought to done that long ago. It's a soft touch."

Faye laughed.

"I was saving it."

The change that had come over both of them startled Tod. They had suddenly become very tough.

"For a punkola like that Earle. Get smart, girlie, and lay off the cheapies. Let him ride a horse, he's a cowboy, ain't he?"

They laughed shrilly and went into the bathroom with their arms around each other.

Tod thought he understood their sudden change to slang. It made them feel worldly and realistic, and so more able to cope with serious things.

He knocked on the bathroom door.

"What do you want?" Faye called out.

"Listen, kid," he said, trying to imitate them. "Why go on the turf?¹ I can get the dough."

"Oh, yeah! No, thanks," Faye said.

"But listen . . ." he began again.

"Go peddle your tripe!" Mary shouted.

17

On the day of Harry's funeral Tod was drunk. He hadn't seen Faye since she went off with Mary Dove, but he knew that he was certain to find her at the undertaking parlor and he wanted to have the courage to quarrel with her. He started drinking at lunch. When he got to Holsepp's in the late afternoon, he had passed the brave state and was well into the ugly one.

He found Harry in his box, waiting to be wheeled out for exhibition in the adjoining chapel. The casket was open and the old man looked quite snug. Drawn up to a little below his shoulders and folded back to show its fancy lining was an ivory satin coverlet. Under his head was a tiny lace cushion. He was wearing a Tuxedo, or at least had on a black bow tie with his stiff shirt and wing collar. His face had been newly shaved, his eyebrows shaped and plucked and his lips and cheeks rouged. He looked like the interlocutor² in a minstrel show.

Tod bowed his head as though in silent prayer when he heard someone come in. He recognized Mrs. Johnson's voice and turned carefully to face her. He caught her eye and nodded, but she ignored him. She was busy with a man in a badly fitting frock coat.

"It's the principle of the thing," she scolded. "Your estimate said bronze. Those handles ain't bronze and you know it."

"But I asked Miss Greener," whined the man. "She okayed them."

"I don't care. I'm surprised at you, trying to save a few dollars by fobbing off a set of cheap gun-metal handles on the poor child."

Tod didn't wait for the undertaker to answer. He had seen Faye pass the door on the arm of one of the Lee sisters. When he caught up with her, he didn't know what to say. She misunderstood his agitation and was touched. She sobbed a little for him.

1. I.e., become a prostitute.

2. Role analogous to master of ceremonies. He appeared in whiteface; the other performers, in blackface.

She had never looked more beautiful. She was wearing a new, very tight black dress and her platinum hair was tucked up in a shining bun under a black straw sailor. Every so often, she carried a tiny lace handkerchief to her eyes and made it flutter there for a moment. But all he could think of was that she had earned the money for the outfit on her back.

She grew uneasy under his stare and started to edge away. He caught her arm.

“May I speak with you for a minute, alone?”

Miss Lee took the hint and left.

“What is it?” Faye asked.

“Not here,” he whispered, making mystery out of his uncertainty.

He led her along the hall until he found an empty showroom. On the walls were framed photographs of important funerals and on little stands and tables were samples of coffin materials and models of tombstones and mausoleums.

Not knowing what to say, he accented his awkwardness, playing the inoffensive fool.

She smiled and became almost friendly.

“Give out, you big dope.”

“A kiss . . .”

“Sure, baby,” she laughed, “only don’t muss me.” They pecked at each other.

She tried to get away, but he held her. She became annoyed and demanded an explanation. He searched his head for one. It wasn’t his head he should have searched, however.

She was leaning toward him, drooping slightly, but not from fatigue. He had seen young birches droop like that at midday when they are over-heavy with sun.

“You’re drunk,” she said, pushing him away.

“Please,” he begged.

“Le’go, you bastard.”

Raging at him, she was still beautiful. That was because her beauty was structural like a tree’s, not a quality of her mind or heart. Perhaps even whoring couldn’t damage it for that reason, only age or accident or disease.

In a minute she would scream for help. He had to say something. She wouldn’t understand the aesthetic argument and with what values could he back up the moral one? The economic didn’t make sense either. Whoring certainly paid. Half of the customer’s thirty dollars. Say ten men a week.

She kicked at his shins, but he held on to her. Suddenly he began to talk. He had found an argument. Disease would destroy her beauty. He shouted at her like a Y.M.C.A.³ lecturer on sex hygiene.

She stopped struggling and held her head down, sobbing fitfully. When he was through, he let go of her arms and she bolted from the room. He groped his way to a carved, marble coffin.

He was still sitting there when a young man in a black jacket and gray striped trousers came in.

“Are you here for the Greener funeral?”

Tod stood up and nodded vaguely.

3. Young Men’s Christian Association.

“The services are beginning,” the man said, then opened a little casket covered with grosgrain⁴ satin and took out a dust cloth. Tod watched him go around the showroom wiping off the samples.

“Services have probably started,” the man repeated with a wave at the door.

Tod understood this time and left. The only exit he could find led through the chapel. The moment he entered it, Mrs. Johnson caught him and directed him to a seat. He wanted badly to get away, but it was impossible to do so without making a scene.

Faye was sitting in the front row of benches, facing the pulpit. She had the Lee sisters on one side and Mary Dove and Abe Kusich on the other. Behind them sat the tenants of the San Berdoo, occupying about six rows. Tod was alone in the seventh. After him were several empty rows and then a scattering of men and women who looked very much out of place.

He turned in order not to see Faye’s jerking shoulders and examined the people in the last rows. He knew their kind. While not torch-bearers themselves, they would run behind the fire and do a great deal of the shouting. They had come to see Harry buried, hoping for a dramatic incident of some sort, hoping at least for one of the mourners to be led weeping hysterically from the chapel. It seemed to Tod that they stared back at him with an expression of vicious, acrid boredom that trembled on the edge of violence. When they began to mutter among themselves, he half-turned and watched them out of the corner of his eyes.

An old woman with a face pulled out of shape by badly-fitting store teeth came in and whispered to a man sucking on the handle of a home-made walking stick. He passed her message along and they all stood up and went out hurriedly. Tod guessed that some star had been seen going into a restaurant by one of their scouts. If so, they would wait outside the place for hours until the star came out again or the police drove them away.

The Gingo family arrived soon after they had left. The Gingos were Eskimos who had been brought to Hollywood to make retakes for a picture about polar exploration. Although it had been released long ago, they refused to return to Alaska. They liked Hollywood.

Harry had been a good friend of theirs and had eaten with them quite regularly, sharing the smoked salmon, white fish, marinated and maatjes herrings⁵ they bought at Jewish delicatessen stores. He also shared the great quantities of cheap brandy they mixed with hot water and salt butter and drank out of tin cups.

Mama and Papa Gingo, trailed by their son, moved down the center aisle of the chapel, bowing and waving to everyone, until they reached the front row. Here they gathered around Faye and shook hands with her, each one in turn. Mrs. Johnson tried to make them go to one of the back rows, but they ignored her orders and sat down in front.

The overhead lights of the chapel were suddenly dimmed. Simultaneously other lights went on behind imitation stained-glass windows which hung on the fake oak-paneled walls. There was a moment of hushed silence, broken only by Faye’s sobs, then an electric organ started to play a recording of one of Bach’s chorales, “Come Redeemer, Our Saviour.”⁶

4. Fabric of a strong, heavy, corded weave, often used for ribbons.

5. Pickled young herring (Yiddish).

6. A hymn by the German theologian Martin Luther (1483–1546) that was set to music several times by Johann Sebastian Bach (1685–1750).

Tod recognized the music. His mother often played a piano adaptation of it on Sundays at home. It very politely asked Christ to come, in clear and honest tones with just the proper amount of supplication. The God it invited was not the King of Kings, but a shy and gentle Christ, a maiden surrounded by maidens, and the invitation was to a lawn fete, not to the home of some weary, suffering sinner. It didn't plead; it urged with infinite grace and delicacy, almost as though it were afraid of frightening the prospective guest.

So far as Tod could tell, no one was listening to the music. Faye was sobbing and the others seemed busy inside themselves. Bach politely serenading Christ was not for them.

The music would soon change its tone and grow exciting. He wondered if that would make any difference. Already the bass was beginning to throb. He noticed that it made the Eskimos uneasy. As the bass gained in power and began to dominate the treble, he heard Papa Gingo grunt with pleasure. Mama caught Mrs. Johnson eyeing him, and put her fat hand heavily on the back of his head to keep him quiet.

"Now come, O our Saviour," the music begged. Gone was its diffidence and no longer was it polite. Its struggle with the bass had changed it. Even a hint of a threat crept in and a little impatience. Of doubt, however, he could not detect the slightest trace.

If there was a hint of a threat, he thought, just a hint, and a tiny bit of impatience, could Bach be blamed? After all, when he wrote this music, the world had already been waiting for its lover more than seventeen hundred years. But the music changed again and both threat and impatience disappeared. The treble soared free and triumphant and the bass no longer struggled to keep it down. It had become a rich accompaniment. "Come or don't come," the music seemed to say, "I love you and my love is enough." It was a simple statement of fact, neither cry nor serenade, made without arrogance or humility.

Perhaps Christ heard. If He did, He gave no sign. The attendants heard, for it was their cue to trundle on Harry in his box. Mrs. Johnson followed close behind and saw to it that the casket was properly placed. She raised her hand and Bach was silenced in the middle of a phrase.

"Will those of you who wish to view the deceased before the sermon please step forward?" she called out.

Only the Gingos stood up immediately. They made for the coffin in a group. Mrs. Johnson held them back and motioned for Faye to look first. Supported by Mary Dove and the Lee girls, she took a quick peek, increased the tempo of her sobs for a moment, then hurried back to the bench.

The Gingos had their chance next. They leaned over the coffin and told each other something in a series of thick, explosive gutturals. When they tried to take another look, Mrs. Johnson herded them firmly to their seats.

The dwarf sidled up to the box, made a play with his handkerchief and retreated. When no one followed him, Mrs. Johnson lost patience, seeming to take what she understood as a lack of interest for a personal insult.

"Those who wish to view the remains of the late Mr. Greener must do so at once," she barked.

There was a little stir, but no one stood up.

"You, Mrs. Gail," she finally said, looking directly at the person named. "How about you? Don't you want a last look? Soon all that remains of your neighbor will be buried forever."

There was no getting out of it. Mrs. Gail moved down the aisle, trailed by several others.

Tod used them to cover his escape.

18

Faye moved out of the San Berdoo the day after the funeral. Tod didn't know where she had gone and was getting up the courage to call Mrs. Jenning when he saw her from the window of his office. She was dressed in the costume of a Napoleonic vivandiere.⁷ By the time he got the window open, she had almost turned the corner of the building. He shouted for her to wait. She waved, but when he got downstairs she was gone.

From her dress, he was sure that she was working in the picture called "Waterloo." He asked a studio policeman where the company was shooting and was told on the back lot. He started toward it at once. A platoon of cuirassiers, big men mounted on gigantic horses, went by. He knew that they must be headed for the same set and followed them. They broke into a gallop and he was soon outdistanced.

The sun was very hot. His eyes and throat were choked with the dust thrown up by the horses' hooves and his head throbbed. The only bit of shade he could find was under an ocean liner made of painted canvas with real life boats hanging from its davits.⁸ He stood in its narrow shadow for a while, then went on toward a great forty-foot papier mache⁹ sphinx that loomed up in the distance. He had to cross a desert to reach it, a desert that was continually being made larger by a fleet of trucks dumping white sand. He had gone only a few feet when a man with a megaphone ordered him off.

He skirted the desert, making a wide turn to the right, and came to a Western street with a plank sidewalk. On the porch of the "Last Chance Saloon" was a rocking chair. He sat down on it and lit a cigarette.

From there he could see a jungle compound with a water buffalo tethered to the side of a conical grass hut. Every few seconds the animal groaned musically. Suddenly an Arab charged by on a white stallion. He shouted at the man, but got no answer. A little while later he saw a truck with a load of snow and several malamute dogs.¹ He shouted again. The driver shouted something back, but didn't stop.

Throwing away his cigarette, he went through the swinging doors of the saloon. There was no back to the building and he found himself in a Paris street. He followed it to its end, coming out in a Romanesque² courtyard. He heard voices a short distance away and went toward them. On a lawn of fiber, a group of men and women in riding costume were picnicking. They were eating cardboard food in front of a cellophane waterfall. He started toward them to ask his way, but was stopped by a man who scowled and held up a sign—"Quiet, Please, We're Shooting." When Tod took another step forward, the man shook his fist threateningly.

Next he came to a small pond with large celluloid swans floating on it. Across one end was a bridge with a sign that read, "To Kamp Komfit." He

7. Female camp-follower selling food and drink to Napoleon's armies.

8. Cranes that project over the side of a ship.

9. Chewed paper (French, literal trans.); a mold-able mixture of paper and glue.

1. Alaskan sled dogs.

2. Architectural style of early medieval Europe.

crossed the bridge and followed a little path that ended at a Greek temple dedicated to Eros.³ The god himself lay face downward in a pile of old newspaper and bottles.

From the steps of the temple, he could see in the distance a road lined with Lombardy poplars. It was the one on which he had lost the cuirassiers. He pushed his way through a tangle of briars, old flats and iron junk, skirting the skeleton of a Zeppelin,⁴ a bamboo stockade, an adobe fort, the wooden horse of Troy,⁵ a flight of baroque palace stairs that started in a bed of weeds and ended against the branches of an oak, part of the Fourteenth Street elevated station,⁶ a Dutch windmill, the bones of a dinosaur, the upper half of the Merrimac,⁷ a corner of a Mayan temple, until he finally reached the road.

He was out of breath. He sat down under one of the poplars on a rock made of brown plaster and took off his jacket. There was a cool breeze blowing and he soon felt more comfortable.

He had lately begun to think not only of Goya and Daumier but also of certain Italian artists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, of Salvatore Rosa, Francesco Guardi and Monsu Desiderio,⁸ the painters of Decay and Mystery. Looking down hill now, he could see compositions that might have actually been arranged from the Calabrian work of Rosa. There were partially demolished buildings and broken monuments half hidden by great, tortured trees, whose exposed roots writhed dramatically in the arid ground, and by shrubs that carried, not flowers or berries, but armories of spikes, hooks and swords.

For Guardi and Desiderio there were bridges which bridged nothing, sculpture in trees, palaces that seemed of marble until a whole stone portico began to flap in the light breeze. And there were figures as well. A hundred yards from where Tod was sitting a man in a derby hat leaned drowsily against the gilded poop of a Venetian barque and peeled an apple. Still farther on, a charwoman on a stepladder was scrubbing with soap and water the face of a Buddha thirty feet high.

He left the road and climbed across the spine of the hill to look down on the other side. From there he could see a ten-acre field of cockleburs spotted with clumps of sunflowers and wild gum. In the center of the field was a gigantic pile of sets, flats and props. While he watched, a ten-ton truck added another load to it. This was the final dumping ground. He thought of Janvier's "Sargasso Sea."⁹ Just as that imaginary body of water was a history of civilization in the form of a marine junkyard, the studio lot was one in the form of a dream dump. A Sargasso of the imagination! And the dump grew continually, for there wasn't a dream afloat somewhere which wouldn't

3. The Greek god of love.

4. A passenger-carrying airship. Their popularity declined after 1937, when the Hindenburg crashed and burned in New Jersey, killing thirty-six.

5. In Homer's Iliad, the city of Troy falls when its Greek besiegers enter the city concealed in a large wooden horse.

6. In New York City.

7. A wood-hulled U.S. Navy ship that was converted into an ironclad warship, one of the first of its kind, by the Confederate navy during the American Civil War (1861–65).

8. Paintings formerly attributed to Monsu Desiderio are now thought to be by several different French Renaissance painters, including François de Nomé (early 17th century) and Didier Barra (1590–1656), both noted for their fantastic paintings of ruins. Nomé's works influenced the surrealist painters of the 1920s and 1930s. Rosa (1615–1673) and Guardi (1712–1793), Italian painters known for their dark and stormy images. 9. In the Sargasso Sea (1898), an adventure tale by the American novelist and historian Thomas A. Janvier (1849–1913), in which the protagonist drifts into a floating junkyard of ghost ships at the center of the Sargasso Sea, a section of the Atlantic encircled by the Gulf Stream and other currents and where marine refuse naturally accumulates.

sooner or later turn up on it, having first been made photographic by plaster, canvas, lath and paint. Many boats sink and never reach the Sargasso, but no dream ever entirely disappears. Somewhere it troubles some unfortunate person and some day, when that person has been sufficiently troubled, it will be reproduced on the lot.

When he saw a red glare in the sky and heard the rumble of cannon, he knew it must be Waterloo. From around a bend in the road trotted several cavalry regiments. They wore casques¹ and chest armor of black cardboard and carried long horse pistols in their saddle holsters. They were Victor Hugo's soldiers. He had worked on some of the drawings for their uniforms himself, following carefully the descriptions in "Les Misérables."²

He went in the direction they took. Before long he was passed by the men of Lefebvre-Desnouettes, followed by a regiment of gendarmes d'élite, several companies of chasseurs of the guard and a flying detachment of Rimbaud's lancers.³

They must be moving up for the disastrous attack on La Haite Santee.⁴ He hadn't read the scenario and wondered if it had rained yesterday. Would Grouchy⁵ or Blucher arrive? Grotenstein, the producer, might have changed it.

The sound of cannon was becoming louder all the time and the red fan in the sky more intense. He could smell the sweet, pungent odor of blank powder. It might be over before he could get there. He started to run. When he topped a rise after a sharp bend in the road, he found a great plain below him covered with early nineteenth-century troops, wearing all the gay and elaborate uniforms that used to please him so much when he was a child and spent long hours looking at the soldiers in an old dictionary. At the far end of the field, he could see an enormous hump around which the English and their allies were gathered. It was Mont St. Jean and they were getting ready to defend it gallantly. It wasn't quite finished, however, and swarmed with grips, property men, set dressers, carpenters and painters.

Tod stood near a eucalyptus tree to watch, concealing himself behind a sign that read, "'Waterloo'—A Charles H. Grotenstein Production." Near by a youth in a carefully torn horse guard's uniform was being rehearsed in his lines by one of the assistant directors.

"Vive l'Empereur!"⁶ the young man shouted, then clutched his breast and fell forward dead. The assistant director was a hard man to please and made him do it over and over again.

In the center of the plain, the battle was going ahead briskly. Things looked tough for the British and their allies. The Prince of Orange commanding the center, Hill the right and Picton the left wing, were being pressed hard by

1. Helmets.

2. The epic novel (1862) of the Napoleonic era and its aftermath by the popular French writer Victor Hugo (1802–1885). A 1935 Hollywood film adaptation was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Picture.

3. Mobile mounted troops. Charles Lefebvre-Desnouettes (1773–1822), a French general during the Napoleonic Wars. "Gendarmes d'élite": members of Napoleon's elite Imperial Guard (French). "Chasseurs": hunters (French, literal trans.); light infantry or cavalry.

4. La Haye Sainte (The holy crown; French), a walled farm, was captured by the French during the course of the battle, giving them the strategic advantage until the Prussian army, lead by Field Marshal Gebhard Leberecht von Blücher (1742–1819), arrived along rain-bogged paths in time to secure victory for the allied armies opposing Napoleon, whose artillery was still more hampered by the wet ground. According to Victor Hugo's famous account of the battle in Les Misérables, "If it had not rained in the night between the 17th and the 18th of June, 1815, the fate of Europe would have been different. A few drops of water, more or less, decided the downfall of Napoleon."

5. Marshal Emmanuel de Grouchy (1766–1847) commanded one wing of Napoleon's forces at Waterloo.

6. Long live the Emperor! (French).

the veteran French. The desperate and intrepid Prince was in an especially bad spot. Tod heard him cry hoarsely above the din of battle, shouting to the Hollande-Belgians, “Nassau! Brunswick! Never retreat!” Nevertheless, the retreat began. Hill, too, fell back. The French killed General Picton with a ball through the head and he returned to his dressing room. Alten⁷ was put to the sword and also retired. The colors of the Lunenburg battalion, borne by a prince of the family of Deux-Ponts, were captured by a famous child star in the uniform of a Parisian drummer boy. The Scotch Greys were destroyed and went to change into another uniform. Ponsonby’s heavy dragoons were also cut to ribbons. Mr. Grotenstein would have a large bill to pay at the Western Costume Company.

Neither Napoleon nor Wellington was to be seen. In Wellington’s absence, one of the assistant directors, a Mr. Crane, was in command of the allies. He reinforced his center with one of Chasse’s brigades and one of Wincke’s.⁸ He supported these with infantry from Brunswick, Welsh foot, Devon yeomanry and Hanoverian⁹ light horse with oblong leather caps and flowing plumes of horsehair.

For the French, a man in a checked cap ordered Milhaud’s cuirassiers to carry Mont St. Jean.¹ With their sabers in their teeth and their pistols in their hands, they charged. It was a fearful sight.

The man in the checked cap was making a fatal error. Mont St. Jean was unfinished. The paint was not yet dry and all the struts were not in place. Because of the thickness of the cannon smoke, he had failed to see that the hill was still being worked on by property men, grips and carpenters.

It was the classic mistake, Tod realized, the same one Napoleon had made. Then it had been wrong for a different reason. The Emperor had ordered the cuirassiers to charge Mont St. Jean not knowing that a deep ditch was hidden at its foot to trap his heavy cavalry. The result had been disaster for the French; the beginning of the end.

This time the same mistake had a different outcome. Waterloo, instead of being the end of the Grand Army, resulted in a draw. Neither side won, and it would have to be fought over again the next day. Big losses, however, were sustained by the insurance company in workmen’s compensation. The man in the checked cap was sent to the dog house by Mr. Grotenstein just as Napoleon was sent to St. Helena.²

When the front rank of Milhaud’s heavy division started up the slope of Mont St. Jean, the hill collapsed. The noise was terrific. Nails screamed with agony as they pulled out of joists. The sound of ripping canvas was like that of little children whimpering. Lath and scantling snapped as though

7. Commanders in the allied forces opposing Napoleon. The Prince of Orange, later William II, king of the Netherlands (1792–1849), was wounded at Waterloo. Rowland Hill (1772–1842) led a crucial charge against the Imperial Guard. Thomas Picton (1758–1815) died in battle, although his troops successfully repulsed the French. Charles Alten (1764–1840), commanding a division in the Allied front lines, was seriously wounded. Nassau and Brunswick were allied troops from states that are now part of Germany. West’s account of the battle in these paragraphs draws heavily on Hugo’s Les Misérables, chapter 6.
8. Hugo’s Les Misérables names Chassé and Wincke as allied commanders. David Hendrik Chassé (1765–1849) commanded a division from the Netherlands. Wincke may be Hugo’s error for August von Klencke, who commanded the Light Field Battalion Luneburg in the army of the German state of Hanover, allied with England.

9. Brunswick, Wales, and Devonshire (in England) and Hanover all contributed to the allied forces.

1. Wellington’s high position at Waterloo, attacked at the climax of the battle by armored cavalry under the command of Édouard Jean-Baptiste Milhaud (1766–1833).

2. A small, remote island in the south Atlantic to which Napoleon was exiled.

they were brittle bones. The whole hill folded like an enormous umbrella and covered Napoleon's army with painted cloth.

It turned into a rout. The victors of Bersina, Leipsic, Austerlitz,³ fled like schoolboys who had broken a pane of glass. "Sauve qui peut!"⁴ they cried, or, rather, "Scram!"

The armies of England and her allies were too deep in scenery to flee. They had to wait for the carpenters and ambulances to come up. The men of the gallant Seventy-Fifth Highlanders⁵ were lifted out of the wreck with block and tackle. They were carted off by the stretcher-bearers, still clinging bravely to their claymores.⁶

19

Tod got a lift back to his office in a studio car. He had to ride on the running board because the seats were occupied by two Walloon grenadiers and four Swabian foot.⁷ One of the infantrymen had a broken leg, the other extras were only scratched and bruised. They were quite happy about their wounds. They were certain to receive several extra days' pay, and the man with the broken leg thought he might get as much as five hundred dollars.

When Tod arrived at his office, he found Faye waiting to see him. She hadn't been in the battle. At the last moment, the director had decided not to use any vivandieres.

To his surprise, she greeted him with warm friendliness. Nevertheless, he tried to apologize for his behavior in the funeral parlor. He had hardly started before she interrupted him. She wasn't angry, but grateful for his lecture on venereal disease. It had brought her to her senses.

She had still another surprise for him. She was living in Homer Simpson's house. The arrangement was a business one. Homer had agreed to board and dress her until she became a star. They were keeping a record of every cent he spent and as soon as she clicked in pictures, she would pay him back with six per cent interest. To make it absolutely legal, they were going to have a lawyer draw up a contract.

She pressed Tod for an opinion and he said it was a splendid idea. She thanked him and invited him to dinner for the next night.

After she had gone, he wondered what living with her would do to Homer. He thought it might straighten him out. He fooled himself into believing this with an image, as though a man were a piece of iron to be heated and then straightened with hammer blows. He should have known better, for if anyone ever lacked malleability Homer did.

He continued to make this mistake when he had dinner with them. Faye seemed very happy, talking about charge accounts and stupid sales clerks. Homer had a flower in his buttonhole, wore carpet slippers and beamed at her continually.

After they had eaten, while Homer was in the kitchen washing dishes, Tod got her to tell him what they did with themselves all day. She said that they lived quietly and that she was glad because she was tired of excitement. All she wanted was a career. Homer did the housework and she was

3. Battles in the Napoleonic wars.

4. Every man for himself! (French).

5. A Scottish regiment.

6. Traditional broadswords.

7. Soldiers from French-speaking Belgium and southwestern Germany, respectively.

getting a real rest. Daddy's long sickness had tired her out completely. Homer liked to do housework and anyway he wouldn't let her go into the kitchen because of her hands.

"Protecting his investment," Tod said.

"Yes," she replied seriously, "they have to be beautiful."

They had breakfast around ten, she went on. Homer brought it to her in bed. He took a housekeeping magazine and fixed the tray like the pictures in it. While she bathed and dressed, he cleaned the house. Then they went downtown to the stores and she bought all sorts of things, mostly clothes. They didn't eat lunch on account of her figure, but usually had dinner out and went to the movies.

"Then, ice cream sodas," Homer finished for her, as he came out of the kitchen.

Faye laughed and excused herself. They were going to a picture and she wanted to change her dress. When she had left, Homer suggested that they get some air in the patio. He made Tod take the deck chair while he sat on an upturned orange crate.

If he had been careful and had acted decently, Tod couldn't help thinking, she might be living with him. He was at least better looking than Homer. But then there was her other prerequisite. Homer had an income and lived in a house, while he earned thirty dollars a week and lived in a furnished room.

The happy grin on Homer's face made him feel ashamed of himself. He was being unfair. Homer was a humble, grateful man who would never laugh at her, who was incapable of laughing at anything. Because of this great quality, she could live with him on what she considered a much higher plane.

"What's the matter?" Homer asked softly, laying one of his heavy hands on Tod's knee.

"Nothing. Why?"

Tod moved so that the hand slipped off.

"You were making faces."

"I was thinking of something."

"Oh," Homer said sympathetically.

Tod couldn't resist asking an ugly question.

"When are you two getting married?"

Homer looked hurt.

"Didn't Faye tell about us?"

"Yes, sort of."

"It's a business arrangement."

"Yes?"

To make Tod believe it, he poured out a long, disjointed argument, the one he must have used on himself. He even went further than the business part and claimed that they were doing it for poor Harry's sake. Faye had nothing left in the world except her career and she must succeed for her daddy's sake. The reason she wasn't a star was because she didn't have the right clothes. He had money and believed in her talent, so it was only natural for them to enter into a business arrangement. Did Tod know a good lawyer?

It was a rhetorical question, but would become a real one, painfully insistent, if Tod smiled. He frowned. That was wrong, too.

“We must see a lawyer this week and have papers drawn up.”

His eagerness was pathetic. Tod wanted to help him, but didn’t know what to say. He was still fumbling for an answer when they heard a woman shouting from the hill behind the garage.

“Adore! Adore!”

She had a high soprano voice, very clear and pure.

“What a funny name,” Tod said, glad to change the subject.

“Maybe it’s a foreigner,” Homer said.

The woman came into the yard from around the corner of the garage. She was eager and plump and very American.

“Have you seen my little boy?” she asked, making a gesture of helplessness. “Adore’s such a wanderer.”

Homer surprised Tod by standing up and smiling at the woman. Faye had certainly helped his timidity.

“Is your son lost?” Homer said.

“Oh, no—just hiding to tease me.”

She held out her hand.

“We’re neighbors. I’m Maybelle Loomis.”

“Glad to know you, ma’am. I’m Homer Simpson and this is Mr. Hackett.”

Tod also shook hands with her.

“Have you been living here long?” she asked.

“No. I’ve just come from the East,” Homer said.

“Oh, have you? I’ve been here ever since Mr. Loomis passed on six years ago. I’m an old settler.”

“You like it then?” Tod asked.

“Like California?” she laughed at the idea that anyone might not like it.

“Why, it’s a paradise on earth!”

“Yes,” Homer agreed gravely.

“And anyway,” she went on, “I have to live here on account of Adore.”

“Is he sick?”

“Oh, no. On account of his career. His agent calls him the biggest little attraction in Hollywood.”

She spoke so vehemently that Homer flinched.

“He’s in the movies?” Tod asked.

“I’ll say,” she snapped.

Homer tried to placate her.

“That’s very nice.”

“If it weren’t for favoritism,” she said bitterly, “he’d be a star. It ain’t talent. It’s pull. What’s Shirley Temple⁸ got that he ain’t got?”

“Why, I don’t know,” Homer mumbled.

She ignored this and let out a fearful bellow.

“Adore! Adore!”

Tod had seen her kind around the studio. She was one of that army of women who drag their children from casting office to casting office and sit for hours, weeks, months, waiting for a chance to show what Junior can do. Some of them are very poor, but no matter how poor, they always manage to scrape together enough money, often by making great sacrifices, to send their children to one of the innumerable talent schools.

8. Temple (1928–2014) was the country’s most famous child movie star during the 1930s.

“Adore!” she yelled once more, then laughed and became a friendly housewife again, a chubby little person with dimples in her fat cheeks and fat elbows.

“Have you any children, Mr. Simpson?” she asked.

“No,” he replied, blushing.

“You’re lucky—they’re a nuisance.”

She laughed to show that she didn’t really mean it and called her child again.

“Adore . . . Oh, Adore . . .”

Her next question surprised them both.

“Who do you follow?”

“What?” said Tod.

“I mean—in the Search for Health, along the Road of Life?”

They both gaped at her.

“I’m a raw-foodist, myself,” she said. “Dr. Pierce is our leader. You must have seen his ads—‘Know-All Pierce-All.’”

“Oh, yes,” Tod said, “you’re vegetarians.”

She laughed at his ignorance.

“Far from it. We’re much stricter. Vegetarians eat cooked vegetables. We eat only raw ones. Death comes from eating dead things.”

Neither Tod nor Homer found anything to say.

“Adore,” she began again. “Adore . . .”

This time there was an answer from around the corner of the garage.

“Here I am, mama.”

A minute later, a little boy appeared dragging behind him a small sailboat on wheels. He was about eight years old, with a pale, peaked face and a large, troubled forehead. He had great staring eyes. His eyebrows had been plucked and shaped carefully. Except for his Buster Brown collar,⁹ he was dressed like a man, in long trousers, vest and jacket.

He tried to kiss his mother, but she fended him off and pulled at his clothes, straightening and arranging them with savage little tugs.

“Adore,” she said sternly, “I want you to meet Mr. Simpson, our neighbor.”

Turning like a soldier at the command of a drill sergeant, he walked up to Homer and grasped his hand.

“A pleasure, sir,” he said, bowing stiffly with his heels together.

“That’s the way they do it in Europe,” Mrs. Loomis beamed. “Isn’t he cute?”

“What a pretty sailboat!” Homer said, trying to be friendly.

Both mother and son ignored his comment. She pointed to Tod, and the child repeated his bow and heel-click.

“Well, we’ve got to go,” she said.

Tod watched the child, who was standing a little to one side of his mother and making faces at Homer. He rolled his eyes back in his head so that only the whites showed and twisted his lips in a snarl.

Mrs. Loomis noticed Tod’s glance and turned sharply. When she saw what Adore was doing, she yanked him by the arm, jerking him clear off the ground.

9. A large round collar worn with a floppy bow tie, named after a cartoon character created in 1902; out of fashion by the 1930s.

“Adore!” she yelled.

To Tod she said apologetically, “He thinks he’s the Frankenstein monster.”¹ She picked the boy up, hugging and kissing him ardently. Then she set him down again and fixed his rumpled clothing.

“Won’t Adore sing something for us?” Tod asked.

“No,” the little boy said sharply.

“Adore,” his mother scolded, “sing at once.”

“That’s all right, if he doesn’t feel like it,” Homer said.

But Mrs. Loomis was determined to have him sing. She could never permit him to refuse an audience.

“Sing, Adore,” she repeated with quiet menace. “Sing ‘Mama Doan Wan’ No Peas.’”²

His shoulders twitched as though they already felt the strap. He tilted his straw sailor over one eye, buttoned up his jacket and did a little strut, then began:

*“Mama doan wan’ no peas,
An’ rice, an’ cocoanut oil,
Just a bottle of brandy handy all the day.
Mama doan wan’ no peas,
Mama doan wan’ no cocoanut oil.”*

His singing voice was deep and rough and he used the broken groan of the blues singer quite expertly. He moved his body only a little, against rather than in time with the music. The gestures he made with his hands were extremely suggestive.

*“Mama doan wan’ no gin,
Because gin do make her sin,
Mama doan wan’ no glass of gin,
Because it boun’ to make her sin,
An’ keep her hot and bothered all the day.”*

He seemed to know what the words meant, or at least his body and his voice seemed to know. When he came to the final chorus, his buttocks writhed and his voice carried a top-heavy load of sexual pain.

Tod and Homer applauded. Adore grabbed the string of his sailboat and circled the yard. He was imitating a tugboat. He tooted several times, then ran off.

“He’s just a baby,” Mrs. Loomis said proudly, “but he’s got loads of talent.”

Tod and Homer agreed.

She saw that he was gone again and left hurriedly. They could hear her calling in the brush back of the garage.

“Adore! Adore . . .”

“That’s a funny woman,” Tod said.

Homer sighed.

“I guess it’s hard to get a start in pictures. But Faye is awfully pretty.”

1. The monster created by Viktor Frankenstein in Frankenstein (1818), by Mary Shelley (1797–1851). A number of popular film adaptations starring Boris Karloff as the monster were made during the 1930s.

2. Song written in 1931 by Charles Lofthouse and L. Wolfe Gilbert and popularized in a 1938 recording by Jimmy Rushing with Count Basie and his orchestra.

Tod agreed. She appeared a moment later in a new flower print dress and picture hat and it was his turn to sigh. She was much more than pretty. She posed, quivering and balanced, on the doorstep and looked down at the two men in the patio. She was smiling, a subtle half-smile uncontaminated by thought. She looked just born, everything moist and fresh, volatile and perfumed. Tod suddenly became very conscious of his dull, insensitive feet bound in dead skin and of his hands, sticky and thick, holding a heavy, rough felt hat.

He tried to get out of going to the pictures with them, but couldn't. Sitting next to her in the dark proved the ordeal he expected it to be. Her self-sufficiency made him squirm and the desire to break its smooth surface with a blow, or at least a sudden obscene gesture, became irresistible.

He began to wonder if he himself didn't suffer from the ingrained, morbid apathy he liked to draw in others. Maybe he could only be galvanized into sensibility and that was why he was chasing Faye.

He left hurriedly, without saying good-bye. He had decided to stop running after her. It was an easy decision to make, but a hard one to carry out. In order to manage it, he fell back on one of the oldest tricks in the very full bag of the intellectual. After all, he told himself, he had drawn her enough times. He shut the portfolio that held the drawings he had made of her, tied it with a string, and put it away in his trunk.

It was a childish trick, hardly worthy of a primitive witch doctor, yet it worked. He was able to avoid her for several months. During this time, he took his pad and pencils on a continuous hunt for other models. He spent his nights at the different Hollywood churches, drawing the worshipers. He visited the "Church of Christ, Physical" where holiness was attained through the constant use of chest-weights and spring grips; the "Church Invisible" where fortunes were told and the dead made to find lost objects; the "Tabernacle of the Third Coming" where a woman in male clothing preached the "Crusade Against Salt"; and the "Temple Moderne" under whose glass and chromium roof "Brain-Breathing, the Secret of the Aztecs" was taught.

As he watched these people writhe on the hard seats of their churches, he thought of how well Alessandro Magnasco³ would dramatize the contrast between their drained-out, feeble bodies and their wild, disordered minds. He would not satirize them as Hogarth⁴ or Daumier might, nor would he pity them. He would paint their fury with respect, appreciating its awful, anarchic power and aware that they had it in them to destroy civilization.

One Friday night in the "Tabernacle of the Third Coming," a man near Tod stood up to speak. Although his name most likely was Thompson or Johnson and his home town Sioux City, he had the same counter-sunk eyes, like the heads of burnished spikes, that a monk by Magnasco might have. He was probably just in from one of the colonies in the desert near Soboba Hot Springs⁵ where he had been conning over his soul on a diet of raw fruit and nuts. He was very angry. The message he had brought to the city was one that an illiterate anchorite⁶ might have given decadent Rome. It was a crazy jumble of dietary rules, economics and Biblical threats. He claimed to have seen the Tiger of Wrath stalking the walls of the citadel and the Jackal of

3. Italian painter (1667–1749) noted for representing beggars, criminals, religious enthusiasts, and outcasts.

4. William Hogarth (1697–1764), satirical English painter and printmaker.

5. Resort in southern California's San Jacinto Valley.

6. A hermit.

Lust skulking in the shrubbery,⁷ and he connected these omens with “thirty dollars every Thursday and meat eating.”

Tod didn't laugh at the man's rhetoric. He knew it was unimportant. What mattered were his messianic rage and the emotional response of his hearers. They sprang to their feet, shaking their fists and shouting. On the altar someone began to beat a bass drum and soon the entire congregation was singing “Onward Christian Soldiers.”⁸

20

As time went on, the relationship between Faye and Homer began to change. She became bored with the life they were leading together and as her boredom deepened, she began to persecute him. At first she did it unconsciously, later maliciously.

Homer realized that the end was in sight even before she did. All he could do to prevent its coming was to increase his servility and his generosity. He waited on her hand and foot. He bought her a coat of summer ermine and a light blue Buick runabout.⁹

His servility was like that of a cringing, clumsy dog, who is always anticipating a blow, welcoming it even, and in a way that makes overwhelming the desire to strike him. His generosity was still more irritating. It was so helpless and unselfish that it made her feel mean and cruel, no matter how hard she tried to be kind. And it was so bulky that she was unable to ignore it. She had to resent it. He was destroying himself, and although he didn't mean it that way, forcing her to accept the blame.

They had almost reached a final crisis when Tod saw them again. Late one night, just as he was preparing for bed, Homer knocked on his door and said that Faye was downstairs in the car and that they wanted him to go to a night club with them.

The outfit Homer wore was very funny. He had on loose blue linen slacks and a chocolate flannel jacket over a yellow polo shirt. Only a Negro could have worn it without looking ridiculous, and no one was ever less a Negro than Homer.

Tod drove with them to the “Cinderella Bar,” a little stucco building in the shape of a lady's slipper, on Western Avenue. Its floor show consisted of female impersonators.

Faye was in a nasty mood. When the waiter took their order, she insisted on a champagne cocktail for Homer. He wanted coffee. The waiter brought both, but she made him take the coffee back.

Homer explained painstakingly, as he must have done many times, that he could not drink alcohol because it made him sick. Faye listened with mock patience. When he finished, she laughed and lifted the cocktail to his mouth.

“Drink it, damn you,” she said.

She tilted the glass, but he didn't open his mouth and the liquor ran down his chin. He wiped himself, using the napkin without unfolding it.

7. The prophet Jeremiah predicts that both Babylon and Jerusalem will become a haunt of jackals for their sins (Jeremiah 9.11, 51.37). According to one of the “Proverbs of Hell” in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793) by English poet William Blake, “The tigers of wrath are wiser than the horses of instruction.”

8. Popular Christian hymn, English in origin, composed in 1871.

9. A small open car. In the 1930s Buick was a luxury car. “Ermine”: a particularly expensive fur.

Faye called the waiter again.

"He doesn't like champagne cocktails," she said. "Bring him brandy."

Homer shook his head.

"Please, Faye," he whimpered.

She held the brandy to his lips, moving the glass when he turned away.

"Come on, sport—bottoms up."

"Let him alone," Tod finally said.

She ignored him as though she hadn't even heard his protest. She was both furious and ashamed of herself. Her shame strengthened her fury and gave it a target.

"Come on, sport," she said savagely, "or mama'll spank."

She turned to Tod.

"I don't like people who won't drink. It isn't sociable. They feel superior and I don't like people who feel superior."

"I don't feel superior," Homer said.

"Oh, yes, you do. I'm drunk and you're sober and so you feel superior. Goddamned, stinking superior."

He opened his mouth to reply and she poured the brandy into it, then clapped her hand over his lips so that he couldn't spit it back. Some of it came out of his nose.

Still without unfolding the napkin, he wiped himself. Faye ordered another brandy. When it came, she held it to his lips again, but this time he took it and drank it himself, fighting the stuff down.

"That's the boy," Faye laughed. "Well done, sloppy-boppy."

Tod asked her to dance in order to give Homer a moment alone. When they reached the floor, she made an attempt to defend herself.

"That guy's superiority is driving me crazy."

"He loves you," Tod said.

"Yeah, I know, but he's such a slob."

She started to cry on his shoulder and he held her very tight. He took a long chance.

"Sleep with me."

"No, baby," she said sympathetically.

"Please, please . . . just once."

"I can't, honey. I don't love you."

"You worked for Mrs. Jennings. Make believe you're still working for her."

She didn't get angry.

"That was a mistake. And anyway, that was different. I only went on call enough times to pay for the funeral and besides those men were complete strangers. You know what I mean?"

"Yes. But please, darling. I'll never bother you again. I'll go east right after. Be kind."

"I can't."

"Why . . . ?"

"I just can't. I'm sorry, darling. I'm not a tease, but I can't like that."

"I love you."

"No, sweetheart, I can't."

They danced until the number finished without saying anything else. He was grateful to her for having behaved so well, for not having made him feel too ridiculous.

When they returned to the table, Homer was sitting exactly as they had left him. He held the folded napkin in one hand and the empty brandy glass in the other. His helplessness was extremely irritating.

"You're right about the brandy, Faye," Homer said. "It's swell! Whoopee!"

He made a little circular gesture with the hand that held the glass.

"I'd like a Scotch," Tod said.

"Me, too," Faye said.

Homer made another gallant attempt to get into the spirit of the evening. "Garsoon,"¹ he called to the waiter, "more drinks."

He grinned at them anxiously. Faye burst out laughing and Homer did his best to laugh with her. When she stopped suddenly, he found himself laughing alone and turned his laugh into a cough, then hid the cough in his napkin.

She turned to Tod.

"What the devil can you do with a slob like that?"

The orchestra started and Tod was able to ignore her question. All three of them turned to watch a young man in a tight evening gown of red silk sing a lullaby.

*"Little man, you're crying,
I know why you're blue,
Someone took your kiddycar away;
Better go to sleep now,
Little man, you've had a busy day . . ."*²

He had a soft, throbbing voice and his gestures were matronly, tender and aborted, a series of unconscious caresses. What he was doing was in no sense parody; it was too simple and too restrained. It wasn't even theatrical. This dark young man with his thin, hairless arms and soft, rounded shoulders, who rocked an imaginary cradle as he crooned, was really a woman.

When he had finished, there was a great deal of applause. The young man shook himself and became an actor again. He tripped on his train, as though he weren't used to it, lifted his skirts to show he was wearing Paris garters,³ then strode off swinging his shoulders. His imitation of a man was awkward and obscene.

Homer and Tod applauded him.

"I hate fairies," Faye said.

"All women do."

Tod meant it as a joke, but Faye was angry.

"They're dirty," she said.

He started to say something else, but Faye had turned to Homer again. She seemed unable to resist nagging him. This time she pinched his arm until he gave a little squeak.

"Do you know what a fairy is?" she demanded.

"Yes," he said hesitatingly.

"All right, then," she barked. "Give out! What's a fairy?"

1. Homer's pronunciation of garçon, "waiter" (French).

2. From "Little Man, You've Had a Busy Day" (1934), by Al Hoffman (1902–1960), Maurice Sigler (1901–1960), and Mabel Wayne (1890– 1978), recorded in the 1930s by Paul Robeson (1898–1976) among other notable singers.

3. A brand marketed to men for holding up dress socks.

Homer twisted uneasily, as though he already felt the ruler on his behind, and looked imploring at Tod, who tried to help him by forming the word “homo” with his lips.

“Momo,” Homer said.

Faye burst out laughing. But his hurt look made it impossible not to relent, so she patted his shoulder.

“What a hick,” she said.

He grinned gratefully and signaled the waiter to bring another round of drinks.

The orchestra began to play and a man came over to ask Faye to dance. Without saying a word to Homer, she followed him to the floor.

“Who’s that?” Homer asked, chasing them with his eyes.

Tod made believe he knew and said that he had often seen him around the San Berdoo. His explanation satisfied Homer, but at the same time set him to thinking of something else. Tod could almost see him shaping a question in his head.

“Do you know Earle Shoop?” Homer finally asked.

“Yes.”

Homer then poured out a long, confused story about a dirty black hen. He kept referring to the hen again and again, as though it were the one thing he couldn’t stand about Earle and the Mexican. For a man who was incapable of hatred, he managed to draw a pretty horrible picture of the bird.

“You never saw such a disgusting thing, the way it squats and turns its head. The roosters have torn all the feathers off its neck and made its comb all bloody and it has scabby feet covered with warts and it cackles so nasty when they drop it into the pen.”

“Who drops it into what pen?”

“The Mexican.”

“Miguel?”

“Yes. He’s almost as bad as his hen.”

“You’ve been to their camp?”

“Camp?”

“In the mountains?”

“No. They’re living in the garage. Faye asked me if I minded if a friend of hers lived in the garage for a while because he was broke. But I didn’t know about the chickens or the Mexican. . . . Lots of people are out of work nowadays.”

“Why don’t you throw them out?”

“They’re broke and they have no place to go. It isn’t very comfortable living in a garage.”

“But if they don’t behave?”

“It’s just that hen. I don’t mind the roosters, they’re pretty, but that dirty hen. She shakes her dirty feathers each time and clucks so nasty.”

“You don’t have to look at it.”

“They do it every afternoon at the same time when I’m usually sitting in the chair in the sun having got back from shopping with Faye and just before dinner. The Mexican knows I don’t like to see it so he tries to make me look just for spite. I go into the house, but he taps on the windows and calls me to come out and watch. I don’t call that fun. Some people have funny ideas of what’s fun.”

"What's Faye say?"

"She doesn't mind the hen. She says it's only natural."

Then, in case Tod should mistake this for criticism, he told him what a fine, wholesome child she was. Tod agreed, but brought him back to the subject.

"If I were you," he said, "I'd report the chickens to the police. You have to have a permit to keep chickens in the city. I'd do something and damned quick."

Homer avoided a direct answer.

"I wouldn't touch that thing for all the money in the world. She's all over scabs and almost naked. She looks like a buzzard. She eats meat. I saw her one time eating some meat that the Mexican got out of the garbage can. He feeds the roosters grain but the hen eats garbage and he keeps her in a dirty box."

"If I were you, I'd throw those bastards out and their birds with them."

"No, they're nice enough young fellows, just down on their luck, like a lot of people these days, you know. It's just that hen . . ."

He shook his head wearily, as though he could smell and taste her.

Faye was coming back. Homer saw that Tod was going to speak to her about Earle and the Mexican and signaled desperately for him not to do it. She, however, caught him at it and was curious.

"What have you guys been chinning about?"

"You, darling," Tod said. "Homer has a t.l.⁴ for you."

"Tell me, Homer."

"No, first you tell me one."

"Well, the man I just danced with asked me if you were a movie big shot."

Tod saw that Homer was unable to think of a return compliment so he spoke for him.

"I said you were the most beautiful girl in the place."

"Yes," Homer agreed. "That's what Tod said."

"I don't believe it. Tod hates me. And anyway, I caught you telling him to keep quiet. You were shushing him."

She laughed.

"I bet I know what you were talking about." She mimicked Homer's excited disgust. "That dirty black hen, she's all over scabs and almost naked."

Homer laughed apologetically, but Tod was angry.

"What's the idea of keeping those guys in the garage?" he demanded.

"What the hell is it your business?" she replied, but not with real anger. She was amused.

"Homer enjoys their company. Don't you, sloppy-boppy?"

"I told Tod they were nice fellows just down on their luck like a lot of people these days. There's an awful lot of unemployment going around."

"That's right," she said. "If they go, I go."

Tod had guessed as much. He realized there was no use in saying anything. Homer was again signaling for him to keep quiet.

For some reason or other, Faye suddenly became ashamed of herself. She apologized to Tod by offering to dance with him again, flirting as she suggested it. Tod refused.

4. From "trade last"; a compliment passed along in hopes of receiving another compliment in exchange.

She broke the silence that followed by a eulogy of Miguel's game chickens, which was really meant to be an excuse for herself. She described what marvelous fighters the birds were, how much Miguel loved them and what good care he took of them.

Homer agreed enthusiastically. Tod remained silent. She asked him if he had ever seen a cock fight and invited him to the garage for the next night. A man from San Diego was coming North with his birds to pit them against Miguel's.

When she turned to Homer again, he leaned away as though she were going to hit him. She flushed with shame at this and looked at Tod to see if he had noticed. The rest of the evening, she tried to be nice to Homer. She even touched him a little, straightening his collar and patting his hair smooth. He beamed happily.

21

When Tod told Claude Estee about the cock fight, he wanted to go with him. They drove to Homer's place together.

It was one of those blue and lavender nights when the luminous color seems to have been blown over the scene with an air brush. Even the darkest shadows held some purple.

A car stood in the driveway of the garage with its headlights on. They could see several men in the corner of the building and could hear their voices. Someone laughed, using only two notes, ha-ha and ha-ha, over and over again.

Tod stepped ahead to make himself known, in case they were taking precautions against the police. When he entered the light, Abe Kusich and Miguel greeted him, but Earle didn't.

"The fights are off," Abe said. "That stinkola from Diego didn't get here."

Claude came up and Tod introduced him to the three men. The dwarf was arrogant, Miguel gracious and Earle his usual wooden, surly self.

Most of the garage floor had been converted into a pit, an oval space about nine feet long and seven or eight wide. It was floored with an old carpet and walled by a low, ragged fence made of odd pieces of lath and wire. Faye's coupe stood in the driveway, placed so that its headlights flooded the arena.

Claude and Tod followed Abe out of the glare and sat down with him on an old trunk in the back of the garage. Earle and Miguel came in and squatted on their heels facing them. They were both wearing blue denims, polka-dot shirts, big hats and high-heeled boots. They looked very handsome and picturesque.

They sat smoking silently, all of them calm except the dwarf, who was fidgety. Although he had plenty of room, he suddenly gave Tod a shove.

"Get over, lard-ass," he snarled.

Tod moved, crowding against Claude, without saying anything. Earle laughed at Tod rather than the dwarf, but the dwarf turned on him anyway.

"Why, you punkola! Who you laughing at?"

"You," Earle said.

"That so, hah? Well, listen to me, you pee-hole bandit, for two cents I'd knock you out of them prop boots."

Earle reached into his shirt pocket and threw a coin on the ground.

"There's a nickel," he said.

The dwarf started to get off the trunk, but Tod caught him by the collar. He didn't try to get loose, but leaned forward against his coat, like a terrier in a harness, and wagged his great head from side to side.

"Go on," he sputtered, "you fugitive from the Western Costume Company, you . . . you louse in a fright-wig, you."

Earle would have been much less angry if he could have thought of a snappy comeback. He mumbled something about a half-pint bastard, then spat. He hit the instep of the dwarf's shoe with a big gob of spittle.

"Nice shot," Miguel said.

This was apparently enough for Earle to consider himself the winner, for he smiled and became quiet. The dwarf slapped Tod's hand away from his collar with a curse and settled down on the trunk again.

"He ought to wear gaffs,"⁵ Miguel said.

"I don't need them for a punk like that."

They all laughed and everything was fine again.

Abe leaned across Tod to speak to Claude.

"It would have been a swell main," he said. "There was more than a dozen guys here before you come and some of them with real dough. I was going to make book."

He took out his wallet and gave him one of his business cards.

"It was in the bag," Miguel said. "I got five birds that would of won easy and two sure losers. We would of made a killing."

"I've never seen a chicken fight," Claude said. "In fact, I've never even seen a game chicken."

Miguel offered to show him one of his birds and left to get it. Tod went down to the car for the bottle of whiskey they had left in a side pocket. When he got back, Miguel was holding Jujutla in the light. They all examined the bird.

Miguel held the cock firmly with both hands, somewhat in the manner that a basketball is held for an underhand toss. The bird had short, oval wings and a heart-shaped tail that stood at right angles to its body. It had a triangular head, like a snake's, terminating in a slightly curved beak, thick at the base and fine at the point. All its feathers were so tight and hard that they looked as though they had been varnished. They had been thinned out for fighting and the lines of its body, which was like a truncated wedge, stood out plainly. From between Miguel's fingers dangled its long, bright orange legs and its slightly darker feet with their horn nails.

"Juju was bred by John R. Bowes of Lindale, Texas," Miguel said proudly. "He's a six times winner. I give fifty dollars and a shotgun for him."

"He's a nice bird," the dwarf said grudgingly, "but looks ain't everything."

Claude took out his wallet.

"I'd like to see him fight," he said. "Suppose you sell me one of your other birds and I put it against him."

Miguel thought a while and looked at Earle, who told him to go ahead.

"I've got a bird I'll sell you for fifteen bucks," he said.

The dwarf interfered.

5. Metal spurs attached to fighting gamecocks.

“Let me pick the bird.”

“Oh, I don’t care,” Claude said, “I just want to see a fight. Here’s your fifteen.”

Earle took the money and Miguel told him to get Hermano, the big red.

“That red’ll go over eight pounds,” he said, “while Juju won’t go more than six.”

Earle came back carrying a large rooster that had a silver shawl. He looked like an ordinary barnyard fowl.

When the dwarf saw him, he became indignant.

“What do you call that, a goose?”

“That’s one of Street’s Butcher Boys,” Miguel said.

“I wouldn’t bait a hook with him,” the dwarf said.

“You don’t have to bet,” Earle mumbled.

The dwarf eyed the bird and the bird eyed him. He turned to Claude.

“Let me handle him for you, mister,” he said.

Miguel spoke quickly.

“Earle’ll do it. He knows the cock.”

The dwarf exploded at this.

“It’s a frame-up!” he yelled.

He tried to take the red, but Earle held the bird high in the air out of the little man’s reach.

Miguel opened the trunk and took out a small wooden box, the kind chessmen are kept in. It was full of curved gaffs, small squares of chamois with holes in their centers and bits of waxed string like that used by a shoemaker.

They crowded around to watch him arm Juju. First he wiped the short stubs on the cock’s legs to make sure they were clean and then placed a leather square over one of them so that the stub came through the hole. He then fitted a gaff over it and fastened it with a bit of the soft string, wrapping very carefully. He did the same to the other leg.

When he had finished, Earle started on the big red.

“That’s a bird with lots of cojones,”⁶ Miguel said. “He’s won plenty fights. He don’t look fast maybe, but he’s fast all right and he packs an awful wallop.”

“Strictly for the cook stove, if you ask me,” the dwarf said.

Earle took out a pair of shears and started to lighten the red’s plumage. The dwarf watched him cut away most of the bird’s tail, but when he began to work on the breast, he caught his hand.

“Leave him be!” he barked. “You’ll kill him fast that way. He needs that stuff for protection.”

He turned to Claude again.

“Please, mister, let me handle him.”

“Make him buy a share in the bird,” Miguel said.

Claude laughed and motioned for Earle to give Abe the bird. Earle didn’t want to and looked meaningly at Miguel.

The dwarf began to dance with rage.

“You’re trying to cold-deck⁷ us!” he screamed.

“Aw, give it to him,” Miguel said.

6. Balls, testicles (Spanish).

7. To stack the deck; i.e., to cheat.

The little man tucked the bird under his left arm so that his hands were free and began to look over the gaffs in the box. They were all the same length, three inches, but some had more pronounced curves than the others. He selected a pair and explained his strategy to Claude.

"He's going to do most of his fighting on his back. This pair'll hit right that way. If he could get over the other bird, I wouldn't use them."

He got down on his knees and honed the gaffs on the cement floor until they were like needles.

"Have we a chance?" Tod asked.

"You can't ever tell," he said, shaking his extra large head. "He feels almost like a dead bird."

After adjusting the gaffs with great care, he looked the bird over, stretching its wings and blowing its feathers in order to see its skin.

"The comb ain't bright enough for fighting condition," he said, pinching it, "but he looks strong. He may have been a good one once."

He held the bird in the light and looked at its head. When Miguel saw him examining its beak, he told him anxiously to quit stalling. But the dwarf paid no attention and went on muttering to himself. He motioned for Tod and Claude to look.

"What'd I tell you!" he said, puffing with indignation. "We've been cold-decked."

He pointed to a hair line running across the top of the bird's beak.

"That's not a crack," Miguel protested, "it's just a mark."

He reached for the bird as though to rub its beak and the bird pecked savagely at him. This pleased the dwarf.

"We'll fight," he said, "but we won't bet."

Earle was to referee. He took a piece of chalk and drew three lines in the center of the pit, a long one in the middle and two shorter ones parallel to it and about three feet away.

"Pit your cocks," he called.

"No, bill them first," the dwarf protested.

He and Miguel stood at arm's length and thrust their birds together to anger them. Juju caught the big red by the comb and held on viciously until Miguel jerked him away. The red, who had been rather apathetic, came to life and the dwarf had trouble holding him. The two men thrust their birds together again, and again Juju caught the red's comb. The big cock became frantic with rage and struggled to get at the smaller bird.

"We're ready," the dwarf said.

He and Miguel climbed into the pit and set their birds down on the short lines so that they faced each other. They held them by the tails and waited for Earle to give the signal to let go.

"Pit them," he ordered.

The dwarf had been watching Earle's lips and he had his bird off first, but Juju rose straight in the air and sank one spur in the red's breast. It went through the feathers into the flesh. The red turned with the gaff still stuck in him and pecked twice at his opponent's head.

They separated the birds and held them to the lines again.

"Pit 'em!" Earle shouted.

Again Juju got above the other bird, but this time he missed with his spurs. The red tried to get above him, but couldn't. He was too clumsy and heavy to fight in the air. Juju climbed again, cutting and hitting so rapidly that his legs were a golden blur. The red met him by going back on his tail and hooking upward like a cat. Juju landed again and again. He broke one of the red's wings, then practically severed a leg.

"Handle them," Earle called.

When the dwarf gathered the red up, its neck had begun to droop and it was a mass of blood and matted feathers. The little man moaned over the bird, then set to work. He spit into its gaping beak and took the comb between his lips and sucked the blood back into it. The red began to regain its fury, but not its strength. Its beak closed and its neck straightened. The dwarf smoothed and shaped its plumage. He could do nothing to help the broken wing or the dangling leg.

"Pit 'em," Earle said.

The dwarf insisted that the birds be put down beak to beak on the center line, so that the red would not have to move to get at his opponent. Miguel agreed.

The red was very gallant. When Abe let go of its tail, it made a great effort to get off the ground and meet Juju in the air, but it could only thrust with one leg and fell over on its side. Juju sailed above it, half turned and came down on its back, driving in both spurs. The red twisted free, throwing Juju, and made a terrific effort to hook with its good leg, but fell sideways again.

Before Juju could get into the air, the red managed to drive a hard blow with its beak to Juju's head. This slowed the smaller bird down and he fought on the ground. In the pecking match, the red's greater weight and strength evened up for his lack of a leg and a wing. He managed to give as good as he got. But suddenly his cracked beak broke off, leaving only the lower half. A large bubble of blood rose where the beak had been. The red didn't retreat an inch, but made a great effort to get into the air once more. Using its one leg skillfully, it managed to rise six or seven inches from the ground, not enough, however, to get its spurs into play. Juju went up with him and got well above, then drove both gaffs into the red's breast. Again one of the steel needles stuck.

"Handle them," Earle shouted.

Miguel freed his bird and gave the other back to the dwarf. Abe, moaning softly, smoothed its feathers and licked its eyes clean, then took its whole head in his mouth. The red was finished, however. It couldn't even hold its neck straight. The dwarf blew away the feathers from under its tail and pressed the lips of its vent⁸ together hard. When that didn't seem to help, he inserted his little finger and scratched the bird's testicles. It fluttered and made a gallant effort to straighten its neck.

"Pit birds."

Once more the red tried to rise with Juju, pushing hard with its remaining leg, but it only spun crazily. Juju rose, but missed. The red thrust weakly with its broken bill. Juju went into the air again and this time drove a gaff through one of the red's eyes into its brain. The red fell over stone dead.

The dwarf groaned with anguish, but no one else said anything. Juju pecked at the dead bird's remaining eye.

"Take off that stinking cannibal!" the dwarf screamed.

8. Cloacal opening.

Miguel laughed, then caught Juju and removed its gaffs. Earle did the same for the red. He handled the dead cock gently and with respect.

Tod passed the whiskey.

22

They were well on their way to getting drunk when Homer came out to the garage. He gave a little start when he saw the dead chicken sprawled on the carpet. He shook hands with Claude after Tod had introduced him, and with Abe Kusich, then made a little set speech about everybody coming in for a drink. They trooped after him.

Faye greeted them at the door. She was wearing a pair of green silk lounging pajamas and green mules⁹ with large pompons and very high heels. The top three buttons of her jacket were open and a good deal of her chest was exposed but nothing of her breasts; not because they were small, but because they were placed wide apart and their thrust was upward and outward.

She gave Tod her hand and patted the dwarf on the top of the head. They were old friends. In acknowledging Homer's awkward introduction of Claude, she was very much the lady. It was her favorite role and she assumed it whenever she met a new man, especially if he were someone whose affluence was obvious.

"Charmed to have you," she trilled.

The dwarf laughed at her.

In a voice stiff with hauteur, she then ordered Homer into the kitchen for soda, ice and glasses.

"A swell layout," announced the dwarf, putting on the hat he had taken off in the doorway.

He climbed into one of the big Spanish chairs, using his knees and hands to do it, and sat on the edge with his feet dangling. He looked like a ventriloquist's dummy.

Earle and Miguel had remained behind to wash up. When they came in, Faye welcomed them with stilted condescension.

"How do you do, boys? The refreshments will be along in a jiffy. But perhaps you prefer a liqueur, Miguel?"

"No, mum," he said, a little startled. "I'll have what the others have."

He followed Earle across the room to the couch. Both of them took long, wooden steps, as though they weren't used to being in a house. They sat down gingerly with their backs straight, their big hats on their knees and their hands under their hats. They had combed their hair before leaving the garage and their small round heads glistened prettily.

Homer took the drinks around on a small tray.

They all made a show of manners, all but the dwarf, that is, who remained as arrogant as ever. He even commented on the quality of the whiskey. As soon as everyone had been served, Homer sat down.

Faye alone remained standing. She was completely self-possessed despite their stares. She stood with one hip thrown out and her hand on it. From 9. Backless shoes.

where Claude was sitting he could follow the charming line of her spine as it swooped into her buttocks, which were like a heart upside down.

He gave a low whistle of admiration and everyone agreed by moving uneasily or laughing.

"My dear," she said to Homer, "perhaps some of the men would like cigars?"

He was surprised and mumbled something about there being no cigars in the house but that he would go to the store for them if . . . Having to say all this made him unhappy and he took the whiskey around again. He poured very generous shots.

"That's a becoming shade of green," Tod said.

Faye peacocked for them all.

"I thought maybe it was a little gaudy . . . vulgar, you know."

"No," Claude said enthusiastically, "it's stunning."

She repaid him for his compliment by smiling in a peculiar, secret way and running her tongue over her lips. It was one of her most characteristic gestures and very effective. It seemed to promise all sorts of undefined intimacies, yet it was really as simple and automatic as the word thanks. She used it to reward anyone for anything, no matter how unimportant.

Claude made the same mistake Tod had often made and jumped to his feet.

"Won't you sit here?" he said, waving gallantly at his chair.

She accepted by repeating the secret smile and the tongue caress. Claude bowed, but then, realizing that everyone was watching him, added a little mock flourish to make himself less ridiculous. Tod joined them, then Earle and Miguel came over. Claude did the courting while the others stood by and stared at her.

"Do you work in pictures, Mr. Estee?" she asked.

"Yes. You're in pictures, of course?"

Everyone was aware of the begging note in his voice, but no one smiled. They didn't blame him. It was almost impossible to keep that note out when talking to her. Men used it just to say good morning.

"Not exactly, but I hope to be," she said. "I've worked as an extra, but I haven't had a real chance yet. I expect to get one soon. All I ask is a chance. Acting is in my blood. We Greeners, you know, were all theatre people from away back."

"Yes. I . . ."

She didn't let Claude finish, but he didn't care.

"Not musicals, but real dramas. Of course, maybe light comedies at first. All I ask is a chance. I've been buying a lot of clothes lately to make myself one. I don't believe in luck. Luck is just hard work, they say, and I'm willing to work as hard as anybody."

"You have a delightful voice and you handle it well," he said.

He couldn't help it. Having once seen her secret smile and the things that accompanied it, he wanted to make her repeat it again and again.

"I'd like to do a show on Broadway," she continued. "That's the way to get a start nowadays. They won't talk to you unless you've had stage experience."

She went on and on, telling him how careers are made in the movies and how she intended to make hers. It was all nonsense. She mixed bits of badly understood advice from the trade papers with other bits out of the fan magazines and compared these with the legends that surround the activities of screen stars and executives. Without any noticeable transition, possibilities became probabilities and wound up as inevitabilities. At first she occasionally stopped and waited for Claude to chorus a hearty agreement, but when she had a good start, all her questions were rhetorical and the stream of words rippled on without a break.

None of them really heard her. They were all too busy watching her smile, laugh, shiver, whisper, grow indignant, cross and uncross her legs, stick out her tongue, widen and narrow her eyes, toss her head so that her platinum hair splashed against the red plush of the chair back. The strange thing about her gestures and expressions was that they didn't really illustrate what she was saying. They were almost pure. It was as though her body recognized how foolish her words were and tried to excite her hearers into being uncritical. It worked that night; no one even thought of laughing at her. The only move they made was to narrow their circle about her.

Tod stood on the outer edge, watching her through the opening between Earle and the Mexican. When he felt a light tap on his shoulder, he knew it was Homer, but didn't turn. When the tap was repeated, he shrugged the hand away. A few minutes later, he heard a shoe squeak behind him and turned to see Homer tiptoeing off. He reached a chair safely and sank into it with a sigh. He put his heavy hands on the knees, one on each, and stared for a while at their backs. He felt Tod's eyes on him and looked up and smiled.

His smile annoyed Tod. It was one of those irritating smiles that seem to say: "My friend, what can you know of suffering?" There was something very patronizing and superior about it, and intolerably snobbish.

He felt hot and a little sick. He turned his back on Homer and went out the front door. His indignant exit wasn't very successful. He wobbled quite badly and when he reached the sidewalk, he had to sit down on the curb with his back against a date palm.

From where he was sitting, he couldn't see the city in the valley below the canyon, but he could see the reflection of its lights, which hung in the sky above it like a batik¹ parasol. The unlighted part of the sky at the edge of the parasol was a deep black with hardly a trace of blue.

Homer followed him out of the house and stood standing behind him, afraid to approach. He might have sneaked away without Tod's knowing it, if he had not suddenly looked down and seen his shadow.

"Hello," he said.

He motioned for Homer to join him on the curb.

"You'll catch cold," Homer said.

Tod understood his protest. He made it because he wanted to be certain that his company was really welcome. Nevertheless, Tod refused to repeat the invitation. He didn't even turn to look at him again. He was sure he was wearing his long-suffering smile and didn't want to see it.

He wondered why all his sympathy had turned to malice. Because of Faye? It was impossible for him to admit it. Because he was unable to do anything to help him? This reason was a more comfortable one, but he dismissed it with even less consideration. He had never set himself up as a healer.

Homer was looking the other way, at the house, watching the parlor window. He cocked his head to one side when someone laughed. The four short sounds, ha-ha and again ha-ha, distinct musical notes, were made by the dwarf.

1. Cloth patterned through a wax-relief dying process, brought to a high art in Indonesia.

“You could learn from him,” Tod said.

“What?” Homer asked, turning to look at him.

“Let it go.”

His impatience both hurt and puzzled Homer. He saw that and motioned for him to sit down, this time emphatically.

Homer obeyed. He did a poor job of squatting and hurt himself. He sat nursing his knee.

“What is it?” Tod finally said, making an attempt to be kind.

“Nothing, Tod, nothing.”

He was grateful and increased his smile. Tod couldn’t help seeing all its annoying attributes, resignation, kindness, and humility.

They sat quietly, Homer with his heavy shoulders hunched and the sweet grin on his face, Tod frowning, his back pressed hard against the palm tree. In the house the radio was playing and its blare filled the street.

They sat for a long time without speaking. Several times Homer started to tell Tod something but he didn’t seem able to get the words out. Tod refused to help him with a question.

His big hands left his lap, where they had been playing “here’s the church and here the steeple,” and hid in his armpits. They remained there for a moment, then slid under his thighs. A moment later they were back in his lap. The right hand cracked the joints of the left, one by one, then the left did the same service for the right. They seemed easier for a moment, but not for long. They started “here’s the church” again, going through the entire performance and ending with the joint manipulation as before. He started a third time, but catching Tod’s eyes, he stopped and trapped his hands between his knees.

It was the most complicated tic Tod had ever seen. What made it particularly horrible was its precision. It wasn’t pantomime, as he had first thought, but manual ballet.

When Tod saw the hands start to crawl out again, he exploded.

“For Christ’s sake!”

The hands struggled to get free, but Homer clamped his knees shut and held them.

“I’m sorry,” he said.

“Oh, all right.”

“But I can’t help it, Tod. I have to do it three times.”

“Okay with me.”

He turned his back on him.

Faye started to sing and her voice poured into the street.

*“Dreamed about a reefer five feet long
Not too mild and not too strong,
You’ll be high, but not for long,
If you’re a viper—a vi-paah.”²*

Instead of her usual swing delivery, she was using a lugubrious one, wailing the tune as though it were a dirge. At the end of every stanza, she shifted to an added minor.

2. “If You’re a Viper,” a popular jazz song about marijuana written and first recorded in 1936 by Stuff Smith (1909–1967). “Viper”: a marijuana smoker. “Reefer”: a joint, or marijuana cigarette.

*"I'm the queen of everything,
Gotta be high before I can swing,
Light a tea and let it be,
If you're a viper—a vi-paah."*

"She sings very pretty," Homer said.

"She's drunk."

"I don't know what to do, Tod," Homer complained. "She's drinking an awful lot lately. It's that Earle. We used to have a lot of fun before he came, but now we don't have any fun any more since he started to hang around."

"Why don't you get rid of him?"

"I was thinking about what you said about the license to keep chickens."

Tod understood what he wanted.

"I'll report them to the Board of Health tomorrow."

Homer thanked him, then insisted on explaining in detail why he couldn't do it himself.

"But that'll only get rid of the Mexican," Tod said. "You'll have to throw Earle out yourself."

"Maybe he'll go with his friend?"

Tod knew that Homer was begging him to agree so that he could go on hoping, but he refused.

"Not a chance. You'll have to throw him out."

Homer accepted this with his brave, sweet smile.

"Maybe . . ."

"Tell Faye to do it," Tod said.

"Oh, I can't."

"Why the hell not? It's your house."

"Don't be mad at me, Toddie."

"All right, Homie, I'm not mad at you."

Faye's voice came through the open window.

*"And when your throat gets dry,
You know you're high,
If you're a viper."*

The others harmonized on the last word, repeating it.

"Vi-paah . . ."

"Toddie," Homer began, "if . . ."

"Stop calling me Toddie, for Christ's sake!"

Homer didn't understand. He took Tod's hand.

"I didn't mean nothing. Back home we call . . ."

Tod couldn't stand his trembling signals of affection. He tore free with a jerk.

"Oh, but, Toddie, I . . ."

"She's a whore!"

He heard Homer grunt, then heard his knees creak as he struggled to his feet.

Faye's voice came pouring through the window, a reedy wail that broke in the middle with a husky catch.

*"High, high, high, high, when you're high,
Everything is dandy,*

*Truck on down to the candy store,
Bust your conk on peppermint candy!³
Then you know your body's sent,
Don't care if you don't pay rent,
Sky is high and so am I,
If you're a viper—a vi-paah."*

23

When Tod went back into the house, he found Earle, Abe Kusich and Claude standing together in a tight group, watching Faye dance with Miguel. She and the Mexican were doing a slow tango to music from the phonograph. He held her very tight, one of his legs thrust between hers, and they swayed together in long spirals that broke rhythmically at the top of each curve into a dip. All the buttons on her lounging pajamas were open and the arm he had around her waist was inside her clothes.

Tod stood watching the dancers from the doorway for a moment, then went to a little table on which the whiskey bottle was. He poured himself a quarter of a tumblerful, tossed it off, then poured another drink. Carrying the glass, he went over to Claude and the others. They paid no attention to him; their heads moved only to follow the dancers, like the gallery at a tennis match.

"Did you see Homer?" Tod asked, touching Claude's arm.

Claude didn't turn, but the dwarf did. He spoke as though hypnotized.

"What a quiff! What a quiff!"⁴

Tod left them and went to look for Homer. He wasn't in the kitchen, so he tried the bedrooms. One of them was locked. He knocked lightly, waited, then repeated the knock. There was no answer, but he thought he heard someone move. He looked through the keyhole. The room was pitch dark.

"Homer," he called softly.

He heard the bed creak, then Homer replied.

"Who is it?"

"It's me—Toddie."

He used the diminutive with perfect seriousness.

"Go away, please," Homer said.

"Let me in for a minute. I want to explain something."

"No," Homer said, "go away, please."

Tod went back to the living room. The phonograph record had been changed to a fox-trot and Earle was now dancing with Faye. He had both his arms around her in a bear hug and they were stumbling all over the room, bumping into the walls and furniture. Faye, her head thrown back, was laughing wildly. Earle had both eyes shut tight.

Miguel and Claude were also laughing, but not the dwarf. He stood with his fists clenched and his chin stuck out. When he couldn't stand any more of it, he ran after the dancers to cut in. He caught Earle by the seat of his trousers.

"Le'me dance," he barked.

Earle turned his head, looking down at the dwarf from over his shoulder.

3. Cocaine (slang). "Conk": head.

4. Derogatory slang for female genitals.

“Git! G’wan, git!”

Faye and Earle had come to a halt with their arms around each other. When the dwarf lowered his head like a goat and tried to push between them, she reached down and tweaked his nose.

“Le’me dance,” he bellowed.

They tried to start again, but Abe wouldn’t let them. He had his hands between them and was trying frantically to pull them apart. When that wouldn’t work, he kicked Earle sharply in the shins. Earle kicked back and his boot landed in the little man’s stomach, knocking him flat on his back. Everyone laughed.

The dwarf struggled to his feet and stood with his head lowered like a tiny ram. Just as Faye and Earle started to dance again, he charged between Earle’s legs and dug upward with both hands. Earle screamed with pain, and tried to get at him. He screamed again, then groaned and started to sink to the floor, tearing Faye’s silk pajamas on his way down.

Miguel grabbed Abe by the throat. The dwarf let go his hold and Earle sank to the floor. Lifting the little man free, Miguel shifted his grip to his ankles and dashed him against the wall, like a man killing a rabbit against a tree. He swung the dwarf back to slam him again, but Tod caught his arm. Then Claude grabbed the dwarf and together they pulled him away from the Mexican.

He was unconscious. They carried him into the kitchen and held him under the cold water. He came to quickly, and began to curse. When they saw he was all right, they went back to the living room.

Miguel was helping Earle over to the couch. All the tan had drained from his face and it was covered with sweat. Miguel loosened his trousers while Claude took off his necktie and opened his collar.

Faye and Tod watched from the side.

“Look,” she said, “my new pajamas are ruined.”

One of the sleeves had been pulled almost off and her shoulder stuck through it. The trousers were also torn. While he stared at her, she undid the top of the trousers and stepped out of them. She was wearing tight black lace drawers. Tod took a step toward her and hesitated. She threw the pajama bottoms over her arm, turned slowly and walked toward the door.

“Faye,” Tod gasped.

She stopped and smiled at him.

“I’m going to bed,” she said. “Get that little guy out of here.”

Claude came over and took Tod by the arm.

“Let’s blow,” he said.

Tod nodded.

“We’d better take the homunculus with us or he’s liable to murder the whole household.”

Tod nodded again and followed him into the kitchen. They found the dwarf holding a big piece of ice to the side of his head.

“There’s some lump where that greaser⁵ slammed me.”

He made them finger and admire it.

“Let’s go home,” Claude said.

“No,” said the dwarf, “let’s go see some girls. I’m just getting started.”

5. Derogatory slang for a Mexican American.

"To hell with that," snapped Tod. "Come on."

He pushed the dwarf toward the door.

"Take your hands off, punk!" roared the little man.

Claude stepped between them.

"Easy there, citizen," he said.

"All right, but no shoving."

He strutted out and they followed.

Earle still lay stretched on the couch. He had his eyes closed and was holding himself below the stomach with both hands. Miguel wasn't there.

Abe chuckled, wagging his big head gleefully.

"I fixed that buckeroo."

Out on the sidewalk he tried again to get them to go with him.

"Come on, you guys—we'll have some fun."

"I'm going home," Claude said.

They went with the dwarf to his car and watched him climb in behind the wheel. He had special extensions on the clutch and brake so that he could reach them with his tiny feet.

"Come to town?"

"No, thanks," Claude said politely.

"Then to hell with you!"

That was his farewell. He let out the brake and the car rolled away.

24

Tod woke up the next morning with a splitting headache. He called the studio to say he wouldn't be in and remained in bed until noon, then went downtown for breakfast. After several cups of hot tea, he felt a little better and decided to visit Homer. He still wanted to apologize.

Climbing the hill to Pinyon Canyon made his head throb and he was relieved when no one answered his repeated knocks. As he started away, he saw one of the curtains move and went back to knock once more. There was still no answer.

He went around to the garage. Faye's car was gone and so were the game chickens. He went to the back of the house and knocked on the kitchen door. Somehow the silence seemed too complete. He tried the handle and found that the door wasn't locked. He shouted hello a few times, as a warning, then went through the kitchen into the living room.

The red velvet curtains were all drawn tight, but he could see Homer sitting on the couch and staring at the backs of his hands which were cupped over his knees. He wore an old-fashioned cotton nightgown and his feet were bare.

"Just get up?"

Homer neither moved nor replied.

Tod tried again.

"Some party!"

He knew it was stupid to be hearty, but he didn't know what else to be.

"Boy, have I got a hang-over," he went on, even going so far as to attempt a chuckle.

Homer paid absolutely no attention to him.

The room was just as they had left it the night before. Tables and chairs were overturned and the smashed picture lay where it had fallen. To give himself a reason for staying, he began to tidy up. He righted the chairs, straightened the carpet and picked up the cigarette butts that littered the floor. He also threw aside the curtains and opened a window.

"There, that's better, isn't it?" he asked cheerfully.

Homer looked up for a second, then down at his hands again. Tod saw that he was coming out of his stupor.

"Want some coffee?" he asked.

He lifted his hands from his knees and hid them in his armpits, clamping them tight, but didn't answer.

"Some hot coffee—what do you say?"

He took his hands from under his arms and sat on them. After waiting a little while he shook his head no, slowly, heavily, like a dog with a foxtail in its ear.

"I'll make some."

Tod went to the kitchen and put the pot on the stove. While it was boiling, he took a peek into Faye's room. It had been stripped. All the dresser drawers were pulled out and there were empty boxes all over the floor. A broken flask of perfume lay in the middle of the carpet and the place reeked of gardenia.

When the coffee was ready, he poured two cups and carried them into the living room on a tray. He found Homer just as he had left him, sitting on his hands. He moved a small table close to him and put the tray on it.

"I brought a cup for myself, too," he said. "Come on—drink it while it's hot."

Tod lifted a cup and held it out, but when he saw that he was going to speak, he put it down and waited.

"I'm going back to Wayneville," Homer said.

"A swell idea—great!"

He pushed the coffee at him again. Homer ignored it. He gulped several times, trying to swallow something that was stuck in his throat, then began to sob. He cried without covering his face or bending his head. The sound was like an ax chopping pine, a heavy, hollow, chunking noise. It was repeated rhythmically but without accent. There was no progress in it. Each chunk was exactly like the one that proceeded. It would never reach a climax.

Tod realized that there was no use trying to stop him. Only a very stupid man would have the courage to try to do it. He went to the farthest corner of the room and waited.

Just as he was about to light a second cigarette, Homer called him.

"Tod!"

"I'm here, Homer."

He hurried over to the couch again.

Homer was still crying, but he suddenly stopped even more abruptly than he had started.

"Yes, Homer?" Tod asked encouragingly.

"She's left."

"Yes, I know. Drink some coffee."

"She's left."

Tod knew that he put a great deal of faith in sayings, so he tried one.

"Good riddance to bad rubbish."

"She left before I got up," he said.

"What the hell do you care? You're going back to Wayneville."

“You shouldn’t curse,” Homer said with the same lunatic calm.

“I’m sorry,” Tod mumbled.

The word “sorry” was like dynamite set off under a dam. Language leaped out of Homer in a muddy, twisting torrent. At first, Tod thought it would do him a lot of good to pour out in this way. But he was wrong. The lake behind the dam replenished itself too fast. The more he talked the greater the pressure grew because the flood was circular and ran back behind the dam again.

After going on continuously for about twenty minutes, he stopped in the middle of a sentence. He leaned back, closed his eyes and seemed to fall asleep. Tod put a cushion under his head. After watching him for a while, he went back to the kitchen.

He sat down and tried to make sense out of what Homer had told him. A great deal of it was gibberish. Some of it, however, wasn’t. He hit on a key that helped when he realized that a lot of it wasn’t jumbled so much as timeless. The words went behind each other instead of after. What he had taken for long strings were really one thick word and not a sentence. In the same way several sentences were simultaneous and not a paragraph. Using this key, he was able to arrange a part of what he had heard so that it made the usual kind of sense.

After Tod had hurt him by saying that nasty thing about Faye, Homer ran around to the back of the house and let himself in through the kitchen, then went to peek into the parlor. He wasn’t angry with Tod, just surprised and upset because Tod was a nice boy. From the hall that led into the parlor he could see everybody having a good time and he was glad because it was kind of dull for Faye living with an old man like him. It made her restless. No one noticed him peeking there and he was glad because he didn’t feel much like joining the fun, although he liked to watch people enjoy themselves. Faye was dancing with Mr. Estee and they made a nice pair. She seemed happy. Her face shone like always when she was happy. Next she danced with Earle. He didn’t like that because of the way he held her. He couldn’t see what she saw in that fellow. He just wasn’t nice, that’s all. He had mean eyes. In the hotel business they used to watch out for fellows like that and never gave them credit because they would jump their bills.⁶ Maybe he couldn’t get a job because nobody would trust him, although it was true as Faye said that a lot of people were out of work nowadays. Standing there peeking at the party, enjoying the laughing and singing, he saw Earle catch Faye and bend her back and kiss her and everybody laughed although you could see Faye didn’t like it because she slapped his face. Earle didn’t care, he just kissed her again, a long nasty one. She got away from him and ran toward the door where he was standing. He tried to hide, but she caught him. Although he didn’t say anything, she said he was nasty spying on her and wouldn’t listen when he tried to explain. She went into her room and he followed to tell about the peeking, but she carried on awful and cursed him some more as she put red on her lips. Then she knocked over the perfume. That made her twice as mad. He tried to explain but she wouldn’t listen and just went on calling him all sorts of dirty things. So he went to his room and got undressed and tried to go to sleep. Then Tod woke him up and wanted to come in and talk. He wasn't angry, but didn't feel like talking just then, all he wanted to do was go to sleep. Tod went away and no sooner had he climbed back into bed when there was some awful screaming and banging. He was afraid to go out and see and he thought of calling the police, but he was scared to go in the hall where the phone was so he started to get dressed to climb out of the window and go for help because it sounded like murder but before he finished putting his shoes on, he heard Tod talking to Faye and he figured that it must be all right or she wouldn't be laughing so he got undressed and went back to bed again. He couldn't fall asleep wondering what had happened, so when the house was quiet, he took a chance and knocked on Faye's door to find out. Faye let him in. She was curled up in bed like a little girl. She called him daddy and kissed him and said that she wasn't angry at him at all. She said there had been a fight but nobody got hurt much and for him to go back to bed and that they would talk more in the morning. He went back like she said and fell asleep, but he woke up again as it was just breaking daylight. At first he wondered why he was up because when he once fell asleep, usually he didn't get up before the alarm clock rang. He knew that something had happened, but he didn't know what until he heard a noise in Faye's room. It was a moan and he thought he was dreaming, but he heard it again. Sure enough, Faye was moaning all right. He thought she must be sick. She moaned again like in pain. He got out of bed and went to her door and knocked and asked if she was sick. She didn't answer and the moaning stopped so he went back to bed. A little later, she moaned again so he got out of bed, thinking she might want the hot water bottle or some aspirin and a drink of water or something and knocked on her door again, only meaning to help her. She heard him and said something. He didn't understand what but he thought she meant for him to go in. Lots of times when she had a headache he brought her an aspirin and a glass of water in the middle of the night. The door wasn't locked. You'd have thought she would have locked the door because the Mexican was in bed with her, both of them naked and she had her arms around him. Faye saw him and pulled the sheets over her head without saying anything. He didn't know what to do, so he backed out of the room and closed the door. He was standing in the hall, trying to figure out what to do, feeling so ashamed, when Earle appeared with his boots in his hand. He must have been sleeping in the parlor. He wanted to know what the trouble was. "Faye's sick," he said, "and I'm getting her a glass of water." But then Faye moaned again and Earle heard it. He pushed open the door. Faye screamed. He could hear Earle and Miguel cursing each other and fighting. He was afraid to call the police on account of Faye and didn't know what to do. Faye kept on screaming. When he opened the door again, Miguel fell out with Earle on top of him and both of them tearing at each other. He ran inside the room and locked the door. She had the sheets over her head, screaming. He could hear Earle and Miguel fighting in the hall and then he couldn't hear them any more. She kept the sheets over her head. He tried to talk to her but she wouldn't answer. He sat down on a chair to guard her in case Earle and Miguel came back, but they didn't and after a while she pulled the sheets away from her face and told him to get out. She pulled the sheets over her face again when he answered, so then he waited a little longer and again she told him to get out without letting him see her face. He couldn't hear either Miguel or Earle. He opened the door and looked out. They were gone. He locked the doors and windows and went to his room and lay down on his bed. Before he knew it he fell asleep and when he woke up she was gone. All he could find was Earle's boots in the hall. He threw them out the back and this morning they were gone.

6. I.e., leave without paying.

25

Tod went into the living room to see how Homer was getting on. He was still on the couch, but had changed his position. He had curled his big body into a ball. His knees were drawn up almost to his chin, his elbows were tucked in close and his hands were against his chest. But he wasn't relaxed. Some inner force of nerve and muscle was straining to make the ball tighter and still tighter. He was like a steel spring which has been freed of its function in a machine and allowed to use all its strength centripetally. While part of a machine the pull of the spring had been used against other and stronger forces, but now, free at last, it was striving to attain the shape of its original coil.

Original coil . . . In a book of abnormal psychology borrowed from the college library, he had once seen a picture of a woman sleeping in a net hammock whose posture was much like Homer's. "Uterine Flight," or something like that, had been the caption under the photograph. The woman had been sleeping in the hammock without changing her position, that of the foetus in the womb, for a great many years. The doctors of the insane asylum had been able to awaken her for only short periods of time and those months apart.

He sat down to smoke a cigarette and wondered what he ought to do. Call a doctor? But after all Homer had been awake most of the night and was exhausted. The doctor would shake him a few times and he would yawn and ask what the matter was. He could try to wake him up himself. But hadn't he been enough of a pest already? He was so much better off asleep, even if it was a case of "Uterine Flight."

What a perfect escape the return to the womb was. Better by far than Religion or Art or the South Sea Islands. It was so snug and warm there, and the feeding was automatic. Everything perfect in that hotel. No wonder the memory of those accommodations lingered in the blood and nerves of everyone. It was dark, yes, but what a warm, rich darkness. The grave wasn't in it. No wonder one fought so desperately against being evicted when the nine months' lease was up.

Tod crushed his cigarette. He was hungry and wanted his dinner, also a double Scotch and soda. After he had eaten, he would come back and see how Homer was. If he was still asleep, he would try to wake him. If he couldn't, he might call a doctor.

He took another look at him, then tiptoed out of the cottage, shutting the door carefully.

26

Tod didn't go directly to dinner. He went first to Hodge's saddlery store thinking he might be able to find out something about Earle and through him about Faye. Calvin was standing there with a wrinkled Indian who had long hair held by a bead strap around his forehead. Hanging over the Indian's chest was a sandwich board that read—

TUTTLE'S TRADING POST
for
 GENUINE RELICS OF THE OLD WEST
Beads, Silver, Jewelry, Moccasins, Dolls, Toys, Rare Books, Postcards.
 TAKE BACK A SOUVENIR from
 TUTTLE'S TRADING POST

Calvin was always friendly.

"'Lo, thar," he called out, when Tod came up.

"Meet the chief," he added, grinning. "Chief Kiss-My-Towkus."

The Indian laughed heartily at the joke.

"You gotta live," he said.

"Earle been around today?" Tod asked.

"Yop. Went by an hour ago."

"We were at a party last night and I . . ."

Calvin broke in by hitting his thigh a wallop with the flat of his palm.

"That must've been some shindig to hear Earle tell it. Eh, Skookum?"

"Vas you dere, Sharley?" the Indian agreed, showing the black inside of his mouth, purple tongue and broken orange teeth.

"I heard there was a fight after I left."

Calvin smacked his thigh again.

"Sure musta been. Earle get himself two black eyes, lulus."

"That's what comes of palling up with a dirty greaser," said the Indian excitedly.

He and Calvin got into a long argument about Mexicans. The Indian said that they were all bad. Calvin claimed he had known quite a few good ones in his time. When the Indian cited the case of the Hermanos brothers who had killed a lonely prospector for half a dollar, Calvin countered with a long tale about a man called Tomas Lopez who shared his last pint of water with a stranger when they both were lost in the desert.

Tod tried to get the conversation back to what interested him.

"Mexicans are very good with women," he said.

"Better with horses," said the Indian. "I remember one time along the Brazos,⁷ I . . ."

Tod tried again.

"They fought over Earle's girl, didn't they?"

"Not to hear him tell it," Calvin said. "He claims it was dough—claims the Mex robbed him while he was sleeping."

"The dirty, thievin' rat," said the Indian, spitting.

"He claims he's all washed up with that bitch," Calvin went on. "Yes, siree, that's his story, to hear him tell it."

Tod had enough.

"So long," he said.

"Glad to meet you," said the Indian.

"Don't take any wooden nickels,"⁸ Calvin shouted after him.

7. River running through Texas.

8. I.e., look out for yourself. During the Great Depression, some banks issued wooden nickels as emergency currency, but most were produced as promotional tokens; many featured variations on the Indian image featured on the "buffalo nickel" issued by the U.S. Mint from 1913 to 1938.

Tod wondered if she had gone with Miguel. He thought it more likely that she would go back to work for Mrs. Jennings. But either way she would come out all right. Nothing could hurt her. She was like a cork. No matter how rough the sea got, she would go dancing over the same waves that sank iron ships and tore away piers of reinforced concrete. He pictured her riding a tremendous sea. Wave after wave reared its ton on ton of solid water and crashed down only to have her spin gaily away.

When he arrived at Musso Frank's restaurant, he ordered a steak and a double Scotch. The drink came first and he sipped it with his inner eye still on the spinning cork.

It was a very pretty cork, gilt with a glittering fragment of mirror set in its top. The sea in which it danced was beautiful, green in the trough of the waves and silver at their tips. But for all their moon-driven power, they could do no more than net the bright cork for a moment in a spume of intricate lace. Finally it was set down on a strange shore where a savage with pork-sausage fingers and a pimped butt picked it up and hugged it to his sagging belly. Tod recognized the fortunate man; he was one of Mrs. Jennings's customers.

The waiter brought his order and paused with bent back for him to comment. In vain. Tod was far too busy to inspect the steak.

"Satisfactory, sir?" asked the waiter.

Tod waved him away with a gesture more often used on flies. The waiter disappeared. Tod tried the same gesture on what he felt, but the driving itch refused to go. If only he had the courage to wait for her some night and hit her with a bottle and rape her.

He knew what it would be like, lurking in the dark in a vacant lot, waiting for her. Whatever that bird was that sang at night in California would be bursting its heart in theatrical runs and quavers and the chill night air would smell of spice pink. She would drive up, turn the motor off, look up at the stars, so that her breasts reared, then toss her head and sigh. She would throw the ignition keys into her purse and snap it shut, then get out of the car. The long step she took would make her tight dress pull up so that an inch of glowing flesh would show above her black stocking. As he approached carefully, she would be pulling her dress down, smoothing it nicely over her hips.

"Faye, Faye, just a minute," he would call.

"Why, Tod, hello."

She would hold her hand out to him at the end of her long arm that swooped so gracefully to join her curving shoulder.

"You scared me!"

She would look like a deer on the edge of the road when a truck comes unexpectedly around a bend.

He could feel the cold bottle he held behind his back and the forward step he would take to bring . . .

"Is there anything wrong with it, sir?"

The fly-like waiter had come back. Tod waved at him, but this time the man continued to hover.

"Perhaps you would like me to take it back, sir?"

"No, no."

"Thank you, sir."

But he didn't leave. He waited to make sure that the customer was really going to eat. Tod picked up his knife and cut a piece. Not until he had also put some boiled potato in his mouth did the man leave.

Tod tried to start the rape going again, but he couldn't feel the bottle as he raised it to strike. He had to give it up.

The waiter came back. Tod looked at the steak. It was a very good one, but he wasn't hungry any more.

"A check, please."

"No dessert, sir?"

"No, thank you, just a check."

"Check it is, sir," the man said brightly as he fumbled for his pad and pencil.

27

When Tod reached the street, he saw a dozen great violet shafts of light moving across the evening sky in wide crazy sweeps. Whenever one of the fiery columns reached the lowest point of its arc, it lit for a moment rose-colored domes and delicate minarets of Kahn's Persian Palace Theatre.⁹ The purpose of this display was to signal the world premiere of a new picture.

Turning his back on the searchlights, he started in the opposite direction, toward Homer's place. Before he had gone very far, he saw a clock that read a quarter past six and changed his mind about going back just yet. He might as well let the poor fellow sleep for another hour and kill some time by looking at the crowds.

When still a block from the theatre, he saw an enormous electric sign that hung over the middle of the street. In letters ten feet high he read that—

"MR. KAHN A PLEASURE DOME DECREED"

Although it was still several hours before the celebrities would arrive, thousands of people had already gathered. They stood facing the theatre with their backs toward the gutter in a thick line hundreds of feet long. A big squad of policemen was trying to keep a lane open between the front rank of the crowd and the façade of the theatre.

Tod entered the lane while the policeman guarding it was busy with a woman whose parcel had torn open, dropping oranges all over the place. Another policeman shouted for him to get the hell across the street, but he took a chance and kept going. They had enough to do without chasing him. He noticed how worried they looked and how careful they tried to be. If they had to arrest someone, they joked good-naturedly with the culprit, making light of it until they got him around the corner, then they whaled him with their clubs. Only so long as the man was actually part of the crowd did they have to be gentle.

Tod had walked only a short distance along the narrow lane when he began to get frightened. People shouted, commenting on his hat, his carriage, and his clothing. There was a continuous roar of catcalls, laughter and yells,

9. Modeled on Grauman's Chinese Theatre in Hollywood, site of many movie premieres, which opened in 1927. The theater's electric sign echoes the opening line of "Kubla Khan" pierced occasionally by a scream. The scream was usually followed by a sudden movement in the dense mass and part of it would surge forward wherever the police line was weakest. As soon as that part was rammed back, the bulge would pop out somewhere else.

(1816)—"In Xanadu did Kubla Khan a stately pleasure dome decree"—by the English poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834).

The police force would have to be doubled when the stars started to arrive. At the sight of their heroes and heroines, the crowd would turn demoniac. Some little gesture, either too pleasing or too offensive, would start it moving and then nothing but machine guns would stop it. Individually the purpose of its members might simply be to get a souvenir, but collectively it would grab and rend.

A young man with a portable microphone was describing the scene. His rapid, hysterical voice was like that of a revivalist preacher whipping his congregation toward the ecstasy of fits.

“What a crowd, folks! What a crowd! There must be ten thousand excited, screaming fans outside Kahn’s Persian tonight. The police can’t hold them. Here, listen to them roar.”

He held the microphone out and those near it obligingly roared for him.

“Did you hear it? It’s a bedlam, folks. A veritable bedlam! What excitement! Of all the premieres I’ve attended, this is the most . . . the most . . . stupendous, folks. Can the police hold them? Can they? It doesn’t look so, folks . . .”

Another squad of police came charging up. The sergeant pleaded with the announcer to stand further back so the people couldn’t hear him. His men threw themselves at the crowd. It allowed itself to be hustled and shoved out of habit and because it lacked an objective. It tolerated the police, just as a bull elephant does when he allows a small boy to drive him with a light stick.

Tod could see very few people who looked tough, nor could he see any working men. The crowd was made up of the lower middle classes, every other person one of his torch-bearers.

Just as he came near the end of the lane, it closed in front of him with a heave, and he had to fight his way through. Someone knocked his hat off and when he stooped to pick it up, someone kicked him. He whirled around angrily and found himself surrounded by people who were laughing at him. He knew enough to laugh with them. The crowd became sympathetic. A stout woman slapped him on the back, while a man handed him his hat, first brushing it carefully with his sleeve. Still another man shouted for a way to be cleared.

By a great deal of pushing and squirming, always trying to look as though he were enjoying himself, Tod finally managed to break into the open. After rearranging his clothes, he went over to a parking lot and sat down on the low retaining wall that ran along the front of it.

New groups, whole families, kept arriving. He could see a change come over them as soon as they had become part of the crowd. Until they reached the line, they looked diffident, almost furtive, but the moment they had become part of it, they turned arrogant and pugnacious. It was a mistake to think them harmless curiosity seekers. They were savage and bitter, especially the middle-aged and the old, and had been made so by boredom and disappointment.

All their lives they had slaved at some kind of dull, heavy labor, behind desks and counters, in the fields and at tedious machines of all sorts, saving their pennies and dreaming of the leisure that would be theirs when they had enough. Finally that day came. They could draw a weekly income of ten or fifteen dollars.¹ Where else should they go but California, the land of sunshine and oranges?

Once there, they discover that sunshine isn't enough. They get tired of oranges, even of avocado pears and passion fruit. Nothing happens. They don't know what to do with their time. They haven't the mental equipment for leisure, the money nor the physical equipment for pleasure. Did they slave so long just to go to an occasional Iowa picnic? What else is there? They watch the waves come in at Venice.² There wasn't any ocean where most of them came from, but after you've seen one wave, you've seen them all. The same is true of the airplanes at Glendale.³ If only a plane would crash once in a while so that they could watch the passengers being consumed in a "holocaust of flame," as the newspapers put it. But the planes never crash.

Their boredom becomes more and more terrible. They realize that they've been tricked and burn with resentment. Every day of their lives they read the newspapers and went to the movies. Both fed them on lynchings, murder, sex crimes, explosions, wrecks, love nests, fires, miracles, revolutions, wars. This daily diet made sophisticates of them. The sun is a joke. Oranges can't titillate their jaded palates. Nothing can ever be violent enough to make taut their slack minds and bodies. They have been cheated and betrayed. They have slaved and saved for nothing.

Tod stood up. During the ten minutes he had been sitting on the wall, the crowd had grown thirty feet and he was afraid that his escape might be cut off if he loitered much longer. He crossed to the other side of the street and started back.

He was trying to figure what to do if he were unable to wake Homer when, suddenly, he saw his head bobbing above the crowd. He hurried toward him. From his appearance, it was evident that there was something definitely wrong.

Homer walked more than ever like a badly made automaton and his features were set in a rigid, mechanical grin. He had his trousers on over his nightgown and part of it hung out of his open fly. In both of his hands were suitcases. With each step, he lurched to one side then the other, using the suitcases for balance weights.

Tod stopped directly in front of him, blocking his way.

"Where're you going?"

"Wayneville," he replied, using an extraordinary amount of jaw movement to get out this single word.

"That's fine. But you can't walk to the station from here. It's in Los Angeles."

Homer tried to get around him, but he caught his arm.

"We'll get a taxi. I'll go with you."

The cabs were all being routed around the block because of the preview. He explained this to Homer and tried to get him to walk to the corner.

"Come on, we're sure to get one on the next street."

1. Equivalent to an annual income of $15,000–25,000 in present-day U.S. dollars.

2. Beachfront neighborhood of Los Angeles, founded in 1905 as a resort town.

3. Opened in 1922, the Grand Central Airport at Glendale was the first commercial airport in Los Angeles.

Once Tod got him into a cab, he intended to tell the driver to go to the nearest hospital. But Homer wouldn't budge, no matter how hard he yanked and pleaded. People stopped to watch them, others turned their heads curiously. He decided to leave him and get a cab.

"I'll come right back," he said.

He couldn't tell from either Homer's eyes or expression whether he heard, for they both were empty of everything, even annoyance. At the corner he looked around and saw that Homer had started to cross the street, moving blindly. Brakes screeched and twice he was almost run over, but he didn't swerve or hurry. He moved in a straight diagonal. When he reached the other curb, he tried to get on the sidewalk at a point where the crowd was very thick and was shoved violently back. He made another attempt and this time a policeman grabbed him by the back of the neck and hustled him to the end of the line. When the policeman let go of him, he kept on walking as though nothing had happened.

Tod tried to get over to him, but was unable to cross until the traffic lights changed. When he reached the other side, he found Homer sitting on a bench, fifty or sixty feet from the outskirts of the crowd.

He put his arm around Homer's shoulder and suggested that they walk a few blocks further. When Homer didn't answer, he reached over to pick up one of the valises. Homer held on to it.

"I'll carry it for you," he said, tugging gently.

"Thief!"

Before Homer could repeat the shout, he jumped away. It would be extremely embarrassing if Homer shouted thief in front of a cop. He thought of phoning for an ambulance. But then, after all, how could he be sure that Homer was crazy? He was sitting quietly on the bench, minding his own business.

Tod decided to wait, then try again to get him into a cab. The crowd was growing in size all the time, but it would be at least half an hour before it over-ran the bench. Before that happened, he would think of some plan. He moved a short distance away and stood with his back to a store window so that he could watch Homer without attracting attention.

About ten feet from where Homer was sitting grew a large eucalyptus tree and behind the trunk of the tree was a little boy. Tod saw him peer around it with great caution, then suddenly jerk his head back. A minute later he repeated the maneuver. At first Tod thought he was playing hide and seek, then noticed that he had a string in his hand which was attached to an old purse that lay in front of Homer's bench. Every once in a while the child would jerk the string, making the purse hop like a sluggish toad. Its torn lining hung from its iron mouth like a furry tongue and a few uncertain flies hovered over it.

Tod knew the game the child was playing. He used to play it himself when he was small. If Homer reached to pick up the purse, thinking there was money in it, he would yank it away and scream with laughter.

When Tod went over to the tree, he was surprised to discover that it was Adore Loomis, the kid who lived across the street from Homer. Tod tried to chase him, but he dodged around the tree, thumbing his nose. He gave up and went back to his original position. The moment he left, Adore got busy with his purse again. Homer wasn't paying any attention to the child, so Tod decided to let him alone.

Mrs. Loomis must be somewhere in the crowd, he thought. Tonight when she found Adore, she would give him a hiding. He had torn the pocket of his jacket and his Buster Brown collar was smeared with grease.

Adore had a nasty temper. The completeness with which Homer ignored both him and his pocketbook made him frantic. He gave up dancing it at the end of the string and approached the bench on tiptoes, making ferocious faces, yet ready to run at Homer's first move. He stopped when about four feet away and stuck his tongue out. Homer ignored him. He took another step forward and ran through a series of insulting gestures.

If Tod had known that the boy held a stone in his hand, he would have interfered. But he felt sure that Homer wouldn't hurt the child and was waiting to see if he wouldn't move because of his pestering. When Adore raised his arm, it was too late. The stone hit Homer in the face. The boy turned to flee, but tripped and fell. Before he could scramble away, Homer landed on his back with both feet, then jumped again.

Tod yelled for him to stop and tried to yank him away. He shoved Tod and went on using his heels. Tod hit him as hard as he could, first in the belly, then in the face. He ignored the blows and continued to stamp on the boy. Tod hit him again and again, then threw both arms around him and tried to pull him off. He couldn't budge him. He was like a stone column.

The next thing Tod knew, he was torn loose from Homer and sent to his knees by a blow in the back of the head that spun him sideways. The crowd in front of the theatre had charged. He was surrounded by churning legs and feet. He pulled himself erect by grabbing a man's coat, then let himself be carried along backwards in a long, curving swoop. He saw Homer rise above the mass for a moment, shoved against the sky, his jaw hanging as though he wanted to scream but couldn't. A hand reached up and caught him by his open mouth and pulled him forward and down.

There was another dizzy rush. Tod closed his eyes and fought to keep upright. He was jostled about in a hacking cross surf of shoulders and backs, carried rapidly in one direction and then in the opposite. He kept pushing and hitting out at the people around him, trying to face in the direction he was going. Being carried backwards terrified him.

Using the eucalyptus tree as a landmark, he tried to work toward it by slipping sideways against the tide, pushing hard when carried away from it and riding the current when it moved toward his objective. He was within only a few feet of the tree when a sudden, driving rush carried him far past it. He struggled desperately for a moment, then gave up and let himself be swept along. He was the spearhead of a flying wedge when it collided with a mass going in the opposite direction. The impact turned him around. As the two forces ground against each other, he was turned again and again, like a grain between millstones. This didn't stop until he became part of the opposing force. The pressure continued to increase until he thought he must collapse. He was slowly being pushed into the air. Although relief for his cracking ribs could be gotten by continuing to rise, he fought to keep his feet on the ground. Not being able to touch was an even more dreadful sensation than being carried backwards.

There was another rush, shorter this time, and he found himself in a dead spot where the pressure was less and equal. He became conscious of a terrible pain in his left leg, just above the ankle, and tried to work it into a more comfortable position. He couldn't turn his body, but managed to get his head around. A very skinny boy, wearing a Western Union cap, had his back wedged against his shoulder. The pain continued to grow and his whole leg as high as the groin throbbed. He finally got his left arm free and took the back of the boy's neck in his fingers. He twisted as hard as he could. The boy began to jump up and down in his clothes. He managed to straighten his elbow, by pushing at the back of the boy's head, and so turn half way around and free his leg. The pain didn't grow less.

There was another wild surge forward that ended in another dead spot. He now faced a young girl who was sobbing steadily. Her silk print dress had been torn down the front and her tiny brassiere hung from one strap. He tried by pressing back to give her room, but she moved with him every time he moved. Now and then, she would jerk violently and he wondered if she was going to have a fit. One of her thighs was between his legs. He struggled to get free of her, but she clung to him, moving with him and pressing against him.

She turned her head and said, "Stop, stop," to someone behind her.

He saw what the trouble was. An old man, wearing a Panama hat and horn-rimmed glasses, was hugging her. He had one of his hands inside her dress and was biting her neck.

Tod freed his right arm with a heave, reached over the girl and brought his fist down on the man's head. He couldn't hit very hard but managed to knock the man's hat off, also his glasses. The man tried to bury his face in the girl's shoulder, but Tod grabbed one of his ears and yanked. They started to move again. Tod held on to the ear as long as he could, hoping that it would come away in his hand. The girl managed to twist under his arm. A piece of her dress tore, but she was free of her attacker.

Another spasm passed through the mob and he was carried toward the curb. He fought toward a lamp-post, but he was swept by before he could grasp it. He saw another man catch the girl with the torn dress. She screamed for help. He tried to get to her, but was carried in the opposite direction. This rush also ended in a dead spot. Here his neighbors were all shorter than he was. He turned his head upward toward the sky and tried to pull some fresh air into his aching lungs, but it was all heavily tainted with sweat.

In this part of the mob no one was hysterical. In fact, most of the people seemed to be enjoying themselves. Near him was a stout woman with a man pressing hard against her from in front. His chin was on her shoulder, and his arms were around her. She paid no attention to him and went on talking to the woman at her side.

"The first thing I knew," Tod heard her say, "there was a rush and I was in the middle."

"Yeah. Somebody hollered, 'Here comes Gary Cooper,'⁴ and then wham!"

"That ain't it," said a little man wearing a cloth cap and pullover sweater. "This is a riot you're in."

"Yeah," said a third woman, whose snaky gray hair was hanging over her face and shoulders. "A pervert attacked a child."

"He ought to be lynched."

4. Hollywood star (1901–1961), known for playing incorruptible American heroes; his movies of the 1930s included A Farewell to Arms (1932) and Mr. Deeds Goes to Town (1936).

Everybody agreed vehemently.

"I come from St. Louis," announced the stout woman, "and we had one of them pervert fellers in our neighborhood once. He ripped up a girl with a pair of scissors."

"He must have been crazy," said the man in the cap. "What kind of fun is that?"

Everybody laughed. The stout woman spoke to the man who was hugging her.

"Hey, you," she said. "I ain't no pillow."

The man smiled beatifically but didn't move. She laughed, making no effort to get out of his embrace.

"A fresh guy," she said.

The other woman laughed.

"Yeah," she said, "this is a regular free-for-all."

The man in the cap and sweater thought there was another laugh in his comment about the pervert.

"Ripping up a girl with scissors. That's the wrong tool."

He was right. They laughed even louder than the first time.

"You'd a done it different, eh, kid?" said a young man with a kidney-shaped head and waxed mustaches.

The two women laughed. This encouraged the man in the cap and he reached over and pinched the stout woman's friend. She squealed.

"Lay off that," she said good-naturedly.

"I was shoved," he said.

An ambulance siren screamed in the street. Its wailing moan started the crowd moving again and Tod was carried along in a slow, steady push. He closed his eyes and tried to protect his throbbing leg. This time, when the movement ended, he found himself with his back to the theatre wall. He kept his eyes closed and stood on his good leg. After what seemed like hours, the pack began to loosen and move again with a churning motion. It gathered momentum and rushed. He rode it until he was slammed against the base of an iron rail which fenced the driveway of the theatre from the street. He had the wind knocked out of him by the impact, but managed to cling to the rail. He held on desperately, fighting to keep from being sucked back. A woman caught him around the waist and tried to hang on. She was sobbing rhythmically. Tod felt his fingers slipping from the rail and kicked backwards as hard as he could. The woman let go.

Despite the agony in his leg, he was able to think clearly about his picture, "The Burning of Los Angeles." After his quarrel with Faye, he had worked on it continually to escape tormenting himself, and the way to it in his mind had become almost automatic.

As he stood on his good leg, clinging desperately to the iron rail, he could see all the rough charcoal strokes with which he had blocked it out on the big canvas. Across the top, parallel with the frame, he had drawn the burning city, a great bonfire of architectural styles, ranging from Egyptian to Cape Cod colonial.⁵ Through the center, winding from left to right, was a long hill street and down it, spilling into the middle foreground, came the mob carrying baseball bats and torches. For the faces of its members, he was using the innumerable sketches he had made of the people who come to California to die; the cultists of all sorts, economic as well as religious, the wave, airplane, funeral and preview watchers—all those poor devils who can only be stirred by the promise of miracles and then only to violence. A super “Dr. Know-All Pierce-All” had made the necessary promise and they were marching behind his banner in a great united front of screwballs and screwboxes to purify the land. No longer bored, they sang and danced joyously in the red light of the flames.

5. Simple, small, gable-roofed houses modeled after 17th-century New England homes and popular during the Depression.

In the lower foreground, men and women fled wildly before the vanguard of the crusading mob. Among them were Faye, Harry, Homer, Claude and himself. Faye ran proudly, throwing her knees high. Harry stumbled along behind her, holding on to his beloved derby hat with both hands. Homer seemed to be falling out of the canvas, his face half-asleep, his big hands clawing the air in anguished pantomime. Claude turned his head as he ran to thumb his nose at his pursuers. Tod himself picked up a small stone to throw before continuing his flight.

He had almost forgotten both his leg and his predicament, and to make his escape still more complete he stood on a chair and worked at the flames in an upper corner of the canvas, modeling the tongues of fire so that they licked even more avidly at a corinthian column that held up the palmleaf roof of a nutburger stand.

He had finished one flame and was starting on another when he was brought back by someone shouting in his ear. He opened his eyes and saw a policeman trying to reach him from behind the rail to which he was clinging. He let go with his left hand and raised his arm. The policeman caught him by the wrist, but couldn't lift him. Tod was afraid to let go until another man came to aid the policeman and caught him by the back of his jacket. He let go of the rail and they hauled him up and over it.

When they saw that he couldn't stand, they let him down easily to the ground. He was in the theatre driveway. On the curb next to him sat a woman crying into her skirt. Along the wall were groups of other disheveled people. At the end of the driveway was an ambulance. A policeman asked him if he wanted to go to the hospital. He shook his head no. He then offered him a lift home. Tod had the presence of mind to give Claude's address.

He was carried through the exit to the back street and lifted into a police car. The siren began to scream and at first he thought he was making the noise himself. He felt his lips with his hands. They were clamped tight. He knew then it was the siren. For some reason this made him laugh and he began to imitate the siren as loud as he could.

RICHARD WRIGHT

1908–1960

With the 1940 publication of Native Son by the Book-of-the-Month Club, Richard Wright became the most famous African American author of his time. Native Son is an uncompromising study of an African American underclass youth who is goaded to brutal violence by the oppression, hatred, and incomprehension of the white world. The sensational story disregarded conventional wisdom about how black authors should approach a white reading audience. Bigger Thomas, the main character, embodied everything that such an audience might fear and detest, but by situating the point of view within this character's consciousness Wright forced readers to see the world through Bigger's eyes and thus to understand him. The novel was structured like a hard-boiled detective story, contained layers of literary allusion and symbol, and combined Marxist social analysis with existential philosophy—in brief, it was at once a powerful social statement and a complex work of literary art.

Wright was born near Natchez, Mississippi. When he was five, his father abandoned the family—Wright, his younger brother, and his mother—and for the next ten years Wright was raised by a series of relatives in Mississippi. By 1925, when he went to Memphis on his own, he had moved twenty times. Extreme poverty, a constantly interrupted education that never went beyond junior high school, and the religious fundamentalism of his grandmother, along with the constant experiences of humiliation and hatred in a racially segregated South: all these contributed to Wright's growing sense that the hidden anger of black people was justified and that only by acknowledging and expressing it could they grapple with it. The title of Native Son made the point that the United States is as much the country of black as of white; the story showed that blacks had been deprived of their inheritance.

Two years after moving to Memphis, Wright went north to Chicago. There he took a series of odd jobs and then joined the WPA Writers' Project (a government project of the Depression years to help support authors) as a writer of guidebooks and as a director of the Federal Negro Theater. He began to study Marxist theory, contributing poetry to leftist literary magazines and joining the Communist Party in 1932. By 1935 he had become the center of a group of African American Chicago writers and had started to write fiction. He was influenced by the naturalistic fiction of James T. Farrell, whose study of sociology at the University of Chicago had helped give structure to his popular Studs Lonigan trilogy about working people of Irish descent.

Wright moved to New York in 1937 to write for the New York Writers' Project and as a reporter on the communist Daily Worker. In 1938 he published Uncle Tom's Children, a collection of four short stories. (An earlier novel, Lawd Today, was not published until after his death.) Set in the rural South, the stories center on racial conflict and physical violence. Wright's theme of the devastating effect of relentless, institutionalized hatred and humiliation on the black male's psyche was paramount in all of them.

After Native Son, Wright turned to autobiographical writings that eventuated in Black Boy, published in 1945. Many consider this to be his best book, and such writers as Ralph Ellison and James Baldwin took it as a model for their own work in the 1950s and 1960s. A communist activist in the early 1940s, Wright became increasingly disillusioned and broke completely with the party in 1944. Visiting France in 1946, he was warmly received by leading writers and philosophers. In 1947 he settled permanently in that country, where he was perceived from the first as one of the important experimental modernist prose writers and was ranked on a level with Hemingway, Fitzgerald, and Faulkner. An existential novel, The Outsider (1953), was followed by five more books: two novels and three collections of lectures, travel writings, and sociopolitical commentary. The collection Eight Men, from which the story printed here is taken, was the last literary project he worked on, and it appeared the year after his death.

Wright's immersion in Marxist doctrine gave him tools for representing society as divided into antagonistic classes and run for the benefit of the few. But in each of his works he portrays individuals who, no matter how they are deformed and brutalized by oppression and exploitation, retain a transcendent spark of selfhood. Ultimately, it is in this spark that Wright put his faith. His writing from first to last affirmed the dignity and humanity of society's outcasts without romanticizing them, and indicted those who had cast them out. As Ralph Ellison expressed it, Wright's example "converted the American Negro impulse toward self-annihilation and 'going underground' into a will to confront the world" and to "throw his findings unashamedly into the guilty conscience of America."

The text was first published in Harper's Bazaar (1939) under the title "Almos' a Man." Under its present title it appeared in Eight Men (1961), a posthumous collection of Wright's short fiction.

The Man Who Was Almost a Man

Dave struck out across the fields, looking homeward through paling light. What's the use talkin wid em niggers in the field? Anyhow, his mother was putting supper on the table. Them niggers can't understan nothing. One of these days he was going to get a gun and practice shooting, then they couldn't talk to him as though he were a little boy. He slowed, looking at the ground. Shucks, Ah ain scareda them even ef they are biggern me! Aw, Ah know whut Ahma do. Ahm going by ol Joe's sto n git that Sears Roebuck catlog n look at them guns. Mebbe Ma will lemme buy one when she gits mah pay from ol man Hawkins. Ahma beg her t gimme some money. Ahm ol enough to hava gun. Ahm seventeen. Almost a man. He strode, feeling his long loose-jointed limbs. Shucks, a man oughta hava little gun aftah he done worked hard all day.

He came in sight of Joe's store. A yellow lantern glowed on the front porch. He mounted steps and went through the screen door, hearing it bang behind him. There was a strong smell of coal oil and mackerel fish. He felt very confident until he saw fat Joe walk in through the rear door, then his courage began to ooze.

"Howdy, Dave! Whutcha want?"

"How yuh, Mistah Joe? Aw, Ah don wanna buy nothing. Ah jus wanted t see ef yuhd lemme look at tha catlog erwhile."

"Sure! You wanna see it here?"

"Nawsuh. Ah wans t take it home wid me. Ah'll bring it back termorrow when Ah come in from the fiels."

"You plannin on buying something?"

"Yessuh."

"Your ma lettin you have your own money now?"

"Shucks. Mistah Joe, Ahm gittin t be a man like anybody else!"

Joe laughed and wiped his greasy white face with a red bandanna.

"Whut you plannin on buyin?"

Dave looked at the floor, scratched his head, scratched his thigh, and smiled. Then he looked up shyly.

"Ah'll tell yuh, Mistah Joe, ef yuh promise yuh won't tell."

"I promise."

"Waal, Ahma buy a gun."

"A gun? What you want with a gun?"

"Ah wanna keep it."

"You ain't nothing but a boy. You don't need a gun."

"Aw, lemme have the catlog, Mistah Joe. Ah'll bring it back."

Joe walked through the rear door. Dave was elated. He looked around at barrels of sugar and flour. He heard Joe coming back. He craned his neck to see if he were bringing the book. Yeah, he's got it. Gawddog, he's got it!

"Here, but be sure you bring it back. It's the only one I got."

"Sho, Mistah Joe."

"Say, if you wanna buy a gun, why don't you buy one from me? I gotta gun to sell."

"Will it shoot?"

"Sure it'll shoot."

"Whut kind is it?"

"Oh, it's kinda old . . . a left-hand Wheeler. A pistol. A big one."

"Is it got bullets in it?"

"It's loaded."

"Kin Ah see it?"

"Where's your money?"

"What yuh wan fer it?"

"I'll let you have it for two dollars."

"Just two dollahs? Shucks, Ah could buy tha when Ah git mah pay."

"I'll have it here when you want it."

"Awright, suh. Ah be in fer it."

He went through the door, hearing it slam again behind him. Ahma git some money from Ma n buy me a gun! Only two dollahs! He tucked the thick catalogue under his arm and hurried.

"Where yuh been, boy?" His mother held a steaming dish of black-eyed peas.

"Aw, Ma, Ah just stopped down the road t talk wid the boys."

"Yuh know bettah t keep suppah waitin."

He sat down, resting the catalogue on the edge of the table.

"Yuh git up from there and git to the well n wash yosef! Ah ain feedin no hogs in mah house!"

She grabbed his shoulder and pushed him. He stumbled out of the room, then came back to get the catalogue.

"Whut this?"

"Aw, Ma, it's jusa catlog."

"Who yuh git it from?"

"From Joe, down at the sto."

“Waal, thas good. We kin use it in the outhouse.”

“Naw, Ma.” He grabbed for it. “Gimme ma catlog, Ma.”

She held onto it and glared at him.

“Quit hollerin at me! Whut’s wrong wid yuh? Yuh crazy?”

“But Ma, please. It ain mine! It’s Joe’s! He tol me t bring it back t im tomorrow.”

She gave up the book. He stumbled down the back steps, hugging the thick book under his arm. When he had splashed water on his face and hands, he groped back to the kitchen and fumbled in a corner for the towel. He bumped into a chair; it clattered to the floor. The catalogue sprawled at his feet. When he had dried his eyes he snatched up the book and held it again under his arm. His mother stood watching him.

“Now, ef yuh gonna act a fool over that ol book, Ah’ll take it n burn it up.”

“Naw, Ma, please.”

“Waal, set down n be still!”

He sat down and drew the oil lamp close. He thumbed page after page, unaware of the food his mother set on the table. His father came in. Then his small brother.

“Whutcha got there, Dave?” his father asked.

“Jusa catlog,” he answered, not looking up.

“Yeah, here they is!” His eyes glowed at blue-and-black revolvers. He glanced up, feeling sudden guilt. His father was watching him. He eased the book under the table and rested it on his knees. After the blessing was asked, he ate. He scooped up peas and swallowed fat meat without chewing. Buttermilk helped to wash it down. He did not want to mention money before his father. He would do much better by cornering his mother when she was alone. He looked at his father uneasily out of the edge of his eye.

“Boy, how come yuh don quit foolin wid tha book n eat yo suppah?”

“Yessuh.”

“How you n ol man Hawkins gitten erlong?”

“Suh?”

“Can’t yuh hear? Why don yuh lissen? Ah ast yu how wuz yuh n ol man Hawkins gittin erlong?”

“Oh, swell, Pa. Ah plows mo lan than anybody over there.”

“Waal, yuh oughta keep yo mind on whut yuh doin.”

“Yessuh.”

He poured his plate full of molasses and sopped it up slowly with a chunk of cornbread. When his father and brother had left the kitchen, he still sat and looked again at the guns in the catalogue, longing to muster courage enough to present his case to his mother. Lawd, ef Ah only had tha pretty one! He could almost feel the slickness of the weapon with his fingers. If he had a gun like that he would polish it and keep it shining so it would never rust. N Ah’d keep it loaded, by Gawd!

“Ma?” His voice was hesitant.

“Hunh?”

“Ol man Hawkins give yuh mah money yit?”

“Yeah, but ain no usa yuh thinking bout throwin nona it erway. Ahm keepin tha money sos yuh kin have cloes t go to school this winter.”

He rose and went to her side with the open catalogue in his palms. She was washing dishes, her head bent low over a pan. Shyly he raised the book. When he spoke, his voice was husky, faint.

"Ma, Gawd knows Ah wans one of these."

"One of whut?" she asked, not raising her eyes.

"One of these," he said again, not daring even to point. She glanced up at the page, then at him with wide eyes.

"Nigger, is yuh gone plumb crazy?"

"Aw, Ma."

"Git outta here! Don yuh talk t me bout no gun! Yuh a fool!"

"Ma, Ah kin buy one fer two dollahs."

"Not ef Ah knows it, yuh ain!"

"But yuh promised me one."

"Ah don care whut Ah promised! Yuh ain nothing but a boy yit!"

"Ma, ef yuh lemme buy one Ah'll never ast yuh fer nothing no mo."

"Ah tol yuh t git outta here! Yuh ain gonna toucha penny of tha money fer no gun! Thas how come Ah has Mistah Hawkins t pay yo wages t me, cause Ah knows yuh ain got no sense."

"But, Ma, we needa gun. Pa ain got no gun. We needa gun in the house. Yuh kin never tell whut might happen."

"Now don yuh try to maka fool outta me, boy! Ef we did hava gun, yuh wouldn't have it!"

He laid the catalogue down and slipped his arm around her waist.

"Aw, Ma, Ah done worked hard alla summer n ain ast yuh fer nothin, is Ah, now?"

"Thas whut yuh spouse t do!"

"But Ma, Ah wans a gun. Yuh kin lemme have two dollahs outta mah money. Please, Ma. I kin give it to Pa . . . Please, Ma! Ah loves yuh, Ma."

When she spoke her voice came soft and low.

"What yuh wan wida gun, Dave? Yuh don need no gun. Yuh'll git in trouble. N ef yo pa jus thought Ah let yuh have money t buy a gun he'd hava fit."

"Ah'll hide it, Ma. It ain but two dollahs."

"Lawd, chil, whut's wrong wid yuh?"

"Ain nothing wrong, Ma. Ahm almos a man now. Ah wans a gun."

"Who gonna sell yuh a gun?"

"Ol Joe at the sto."

"N it don cos but two dollahs?"

"Thas all, Ma. Just two dollahs. Please, Ma."

She was stacking the plates away; her hands moved slowly, reflectively. Dave kept an anxious silence. Finally, she turned to him.

"Ah'll let yuh git tha gun ef yuh promise me one thing."

"Whut's tha, Ma?"

"Yuh bring it straight back t me, yuh hear? It be fer Pa."

"Yessum! Lemme go now, Ma."

She stooped, turned slightly to one side, raised the hem of her dress, rolled down the top of her stocking, and came up with a slender wad of bills.

"Here," she said. "Lawd knows yuh don need no gun. But yer pa does. Yuh bring it right back t me, yuh hear? Ahma put it up. Now ef yuh don, Ahma have yuh pa pick yuh so hard yuh won fergit it."

“Yessum.”

He took the money, ran down the steps, and across the yard.

“Dave! Yuuuuuh Daaaaave!”

He heard, but he was not going to stop now. “Naw, Lawd!”

The first movement he made the following morning was to reach under his pillow for the gun. In the gray light of dawn he held it loosely, feeling a sense of power. Could kill a man with a gun like this. Kill anybody, black or white. And if he were holding his gun in his hand, nobody could run over him; they would have to respect him. It was a big gun, with a long barrel and a heavy handle. He raised and lowered it in his hand, marveling at its weight.

He had not come straight home with it as his mother had asked; instead he had stayed out in the fields, holding the weapon in his hand, aiming it now and then at some imaginary foe. But he had not fired it; he had been afraid that his father might hear. Also he was not sure he knew how to fire it.

To avoid surrendering the pistol he had not come into the house until he knew that they were all asleep. When his mother had tiptoed to his bedside late that night and demanded the gun, he had first played possum; then he had told her that the gun was hidden outdoors, that he would bring it to her in the morning. Now he lay turning it slowly in his hands. He broke it, took out the cartridges, felt them, and then put them back.

He slid out of bed, got a long strip of old flannel from a trunk, wrapped the gun in it, and tied it to his naked thigh while it was still loaded. He did not go in to breakfast. Even though it was not yet daylight, he started for Jim Hawkins’ plantation. Just as the sun was rising he reached the barns where the mules and plows were kept.

“Hey! That you, Dave?”

He turned. Jim Hawkins stood eying him suspiciously.

“What’re yuh doing here so early?”

“Ah didn’t know Ah wuz gittin up so early, Mistah Hawkins. Ah wuz fixin t hitch up ol Jenny n take her t the fiels.”

“Good. Since you’re so early, how about plowing that stretch down by the woods?”

“Suits me, Mistah Hawkins.”

“O.K. Go to it!”

He hitched Jenny to a plow and started across the fields. Hot dog! This was just what he wanted. If he could get down by the woods, he could shoot his gun and nobody would hear. He walked behind the plow, hearing the traces creaking, feeling the gun tied tight to his thigh.

When he reached the woods, he plowed two whole rows before he decided to take out the gun. Finally, he stopped, looked in all directions, then untied the gun and held it in his hand. He turned to the mule and smiled.

“Know whut this is, Jenny? Naw, yuh wouldn know! Yuhs jusa ol mule! Anyhow, this is a gun, n it kin shoot, by Gawd!”

He held the gun at arm’s length. Whut t hell, Ahma shoot this thing! He looked at Jenny again.

“Lissen here, Jenny! When Ah pull this ol trigger, Ah don wan yuh t run n acka fool now!”

Jenny stood with head down, her short ears pricked straight. Dave walked off about twenty feet, held the gun far out from him at arm’s length, and turned his head. Hell, he told himself, Ah ain afraid. The gun felt loose in his fingers; he waved it wildly for a moment. Then he shut his eyes and tightened his forefinger. Bloom! A report half deafened him and he thought his right hand was torn from his arm. He heard Jenny whinnying and galloping over the field, and he found himself on his knees, squeezing his fingers hard between his legs. His hand was numb; he jammed it into his mouth, trying to warm it, trying to stop the pain. The gun lay at his feet. He did not quite know what had happened. He stood up and stared at the gun as though it were a living thing. He gritted his teeth and kicked the gun. Yuh almos broke mah arm! He turned to look for Jenny; she was far over the fields, tossing her head and kicking wildly.

“Hol on there, ol mule!”

When he caught up with her she stood trembling, walling her big white eyes at him. The plow was far away; the traces had broken. Then Dave stopped short, looking, not believing. Jenny was bleeding. Her left side was red and wet with blood. He went closer. Lawd, have mercy! Wondah did Ah shoot this mule? He grabbed for Jenny’s mane. She flinched, snorted, whirled, tossing her head.

“Hol on now! Hol on.”

Then he saw the hole in Jenny’s side, right between the ribs. It was round, wet, red. A crimson stream streaked down the front leg, flowing fast. Good Gawd! Ah wuzn’t shootin at tha mule. He felt panic. He knew he had to stop that blood, or Jenny would bleed to death. He had never seen so much blood in all his life. He chased the mule for a half a mile, trying to catch her. Finally she stopped, breathing hard, stumpy tail half arched. He caught her mane and led her back to where the plow and gun lay. Then he stooped and grabbed handfuls of damp black earth and tried to plug the bullet hole. Jenny shuddered, whinnied, and broke from him.

“Hol on! Hol on now!”

He tried to plug it again, but blood came anyhow. His fingers were hot and sticky. He rubbed dirt into his palms, trying to dry them. Then again he attempted to plug the bullet hole, but Jenny shied away, kicking her heels high. He stood helpless. He had to do something. He ran at Jenny; she dodged him. He watched a red stream of blood flow down Jenny’s leg and form a bright pool at her feet.

“Jenny . . . Jenny,” he called weakly.

His lips trembled. She’s bleeding t death! He looked in the direction of home, wanting to go back, wanting to get help. But he saw the pistol lying in the damp black clay. He had a queer feeling that if he only did something, this would not be; Jenny would not be there bleeding to death.

When he went to her this time, she did not move. She stood with sleepy, dreamy eyes; and when he touched her she gave a low-pitched whinny and knelt to the ground, her front knees slopping in blood.

“Jenny . . . Jenny . . .” he whispered.

For a long time she held her neck erect; then her head sank, slowly. Her ribs swelled with a mighty heave and she went over.

Dave’s stomach felt empty, very empty. He picked up the gun and held it gingerly between his thumb and forefinger. He buried it at the foot of a tree. He took a stick and tried to cover the pool of blood with dirt—but what was the use? There was Jenny lying with her mouth open and her eyes walled and glassy. He could not tell Jim Hawkins he had shot his mule. But he had to tell something. Yeah, Ah'll tell em Jenny started gittin wil n fell on the joint of the plow. . . . But that would hardly happen to a mule. He walked across the field slowly, head down.

It was sunset. Two of Jim Hawkins' men were over near the edge of the woods digging a hole in which to bury Jenny. Dave was surrounded by a knot of people, all of whom were looking down at the dead mule.

"I don't see how in the world it happened," said Jim Hawkins for the tenth time.

The crowd parted and Dave's mother, father, and small brother pushed into the center.

"Where Dave?" his mother called.

"There he is," said Jim Hawkins.

His mother grabbed him.

"Whut happened, Dave? Whut yuh done?"

"Nothin."

"C mon, boy, talk," his father said.

Dave took a deep breath and told the story he knew nobody believed.

"Waal," he drawled. "Ah brung ol Jenny down here sos Ah could do mah plowin. Ah plowed bout two rows, just like yuh see." He stopped and pointed at the long rows of upturned earth. "Then somethin musta been wrong wid ol Jenny. She wouldn ack right a-tall. She started snortin n kickin her heels. Ah tried t hol her, but she pulled erway, rearin n goin in. Then when the point of the plow was stickin up in the air, she swung erroun n twisted herself back on it . . . She stuck herself n started t bleed. N fo Ah could do anything, she wuz dead."

"Did you ever hear of anything like that in all your life?" asked Jim Hawkins.

There were white and black standing in the crowd. They murmured. Dave's mother came close to him and looked hard into his face. "Tell the truth, Dave," she said.

"Looks like a bullet hole to me," said one man.

"Dave, whut yuh do wid the gun?" his mother asked.

The crowd surged in, looking at him. He jammed his hands into his pockets, shook his head slowly from left to right, and backed away. His eyes were wide and painful.

"Did he hava gun?" asked Jim Hawkins.

"By Gawd, Ah tol yuh tha wu a gun wound," said a man, slapping his thigh.

His father caught his shoulders and shook him till his teeth rattled.

"Tell whut happened, yuh rascal! Tell whut . . ."

Dave looked at Jenny's stiff legs and began to cry.

"Whut yuh do wid tha gun?" his mother asked.

"Whut wuz he doin wida gun?" his father asked.

"Come on and tell the truth," said Hawkins. "Ain't nobody going to hurt you . . ."

His mother crowded close to him.

"Did yuh shoot tha mule, Dave?"

Dave cried, seeing blurred white and black faces.

“Ahh ddinn gggo tt sshoooot hher . . . Ah ssswear ffo Gawd Ahh ddin. . . . Ah wuz a-tryin t ssee ef the old gggun would sshoot.”

“Where yuh git the gun from?” his father asked.

“Ah got it from Joe, at the sto.”

“Where yuh git the money?”

“Ma give it t me.”

“He kept worryin me, Bob. Ah had t. Ah tol im t bring the gun right back to me . . . It was fer yuh, the gun.”

“But how yuh happen to shoot that mule?” asked Jim Hawkins.

“Ah wuzn shootin at the mule, Mistah Hawkins. The gun jumped when Ah pulled the trigger . . . N fo Ah knowed anythin Jenny was there a-bleedin.”

Somebody in the crowd laughed. Jim Hawkins walked close to Dave and looked into his face.

“Well, looks like you have bought you a mule, Dave.”

“Ah swear fo Gawd, Ah didn go t kill the mule, Mistah Hawkins!”

“But you killed her!”

All the crowd was laughing now. They stood on tiptoe and poked heads over one another’s shoulders.

“Well, boy, looks like yuh done bought a dead mule! Hahaha!”

“Ain tha ershame.”

“Hohohohoho.”

Dave stood, head down, twisting his feet in the dirt.

“Well, you needn’t worry about it, Bob,” said Jim Hawkins to Dave’s father.

“Just let the boy keep on working and pay me two dollars a month.”

“Whut yuh wan fer yo mule, Mistah Hawkins?”

Jim Hawkins screwed up his eyes.

“Fifty dollars.”

“Whut yuh do wid tha gun?” Dave’s father demanded.

Dave said nothing.

“Yuh wan me t take a tree n beat yuh till yuh talk!”

“Nawsuh!”

“Whut yuh do wid it?”

“Ah throwed it erway.”

“Where?”

“Ah . . . Ah throwed it in the creek.”

“Waal, c mon home. N firs thing in the mawnin git to tha creek n fin tha gun.”

“Yessuh.”

“Whut yuh pay fer it?”

“Two dollahs.”

“Take tha gun n git yo money back n carry it t Mistah Hawkins, yuh hear? N don fergit Ahma lam you black bottom good fer this! Now march yosef on home, suh!”

Dave turned and walked slowly. He heard people laughing. Dave glared, his eyes welling with tears. Hot anger bubbled in him. Then he swallowed and stumbled on.

That night Dave did not sleep. He was glad that he had gotten out of killing the mule so easily, but he was hurt. Something hot seemed to turn over inside him each time he remembered how they had laughed. He tossed on his bed, feeling his hard pillow. N Pa says he's gonna beat me . . . He remembered other beatings, and his back quivered. Naw, naw, Ah sho don wan im t beat me tha way no mo. Dam em all! Nobody ever gave him anything. All he did was work. They treat me like a mule, n then they beat me. He gritted his teeth. N Ma had t tell on me.

Well, if he had to, he would take old man Hawkins that two dollars. But that meant selling the gun. And he wanted to keep that gun. Fifty dollars for a dead mule.

He turned over, thinking how he had fired the gun. He had an itch to fire it again. Ef other men kin shoota gun, by Gawd, Ah kin! He was still, listening. Mebbe they all sleepin now. The house was still. He heard the soft breathing of his brother. Yes, now! He would go down and get that gun and see if he could fire it! He eased out of bed and slipped into overalls.

The moon was bright. He ran almost all the way to the edge of the woods. He stumbled over the ground, looking for the spot where he had buried the gun. Yeah, here it is. Like a hungry dog scratching for a bone, he pawed it up. He puffed his black cheeks and blew dirt from the trigger and barrel. He broke it and found four cartridges unshot. He looked around; the fields were filled with silence and moonlight. He clutched the gun stiff and hard in his fingers. But, as soon as he wanted to pull the trigger, he shut his eyes and turned his head. Naw, An can't shoot wid mah eyes closed n mah head turned. With effort he held his eyes open; then he squeezed. Blooom! He was stiff, not breathing. The gun was still in his hands. Dammit, he'd done it! He fired again. Bloooooom! He smiled. Bloooooom! Bloooooom! Click, click. There! It was empty. If anybody could shoot a gun, he could. He put the gun into his hip pocket and started across the fields.

When he reached the top of a ridge he stood straight and proud in the moonlight, looking at Jim Hawkins' big white house, feeling the gun sagging in his pocket. Lawd, ef Ah had just one mo bullet Ah'd taka shot at the house. Ah'd like t scare ol man Hawkins jusa little . . . Jusa enough t let im know Dave Saunders is a man.

To his left the road curved, running to the tracks of the Illinois Central. He jerked his head, listening. From far off came a faint hoof-hoof; hoof-hoof; hoof-hoof. . . He stood rigid. Two dollahs a mont. Les see now . . . Tha means it'll take bout two years. Shucks! Ah'll be dam!

He started down the road, toward the tracks. Yeah, here she comes! He stood beside the track and held himself stiffly. Here she comes, erroun the ben . . . C mon, yuh slow poke! C mon! He had his hand on his gun; something quivered in his stomach. Then the train thundered past, the gray and brown box cars rumbling and clinking. He gripped the gun tightly; then he jerked his hand out of his pocket. Ah betcha Bill wouldn't do it! Ah betcha. . . The cars slid past, steel grinding upon steel. Ahm ridin yuh ternight, so hep me Gawd! He was hot all over. He hesitated just a moment; then he grabbed, pulled atop of a car, and lay flat. He felt his pocket; the gun was still there. Ahead the long rails were glinting in the moonlight, stretching away, away to somewhere, somewhere where he could be a man . . .

Selected Bibliographies

Reference Works and Histories

Chapters on the period may be consulted in the Columbia Literary History of the United States (1988), general editor Emory Elliott; the Columbia History of the American Novel (1991), general editor Emory Elliot; the Columbia History of American Poetry (1993), edited by Jay Parini; The History of Southern Literature (1985), edited by Louis D. Rubin et al.; A. LaVonne Brown Ruoff's American Indian Literature (1990); and The Cambridge History of American Poetry (2015), edited by Alfred Bendixen and Stephen Burt. Relevant volumes in the eight-volume Cambridge History of American Literature are volume 5, Poetry and Criticism, 1900–1950 (2003), edited by Sacvan Bercovitch, and volume 6, Prose Writing, 1910–1950 (2002), edited by Sacvan Bercovitch and Cyrus R. Patell. Reference works dedicated to the period and some of its important movements include A Companion to Modernist Literature and Culture, edited by David Bradshaw and Kevin J. H. Dettmar (2006); The Cambridge Companion to American Modernism (2005), edited by Walter Kalaidjian; The Cambridge Companion to the Harlem Renaissance, edited by George Hutchinson (2007); A Companion to Twentieth-Century Poetry, edited by Neil Roberts (2001); A Companion to Twentieth-Century American Fiction, edited by David Seed (2010); The Cambridge Companion to Modernist Poetry, edited by Alex Davis and Lee M. Jenkins (2007); A Companion to Twentieth-Century American Drama (2005), edited by David Krasner; A Companion to the Modern American Novel 1900–1950 (2009), edited by John T. Matthews; The Oxford Critical and Culture History of Modernist Magazines, Volume 2, North America, 1894–1960 (2012), edited by Peter Brooker and Andrew Thacker; The Cambridge Companion to the Literature of the American South (2013), edited by Sharon Monteith; A Companion to Modernist Poetry (2014), edited by David E. Chinitz and Gail McDonald; A Companion to the Harlem Renaissance (2015), edited by Cherene Sherrard-Johnson; and The Cambridge Companion to Modern American Poetry (2015), edited by Kalaidjian.

For early histories of the period authored by critics who were active in the rise of modernism, see Malcolm Cowley's Exile's Return (1951), After the Genteel Tradition: American Writers, 1910–1930 (1964), and A Second Flowering: Works and Days of the Lost Generation (1973); and Edmund Wilson's The Shores of Light: A Literary Chronicle of the Twenties and Thirties (1952). Other important early surveys include Alfred Kazin's On Native Grounds: An Interpretation of Modern American Prose Literature (1942);

Frederick J. Hoffman's The Twenties: American Writing in the Postwar Decade (1955); Harold Clurman's The Fervent Years: The Story of the Group Theatre and the Thirties (1957); Walter Rideout's The Radical Novel in the United States, 1900–1954 (1956); Joseph Wood Krutch's The American Drama Since 1918 (1957); Daniel Aaron's Writers on the Left (1961); Louis D. Rubin's Writers of the Modern South (1963); Howard Taubman's The Making of the American Theater (1965); Warren French's The Social Novel at the End of an Era (1966); Brooks Atkinson's Broadway: Nineteen Hundred to Nineteen Seventy (1970); Nathan I. Huggins's Harlem Renaissance (1971); Hugh Kenner's The Pound Era (1971); and Kenner's A Home-made World: The American Modernist Writers (1975).

General books on literary and cultural history appearing since 1980 include David Levering Lewis's When Harlem Was in Vogue (1981); Daniel J. Singal's The War Within: From Victorian to Modernist Thought in the South 1919–1945 (1982); Shari Benstock's Women of the Left Bank: Paris 1900–1940 (1986); Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance (1987), edited by Houston Baker Jr.; Cecilia Tichi's Shifting Gears: Technology, Literature, Culture in Modernist America (1987); Joan Shelley Rubin's The Making of Middlebrow Culture (1992); Michael North's The Dialect of Modernism: Race, Language and Twentieth-Century Literature (1994); George Chauncey's Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Making of the Gay Male World, 1980–1940 (1994); George Hutchinson's The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White (1995); Cheryl Wall's Women of the Harlem Renaissance (1995); Walter Benn Michaels's Our America (1995); Ann Douglas's Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s (1995); Ross Posnock's Color and Culture: Black Writers and the Making of the Modern Intellectual (1998); William J. Maxwell's New Negro, Old Left: African-American Writing and Communism between the Wars (1999); Christine Stansell's American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century (1999); David G. Nicholls's Conjuring the Folk: Forms of Modernity in African America (2000); Michael Szalay's New Deal Modernism: American Literature and the Invention of the Welfare State (2000); Edward Pavlic's Crossroads Modernism: Descent and Emergence in African-American Literary Culture (2002); Catherine Turner's Marketing Modernism between the Two World Wars (2003); Tim Armstrong's Modernism: A Cultural History (2005); Daphne Lamothe's Inventing the New Negro: Narrative, Culture, and Ethnography (2008); Sarah Wilson's Melting-Pot Modernism (2010); Erick King Watts's Hearing the Hurt: Rhetoric, Aesthetics, and Politics of the New Negro Movement (2012); Jeffrey Hart's The Living Moment: Modernism in a Broken World (2012); Pearl James's The New Death: American Modernism and World War I (2013); Hazel Hutchison's The War That Used Up Words: American Writers and the First World War (2015); and Ichiro Takayoshi's American Writers and the Approach of World War II, 1930–1941 (2015).

Literary Theory and Criticism

For an introduction to the ideas of literary criticism during the period, see Rene Wellek's A History of Modern Criticism: American Criticism, 1900–

1950, volume 7 (1987); and Vincent B. Leitch's American Literary Criticism from the 30s to the 80s (1988). Gordon Hutner's American Literature, American Culture (1998) reprints a number of critical statements from the period. Gerald's Graff's Professing Literature: An Institutional History (1987); Lawrence H. Schwartz's Creating Faulkner's Reputation: The Politics of Modern Literary Criticism (1988); and Mark Jancovich's The Cultural Politics of the New Criticism (1994) analyze aspects of American literary criticism in the period and its aftermath.

Theoretical treatments of modernism (often in international perspectives) include Andreas Huyssen's After the Great Divide: Modernism, Mass Culture, Postmodernism (1986); Ashadur Eyssteinnsson's The Concept of Modernism (1991); Joseph N. Riddel's The Turning Word: American Literary Modernism and Continental Theory (1996); Leonard Diepeveen's The Difficulties of Modernism (2003); Michael Trask's Cruising Modernism: Class and Sexuality in American Literature and Social Thought (2003); Susan McCabe's Cinematic Modernism: Modernist Poetry and Film (2005); Robert Scholes's Paradox of Modernism (2006); and John Carlos Rowe's Afterlives of Modernism: Liberalism, Transnationalism, and Political Critique (2011).

Criticism of poetry published since 1980 includes M. L. Rosenthal and Sally M. Gall's The Modern Poetic Sequence: The Genius of Modern Poetry (1984); William Drake's The First Wave: Women Poets in America, 1914–1945 (1987); Albert Gelpi's A Coherent Splendor: The American Poetic Renaissance, 1910–1950 (1987); Lisa M. Steinman's Made in America: Science, Technology, and American Modernist Poets (1987); Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance (1989), edited by Maureen Honey; Cary Nelson's Repression and Recovery: Modern American Poetry and the Politics of Cultural Memory, 1910–1945 (1989); Elisa New's Fictions of Form in American Poetry (1993); Frank Lentricchia's Modernist Quartet (1994); Elizabeth Gregory's Quotation and Modern America Poetry: Imaginary Gardens with Real Toads (1996); Rachel Blau DuPlessis's Genders, Races, and Religious Cultures in Modern American Poetries, 1908–1934 (2001); Merrill Cole's The Other Orpheus: A Poetics of Modern Homosexuality (2003); Jennifer Ashton's From Modernism to Postmodernism: American Poetry and Theory in the Twentieth Century (2005); Rachel Potter's Modernism and Democracy: Literary Culture, 1900–1930 (2006); Charles Altieri's The Art of Twentieth-Century American Poetry: Modernism and After (2006); and Joel Nickels's The Poetry of the Possible: Spontaneity, Modernism, and the Multitude (2012).

Critical studies of fiction published since 1980 include Hazel V. Carby's Reconstructing Womanhood: The Emergence of the Afro-American Woman Novelist (1987); Linda Wagner-Martin's The Modern American Novel, 1914–1945 (1990); J. Gerald Kennedy's Imagining Paris (1993); Barbara Foley's Radical Representations: Politics and Form in U.S. Proletarian Fiction, 1929–41 (1993); David Minter's A Cultural History of the American Novel (1994); Laura Hapke's Daughters of the Great Depression: Women, Work, and Fiction in the American 1930s (1995); Gordon Hutner's What America Read: Taste, Class, and the Novel, 1920–1960 (2009); Lawrence Buell's The Dream of the Great American Novel (2014); and David M. Ball's False Starts: The Rhetoric of Failure and the Making of American Modernism (2014).

Critical studies of drama published since 1980 include C. W. E. Bigsby's A Critical Introduction to Twentieth-Century American Drama, volume 1, 1900–1940 (1985); Ethan Mordden's The American Theatre (1981); Brenda Murphy's American Realism and American Drama, 1880–1940 (1987); David Krasner's A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927 (2002); Julia A. Walker's Expressionism and Modernism in the American Theatre: Bodies, Voices, Words (2005); Soyica Diggs Colbert's The African-American Theatrical Body: Reception, Performance, and the Stage (2011); and Andrea Most's Theatrical Liberalism: Jews and Popular Entertainment in America (2013).

AMERICAN LITERATURE 1914–1945

Sherwood Anderson

In addition to works mentioned in the author's headnote, Anderson published The Modern Writer (1925); Sherwood Anderson's Notebook (1925); Alice and the Lost Novel (1929); Nearer the Grass Roots (1929); The American Country Fair (1930); and Home Town (1940). The Library of America published his Collected Stories (2012), edited by Charles Baxter. The Norton Critical Edition of Winesburg, Ohio (1996), edited by Charles E. Modlin and Ray Lewis White, includes background materials and critical essays, as does the edition edited by John H. Ferres (1996). White edited a variorum edition of Winesburg, Ohio (1997) as well as Sherwood Anderson's Memoirs: A Critical Edition (1969). The Letters of Sherwood Anderson (1953) were edited by Howard Mumford Jones and Walter Rideout. See also Sherwood Anderson: Selected Letters (1984), edited by Charles E. Modlin, and Letters to Bab: Sherwood Anderson to Marietta D. Finley, 1916–1933 (1985), edited by William A. Sutton. A two-volume biography by Walter Rideout is Sherwood Anderson: A Writer in America (2006–7). For critical commentary see Sherwood Anderson: A Collection of Critical Essays (1974), edited by Walter Rideout; New Essays on Winesburg, Ohio (1990), edited by John W. Crowley; Allen Papinchak's Sherwood Anderson: A Study of the Short Fiction (1992); Judy Jo Small's A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Sherwood Anderson (1994); Ray Lewis White's Winesburg, Ohio: An Exploration (1990); and Clarence Lindsay's Such a Rare Thing: The Art of Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio (2009).

Sterling Brown

Brown's Collected Poems, selected by Michael S. Harper (1989, 1996), includes Southern Road, No Hiding Place as well as additional individual poems. A Son's Return: Selected Essays of Sterling A. Brown (1996) is edited by Mark A. Sanders, and Sanders with John Edgar Tidwell edited Sterling A. Brown's A Negro Looks at the South (2007). A special issue of the journal Callaloo, 5 (1982), contains a bibliography by Robert G. O'Meally along with reminiscences and critical assessments by several scholars. Full-length studies are Joanne V. Gabbin's Sterling A. Brown: Building the Black Aesthetic Tradition (1985), and Mark A. Sanders's Afro-Modernist Aesthetics and the Poetry of Sterling A. Brown (1999). There are discussions of Brown in Stephen Henderson's Understanding the New Black Poetry (1973); Jean Wagner's Black Poetry (1973); Henry Louis Gates, Jr.'s Figures in Black: Words, Signs, and the "Racial" Self (1987); Victor Kramer's The Harlem Renaissance Reconsidered (1987); and Cary Nelson's Repression and Recovery (1989). After Winter: The Art and Life of Sterling A. Brown (2009), edited by Tidwell and Steven C. Tracy, includes a wide selection of critical essays.

Willa Cather

Cather's volume of verse, April Twilights (1903; rev. 1923; reissued with an introduction by Bernice Slote, 1990), and her collection of essays, Not under Forty (1936), supplement the standard edition of her fiction, The Novels and Stories of Willa Cather (1937–41), and the scholarly editions (1992–2015) under the general editorship of Guy Reynolds. Her stories, novels, poems, and essays were published in three volumes by the Library of America with notes by Sharon O'Brien (1987, 1990, 1992). The Selected Letters of Willa Cather (2013) was edited by Andrew Jewell and Janis Stout. Other sources include Willa Cather on Writing (1949); Writings from Willa Cather's Campus Years (1950), edited by James Shively; and The Kingdom of Art: Willa Cather's First Principles and Critical Statements (1967), edited by Bernice Slote. William M. Curtin collected articles and reviews in the two-volume The World and the Parish (1970). Personal memoirs include Edith Lewis's Willa Cather Living (1953, 2000), and Elizabeth Sergeant's Willa Cather: A Memoir (1953, 1992). Janis P. Stout's A Calendar of the Let- ters of Willa Cather (2002), and the biography Willa Cather: The Writer and Her World (2000) are worthwhile. Phyllis C. Robinson's Willa: The Life of Willa Cather (1982) is a full-length biography, as is James Woodress's Willa Cather: A Literary Life (1987). Sharon O'Brien's Willa Cather: The Emerging Voice (1987) concentrates on Cather's early years.

Critical studies of Cather are David Stouck's Willa Cather's Imagination (1975); Marilyn Arnold's Willa Cather's Short Fiction (1984) and Willa Cather: A Reference Guide (1986); Susan J. Rosowski's The Voyage Perilous: Willa Cather's Romanticism (1986); Sally P. Harvey's Redefining the American Dream: The Novels of Willa Cather (1995); Joseph R. Urgo's Willa Cather and the Myth of American Migration (1995); Guy Reynolds's Willa Cather in Context (1996); O'Brien's New Essays on My Antonia (1999); Ann Romines's Willa Cather's Southern Connection (2000); Joan Acoella's Willa Cather and the Politics of Criticism (2000); and David Porter's On the Divide: The Many Lives of Willa Cather (2008) on her relationship to the literary marketplace. Janis P. Stout edited Willa Cather and Material Culture: Real-World Writing and Writing the Real World (2005). Also useful is Violence, the Arts, and Willa Cather (2007), edited by Joseph R. Urgo and Merrill Maguire Skaggs.

Hart Crane

Langdon Hammer edited Hart Crane: Complete Poems and Selected Letters (2006) for the Library of America. Crane's Collected Poems, edited by his friend Waldo Frank, appeared in 1933. Lawrence Kramer edited The Bridge: An Annotated Edition (2011). Correspondence between Hart Crane and Waldo Frank (1998) was edited by Steve H. Cook. Other sources of primary and bibliographical material are My Land, My Friends: The Selected Letters of Hart Crane (1997), edited by Langdon Hammer and Brom Weber; Hart Crane: An Annotated Critical Bibliography (1970), edited by Joseph Schwartz; and Hart Crane: A Descriptive Bibliography (1972), edited by Joseph Schwartz and Robert C. Schweik. Gary Lane compiled A Concordance to the Poems of Hart Crane (1972). Biographies of Crane are John Unter-ecker's Voyager: A Life of Hart Crane (1969); Paul Mariani's The Broken Tower: A Life of Hart Crane (2000); and Clive Fisher's Hart Crane: A Life (2002).

Useful earlier studies are R. W. B. Lewis's The Poetry of Hart Crane (1967); Monroe K. Spears's Hart Crane (1965); and Huncie Voelcker's The Hart Crane Voyages (1967). See also Richard P. Sugg's Hart Crane's "The Bridge" (1976); Helge Norman Nilsen's Hart Crane's Divided Vision: An Analysis of "The Bridge" (1980); Edward Brunner's Hart Crane and the Making of "The Bridge" (1984); Paul Giles's Hart Crane: The Contexts of The Bridge (1986); Thomas E. Yingling's Hart Crane and the Homosexual Text (1990); Brian M. Reed's Hart Crane: After His Lights (2006); Daniel Gabriel's Hart Crane and the Modernist Epic: Canon and Genre Formation in Crane, Pound, Eliot and Williams (2007); and John T. Irwin, Hart Crane's Poetry: "Appollinaire Lived in Paris, I Live in Cleveland, Ohio" (2011).

Countee Cullen

The Library of America issued Cullen's Collected Poems (2013), edited by Major Jackson. Cullen's groundbreaking anthology of 1927, Caroling Dusk, was reissued in 1993. His poetry volume, Color, originally published in 1925, was also reissued in 1993. My Soul's High Song, a collection of his writings edited by Gerald Early, appeared in 1991. And Bid Him Sing: A Biography of Countée Cullen, by Charles Molesworth, appeared in 2012. Earlier work of interest includes Helen J. Dinger's A Study of Countee Cullen (1953); Margaret Perry's A Bio-Bibliography of Countee P. Cullen (1969); Blanche E. Ferguson's Countee Cullen and the Negro Renaissance (1966); and Alan R. Shucard's Countee Cullen (1984).

E. E. Cummings

Complete Poems 1904–62, edited by George J. Firmage, was published in 1991. Firmage also edited Three Plays and a Ballet (1967). Cummings's prose fiction includes The Enormous Room (1922) and EIMI (1933). E. E. Cummings: A Miscellany Revised (1965), edited by Firmage, contains previously uncollected short prose pieces. Six Nonlectures (1953) consists of the talks that Cummings delivered at Harvard in the same year. A gathering of works is Another E. E. Cummings (1999), edited by Richard Kostreanetz. Selected Letters of E. E. Cummings (1969) was edited by F. W. Dupee and George Stade. Firmage edited E. E. Cummings: A Bibliography (1960). Barry Ahearn edited The Correspondence of Ezra Pound and E. E. Cummings (1996).

Several of Cummings's earlier works have been reedited by Firmage in the Cummings Typescript Editions. These include Tulips & Chimneys (1976); No Thanks (1978); The Enormous Room, with illustrations by Cummings (1978); ViVa (1979); XAIPE (1979); and Etcetera, the unpublished poems (1983).

Biographies are Richard S. Kennedy's Dreams in the Mirror (1979, 1994) and Susan Cheever's E. E. Cummings: A Life (2014). Early studies include Norman Friedman's E. E. Cummings: The Growth of a Writer (1964); Robert E. Wegner's The Poetry and Prose of E. E. Cummings (1965); and Rushworth Kidder's E. E. Cummings, An Introduction to the Poetry (1979). See also Cary Lane's I Am: A Study of E. E. Cummings' Poems (1976), and Richard S. Kennedy's E. E. Cummings Revisited (1994). Norman Friedman edited E. E. Cummings: A Collection of Critical Essays (1972) and authored (Re)Valuing Cummings: Further Essays on the Poet (1996). David G. Farley's Modernist Travel Writing: Intellectuals Abroad (2010) compares Cummings and Ezra Pound.

Hilda Doolittle (H.D.)

H.D.'s poetry through 1944 has been collected and edited by Louis L. Martz in Collected Poems 1912–1944 (1983). Collected Poems of H.D. was published in 1925. Subsequent volumes of poetry include Red Rose for Bronze (1931); the trilogy of war poems The Walls Do Not Fall (1944), Tribute to the Angels (1945), and The Flowering of the Rod (1946); the dramatic monologue Helen in Egypt (1961); the major collection of her late poems, Hermetic Definition (1972); and the long poem Vale Ave (1992). H.D.'s other book-length verse dramas are Hippolytus Temporalizes (1927) and the translation of Euripides' Ion (1937). Palimpsest (1926), Hadylus (1928), Bid Me to Live (1961), HERmione (1981), and Asphodel (1992), edited by Robert Spoo, compose her major prose fiction. By Avon River (1949) celebrates Shakespeare in prose and verse. Tribute to Freud (1956) is her account of her psychoanalysis by Freud. Also important are two autobiographical works: End to Torment (1979) and The Gift (1982, complete edition 1998). Michael Boughn compiled H.D.: A Bibliography, 1905–1990 (1993). Richard Aldington and H.D.: The Early Years in Letters (1992), edited by Caroline Zilboorg, collects correspondence. Zilboorg also edited a scholarly edition of Bid Me to Live (2012).

Barbara Guest's Herself Defined: The Poet H.D. and Her World (1984) is a biography; Rachel Blau DuPlessis's H.D.: The Career of That Struggle (1986); Susan S. Friedman's Psyche Reborn: The Emergence of H.D. (1981); and Janice S. Robinson's H.D.: The Life and Work of an American Poet (1982) combine biography and literary analysis. Among critical books are Gary Burnett's H. D.: Between Image and Epic, The Mysteries of Her Poetics (1990); Friedman's Penelope's Web: Gender, Modernity, and H.D.'s Fiction (1990); Eileen Gregory's H.D. and Hellenism (1997); Diana Collocott's H.D. and Sapphic Modernism (1999); Georgia Taylor's H.D. and the Public Sphere of Modernist Women Writers 1913–1946 (2001); Adalaide Morris's How to Live/What to Do: H.D.'s Cultural Poetics (2003); and Annette Debo's The American H.D. (2012). Nephie J. Christodoulides and Polina Mackay edited The Cambridge Companion to H. D. (2011).

John Dos Passos

The Library of America reissued U.S.A. in a single volume (1997), followed by Travel Books and Other Writings, 1916–1941 (2003) and Novels, 1920–1925 (2003). John Rohrkemper's John Dos Passos, A Reference Guide appeared in 1980. Two biographies are Virginia Spencer Carr's Dos Passos: A Life (1984) and Townsend Ludington's John Dos Passos: A Twentieth Century Odyssey (1980). Dos Passos: A Collection of Critical Essays was edited by Andrew Hook in 1974 and Dos Passos: The Critical Heritage, edited by Barry Maine, appeared in 1988 and was reissued in 1997. Useful books include Linda W. Wagner's Dos Passos: The Artist as American (1979); Robert C. Rosen's John Dos Passos: Politics and the Writer (1981); Donald Pizer's Dos Passos' U.S.A.: A Critical Study (1990); Janet Casey's Dos Passos and the Ideology of the Feminine (1998); and Seth Moglen's Mourning Modernity: Literary Modernism and the Injuries of American Capitalism (2007).

T. S. Eliot

Eliot's poetic works have been collected in Collected Poems, 1909–1962 (1963) and The Complete Poems and Plays of T. S. Eliot (1969). Inventions of the March Hare: Poems 1909–1917 (1997), edited by Christopher Ricks, contains early, previously unpublished poetry. The indispensable manuscript to The Waste Land is in The Waste Land: A Facsimile and Transcript of the Original Drafts Including the Annotations of Ezra Pound (1971), edited by Valerie Eliot. Michael North edited a Norton Critical Edition of The Waste Land (2001), and Lawrence Rainey edited The Annotated Waste Land with Eliot's Contemporary Prose (2005). Important critical writings include The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933), Poetry and Drama (1951), The Three Voices of Poetry (1953), On Poetry and Poets (1957), and To Criticize the Critic and Other Writings (1965). Three volumes of social commentary are After Strange Gods (1934), The Idea of a Christian Society (1939), and Notes toward the Definition of Culture (1948). Valerie Eliot's edition of The Letters of T. S. Eliot (1988–2015) has reached five volumes, up to 1933. J. L. Dawson edited Concordance to the Complete Poems and Plays of T. S. Eliot (1995). Good biographies are Peter Ackroyd's T. S. Eliot: A Life (1984); Lyndall Gordon's T. S. Eliot: An Imperfect Life (1998, 2000), an updating of her earlier biographies; James E. Miller Jr.'s T. S. Eliot: The Making of an American Poet, 1888–1922 (2005); and Robert Crawford's Young Eliot: A Biography (2015).

Influential earlier studies of Eliot include F. O. Matthiessen's The Achievement of T. S. Eliot (rev. 1947); Helen Gardner's The Art of T. S. Eliot (1950); Hugh Kenner's The Invisible Poet (1959), Northrop Frye's T. S. Eliot (1963); and Stephen Spender's T. S. Eliot (1976).

Among numerous critical studies are Helen Gardner's The Composition of Four Quartets (1978); Derek Traversi's T. S. Eliot: The Longer Poems (1976); Louis Menand's Discovering Modernism: T. S. Eliot and His Context (1987); Jewel Spears Brooker and Joseph Bentley's Reading "The Waste Land": Modernism and the Limits of Interpretation (1990); Brooker's Mastery and Escape: T. S. Eliot and the Dialectic of Modernism (1994); A. David Moody's Thomas Stearns Eliot, Poet (1994); Anthony Julius's T. S. Eliot, Anti-Semitism, and Literary Form (1996); Ronald Schuchard's Eliot's Dark Angel: Intersections of Life and Art (2001); David Chintz's T. S. Eliot and the Cultural Divide (2003); and Craig Raine's T. S. Eliot (2006). Moody also edited the useful Cambridge Companion to T. S. Eliot (1994). For collections of critical essays about Eliot, see T. S. Eliot: A Collection of Criticism (1974), edited by Linda W. Wagner (1974); T. S. Eliot: The Modernist in History (1991), edited by Ronald Bush; and Gender, Desire, and Sexuality in T. S. Eliot (2004), edited by Cassandra Laity and Nancy K. Gish. Gareth Reeves's T. S. Eliot's "The Waste Land" (1994) is a comprehensive introduction to the poem.

Donald C. Gallup compiled the standard bibliography, T. S. Eliot: A Bibliography (rev. 1969).

William Faulkner

The Library of America issued Faulkner's novels in four volumes: 1930–1935 (1985), 1936–1940 (1990), 1942–1954 (1994), and 1957–1962 (1999). In addition to the volumes mentioned in the author's headnote are Early Prose and Poetry (1962), edited by Carvel Collins; Dr. Martino and Other Stories (1934); Pylon (1935); The Unvanquished (1938); Intruder in the Dust (1948); Knight's Gambit (1949); Collected Stories of William Faulkner (1950); Requiem for a Nun (1951); Notes on a Hornet (1951); Big Woods (1955); and Essays, Speeches, and Public Letters (rev. 2004), edited by James B. Meriwether. Transcripts of discussions and interviews with Faulkner include Faulkner at Nagano (1956), edited by Robert A. Jelliffe; Faulkner in the University (1959), edited by Frederick L. Gwynn and Joseph L. Blotner; Faulkner at West Point (1964), edited by Joseph L. Fant and Robert Ashley (1964); and The Lion in the Garden (1968), edited by Meriwether and Michael Millgate. Letters are collected in The Faulkner-Cowley File (1961), edited by Malcolm Cowley (1961), and Selected Letters of William Faulkner (1977), edited by Joseph L. Blotner. Noel Polk has produced editions of several Faulkner novels based on a study of the manuscripts. Michael Gorra and Polk have published a Norton Critical Edition of The Sound and the Fury (2014), and Gorra has also published one of As I Lay Dying (2010).

Blotner's Faulkner: A Biography, 2 volumes (1974) is condensed and updated in Faulkner (1984). Two shorter biographies based on Blotner's work are David Minter's William Faulkner: His Life and Work (1980) and Judith Wittenberg's Faulkner: The Transfiguration of Biography (1979).

Comprehensive guides are Thomas E. Connolly's Faulkner's World: A Directory of His People and Synopsis of Actions in His Published Works (1988); and A William Faulkner Encyclopedia (1999), edited by Robert W. Hamblin and Charles E. Peek. Teresa Towner's Cambridge Introduction to William Faulkner (2008) and John T. Matthews's edited New Cambridge Companion to William Faulkner (2015) are useful. Influential early studies include Cleanth Brooks's William Faulkner: The Yoknapatawpha Country (1963) and Hyatt H. Waggoner's William Faulkner: From Jefferson to the World (1959). Later studies include John T. Irwin's Doubling and Incest, Repetition and Revenge: A Speculative Reading of Faulkner (1975); Thadious M. Davis's Faulkner's "Negro": Art and the Southern Context (1983); Eric J. Sundquist's Faulkner: The House Divided (1983); Robert Dale Parker's Faulkner and the Novelistic Imagination (1985); Warwick Wadlington's Reading Faulknerian Tragedy (1987) and As I Lay Dying: Stories out of Stories (1992); Minrose C. Gwin's The Feminine and Faulkner: Reading (beyond) Sexual Difference (1990); André Bleikasten's The Ink of Melancholy: Faulkner's Novels from "The Sound and the Fury" to "Light in August" (1990); Richard Moreland's Faulkner and Modernism: Rereading and Rewriting (1990); Joel Williamson's William Faulkner and Southern History (1993); Diane Roberts's Faulkner and Southern Womanhood (1994); David Minter's Faulkner's Questioning Narratives: Fiction of His Major Phase, 1929–42 (2001); Philip Weinstein's Becoming Faulkner: The Art and Life of William Faulkner (2010); and Candace Waid's The Signifying Eye: Seeing Faulkner's Art (2013).

Edited collections of critical essays include Louis J. Budd and Edwin Cady's On Faulkner (1989); Linda Wagner-Martin's Faulkner: Six Decades of Criticism (2002); Annette Trefzer's Global Faulkner: Faulkner and Yoknapatawpha, 2006 (2009); and Peter Lurie and Ann J. Abadie's Faulkner and Film (2014).

F. Scott Fitzgerald

Fitzgerald's novels are This Side of Paradise (1920), The Beautiful and Damned (1922), The Great Gatsby (1925), Tender Is the Night (1934; rev. 1939; rpt. 1953), and the unfinished The Last Tycoon (1941). His collections of stories are Flappers and Philosophers (1921), Tales of the Jazz Age (1922), All the Sad Young Men (1926), and Taps at Reveille (1935). Two recent editions of his fiction are the Library of America's Novels and Stories 1920–1922 (2000) and Matthew J. Bruccoli and Judith Baughman's Before Gatsby: The First Twenty-Six Stories (2001). The Cambridge Edition of Fitzgerald's works (1991–2014) includes his novels, story collections, and My Lost City: Personal Essays, 1920–1940 (2005). A satirical play, The Vegetable, or From Presidents to Postman, was published in 1923. Among collections of Fitzgerald's writings are F. Scott Fitzgerald in His Own Time: A Miscellany (1971), edited by Jackson R. Bryer and Bruccoli, and Afternoon of an Author (1957), edited by Arthur Mizener. The Crack-Up (1945), edited by Edmund Wilson, collects essays, notebook entries, and letters from the 1930s; youthful work is collected in F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Princeton Years; Selected Writings, 1914–1920 (1966), edited by Chip Defaa.

The fullest collection of letters is Correspondence of F. Scott Fitzgerald (1980), edited by Bruccoli and Margaret M. Duggan. Other volumes of letters are Dear Scott/Dear Max: The Fitzgerald-Perkins Correspondence (1971), edited by John Kuehl and Jackson R. Bryer; As Ever, Scott Fitz (1972), edited by Bruccoli and Jennifer McCabe Atkinson (letters between Fitzgerald and his literary agent, Harold Ober); and Dear Scott, Dearest Zelda: The Love Letters of F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald (2002), edited by Jackson R. Bryer and Cathy W. Barks. Biographies include Bruccoli's Some Sort of Epic Grandeur: The Life of F. Scott Fitzgerald (1981), Scott Donaldson's Fool for Love: F. Scott Fitzgerald, A Biographical Portrait (1983), James Mellow's Invented Lives (1984), Jeffrey Myers's Scott Fitzgerald (2000), and Andrew Turnbull's Scott Fitzgerald (2001).

Among guides are Robert Gale's An F. Scott Fitzgerald Encyclopedia (1998); Linda Pelzer's Student Companion to F. Scott Fitzgerald (2001); and Kirk Curnutt's Cambridge Introduction to F. Scott Fitzgerald (2007). Critical studies include Milton R. Stern's The Golden Moment: The Novels of F. Scott Fitzgerald (1970); Brian Way's F. Scott Fitzgerald and the Art of Social Fiction (1980); John Kuehl's F. Scott Fitzgerald, a Study of the Short Fiction (1991); and Scott Donaldson's Fitzgerald and Hemingway: Works and Days (2009). Among collections of critical essays are The Short Stories of F. Scott Fitzgerald: New Approaches in Criticism (1983), edited by Jackson R. Bryer; New Essays on "The Great Gatsby" (1985), edited by Bruccoli; The Cambridge Companion to F. Scott Fitzgerald (2001), edited by Ruth Prigozy; F. Scott Fitzgerald in the Twenty-First Century (2003), edited by Jackson R. Bryer, Prigozy, and Milton B. Stern; and F. Scott

Fitzgerald in Context (2013), edited by Bryant Mangum.

Robert Frost

The Poetry of Robert Frost (1969) incorporated Complete Poems (1949) and Frost's last volume, In the Clearing (1962). The Library of America issued Frost's Collected Poems, Prose, and Plays (1995). Mark Richardson edited The Collected Prose of Robert Frost (2007), and Robert Faggen edited The Notebooks of Robert Frost (2007). Richardson and Donald Sheehy edited The Letters of Robert Frost, volume 1 (2014). Important collections of letters appear in Selected Letters of Robert Frost (1964), edited by Lawrence Thompson; The Letters of Robert Frost to Louis Untermeyer (1963); and Margaret Anderson's, Robert Frost and John Bartlett: The Record of a Friendship (1963). Conversations and interviews with Frost include Edward C. Lathem's Interviews with Robert Frost (1966); Reginald L. Cook's The Dimensions of Robert Frost (1964); Daniel Smythe's Robert Frost Speaks (1954); and Louis Mertin's Robert Frost: Life and Talks—Walking (1965).

Lawrance Thompson completed two volumes of the authorized biography: Robert Frost: The Early Years, 1874–1915 (1966) and Robert Frost: The Years of Triumph, 1915–1938 (1970). The third volume, Robert Frost, the Later Years (1976), was completed by Richard Winnick, and Lathem produced a shorter version of the biography in Robert Frost: A Biography (1981). Other biographies are Jeffrey Meyers's Robert Frost (1996) and Jay Parini's Robert Frost: A Life (1999). William H. Pritchard in Frost: A Literary Life Reconsidered (1984) is interested in the poet's art, not his personal life. James L. Potter's Robert Frost Handbook (1980) is a useful guide; Lathem produced a concordance to Frost's poetry (1994).

A brief critical introduction is Mordecai Marcus's The Poems of Robert Frost (1991). Other critical studies are Richard Poirier's Robert Frost, The Work of Knowing (1977, reissued with new material in 1990); John C. Kemp's Robert Frost and New England: The Poet as Regionalist (1979); George Monteiro's Robert Frost and the New England Renaissance (1988); Mario D'Avanzo's A Cloud of Other Poets: Robert Frost and the Romantics (1990); Judith Oster's Toward Robert Frost (1991); George Bagby's Frost and the Book of Nature (1993); Mark Richardson's Robert Frost: The Poet and His Poetics (1997); and Tim Kendall's The Art of Robert Frost (2012). Collections of critical essays include On Frost (1991), edited by Edwin H. Cady and Louis J. Budd, and Robert Faggen's Cambridge Companion to Robert Frost (2001).

Susan Glaspell

Susan Glaspell: The Complete Plays, edited by Linda Ben-Zvi and J. Ellen Gainor, appeared in 2010. Major Novels of Susan Glaspell, edited by Martha C. Carpenter, was published in 1995. Patricia I. Bryan and Martha C. Carnpenter edited Her America: "A Jury of Her Peers" and Other Stories (2010). Two biographies are Arthur E. Waterman's Susan Glaspell (1966) and Barbara O. Rajkowska's Susan Glaspell: A Critical Biography (2000). Critical studies include Marcia Noe's Susan Glaspell: Voice from the Heartland (1983); Veronica A. Makowsky's Susan Glaspell's Century of American Women: A Critical Interpretation of Her Work (1993); Gainor's Susan Glaspell in Context: American Theater, Culture, and Politics, 1915–48 (2001); and Brenda Murphy's The Provincetown Players and the Culture of Modernity (2005). A collection of critical essays is Susan Glaspell: Essays on Her Theater and Fiction (1995), edited by Ben-Zvi.

Ernest Hemingway

There is no collected edition of Hemingway's writings. In addition to works mentioned in the author's headnote, his fiction includes Today Is Friday (1926) and God Rest You Merry Gentlemen (1933). His tribute to Spain, The Spanish Earth, and his play The Fifth Column appeared in 1938, the latter in a collection The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories. His journalism has been collected in The Wild Years (1962), edited by Gene Z. Hanrahan, and By-Line: Ernest Hemingway, Selected Articles and Dispatches of Four Decades (1967), edited by William White. His Complete Poems (1992) has been edited by Nicholas Gerogiannis. The Letters of Ernest Hemingway, vols. 1 and 2 (2011, 2013), have appeared under the general editorship of Sandra Spanier. Audre Hanneman's Ernest Hemingway: A Comprehensive Bibliography (1967) is thorough. Scribners published The Complete Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway (1987).

The authorized biography is Carlos Baker's Ernest Hemingway: A Life Story (1969). Jeffrey Meyers's Hemingway: A Biography (1985) and Kenneth S. Lynn's Hemingway (1987) are important. Michael Reynolds's detailed volumes include The Young Hemingway (1986), Hemingway: The Paris Years (1989), Hemingway: The 1930s (1997), and Hemingway: The Final Years (1999). Bernice Kert's The Hemingway Women (1983) tells about Hemingway's mother, wives, and lovers; John Raeburn's Fame Became of Him: Hemingway as Public Writer (1984) compares the life with the public image.

Paul Smith's A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway (1989) is useful; Peter B. Messent's Ernest Hemingway (1992) is a good overview. For collections of critical essays on Hemingway, see Ernest Hemingway: Eight Decades of Criticism (2009), edited by Linda Wagner-Martin; The Cambridge Companion to Hemingway (1996), edited by Scott Donaldson; and A Historical Guide to Ernest Hemingway (2001), edited by Wagner-Martin. Specialized studies include Wirt Williams's The Tragic Art of Ernest Hemingway (1982); Mark Spilka's Hemingway's Quarrel with Androgyny (1990); Robert W. Trogdon's The Lousy Racket: Hemingway, Scribners, and the Business of Literature (2007); Amy L. Strong's Race and Identity in Hemingway's Fiction (2008); Robert Paul Lamb's Art Matters: Hemingway, Craft, and the Creation of the Modern Short Story (2010); and Mark Cirino's Ernest Hemingway: Thought in Action (2012).

Langston Hughes

A sixteen-volume standard edition of Hughes's complete works appeared in 2001–3. Arnold Rampersad and David Roessel edited The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes (1994), including The Weary Blues (1926), Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), The Dream Keeper and Other Poems (1932), Scottsboro Limited: Four Poems and a Play in Verse (1932), Montage of a Dream Deferred (1951), and The Panther and the Lash: Poems of our Times (1967). His short stories were edited by Akiba Sullivan Harper (1996). Faith Berry edited Good Morning Revolution: Uncollected Social Protest Writings by Langston Hughes (1973). Mule Bone (1991), which he coauthored with Zora Neale Hurston, has been edited with contextual materials by George Houston Pope and Henry Louis Gates, Jr. Hughes's autobiographical volumes include The Big Sea (1940) and I Wonder as I Wander (1956); both were reissued in 1993. Charles H. Nichols edited Arna Bontemps–Langston Hughes: Letters 1925–1967 (1980), and Rampersad edited his Selected Letters (2015).

Early biographies of Hughes include Charlemae Rollins's Black Troubador: Langston Hughes (1970), and James S. Haskins's Always Movin' On: The Life of Langston Hughes (1976). Faith Berry's Langston Hughes: Before and Beyond Harlem (1983, 1995) contains much about Hughes's life to 1940. Arnold Rampersad's two-volume Life of Langston Hughes—volume 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America (1986), and volume 2, 1941–1967: I Dream a World (1988)—is definitive.

Thomas A. Mikolyzk compiled Langston Hughes: A Bio-Bibliography (1990). Contemporary reviews were collected by Letitia Dace (1997). Full-length critical studies are Onwuchekwa Jemie's Langston Hughes: An Introduction to the Poetry (1976); Richard K. Barksdale's Langston Hughes: The Poet and His Critics (1977); Steven C. Tracy's Langston Hughes and the Blues (1988); R. Baxter Miller's The Art and Imagination of Langston Hughes (1989); W. Jason Miller's Langston Hughes and American Lynching Culture (2011); Vera M. Kutzinski's The Worlds of Langston Hughes: Modernism and Translation in the Americas (2012); and David E. Chinitz's Which Sin to Bear? Authenticity and Compromise in Langston Hughes (2013). Essay collections include Langston Hughes: Critical Perspectives Past and Present (1993), edited by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and K. A. Appiah; Langston Hughes: The Man, His Art, and His Continuing Influence (1995), edited by C. James Trotman; and A Historical Guide to Langston Hughes (2003), edited by Steven C. Tracy. Peter Mandelik and Stanley Schatt's A Concordance to the Poetry of Langston Hughes (1975) is useful.

Zora Neale Hurston

Robert Hemenway's Zora Neale Hurston, A Literary Biography (1977) initiated the Hurston revival; her work is mostly available in paperback editions. The Library of America published Hurston's writing in two volumes: Novels and Stories (1995) and Folklore, Memoirs, and Other Writings (1995); Jean Lee Cole and Charles Mitchell edited Collected Plays (2008). Her letters were edited by Carla Kaplan (2002). Biographies include Valerie Boyd's Wrapped in Rainbows: The Life of Zora Neale Hurston (2003) and Virginia Lynn Moylan's Zora Neale Hurston's Final Decade (2011). Book-length studies include Karla C. F. Holloway's The Character of the Word: The Texts of Zora Neale Hurston (1987); John Lowe's Jump at the Sun: Zora Neale Hurston's Cosmic Comedy (1994); Deborah G. Plant's Every Tub Must Sit on Its Own Bottom: The Philosophy and Politics of Zora Neale Hurston (1995); Margaret Genevieve West's Zora Neale Hurston and American Literary Culture (2005); and Loyalie King's Cambridge Introduction to Zora Neale Hurston (2008). Hurston is linked to other writers in Cheryl A. Wall's Women of the Harlem Renaissance (1995); Carla Kaplan's The Erotics of Talk: Women's Writing and Feminist Paradigms (1996); and Trudier Harris's The Power of the Porch: The Storyteller's Craft in Zora Neale Hurston, Gloria Naylor, and Randall Kenan (1996). Collections of essays are New Essays on "Their Eyes Were Watching God" (1990), edited by Michael Awkward; Zora Neale Hurston: Critical Perspectives Past and Present (1993), edited by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and K. A. Appiah; and Critical Essays on Zora Neale Hurston (1998), edited by Gloria L. Cronin.

Nella Larsen

Larsen's complete fiction, including Quick- sand, Passing, and three stories, appeared in 1992, edited by Charles R. Larson; this volume was reissued in 2001. The two novels were also made available in 1986, in an edition introduced by Deborah E. McDowell. The Norton Critical Edition of Passing (2007), edited by Carla Kaplan, includes critical and historical backgrounds. Biographies are Thadious M. Davis's Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance: A Woman's Life Unveiled (1994), and George Hutchinson's In Search of Nella Larsen: A Biography of the Color Line (2006). Larsen is also considered in Cheryl A. Wall's Women of the Harlem Renaissance (1995). Three critical studies, each connecting Larsen with other African American writers, are Charles R. Larson's Invisible Darkness: Jean Toomer and Nella Larsen (1993); Jacquelyn Y. McLendon's The Politics of Color in the Fiction of Jessie Fauset and Nella Larsen (1995); and Erika M. Miller's The Other Reconstruction: Where Violence and Womanhood Meet in the Writings of Wells-Barnett, Grimké, and Larsen (2000). Pamela L. Caughie discusses Passing in "'The Best People': The Making of the Black Bourgeoisie in Writings of the Negro Renaissance," Modernism/Modernity 20.3 (2013), 519–537.

Amy Lowell

Lowell's complete poems were published in 1955. Honor Moore edited her Selected Poems (2004) for the Library of America. Ferris Greenslet, who was her editor at Houghton Mifflin, has written an excellent family chronicle from the first settler to Amy Lowell, The Lowells and Their Seven Worlds (1945). Additional biographical material may be found in S. Foster Damon's Amy Lowell: A Chronicle, with Extracts from Her Correspondence (1935), and Florence Ayscough and Amy Lowell: Correspondence of a Friendship (1945), edited by Harley Farnsworth MacNair. Critical estimates of Lowell include Jean Gould's Amy: The World of Amy Lowell and the Imagist Movement (1975); Glenn Richard Ruihley's The Thorn of a Rose: Amy Lowell Reconsidered (1975); Richard Benvenuto's Amy Lowell (1985); and Melissa Bradshaw's Amy Lowell, Diva Poet (2011). Adrienne Munich and Bradshaw edited Amy Lowell, American Modern (2004).

Edgar Lee Masters

An edition of Spoon River Anthology annotated by John E. Hall was appeared in 1992, uncollected Spoon River poems were edited by Herbert K. Russell in 1991, and Masters's autobiography, Across Spoon River, was published with an introduction by Ronald Primeau in 1991. His son, Hardin Wallace Masters, published Edgar Lee Masters: A Biographical Sketchbook about a Famous American Author (1978); the definitive biography is by Russell (2001). A brief general estimate and survey is John T. Flanagan's Edgar Lee Masters: The Spoon River Poet and His Critics (1974). Ronald Primeau's Beyond Spoon River: The Legacy of Edgar Lee Masters (1981) considers Masters's lesser-known work.

Claude McKay

Volumes of McKay's poetry include Songs of Jamaica (1912), Constab Ballads (1912), Spring in New Hampshire and Other Poems (1920)—published in England—and Harlem Shadows (1922). William J. Maxwell edited the Complete Poems (2004), including many poems previously uncollected. Books of prose published in his lifetime include the novels Home to Harlem (1928), Banjo (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933); a short story collection, Gingertown (1932, 1991); an autobiography, A Long Way from Home (1937), and an essay collection, Harlem: Negro Metropolis (1940). Collections brought out after McKay's death include Selected Poems (1953), The Dialect Poetry of Claude McKay (1972), The Passion of Claude McKay: Selected Poetry and Prose (1973); two books of short stories, Trial by Lynching (1977) and My Green Hills of Jamaica (1979); and an essay collection, The Negro in America (1979).

Three good biographies are James R. Giles's Claude McKay (1976); Wayne F. Cooper's Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance (1987, 1996); and Tyrone Tillery's Claude McKay: A Black Poet's Struggle for Identity (1992). A collection of interpretive essays is Claude McKay: Centennial Studies (1992), edited by A. L. McLeod. General works with material on McKay include Harold Cruse's still valuable The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual (1967); Kenneth Ramchand's The West Indian Novel and Its Background (1970; rev. ed. 2004); Nathan I. Huggins's Harlem Renaissance (1971); Addison Gayle's The Way of the New World: The Black Novel in America (1975); David Levering Lewis's When Harlem Was in Vogue (1981); Bernard W. Bell's The Afro-American Novel and Its Tradition (1987); and George Hutchinson's The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White (1995). Contrasting treatments of McKay's poetry are in Winston James's A Fierce Hatred of Injustice: Claude McKay's Jamaican Poetry of Rebellion (2001) and Josh Gosciak's The Shadowed Country: Claude McKay and the Romance of the Victorians (2006).

Edna St. Vincent Millay

Millay's Collected Sonnets (1941) and Collected Lyrics (1943) were followed by Collected Poems: Edna St. Vincent Millay (1956), edited by Norma Millay (1956). The Library of America issued Selected Poems (2003). Her prose sketches, Distressing Dialogue, published under the pseudonym Nancy Boyd, appeared in 1924. Her three verse plays (Aria da Capa, 1920; The Lamp and the Bell, 1921; and Two Slatterns and a King, 1921) were collected in Three Plays (1926). Allan Ross Macdougall edited Letters of Edna St. Vincent Millay in 1952. The biographies are Daniel Epstein's What Lips My Lips Have Kissed (2001) and Nancy Milford's Savage Beauty: The Life of Edna St. Vincent Millay (2001). A chapter on Millay appears in Brett C. Millier's Flawed Light: American Women Poets and Alcohol (2009). Essay collections are Critical Essays on Edna St. Vincent Millay (1993), edited by William B. Thesing, and Millay at One Hundred (1995), edited by Diane P. Freedman. Elissa Zellinger's "Edna St. Vincent Millay and the Poetess Tradition," Legacy 29.2 (2012), 240–62, looks at Millay's formal choices in the context of earlier women's poetry.

Marianne Moore

Each collection of Moore's verse excluded some earlier poems while subjecting others to extensive revisions and changes in format. Her separate volumes include Poems (1921), Observations (1924), The Pangolin and Other Verse (1936), What Are Years? (1941), Nevertheless (1944), Like a Bulwark (1956), O to Be a Dragon (1959), and Tell Me, Tell Me (1966). Collections include Selected Poems (1935), Collected Poems (1951), and The Complete Poems of Marianne Moore (1967, repr. 1981, 1987), which included selections from her translation of The Fables of La Fontaine (1954). Grace Shulman's The Poems of Marianne Moore (2003) is now the fullest edition. Patricia C. Willis has brought together Moore's published prose in The Complete Prose of Marianne Moore (1986). Moore's correspondence with Robert Lowell is published in David Kalstone's Becoming a Poet (1991); her relation to Wallace Stevens is considered by Robin G. Schulze in The Web of Friendship (1995). Biographies are Charles Molesworth's Marianne Moore: A Literary Life (1990) and Linda Leavell's Holding On Upside Down: The Life and Work of Marianne Moore (2013). Bonnie Costello edited The Selected Letters of Marianne Moore (1997). Book-length studies include Bernard F. Engel's Marianne Moore (1963, rev. 1989); Costello's Marianne Moore: Imaginary Possessions (1982); John M. Slatin's The Savage's Romance: The Poetry of Marianne Moore (1986); Grace Schulman's Marianne Moore: The Poetry of Engagement (1987); Margaret Holley's The Poetry of Marianne Moore: A Study in Voice and Value (1987); Cristanne Miller's Questions of Authority (1995); Leavell's Marianne Moore and the Visual Arts (1995); Elisabeth W. Joyce's Cultural Critique and Abstraction: Marianne Moore and the Avant-Garde (1998); and Victoria Bazin's Marianne Moore and the Cultures of Modernity (2010). Bethany Hickock's Degrees of Freedom: American Women Poets and the Women's College, 1905–1955 (2008) connects Moore with Elizabeth Bishop and Sylvia Plath. Essay collections include Marianne Moore, Woman and Poet (1990), edited by Patricia Willis, and Critics and Poets on Marianne Moore: "A Right Good Salvo of Barks" (2005), edited by Leavell, Miller, and Schulze. Craig S. Abbott compiled Marianne Moore: A Descriptive Bibliography in 1977. Gary Lane's A Concordance to the Poems of Marianne Moore appeared in 1972.

Eugene O'Neill

The Library of America collected O'Neill's plays in three volumes, Complete Plays, 1913–1920; Complete Plays, 1920–1931; and Complete Plays, 1932–1943 (1988). The standard biography of O'Neill is still that of Arthur and Barbara Gelb, O'Neill (1962, rev. 2000). Other biographical treatments are L. Schaeffer's O'Neill, Son and Artist (1973, 1990); Stephen A. Bloch's Eugene O'Neill: Beyond Mourning and Tragedy (1999); and Robert M. Dowling's Eugene O'Neill: A Life in Four Acts (2014). The Theatre We Worked For: The Letters of Eugene O'Neill to Kenneth Macgowan (1982), edited by Jackson R. Bryer, documents O'Neill's attitudes to the theater of his day. Brenda Murphy's O'Neill: Long Day's Journey into Night (2001) provides a production history. Bryer and Travis Bogard edited Selected Letters of Eugene O'Neill (1994). Conversations with Eugene O'Neill (1990) is edited by Mark W. Estrin. Literary analysis of O'Neill's plays can be found in Bogard's Contour in Time: The Plays of Eugene O'Neill (1972, rev. 1987); Michael Manheim's Eugene O'Neill's New Language of Kinship (1982); Judith E. Barlow's Final Acts: The Creation of Three Late O'Neill Plays (1985); Kurt Eisen's The Inner Strength of Opposites (1994); on O'Neill's techniques; Joel Pfister's Staging Depth: Eugene O'Neill and the Politics of Psychological Discourse (1995); Donald Gallup's Eugene O'Neill and His Eleven-Play Cycle (1998); Doris Alexander's Eugene O'Neill's Last Plays: Separating Art from Autobiography (2005); and John Patrick Diggins's Eugene O'Neill's America: Desire Under Democracy (2007).

Essay collections include Eugene O'Neill's Century (1991), edited by Richard F. Moorton Jr.; The Critical Response to Eugene O'Neill (1993), edited by John H. Houchin; and The Cambridge Companion to Eugene O'Neill (1998), edited by Michael Manheim.

Katherine Anne Porter

Primary sources include Ship of Fools (1962); The Collected Stories of Katherine Anne Porter (1965); The Collected Essays and Occasional Writings of Katherine Anne Porter (1970); The Never-Ending Wrong (1977), about the Sacco and Vanzetti case; Letters (1990), edited by Isabel Bayley; "This Strange, Old World" and Other Book Reviews by Katherine Anne Porter (1991), edited by Darlene Harbour Unrue; Uncollected Early Prose of Katherine Anne Porter (1993), edited by Ruth M. Alvarez and Thomas F. Walsh; and Katherine Anne Porter's Poetry (1996), edited by Unrue. The Library of America's Collected Stories and Other Writings (2008), edited by Unrue, includes Porter's literary reviews and her journalism from Mexico. Unrue edited Selected Letters of Katherine Anne Porter: Chronicles of a Modern Woman (2012).

Biographies are Joan Givner's Katherine Anne Porter, A Life (1982, rev. 1991), and Unrue's Katherine Anne Porter: The Life of an Artist (2005). Givner also edited Katherine Anne Porter: Conversations (1987). A Bibliography of the Works of Katherine Anne Porter, edited by Louise Waldrip and Shirley Ann Bauer, appeared in 1969.

Critical studies include Jane Krause DeMouy's Katherine Anne Porter's Women: The Eye of Her Fiction (1983); Unrue's Truth and Vision in Katherine Anne Porter's Fiction (1985); Willene and George Hendrick's Katherine Anne Porter (rev. 1988); Thomas F. Walsh's Katherine Anne Porter and Mexico: The Illusion of Eden (1992); Robert H. Brinkmeyer's Katherine Anne Porter's Artistic Development (1993); Janis P. Stout's Katherine Anne Porter, A Sense of the Times (1995); Mary Titus's The Ambivalent Art of Katherine Anne Porter (2005); and Stout's South by Southwest: Katherine Anne Porter and the Burden of Texas History (2013). Unrue edited Critical Essays on Katherine Anne Porter (1997).

Ezra Pound

Pound's early poetry, from A Lume Spento (1908) through Riposte (1912), is in the authoritative Collected Early Poems of Ezra Pound (1976), edited by Michael King. The same volumes, along with later volumes Hugh Selwyn Mauberley and Homage to Sextus Propertius, are collected in Personae: The Collected Shorter Poems (rev. ed. 1949; 2nd rev. ed. 1990). The New Directions edition of The Cantos (1993) is definitive. The Library of America's Poems and Translations (2003), edited by Richard Sieburth, excludes The Cantos. The most important of Pound's critical writings are The Spirit of Romance (rev. 1952); Gaudier-Brzeska: A Memoir (1916); Instigations (1920); Make It New (1934); The ABC of Read- ing (1934); Guide to Kulchur (1938); and Patria Mia (1950). His criticism has been collected in Literary Essays of Ezra Pound (1954), edited by T. S. Eliot; Selected Prose, 1909–1965 (1973), edited by William Cookson; and Ezra Pound's Poetry and Prose Contributions to Periodicals (1991), prefaced and arranged by Lea Baechler, A. Walton Litz, and James Longenback in eleven volumes. Ezra Pound Speaking: Radio Speeches of World War II (1978), edited by Leonard W. Doob, collects his wartime radio addresses. D. D. Paige edited The Letters of Ezra Pound, 1907–1941 (1950). Other correspondence is collected in Ezra Pound and Dorothy Shakespear: Their Letters, 1909–1914 (1984), edited by Omar Pound and A. Walton Litz; Pound/Lewis: The Letters of Ezra Pound and Wyndham Lewis (1985), edited by Timothy Materer; Ezra Pound and James Loughlin (1994), edited by David M. Gordon; and Pound/Cummings: The Correspondence of Ezra Pound and E. E. Cummings, edited by Barry Ahearn. Reviews of Pound are collected in Eric Homberger's Ezra Pound: The Critical Heritage (1973, 1997).

James J. Wilhelm's three-volume biography includes The American Roots of Ezra Pound (1985), Ezra Pound in London and Paris, 1908–1925 (1990), and Ezra Pound: The Tragic Years, 1925–1972 (1994). David Moody also has a three-volume biography, Ezra Pound: Poet (2007, 2014, 2015). Also useful are Noel Stock's The Life of Ezra Pound (1970, 1982); C. David Haymann's Ezra Pound, The Last Rower: A Political Profile (1976); and Wendy Stallard Flory's The American Ezra Pound (1989). The Roots of Treason: Ezra Pound and the Secrets of St. Elizabeth (1984), by E. Fuller Torrey, focuses on Pound's trial and incarceration.

Hugh Kenner's The Pound Era (1972) has been influential. Good introductions are Christine Brooke-Rose's A ZBC of Ezra Pound (1971) and James Knapp's Ezra Pound (1972). For The Cantos see the Annotated Index to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (1957) (through "Canto LXXXIV"), edited by John H. Edwards and William W. Vasse; Noel Stock's Reading the Cantos (1967); Ronald Bush's The Genesis of Pound's Cantos (1976); Wilhelm's The Later Cantos of Ezra Pound (1977); Lawrence S. Rainey's Ezra Pound and the Monument of Culture (1991); Carrol F. Terrill's A Companion to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (1993); George Kearn's Guide to Ezra Pound's Selected Cantos (1980); Anthony Woodward's Ezra Pound and "The Pisan Cantos" (1980); and William Cookson's updated Guide to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (2001). Tim Redman's Ezra Pound and Italian Fascism (1991) addresses the poet's politics, as does Leon Surette's Pound in Purgatory: From Economic Realism to Anti-Semitism (1999). Cultural approaches to Pound include Michael Coyle's Ezra Pound, Popular Genres, and the Discourse of Culture (1995); Daniel Tiffany's Radio Corpse (1995); and Rebecca Beasley's Ezra Pound and the Visual Culture of Modernism (2007). Marjorie Perloff's The Dance of the Intellect (1996) studies poetry in the Pound tradition; Jacob Korg's Winter Love: Ezra Pound and H. D. (2003) is a comparative study. Andrew Gibson edited Pound in Multiple Perspective: A Collection of Critical Essays (1993), and Ira B. Nadel edited The Cambridge Companion to Ezra Pound (1999).

Edwin Arlington Robinson

Collected Poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson (1921) was enlarged periodically through 1937. In addition to shorter verse, Robinson wrote long narrative poems, including the Arthurian Trilogy of Merlin (1917), Lancelot (1920), and Tristrum (1927). Other books include Roman Bartholomew (1923), The Man Who Died Twice (1924), Cavender's House (1929), The Glory of the Nightingales (1930), Matthias at the Door (1931), Talifer (1933), Amaranth (1934), and King Jasper (1935). Ridgely Torrence compiled Selected Letters (1940). Denham Sutcliffe edited Untriangulated Stars: Letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson to Harry de Forest Smith, 1890–1905 (1947). Richard Cary edited Edwin Arlington Robinson's Letters to Edith Brower (1968).

Scott Donaldson's Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Poet's Life (2007) is comprehensive. Richard Cary documented The Early Reception of Edwin Arlington Robinson (1974). Introductions to Robinson's work include Wallace L. Anderson's Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Critical Introduction (1967), Hoyt C. Franchere's Edwin Arlington Robinson (1968), and Louis O. Coxe's Edwin Arlington Robinson: The Life of Poetry (1969). Ellsworth Barnard edited Edwin Arlington Robinson: Centenary Essays (1969). Other collections are Appreciation of Edwin Arlington Robinson: Twenty-eight Interpretive Essays (1969), edited by Richard Cary; and Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Collection of Critical Essays (1970), edited by Francis Murphy. Richard Hoffpait's The Contemplative Poetry of Edwin Arlington Robinson, Robert Frost, and Yvor Winters (2002) links Robinson to other poets.

Carl Sandburg

The Complete Poems of Carl Sandburg (1950) was revised and expanded in 1970. Breathing Tokens (1978), edited by Margaret Sandburg, prints unpublished poems. Billy Sunday and Other Poems (1993), edited by George and Wilene Hendrick, contains some of his unpublished, uncollected, and unexpurgated poems. Paul Berman edited his Selected Poems (2006) for the Library of America. In addition to eight full-length volumes of poetry, Sandburg wrote a Pulitzer Prize-winning study of Abraham Lincoln: Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years, 2 vols. (1926), and Abraham Lincoln: The War Years, 4 vols. (1939); two collections of journalism and social commentary; Rootabaga Stories for children; a novel; and a book of American folk songs. Fables, Foibles and Foolies (1988), edited by George Hendrick, is a selection of unpublished humorous pieces. More Rootabagas (1993), edited by Hendrick, contains stories for children. Selected Poems (1996) was edited by George and Willene Hendrick. The Letters of Carl Sandburg (1968, 1988) was edited by Herbert Mitgang. The Poet and the Dream Girl: The Love Letters of Lillian Steichen and Carl Sandburg (1987, 1999) was edited by Margaret Sandburg.

Always the Young Strangers (1953) and Ever the Winds of Chance (1983), edited by Margaret Sandburg and George Hendrick, are segments of Sandburg's autobiography. A full-scale biography is Penelope Niven's Carl Sandburg: A Biography (1991). Critical studies include Richard Crowder's Carl Sandburg (1964) and Philip R. Yannella's The Other Carl Sandburg (1996). John Marsh's Hog Butchers, Beggars, and Busboys: Poverty, Labor, and the Making of Modern American Poetry (2011) includes a chapter on Sandburg.

Gertrude Stein

The Library of America published Stein's writings in two volumes: 1903–32 and 1932–46 (1998). The Yale Edition of the Unpublished Writings of Gertrude Stein (1951–58), edited by Carl Van Vechten, contains eight volumes of poetry, prose fiction, portraits, essays, and miscellany. The Norton Critical Edition of Three Lives and Q.E.D. (2005), edited by Marianne DeKoven, supplies critical and biographical contexts. Among publications in Stein's lifetime are Tender Buttons (1914) and prose fiction, including Three Lives (1909), The Making of Americans (1925), Lucy Church Amiably (1930), Ida: A Novel (1941), and Brewsie and Willie (1946). Geography and Plays (1922), Operas and Plays (1932), and Last Operas and Plays (1949, 1995), edited by Carl Van Vechten, contain dramatic pieces. Biographical material and portraits of Stein's contemporaries may be found in The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933), Portraits and Prayers (1934), Everybody's Autobiography (1937), and Wars I Have Seen (1945). Other works, including meditations, essays, sketches, and sociolinguistic treatises, are Useful Knowledge (1928), How to Write (1931), Lectures in America (1935), Narration: Four Lectures by Gertrude Stein (1935), What Are Masterpieces? (1940), and Four in America (1947). Donald C. Gallup edited Fernhurst, Q.E.D. and Other Early Writings by Gertrude Stein (1971) and also a collection of letters to Stein, The Flowers of Friendship (1953). Her correspondence with Mabel Dodge Luhan is edited by Patricia R. Everett (1996), with Thornton Wilder by Edward Burns and Ulla E. Dydo (1996), and with Virgil Thomson by Susan Holbrook and Thomas Dilworth (2010). Baty Precious Always Shines (2000), edited by Kay Turner, has selected love letters written between Stein and her partner, Alice B. Toklas. Gertrude Stein: An Annotated Bibliography (1979) was compiled by Maureen R. Liston.

W. G. Rogers's When This You See Remember Me: Gertrude Stein in Person (1948) and Alice B. Toklas's What Is Remembered (1963) are reminiscences of Stein by friends. Biographies include Howard Greenfield's Gertrude Stein: A Biography (1973); James R. Mellow's Charmed Circle: Gertrude Stein and Company (1974); Janet Hobbhouse's Everybody Who Was Anybody (1989); Linda Wagner-Martin's Favored Strangers: Gertrude Stein and Her Family (1995); Brenda Wineapple's Sister Brother: Gertrude and Leo Stein (1996); and Janet Malcolm's Two Lives: Gertrude and Alice (2007).

Critical studies include Robert B. Haas's A Primer for the Gradual Understanding of Gertrude Stein (1971); Richard Bridgman's Gertrude Stein in Pieces (1970); Wendy Steiner's Exact Resemblance to Exact Resemblance: The Literary Portraiture of Gertrude Stein (1978); Marianne DeKoven's A Different Language: Gertrude Stein's Experimental Writing (1983); Randa Kay Dubnick's The Structure of Obscurity: Gertrude Stein, Language, and Cubism (1984); Lisa Ruddick's Reading Gertrude Stein: Body, Text, Gnosis (1990); Jane P. Bowers's Gertrude Stein (1993); Linda Watts's Gertrude Stein: A Study of the Short Fiction (1999); Barbara Will's Gertrude Stein, Modernism, and the Problem of "Genius" (2000); Steven Meyer's Irresistible Dictation: Gertrude Stein and the Correlations of Writing and Science (2001); Dana Cairns Watson's Gertrude Stein and the Essence of What Happens (2005); and Karen Leick's Gertrude Stein and the Making of an American Celebrity (2009). Bruce Kellner edited the useful Gertrude Stein Companion (1988). A collection of critical essays, edited by Richard Kostelanetz, is Gertrude Stein Advanced (1990).

John Steinbeck

The Library of America issued four volumes of Steinbeck's work, Novels and Stories 1932–1937 (1994), The Grapes of Wrath and Other Writings (1996), Novels 1942–1952 (2002), and Travels with Charley and Later Novels

1947–1962 (2007). Two biographies are Jack J. Benson's The True Adventures of John Steinbeck, Writer (1984) and Jay Parini's John Steinbeck (1995). Elaine Steinbeck and Robert Wallsten edited Steinbeck: A Life in Letters (1975). Critical studies of Steinbeck include R. S. Hughes's Beyond the Red Pony: A Reader's Guide to Steinbeck's Complete Short Stories (1987); John H. Timmerman's The Dramatic Landscape of Steinbeck's Short Stories (1990); and Warren French's John Steinbeck's Fiction Revisited (1994). R. David edited John Steinbeck: A Collection of Critical Essays (1972); other collections are Rediscovering Steinbeck (1989), edited by Cliff Lewis and Carroll Britch; Critical Essays on Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath (1989), edited by John Ditsky; Short Novels of John Steinbeck (1990), edited by Jackson J. Benson; John Steinbeck: The Contemporary Reviews (1996), edited by Joseph R. McElrath Jr., Jesse S. Crisler, and Susan Shillinglaw; Steinbeck and the Environment: Interdisciplinary Approaches (1997), edited by Susan F. Beegel; and Beyond Boundaries: Rereading John Steinbeck (2002), edited by Shillinglaw and Kevin Hearle.

Wallace Stevens

The Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens was published in 1954. Milton J. Bates's Opus Posthumous (1957, rev. 1989) includes previously uncollected poems, plays, and essays. The Necessary Angel: Essays on Reality and the Imagination (1951) is Stevens's prose statement on poetry. The Library of America issued his Collected Poetry and Prose (1997). Other resources are Letters of Wallace Stevens (1966, 1996), edited by Holly Stevens; The Contemplated Spouse: The Letters of Wallace Stevens to Elsie (2006), edited by J. Donald Blount; Concordance to the Poetry of Wallace Stevens (1963), edited by Thomas Walsh; and Wallace Stevens: A Descriptive Bibliography (1973), compiled by J. M. Edelstein.

Joan Richardson's Wallace Stevens: The Early Years, 1879–1923 (1986) chronicles the poet's youth and her Wallace Stevens: The Later Years, 1923–1955 (1988) completes the story. Another biography is Tony Sharpe's Wallace Stevens: A Literary Life (2000). A. Walton Litz's Introspective Voyager: The Poetic Development of Wallace Stevens (1972) traces Stevens's thought and style through his early and middle years. Harold Bloom's Wallace Stevens: The Poems of Our Climate (1977) considers intellectual influences on Stevens; Joseph N. Riddle's The Clairvoyant Eye: The Poetry and Poetics of Wallace Stevens (1969, 1991) reads many individual poems. Other good full-length studies include Eleanor Cook's Poetry, Word-Play, and Word-War in Wallace Stevens (1988) and A Reader's Guide to Wallace Stevens (2007); James Longenbach's Wallace Stevens: The Plain Sense of Things (1991); Alan Filreis's Modernism from Left to Right (1994); Janet McCann's Wallace Stevens Revisited (1995); and Edward Ragg's Wallace Stevens and the Aesthetics of Abstraction (2010). Jacqueline Vaught Brogan's The Violence within/The Violence without: Wallace Stevens and the Emergence of a Revolutionary Poetics (2003) and Malcolm Woodland's Wallace Stevens and the Apocalyptic Mode (2005) consider the relation of Stevens's poetry to war. Albert Gelpi collects essays on the poet in Wallace Stevens: The Poetics of Modernism (1990); other collections are Critical Essays on Wallace Stevens (1988), edited by Steven Gould Axelrod and Helen Deese; Wallace Stevens and the Feminine (1993), edited by Melita Schaum; and Wallace Stevens Across the Atlantic (2008), edited by Bart Eeckhout and Ragg.

Jean Toomer

Toomer's published works include Cane (1923, repr. 1975, pub. also in a Norton Critical Edition, 2011), Essentials (1931), Portage Potential (1932), and an address, "The Flavor of Man" (1949). His Collected Poems, edited by Robert B. Jones and Margery Toomer Latimer, was published in 1988. A Jean Toomer Reader (1993), containing previously unpublished writings, was edited by Frederik L. Rusch; Robert B. Jones edited Selected Essays and Literary Criticism (1996). Mark Whalan edited The Letters of Jean Toomer, 1919–1924 (2005). Brian Joseph Benson and Mabel Mayle Dillard's Jean Toomer (1980); Nellie Y. McKay's Jean Toomer, Artist: A Study of His Literary Life and Work, 1894–1936 (1984); and Cynthia Earl Kerman and Richard Eldridge's The Lives of Jean Toomer: A Hunger for Wholeness (1989) are biographies. Studies include Charles Scruggs and Lee Van De Marr's Jean Toomer and the Terrors of American History (1998); Karen Ford Jackson's Split-Gut Song: Jean Toomer and the Poetics of Modernity (2005); and Barbara Foley's Jean Toomer: Race, Repression and Revolution (2014). Whalan's Race, Manhood, and Modernism in America: The Short Story Cycles of Sherwood Anderson and Jean Toomer (2007) is a comparative study. Essay collections are Jean Toomer: A Critical Evaluation (1988), edited by Therman B. O'Daniel, and Jean Toomer and the Harlem Renaissance, edited by Geneviève Faber and Michel Faith (2000).

Nathanael West

West's published novels are The Dream Life of Balso Snell (1931), Miss Lonelyhearts (1933), A Cool Million: The Dismantling of Lemuel Pitkin

(1934), and The Day of the Locust (1939). Miss Lonelyhearts and The Day of the Locust are reprinted in a combined volume from New Directions (1962, 1969). The Library of America's Novels and Other Writings (1997), edited by Sacvan Bercovitch, includes selected letters as well as screenplays and a play. Biographies are Jay Martin's Nathanael West: The Art of His Life (1970) and Joe Woodward's Alive Inside the Wreck: A Biography of Nathanael West (2011). Critical studies include James F. Light's Nathanael West: An Interpretive Study (1961); Victor Comerchero's Nathanael West: The Ironic Prophet (1964); Randall Reid's The Fiction of Nathanael West: No Redeemer, No Promised Land (1967); Alistair Wisker's The Writing of Nathanael West (1990); and Jonathan Veitch's American Superrealism: Nathanael West and the Politics of Representation in the 1930s (1997). Chapters on West are in Rita Barnard's The Great Depression and the Culture of Abundance: Kenneth Fearing, Nathanael West, and Mass Culture in the 1930s (1995); Karen Jacobs's The Eye's Mind: Literary Modernism and Visual Culture (2001); and Chip Rhodes's Politics, Desire, and the Hollywood Novel (2008). Ben Siegel's Critical Essays on Nathanael West (1994) provides a useful sampling of contemporary reviews and early critical responses. William White compiled Nathanael West: A Comprehensive Bibliography (1975).

William Carlos Williams

Williams's poems were first collected in three volumes: Collected Earlier Poems of William Carlos Williams (1951), Collected Later Poems of William Carlos Williams (1950), and Pictures from Brueghel (1962). More recent are The Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams, volume 1, 1909–1939 (1996), edited by A. Walton Litz and Christopher MacGowan, and volume 2, 1939–1962, edited by MacGowan (1988). Paterson's five books, published individually between 1946 and 1958, were issued in one volume in 1963 and reedited by MacGowan (1992). The Library of America issued Selected Poems (2004), edited by Robert Pinsky. Kora in Hell, Williams's volume of prose poetry, is in the collection Imaginations (1970), edited by Webster Schott, along with essays, fiction, and creative prose. Williams's short stories are collected in Make Light of It (1950) and again, with several additions, in The Farmers' Daughters (1961). His novels are A Voyage to Paganry (1928), White Mule (1937), In the Money (1940), and The Build Up (1946). His dramatic pieces were published together in Many Loves and Other Plays (1961). Important essays are contained in In the American Grain (1925, 1940), Selected Essays of William Carlos Williams (1954), and Imaginations (1970), edited by Webster Schott. Williams's prose also includes The Autobiography of William Carlos Williams (1951); a book of recollections dictated to Edith Heal, I Wanted to Write a Poem (1958); and Yes, Mrs. Williams (1959), a portrait of the poet's mother. J. C. Thirlwall edited The Selected Letters of William Carlos Williams (1957). Selections from the Pound–Williams correspondence, edited by Hugh Witemeyer, appeared in 1996. Letters between Williams and Denise Levertov, edited by MacGowan, appeared in 1998. Barry Ahearn edited The Correspondence of William Carlos Williams and Louis Zukofsky (2003). The Humane Particulars: The Collected Letters of William Carlos Williams and Kenneth Burke (2003) was edited by James H. East. Emily Mitchell Wallace compiled A Bibliography of William Carlos Williams (1968). Reed Whittemore's William Carlos Williams: Poet from Jersey (1975) is a critical biography, as are Paul Mariani's more detailed William Carlos Williams: A New World Naked (1981), and Herbert Leibowitz's "Something Urgent I Have to Say to You": The Life and Works of William Carlos Williams (2011).

James E. Breslin's William Carlos Williams: An American Artist (1970) is a still-useful overview. Other general introductions are Thomas R. Whitaker's William Carlos Williams (1989) and Kelli A. Larson's Guide to the Poetry of William Carlos Williams (1995). Among specialized studies are Mike Weaver's William Carlos Williams: The American Background (1971); Joseph N. Riddel's The Inverted Bell: Modernism and the Counter-Poetics of William Carlos Williams (1974); Henry M. Sayre's The Visual Text of William Carlos Williams (1983); Ann W. Fisher-Wirth's William Carlos Williams and Autobiography: The Woods of His Own Nature (1989); Ron Callan's William Carlos Williams and Transcendentalism (1992); T. Hugh Crawford's Modernism, Medicine, and William Carlos Williams (1993); Brian A. Bremen's William Carlos Williams and the Diagnostics of Culture (1993); Peter Halter's The Revolution in the Visual Arts and the Poetry of William Carlos Williams (1994); Donald W. Markos's Ideas in Things (1994); Barry Ahearn's William Carlos Williams and Alterity (1994); Julio Marzan's The Spanish American Roots of William Carlos Williams (1994); Stanley Koehler's Countries of the Mind: The Poetry of William Carlos Williams (1998); and John Beck's Writing the Radical Center: William Carlos Williams, John Dewey, and American Cultural Politics (2001).

Linda Wagner's The Prose of William Carlos Williams (1970) and Robert Coles's William Carlos Williams: The Knack of Survival in America (1975) discuss Williams's prose. For Paterson, see Joel Conarroe's William Carlos Williams' Paterson: Language and Landscape (1970); Benjamin Sankey's A Companion to William Carlos Williams's Paterson (1971); and Ann Marie Mikkelsen's Pastoral, Pragmatism, and Twentieth-Century American Poetry (2011). Paul Mariani's William Carlos Williams: The Poet and His Critics (1975) considers Williams's critical reception, as does William Carlos Williams, The Critical Heritage (1980, 1997), edited by Charles Doyle.

Thomas Wolfe

Arlyn and Matthew Bruccoli edited Wolfe's massive O Lost: A Story of the Buried Life (2000). David Madden compiled Thomas Wolfe's Civil War (2004) from Wolfe's writings. Among primary documents are The Notebooks of Thomas Wolfe (1970), edited by Richard S. Kennedy and P. Reeves; The Autobiography of an American Novelist, by Thomas Wolfe (1983), edited by Leslie Field; The Letters of Thomas Wolfe (1956), edited by Elizabeth Nowell; The Letters of Thomas Wolfe to His Mother (1968), edited by C. Holman and S. Ross; My Other Loneliness: Letters of Thomas Wolfe and Aline Bernstein (1983), edited by Suzanne Stutman; Beyond Love and Loyalty: The Letters of Thomas Wolfe and Elizabeth Nowell (1983), edited by Richard S. Kennedy; and To Loot My Life Clean: The Thomas Wolfe–Maxwell Perkins Correspondence (2000), edited by Matthew Bruccoli. The fullest biography is David Herbert Donald's Look Homeward: A Life of Thomas Wolfe (1987). John Lane Idol Jr.'s A Thomas Wolfe Companion (1987) is informative and useful. John Earl Bassett compiled Thomas Wolfe: An Annotated Critical Bibliography (1996).

There were many critical studies of Wolfe in the 1950s and 1960s. Later books include Carol I. Johnston's Of Time and the Artist (1996) and Robert Taylor Ensign's Lean down Your Ear upon the Earth, and Listen: Thomas Wolfe's Greener Modernism (2003).

Collections of critical essays are Thomas Wolfe: The Critical Reception (1974), edited by P. Reeves; The Loneliness at the Core: Studies in Thomas Wolfe (1975), edited by C. Hugh Holman; and Critical Essays on Thomas Wolfe (1985), edited by John S. Phillipson.

Richard Wright

Wright's fiction includes Uncle Tom's Children (1938), Native Son (1940), The Outsider (1953), and Eight Men (1961). Black Boy (1945) is his autobiography; White Man, Listen! (1957) is an important work of nonfiction. The Library of America has published his writings in two volumes, including an unexpurgated version of Native Son (1991). Earle V. Bryant edited Byline, Richard Wright: Articles from the Daily Worker and the New Masses (2015). For a complete bibliography of his writings, see Richard Wright: A Primary Bibliography (1982), compiled by Charles T. Davis and Michel Fabre. A good sample of reviews can be found in Richard Wright: The Critical Reception (1978), edited by John M. Reilly; a massive bibliography of Wright criticism around the world has been assembled by Keneth Kinnamon (1988). Kinnamon and Michel Fabre edited Conversations with Richard Wright (1993). The best critical biography is Fabre's The Unfinished Quest of Richard Wright (1993); see also Margaret Walker's Richard Wright, Daemonic Genius (1993) and Hazel Rowley's Richard Wright: The Life and Times (2001). Critical studies include Russell C. Brignano's Richard Wright: An Introduction to the Man and His Works (1970), Kinnamon's The Emergence of Richard Wright (1972), Fabre's Richard Wright: Books and Writers (1990) and his essays in The World of Richard Wright (2007), and Robert Butler's Native Son: The Emergence of a New Black Hero (1991). Abdul R. Jan Mohamed's The Death-Bound-Subject: Richard Wright's Archaeology of Death (2005) is an ambitious theoretical study. Collections of criticism are Yoshinobu Hakutani's Critical Essays on Richard Wright (1982); Richard Wright: Critical Perspectives Past and Present (1993), edited by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and K. A. Appiah; The Critical Response to Richard Wright (1995), edited by Robert J. Butler; Richard Wright: A Collection of Critical Essays (1995), edited by Arnold Rampersad; Kinnamon's Critical Essays on Richard Wright's Native Son (1997); and Richard Wright: New Readings in the 21st Century (2011), edited by Alice Mikal Craven, William E. Dow, and Gary Taylor.

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

IMAGE CREDITS

P. 2: Edward Hopper (American 1882–1967), Nighthawks, 1942; Friends of American Art Collection 1942.51, The Art Institute of Chicago. Photography © The Art Institute of Chicago; p. 4: Bettmann/Getty Images; p. 5: Library of Congress/Getty Images; p. 8: Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, DC/Art Resource, NY; p. 11: Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, DC/Art Resource, NY; p. 12: Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, DC/Art Resource, NY; p. 16: Merrill C. Berman Collection; p. 20: Provincetown Players, 1916; p. 33: University of Nebraska Lincoln, Archives and Special Collections; p. 185: The Sandor Family Collection. Richard & Ellen Sandor; p. 202: HIP/Art Resource, NY; p. 210: Library of Congress; p. 212: Art & Artifacts Division, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, The New York Public Library, Astor, Lenox and Tilden Foundations; p. 354: Bettmann/Getty Images; p. 516: Library of Congress; p. 538: Library of Congress; p. 608: Harry Ransom Humanities Research Art Collection, UT Austin; p. 667: Courtesy Everett Collection; p. 668: Norton; p. 860: Bettmann/Getty Images.

COLOR INSERT CREDITS

C1: Marcel Duchamp (1887–1968), © ARS, NY, Nude Descending a Staircase (No. 2), 1912. Oil on canvas, 57 7/8 x 35 1/8 inches (147 x 89.2cm). The Louise and Walter Arensberg Collection, 1950. The Philadelphia Museum of Art. Art © 2016 Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York/ADAGP, Paris/Succession Marcel Duchamp. Photo credit: The Philadelphia Museum of Art/Art Resource, NY. C2: Marsden Hartley, Portrait of a German Officer, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Alfred Stieglitz Collection, 1949 (49.70.42). Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art/Art Resource, NY. C3: Thomas Hart Benton, American (1889–1975), Hollywood, 1937–38. Tempera with oil on canvas, mounted on panel, 56 x 84 inches (142.2 x 213.4 cm). The Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art, Kansas City, Missouri. Bequest of the artist, F75-21/12. Photo by Jamison Miller. Art © T. H. Benton and R. P. Benton Testamentary Trusts/UMB Bank Trustee/Licensed by VAGA, New York, NY; C4: Hampton University Museum, Hampton, VA; C5: Charles Sheeler (1883–1965), River Rouge Plant, 1932; oil on Canvas, 20 x 24 1/8 in. Whitney Museum of Art, NY; Purchase 32.43; C6: Georgia O’Keeffe, From the Faraway, Nearby, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Alfred Stieglitz Collection, 1959 (59.204.2). Photograph © 1984 The Metropolitan Museum of Art; C7: Granger, NYC—All rights reserved; C8: Edward Hopper (American 1882–1967), Nighthawks, 1942; Friends of American Art Collection 1942.51, The Art Institute of Chicago. Photography © The Art Institute of Chicago.

TEXT CREDITS

Sterling Brown: “Mister Samuel and Sam,” “He Was a Man,” “Master and Man,” “Break of Day,” “Bitter Fruit of the Tree,” from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF STERLING A BROWN, selected by Michael S. Harper. Copyright © 1980 by Sterling A. Brown. Reprinted by permission of Elizabeth A. Dennis.

Willa Cather: “The Novel Dômeuble” from NOT UNDER FORTY by Willa Cather, copyright © 1936 by Willa S. Cather, renewed 1964 by Edith Lewis and the City Bank Farmers Trust Co. “The Sculptor’s Funeral” from COLLECTED STORIES by Willa Cather, copyright 1948 by Alfred A. Knopf, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, copyright renewed 1976 by Charles E. Cather. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Penguin Random House LLC for permission. MY ANTONIA by Willa Cather. Copyright 1918, 1926 by Willa Sibert Cather. © renewed 1946 by Willa Sibert Cather; copyright © renewed 1954 by Edith Lewis. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Co. All rights reserved.

Hart Crane: “At Melville’s Tomb,” “The Tunnel,” “To Brooklyn Bridge,” “Chaplinesque” and “Powhatan’s Daughter,” from THE COMPLETE POEMS OF HART CRANE by Hart Crane, ed. by Marc Simon. Copyright 1933, © 1958, 1966 by Liveright Publishing Corporation. Copyright © 1986 by Marc Simon. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.

Countee Cullen: “From the Dark Tower,” “Uncle Jim,” “Yet Do I Marvel,” “Incident,” and “Heritage.” from ON THESE I STAND by Countee Cullen. Copyright © 1947 Harper & Brothers, New York; renewed 1975 Ida M. Cullen. Copyrights held by the Amistad Research Center, Tulane University, administered by Thompson and Thompson, Brooklyn, NY.

E. E. Cummings: “anyone lived in a pretty how town,” copyright 1940, © 1968, 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. “Buffalo Bill’s,” copyright 1923, 1951, © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. “the Cambridge ladies who live in furnished souls,” copyright 1923, 1951, © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. “I sing of Olaf glad and big,” copyright 1931 © 1959, 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. “in Just-,” copyright 1923, 1951 © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. “my father moved through dooms of love,” copyright 1940, © 1968, 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. “next to of course god America I,” copyright 1926, 1954 © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1985 by George James Firmage. “O sweet spontaneous,” copyright 1923, 1951 © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. “pity this busy monster, manunkind,” copyright 1944 © 1972, 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. “somewhere I have never travelled, gladly beyond,” copyright 1931, © 1959, 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1979 by George James Firmage. “Thy fingers make early flowers of,” copyright 1923, 1951 © 1991 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage, from COMPLETE POEMS:

- 1904–1962 by E. E. Cummings, edited by George J. Firmage. From THE ENORMOUS ROOM, A TYPESCRIPT EDITION WITH DRAWINGS BY THE AUTHOR, ed. by George James Firmage. Copyright © 1978 by the Trustees for the E. E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.
- H.D. (Hilda Doolittle): “Oread” from COLLECTED POEMS 1912–1944 by H.D. (Hilda Doolittle). Copyright © 1914 by Hilda Doolittle. “Fragment 113,” “Helen,” “Leda,” “Mid-day,” and “The Walls Do Not Fall (Part 1)” from COLLECTED POEMS 1912–1944. Copyright © 1982 by The Estate of Hilda Doolittle. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Carcanet Press Ltd.
- John Dos Passos: From THE BIG MONEY from U.S.A. by John Dos Passos. Copyright by Elizabeth H. Dos Passos. Reprinted by permission of Lucy Dos Passos Coggin.
- T. S. Eliot: “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” “Sweeney Among the Nightingales,” “Gerontion,” and “The Waste Land,” reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber Ltd. from COLLECTED POEMS 1909–1962 by T. S. Eliot. “The Hollow Men” and “Journey of the Magi” from COLLECTED POEMS 1909–1962 by T. S. Eliot, copyright 1936 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt and © renewed 1964 by Thomas Stearns Eliot. “Burnt Norton” from FOUR QUARTETS, copyright 1936 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt and © renewed 1964 by T. S. Eliot. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt and Faber and Faber Ltd. from “Tradition and the Individual Talent” from SELECTED ESSAYS by T. S. Eliot. Reprinted by permission of Faber & Faber Ltd.
- William Faulkner: As I Lay Dying, “Barn Burning,” and “A Rose for Emily” from COLLECTED STORIES OF WILLIAM FAULKNER by William Faulkner. Copyright © 1950 by Random House, Inc., and renewed 1977 by Jill Faulkner Summers. Reprinted by permission of W. W. Norton and Company.
- Jessie Redmon Fauset: From THERE IS CONFUSION by Jessie Redmon Fauset. Copyright 1924 by Boni & Liveright, Inc., renewed 1951 by Jesse Redmon Fauset. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corp.
- F. Scott Fitzgerald: “Babylon Revisited” reprinted by permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., from THE SHORT STORIES OF F. SCOTT FITZGERALD, ed. by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Copyright 1931 by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright renewed © 1959 by Frances Scott Fitzgerald Lanahan. All rights reserved.
- Robert Frost: “The Pasture,” “Mowing,” “Mending Wall,” “The Death of the Hired Man,” “Home Burial,” “After Apple-Picking,” “The Wood-Pile,” “The Road Not Taken,” “The Oven Bird,” “Birches,” “Out, Out—” “Fire and Ice,” “Nothing Gold Can Stay,” “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening,” “Desert Places,” “Design,” “Neither Out Far, Nor in Deep,” “Provide, Provide,” “The Gift Outright,” and “Directive” from THE POETRY OF ROBERT FROST, ed. by Edward Connery Lathem. Copyright © 1916, 1923, 1930, 1934, 1939, 1969 by Henry Holt and Company, copyright 1936, 1942, 1944, 1951, 1958, 1962 by Robert Frost. Copyright 1964, 1967, 1970, 1975 by Lesley Frost Ballantine. Reprinted by permission of the publisher Henry Holt and Company, LLC. “The Figure a Poem Makes” from THE SELECTED PROSE OF ROBERT FROST, ed. by Hyde Cox and Edward Connery Lathem. Copyright © 1939, 1967 by Henry Holt and Company. Reprinted by permission of Henry Holt and Company, LLC. All rights reserved.
- Ernest Hemingway: “Hills Like White Elephants” from THE SHORT STORIES OF ERNEST HEMINGWAY. Copyright 1927 by Charles Scribner’s Sons; copyright renewed © 1955 by Ernest Hemingway. All rights reserved. Published in Great Britain in THE FIRST FORTY-NINE STORIES. From THE SUN ALSO RISES, copyright © 1926 by Charles Scribner’s Sons; copyright renewed 1954 by Ernest Hemingway. All rights reserved. Published in Great Britain as FIESTA: THE SUN ALSO RISES. Reprinted by permission of the publishers, Scribner, a division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., and Jonathan Cape c/o The Random House Group Limited. Excerpt from letter from Ernest Hemingway to his family (Aug. 18, 1918). From ERNEST HEMINGWAY, SELECTED LETTERS, 1917–1961, ed. by Carlos Baker. Copyright © 1981 by Carlos Baker and The Ernest Hemingway Foundation, Inc. All rights reserved. Reprinted with permission of Atria/Scribner/Gallery, a division of Simon & Schuster, Inc.
- Langston Hughes: “The Negro Speaks of Rivers,” “Mother to Son,” “The Weary Blues,” “I, Too,” “Song for a Dark Girl,” “Theme for English B,” “Vagabonds,” “Genius Child,” “Madam and Her Madam,” “Madam’s Calling Cards,” “Silhouette,” “Note on Commercial Theatre,” “Visitors to the Black Belt,” “Mulatto,” “Freedom (1),” “Words Like Freedom,” from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF LANGSTON HUGHES, edited by Arnold Rampersad with David Roessel, Associate Editor. Copyright © 1994 by The Estate of Langston Hughes. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Penguin Random House LLC for permission. Electronic rights by permission of Harold Ober Associates, Inc. “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain” abridged from The Nation, June 23, 1926. Copyright 1926 by Langston Hughes. Used by permission of Harold Ober Associates, Inc.
- Zora Neale Hurston: From “The Eatonville Anthology” and “How It Feels to Be Colored Me” reprinted by permission of The Joy Harris Literary Agency, Inc. “Sweat” as taken from THE COMPLETE STORIES by Zora Neale Hurston. Introduction copyright © 1995 by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and Sieglinde Lemke. Compilation copyright © 1995 by Vivian Bowden, Lois J. Hurston Gaston, Clifford Hurston, Lucy Ann Hurston, Winifred Hurston Clark, Zora Mack Goins, Edgar Hurston, Sr., and Barbara Hurston Lewis. Afterword and Bibliography copyright © 1995 by Henry Louis Gates, Jr. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
- Nella Larsen: PASSING from QUICKSAND AND PASSING is reprinted by permission of Profile Books Limited.
- Amy Lowell: “St. Louis” and “New Heavens for Old” from THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF AMY LOWELL. Copyright © 1955 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company, © renewed 1983 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company, Brinton P. Roberts, and G. D’Andelot Belin, Esq. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Co. All rights reserved.
- Mina Loy: “Feminist Manifesto” from THE LOST LUNAR BAEDEKER by Mina Loy. Works of Mina Loy copyright © 1996 by the Estate of Mina Loy. Introduction and edition copyright © 1996 by Roger L. Conover. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC, and Carcanet Press Ltd.
- Claude McKay: “Africa,” copyright 1921; “The Harlem Dancer,” copyright 1917; “The Lynching,” copyright 1920; “Harlem Shadows,” copyright 1918; “America,” copyright 1921; and “If We Must Die,” copyright 1921. Reprinted by permission of the Literary Estate of Claude McKay.

- F. T. Marinetti: From “Manifesto of Futurism” from “The Founding Manifesto of Futurism” from MARINETTI: SELECTED WRITINGS by F. T. Marinetti, ed. by R. W. Flint, tr. by R. W. Flint and Arthur A. Coppotelli. Translation copyright © 1972 by Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Inc. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.
- Edgar Lee Masters: From SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY (1915). Copyright © by Edgar Lee Masters. Reprinted by permission of the Estate of Edgar Lee Masters and the Estate of Hilary Masters.
- Edna St. Vincent Millay: “I, being born a woman,” “Apostrophe to Man,” “I too beneath Your Moon, Almighty Sex,” from COLLECTED POEMS. Copyright © 1923, 1932, 1939, 1940, 1951, © 1962, 1967, 1968, 1982 by Edna St. Vincent Millay and Norma Millay Ellis. “I Forgot for a Moment” from MAKE BRIGHT THE ARROWS. Copyright 1940, © 1968 by Edna St. Vincent Millay and Norma Millay Ellis. Reprinted by permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., on behalf of Holly Pepe, Literary Executor, The Edna St. Vincent Millay Society, www.millay.org.
- Marianne Moore: “To a Snail,” “Poetry,” and “Marriage” with author’s notes, copyright © 1935, 1963 by Marianne Moore. All rights reserved. “The Paper Nautilus,” copyright 1941 by Marianne Moore and renewed © 1969 by Marianne Moore. All rights reserved. “The Mind Is an Enchanting Thing” and “In Distrust of Merits,” copyright 1944 by Marianne Moore and renewed © 1972 by Marianne Moore. All rights reserved. Reprinted from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF MARIANNE MOORE by permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., Faber & Faber Ltd., and by David M. Moore, Administrator, Literary Estate of Marianne Moore. All rights reserved.
- Eugene O’Neill: LONG DAY’S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT, copyright © 1955 by Carlotta Monterey O’Neill. Copyright © renewed 1983 by Oona O’Neill Chaplin and Yale University. Reprinted by permission.
- Katherine Anne Porter: “Flowering Judas” from FLOWERING JUDAS AND OTHER STORIES, copyright 1930 by Katherine Anne Porter and renewed 1958 by Katherine Anne Porter. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission of the publishers, Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company and Jonathan Cape c/o The Random House Group Limited. Published in Great Britain in COLLECTED STORIES. Electronic rights by permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., for the Katherine Anne Porter Literary Trust. Pale Horse, Pale Rider from PALE HORSE, PALE RIDER: THREE SHORT NOVELS, copyright 1937 by Katherine Anne Porter and renewed 1965 by Katherine Anne Porter. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved. Electronic rights by permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., for the Katherine Anne Porter Literary Trust.
- Ezra Pound: “A Virginal,” “Hugh Selwyn Mauberley [Part I],” “In a Station of the Metro,” “Portrait d’Une Femme,” “To Whistler, American,” “Villanelle: The Psychological Hour,” and “A Pact” from PERSONAE, copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound. “The River-Merchant’s Wife: A Letter” original by Rihaku, from PERSONAE, copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Faber & Faber Ltd. Published in Great Britain in COLLECTED SHORTER POEMS. Canto I and Canto XVII from THE CANTOS OF EZRA POUND, copyright 1934 by Ezra Pound. Canto XLV from THE CANTOS OF EZRA POUND, copyright © 1937 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Faber and Faber Ltd. From “A Retrospect” from THE LITERARY ESSAYS OF EZRA POUND, copyright © 1935 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Faber and Faber Ltd.
- Carl Sandburg: “Chicago” and “Fog from CHICAGO POEMS by Carl Sandburg. Copyright 1916 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company and renewed 1944 by Carl Sandburg. “Cool Tombs” and “Grass” from CORNHUSKERS by Carl Sandburg. Copyright 1918 by Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company and renewed 1946 by Carl Sandburg. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
- Gertrude Stein: From THE MAKING OF AMERICANS: THE HERSLAND FAMILY by Gertrude Stein, copyright 1934 Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company and renewed 1962 by Alice B. Toklas, reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. From THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ALICE B. TOKLAS by Gertrude Stein, copyright 1933 by Gertrude Stein and renewed 1961 by Alice B. Toklas. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint and division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Penguin Random House LLC for permission. “Objects” from TENDER BUTTONS by Gertrude Stein is reprinted with permission of the Estate of Gertrude Stein through its Literary Executor, Mr. Stanford Gann, Jr., of Levin & Gann, P.A.
- John Steinbeck: “The Chrysanthemums” from THE LONG VALLEY by John Steinbeck, copyright 1937, renewed © 1965 by John Steinbeck. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC and Penguin Books Ltd. Copyright 1938 by John Steinbeck. Copyright renewed 1966 by John Steinbeck.
- Wallace Stevens: “The Snow Man,” “A High-Toned Old Christian Woman,” “The Emperor of Ice-Cream,” “Disillusionment of Ten O’Clock,” “Sunday Morning,” “Anecdote of the Jar,” “Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird,” “The Idea of Order at Key West,” “Of Modern Poetry,” and “The Plain Sense of Things” from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF WALLACE STEVENS by Wallace Stevens. Copyright 1954 by Wallace Stevens. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Penguin Random House LLC for permission and Faber and Faber Ltd.
- Jean Toomer: “Georgia Dusk,” “Fern,” “Portrait in Georgia,” “Blood-Burning Moon,” and “Seventh Street” from CANE by Jean Toomer. Copyright 1923 by Boni & Liveright. Copyright renewed 1951 by Jean Toomer. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.
- Nathanael West: The Day of the Locust from MISS LONELYHEARTS & THE DAY OF THE LOCUST, copyright © 1939 by the Estate of Nathanael West. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.
- William Carlos Williams: “Portrait of a Lady,” “The Young Housewife,” “Queen-Anne’s-Lace,” “The Widow’s Lament in Springtime,” “Spring and All, Section 1” “To Elsie,” “The Red Wheelbarrow,” “This Is Just to Say,” “The Dead Baby” and excerpt from the essay “Spring and All” from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS 1909–1939, volume I. Copyright © 1938 by New Directions Publishing Corporation. “A Sort of a Song,” “Burning the Christmas Greens,” “The Dance (In Brueghel’s),” and “Landscape with the Fall of Icarus,” from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS 1939–1962, volume II. Copyright © 1944, 1962 by William Carlos Williams. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Carcanet Press Ltd.

Thomas Wolfe: "The Lost Boy" by Thomas Wolfe. Copyright © 1937 by McCall Corporation. Copyright renewed 1965 by Paul Gitlin, Administrator C.T.A., Estate of Thomas Wolfe. Reprinted with the permission of McIntosh & Otis, Inc.

Richard Wright: "The Man Who Was Almost a Man" from EIGHT MEN by Richard Wright. Copyright 1940, © 1961 by Richard Wright, renewed © 1989 by Ellen Wright. Introduction © 1996 by Paul Gilroy. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers, John Hawkins & Associates, Inc., and the Estate of Richard Wright.

Index

- 'A cold coming we had of it, 381
A reek of steam—the bath-house rang with cries, 214
Abel Melveny, 27
According to Brueghel, 292
Adventure, 262
Africa, 470
After Apple-Picking, 228
After I got religion and steadied down, 25
After the leaves have fallen, we return, 281
All day long I have been working, 181
All Greece hates, 335
Although she feeds me bread of bitterness, 471
America, 471
Among twenty snowy mountains, 277
An incident here and there, 335
And then went down to the ship, 308
Anderson, Sherwood, 251
Anecdote of the Jar, 276
anyone lived in a pretty how town, 614
Apeneck Sweeney spreads his knees, 358
Apostrophe to Man, 606
Applauding youths laughed with young prostitutes, 469
April is the cruellest month, breeding, 365
As I Lay Dying, 669
At Melville's Tomb, 785
At ten a.m. the young housewife, 283
Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, The, 215
- Babylon Revisited*, 646
Back out of all this now too much for us, 236
Barn Burning, 771
Big Jess fired on the Alabama Central, 832
Big Money, The, 662
Birches, 231
Bitter Fruit of the Tree, 833
Blood-Burning Moon, 622
Break of Day, 832
Bridge, The, 786
Brown, Sterling, 828
Buffalo Bill 's, 611
Burning the Christmas Greens, 290
Burnt Norton, 382
"Butch" Weldy, 25
By the road to the contagious hospital, 286
- Call the roller of big cigars, 272
Cane, 618
Cantos, The, 308
Captured Goddess, The, 179
Cather, Willa, 32
Chaplinesque, 785
Chicago, 267
Chrysanthemums, The, 846
Complacencies of the peignoir, and late, 273
Cool Tombs, 268
Crane, Hart, 783
Cullen, Countee, 853
Cummings, E. E., 206, 607
- Dance, The*, 290
Day of the Locust, The, 861
Dead Baby, The, 289
Death of the Hired Man, The, 221
Desert Places, 234
Design, 234
Detestable race, continue to expunge yourself, die out, 606
Directive, 236
Disillusionment of Ten O'Clock, 273
Dos Passos, John, 661
Droning a drowsy syncopated tune, 836
- Eatonville Anthology, The*, 525
Eliot, T. S., 352
Emperor of Ice-Cream, The, 272
Enormous Room, The, 207
Eros Turannos, 30
- Faulkner, William, 666
Fauset, Jessie Redmon, 211
Feminist Manifesto, 318
Fern, 619
Figure a Poem Makes, The, 238
Fire and Ice, 233
Fitzgerald, F. Scott, 629
Flat / Flat, 182
Flowering Judas, 473
Fog, 268
For authorities whose hopes, 348
For three years, out of key with his time, 300
Four Quartets, 382
Fragment 113, 334

- Freedom*, 842
 Freedom will not come, 842
From the Dark Tower, 858
Fromereville, 214
Frost, Robert, 218
- Genius Child*, 839
Georgia Dusk, 618
Gerontion, 363
Gift Outright, The, 236
Glaspell, Susan, 240
 Go to the western gate, Luke Havergal,—, 28
Grass, 269
- H.D. (Hilda Doolittle), 330
 Hair—braided chestnut, 622
Hands, 253
Harlem Dancer, The, 469
Harlem Shadows, 469
 He saw her from the bottom of the stairs, 225
He Was a Man, 830
Helen, 335
Hemingway, Ernest, 204, 795
 Her body is not so white as, 284
 Here I am, an old man in a dry month, 363
Heritage, 855
High-Toned Old Christian Woman, A, 272
Hills Like White Elephants, 803
 His Spirit in smoke ascended to high heaven, 470
 Hog Butcher for the World, 267
Hollow Men, The, 378
Home Burial, 225
How It Feels to Be Colored Me, 533
 How many dawns, chill from his rippling rest, 786
Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (Life and Contacts), 300
Hughes, Langston, 328, 833
Hurston, Zora Neale, 515
- I am useless, 183
 I am your son, white man! 837
 [I, being born a woman], 605
 I bought every kind of machine that's known—, 27
 I doubt not God is good, well-meaning, kind, 854
I Forgot for a Moment, 607
 I found a dimpled spider, fat and white, 234
 I had over-prepared the event, 298
 I had some cards printed, 843
I Have a Rendezvous with Death . . ., 204
 I have eaten, 289
 I hear the halting footsteps of a lass, 469
 I make a pact with you, Walt Whitman—, 297
 I placed a jar in Tennessee, 276
i sing of Olaf glad and big, 612
I Think I Should Have Loved You Presently, 605
I, Too, 836
I Too beneath Your Moon, Almighty Sex, 606
- I, too, dislike it: there are things that are important beyond all, 339
 I, too, sing America., 836
 I was only eight years old, 26
 I worked for a woman, 841
 I would have been as great as George Eliot, 26
 I'm going out to clean the pasture spring, 219
 I've known rivers, 835
Idea of Order at Key West, The, 279
 If "compression is the first grace of style," 347
If We Must Die, 470
In a Station of the Metro, 297
 In Brueghel's great picture, The Kermess, 290
In Distrust of Merits, 350
in Just-, 609
Incident, 854 is an enchanted thing, 349
 It wasn't about no woman, 830
- Journey of the Magi*, 381
- Landscape with the Fall of Icarus*, 292
Larsen, Nella, 536
Leda, 333
 Let the snake wait under, 290
 Let us go then, you and I, 355
Letter of August 18, 1918, to His Parents, 205
Long Day's Journey into Night, 389
Lost Boy, The, 808
Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock, The, 355
Lowell, Amy, 178
Loy, Mina, 318
Luke Havergal, 28
Lynching, The, 470
- Madam and Her Madam*, 841
Madam's Calling Cards, 843
Madonna of the Evening Flowers, 181
Making of Americans, The, 187
Man Who Was Almost a Man, The, 958
Manifesto of Futurism, 317
Margaret Fuller Slack, 26
Marinetti, F. T., 316
Marriage, 340
 Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the table, 221
Master and Man, 831
Masters, Edgar Lee, 24
McKay, Claude, 467
Mending Wall, 220
Mid-day, 332
Millay, Edna St. Vincent, 604
Mind Is an Enchanting Thing, The, 349
Mimiver Cheevy, 29
Mister Samuel and Sam, 829
 Mister Samuel, he belong to Rotary, 829
Moore, Marianne, 337
Mother, 257

- Mother to Son*, 835
Mowing, 219
Mulatto, 837
My Antonia, 34
my father moved through dooms of love, 615
 My long two-pointed ladder's sticking through a tree, 228

 Nature's first green is gold, 233
Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain,
 The, 328
Negro Speaks of Rivers, The, 835
Neither Out Far Nor In Deep, 235
Nellie Clark, 26
New Heavens for Old, 183
"next to of course god america i", 612
 No, no! Go from me. I have left her lately, 297
 Not honey, / not the plunder of the bee, 334
Note on Commercial Theatre, 840
Nothing Gold Can Stay, 233

O sweet spontaneous, 610
Of Modern Poetry, 280
 Often beneath the wave, wide from this ledge, 785
 Once riding in old Baltimore, 854
 One must have a mind of winter, 271
O'Neill, Eugene, 387
 Only the chemist can tell, and not always the chemist, 25
Oread, 332
"Out, Out—", 232
 Out walking in the frozen swamp one gray day, 229
Oven Bird, The, 230
 Over the house tops, 179

Pact, A, 297
Pale Horse, Pale Rider, 481
Paper Nautilus, The, 348
Passing, 538
Pasture, The, 219
 Pile the bodies high at Austerlitz and Waterloo, 269
pity this busy monster, manunkind, 617
Plain Sense of Things, The, 281
Poetry, 339
 Poetry is the supreme fiction, madame, 272
Porter, Katherine Anne, 471
Portrait d'une Femme, 296
Portrait in Georgia, 622
Portrait of a Lady, 284
Pound, Ezra, 293, 321
Powhatan's Daughter, 788
Provide, Provide, 235

Queen-Anne's-Lace, 284

Recuerdo, 604
Red Wheelbarrow, The, 288
Retrospect, A, 322

Richard Cory, 29
River, The, 788
River-Merchant's Wife: A Letter, The, 297
Road Not Taken, The, 230
Robinson, Edwin Arlington, 27
Rose for Emily, A, 765

Sandburg, Carl, 266
Sculptor's Funeral, The, 168
Seeger, Alan, 203
September, 1918, 182
Seventh Street, 628
 She fears him, and will always ask, 30
 She sang beyond the genius of the sea, 279
Silhouette, 843
 Snow falling and night falling fast, oh, fast, 234
Snow Man, The, 271
 so much depends, 288
 Some say the world will end in fire, 233
 Something there is that doesn't love a wall, 220 somewhere i have never travelled, gladly beyond, 613
Song for a Dark Girl, 838
 Sorrow is my own yard, 285
Sort of a Song, A, 290
 Southern gentle lady, 843
Spring and All, 286, 326
St. Louis, 182
Stein, Gertrude, 184, 214
Steinbeck, John, 845
Stevens, Wallace, 269
 Stick your patent name on a signboard, 788
Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening, 233 Strengthened to live, strengthened to die for, 350
Sun Also Rises, The, 797
Sunday Morning, 273
Sweat, 517
Sweeney among the Nightingales, 358
 Sweep the house, 289

 Tell me, / Was Venus more beautiful, 180
Tender Buttons, 190
 The apparition of these faces in the crowd,
 297
 The buzz saw snarled and rattled in the yard, 232
the Cambridge ladies who live in furnished souls, 611
 The fog comes, 268
 The houses are haunted, 273
 The instructor said, 844
 The land was ours before we were the land's, 236
 The light beats upon me, 332
 The people along the sand, 235
 The poem of the mind in the act of finding,
 280
 The pure products of America, 286
 The sky, lazily disdaining to pursue, 618

- The sun sought thy dim bed and brought forth light, 470
 The witch that came (the withered hag), 235
 The yellow ears are crammed in
 Mr. Cromartie's bin, 831
 Their time past, pulled down, 290
Theme for English B, 844
 There are words like Freedom, 841
 There is a singer everyone has heard, 230
There Is Confusion, 211
 There was never a sound beside the wood but one, 219
 They said to my grandmother: "Please do not be bitter," 833
Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird, 277
 This afternoon was the colour of water falling through sunlight, 182
 This institution, 340
 This is a song for the genius child, 839
This Is Just to Say, 289
Thy fingers make early flowers of, 609
 Time present and time past, 382
To a Snail, 347
To Brooklyn Bridge, 786
To Elsie, 286
Toomer, Jean, 617
To Whistler, American, 295
Tradition and the Individual Talent, 359
Trainor, the Druggist, 25
Trifles, 241
Tunnel, The, 791
 Two roads diverged in a yellow wood, 230

Uncle Jim, 858
 U.S.A., 662

Vagabonds, 841
Venus Transiens, 180
Villanelle: The Psychological Hour, 298
Virginal, A, 297
Visitors to the Black Belt, 839

Walls Do Not Fall, The, 335
Waste Land, The, 365
 Way Down South in Dixie, 838
 We are the desperate, 841
 We are the hollow men, 378
 We make our meek adjustments, 785
 We shall not always plant while others reap, 858
 We were very tired, we were very merry—, 604
Weary Blues, The, 836
 Well, son, I'll tell you, 835
West, Nathanael, 859
 What is Africa to me, 855
 When Abraham Lincoln was shoveled into the tombs, he forgot the, 268
 When I see birches bend to left and right, 231
 Whenever Richard Cory went down town, 29
 Where the slow river, 333
 While my hair was still cut straight across my forehead, 297
 Whirl up, sea—, 332
 "White folks is white," says uncle Jim, 858
 Whose woods these are I think I know, 233
Widow's Lament in Springtime, The, 285
Williams, William Carlos, 281, 326
Winesburg, Ohio, 253
Winter Dreams, 630
Wolfe, Thomas, 807
Wood-Pile, The, 229
Words Like Freedom, 841
Wright, Richard, 957
Wyeth, John Allan, Jr., 213

Yet Do I Marvel, 854
 You also, our first great, 295
 You can talk about, 839
Young Housewife, The, 283
 Your mind and you are our Sargasso Sea, 296
 Your thighs are appletrees, 284
 You've taken my blues and gone—, 840

1914–1945

Nude Descending a Staircase, No. 2, Marcel Duchamp, 1912

Rejected by Duchamp's fellow French modernists when he submitted it to the annual Salon des Indépendants (the annual exhibition of France's Society of Independent Artists) in 1912, Nude Descending a Staircase went on to become the most controversial work shown at the 1913 International Exhibition of Modern Art in New York City—the Armory Show, as it became known, after its site in a National Guard armory. Featuring paintings and sculpture by European avant-garde artists as well as a scattering of Americans, including Edward Hopper and Charles Sheeler, the Armory Show brought modernist art to the attention of a broad American public. Nude Descending a Staircase links Cubism's technique of representing objects in multiple perspectives with the innovations of late nineteenth-century multiple-exposure photography, the precursor to motion pictures.

Portrait of a German Officer, Marsden Hartley, 1914

Born in Lewiston, Maine, Hartley immersed himself in European modernist painting at Gertrude Stein's Paris salon during a 1912 trip financed by the photographer Alfred Stieglitz. Hartley's abstract "portrait," completed on his second European trip to Berlin and before the United States entered World War I, represents its wartime subject in fragments of ribbons, uniforms, and flags. The painting memorializes Hartley's friend Karl von Freyburg, a German cavalry officer who had been killed in combat. Hartley's Portrait is deliberately far removed from the kind of traditional memorial art that might have idealized an officer on his horse. Among the elements incorporated into the painting are Freyburg's initials (K v. F) and the age at which he died (24). Like T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (p. 365), this work registers a world blown to pieces.

Hollywood, Thomas Hart Benton, 1937–38

The Missouri-born painter Thomas Hart Benton studied at the Art Institute of Chicago and then, like other American artists of his generation, traveled to Paris for further education and immersion in avant-garde circles. On returning to the United States, Benton worked as a painter of backdrops for early silent movies being filmed in Fort Lee, New Jersey. His service in the U.S. Navy during World War I introduced him to still another use for painting, as camouflage for warships. But after the war, Benton declared himself “an enemy of modernism” and turned toward a more realistic style. During the Great Depression, he earned a national reputation by producing several series of murals on subjects from American regional life and history, including controversial topics like slavery and the Ku Klux Klan. In 1937 Life magazine sent Benton to Los Angeles to cover the film industry; his large canvas Hollywood was the result. Like many famous paintings in Western art, Hollywood centers the viewer’s gaze on a nearly nude female body, a modern-day goddess in the process of creation. Surrounding this body are not cupids and angels but managers and technicians of an industrial workplace—one of many American work settings that Benton painted. Like Nathanael West in The Day of the Locust, Benton in Hollywood focuses on the unnamed and invisible laborers supporting the film industry.

Black Belt, Archibald J. Motley, 1934

Motley attended the School of the Art Institute of Chicago and later studied European art on a Guggenheim fellowship in Paris, where he was drawn to Renaissance and nineteenth-century realistic portraiture. During the 1930s his painting was supported by the federal Works Progress Administration. Black Belt captures the social breadth and vitality of Chicago's South Side and other emerging African American urban centers, using a stylized realism of vivid colors and flat perspective. His men and women include well-dressed couples; a matronly, homeward-bound woman; and the stoic, downcast worker in the foreground. In the middle background a man in a suit and hat glances warily over his shoulder toward the viewer; in his poem about the South Side (p. 839), Langston Hughes explicitly challenged outsiders looking in on black life. Chicago's diverse African American community was an important setting for Nella Larsen's novel Passing (p. 538).

River Rouge Plant, Charles Sheeler, 1932

This painting of a Ford Motor Company factory near Detroit grew out of a series of photographs that Sheeler took for an advertising agency. Along with other “precisionist” painters of the 1920s and 1930s, Sheeler was influenced by Futurism’s celebration of the machine and by Cubism’s breaking of traditional unified perspective into multiple flat planes. Sheeler’s painterly style, however, remained realistic; he sought the broken planes and angles of Cubism in the objects themselves (here, the multiple white planes of the factory and its reflection) and avoided calling attention to the medium of paint—its texture and brushwork, the surface of the canvas—over what it represented. Like the poet Hart Crane, Sheeler found the materials for a modernist art in the American industrial landscape.

From the Faraway, Nearby, Georgia O'Keeffe, 1937

O'Keeffe found inspiration in the landscapes of the American Southwest. Noted in the 1920s for her large, vivid paintings of flowers “with great sexy involutions” (as Life magazine observed), O'Keeffe in the 1930s began painting the bones she found scattered about the New Mexico desert. In this almost surrealist image, the sharp lines of the elk antlers floating in the foreground are echoed in softer form by the hills; the painting’s perspective collapses the middle distance to put the faraway and the nearby on top of one another. O'Keeffe’s paintings became modernist icons of the American landscape; the bones of the Southwest, she wrote, opened her work up to “the wideness and wonder of the world as I live in it.”

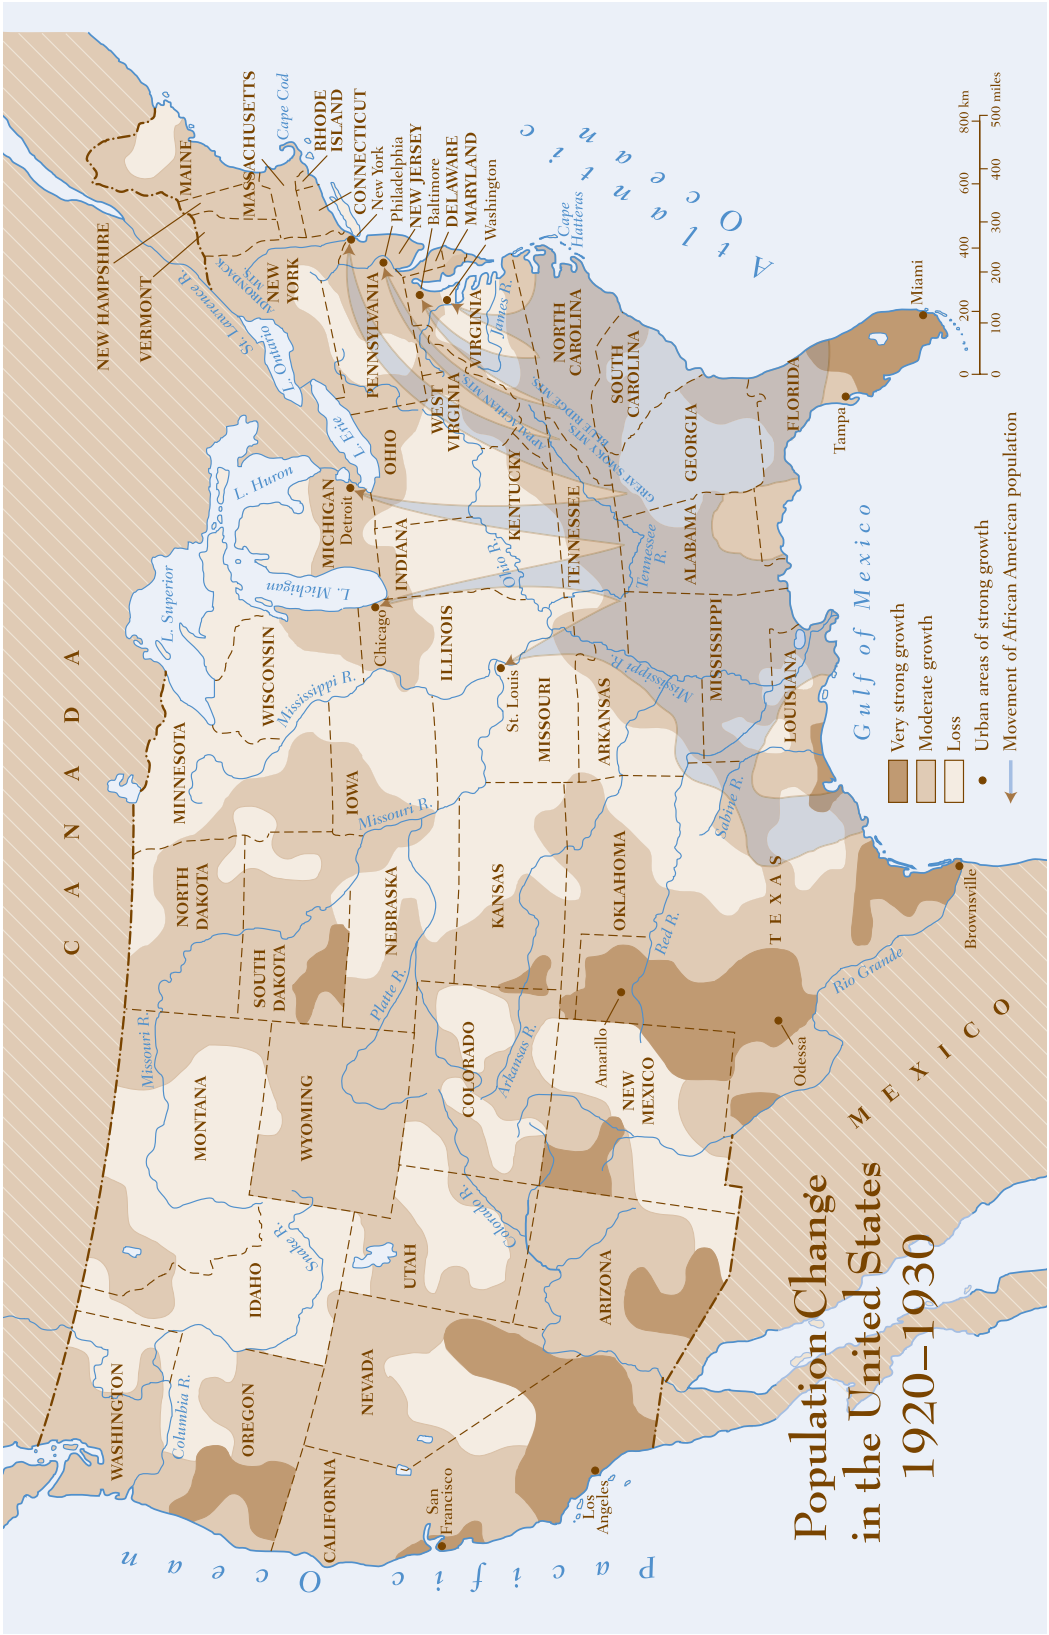

We Can Do It! (“Rosie the Riveter”), J. Howard Miller, c. 1942

World War II drew many women out of traditional roles in the home and into the industrial labor force and various forms of war-related work. Miller’s poster We Can Do It!, produced by the defense contractor Westinghouse for the War Production Co-ordinating Committee, uses the bright colors and clean, simple lines of advertising to make the dislocations of traditional gender patterns familiar and acceptable, at least for the duration of the war. The worker’s pert face and feminine grooming balance her assertively flexed bicep. A popular wartime song, “Rosie the Riveter,” gave Miller’s anonymous heroine her familiar nickname.

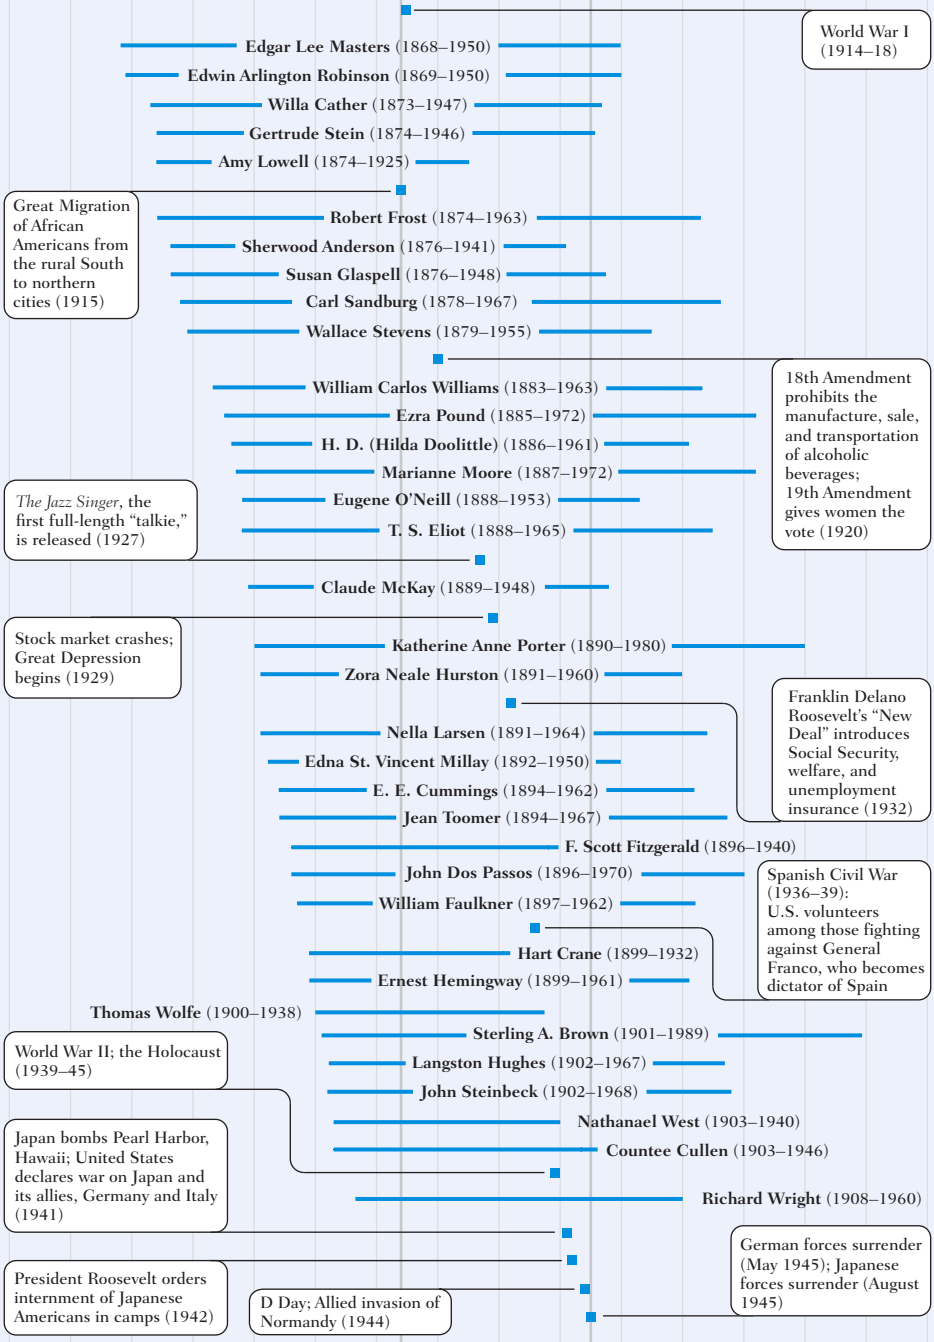

Night Hawks, Edward Hopper, 1942

Born in Nyack, New York, and trained at the New York Institute of Design, Hopper sold his first painting at the 1913 Armory show and lived in New York's Greenwich Village for most of his career. Hopper's painting represents the night life of loners in the city. Its stylized realism preserves traditional perspective, accentuated by the deep view through the restaurant's large plate-glass window, but simplifies both realistic detail and painterly brushwork. In both style and subject, Hopper's painting is often compared to the work of writers like Ernest Hemingway and to the visual style of 1940s film noir (literally, "dark film"). Night Hawks depicts a clean, well-lit restaurant against a dark urban background of uncertain danger or promise. The customer with his back to the viewer, like one of the "private eye" characters of film noir, keeps to himself but stands in for the viewer's anonymous perspective on the scene.

American Literature 1914–1945

1850 1860 1870 1880 1890 1900 1910 1920 1930 1940 1950 1960 1970 1980 1990 2000

1850 1860 1870 1880 1890 1900 1910 1920 1930 1940 1950 1960 1970 1980 1990 2000

THE NORTON ANTHOLOGY OF

AMERICAN LITERATURE

NINTH EDITION

VOLUME E: LITERATURE SINCE 1945

VOLUME A
American Literature, Beginnings to 1820 • GUSTAFSON

VOLUME B
American Literature 1820–1865 • LEVINE

VOLUME C
American Literature 1865–1914 • ELLIOTT

VOLUME D
American Literature 1914–1945
LOEFFELHOLZ

VOLUME E
American Literature since 1945
HUNGERFORD

Michael A. Elliott

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN STUDIES
EMORY UNIVERSITY

Sandra M. Gustafson

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN STUDIES
UNIVERSITY OF NOTRE DAME

Amy Hungerford

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN STUDIES
AND DIRECTOR OF THE DIVISION OF THE HUMANITIES
YALE UNIVERSITY

Mary Loeffelholz

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH
NORTHEASTERN UNIVERSITY

THE NORTON ANTHOLOGY OF
AMERICAN LITERATURE

NINTH EDITION

Robert S. Levine, General Editor

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND DISTINGUISHED UNIVERSITY PROFESSOR AND DISTINGUISHED SCHOLAR-TEACHER
University of Maryland, College Park

VOLUME E: LITERATURE SINCE 1945

W • W • NORTON & COMPANY
NEW YORK • LONDON

Contents

PREFACE xxi

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS xxxiii

American Literature since 1945

INTRODUCTION 3

TIMELINE 21

ROBERT PENN WARREN (1905–1989) 25

Bearded Oaks 27

Audubon 28

I. Was Not the Lost Dauphin 28

VI. Love and Knowledge 29

VII. Tell Me a Story 29

Mortal Limit 30

THEODORE ROETHKE (1908–1963) 30

Cuttings 32

Cuttings (later) 32

Root Cellar 32

Big Wind 33

Weed Puller 33

Frau Bauman, Frau Schmidt, and Frau Schwartz 34

Child on Top of a Greenhouse 35

My Papa's Waltz 35

Dolor 35

Night Crow 36

The Lost Son 36

The Waking 40

Elegy for Jane 41

I Knew a Woman 42

Wish for a Young Wife 42

In a Dark Time 43

EUDORA WELTY (1909–2001)	43
Petrified Man 45
ELIZABETH BISHOP (1911–1979)	54
The Man-Moth 55
The Fish 56
Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance 58
The Bight 60
At the Fishhouses 61
Questions of Travel 63
The Armadillo 64
Sestina 65
In the Waiting Room 66
The Moose 68
One Art 72
TENNESSEE WILLIAMS (1911–1983)	73
A Streetcar Named Desire 76
JOHN CHEEVER (1912–1982)	139
The Swimmer 140
ROBERT HAYDEN (1913–1980)	148
Middle Passage 150
Homage to the Empress of the Blues 155
Those Winter Sundays 155
Free Fantasia: Tiger Flowers 156
RANDALL JARRELL (1914–1965)	157
90 North 159
The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner 160
Second Air Force 160
Next Day 161
Well Water 163
Thinking of the Lost World 163
JOHN BERRYMAN (1914–1972)	165
From Homage to Mistress Bradstreet 167
The Dream Songs 173
1 (“Huffy Henry hid the day”) 173
14 (“Life, friends, is boring. We must not say so”) 174
29 (“There sat down, once, a thing on Henry’s heart”) 174
40 (“I’m scared a lonely. Never see my son”) 175
384 (“The marker slants, flowerless, day’s almost done”) 175
BERNARD MALAMUD (1914–1986)	176
The Magic Barrel 177

RALPH ELLISON (1914–1994)	189
Invisible Man 190
Prologue 190
Chapter I [Battle Royal] 197
SAUL BELLOW (1915–2005)	207
The Adventures of Augie March 209
Chapter 1 209
ARTHUR MILLER (1915–2005)	218
Death of a Salesman 221
ROBERT LOWELL (1917–1977)	286
Colloquy in Black Rock 289
The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket 290
Mr. Edwards and the Spider 293
My Last Afternoon with Uncle Devereux Winslow 295
Home after Three Months Away 298
Memories of West Street and Lepke 299
Skunk Hour 301
Night Sweat 302
For the Union Dead 303
GWENDOLYN BROOKS (1917–2000)	305
A Street in Bronzeville 306
kitchenette building 306
the mother 307
a song in the front yard 307
the white troops had their orders but the Negroes looked like men 308
The Womanhood 308
The Children of the Poor (II) 308
We Real Cool 309
The Bean Eaters 309
A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon 310
The Last Quatrain of the Ballad of Emmett Till 313
The Blackstone Rangers 313
To the Diaspora 315
PATRICIA HIGHSMITH (1921–1995)	316
The Quest for Blank Claveringi 317
RICHARD WILBUR (b. 1921)	327
The Beautiful Changes 328
The Death of a Toad 329
“A World without Objects Is a Sensible Emptiness” 329
Love Calls Us to the Things of This World 330

JACK KEROUAC (1922–1969)	331
On the Road	333
Part One, Chapter 1	333
Part Five	339
KURT VONNEGUT (1922–2007)	342
Slaughterhouse-Five	344
Chapter 1	344
GRACE PALEY (1922–2007)	355
A Conversation with My Father	356
Here	360
JAMES DICKEY (1923–1997)	361
Drowning with Others	362
The Heaven of Animals	363
Falling	364
POSTMODERN MANIFESTOS
RONALD SUKENICK: Innovative Fiction / Innovative Criteria	370
WILLIAM H. GASS: The Medium of Fiction	372
CHARLES OLSON: From Projective Verse	376
FRANK O'HARA: From Personism: A Manifesto	378
RICHARD FOREMAN: From Ontological-Hysteric Manifesto I	380
CHARLES LUDLAM: Ridiculous Theater, Scourge of Human Folly	381
A. R. AMMONS: From A Poem Is a Walk	382
AUDRE LORDE: From Poetry Is Not a Luxury	385
—————
DENISE LEVERTOV (1923–1997)	386
To the Snake	387
The Jacob's Ladder	388
In Mind	388
What Were They Like?	389
Caedmon	390
JAMES BALDWIN (1924–1987)	391
Going to Meet the Man	392
Sonny's Blues	404
FLANNERY O'CONNOR (1925–1964)	426
The Life You Save May Be Your Own	427
Good Country People	435
A Good Man Is Hard to Find	449

A. R. AMMONS (1926–2001)	460
So I Said I Am Ezra	462
Corsons Inlet	462
Easter Morning	465
Singling & Doubling Together	467
From Garbage	468
JAMES MERRILL (1926–1995)	472
An Urban Convalescence	474
The Broken Home	476
Dead Center	478
Family Week at Oracle Ranch	479
ALLEN GINSBERG (1926–1997)	485
Howl	487
Footnote to Howl	495
A Supermarket in California	495
Sunflower Sutra	496
To Aunt Rose	498
FRANK O'HARA (1926–1966)	499
To the Harbormaster	501
Why I Am Not a Painter	501
A Step Away from Them	502
The Day Lady Died	503
A True Account of Talking to the Sun at Fire Island	504
GALWAY KINNELL (1927–2014)	506
The Porcupine	507
Blackberry Eating	510
After Making Love We Hear Footsteps	510
Cemetery Angels	511
JOHN ASHBERY (b. 1927)	511
Illustration	512
Soonest Mended	514
Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror	515
Myrtle	527
W. S. MERWIN (b. 1927)	528
The Drunk in the Furnace	529
For the Anniversary of My Death	530
For a Coming Extinction	530
Losing a Language	531
Lament for the Makers	532
Ceremony after an Amputation	538

JAMES WRIGHT (1927–1980)	539
Autumn Begins in Martins Ferry, Ohio	541
To the Evening Star: Central Minnesota	541
A Blessing	542
A Centenary Ode: Inscribed to Little Crow, Leader of the Sioux Rebellion in Minnesota, 1862	542
With the Shell of a Hermit Crab	544
PHILIP LEVINE (1928–2015)	544
Animals Are Passing from Our Lives	545
Detroit Grease Shop Poem	546
Starlight	547
The Simple Truth	548
ANNE SEXTON (1928–1974)	549
The Truth the Dead Know	550
The Starry Night	550
Sylvia's Death	551
Little Girl, My String Bean, My Lovely Woman	553
The Death of the Fathers	555
2. How We Danced	555
3. The Boat	556
PHILIP K. DICK (1928–1982)	557
Precious Artifact	558
ADRIENNE RICH (1929–2012)	569
Snapshots of a Daughter-in-Law	571
"I Am in Danger—Sir—"	575
A Valediction Forbidding Mourning	576
Diving into the Wreck	577
Power	579
Transcendental Etude	580
Shattered Head	584
Five O'Clock, January 2003	585
Wait	586
URSULA K. LE GUIN (b. 1929)	587
Schrödinger's Cat	588
She Unnames Them	593
GARY SNYDER (b. 1930)	595
Milton by Firelight	596
Riprap	597
August on Sourdough, A Visit from Dick Brewer	598
Beneath My Hand and Eye the Distant Hills. Your Body	599

Ripples on the Surface	600
Falling from a Height, Holding Hands	600
DONALD BARTHELME (1931–1989)	601
The Balloon	602
TONI MORRISON (b. 1931)	605
Recitatif	607
SYLVIA PLATH (1932–1963)	620
Morning Song	622
Lady Lazarus	622
Ariel	625
Daddy	626
Words	628
Blackberrying	628
Purdah	629
The Applicant	631
Child	632
JOHN UPDIKE (1932–2009)	632
Separating	634
PHILIP ROTH (b. 1933)	642
Defender of the Faith	644
AMIRI BARAKA (LEROI JONES) (1934–2014)	666
An Agony. As Now.	667
A Poem for Willie Best	668
Will They Cry When You're Gone, You Bet	673
N. SCOTT MOMADAY (b. 1934)	673
The Way to Rainy Mountain	674
Headwaters	674
Introduction	675
IV	679
XIII	680
XVII	680
XXIV	681
Epilogue	682
Rainy Mountain Cemetery	684
AUDRE LORDE (1934–1992)	684
Coal	685
The Woman Thing	686
Black Mother Woman	687

MARY OLIVER (b. 1935)	687
The Black Snake 689
In Blackwater Woods 689
Wild Geese 690
Poppies 691
Hummingbird Pauses at the Trumpet Vine 692
Alligator Poem 693
LUCILLE CLIFTON (1936–2010)	694
miss rosie 695
the lost baby poem 696
homage to my hips 696
wild blessings 697 wishes for sons 697
blessing the boats 698
the mississippi river empties into the gulf 698 moonchild 698
[oh antic god] 699
DON DELILLO (b. 1936)	700
White Noise 702
Part II: Airborne Toxic Event 702
RUDOLFO ANAYA (b. 1937)	720
Bless Me, Ultima 721
Dos 721
THOMAS PYNCHON (b. 1937)	730
Entropy 731
RAYMOND CARVER (1938–1988)	742
Cathedral 743
ISHMAEL REED (b. 1938)	754
The Last Days of Louisiana Red 755
Chapter 36 [Mary Dalton's Dream] 755
Neo-HooDoo Manifesto 762
CHARLES SIMIC (b. 1938)	764
Fork 765
Prodigy 766
A Book Full of Pictures 767
Arriving Celebrities 767
MICHAEL S. HARPER (1938–2016)	768
Dear John, Dear Coltrane 769
American History 771

Martin's Blues	771
" Bird Lives ": Charles Parker in St. Louis	771
Nightmare Begins Responsibility	773
TONI CADE BAMBARA (1939–1995)	774
Medley	774
FRANK BIDART (b. 1939)	786
Ellen West	787
MAXINE HONG KINGSTON (b. 1940)	797
The Woman Warrior	798
No Name Woman	798
ROBERT PINSKY (b. 1940)	807
The Figured Wheel	809
The Street	810
The Want Bone	812
Shirt	813
At Pleasure Bay	814
SIMON J. ORTIZ (b. 1941)	816
Passing through Little Rock	818
Earth and Rain, the Plants & Sun	818
Vision Shadows	819
Poems from the Veterans Hospital	821
Travelling	821
From From Sand Creek	821
BILLY COLLINS (b. 1941)	822
Forgetfulness	823
Osso Buco	824
Tuesday, June 4, 1991	825
I Chop Some Parsley While Listening to Art Blakey's Version of "Three Blind Mice"	827
The Night House	828
Litany	829
Sonnet	830
GLORIA ANZALDÚA (1942–2004)	831
La conciencia de la mestiza / Towards a New Consciousness	832
How to Tame a Wild Tongue	843
El sonavabitché	852
SHARON OLDS (b. 1942)	856
Sex Without Love	857
I Go Back to May 1937	857

Little Things	858
My Father Speaks to Me from the Dead	858
Adolescence	859
The Talkers	860
SAM SHEPARD (b. 1943)	861
True West	862
LOUISE GLÜCK (b. 1943)	902
The Drowned Children	903
Descending Figure	904
2 The Sick Child	904
3 For My Sister	904
Appearances	905
Vespers	906
October	907
ALICE WALKER (b. 1944)	912
Everyday Use	913
AUGUST WILSON (1945–2005)	919
Fences	921
ANNIE DILLARD (b. 1945)	967
Pilgrim at Tinker Creek	968
Seeing	968
LYDIA DAVIS (b. 1947)	980
Break It Down	981
The Outing	985
Happiest Moment	985
Letter to a Funeral Parlor	985
ANN BEATTIE (b. 1947)	986
Weekend	987
DAVID MAMET (b. 1947)	999
Glengarry Glen Ross	1001
YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA (b. 1947)	1034
Facing It	1036
My Father's Love Letters	1036
Slam, Dunk, & Hook	1037
Song for My Father	1038
[Sometimes you could be]	1038
When Dusk Weighs Daybreak	1039
Jasmine	1039
Nude Study	1040

LESLIE MARMON SILKO (b. 1948)	1041
Lullaby	1042
ART SPIEGELMAN (b. 1948)	1049
From Maus	1050
JOY HARJO (b. 1951)	1067
Call It Fear	1068
White Bear	1069
Summer Night	1070
The Flood	1071
When the World As We Knew It Ended—	1073
EDWARD P. JONES (b. 1951)	1075
The First Day	1076
RITA DOVE (b. 1952)	1079
Geometry	1081
Adolescence—I	1081
Adolescence—II	1081
Adolescence—III	1082
Parsley	1083
Thomas and Beulah	1085
The Event	1085
The Zeppelin Factory	1086
Dusting	1086
Poem in Which I Refuse Contemplation	1087
Missing	1088
Rosa	1089
Fox Trot Fridays	1089
AMY TAN (b. 1952)	1090
The Joy Luck Club	1091
Two Kinds	1091
SANDRA CISNEROS (b. 1954)	1100
Woman Hollering Creek	1101
LOUISE ERDRICH (b. 1954)	1109
Dear John Wayne	1110
I Was Sleeping Where the Black Oaks Move	1111
Grief	1112
Fleur	1112
LI-YOUNG LEE (b. 1957)	1122
The Gift	1122
Persimmons	1123
Eating Alone	1125

Eating Together 1126
 This Room and Everything in It 1126
 Nativity 1128

CREATIVE NONFICTION

EDWARD ABBEY: Havasu 1129
 BARRY LOPEZ: The Raven 1135
 JAMAICA KINCAID: Girl 1137
 HUNTER S. THOMPSON: From Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas 1139
 JOAN DIDION: From Slouching Towards Bethlehem 1141
 DAVID FOSTER WALLACE: From Consider the Lobster 1144
 EDWIDGE DANTICAT: From Brother, I'm Dying 1149

GEORGE SAUNDERS (b. 1958) 1152
 CivilWarLand in Bad Decline 1153

SHERMAN ALEXIE (b. 1966) 1165
 At Navajo Monument Valley Tribal School 1166
 Pawn Shop 1167
 Sister Fire, Brother Smoke 1168
 Tourists 1168
 3. Marilyn Monroe 1168
 The Exaggeration of Despair 1169
 Crow Testament 1170
 This Is What It Means to Say Phoenix, Arizona 1172
 Survivorman 1180

NATASHA TRETHERWEY (b. 1966) 1181
 Vignette 1183
 Graveyard Blues 1184
 Photograph: Ice Storm, 1971 1184
 Native Guard 1185
 Miracle of the Black Leg 1189

JHUMPA LAHIRI (b. 1967) 1190
 Sexy 1192

JUNOT DÍAZ (b. 1968) 1207
 Drown 1208

TRACY K. SMITH (b. 1972) 1216
 Thirst 1217
 Gospel: Juan 1218
 Gospel: Jesús 1219

“My God, It’s Full of Stars”	1219
3. [Perhaps the great error is believing we’re alone]	1219
The Universe: Original Motion Picture Soundtrack	1220

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHIES	E1
PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	E29
INDEX	E37

Preface to the Ninth Edition

The Ninth Edition of The Norton Anthology of American Literature is the first for me as General Editor; for the Eighth Edition, I served as Associate General Editor under longstanding General Editor Nina Baym. On the occasion of a new general editorship, we have undertaken one of the most extensive revisions in our long publishing history. Three new section editors have joined the team: Sandra M. Gustafson, Professor of English and Concurrent Professor of American Studies at the University of Notre Dame, who succeeds Wayne Franklin and Philip Gura as editor of “American Literature, Beginnings to 1820”; Michael A. Elliott, Professor of English at Emory University, who succeeds Nina Baym, Robert S. Levine, and Jeanne Campbell Reesman as editor of “American Literature, 1865–1914”; and Amy Hungerford, Professor of English and American Studies at Yale University, who succeeds Jerome Klinkowitz and Patricia B. Wallace as editor of “American Literature since 1945.” These editors join Robert S. Levine, editor of “American Literature, 1820–1865,” and Mary Loeffelholz, editor of “American Literature, 1914–1945.” Each editor, new or continuing, is a well-known expert in the relevant field or period and has ultimate responsibility for his or her section of the anthology, but we have worked closely from first to last to rethink all aspects of this new edition. Volume introductions, author headnotes, thematic clusters, annotations, illustrations, and bibliographies have all been updated and revised. We have also added a number of new authors, selections, and thematic clusters. We are excited about the outcome of our collaboration and anticipate that, like the previous eight editions, this edition of The Norton Anthology of American Literature will continue to lead the field.

From the anthology’s inception in 1979, the editors have had three main aims: first, to present a rich and substantial enough variety of works to enable teachers to build courses according to their own vision of American literary history (thus, teachers are offered more authors and more selections than they will probably use in any one course); second, to make the anthology self-sufficient by featuring many works in their entirety along with extensive selections for individual authors; third, to balance traditional interests with developing critical concerns in a way that allows for the complex, rigorous, and capacious study of American literary traditions. As early as 1979, we anthologized work by Anne Bradstreet, Mary Rowlandson, Sarah Kemble Knight, Phillis Wheatley, Margaret Fuller, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Frederick Douglass, Sarah Orne Jewett, Kate Chopin, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Booker T. Washington, Charles W. Chesnutt, Edith Wharton,

W. E. B. Du Bois, and other writers who were not yet part of a standard canon. Yet we never shortchanged writers—such as Franklin, Emerson, Whitman, Hawthorne, Melville, Dickinson, Hemingway, Fitzgerald, and Faulkner—whose work many students expected to read in their American literature courses, and whom most teachers then and now would not think of doing without.

The so-called canon wars of the 1980s and 1990s usefully initiated a review of our understanding of American literature, a review that has enlarged the number and diversity of authors now recognized as contributors to the totality of American literature. The traditional writers look different in this expanded context, and they also appear different according to which of their works are selected. Teachers and students remain committed to the idea of the literary—that writers strive to produce artifacts that are both intellectually serious and formally skillful—but believe more than ever that writers should be understood in relation to their cultural and historical situations. We address the complex interrelationships between literature and history in the volume introductions, author headnotes, chronologies, and some of the footnotes. As in previous editions, we have worked with detailed suggestions from many teachers on how best to present the authors and selections. We have gained insights as well from the students who use the anthology. Thanks to questionnaires, face-to-face and phone discussions, letters, and email, we have been able to listen to those for whom this book is intended. For the Ninth Edition, we have drawn on the careful commentary of over 240 reviewers and reworked aspects of the anthology accordingly.

Our new materials continue the work of broadening the canon by representing thirteen new writers in depth, without sacrificing widely assigned writers, many of whose selections have been reconsidered, reselected, and expanded. Our aim is always to provide extensive enough selections to do the writers justice, including complete works wherever possible. Our Ninth Edition offers complete longer works, including Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter and Kate Chopin's The Awakening, and such new and recently added works as Margaret Fuller's The Great Lawsuit, Abraham Cahan's Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto, Nella Larsen's Passing, Katherine Anne Porter's Pale Horse, Pale Rider, Nathanael West's The Day of the Locust, and August Wilson's Fences. Two complete works—Eugene O'Neill's Long Day's Journey into Night and Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire—are exclusive to The Norton Anthology of American Literature. Charles Brockden Brown, Louisa May Alcott, Upton Sinclair, and Junot Díaz are among the writers added to the prior edition, and to this edition we have introduced John Rollin Ridge, Constance Fenimore Woolson, George Saunders, and Natasha Tretheway, among others. We have also expanded and in some cases reconfigured such central figures as Franklin, Hawthorne, Dickinson, Twain, and Hemingway, offering new approaches in the headnotes, along with some new selections. In fact, the headnotes and, in many cases, selections for such frequently assigned authors as William Bradford, Washington Irving, James Fenimore Cooper, William Cullen Bryant, Lydia Maria Child, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mark Twain, William Dean Howells, Henry James, Kate Chopin, W. E. B. Du Bois, Edith Wharton, Willa Cather, and William Faulkner have been revised, updated, and in some cases entirely rewritten in light of recent scholarship. The Ninth Edition further expands its selections of women writers and writers from diverse ethnic, racial, and regional backgrounds—always with attention to the critical acclaim that recognizes their contributions to the American literary record. New and recently added writers such as Samson Occom, Jane Johnston Schoolcraft, John Rollin Ridge, and Sarah Winnemucca, along with the figures represented in “Voices from Native America,” enable teachers to bring early Native American writing and oratory into their syllabi, or should they prefer, to focus on these selections as a freestanding unit leading toward the moment after 1945 when Native writers fully entered the mainstream of literary activity.

We are pleased to continue our popular innovation of topical gatherings of short texts that illuminate the cultural, historical, intellectual, and literary concerns of their respective periods. Designed to be taught in a class period or two, or used as background, each of the sixteen clusters consists of brief, carefully excerpted primary and (in one case) secondary texts, about six to ten per cluster, and an introduction. Diverse voices—many new to the anthology—highlight a range of views current when writers of a particular time period were active, and thus allow students better to understand some of the large issues that were being debated at particular historical moments. For example, in “Slavery, Race, and the Making of American Literature,” texts by David Walker, William Lloyd Garrison, Angelina Grimké, Sojourner Truth, James M. Whitfield, and Martin R. Delany speak to the great paradox of pre-Civil War America: the contradictory rupture between the realities of slavery and the nation’s ideals of freedom.

The Ninth Edition strengthens this feature with eight new and revised clusters attuned to the requests of teachers. To help students address the controversy over race and aesthetics in Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, we have revised a cluster in Volume C that shows what some of the leading critics of the past few decades thought was at stake in reading and interpreting slavery and race in Twain’s canonical novel. New to Volume A is “American Literature and the Varieties of Religious Expression,” which includes selections by Elizabeth Ashbridge, John Woolman, and John Marrant, while Volume B offers “Science and Technology in the Pre-Civil War Nation.” Volume C newly features “Becoming American in the Gilded Age,” and we continue to include the useful “Modernist Manifestos” in Volume D. We have added to the popular “Creative Nonfiction” in Volume E new selections by David Foster Wallace and Hunter S. Thompson, who join such writers as Jamaica Kincaid and Joan Didion.

The Ninth Edition features an expanded illustration program, both of the black-and-white images, 145 of which are placed throughout the volumes, and of the color plates so popular in the last two editions. In selecting color plates—from Elizabeth Graham’s embroidered map of Washington, D.C., at the start of the nineteenth century to Jeff Wall’s “After ‘Invisible Man’” at the beginning of the twenty-first—the editors aim to provide images relevant to literary works in the anthology while depicting arts and artifacts representative of each era. In addition, graphic works—segments from the colonial children’s classic The New-England Primer and from Art Spiegelman’s canonical graphic novel, Maus, and a facsimile page of Emily Dickinson manuscript, along with the many new illustrations—open possibilities for teaching visual texts.

Period-by-Period Revisions

Volume A, Beginnings to 1820. Sandra M. Gustafson, the new editor of Volume A, has substantially revised the volume. Prior editions of Volume A were broken into two historical sections, with two introductions and a dividing line at the year 1700; Gustafson has dropped that artificial divide to tell a more coherent and fluid story (in her new introduction) about the variety of American literatures during this long period. The volume continues to feature narratives by early European explorers of the North American continent as they encountered and attempted to make sense of the diverse cultures they met, and as they sought to justify their aim of claiming the territory for Europeans. These are precisely the issues foregrounded by the revised cluster “First Encounters: Early European Accounts of Native America,” which gathers writings by Hernán Cortés, Samuel de Champlain, Robert Juet, and others, including the newly added Thomas Harriot. In addition to the standing material from The Bay Psalm Book, we include new material by Roger Williams; additional poems by Annis Boudinot Stockton; Abigail Adams’s famous letter urging her husband to “Remember the Ladies”; an additional selection from Olaudah Equiano on his post-emancipation travels; and Charles Brockden Brown’s “Memoirs of Carwin the Biloquist” (the complete “prequel” to his first novel, Wieland). We continue to offer the complete texts of Rowlandson’s enormously influential A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, Benjamin Franklin’s Autobiography (which remains one of the most compelling works on the emergence of an “American” self), Royall Tyler’s popular play The Contrast, and Hannah Foster’s novel The Coquette, which uses a real-life tragedy to meditate on the proper role of well-bred women in the new republic and testifies to the existence of a female audience for the popular novels of the period. New to this volume is Washington Irving, a writer who looks back to colonial history and forward to Jacksonian America. The inclusion of Irving in both Volumes A and B, with one key overlapping selection, points to continuities and changes between the two volumes.

Five new and revised thematic clusters of texts highlight themes central to Volume A. In addition to “First Encounters,” we have included “Native American Oral Literature,” “American Literature and the Varieties of Religious Expression,” “Ethnographic and Naturalist Writings,” and “Native American Eloquence: Negotiation and Resistance.” “Native American Oral Literature” features creation stories, trickster tales, oratory, and poetry from a spectrum of traditions, while “Native American Eloquence” collects speeches and accounts by Canassatego and Native American women (both new to the volume), Pontiac, Chief Logan (as cited by Thomas Jefferson), and Tecumseh, which, as a group, illustrate the centuries-long pattern of initial peaceful contact between Native Americans and whites mutating into bitter and violent conflict. This cluster, which focuses on Native Americans’ points of view, complements “First Encounters,” which focuses on European colonizers’ points of view. The Native American presence in the volume is further expanded with increased representation of Samson Occom, which includes an excerpt from his sermon at the execution of Moses Paul, and the inclusion of Sagoyewatha in “American Literature and the Varieties of Religious Expression.” Strategically located between the Congregationalist Protestant (or late-Puritan) Jonathan Edwards and the Enlightenment figure Franklin, this cluster brings together works from the perspectives of the major religious groups of the early Americas, including Quakerism (poems by Francis Daniel Pastorius, selections from autographical narratives of Elizabeth Ashbridge and John Woolman), Roman Catholicism (poems by Sor Juana, two Jesuit Relations, with biographical accounts of Father Isaac Jogues and Kateri Tekakwitha), dissenting Protestantism (Marrant), Judaism (Rebecca Samuel), and indigenous beliefs (Sagoyewatha). The new cluster “Ethnographic and Naturalist Writings” includes writings by Sarah Kemble Knight and William Byrd, along with new selections by Alexander Hamilton, William Bartram, and Hendrick Aupaumut. With this cluster, the new cluster on science and technology in Volume B, and a number of new selections and revisions in Volumes C, D, and E, the Ninth Edition pays greater attention to the impact of science on American literary traditions.

Volume B, American Literature, 1820–1865. Under the editorship of Robert S. Levine, this volume over the past several editions has become more diverse. Included here are the complete texts of Emerson’s Nature, Hawthorne’s Scarlet Letter, Thoreau’s Walden, Douglass’s Narrative, Whitman’s Song of Myself, Melville’s Benito Cereno and Billy Budd, Rebecca Harding Davis’s Life in the Iron Mills, and Margaret Fuller’s The Great Lawsuit. At the same time, aware of the important role of African American writers in the period, and the omnipresence of race and slavery as literary and political themes, we have recently added two major African American writers, William Wells Brown and Frances E. W. Harper, along with Douglass’s novella The Heroic Slave. Thoreau’s “Plea for Captain John Brown,” a generous selection from Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, and the cluster “Slavery, Race, and the Making of American Literature” also help remind students of how central slavery was to the literary and political life of the nation during this period. “Native Americans: Resistance and Removal” gathers oratory and writings—by Native Americans such as Black Hawk and whites such as Ralph Waldo Emerson—protesting Andrew Jackson’s ruthless national policy of Indian removal. Newly added is a selection from The Life and Adventures of Joaquín Murieta, by the Native American writer John Rollin Ridge. This potboiler of a novel, set in the new state of California, emerged from the debates that began during the Indian removal period. Through the figure of the legendary Mexican bandit Murieta, who fights back against white expansionists, Ridge responds to the violence encouraged by Jackson and subsequent white leaders as they laid claim to the continent. Political themes, far from diluting the literary imagination of American authors, served to inspire some of the most memorable writing of the pre-Civil War period.

Women writers recently added to Volume B include Lydia Huntley Sigourney, the Native American writer Jane Johnston Schoolcraft, and Louisa May Alcott. Recently added prose fiction includes chapters from Cooper’s The Last of the Mohicans, Sedgwick’s Hope Leslie, and Melville’s Moby-Dick, along with Poe’s “The Black Cat” and Hawthorne’s “Wakefield.”

For the first time in the print edition, we include Melville's "Hawthorne and His Mosses" as it appeared in the 1850 Literary World. Poetry by Emily Dickinson is now presented in the texts established by R. W. Franklin and includes a facsimile page from Fascicle 10. For this edition we have added several poems by Dickinson that were inspired by the Civil War. Other selections added to this edition include Fanny Fern's amusing sketch "Writing 'Compositions,'" the chapter in Frederick Douglass's My Bondage and My Freedom on his resistance to the slave-breaker Covey, three poems by Melville ("Dupont's Round Fight," "A Utilitarian View of the Monitor's Fight," and "Art"), and Whitman's "The Sleepers."

Perhaps the most significant addition to Volume B is the cluster "Science and Technology in the Pre-Civil War Nation," with selections by the canonical writers Charles Dickens, Edgar Allan Poe, and Frederick Douglass, by the scientists Jacob Bigelow and Alexander Humboldt, and by the editor-writer Harriet Farley. The cluster calls attention to the strong interest in science and technology throughout this period and should provide a rich context for reconsidering works such as Thoreau's Walden and Melville's "The Paradise of Bachelors and the Tartarus of Maids." In an effort to underscore the importance of science and technology to Poe and Hawthorne in particular, we have added two stories that directly address these topics: Poe's "The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar" and Hawthorne's "The Artist of the Beautiful" (which reads nicely in relation to his "The Birth-Mark" and "Rappaccini's Daughter"). Emerson, Whitman, and Dickinson are among the many other authors in Volume B who had considerable interest in science.

Volume C, American Literature, 1865–1914. Newly edited by Michael A. Elliott, the volume includes expanded selections of key works, as well as new ones that illustrate how many of the struggles of this period prefigure our own. In addition to complete longer works such as Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Chopin's The Awakening, James's Daisy Miller, and Stephen Crane's Maggie: A Girl of the Streets, the Ninth Edition now includes the complete text of Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto, a highly influential novella of immigrant life that depicts the pressures facing newly arrived Jews in the nation's largest metropolis. Also new is a substantial selection from Sarah Orne Jewett's The Country of the Pointed Firs, a masterpiece of literary regionalism that portrays a remote seaside community facing change.

Americans are still reflecting on the legacy of the Civil War, and we have added two works approaching that subject from different angles. Constance Fenimore Woolson's "Rodman the Keeper" tells the story of a Union veteran who maintains a cemetery in the South. In "The Private History of a Campaign That Failed," Mark Twain reflects with wit and insight on his own brief experience in the war. In the Eighth Edition, we introduced a section on the critical controversy surrounding race and the conclusion of Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. That section remains as important as ever, and new additions incorporate a recent debate about the value of an expurgated edition of the novel.

We have substantially revised clusters designed to give students a sense of the cultural context of the period. New selections in "Realism and Naturalism" demonstrate what was at stake in the debate over realism, among them a feminist response from Charlotte Perkins Gilman. "Becoming American in the Gilded Age,” a new cluster, introduces students to writing about wealth and citizenship at a time when the nation was undergoing transformation. Selections from one of Horatio Alger’s popular novels of economic uplift, Andrew Carnegie’s “Gospel of Wealth,” and Charles W. Chesnutt’s “The Future American” together reveal how questions about the composition of the nation both influenced the literature of this period and prefigured contemporary debates on immigration, cultural diversity, and the concentration of wealth.

The turn of the twentieth century was a time of immense literary diversity. “Voices from Native America” brings together a variety of expressive forms—oratory, memoir, ethnography—through which Native Americans sought to represent themselves. It includes new selections by Francis LaFlesche, Zitkala Ša, and Chief Joseph. For the first time, we include the complete text of José Martí’s “Our America,” in a new translation by Martí biographer Alfred J. López. By instructor request, we have added fiction and nonfiction by African American authors: Charles W. Chesnutt’s “Po’ Sandy,” Pauline Hopkins’s “Talma Gordon,” and expanded selections from W. E. B. Du Bois’s Souls of Black Folk and James Weldon Johnson’s Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man.

Volume D, American Literature 1914–1945. Edited by Mary Loeffelholz, Volume D offers a number of complete longer works—Eugene O’Neill’s Long Day’s Journey into Night (exclusive to the Norton Anthology), William Faulkner’s As I Lay Dying, and Willa Cather’s My Ántonia. To these we have added Nella Larsen’s Passing, which replaces Quicksand, and Nathanael West’s The Day of the Locust. We added Passing in response to numerous requests from instructors and students who regard it as one of the most compelling treatments of racial passing in American literature. The novel also offers rich descriptions of the social and racial geographies of Chicago and New York City. West’s darkly comic The Day of the Locust similarly offers rich descriptions of the social and racial geography of Los Angeles. West’s novel can at times seem bleak and not “politically correct,” but in many ways it is the first great American novel about the film industry, and it also has much to say about the growth of California in the early decades of the twentieth century. New selections by Zora Neale Hurston (“Sweat”) and John Steinbeck (“The Chrysanthemums”) further contribute to the volume’s exploration of issues connected with racial and social geographies.

Selections by Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Marianne Moore, Hart Crane, and Langston Hughes encourage students and teachers to contemplate the interrelation of modernist aesthetics with ethnic, regional, and popular writing. In “Modernist Manifestos,” F. T. Marinetti, Mina Loy, Ezra Pound, Willa Cather, William Carlos Williams, and Langston Hughes show how the manifesto as a form exerted a powerful influence on international modernism in all the arts. Another illuminating cluster addresses central events of the modern period. In “World War I and Its Aftermath,” writings by Ernest Hemingway, Gertrude Stein, Jessie Redmon Fauset, and others explore sharply divided views on the U.S. role in World War I, as well as the radicalizing effect of modern warfare—with 365,000 American casualties—on contemporary writing. We have added to this edition a chapter from Hemingway’s first novel, The Sun Also Rises, which speaks to the impact of the war on sexuality and gender. Other recent and new additions to Volume D include Faulkner's popular "A Rose for Emily," Katherine Anne Porter's novella Pale Horse, Pale Rider, Gertrude Stein's "Objects," Marianne Moore's ambitious longer poem "Marriage," poems by Edgar Lee Masters and Edwin Arlington Robinson, and Jean Toomer's "Blood Burning Moon."

Volume E, American Literature, 1945 to the Present. Amy Hungerford, the new editor of Volume E, has revised the volume to present a wider range of writing in poetry, prose, drama, and nonfiction. As before, the volume offers the complete texts of Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire (exclusive to this anthology), Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, Allen Ginsberg's Howl, Sam Shepard's True West, August Wilson's Fences, David Mamet's Glengarry Glen Ross, and Louise Glück's long poem October. A selection from Art Spiegelman's prize-winning Maus opens possibilities for teaching the graphic novel. We also include teachable stand-alone segments from influential novels by Saul Bellow (The Adventures of Augie March) and Kurt Vonnegut (Slaughterhouse-Five), and, new to this edition, Jack Kerouac (On the Road) and Don DeLillo (White Noise). The selection from one of DeLillo's most celebrated novels tells what feels like a contemporary story about a nontraditional family navigating an environmental disaster in a climate saturated by mass media. Three newly added stories—Patricia Highsmith's "The Quest for Blank Claveringi," Philip K. Dick's "Precious Artifact," and George Saunders's "CivilWarLand in Bad Decline"—reveal the impact of science fiction, fantasy, horror, and (especially in the case of Saunders) mass media on literary fiction. Also appearing for the first time are Edward P. Jones and Lydia Davis, contemporary masters of the short story, who join such short fiction writers as Ann Beattie and Junot Díaz. Recognized literary figures in all genres, ranging from Robert Penn Warren and Elizabeth Bishop to Leslie Marmon Silko and Toni Morrison, continue to be richly represented. In response to instructors' requests, we now include Flannery O'Connor's "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" and James Baldwin's "Sonny's Blues."

One of the most distinctive features of twentieth- and twenty-first-century American literature is a rich vein of African American poetry. This edition adds two contemporary poets from this living tradition: Natasha Trethewey and Tracy K. Smith. Trethewey's selections include personal and historical elegies; Smith draws on cultural materials as diverse as David Bowie's music and the history of the Hubble Space Telescope. These writers join African American poets whose work has long helped define the anthology—Rita Dove, Gwendolyn Brooks, Robert Hayden, Audre Lorde, and others.

This edition gives even greater exposure to literary and social experimentation during the 1960s, 1970s, and beyond. The work of two avant-garde playwrights joins "Postmodern Manifestos" (which pairs nicely with "Modernist Manifestos" in Volume D). Introduced to the anthology through their short, challenging pieces, Charles Ludlam and Richard Foreman cast the mechanics of performance in a new light. Reading their thought pieces in relation to the volume's complete plays helps raise new questions about how the seemingly more traditional dramatic works engage structures of time, plot, feeling, and spectatorship. To our popular cluster "Creative Nonfiction" we have added a new selection by Joan Didion, from "Slouching Towards Bethlehem,” which showcases her revolutionary style of journalism as she comments on experiments with public performance and communal living during the 1960s. A new selection from David Foster Wallace in the same cluster pushes reportage on the Maine Lobster Festival into philosophical inquiry: how can we fairly assess the pain of other creatures? This edition also introduces poet Frank Bidart through his most famous work—Ellen West—in which the poet uses experimental forms of verse he pioneered during the 1970s to speak in the voice of a woman battling anorexia. Standing authors in the anthology, notably John Ashbery and Amiri Baraka, fill out the volume’s survey of radical change in the forms, and social uses, of literary art.

We are delighted to offer this revised Ninth Edition to teachers and students, and we welcome your comments.

Additional Resources from the Publisher

The Ninth Edition retains the paperback splits format, popular for its flexibility and portability. This format accommodates the many instructors who use the anthology in a two-semester survey, but allows for mixing and matching the five volumes in a variety of courses organized by period or topic, at levels from introductory to advanced. We are also pleased to offer the Ninth Edition in an ebook format. The Digital Anthologies include all the content of the print volumes, with print-corresponding page and line numbers for seamless integration into the print-digital mixed classroom. Annotations are accessible with a click or a tap, encouraging students to use them with minimal interruption to their reading of the text. The e-reading platform facilitates active reading with a powerful annotation tool and allows students to do a full-text search of the anthology and read online or off. The Digital Editions can be accessed from any computer or device with an Internet browser and are available to students at a fraction of the print price at digital.wwnorton.com/americanlit9pre1865 and digital.wwnorton.com/americanlit9post1865. For exam copy access to the Digital Editions and for information on making the Digital Editions available through the campus bookstore or packaging the Digital Editions with the print anthology, instructors should contact their Norton representative.

To give instructors even more flexibility, Norton is making available the full list of 254 Norton Critical Editions. A Norton Critical Edition can be included for free with either package (Volumes A and B; Volumes C, D, E) or any individual split volume. Each Norton Critical Edition gives students an authoritative, carefully annotated text accompanied by rich contextual and critical materials prepared by an expert in the subject. The publisher also offers the much-praised guide Writing about American Literature, by Karen Gocsik (University of California—San Diego) and Coleman Hutchison (University of Texas—Austin), free with either package or any individual split volume.

In addition to the Digital Editions, for students using The Norton Anthology of American Literature, the publisher provides a wealth of free resources at digital.wwnorton.com/americanlit9pre1865 and digital.wwnorton.com/americanlit9post1865. There students will find more than seventy reading-comprehension quizzes on the period introductions and widely taught works with extensive feedback that points them back to the text. Ideal for self-study or homework assignments, Norton's sophisticated quizzing engine allows instructors to track student results and improvement. For over thirty works in the anthology, the sites also offer Close Reading Workshops that walk students step-by-step through analysis of a literary work. Each workshop prompts students to read, reread, consider contexts, and answer questions along the way, making these perfect assignments to build close-reading skills.

The publisher also provides extensive instructor-support materials. New to the Ninth Edition is an online Interactive Instructor's Guide at iig.wwnorton.com/americanlit9/full. Invaluable for course preparation, this resource provides hundreds of teaching notes, discussion questions, and suggested resources from the much-praised Teaching with The Norton Anthology of American Literature: A Guide for Instructors by Edward Whitley (Lehigh University). Also at this searchable and sortable site are quizzes, images, and lecture PowerPoints for each introduction, topic cluster, and twenty-five widely taught works. A PDF of Teaching with NAAL is available for download at wnorton.com/instructors.

Finally, Norton Coursepacks bring high-quality digital media into a new or existing online course. The coursepack includes all the reading comprehension quizzes (customizable within the coursepack), the Writing about Literature video series, a bank of essay and exam questions, bulleted summaries of the period introductions, and "Making Connections" discussion or essay prompts to encourage students to draw connections across the anthology's authors and works. Coursepacks are available in a variety of formats, including Blackboard, Canvas, Desire2Learn, and Moodle, at no cost to instructors or students.

Editorial Procedures

As in past editions, editorial features—period introductions, headnotes, annotations, and bibliographies—are designed to be concise yet full and to give students necessary information without imposing a single interpretation. The editors have updated all apparatus in response to new scholarship: period introductions have been entirely or substantially rewritten, as have many headnotes. All selected bibliographies and each period's general-resources bibliographies, categorized by Reference Works, Histories, and Literary Criticism, have been thoroughly updated. The Ninth Edition retains three editorial features that help students place their reading in historical and cultural context—a Texts/Contexts timeline following each period introduction, a map on the front endpaper of each volume, and a chronological chart, on the back endpaper, showing the lifespans of many of the writers anthologized.

Whenever possible, our policy has been to reprint texts as they appeared in their historical moment. There is one exception: we have modernized most spellings and (very sparingly) the punctuation in Volume A on the principle that archaic spellings and typography pose unnecessary problems for beginning students. We have used square brackets to indicate titles supplied by the editors for the convenience of students. Whenever a portion of a text has been omitted, we have indicated that omission with three asterisks.

If the omitted portion is important for following the plot or argument, we give a brief summary within the text or in a footnote. After each work, we cite the date of first publication on the right; in some instances, the latter is followed by the date of a revised edition for which the author was responsible. When the date of composition is known and differs from the date of publication, we cite it on the left.

The editors have benefited from commentary offered by hundreds of teachers throughout the country. Those teachers who prepared detailed critiques, or who offered special help in preparing texts, are listed under Acknowledgments, on a separate page. We also thank the many people at Norton who contributed to the Ninth Edition: Julia Reidhead, who supervised the Ninth Edition; Marian Johnson, managing editor, college; Carly Fraser Doria, media editor; Kurt Wildermuth, Michael Fleming, Harry Haskell, and Candace Levy, manuscript editors; Rachel Taylor and Ava Bramson, assistant editors; Sean Mintus, production manager; Cat Abelman, photo editor; Julie Tesser, photo researcher; Debra Morton Hoyt, art director; Tiani Kennedy, cover designer; Megan Jackson Schindel, permissions manager; and Margaret Gorenstein, who cleared permissions. We also wish to acknowledge our debt to the late George P. Brockway, former president and chairman at Norton, who invented this anthology, and to the late M. H. Abrams, Norton's advisor on English texts. All have helped us create an anthology that, more than ever, testifies to the continuing richness of American literary traditions.

ROBERT S. LEVINE, General Editor

Acknowledgments

Among our many critics, advisors, and friends, the following were of especial help toward the preparation of the Ninth Edition, either with advice or by providing critiques of particular periods of the anthology: Melissa Adams-Campbell (Northern Illinois University); Rolena Adorno (Yale University); Heidi Ajrami (Victoria College); Simone A. James Alexander (Seton Hall University); Brian Anderson (Central Piedmont Community College); Lena Andersson (Fulton-Montgomery Community College); Marilyn Judith Atlas (Ohio University); Sylvia Baer (Gloucester County College); George H. Bailey (Northern Essex Community College); Margarita T. Barceló (MSU Denver); Peter Bellis (University of Alabama–Birmingham); Randall Blankenship (Valencia College); Susanne Bloomfield (University of Nebraska–Kearney); David Bordelon (Ocean County College); Patricia Bostian (Central Piedmont Community College); Maria Brandt (Monroe Community College); Tamara Ponzo Brattoli (Joliet Junior College); Joanna Brooks (San Diego State University); David Brottman (Iowa State University); Arthur Brown (University of Evansville); Martin Brückner (University of Delaware); Judith Budz (Fitchburg State University); Dan Butcher (University of Alabama–Birmingham); Maria J. Cahill (Edison State College); Ann Cameron (Indiana University–Kokomo); Brad Campbell (Cal Poly); Mark Canada (University of North Carolina–Pembroke); Gerry Canavan (Marquette University); Ann Capel (Gadsden State Community College, Ayers Campus); Elisabeth Ceppi (Portland State University); Tom Cerasulo (Elms College); Mark Cirino (University of Evansville); Josh Cohen (Emory University); Matt Cohen (University of Texas–Austin); William Corley (Cal Poly Pomona and U.S. Naval Academy); David Cowart (University of South Carolina); Paul Crumbley (Utah State University); Ryan Cull (New Mexico State University); Sue Currell (University of Sussex); Kathleen Danker (South Dakota State University); Clark Davis (University of Denver); Eve Davis (Virginia Union University); Matthew R. Davis (University of Wisconsin–Stevens Point); Laura Dawkins (Murray State University); Bruce J. Degi (Metropolitan State University of Denver); Jerry DeNuccio (Graceland University); Lisa DeVries (Victoria College); Lorraine C. DiCicco (King's University College); Joshua A. Dickson (SUNY Jefferson); Rick Diguette (Georgia Perimeter College); Raymond F. Dolle (Indiana State University); James Donelan (UC Santa Barbara); Clark Draney (College of Southern Idaho); John Dudley (University of South Dakota); Sara Eaton (North Central College); Julia Eichelberger (College of Charleston); Marilyn Elkins (California State University–Los Angeles); Sharyn Emery (Indiana

University Southeast); Hilary Emmett (University of East Anglia); Terry Engebresten (Idaho State University); Patrick Erben (University of West Georgia); Timothy J. Evans (College of William & Mary); Duncan Faherty (CUNY); Laura Fine (Meredith College); Daniel Fineman (Occidental College); Pat Gantt (Utah State University); Xiongya Gao (Southern University at New Orleans); Becky Jo Gesteland (Weber State University); Paul Gilmore (Rutgers University); Len Gougeon (University of Scranton); Carey Goyette (Clinton Community College); Sarah Graham (University of Leicester); Alan Gravano (Marshall University); James N. Green (Library Company of Philadelphia); Laura Morgan Green (Northeastern University); John Gruesser (Kean University); Bernabe G. Gutierrez (Laredo Community College); Julia Hans (Fitchburg State University); Stephanie Hawkins (University of North Texas); Catherine F. Heath (Victoria College); Roger Hechy (SUNY Oneonta); Terry Heller (Coe College); Carl Herzig (St. Ambrose University); Eric Heyne (University of Alaska–Fairbanks); Thomas Alan Holmes (East Tennessee State University); Greg Horn (Southwest Virginia Community College); Ruth Y. Hsu (University of Hawaii–Manoa); Kate Huber (Temple University); Zach Hutchins (Colorado State University); Thomas Irwin (University of Missouri–St. Louis); Elizabeth Janoski (Lackawanna College); Andrew Jenkins (College of Central Florida); Luke Johnson (Mesabi Range College); Mark Johnson (San Jacinto College); Paul Jones (Ohio University); Roger Walton Jones (Ranger College); Jennifer Jordan-Henley (Roane State Community College); Mark Kamrath (University of Central Florida); Rachel Key (El Centro College); Julie H. Kim (Northeastern Illinois University); Vincent King (Black Hills State University); Denis Kohn (Baldwin Wallace University); Gary Konas (University of Wisconsin–La Crosse); Michael Kowalewski (Carleton College); Michael Lackey (University of Minnesota–Morris); Jennifer Ladino (University of Idaho); Thomas W. LaFleur (Laredo Community College); Andrew Lanham (Yale University); Christopher Leise (Whitman College); Beth Leishman (Northwest MS Community College); Jennifer Levi (Cecil College); Alfred J. López (Purdue University); Paul Madachy (Prince George’s Community College); Etta Madden (Missouri State University); Marc Malandra (Biola University); David Malone (Union University); Matt Martin (Wesleyan College); Stephen Mathewson (Central New Mexico Community College); Liz Thompson Mayo (Jackson State Community College); David McCracken (Coker College); Kathleen McDonald (Norwich University); John McGreevy (University of Notre Dame); Dana McMichael (Abilene Christian University); Sandra Measels (Holmes Community College); Eric Mein (Normandale Community College); Christine Mihelich (Marywood University); Deborah M. Mix (Ball State University); Aaron Moe (Washington State University); Joelle Moen (Brigham Young University–Idaho); Lisa Muir (Wilkes Community College); Lori Muntz (Iowa Wesleyan College); Justine Murison (University of Illinois); Jillmarie Murphy (Union College); Harold Nelson (Minot State University); Howard Nelson (Cayuga Community College); Lance Newman (Westminster College); Taryn Okuma (The Catholic University of America); Stanley Orr (University of Hawai‘i–West O‘ahu); Samuel Otter (University of California–Berkeley); Susan Scott Parrish (University of Michigan); Martha H. Patterson (McKendree University); Michelle Paulsen (Victoria College); Daniel G. Payne (SUNY Oneonta); Ian Peddie (Georgia

Gwinnett College); Aaron Matthew Percich (West Virginia University); Tom Perrin (Huntingdon College); Sandra Petrulionis (Penn State–Altoona); Christopher Phillips (Lafayette College); Maria Pollack (Hudson Valley Community College); Kenneth M. Price (University of Nebraska); Marty G. Price (Mississippi State University); Kieran Quinlan (University of Alabama–Birmingham); Wesley Raabe (Kent State University); Maria Ramos (J. Sargeant Reynolds Community College); Palmer Rampell (Yale University); Rick Randolph (Kauai Community College); Kimberly Reed (Lipscomb University); Joan Reeves (Northeast Alabama Community College); Elizabeth Renker (The Ohio State University); Joseph Rezek (Boston University); Anne Boyd Rioux (University of New Orleans); Marc Robinson (Yale University); Jane Rosecrans (J. Sargeant Reynolds Community College); Phillip Round (University of Iowa); Jeffrey Rubinstein (Hillborough Community College); Maureen Ryan (University of Southern Mississippi); Jamie Sadler (Richmond Community College); Gordon Sayre (University of Oregon); Jennifer Schell (University of Alaska–Fairbanks); Jim Schrantz (Tarrant County College); Joshua Schuster (University of Western Ontario); Marc Seals (University of Wisconsin–Baraboo/Sauk County); Carl Sederholm (Brigham Young University); Larry Severeid (Utah State University–Eastern); Anna Sheckman (Yale University); Deborah Sims (USC and UCR); Claudia Slate (Florida Southern College); Brenda R. Smith (Kent State University–Stark); Martha Nell Smith (University of Maryland); Eric Sterling (Auburn University Montgomery); Julia Stern (Northwestern University); Billy J. Stratton (University of Denver); Steve Surryhne (California State University–San Francisco); Timothy Sweet (West Virginia University); David Taylor (University of North Texas); Jan Thompson (University of Nebraska–Kearney); Robin Thompson (Governors State University); Marjory Thrash (Pearl River Community College); Nicole Tonkovich (UC San Diego); Steve Tracy (University of Massachusetts–Amherst); Alan Trusky (Forence-Darlington Tech College); April Van Camp (Indian River State College); Joanne van der Woude (University of Groningen); Abram van Engen (Washington University); Laura Veltman (California Baptist University); Eliza Waggoner (Miami University–Middletown); Catherine Waitinas (Cal Poly State University); Laura Dassow Walls (University of Notre Dame); Raquel Wanzo (Laney College); Bryan Waterman (New York University); Stephanie Wells (Orange Coast College); Jeff Westover (Boise State University); Belinda Wheeler (Paine College); Chris Wheeler (Horry-Georgetown Technical College); Steven J. Whitton (Jacksonville State University); Elizabeth Wiet (Yale University); Jason Williams (Brigham Young University–Idaho); Barbara Williamson (Spokane Falls Community College); Gaye Winter (Mississippi Gulf Coast Community College); Kelly Wisecup (University of North Texas); Aiping Zhang (California State University–Chico).

THE NORTON ANTHOLOGY OF

AMERICAN LITERATURE

NINTH EDITION

VOLUME E: LITERATURE SINCE 1945

American Literature since 1945

How do we tell the story of American literature in our own time? In one version of that story, we are led into the twenty-first century by an unlikely hero named Oscar Wao, the creation of novelist and short-story writer Junot Díaz in The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao (2008). Oscar is a nerdy, overweight devotee of fantasy fiction and comics, dreaming of becoming the Dominican American J. R. R. Tolkien, author of Oscar's favorite novels, the Lord of the Rings trilogy. Failing at exercise, dating, and the college social scene, Oscar leaves New Jersey for an extended stay with relatives in the Dominican Republic. There he achieves the romantic fulfillment that eluded him at home, but his refugee family's tragic history comes full circle, too, as Oscar's life is changed forever by his unwitting entanglement with the Dominican Republic's brutal political regime. This, Díaz tells us, is fuku, a curse that wreaks havoc the world over, anywhere we find those hungry for power crushing the freedom, and the bodies, of the weak.

Díaz's hero and the novel that brings him to life embody what feels truly new in American writing of the twenty-first century. When we read Oscar Wao—or virtually any of Díaz's stories, such as “Drown,” reprinted in this volume—we plug into an electric, multilingual English renewed by Spanish, African, and Latin American borrowings. What has been called a mestizo language was practiced, described, and theorized by the writer Gloria Anzaldúa decades before (see her essay “How to Tame a Wild Tongue,” also in this volume). Building on the work of Anzaldúa and others, a writer of Díaz's generation need not justify the hybrid, but can simply inhabit it, using new language to reach new regions of human experience and Blam, Roy Lichtenstein, 1962. For more information about this painting, see the color insert in this volume.

American culture. Following Díaz's allusions in Oscar Wao, readers are led to genre fiction, superhero comics, film, fashion, pop music, arts, religious ritual, modern sexuality, and mass entertainment—a cultural milieu that stretches from New Jersey to Santo Domingo. But Díaz's headlong prose also brings references to more traditionally literary writers such as William Shakespeare, Herman Melville, and the Latin American novelist Gabriel García Márquez, alongside the terms and ideas of literary criticism, history, philosophy, gender theory, and critiques of political power. Twenty-first-century readers have been more than ready to embrace Díaz's capacious literary and cultural vision. They have been willing to wrestle with what is difficult in his writing while they revel in his brilliant, loving use of the lowbrow and the popular. Do readers have to choose between the academic and the popular, between “serious” and “entertaining”? Junot Díaz says no. What do the X-Men comics have to say about theories of dictatorship? Oscar Wao explains—in a footnote, no less. Twenty-first-century readers live these intersections daily, code-shifting as they move among family, friends, school, work, nations, and cultures. The fiction of Junot Díaz seems to speak all these languages and more.

Junot Díaz took eleven years to write The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao. He had to invent the hybrid language from which to spin the strands of his story. The Pulitzer Prize committee—known for honoring epic novels that sum up something important about American life—chose Oscar Wao for the 2008 prize, marking the arrival in literature of a vision of America already lived by many of its citizens. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Oscar Wao did just what the poet Ezra Pound exhorted ambitious writers to do at the start of the twentieth century: “Make it new.” In doing so, of course, Díaz joined a literary tradition even as he broke its molds.

The vitality of contemporary American literature, evident throughout the most recent selections in this volume, is fueled by two great engines, one artistic and one demographic. The artistic urge to experiment galvanized writers inspired by, or reacting against, the influential modernist writers of the first half of the twentieth century who themselves experimented ceaselessly with literary form and with the subjects and stories that could be spoken through poetry, drama, and fiction. At the same time, the demographics of American education and immigration were changing radically, beginning in the middle of the twentieth century. These forces transformed the cast of American high- and middlebrow culture: who participated in American culture, and who was taught the reading and writing skills essential to the creation of modern literature. As an interest in experiment surged through a nation of new readers and writers, the basic elements of literary culture were renewed once more.

NEW READERS, NEW WRITERS, NEW HEROES

Addressing American college students in 1950, the Russian émigré author Vladimir Nabokov gave his audience a multiple-choice quiz: What makes a reader a good reader? The options included joining a book club, identifying with characters, and reading a story for what it had to say about society. These were, for Nabokov, trick answers: they were common ways of reading then, as now, but he disparaged them. He wanted readers to take a different approach. The correct answers, he told the students, were owning a dictionary, possessing a good memory, and having imagination. Both the “wrong” answers and the ones Nabokov thought were right tell us a great deal about what the new generation of American readers was looking for when they turned to literature.

These readers—more diverse and better educated than ever before, faced with more choices than ever before—would help to define American and world literature over the next half century. Many of those regularly encountering literary works in the second half of the twentieth century were, or had been, servicemen. Quality paperbacks at low prices were suddenly everywhere, and the format was no longer the province solely of lowbrow “pulp” fiction. Millions of pocket-sized paperbacks had been sent abroad during World War II, given away by publishers through the Armed Services Editions series. Mysteries, Westerns, domestic novels, and works by Charles Dickens and Shakespeare all found their way overseas. The Great Gatsby, which had faded from public consciousness by the 1940s, was made popular again by servicemen and their paperbacks. While these books carried aspects of American and British culture into the barracks and bivouacs of soldiers in the theaters of war, those soldiers were also encountering the languages and cultures of Europe, North Africa, India, and Japan in the course of their service, broadening their cultural education in ways not specifically American. Coming back to the United States after 1945, veterans were greeted by an entitlement that dramatically changed American society: the benefits of the GI Bill—the Servicemen’s Readjustment Act of 1944—signed into law by President Roosevelt. Under its provisions the government provided money so that veterans could buy homes and attend school, receiving tuition and a stipend for up to four years of college or other professional training. For the first time, men from immigrant, poor, and working-class families, whose parents had little education, were attending college in droves. In 1947, the program's peak year, 49 percent of students admitted to college were veterans. By the time the original version of the law had run its course in 1956, 7.8 million out of the 16 million World War II veterans had benefited from its education and training provisions. Combined with a booming American economy, plentiful jobs, and the widespread urge to start adult lives delayed by military deployment, the entitlement helped to lift millions of individuals and families into the middle class.

Army Special Services librarian and soldiers in the Philippines, 1946.

The GI Bill (1944), which provided federal subsidies to support college education for returning World War II veterans, democratized American higher education. Shown here, veterans and other students at New York University in January 1945.

That demographic change transformed the demographics of reading and writing for the rest of the century. American readers' increasing sophistication about aesthetic and cultural matters was fueled by their professors' desire to teach the formally complex works promoted by the international modernist writers they admired from the early twentieth century. An influx of writers and scholars fleeing Europe just prior to the outbreak of war had given American intellectuals renewed contact with the literary currents of French, German, and Russian literature. "The New Criticism"—a modernist-inspired method of critical interpretation grounded in reading the text "closely"—was popular in literature classrooms just about everywhere, enshrined in textbooks such as Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren's Understanding Poetry (1938) and Understanding Fiction (1943; the writer Flannery O'Connor called Understanding Fiction her "Bible"). The method put students from varied backgrounds on an equal footing as readers and helped them to see how literary works were crafted, benefits that explain why students and teachers still practice "close reading" today.

Nabokov's recommended reading practices would serve students well as they encountered complex literary works, European influences, and the challenge of reading closely—and they would serve the future readers of his morally edgy novel Lolita (1955), too. Lolita is about a gentlemanly and intellectual European pedophile in love with a brash American preteen girl.

Initially banned in the United States, once Lolita became available freely to the American public in 1958, it became a best seller even as it tested readers' moral tolerance and aesthetic sophistication. Ironically, then, while Nabokov strove to teach American college students a kind of literary appreciation fostered by his aristocratic European education, the practices he in turn discouraged were too deeply embedded in American history to be set aside by the new college students filling the lecture halls and classrooms where he taught. Literature's capacity to change the culture by encouraging readers to think about their society through the lens of a story had already had significant effects in the nation's history. Nineteenth-century readers identifying with the characters in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin or turning to Frederick Douglass's autobiography to understand slavery fueled the abolitionist movement that in turn fueled the Civil War. The African American characters that northern white readers identified with or listened to in fiction and autobiography reached them in ways their social lives otherwise prevented.

In the second half of the twentieth century, a new generation read not only for the "aesthetic bliss" Nabokov celebrated and for the formal features of language that "close reading" and an appreciation of international modernism could reveal, but also in order to remake themselves and their society. Those socially engaged acts of reading ensured that writers catering to them would make their mark both on the development of fiction, poetry, and drama as art forms and on politics, commerce, religion, medicine, and domestic life. By the mid-twentieth century, one could already point to a long history of black writers in the United States who used their skills on the page to fight the philosophy, psychology, and policies of white supremacy. The burgeoning civil rights movement and, later, the Black Arts movement, brought many more black writers into publication. While African American members of the armed services were in Europe, James Baldwin—who did not qualify for the service because of the effects of childhood malnutrition—was working in the War Information Office in New York, but he was also honing his craft as a fiction writer, joining a distinguished generation of black writers that included Ralph Ellison, Richard Wright, Langston Hughes, Ann Petry, and others who enjoyed wide audiences in the United States before, during, and after the war. Although James Baldwin left the United States in 1949 and spent most of the rest of his life in Europe, he would become one of the most canny commentators on race to address a mass readership in the postwar period. The essays contained in his well-received 1965 volume, The Fire Next Time, are even more direct than the critique to be found in Black Boy, the memoir that his mentor Richard Wright had published just twenty years earlier. This was partly due to the genre Baldwin chose: Baldwin's essays were not stories or memoirs, but cultural criticism. He provided a pointed psychological, spiritual, sexual, and practical analysis of racism in America that was as important to the civil rights movement's intellectual evolution as sit-ins and boycotts were to its political success. Baldwin's fiction—such as the story "Sonny's Blues," found in this volume—matched this social analysis with storytelling that could make readers feel the human cost of poverty and addiction in black communities—the outgrowths of the racist society Baldwin's essays lay bare.

“A Man Becomes Invisible.” One of a set of images created by photographer Gordon Parks for a photo essay on Ralph Ellison’s Invisible Man. The essay was published in Life magazine on August 25, 1952.

Drawing energy from the newly educated readers and writers of the mid-twentieth century, American fiction and drama in the postwar period frequently celebrated nonconforming outsiders like Baldwin’s Sonny: the philosophical character, often a writer or an artist, usually male, who suffers social rejection for his ideals or simply for his identity. The social liberation movements of the second half of the twentieth century—not only the civil rights movement, but also the later Black Power movement, the American Indian Movement (AIM, founded in 1968), the women’s liberation movement (which gained momentum in the early 1970s), and the movement for gay rights (which began with a protest at the Stonewall Inn in Greenwich Village, New York City, in 1969, and entered a new phase with the AIDS crisis in the mid-1980s)—inspired content for this infinitely flexible dramatic setup. Notable examples of the outsider character would include the nameless narrator of Ralph Ellison’s Invisible Man (1952); Augie in Saul Bellow’s The Adventures of Augie March (1953); the autobiographical narrator of Maxine Hong Kingston’s stories in The Woman Warrior (1979); Toni Morrison’s Milkman Dead and Guitar Bains (Song of Solomon, 1979); Don DeLillo’s Jack Gladney (White Noise, 1985); Sherman Alexie’s Junior in his acclaimed young adult novel, The Absolutely True Diary of a Part-Time Indian (2007); Junot Díaz’s Oscar Wao (The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao, 2007); and Philip Roth’s many Jewish protagonists who belong neither in their Jewish communities nor in the Protestant-dominated culture around them, the kind of character central to the story “Defender of the Faith” and embodied perhaps most memorably in Coleman Silk—the contemporary black man who lives out his life as a Jew in Roth’s The Human Stain (2000). There were limits to American optimism about the prospects for outsiders’ lives: like Willy Loman in Arthur Miller’s play Death of a Salesman, the outsider trying to reenter society's circle of norms can fail, sometimes spectacularly. These misfit characters can be heroes and antiheroes, weak men or rebels, and their stories can end in tragedy or triumph.

Such outsider characters were related to the rise of a new readership looking for characters with whom they could identify, but they were also inspired by discontent with mass culture in the United States and its perceived insistence on social conformity. That discontent sent young people in the postwar period searching for meaning and identity—beyond the desire for upward mobility, marriage and children, a house in the suburbs, and the sturdy work ethic of their fathers and mothers. The satirical and sometimes simply resistant attitude toward intellectual, cultural, religious, and political authority cultivated among the coterie of so-called beat-niks in the late 1940s and 1950s—a group that included Allen Ginsberg, Gary Snyder, Jack Kerouac, and William Burroughs—had become a popular movement among the generation born in the decade after the war. In the 1970s, many important women writers whom readers will find in this anthology—such as Jamaica Kincaid, Anne Sexton, Elizabeth Bishop, Toni Cade Bambara, Toni Morrison, and Leslie Marmon Silko—also resisted conformities of race, education, religion, and gender that they perceived had circumscribed the lives of the women and men around them. Some, like Bishop, found artistic and personal solidarity among artists with whom they shared an aesthetic vision and a common set of cultural touchstones (later in this volume readers can see Bishop among a roomful of male writers at New York's Gotham Book Mart in a group photograph included alongside the selections from poet Randall Jarrell). Others, like Bambara, cultivated a diverse solidarity of women through collective projects and mutual support—as in Bambara's significant gathering of writers in the volume she edited, The Black Woman: An Anthology (1970). Toni Morrison spent twenty years as an editor at Random House, the job she held before becoming a full-time writer, where she ensured that black writers received the attention they deserved. And some writers resisted norms by arguing for new ones, as demonstrated in Silko's lifelong advocacy for politically engaged Native American art, which led her to criticize sharply white writers (famously, the poet Gary Snyder) for appropriating Native American sources as well as Native writers (such as fellow fiction writer Louise Erdrich) for being insufficiently committed to Native American Levittown. Construction and aerial views of housing development in Levittown, PA, built by Levitt & Sons between 1951 and 1957. Levittown was the prototype for similar developments built all over the country in the 1950s and 1960s. They offered largely identical single-family homes for a generation of upwardly mobile middle-class Americans who wanted to move out of cities.

Toni Morrison in 1970 at Random House, where she worked as an editor.

materials. Silko's admonishments to writers regarding the subjects and cultural materials that they should or should not write about suggests how nonconformity with the mainstream could sometimes place different forms of expectation or restraint upon writers. Do writers have to turn to their own heritage for inspiration? Sometimes it has seemed that writers of color are expected to do so, and white writers are free to choose not to. Language itself is a form of conformity and restraint. In the fiction of George Saunders—such as his story “CivilWarLand in Bad Decline,” included here—the characters resist (and are sometimes overcome by) the stifling, dystopian worlds of American business where the euphemisms of customer service and “total quality management” jargon make it nearly impossible to describe, or even to perceive, the world beyond capitalist enterprise. Nonconformity had its most theatrical moment in the 1960s youth counterculture, epitomized by LSD advocate Timothy Leary's exhortation to “turn on, tune in, drop out.” “Turning on” to the exploration of consciousness through psychedelic drugs such as LSD was meant to expand the mind beyond the limits of conventional thought and perception. For Leary and many in the counterculture, to “tune in” meant that one would seek to be open to the world spiritually, intellectually, and sensually; to “drop out” was to reject social conventions and free the mind of the unconscious limits that accompanied those conventions. The writer Joan Didion turned a critical eye on the counterculture in her essay “Slouching Towards Bethlehem,” excerpted below in the “Creative Nonfiction” cluster, but the counterculture was artistically enabling for many, including Didion herself, whose practice of reportage looked little like the conventional journalism of her day. Didion waxed personal in her reporting—breaking the rules of objectivity—as the counterculture around her took to heart the adage that “the personal is political.”

“Dropping out” was the 1960s incarnation of an old impulse in American culture, one that can be traced back at least to Henry David Thoreau, alone in his cabin on Walden Pond writing essays about civil disobedience, who was jailed briefly upon his return to town for refusing to pay taxes that supported slavery and the war against Mexico. But this aspect of the counterculture was not as politically engaged as the model of Thoreau might suggest. The ethic of “dropping out” was perhaps most famously embodied by novelist Ken Kesey. Kesey became famous when he published One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest (1962), a best-selling novel that told the story of a man sent to a mental institution and, finally, lobotomized, because he would not conform to society’s expectations. The money Kesey earned from this book supported him and a group of followers calling themselves “The Merry Pranksters,” who experimented with drugs, music, art, meditation, macrobiotic diets, and unusual social, sexual, and leadership arrangements. The Pranksters’ compound in the redwood groves of La Honda, California, and their converted schoolbus, called “Further” and piloted by Neal Cassady, the model for Jack Kerouac’s hero in On the Road (1957), became the symbols of the counterculture’s ideals and excesses. Kesey’s world was described in Thomas Wolfe’s book The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (1968), an early example of a genre that came to be called “creative nonfiction.” Like Hunter S. Thompson’s “gonzo” journalism—in which the journalist immerses him- or herself in extreme experience in order to report on it vividly—this new genre of writing used literary language (in these cases, the high-energy poetic prose style of the Beat writers) to report on real people and events. Wolfe and Thompson crafted their styles to match—and to make the reader feel that she had somehow experienced—their wild subjects.

The Merry Pranksters atop their bus, “Further.”

Testifying to the broadly shared celebration of the outsider in American prose writing, we can look back to Holden Caulfield in J. D. Salinger’s The Catcher in the Rye (1951) and to the melancholy, misfit suburbanites of John Cheever’s and John Updike’s stories to round out the fellowship of nonconforming heroes. This was a durable narrative and thematic convention that long accompanied protest and cultural transformation but also had its politically quietist side. Nabokov, who told his college student audience they should not identify with characters, would not approve: America’s newly expanded and diverse reading public embraced these figures and, yes, identified with them as culture heroes and fellow-travelers. That they still speak to readers today—many can be met in the pages of this volume of The Norton Anthology of American Literature—reveals how unconventionality itself can become a fertile and endlessly engaging convention.

LITERATURE AND AMERICAN MEDIA

While education, immigration, and political and cultural unrest had an enormous impact on America's readers and writers during the second half of the twentieth century, the medium of writing itself was suddenly surrounded by a rich and shifting context of new media. Many would say that writing—fiction, poetry, and plays especially—had to compete with other media in new ways, but that would oversimplify the matter. For the new media that developed after World War II and through into the twenty-first century are closely related to literature and together take up themes and ideas rooted in literature's longer history.

Two major developments dominate our sense of the media landscape of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries: first, the rise of television after the Second World War, and second, the invention of the Internet in the 1990s. These two forms of media—and of course, the second is better understood as a whole constellation of media, including text, moving and still images, and sound—fascinated not only their mass publics but also writers and dramatists whose very vocations made them highly aware of the powers and effects of different media. The very first “media theorist” was a trained literary critic, a Canadian-born professor named Marshall McLuhan, whose best-known book, Understanding Media (1964), consciously echoed the titles of the much-used literary textbooks of the New Criticism. Famous for his dictum that “the medium is the message,” he argued that how something is communicated is sometimes the very essence of what it communicates. Television shows and print advertising were often the targets of his analyses, but he also wrote lovingly of medieval life, of a time before Gutenberg's printing press, when oral storytelling, music, and traveling dramatic productions constituted the public media of the day. McLuhan's attention to the material medium at the expense of content sometimes seemed absurd to his critics, but his emphasis reflected the public's sense that television in particular was changing American mass culture less because of what was said on television than because of how it delivered a culture of performance into living rooms across the country. The television networks took types of programs already well established in radio and on the vaudeville stage of the early twentieth century—such as the variety show, the interview or advice show, and cowboy and detective stories—and made them come alive every night on screens in American homes. In 1947, about 6,000 sets could be found in those homes; by 1951, the number was over 12 million. McLuhan's prolific writing and speaking about television made him a celebrity. When appointed by Fordham University to hold the prestigious Albert Schweitzer Chair, he was one of the highest paid English professors in the country (with a salary of $100,000 in 1967). He was so well known that Woody Allen gave him an amusing cameo in his film Annie Hall (1977): Allen's character pulls McLuhan out from behind a billboard in the lobby of a movie theater in order to refute an annoying man spouting media criticism while waiting in line for tickets. McLuhan lamented the passivity with which viewers received television. Allen makes the scene in which McLuhan appears a commentary on passivity. Allen breaks character and addresses the film's audience: "If life were only like this!" he says to the audience, as McLuhan gives the obnoxious moviegoer an intellectual dressing-down.

Media critic Marshall McLuhan (far right) and, addressing the audience, film-maker Woody Allen (center) in Annie Hall (1977).

The problem of passivity in the face of spectacle is something that television made urgent and that modern uses of drama highlight in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Television made Americans nightly spectators to realities that were far from entertaining. Images of violence against peaceful civil rights protesters and, in the late 1960s and '70s, images of the war in Vietnam—which many term the first “televised war”—galvanized national issues that might otherwise have seemed too local or too far away to engage people throughout the country. Viewers found their passivity challenged: What should they do with the violence or injustice that they saw in front of them on the screen? How did watching something implicate them as participants in what they watched? How did performance in social life constrain them—to norms of gender or race, for example? How might performance free them?

In twentieth- and twenty-first-century drama, playwrights experimented—as Woody Allen does in Annie Hall—with the so-called fourth wall, the side of the stage that faces the audience. They explored what would happen when a play broke through that wall, treating the whole theater, including the audience, as its staging area. Even public spaces—parks, streets, and museums—were treated as stages that could include random passersby. The term fourth wall comes from the eighteenth-century French playwright Denis Diderot; engaging the audience was routine in Shakespearean drama, and the audience is always crucial to comedy—we have to laugh in order for comedy to work. And in classical Greek drama, the fourth wall is broken whenever the chorus addresses the audience directly and comments on the action. Among the plays included in this volume, for instance, August Wilson's Fences (1983) provokes audiences to think about barriers and spheres of action, to consider how enclosures determine human beings' powers of expression. The stage, in every play, fences things in, and, therefore, fences things out. The counterculture experimented with “happenings” that moved performance out to public spaces where the question of what is fenced in or out becomes particularly acute. A description of one such performance appears in the excerpt from Didion's “Slouching Towards Bethlehem” in the Creative Nonfiction cluster in this volume: a performance by the San Francisco Mime Troupe in the section of Golden Gate Park known as the “Panhandle.” Disturbingly, the troupe uses the racist tradition of blackface theater to goad people into resisting racist political structures; Didion implicitly asks the reader to consider whether such a performance finally undermines or reinforces racial stereotyping.

Avant-garde theater, as articulated in the “Postmodern Manifestos” by Charles Ludlam and George Foreman included in this volume, invites readers to think of theater as a place where such questions can be explored and where the real-life social roles that people perform can be experimented with. (Ludlam was particularly interested in the performance of gender.) Even realist theater was tending toward this kind of self-conscious meditation on spectatorship. “Reality TV” in the twenty-first century, with its confession booths and “real” people, pushes right through the fourth wall, even as it gives the viewer an uncomfortable voyeuristic feeling as he or she passively consumes, as entertainment, the tears and abuses of the people on the show. What seemed in the early twentieth century like artificiality—the artwork’s own acknowledgment that it is fictional—became the ultimate stamp of a certain kind of realism in the twenty-first century.

Poetry was affected, too, by the rising interest in theatricality that the new medium of television stimulated. One of the signal changes in poetic practice, starting with the Beat poets in the middle of the twentieth century, was the growing popularity of public poetry readings. Perhaps the most famous reading of the twentieth century occurred on October 7, 1955, at the Six Gallery in San Francisco—a converted garage with a toilet adjoining the stage area. Jack Kerouac passed the wine jug while Allen Ginsberg read Howl, which had not been heard before that night. After using the toilet with the door ajar in front of the audience, Ginsberg pulled up his pants, walked out, and read a tour de force poem that seemed to expose the bodies and the anguish of, as the poem put it, “the best minds of my generation.” Joined that night by the poets of what came to be called the “San Francisco Renaissance,” Ginsberg’s performance reminded the world that poetry was an oral medium, an art of sound—a fact that had faded from view (rightly or wrongly) as readers absorbed the most famous poems of the early twentieth century, including T. S. Eliot’s footnoted The Waste Land (1922), considered by some the ultimate modernist example of the art form. Readings such as the one at the Six Gallery treated poetry like jazz performance—an experience of musicality, improvisation, and blues-inspired rhythm and emotion. Robert Lowell explained that part of his own dramatic change of poetic style from formalism to free verse forms in the 1950s came from the realization that his more traditional poems would not make much of a splash at a reading. Sylvia Plath read “Daddy” on BBC radio shortly before her suicide in 1963, her flat, elegant tone playing like a chill wind on the surface of tightly controlled anger. Again and again the poets in this volume turn to music, from Theodore Roethke’s “My Papa’s Waltz,” to the jazz-inspired poetry of Michael Harper, to the dancing figures and film scores in Tracy K. Smith’s “Thirst” and “The Universe: Original Motion Picture Soundtrack.”

ComCo (Communications Company) poster for a poetry reading by LeRoi Jones (1967). Chester Anderson Papers, Bancroft Library, University of California.

While fiction, like poetry, began to be read onstage regularly during the period covered by this volume, it was not drama or live performance but film that intersected most broadly with narrative: Patricia Highsmith and Philip K. Dick wrote stories that were adapted regularly into popular Hollywood films; film features in Don DeLillo’s stories almost as often as television does; and the crosscuts and dialogue of film can be discerned in fictional forms and settings throughout the period. Still-image media such as photography and painting interface with literature, too. Natasha Trethewey’s poetry meditates on both these media. For her, they represent the deceptions and the truths of history that the poet must confront. Like Marshall McLuhan, Trethewey reveals messages inherent to different media, such as the oppressive racial spectatorship implicit in much photography, even—or especially—when it is used to reveal the beauty of the downtrodden. What does writing accomplish, then, that television, film, music, photography, and painting cannot quite achieve? Readers will find many answers among the selections here. Writers throughout the period wrestle with, borrow from, and sometimes engulf the media of their times as they reimagine what literature can be and do.

EXPERIMENT AND PLAY IN TWENTIETH- AND TWENTY-FIRST-CENTURY LITERATURE

What is “postmodern”? In contemporary parlance, this is an endlessly useful term that can describe practically anything aesthetically edgy or off-kilter, anything that bends genres or cultural registers, anything that comments on the welter of media in contemporary culture. Students coming to the study of the literature of this period for the first time might well use postmodern to define the works that were most influential in the second half of the twentieth century. The “Postmodern Manifestos” in this volume, as well as other examples included here, suggest the variety of ideas and styles that the term can indicate. Don DeLillo’s White Noise (1985) has been considered one of the best fictional descriptions of life in postmodern America. Postmodern life is imagined by DeLillo as a heap of fragments, a babble of incessant voices flowing from modern media (radio, television, film, and cyberspace) to penetrate our perceptions and thoughts. In DeLillo’s America, material consumption and entertainment become the goals of domestic and professional life, and his stories are crammed with cars, stores, fast food, breaking news, tourist attractions, screens, and sports. The human beings caught up in these pursuits, though, always suspect there is something beyond all these glittery attractions. In the face of such a world, the protagonist of White Noise, Jack Gladney, seeks genuine transcendence, looking variously to data, psychotropic drugs, mystical sound, and spiritual mantras in his search for meaning. The enchanting words Jack hears muttered by his sleeping daughter turn out to be the name of a car—“Toyota Celica.” Is DeLillo suggesting that it is impossible to reclaim the soul in modern, commercial America? Or, rather, is transcendence available to us in all human culture, no matter how banal? Or is Jack’s mistake simply funny? This sort of ambiguity and uncertainty, and the way DeLillo shifts between satire and sincerity, suggests what is so inviting to readers in the literature typically called “postmodern.” Readers of fiction have found such openness to interpretation especially appealing in the exuberant satires of Thomas Pynchon, George Saunders, Lydia Davis, and Ishmael Reed, to name a few, all found alongside DeLillo in this volume.

In poetry, writers embraced the task of re-enchanting the material, commercial world—a task that poets have been called to since the ancient Greek poet Hesiod celebrated human labor in “Works and Days.” In “A Supermarket in California,” Allen Ginsberg’s speaker, walking and thinking of the nineteenth-century American poet Walt Whitman, looks at the grocery aisles with new wonder: “What peaches and what penumbras!” He catches earthy Walt squeezing the produce and eyeing the handsome grocery boys. Others felt it was poetry’s job to probe the material properties of language itself. The poets known as the “L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E” school, and their experimentalist precursor, John Ashbery, questioned the basic expectations of meaning. What can language do and become if it is freed from the requirement that it steadily refer to the world? Perhaps poems should represent the distracted mind as it writes the poem, rather than some object that can discipline the poet’s unruly attention. Such poetry can seem difficult—indeed, it is difficult to follow meaning and sense if these are not the underlying threads holding a poem together. And yet, like the ambiguous satires of the story writers, postmodern poetry most often wants to play with readers, not against them. Ashbery was inspired by mid-century abstract painting—by artists such as Jackson Pollock and Mark Rothko. Readers can take pleasure in the color, texture, feeling, connotations, and shapes of language even if its meanings remain elusive.

Writing in the second half of the twentieth century was not experimental only in matters of form. For many writers, the imperative to create challenging or innovative forms—be they poetic, narrative, or dramatic—paled in significance next to the social changes they, and the world around them, were experiencing. Realism, in whatever genre, could respond to the shocks of contemporary life. When the forms of modernist literature seemed too heady, too abstract, or too intellectual, realism offered a mode suited to the autobiographical and the personal. The poet Robert Lowell lived this transition in his own work: the poems in his first book, Lord Weary’s Castle (1946), were formally intricate, lyrically beautiful, and concerned with large subjects—the Protestant legacy in commercial life, the spiritual condition of the nation. But in fact these concerns grew from Lowell’s own past, from his distinguished, old New England Protestant family, a family from which he dissented when he converted to Catholicism in 1940. Life Studies (1959), Lowell’s second volume of poetry, changed tack, driving straight for the autobiographical core of his art with freer forms, more direct language, and candid accounts of his ruined loves and his struggles with alcoholism, depression, and mania. Breaking with both social decorum and poetic form, a prose section acknowledges a possibly Jewish ancestor in the poet's white-Anglo-Saxon-Protestant family tree. Alongside work by other poets who used the so-called confessional approach to poetry—including Frank O'Hara, Anne Sexton, Sylvia Plath, Adrienne Rich, and Sharon Olds—Lowell's experiments with subject and form brought newly accessible urgency and emotion to lyric poetry in the decades after World War II. Billy Collins's popular contemporary poetry must be read in this context: the poem "I Chop Some Parsley While Listening to Art Blakey's Version of 'Three Blind Mice'" (1998) uses an immediately personal and ordinary (not to mention humorous) occasion to transcribe the poet's thoughts on the effects of music. This is a different kind of confession—there is no deep trauma remembered here, no scandal or lost love. And the poem doesn't push the boundaries of socially acceptable topics in the manner of confessional poetry. Rather, it pushes the boundaries of poetic relevance—chopping parsley? chopping onions? speculations about the three blind mice of nursery rhyme fame? But the poem's accessible realism and its unapologetic emotion owe a debt to the generation of poets that began with Lowell.

"From the modernism you choose you get the postmodernism you deserve." So declared the critic David Antin in his 1972 essay "Modernism and Postmodernism." Given the wide variety of aesthetic strategies people refer to when they use the word postmodernism, Antin is surely correct. While writers who have been called "postmodern" sometimes rejected or reacted against the early-twentieth-century writers and artists who have been called "modernists," their techniques and concerns are often continuous with those of these earlier practitioners. The writers of the early twentieth century took up socially taboo topics, were inspired by other artistic media, and wove high and low culture into their work. They wrestled with profound social changes and with a brutal, seemingly pointless war. And so when late-twentieth-century writers reacted against modernism, they had also decided what the movement meant. From the longer perspective of the twenty-first century, it's clear that the aesthetic epoch reflected in much of this volume could just as well be termed "long modernism." Like their early-twentieth-century precursors, many of the writers included here experiment with literary form and subject as an antidote to what they see as the violent, empty, fragmented, and soul-crushingly conventional forms of modern life.

What is truly postmodern, then? Writers such as Edward P. Jones, Natasha Trethewey, Patricia Highsmith, George Saunders, and Philip K. Dick turn to personal history, to low-brow visual media, to the new languages of business, and to genres such as horror and science fiction for sources of inspiration and provocation that were not typical for writers of the early twentieth century. Consider, for instance, how a lesbian pulp novel such as The Fear and the Guilt (1954), by Wilene Shaw (the pen name of Virginia M. Harrison), sports its genre conventions on its cover: Ruby brings her lover, Christy, to her southern home, where Christy is seduced by Ruby's father (and agrees to marry him). By contrast, Highsmith's carefully crafted realist novel, The Price of Salt (1952), upended such pulp conventions. It is a love story between two women with an unprecedented happy ending for the couple. Though some critics have noted how its narrative artistry seems to have inspired the cross-country car chase in Nabokov's Lolita, and while it is clear that Highsmith learned much from the great modern novelist Henry James, The Price of Salt wore a paperback cover and looked as steamy as its pulp sisters. Harkening back to the literature of the nineteenth century, writers understood as postmodern in this sense seek to make readers feel something even while they revel in satire and irony, while (for all their confessional force) the writers of "long modernism" can be suspicious of sentiment. Rejecting or reimagining what "elite" literature might look like, writers looking for alternatives to a dominant and elite modernism likewise reimagine their readers and pave the way for the innovations of a writer like Junot Díaz.

Cover of original 1952 edition of The Price of Salt, by Patricia Highsmith, publishing under the pseudonym Claire Morgan. The book's imagery and format placed it in the company of lowbrow erotic genre fiction such as the example on the right, The Fear and the Guilt (1954).

LITERATURE NOW

In the United States alone, over 50,000 novels are published each year. Worldwide, the number is well over 200,000. It is cheaper and easier than ever to make written works available to readers. Writing programs have made the professional lives of poets and other writers sustainable, even when their work doesn't turn a profit in the publishing market. The Association of Writers and Writing Programs reports that in 1975 there were a total of 79 programs granting creative writing degrees ranging from the associate's degree to the Ph.D. In 2012 that number was 880. The teaching now done by many writers not only allows them to continue writing but also trains new writers, whose work can in turn be found in the ever-increasing numbers of creative writing journals and websites, as well as in the blogs, posts, and Twitter feeds generated daily to keep Web content fresh. If the ranks of readers and writers expanded dramatically in the United States in the wake of World War II, how much more has the audience for writing of all kinds expanded—but also fragmented—in the wake of the Internet? The rise of digital culture and of global publishing has made the ubiquity of writing, and of English, suddenly obvious.

Author Grace Paley teaching writing at Sarah Lawrence College.

One argument about what literature looks like now is that it is defined by its global audience, massive production, and transnational use of English. The literary critic Rebecca Walkowitz notes that many of the most successful writers now labor with the knowledge that their work will instantly be translated into multiple languages. She argues that this fact has driven a resurgence in literary experimentation with plot and character, elements of fiction that “survive” translation in ways that more material aspects of language—grammar, sound, etymology—cannot. Others point to the way that the migration of literary works to unexpected new contexts changes the interpretation and social meaning of those works. Critics have tracked, for instance, how the southern novelist William Faulkner was received in Japan in the twentieth century, or how the movie Shrek has been remade and repurposed by digital film artists in Iran. And Web formats privilege some forms of writing over others: fiction with short (that is, easily scrollable) chapters or sections translates better to online contexts than narratives made up of longer blocks of text. Poetry, by contrast, translates beautifully to the screen. In turn, poetry and fiction appearing in traditional print form sometimes borrow styles from texting, posts, and tweets. Readers should be sure to explore the Poetry Foundation's excellent website, which provides additional poems and readings by virtually every poet in this anthology.

What does all the writing sparked by the rise of the Internet tell us about literature today? Crucially, it reminds us that language itself is a living thing, an artistic medium that changes in the very hands of the writers and speakers who use it. Physical and virtual migrations of people and their writing in the contemporary world are driven by economic, political, religious, and personal forces—forces that call out now, as they always have, for a response in art. As Junot Díaz, Gloria Anzaldúa, Maxine Hong Kingston, Tracy K. Smith, and other writers fold multiple languages into their literary works, they recraft the English we have at our disposal. African immigration, the rise of Spanish as an American language (just as German was in the American West in the nineteenth century), and immigrations yet to come will continually reshape the literary landscape. Today, writing flourishes at the grass roots, much of it thriving apart from major publishers, advertisers, and reviewing venues even as the most admired of the writers in the last half-century become the touchstones of an evolving tradition. While this overabundance has unsettled any shared sense of what merits readers' attention, it also indicates the extraordinary energy and possibility in American literature now. Intrepid readers who go exploring will find as-yet-undiscovered wonders.

AMERICAN LITERATURE SINCE 1945

TEXTS	CONTEXTS
1941 Eudora Welty, "Petrified Man"
1945 Randall Jarrell, "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner"	1945 U.S. drops atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki; Japan surrenders, ending World War II • Cold War begins
1947 Tennessee Williams, A Streetcar Named Desire	1947 Jackie Robinson becomes the first black Major League ballplayer
1948 Theodore Roethke, The Lost Son
1949 Arthur Miller, Death of a Salesman
1950 Richard Wilbur, "A World without Objects Is a Sensible Emptiness" • Charles Olson, "Projective Verse"	1950 Senator Joseph McCarthy begins attacks on supposed Communist influence on U.S. government
1952 Ralph Ellison, Invisible Man	1950–53 Korean War
1953 Saul Bellow, The Adventures of Augie March	1953 House Concurrent Resolution 108 dictates government's intention to "terminate" its treaty relations with Native American tribes
	1954 Brown v. Board of Education declares segregated schools unconstitutional • Beat Generation poets begin to gather at San Francisco's City Lights Bookshop
1955 Flannery O'Connor, "Good Country People"
1955–68 John Berryman composes The Dream Songs (pub. 1964, 1968, 1977)
1956 Allen Ginsberg, Howl
1957 Jack Kerouac, On the Road	1956 Martin Luther King Jr. leads bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama
1958 Bernard Malamud, "The Magic Barrel"
1959 Philip Roth, "Defender of the Faith" • Robert Lowell, Life Studies • Frank O'Hara, "Personism"	1959 Fidel Castro becomes Communist leader of Cuba
1960 Thomas Pynchon, "Entropy" • Gwendolyn Brooks, "We Real Cool"	1960 Woolworth lunch counter sit-in in Greensboro, North Carolina, marks beginning of civil rights movement
1961 Denise Levertov, "The Jacob's Ladder"
1962 Robert Hayden, "Middle Passage"	1962 United States and Soviet Union come close to war over Russian missiles based in Cuba; missiles withdrawn
1963 James Wright, "A Blessing"	1963 Martin Luther King Jr. delivers "I Have a Dream" speech • black church in Birmingham, Alabama, bombed, killing four girls • President John F. Kennedy assassinated

Boldface titles indicate works in the anthology.

TEXTS	CONTEXTS
1964 John Cheever, "The Swimmer" • Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones), "An Agony. As Now." • Frank O'Hara, "A Step Away from Them" • Philip K. Dick, "Precious Artifact"
1965 James Baldwin, "Going to Meet the Man" • A. R. Ammons, "Corson's Inlet"	1965 Riots break out in Watts section of Los Angeles • Malcolm X assassinated • hippie culture flourishes in San Francisco
1966 James Merrill, "The Broken Home" • Sylvia Plath, Ariel	1965–73 Vietnam War 1966 National Organization for Women (NOW) founded • Hayden and Brooks criticized at Black Writers' Conference, Fisk University, for composing "academic" poetry
1967 A. R. Ammons, "A Poem Is a Walk" • W. S. Merwin, "For a Coming Extinction" • Patricia Highsmith, "The Quest for Blank Claverigi"
1968 Donald Barthelme, "The Balloon" • Edward Abbey, Desert Solitaire • Joan Didion, "Slouching Towards Bethlehem"	1968 Martin Luther King Jr. assassinated • Senator Robert F. Kennedy assassinated • photo of Earthrise by Apollo 8
1969 N. Scott Momaday, The Way to Rainy Mountain • Kurt Vonnegut, Slaughterhouse-Five • Galway Kinnell, "The Porcupine" • Robert Penn Warren, Audubon	1969 U.S. astronauts land on the moon • Stonewall riots in New York City initiate gay liberation movement • Woodstock Festival held near Bethel, New York
1970 Ishmael Reed, "Neo-HooDoo Manifesto"	1970 National Guard kills four students during antiwar demonstration at Kent State University, Ohio
1971 Audre Lorde, "Black Mother Woman" 1972 Rudolfo Anaya, Bless Me, Ultima • Anne Sexton, The Death of the Fathers	1972 Watergate scandal • military draft ends
1973 Alice Walker, "Everyday Use" • Adrienne Rich, Diving into the Wreck	1973 Roe v. Wade legalizes abortion • American Indian Movement members occupy Wounded Knee, South Dakota
1974 Grace Paley, "A Conversation with My Father" • Annie Dillard, Pilgrim at Tinker Creek	1974 President Richard Nixon resigns in wake of Watergate, avoiding impeachment
1975 John Updike, "Separating" • John Ashbery, "Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror" • Michael S. Harper, "Nightmare Begins Responsibility"
1976 Elizabeth Bishop, Geography III • Maxine Hong Kingston, "No Name Woman" • Barry Lopez, Desert Notes	1976 U.S. bicentennial
1977 Audre Lorde, "Poetry Is Not a Luxury" 1978 Ann Beattie, "Weekend" • Jamaica Kincaid, "Girl"
1979 Philip Levine, "Starlight" • Mary Oliver, "The Black Snake"

TEXTS	CONTEXTS
1980 Toni Cade Bambara, “Medley” • Sam Shepard, True West
1981 Leslie Marmon Silko, “Lullaby” • James Dickey, “Falling” • Simon J. Ortiz, “From Sand Creek”
1982 Raymond Carver, “Cathedral” • David Mamet, Glengarry Glen Ross	1982 Equal Rights Amendment defeated • antinuclear movement protests manufacture of nuclear weapons • AIDS officially identified in the United States
1983 Toni Morrison, “Recitatif” • Joy Harjo, “Call It Fear”
1984 Louise Erdrich, “Dear John Wayne”
1985 Ursula K. Le Guin, “She Unnames Them” • Don DeLillo, White Noise	1985 Introduction of first desktop publishing software, Aldus pagemaker
1986 Lydia Davis, “Break It Down” • Art Spiegelman, Maus I • Rita Dove, Thomas and Beulah • Li-Young Lee, “Eating Together”
1987 Gloria Anzaldúa, Borderlands/La Frontera • Sharon Olds, “I Go Back to May 1937”
1988 Yusef Komunyakaa, “Facing It”
1989 Amy Tan, The Joy Luck Club	1989 Soviet Union collapses; Cold War ends • oil tanker Exxon Valdez runs aground in Alaska
1990 Robert Pinsky, “The Want Bone” • Frank Bidart, “Ellen West”	1990 Congress passes Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act
1991 Sandra Cisneros, Woman Hollering Creek	1991 United States enters Persian Gulf War • World Wide Web introduced
1992 Edward P. Jones, “The First Day”
1993 Gary Snyder, “Ripples on the Surface” • A. R. Ammons, Garbage • Sherman Alexie, “This Is What It Means to Say Phoenix, Arizona”
1996 W. S. Merwin, “Lament for the Makers” • Sherman Alexie, “The Exaggeration of Despair” • Junot Díaz, “Drown” • George Saunders, “CivilWar-Land in Bad Decline”	1995 Federal building in Oklahoma City bombed in a terrorist attack
1998 Billy Collins, “I Chop Some Parsley While Listening to Art Blakey’s Version of ‘Three Blind Mice’”	1997 Mars Pathfinder robot explores Mars

TEXTS	CONTEXTS
1999 Jhumpa Lahiri, “Sexy” • Charles Simic, “Arriving Celebrities” 2000 Lucille Clifton, “Moonchild” 2004 Louise Glück, “October” • David Foster Wallace, “Consider the Lobster” 2006 Natasha Trethewey, Native Guard 2007 Edwidge Danticat, Brother, I’m Dying • Junot Díaz, The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao 2011 Tracy K. Smith, “My God, It’s Full of Stars”	2001 Execution of Timothy McVeigh, convicted of 1995 Oklahoma City bombing • September 11 terrorist attacks on Pentagon and World Trade Center 2003 United States and Great Britain invade Iraq 2007 Advent of worst economic recession since the Great Depression. 2009 Inauguration of Barack Obama as U.S. president 2010 Massive oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico 2011 Death of terrorist leader Osama bin Laden, architect of 9/11 attacks 2013 Second inauguration of Barack Obama as U.S. president 2014 Police shooting of an unarmed black teenager named Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri, touches off nationwide protests 2015 U.S. Supreme Court rules that state bans on same-sex marriage are unconstitutional • hundreds of thousands of migrants from Syria and other areas in the Middle East cross into Europe

ROBERT PENN WARREN

1905–1989

In 1969, with a long, distinguished career as a man of letters already behind him, Robert Penn Warren published his long poem Audubon: A Vision. Although Warren wrote many highly regarded poems before the publication of the volume, until the 1960s he was best known for his fiction. In the six books of poetry that followed Audubon, Warren developed the claim he had begun earlier in his career to a powerful, distinctive, American voice. The mark of Warren's poetry, from early to late, is a passion directed toward the physical world and toward a knowledge of truth. As a poet he yearns for more than what life usually discloses, yet an intense love for the world accompanies this yearning.

Warren was born in Guthrie in southern Kentucky, and much of his writing reflects his engagement with the lessons of history as they can be read in the experience of the American South. He took this sense of history most immediately from his father, who read history and poetry aloud to the family, and from his maternal grandfather, Gabriel Telemachus Penn. Warren spent his boyhood summers on this grandfather's isolated tobacco farm. There the old man, who had fought on the Confederate side in the Civil War, told Warren tales of war while the two mapped out battles together, or the boy listened while his grandfather recited poetry "by the yard" (as Warren described it), especially Sir Walter Scott and Robert Burns. The memory of an idyllic boyhood spent dreaming amid the natural world informs many of Warren's poems.

The decisive literary moment in Warren's life came when, at the age of sixteen, he enrolled at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. He had wanted to be a naval officer, but an eye injury prevented him from taking up his commission at Annapolis. Vanderbilt was enjoying a feverish interest in poetry at the time. (Even football players, Warren reported, seemed to be writing verse, and Warren remembers that people lined up for the latest issues of the Dial and other literary periodicals in which they might find new work by Yeats or Eliot or Hart Crane.) Part of the excitement was due to the presence of the poet John Crowe Ransom, who taught Warren's freshman composition class and soon involved him, even as an undergraduate, with the Fugitives, a group of faculty members and, according to Warren, "bookish, intelligent young businessmen" who met to discuss literature and philosophy. By the time Warren joined it was largely a poetry club at which Ransom and others read and criticized one another's work. Here Warren met Allen Tate, the gifted poet and critic, who found the redheaded undergraduate, five years his junior, "the most gifted person I have ever known." For years to come they constituted a kind of southern axis in American letters, and in 1930 they joined several other southern writers in a political manifesto, I'll Take My Stand. The collection of twelve essays envisioned an agrarian South with strong local cultures as the only humane alternative to an increasingly self-destructive industrialism centered in the North.

Warren attended graduate school at the University of California, at Yale, and then as a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University in England. From 1935 to 1942 he was on the English faculty at Louisiana State University. There, along with Cleanth Brooks and Charles W. Pipkin, he founded the Southern Review, which for the seven years of their involvement was the most influential literary quarterly in the country. It was the principal forum for pioneering interpretative essays by "New Critics” such as Ransom, Kenneth Burke, and R. P. Blackmur. (Brooks and Warren also edited Understanding Poetry, the important school anthology and text that introduced students to “close reading” on New Critical principles.) In addition, the Southern Review published the best fiction by emerging southern writers such as Katherine Anne Porter and Eudora Welty.

Warren’s own fiction brought him wide critical attention in the 1940s. The novel All the King’s Men (1946), which he conceived as a verse play, won the Pulitzer Prize and later became a film. It portrayed the rise and fall of a southern demagogue who closely resembled Huey Long, the Louisiana governor and senator who was assassinated in the rotunda of the Louisiana statehouse in 1935. Warren’s interest was in showing the tangled motives of his protagonist, Willie Stark, a Depression-era governor who led a corrupt regime that was progressive in its social programs. In its focus on violent subjects with historical and psychological resonance, Warren’s fiction anticipates his sequence Audubon: A Vision. Other novels, like World Enough and Time (1950), set in the Kentucky of the 1820s, are based on documents and grow out of his ongoing study of and response to southern history.

From 1944 to 1954 Warren was intensely active in fiction and published almost no poems. In 1952 he married the writer Eleanor Clark, his second wife, and, prompted by the landscapes where they lived in Europe and by the birth of a son and daughter in the mid 1950s, he returned to poetry with a new intimacy and autobiographical intensity. His earlier work, like “Bearded Oaks,” had been strongly influenced by the formal control and the elegant, well-mannered rationality of John Crowe Ransom’s verse. But beginning with the volume Promises (1957), and revealed fully in Audubon, Warren’s poetic line loosened up, moved with vigor and raw energy. Although the tone of his poems sometimes grows too insistent or rhetorical, his muscular syntax and rhythm forged a “voice-instrument calibrated to experience,” in the words of Dave Smith, a poet of a younger generation, indebted to Warren’s work.

In Democracy and Poetry (1975), his Jefferson Lecture in the Humanities, Warren said, “What poetry most significantly celebrates is the capacity of man to face the deep, dark inwardness of his nature and fate.” In Audubon, Warren’s version of the historical John James Audubon must enter what Yeats once called “the abyss of the self” to create a heroic selfhood at the center of the poetry. Ornithologist and painter of Birds of America, Audubon (1785–1851) was artist and scientist, solitary searcher and classifier, consumed by his tasks. Basing part of his poem on Audubon’s autobiographical account, Warren imagines a man launched into his true vision after an encounter with violence at the heart of experience: he narrowly escapes being robbed and murdered in the wilderness by a crone and her sons. In this incident Audubon must also confront the violent desire of his own “lust of the eye” and thereby reconcile in himself the need for both passion and reverence toward existence. Passion directs Warren’s hero to slay the birds in order to paint them, to put them “In our imagination” (Audubon VI, “Love and Knowledge”). But reverence demands the heart’s total response to the beauty of existence. This is why Warren commands his hero and himself: “Continue to walk in the world. Yes, love it!” While the most representative figure in Warren’s poems is solitary—the individual, like Audubon, confronting versions of the American sublime—Warren also wrote a number of fine poems in other registers, among them some moving love poems. The sense of history that animates so much of his fiction becomes in his poems the persistent struggle of memory to overcome the passage of time, to make then into now, as reflected in the title of his volume Now and Then: Poems 1976–1978 (1978). The struggle with time is one aspect of the heroic engagement with existence that was the dramatic center of Warren’s work.

Bearded Oaks

The oaks, how subtle and marine,
 Bearded, and all the layered light
 Above them swims; and thus the scene,
 Recessed, awaits the positive night.

So, waiting, we in the grass now lie 5
 Beneath the languorous tread of light:
 The grasses, kelp-like, satisfy
 The nameless motions of the air.

Upon the floor of light, and time, 10
 Unmurmuring, of polyp made,
 We rest; we are, as light withdraws,
 Twin atolls on a shelf of shade.

Ages to our construction went,
 Dim architecture, hour by hour:
 And violence, forgot now, lent 15
 The present stillness all its power.

The storm of noon above us rolled,
 Of light the fury, furious gold,
 The long drag troubling us, the depth:
 Dark is unrocking, unrippling, still. 20

Passion and slaughter, ruth, decay
 Descend, minutely whispering down,
 Silted down swaying streams, to lay
 Foundation for our voicelessness.

All our debate is voiceless here, 25
 As all our rage, the rage of stone
 If hope is hopeless, then fearless is fear,
 And history is thus undone.

Our feet once wrought the hollow street
 With echo when the lamps were dead 30
 At windows, once our headlight glare
 Disturbed the doe that, leaping, fled.

I do not love you less that now
 The caged heart makes iron stroke,
 Or less that all that light once gave 35
 The graduate dark should now revoke.

We live in time so little time
 And we learn all so painfully,
 That we may spare this hour's term
 To practice for eternity. 40

From Audubon¹

I. Was Not the Lost Dauphin

[A]

Was not the lost dauphin, though handsome was only Base-born and not even able
 To make a decent living, was only Himself, Jean Jacques, and his passion—what
 Is man but his passion? 5

Saw,

Eastward and over the cypress swamp, the dawn,
 Redder than meat, break;
 And the large bird,
 Long neck outthrust, wings crooked to scull air, moved 10
 In a slow calligraphy, crank, flat, and black against
 The color of God's blood spilt, as though Pulled by a string.

Saw

It proceed across the inflamed distance. 15

Moccasins set in hoar frost, eyes fixed on the bird,
 Thought: "On that sky it is black."
 Thought: "In my mind it is white."
 Thinking: "Ardea occidentalis, heron the great one."

Dawn: his heart shook in the tension of the world. 20

Dawn: and what is your passion?

[B]

October: and the bear,
 Daft in the honey-light, yawns.

The bear's tongue, pink as a baby's, out-crisps to the curled tip,
 It bleeds the black blood of the blueberry. 25

The teeth are more importantly white
 Than has ever been imagined.

The bear feels his own fat
 Sweeten, like a drowse, deep to the bone.

Bemused, above the fume of ruined blueberries,
 The last bee hums. 30

1. John James Audubon (1785–1851), natural son of French parents (hence "Jean Jacques" in line 4), but later an American citizen. Painter, ornithologist, Kentucky settler, he dedicated his life to the pursuit, classification, and depiction of the Birds of America (first published in England, 1827). Among the stories told about his birth was one (false) that he was the Dauphin, the son of the dethroned and executed Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette of France.

The wings, like mica, glint
In the sunlight.

He leans on his gun. Thinks
How thin is the membrane between himself and the world. 35

VI. Love and Knowledge

Their footless dance
Is of the beautiful liability of their nature.
Their eyes are round, boldly convex, bright as a jewel,
And merciless. They do not know
Compassion, and if they did, 5
We should not be worthy of it. They fly
In air that glitters like fluent crystal
And is hard as perfectly transparent iron, they cleave it
With no effort. They cry
In a tongue multitudinous, often like music. 10

He slew them, at surprising distances, with his gun.
Over a body held in his hand, his head was bowed low,
But not in grief.

He put them where they are, and there we see them:
In our imagination. 15

What is love?

Our name for it is knowledge.

VII. Tell Me a Story

[A]

Long ago, in Kentucky, I, a boy, stood
By a dirt road, in first dark, and heard
The great geese hoot northward.

I could not see them, there being no moon
And the stars sparse. I heard them. 5

I did not know what was happening in my heart.

It was the season before the elderberry blooms,
Therefore they were going north.

The sound was passing northward.

[B]

Tell me a story. 10

In this century, and moment, of mania,
Tell me a story.

Make it a story of great distances, and starlight.

The name of the story will be Time,
But you must not pronounce its name. 15

Tell me a story of deep delight.
1969

Mortal Limit

I saw the hawk ride updraft in the sunset over Wyoming.
It rose from coniferous darkness, past gray jags
Of mercilessness, past whiteness, into the gloaming
Of dream-spectral light above the last purity of snow-snags.

There—west—were the Tetons.¹ Snow-peaks would soon be 5
In dark profile to break constellations. Beyond what height Hangs now the black speck? Beyond what range will gold eyes see
New ranges rise to mark a last scrawl of light?

Or, having tasted that atmosphere's thinness, does it 10
Hang motionless in dying vision before
It knows it will accept the mortal limit,
And swing into the great circular downwardness that will restore

The breath of earth? Of rock? Of rot? Of other such Items, and the darkness of whatever dream we clutch?
1985

1. High mountain range in northwest Wyoming.

THEODORE ROETHKE

1908–1963

Theodore Roethke had the kind of childhood a poet might have invented. He was born in Saginaw, Michigan, where both his German grandfather and his father kept greenhouses for a living. The greenhouse world, he later said, represented for him “both heaven and hell, a kind of tropics created in the savage climate of Michigan, where austere German Americans turned their love of order and their terrifying efficiency into something truly beautiful.” Throughout his life he was haunted both by the ordered, protected world of the greenhouse—the constant activity of growth, the cultivated flowers—and by the desolate landscape of his part of Michigan. “The marsh, the mire, the Void, is always there, immediate and terrifying. It is a splendid place for schooling the spirit. It is America.”

Roethke's poetry often reenacted this "schooling" of the spirit by revisiting the landscapes of his childhood: the nature poems that make up the largest part of his early work try to bridge the distance between a child's consciousness and the adult mysteries presided over by his father. Roethke arranged and rearranged these poems to give the sense of a spiritual autobiography, especially in preparing the volumes The Lost Son and Other Poems (1948), Praise to the End! (1951), and The Waking (1953). In what are known as "the greenhouse poems," the greenhouse world emerged as a "reality harsher than reality," the cultivator's activity pulsating and threatening. Its overseers, like "Frau Bauman, Frau Schmidt, and Frau Schwartze" (the title of one poem) emerge as gods, fates, muses, and witches all in one. By focusing on the minute processes of botanical growth—the rooting, the budding—the poet found a way of participating in the mysteries of this once alien world, whether he was deep in the subterranean root cellar or, as a child, perched high on top of the greenhouse.

In his books The Lost Son and Praise to the End! Roethke explored the regenerative possibilities of prerational speech (like children's riddles) in which language as sound recaptures nonlogical states of being. In these poems, his most dazzling and original work, Roethke opened up the possibilities of language. The title of one section of the long poem The Lost Son is "The Gibber," a pun because the word means both a meaningless utterance and the pouch at the base of a flower's calyx. The pun identifies principles of growth with the possibilities of speech freed from logical meanings, and the sequence as a whole suggests the power of both nature and language to revive the spirit of an adult life: "A lively understandable spirit / Once entertained you. / It will come again. / Be still. / Wait."

If the nature poems of Roethke's first four books explore the anxieties within him since childhood, his later love poems show him in periods of release and momentary pleasure: "And I dance round and round, / A fond and foolish man, / And see and suffer myself / In another being at last." The love poems, many included in Words for the Wind (1958) and The Far Field (1964), are among the most appealing in modern American verse. His beautiful and tender "Elegy for Jane" should be included in this category. These poems stand in sharp relief to the suffering Roethke experienced in other areas of his personal life—several mental breakdowns and periods of alcoholism—which led to a premature death. The Far Field, a posthumous volume, includes fierce, strongly rhymed lyrics in which Roethke tried "bare, even terrible statement," pressing toward the threshold of spiritual insight: "A man goes far to find out what he is— / Death of the self in a long, tearless night, / All natural shapes blazing unnatural light." The nature poems of this last volume, gathered as "The North American Sequence," use extended landscape to find natural analogies for the human passage toward the dark unknown, hoping "in their rhythms to catch the very movement of mind itself."

Roethke is remembered as one of the great teachers of poetry, especially by those young poets and critics who studied with him at the University of Washington from 1948 until the time of his death. James Wright, David Wagoner, and Richard Hugo, among others, attended his classes. He was noted for his mastery of sound and metrics. Although his own poetry was intensely personal, his starting advice to students always deemphasized undisciplined self-expression. "Write like someone else," he instructed beginners. In Roethke's own career, however, this advice had its costs. His apprenticeship to Yeats, in particular, endangered his own poetic voice; in some late poems the echo of this great predecessor makes Roethke all but inaudible.

Roethke was much honored later in his career: a Pulitzer Prize for The Waking (1953); a National Book Award and Bollingen Prize for the collected poems, Words for the Wind (1958); and a posthumous National Book Award for The Far Field (1964).

Cuttings

Sticks-in-a-drowse droop over sugary loam,
 Their intricate stem-fur dries;
 But still the delicate slips keep coaxing up water;
 The small cells bulge;

One nub of growth 5
 Nudges a sand-crumble loose,
 Pokes through a musty sheath
 Its pale tendrulous horn.

1948

Cuttings

(later)

This urge, wrestle, resurrection of dry sticks,
 Cut stems struggling to put down feet,
 What saint strained so much,
 Rose on such lopped limbs to a new life?

I can hear, underground, that sucking and sobbing, 5
 In my veins, in my bones I feel it,—
 The small waters seeping upward,
 The tight grains parting at last.
 When sprouts break out,
 Slippery as fish 10
 I quail, lean to beginnings, sheath-wet.

1948

Root Cellar

Nothing would sleep in that cellar, dank as a ditch,
 Bulbs broke out of boxes hunting for chinks in the dark,
 Shoots dangled and drooped,
 Lolling obscenely from mildewed crates,
 Hung down long yellow evil necks, like tropical snakes. 5
 And what a congress of stinks!—
 Roots ripe as old bait,
 Pulpy stems, rank, silo-rich,
 Leaf-mold, manure, lime, piled against slippery planks.
 Nothing would give up life: 10
 Even the dirt kept breathing a small breath.

1948

Big Wind

Where were the greenhouses going,
 Lunging into the lashing
 Wind driving water
 So far down the river
 All the faucets stopped?— 5
 So we drained the manure-machine
 For the steam plant,
 Pumping the stale mixture
 Into the rusty boilers,
 Watching the pressure gauge 10
 Waver over to red,
 As the seams hissed
 And the live steam
 Drove to the far
 End of the rose-house, 15
 Where the worst wind was,
 Creaking the cypress window-frames,
 Cracking so much thin glass
 We stayed all night,
 Stuffing the holes with burlap; 20
 But she rode it out,
 That old rose-house,
 She hove into the teeth of it,
 The core and pith of that ugly storm,
 Ploughing with her stiff prow, 25
 Bucking into the wind-waves
 That broke over the whole of her,
 Flailing her sides with spray,
 Flinging long strings of wet across the roof-top,
 Finally veering, wearing themselves out, merely 30
 Whistling thinly under the wind-vents;
 She sailed until the calm morning,
 Carrying her full cargo of roses.

1948

Weed Puller

Under the concrete benches,
 Hacking at black hairy roots,—
 Those lewd monkey-tails hanging from drainholes,— Digging into the soft rubble underneath,
 Webs and weeds, 5
 Grubs and snails and sharp sticks,
 Or yanking tough fern-shapes,
 Coiled green and thick, like dripping smilax,¹

1. A type of fern.

Tugging all day at perverse life:
 The indignity of it!— 10
 With everything blooming above me,
 Lilies, pale-pink cyclamen, roses,
 Whole fields lovely and inviolate,—
 Me down in that fetor of weeds,
 Crawling on all fours, 15
 Alive, in a slippery grave.

1948

Frau Bauman, Frau Schmidt, and Frau Schwartzel¹

Gone the three ancient ladies
 Who creaked on the greenhouse ladders,
 Reaching up white strings
 To wind, to wind
 The sweet-pea tendrils, the smilax,² 5
 Nasturtiums, the climbing
 Roses, to straighten
 Carnations, red
 Chrysanthemums; the stiff
 Stems, jointed like corn, 10
 They tied and tucked,—
 These nurses of nobody else.
 Quicker than birds, they dipped
 Up and sifted the dirt;
 They sprinkled and shook; 15
 They stood astride pipes,
 Their skirts billowing out wide into tents,
 Their hands twinkling with wet;
 Like witches they flew along rows
 Keeping creation at ease; 20
 With a tendril for needle
 They sewed up the air with a stem;
 They teased out the seed that the cold kept asleep,—
 All the coils, loops, and whorls.
 They trellised the sun; they plotted for more than themselves. 25

I remember how they picked me up, a spindly kid,
 Pinching and poking my thin ribs
 Till I lay in their laps, laughing,
 Weak as a whiffet;³
 Now, when I'm alone and cold in my bed, 30
 They still hover over me,
 These ancient leathery crones,

1. Women who worked in the greenhouse owned by Roethke's father.

2. A type of fern.

3. A small, young, or unimportant person (probably from whippet, a small, delicate-looking racing dog).

With their bandannas stiffened with sweat,
 And their thorn-bitten wrists,
 And their snuff-laden breath blowing lightly over me in my first sleep. 35

1948

Child on Top of a Greenhouse

The wind billowing out the seat of my britches,
 My feet crackling splinters of glass and dried putty,
 The half-grown chrysanthemums staring up like accusers,
 Up through the streaked glass, flashing with sunlight,
 A few white clouds all rushing eastward, 5
 A line of elms plunging and tossing like horses,
 And everyone, everyone pointing up and shouting!

1948

My Papa's Waltz

The whiskey on your breath
 Could make a small boy dizzy;
 But I hung on like death:
 Such waltzing was not easy.

We romped until the pans 5
 Slid from the kitchen shelf;
 My mother's countenance
 Could not unfrown itself.

The hand that held my wrist 10
 Was battered on one knuckle;
 At every step you missed
 My right ear scraped a buckle.

You beat time on my head 15
 With a palm caked hard by dirt,
 Then waltzed me off to bed
 Still clinging to your shirt.

1948

Dolor

I have known the inexorable sadness of pencils,
 Neat in their boxes, dolor of pad and paper-weight,
 All the misery of manilla folders and mucilage,

Desolation in immaculate public places,
 Lonely reception room, lavatory, switchboard, 5
 The unalterable pathos of basin and pitcher,
 Ritual of multigraph, paper-clip, comma,
 Endless duplication of lives and objects.
 And I have seen dust from the walls of institutions,
 Finer than flour, alive, more dangerous than silica, 10
 Sift, almost invisible, through long afternoons of tedium,
 Dropping a fine film on nails and delicate eyebrows,
 Glazing the pale hair, the duplicate grey standard faces.

1948

Night Crow

When I saw that clumsy crow
 Flap from a wasted tree,
 A shape in the mind rose up:
 Over the gulfs of dream
 Flew a tremendous bird 5
 Further and further away
 Into a moonless black,
 Deep in the brain, far back.

1948

The Lost Son

I. The Flight

At Woodlawn¹ I heard the dead cry:
 I was lulled by the slamming of iron,
 A slow drip over stones,
 Toads brooding wells.
 All the leaves stuck out their tongues; 5
 I shook the softening chalk of my bones,
 Saying,
 Snail, snail, glister me forward,
 Bird, soft-sigh me home,
 Worm, be with me. 10
 This is my hard time.

Fished in an old wound,
 The soft pond of repose;
 Nothing nibbled my line,
 Not even the minnows came. 15

Sat in an empty house
 Watching shadows crawl,

1. A cemetery.

Scratching.

There was one fly.

Voice, come out of the silence.

20

Say something.

Appear in the form of a spider

Or a moth beating the curtain.

Tell me:

Which is the way I take;

25

Out of what door do I go,

Where and to whom?

Dark hollows said, lee to the wind,

The moon said, back of an eel,

The salt said, look by the sea,

30

Your tears are not enough praise,

You will find no comfort here,

In the kingdom of bang and blab.

Running lightly over spongy ground,

Past the pasture of flat stones,

35

The three elms,

The sheep strewn on a field,

Over a rickety bridge

Toward the quick-water, wrinkling and rippling.

Hunting along the river,

40

Down among the rubbish, the bug-riddled foliage,

By the muddy pond-edge, by the bog-holes,

By the shrunken lake, hunting, in the heat of summer.

The shape of a rat?

It's bigger than that.

45

It's less than a leg

And more than a nose,

Just under the water

It usually goes.

Is it soft like a mouse?

50

Can it wrinkle its nose?

Could it come in the house

On the tips of its toes?

Take the skin of a cat

And the back of an eel,

55

Then roll them in grease,—

That's the way it would feel.

It's sleek as an otter

With wide webby toes

Just under the water

60

It usually goes.

2. The Pit

Where do the roots go?
 Look down under the leaves.
 Who put the moss there?
 These stones have been here too long. 65
 Who stunned the dirt into noise?
 Ask the mole, he knows.
 I feel the slime of a wet nest.
 Beware Mother Mildew.
 Nibble again, fish nerves. 70

3. The Gibber

At the wood's mouth,
 By the cave's door,
 I listened to something
 I had heard before.

Dogs of the groin 75
 Barked and howled,
 The sun was against me,
 The moon would not have me.

The weeds whined,
 The snakes cried, 80
 The cows and briars
 Said to me: Die.

What a small song. What slow clouds. What dark water.
 Hath the rain a father? All the caves are ice. Only the snow's here.
 I'm cold. I'm cold all over. Rub me in father and mother. 85
 Fear was my father, Father Fear.
 His look drained the stones.

What gliding shape
 Beckoning through halls,
 Stood poised on the stair, 90
 Fell dreamily down?

From the mouths of jugs
 Perched on many shelves,
 I saw substance flowing
 That cold morning. 95

Like a slither of eels
 That watery cheek
 As my own tongue kissed
 My lips awake.

Is this the storm's heart? The ground is unstilling itself. 100
 My veins are running nowhere. Do the bones cast out their fire?

Is the seed leaving the old bed? These buds are live as birds.
 Where, where are the tears of the world?
 Let the kisses resound, flat like a butcher's palm;
 Let the gestures freeze; our doom is already decided. 105
 All the windows are burning! What's left of my life?
 I want the old rage, the lash of primordial milk!
 Goodbye, goodbye, old stones, the time-order is going,
 I have married my hands to perpetual agitation,
 I run, I run to the whistle of money. 110

Money money money
 Water water water

How cool the grass is.
 Has the bird left?
 The stalk still sways. 115
 Has the worm a shadow?
 What do the clouds say?

These sweeps of light undo me.
 Look, look, the ditch is running white!
 I've more veins than a tree! 120
 Kiss me, ashes, I'm falling through a dark swirl.

4. The Return

The way to the boiler was dark,
 Dark all the way,
 Over slippery cinders
 Through the long greenhouse. 125

The roses kept breathing in the dark.
 They had many mouths to breathe with.
 My knees made little winds underneath
 Where the weeds slept.

There was always a single light 130
 Swinging by the fire-pit,
 Where the fireman pulled out roses,
 The big roses, the big bloody clinkers.²

Once I stayed all night.
 The light in the morning came slowly over the white 135
 Snow.
 There were many kinds of cool
 Air.
 Then came steam.

Pipe-knock. 140

2. Large cinders; the residue left in burning coal.

Scurry of warm over small plants.
 Ordnung!³ ordnung!
 Papa is coming!

A fine haze moved off the leaves;
 Frost melted on far panes; 145
 The rose, the chrysanthemum turned toward the light.
 Even the hushed forms, the bent yellowy weeds
 Moved in a slow up-sway.

5. "It was beginning winter"

It was beginning winter,
 An in-between time, 150
 The landscape still partly brown:
 The bones of weeds kept swinging in the wind,
 Above the blue snow.

It was beginning winter,
 The light moved slowly over the frozen field, 155
 Over the dry seed-crowns,
 The beautiful surviving bones
 Swinging in the wind.

Light traveled over the wide field;
 Stayed. 160
 The weeds stopped swinging.
 The mind moved, not alone,
 Through the clear air, in the silence.

Was it light?
 Was it light within? 165
 Was it light within light?
 Stillness becoming alive,
 Yet still?

A lively understandable spirit
 Once entertained you. 170
 It will come again.
 Be still.
 Wait.

1948

The Waking

I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.
 I feel my fate in what I cannot fear.
 I learn by going where I have to go.

3. A call to order (German).

We think by feeling. What is there to know?
 I hear my being dance from ear to ear. 5
 I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.

Of those so close beside me, which are you?
 God bless the Ground! I shall walk softly there,
 And learn by going where I have to go.

Light takes the Tree; but who can tell us how? 10
 The lowly worm climbs up a winding stair;
 I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.

Great Nature has another thing to do
 To you and me; so take the lively air,
 And, lovely, learn by going where to go. 15

This shaking keeps me steady. I should know.
 What falls away is always. And is near.
 I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.
 I learn by going where I have to go.

1953

Elegy for Jane

My Student, Thrown by a Horse

I remember the neckcurls, limp and damp as tendrils;
 And her quick look, a sidelong pickerel smile;
 And how, once startled into talk, the light syllables leaped for her,
 And she balanced in the delight of her thought,
 A wren, happy, tail into the wind, 5
 Her song trembling the twigs and small branches.
 The shade sang with her;
 The leaves, their whispers turned to kissing;
 And the mold sang in the bleached valleys under the rose.

Oh, when she was sad, she cast herself down into such a pure depth, 10
 Even a father could not find her:
 Scraping her cheek against straw;
 Stirring the clearest water.

My sparrow, you are not here,
 Waiting like a fern, making a spiny shadow. 15
 The sides of wet stones cannot console me,
 Nor the moss, wound with the last light.

If only I could nudge you from this sleep,
 My maimed darling, my skittery pigeon.
 Over this damp grave I speak the words of my love: 20
 I, with no rights in this matter,
 Neither father nor lover.

1953

I Knew a Woman

I knew a woman, lovely in her bones,
 When small birds sighed, she would sigh back at them;
 Ah, when she moved, she moved more ways than one:
 The shapes a bright container can contain!
 Of her choice virtues only gods should speak, 5
 Or English poets who grew up on Greek (I'd have them sing in chorus, cheek to cheek).

How well her wishes went! She stroked my chin,
 She taught me Turn, and Counter-turn, and Stand;¹
 She taught me Touch, that undulant white skin; 10
 I nibbled meekly from her proffered hand;
 She was the sickle; I, poor I, the rake,
 Coming behind her for her pretty sake
 (But what prodigious mowing we did make).

Love likes a gander, and adores a goose: 15
 Her full lips pursed, the errant note to seize;
 She played it quick, she played it light and loose;
 My eyes, they dazzled at her flowing knees;
 Her several parts could keep a pure repose, 20
 Or one hip quiver with a mobile nose
 (She moved in circles, and those circles moved).

Let seed be grass, and grass turn into hay:
 I'm martyr to a motion not my own;
 What's freedom for? To know eternity.
 I swear she cast a shadow white as stone. 25
 But who would count eternity in days?
 These old bones live to learn her wanton ways:
 (I measure time by how a body sways).

1958

Wish for a Young Wife

My lizard, my lively writher,
 May your limbs never wither,
 May the eyes in your face
 Survive the green ice
 Of envy's mean gaze; 5
 May you live out your life
 Without hate, without grief,
 And your hair ever blaze,

1. The triadic parts of a Pindaric ode, a ceremonious poem in the manner of the Greek lyric poet Pindar (c. 522–c. 438 B.C.E.).

In the sun, in the sun,
 When I am undone, 10
 When I am no one.

1964

In a Dark Time

In a dark time, the eye begins to see,
 I meet my shadow in the deepening shade;
 I hear my echo in the echoing wood—
 A lord of nature weeping to a tree.
 I live between the heron and the wren, 5
 Beasts of the hill and serpents of the den.

What's madness but nobility of soul
 At odds with circumstance? The day's on fire!
 I know the purity of pure despair,
 My shadow pinned against a sweating wall. 10
 That place among the rocks—is it a cave,
 Or winding path? The edge is what I have.

A steady storm of correspondences!
 A night flowing with birds, a ragged moon,
 And in broad day the midnight come again! 15
 A man goes far to find out what he is—
 Death of the self in a long, tearless night,
 All natural shapes blazing unnatural light.

Dark, dark my light, and darker my desire.
 My soul, like some heat-maddened summer fly, 20
 Keeps buzzing at the sill. Which I is I?
 A fallen man, I climb out of my fear.
 The mind enters itself, and God the mind,
 And one is One, free in the tearing wind.

1964

EUDORA WELTY

1909–2001

In her essay “Place in Fiction,” Eudora Welty spoke of her work as filled with the spirit of place: “Location is the ground conductor of all the currents of emotion and belief and moral conviction that charge out from the story in its course.” Both her outwardly uneventful life and her writing are most intimately connected to the topography and atmosphere, the season and the soil of Mississippi, her lifelong home.

Born in Jackson to parents who came from the North, and raised in comfortable circumstances (her father headed an insurance company), she attended Mississippi State College for Women, then graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1929. After a course in advertising at the Columbia University School of Business, she returned to Mississippi, working first as a radio writer and newspaper society editor, then for the Depression-era Works Progress Administration, taking photographs of and interviewing local residents. Those travels would be reflected in her fiction and also in a book of her photographs, One Time and Place, published in 1971.

She began writing fiction after her return to Mississippi in 1931 and five years later published her first story, "Death of a Traveling Salesman," in a small magazine. Over the next two years six of her stories were published in the Southern Review, a serious literary magazine one of whose editors was the poet and novelist Robert Penn Warren. She also received strong support from Katherine Anne Porter, who contributed an introduction to Welty's first book of stories, A Curtain of Green (1941). That introduction hailed the arrival of another gifted southern fiction writer, and in fact the volume contained some of the best stories she ever wrote, such as "Petrified Man." Her profusion of metaphor and the difficult surface of her narrative—often oblique and indirect in its effect—were in part a mark of her admiration for modern writers like Virginia Woolf and (as with any young southern writer) William Faulkner. Although Welty's stories were as shapely as those of her mentor, Porter, they were more richly idiomatic and comic in their inclination. A second collection, The Wide Net, appeared two years later; and her first novel, The Robber Bridegroom, was published in 1942.

In that year and the next she was awarded the O. Henry Memorial Prize for the best piece of short fiction, and from then on she received a steady stream of awards and prizes, including the Pulitzer Prize for her novel The Optimist's Daughter (1972). Her most ambitious and longest piece of fiction is Losing Battles (1970), in which she aimed to compose a narrative made up almost wholly out of her characters' voices in mainly humorous interplay. Like Robert Frost, Welty loved gossip in all its actuality and intimacy, and if that love failed in the novels to produce compelling, extended sequences, it did result in many lively and entertaining pages. Perhaps her finest single book after A Curtain of Green was The Golden Apples (1949), a sequence of tales about a fabulous, invented, small Mississippi community named Morgana. Her characters appear and reappear in these related stories and come together most memorably in the brilliant "June Recital," perhaps her masterpiece.

Throughout her fiction Welty's wonderfully sharp sense of humor is strongly evident. Although her characters often consist of involuted southern families, physically handicapped, mentally retarded, or generally unstable kinfolk—and although her narratives are shot through with undercurrents of death, violence, and degradation—Welty transforms everything with an entertaining twist. No matter how desperate a situation may be, she makes us listen to the way a character talks about it; we pay attention to style rather than information. And although her attitude toward human folly is satiric, her satire is devoid of the wish to undermine and mock her characters. Instead, the vivid realizations of her prose give them irresistible life and a memorable expressiveness. Yet she remarked in an essay that "fine story writers seem to be in a sense obstructionists," and Welty's narratives unfold through varied repetitions or reiterations that have, she once claimed, the function of a deliberate double exposure in photography. By making us pay close attention to who is speaking and the implications of that speech, by asking us to imagine the way in which a silent character is responding to that speech, and by making us read behind the deceptively simple response she gives to that character, she makes us active readers, playfully engaged in a typically complicated scene. "Why I Live at the P.O.," "Keela, the Outcast Indian Maiden," "Powerhouse," "June Recital," "Petrified Man," and many others demonstrate the strength and the joy of her art. And although she has been called a "regional" writer, she has noted the condescending nature of that term, which she calls an “outsider’s term; it has no meaning for the insider who is doing the writing, because as far as he knows he is simply writing about life” (On Writing). So it is with Eudora Welty’s fiction.

The text is from A Curtain of Green (1941).

Petrified Man

“Reach in my purse and git me a cigarette without no powder in it if you kin, Mrs. Fletcher, honey,” said Leota to her ten o’clock shampoo-and-set customer. “I don’t like no perfumed cigarettes.”

Mrs. Fletcher gladly reached over to the lavender shelf under the lavender-framed mirror, shook a hair net loose from the clasp of the patent-leather bag, and slapped her hand down quickly on a powder puff which burst out when the purse was opened.

“Why, look at the peanuts, Leota!” said Mrs. Fletcher in her marvelling voice.

“Honey, them goobers has been in my purse a week if they’s been in it a day. Mrs. Pike bought them peanuts.”

“Who’s Mrs. Pike?” asked Mrs. Fletcher, settling back. Hidden in this den of curling fluid and henna¹ packs, separated by a lavender swing-door from the other customers, who were being gratified in other booths, she could give her curiosity its freedom. She looked expectantly at the black part in Leota’s yellow curls as she bent to light the cigarette.

“Mrs. Pike is this lady from New Orleans,” said Leota, puffing, and pressing into Mrs. Fletcher’s scalp with strong red-nailed fingers. “A friend, not a customer. You see, like maybe I told you last time, me and Fred and Sal and Joe all had us a fuss, so Sal and Joe up and moved out, so we didn’t do a thing but rent out their room. So we rented it to Mrs. Pike. And Mr. Pike.” She flicked an ash into the basket of dirty towels. “Mrs. Pike is a very decided blonde. She bought me the peanuts.”

“She must be cute,” said Mrs. Fletcher.

“Honey, ‘cute’ ain’t the word for what she is. I’m tellin’ you, Mrs. Pike is attractive. She has her a good time. She’s got a sharp eye out, Mrs. Pike has.”

She dashed the comb through the air, and paused dramatically as a cloud of Mrs. Fletcher’s hennaed hair floated out of the lavender teeth like a small storm-cloud.

“Hair fallin’.”

“Aw, Leota.”

“Uh-huh, commencin’ to fall out,” said Leota, combing again, and letting fall another cloud.

“Is it any dandruff in it?” Mrs. Fletcher was frowning, her hair-line eyebrows diving down toward her nose, and her wrinkled, beady-lashed eyelids batting with concentration.

“Nope.” She combed again. “Just fallin’ out.”

“Bet it was that last perm’nent you gave me that did it,” Mrs. Fletcher said cruelly. “Remember you cooked me fourteen minutes.”

“You had fourteen minutes comin’ to you,” said Leota with finality.

1. Reddish brown dye for tinting hair.

“Bound to be somethin’,” persisted Mrs. Fletcher. “Dandruff, dandruff. I couldn’t of caught a thing like that from Mr. Fletcher, could I?”

“Well,” Leota answered at last, “you know what I heard in here yestiddy, one of Thelma’s ladies was settin’ over yonder in Thelma’s booth gittin’ a machineless, and I don’t mean to insist or insinuate or anything, Mrs. Fletcher, but Thelma’s lady just happ’med to throw out—I forgotten what she was talkin’ about at the time—that you was p-r-e-g., and lots of times that’ll make your hair do awful funny, fall out and God knows what all. It just ain’t our fault, is the way I look at it.”

There was a pause. The women stared at each other in the mirror.

“Who was it?” demanded Mrs. Fletcher.

“Honey, I really couldn’t say,” said Leota. “Not that you look it.”

“Where’s Thelma? I’ll get it out of her,” said Mrs. Fletcher.

“Now, honey, I wouldn’t go and git mad over a little thing like that,” Leota said, combing hastily, as though to hold Mrs. Fletcher down by the hair. “I’m sure it was somebody didn’t mean no harm in the world. How far gone are you?”

“Just wait,” said Mrs. Fletcher, and shrieked for Thelma, who came in and took a drag from Leota’s cigarette.

“Thelma, honey, throw your mind back to yestiddy if you kin,” said Leota, drenching Mrs. Fletcher’s hair with a thick fluid and catching the overflow in a cold wet towel at her neck.

“Well, I got my lady half wound for a spiral,” said Thelma doubtfully.

“This won’t take but a minute,” said Leota. “Who is it you got in there, old Horse Face? Just cast your mind back and try to remember who your lady was yestiddy who happ’med to mention that my customer was pregnant, that’s all. She’s dead to know.”

Thelma drooped her blood-red lips and looked over Mrs. Fletcher’s head into the mirror. “Why, honey, I ain’t got the faintest,” she breathed. “I really don’t recollect the faintest. But I’m sure she meant no harm. I declare, I forgot my hair finally got combed and thought it was a stranger behind me.”

“Was it that Mrs. Hutchinson?” Mrs. Fletcher was tensely polite.

“Mrs. Hutchinson? Oh, Mrs. Hutchinson.” Thelma batted her eyes. “Naw, precious, she come on Thursday and didn’t ev’m mention your name. I doubt if she ev’m knows you’re on the way.”

“Thelma!” cried Leota staunchly.

“All I know is, whoever it is ’ll be sorry some day. Why, I just barely knew it myself!” cried Mrs. Fletcher. “Just let her wait!”

“Why? What’re you gonna do to her?”

It was a child’s voice, and the women looked down. A little boy was making tents with aluminum wave pinchers² on the floor under the sink.

“Billy Boy, hon, mustn’t bother nice ladies,” Leota smiled. She slapped him brightly and behind her back waved Thelma out of the booth. “Ain’t Billy Boy a sight? Only three years old and already just nuts about the beauty-parlor business.”

“I never saw him here before,” said Mrs. Fletcher, still unmollified.

“He ain’t been here before, that’s how come,” said Leota. “He belongs to Mrs. Pike. She got her a job but it was Fay’s Millinery. He oughtn’t to try on those ladies’ hats, they come down over his eyes like I don’t know what.

2. Clips used to form and hold (or set) hair curl or wave.

They just git to look ridiculous, that's what, an' of course he's gonna put 'em on: hats. They tole Mrs. Pike they didn't appreciate him hangin' around there. Here, he couldn't hurt a thing."

"Well! I don't like children that much," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Well!" said Leota moodily.

"Well! I'm almost tempted not to have this one," said Mrs. Fletcher. "That Mrs. Hutchinson! Just looks straight through you when she sees you on the street and then spits at you behind your back."

"Mr. Fletcher would beat you on the head if you didn't have it now," said Leota reasonably. "After going this far."

Mrs. Fletcher sat up straight. "Mr. Fletcher can't do a thing with me."

"He can't!" Leota winked at herself in the mirror.

"No, siree, he can't. If he so much as raises his voice against me, he knows good and well I'll have one of my sick headaches, and then I'm just not fit to live with. And if I really look that pregnant already—"

"Well, now, honey, I just want you to know—I habn't told any of my ladies and I ain't goin' to tell 'em—even that you're losin' your hair. You just get you one of those Stork-a-Lure dresses and stop worryin'. What people don't know don't hurt nobody, as Mrs. Pike says."

"Did you tell Mrs. Pike?" asked Mrs. Fletcher sulkily.

"Well, Mrs. Fletcher, look, you ain't ever goin' to lay eyes on Mrs. Pike or her lay eyes on you, so what diffunce does it make in the long run?"

"I knew it!" Mrs. Fletcher deliberately nodded her head so as to destroy a ringlet Leota was working on behind her ear. "Mrs. Pike!"

Leota sighed. "I reckon I might as well tell you. It wasn't any more Thelma's lady tole me you was pregnant than a bat."

"Not Mrs. Hutchinson?"

"Naw, Lord! It was Mrs. Pike."

"Mrs. Pike!" Mrs. Fletcher could only sputter and let curling fluid roll into her ear. "How could Mrs. Pike possibly know I was pregnant or otherwise, when she doesn't even know me? The nerve of some people!"

"Well, here's how it was. Remember Sunday?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Sunday, Mrs. Pike an' me was all by ourself. Mr. Pike and Fred had gone over to Eagle Lake, sayin' they was goin' to catch 'em some fish, but they didn't a course. So we was gettin' in Mrs. Pike's car, it's a 1939 Dodge—"

"1939, eh," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"—An' we was gettin' us a Jax beer apiece—that's the beer that Mrs. Pike says is made right in N.O., so she won't drink no other kind. So I seen you drive up to the drugstore an' run in for just a secont, leavin' I reckon Mr. Fletcher in the car, an' come runnin' out with looked like a perscription. So I says to Mrs. Pike, just to be makin' talk, 'Right yonder's Mrs. Fletcher, and I reckon that's Mr. Fletcher—she's one of my regular customers,' I says."

"I had on a figured print," said Mrs. Fletcher tentatively.

"You sure did," agreed Leota. "So Mrs. Pike, she give you a good look—she's very observant, a good judge of character, cute as a minute, you know—and she says, 'I bet you another Jax that lady's three months on the way.'"

"What gall!" said Mrs. Fletcher. "Mrs. Pike!"

"Mrs. Pike ain't goin' to bite you," said Leota. "Mrs. Pike is a lovely girl, you'd be crazy about her, Mrs. Fletcher. But she can't sit still a minute. We went to the travellin' freak show yestiddy after work. I got through early—nine o'clock. In the vacant store next door. What, you ain't been?"

"No, I despise freaks," declared Mrs. Fletcher.

"Aw. Well, honey, talkin' about bein' pregnant an' all, you ought to see those twins in a bottle, you really owe it to yourself."

"What twins?" asked Mrs. Fletcher out of the side of her mouth.

"Well, honey, they got these two twins in a bottle, see? Born joined plumb together—dead a course." Leota dropped her voice into a soft lyrical hum. "They was about this long—pardon—must of been full time, all right, wouldn't you say?—an' they had these two heads an' two faces an' four arms an' four legs, all kind of joined here. See, this face looked this-a-way, and the other face looked that-a-way, over their shoulder, see. Kinda pathetic."

"Glah!" said Mrs. Fletcher disapprovingly.

"Well, ugly? Honey, I mean to tell you—their parents was first cousins and all like that. Billy Boy, git me a fresh towel from off Teeny's stack—this 'n's wringin' wet—an' quit ticklin' my ankles with that curler. I declare! He don't miss nothin'."

"Me and Mr. Fletcher aren't one speck of kin, or he could never of had me," said Mrs. Fletcher placidly.

"Of course not!" protested Leota. "Neither is me an' Fred, not that we know of. Well, honey, what Mrs. Pike liked was the pygmies. They've got these pygmies down there, too, an' Mrs. Pike was just wild about 'em. You know, the teeniniest men in the universe? Well, honey, they can just rest back on their little bohunkus an' roll around an' you can't hardly tell if they're sittin' or standin'. That'll give you some idea. They're about forty-two years old. Just suppose it was your husband!"

"Well, Mr. Fletcher is five foot nine and one half," said Mrs. Fletcher quickly.

"Fred's five foot ten," said Leota, "but I tell him he's still a shrimp, account of I'm so tall." She made a deep wave over Mrs. Fletcher's other temple with the comb. "Well, these pygmies are a kind of a dark brown, Mrs. Fletcher. Not bad lookin' for what they are, you know."

"I wouldn't care for them," said Mrs. Fletcher. "What does that Mrs. Pike see in them?"

"Aw, I don't know," said Leota. "She's just cute, that's all. But they got this man, this petrified man, that ever'thing ever since he was nine years old, when it goes through his digestion, see, somehow Mrs. Pike says it goes to his joints and has been turning to stone."

"How awful!" said Mrs. Fletcher.

"He's forty-two too. That looks like a bad age."

"Who said so, that Mrs. Pike? I bet she's forty-two," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Naw," said Leota, "Mrs. Pike's thirty-three, born in January, an Aquarian. He could move his head—like this. A course his head and mind ain't a joint, so to speak, and I guess his stomach ain't, either—not yet, anyways. But see—his food, he eats it, and it goes down, see, and then he digests it"—Leota rose on her toes for an instant—"and it goes out to his joints and before you can say 'Jack Robinson,' it's stone—pure stone. He's turning to stone. How'd you liked to be married to a guy like that? All he can do, he can move his head just a quarter of an inch. A course he looks just terrible."

"I should think he would," said Mrs. Fletcher frostily. "Mr. Fletcher takes bending exercises every night of the world. I make him."

"All Fred does is lay around the house like a rug. I wouldn't be surprised if he woke up some day and couldn't move. The petrified man just sat there moving his quarter of an inch though," said Leota reminiscently.

"Did Mrs. Pike like the petrified man?" asked Mrs. Fletcher.

"Not as much as she did the others," said Leota deprecatingly. "And then she likes a man to be a good dresser, and all that."

"Is Mr. Pike a good dresser?" asked Mrs. Fletcher sceptically.

"Oh, well, yeah," said Leota, "but he's twelve or fourteen years older'n her. She ast Lady Evangeline about him."

"Who's Lady Evangeline?" asked Mrs. Fletcher.

"Well, it's this mind reader they got in the freak show," said Leota. "Was real good. Lady Evangeline is her name, and if I had another dollar I wouldn't do a thing but have my other palm read. She had what Mrs. Pike said was the 'sixth mind' but she had the worst manicure I ever saw on a living person."

"What did she tell Mrs. Pike?" asked Mrs. Fletcher.

"She told her Mr. Pike was as true to her as he could be and besides, would come into some money."

"Humph!" said Mrs. Fletcher. "What does he do?"

"I can't tell," said Leota, "because he don't work. Lady Evangeline didn't tell me enough about my nature or anything. And I would like to go back and find out some more about this boy. Used to go with this boy until he got married to this girl. Oh, shoot, that was about three and a half years ago, when you was still goin' to the Robert E. Lee Beauty Shop in Jackson. He married her for her money. Another fortune-teller tole me that at the time. So I'm not in love with him anymore, anyway, besides being married to Fred, but Mrs. Pike thought, just for the hell of it, see, to ask Lady Evangeline was he happy."

"Does Mrs. Pike know everything about you already?" asked Mrs. Fletcher unbelievably. "Mercy!"

"Oh, yeah, I tole her ever'thing about ever'thing, from now on back to I don't know when—to when I first started goin' out," said Leota. "So I ast Lady Evangeline for one of my questions, was he happily married, and she says, just like she was glad I ask her, 'Honey,' she says, 'naw, he idn't. You write down this day, March 8, 1941,' she says, 'and mock it down: three years from today him and her won't be occupyin' the same bed.' There it is, up on the wall with them other dates—see, Mrs. Fletcher? And she says, 'Child, you ought to be glad you didn't git him, because he's so mercenary.' So I'm glad I married Fred. He sure ain't mercenary, money don't mean a thing to him. But I sure would like to go back and have my other palm read."

"Did Mrs. Pike believe in what the fortune-teller said?" asked Mrs. Fletcher in a superior tone of voice.

"Lord, yes, she's from New Orleans. Ever'body in New Orleans believes ever'thing spooky. One of 'em in New Orleans before it was raided says to Mrs. Pike one summer she was goin' to go from State to State and meet some grey-headed men, and, sure enough, she says she went on a beautician convention up to Chicago. . . ."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Fletcher. "Oh, is Mrs. Pike a beautician too?"

"Sure she is," protested Leota. "She's a beautician. I'm goin' to git her in here if I can. Before she married. But it don't leave you. She says sure enough, there was three men who was a very large part of making her trip what it was, and they all three had grey in their hair and they went in six States. Got Christmas cards from 'em. Billy Boy, go see if Thelma's got any dry cotton. Look how Mrs. Fletcher's a-drippin'."

"Where did Mrs. Pike meet Mr. Pike?" asked Mrs. Fletcher primly.

"On another train," said Leota.

"I met Mr. Fletcher, or rather he met me, in a rental library," said Mrs. Fletcher with dignity, as she watched the net come down over her head.

"Honey, me an' Fred, we met in a rumble seat³ eight months ago and we was practically on what you might call the way to the altar inside of half an hour," said Leota in a guttural voice, and bit a bobby pin open. "Course it don't last. Mrs. Pike says nothin' like that ever lasts."

"Mr. Fletcher and myself are as much in love as the day we married," said Mrs. Fletcher belligerently as Leota stuffed cotton into her ears.

"Mrs. Pike says it don't last," repeated Leota in a louder voice. "Now go git under the dryer. You can turn yourself on, can't you? I'll be back to comb you out. Durin' lunch I promised to give Mrs. Pike a facial. You know—free. Her bein' in the business, so to speak."

"I bet she needs one," said Mrs. Fletcher, letting the swing-door fly back against Leota. "Oh, pardon me."

A week later, on time for her appointment, Mrs. Fletcher sank heavily into Leota's chair after first removing a drug-store rental book, called Life Is Like That, from the seat. She stared in a discouraged way into the mirror.

"You can tell it when I'm sitting down, all right," she said.

Leota seemed preoccupied and stood shaking out a lavender cloth. She began to pin it around Mrs. Fletcher's neck in silence.

"I said you sure can tell it when I'm sitting straight on and coming at you this way," Mrs. Fletcher said.

"Why, honey, naw you can't," said Leota gloomily. "Why, I'd never know. If somebody was to come up to me on the street and say, 'Mrs. Fletcher is pregnant!' I'd say, 'Heck, she don't look it to me.'"

"If a certain party hadn't found it out and spread it around, it wouldn't be too late even now," said Mrs. Fletcher frostily, but Leota was almost choking her with the cloth, pinning it so tight, and she couldn't speak clearly. She paddled her hands in the air until Leota wearily loosened her.

"Listen, honey, you're just a virgin compared to Mrs. Montjoy," Leota was going on, still absent-minded. She bent Mrs. Fletcher back in the chair and, sighing, tossed liquid from a teacup on to her head and dug both hands into her scalp. "You know Mrs. Montjoy—her husband's that premature-greyheaded fella?"

"She's in the Trojan Garden Club, is all I know," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Well, honey," said Leota, but in a weary voice, "she come in here not the week before and not the day before she had her baby—she come in here the very selfsame day, I mean to tell you. Child, we was all plumb scared to death. There she was! Come for her shampoo an' set. Why, Mrs. Fletcher, in an hour an' twenty minutes she was layin' up there in the Baptist Hospital with a seb'm-pound son. It was that close a shave. I declare, if I hadn't been so tired I would of drank up a bottle of gin that night."

"What gall," said Mrs. Fletcher. "I never knew her at all well."

3. Folding seat at the rear of an automobile.

"See, her husband was waitin' outside in the car, and her bags was all packed an' in the back seat, an' she was all ready, 'cept she wanted her shampoo an' set. An' havin' one pain right after another. Her husband kep' comin' in here, scared-like, but couldn't do nothin' with her a course. She yelled bloody murder, too, but she always yelled her head off when I give her a perm'nent."

"She must of been crazy," said Mrs. Fletcher. "How did she look?"

"Shoot!" said Leota.

"Well, I can guess," said Mrs. Fletcher. "Awful."

"Just wanted to look pretty while she was havin' her baby, is all," said Leota airily. "Course, we was glad to give the lady what she was after—that's our motto—but I bet a hour later she wasn't payin' no mind to them little end curls. I bet she wasn't thinkin' about she ought to have on a net. It wouldn't of done her no good if she had."

"No, I don't suppose it would," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Yeah man! She was a-yellin'. Just like when I give her perm'nent."

"Her husband ought to make her behave. Don't it seem that way to you?" asked Mrs. Fletcher. "He ought to put his foot down."

"Ha," said Leota. "A lot he could do. Maybe some women is soft."

"Oh, you mistake me, I don't mean for her to get soft—far from it! Women have to stand up for themselves, or there's just no telling. But now you take me—I ask Mr. Fletcher's advice now and then, and he appreciates it, especially on something important, like is it time for a permanent—not that I've told him about the baby. He says, 'Why, dear, go ahead!' Just ask their advice."

"Huh! If I ever ast Fred's advice we'd be floatin' down the Yazoo River on a houseboat or somethin' by this time," said Leota. "I'm sick of Fred. I told him to go over to Vicksburg."

"Is he going?" demanded Mrs. Fletcher.

"Sure. See, the fortune-teller—I went back and had my other palm read, since we've got to rent the room agin—said my lover was goin' to work in Vicksburg, so I don't know who she could mean, unless she meant Fred. And Fred ain't workin' here—that much is so."

"Is he going to work in Vicksburg?" asked Mrs. Fletcher. "And—"

"Sure. Lady Evangeline said so. Said the future is going to be brighter than the present. He don't want to go, but I ain't gonna put up with nothin' like that. Lays around the house an' bulls—did bull—with that good-for-nothin' Mr. Pike. He says if he goes who'll cook, but I says I never get to eat anyway—not meals. Billy Boy, take Mrs. Grover that Screen Secrets and leg it."

Mrs. Fletcher heard stamping feet go out the door.

"Is that that Mrs. Pike's little boy here again?" she asked, sitting up gingerly.

"Yeah, that's still him." Leota stuck out her tongue.

Mrs. Fletcher could hardly believe her eyes. "Well! How's Mrs. Pike, your attractive new friend with the sharp eyes who spreads it around town that perfect strangers are pregnant?" she asked in a sweetened tone.

"Oh, Mizziz Pike." Leota combed Mrs. Fletcher's hair with heavy strokes.

"You act like you're tired," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Tired? Feel like it's four o'clock in the afternoon already," said Leota. "I ain't told you the awful luck we had, me and Fred? It's the worst thing you ever heard of. Maybe you think Mrs. Pike's got sharp eyes. Shoot, there's a limit! Well, you know, we rented out our room to this Mr. and Mrs. Pike from New Orleans when Sal an' Joe Fentress got mad at us 'cause they drank up some home-brew we had in the closet—Sal an' Joe did. So, a week ago Sat'-day Mr. and Mrs. Pike moved in. Well, I kinda fixed up the room, you know—put a sofa pillow on the couch and picked some ragged robbins and put in a vase, but they never did say they appreciated it. Anyway, then I put some old magazines on the table."

"I think that was lovely," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"Wait. So, come night 'fore last, Fred and this Mr. Pike, who Fred just took up with, was back from they said they was fishin', bein' as neither one of 'em has got a job to his name, and we was all settin' around their room. So Mrs. Pike was settin' there, readin' a old Startling G-Man Tales that was mine, mind you, I'd bought it myself, and all of a sudden she jumps!—into the air—you'd 'a' thought she'd set on a spider—an' says, 'Canfield'—ain't that silly, that's Mr. Pike—'Canfield, my God Almighty,' she says, 'honey,' she says, 'we're rich, and you won't have to work.' Not that he turned one hand anyway. Well, me and Fred rushes over to her, and Mr. Pike, too, and there she sets, pointin' her finger at a photo in my copy of Startling G-Man. 'See that man?' yells Mrs. Pike. 'Remember him, Canfield?' 'Never forget a face,' says Mr. Pike. 'It's Mr. Petrie, that we stayed with him in the apartment next to ours in Toulouse Street in N.O. for six weeks. Mr. Petrie.' 'Well,' says Mrs. Pike, like she can't hold out one secont longer, 'Mr. Petrie is wanted for five hundred dollars cash, for rapin' four women in California, and I know where he is.'"

"Mercy!" said Mrs. Fletcher. "Where was he?"

At some time Leota had washed her hair and now she yanked her up by the back locks and sat her up.

"Know where he was?"

"I certainly don't," Mrs. Fletcher said. Her scalp hurt all over.

Leota flung a towel around the top of her customer's head. "Nowhere else but in that freak show! I saw him just as plain as Mrs. Pike. He was the petrified man!"

"Who would ever have thought that!" cried Mrs. Fletcher sympathetically.

"So Mr. Pike says, 'Well whatta you know about that', an' he looks real hard at the photo and whistles. And she starts dancin' and singin' about their good luck. She meant our bad luck! I made a point of tellin' that fortune-teller the next time I saw her. I said, 'Listen, that magazine was layin' around the house for a month, and there was the freak show runnin' night an' day, not two steps away from my own beauty parlor, with Mr. Petrie just settin' there waitin'. An' it had to be Mr. and Mrs. Pike, almost perfect strangers.'"

"What gall," said Mrs. Fletcher. She was only sitting there, wrapped in a turban, but she did not mind.

"Fortune-tellers don't care. And Mrs. Pike, she goes around actin' like she thinks she was Mrs. God," said Leota. "So they're goin' to leave tomorrow, Mr. and Mrs. Pike. And in the meantime I got to keep that mean, bad little ole kid here, gettin' under my feet ever' minute of the day an' talkin' back too."

"Have they gotten the five hundred dollars' reward already?" asked Mrs. Fletcher.

"Well," said Leota, "at first Mr. Pike didn't want to do anything about it. Can you feature that? Said he kinda liked that ole bird and said he was real nice to 'em, lent 'em money or somethin'. But Mrs. Pike simply tole him he could just go to hell, and I can see her point. She says, 'You ain't worked a lick in six months, and here I make five hundred dollars in two seconts, and what thanks do I get for it? You go to hell, Canfield,' she says. So," Leota went on in a despondent voice, "they called up the cops and they caught the ole bird, all right, right there in the freak show where I saw him with my own eyes, thinkin' he was petrified. He's the one. Did it under his real name—Mr. Petrie. Four women in California, all in the month of August. So Mrs. Pike gits five hundred dollars. And my magazine, and right next door to my beauty parlor. I cried all night, but Fred said it wasn't a bit of use and to go to sleep, because the whole thing was just a sort of coincidence—you know: can't do nothin' about it. He says it put him clean out of the notion of goin' to Vicksburg for a few days till we rent out the room agin—no tellin' who we'll git this time."

"But can you imagine anybody knowing this old man, that's raped four women?" persisted Mrs. Fletcher, and she shuddered audibly. "Did Mrs. Pike speak to him when she met him in the freak show?"

Leota had begun to comb Mrs. Fletcher's hair. "I says to her, I says, 'I didn't notice you fallin' on his neck when he was the petrified man—don't tell me you didn't recognize your fine friend?' And she says, 'I didn't recognize him with that white powder all over his face. He just looked familiar,' Mrs. Pike says, 'and lots of people look familiar.' But she says that ole petrified man did put her in mind of somebody. She wondered who it was! Kep' her awake, which man she'd ever knew it reminded her of. So when she seen the photo, it all come to her. Like a flash. Mr. Petrie. The way he'd turn his head and look at her when she took him in his breakfast."

"Took him in his breakfast!" shrieked Mrs. Fletcher. "Listen—don't tell me. I'd 'a' felt something."

"Four women. I guess those women didn't have the faintest notion at the time they'd be worth a hundred an' twenty-five bucks apiece some day to Mrs. Pike. We ast her how old the fella was then, an's she says he musta had one foot in the grave, at least. Can you beat it?"

"Not really petrified at all, of course," said Mrs. Fletcher meditatively. She drew herself up. "I'd 'a' felt something," she said proudly.

"Shoot! I did feel somethin'," said Leota. "I tole Fred when I got home I felt so funny. I said, 'Fred, that ole petrified man sure did leave me with a funny feelin'.' He says, 'Funny-haha or funny-peculiar?' and I says, 'Funny-peculiar.'" She pointed her comb into the air emphatically.

"I'll bet you did," said Mrs. Fletcher.

They both heard a crackling noise.

Leota screamed, "Billy Boy! What you doin' in my purse?"

"Aw, I'm just eatin' these ole stale peanuts up," said Billy Boy.

"You come here to me!" screamed Leota, recklessly flinging down the comb, which scattered a whole ashtray full of bobby pins and knocked down a row of Coca-Cola bottles. "This is the last straw!"

"I caught him! I caught him!" giggled Mrs. Fletcher. "I'll hold him on my lap. You bad, bad boy, you! I guess I better learn how to spank little old bad boys," she said.

Leota's eleven o'clock customer pushed open the swing-door upon Leota's paddling him heartily with the brush, while he gave angry but belittling screams which penetrated beyond the booth and filled the whole curious beauty parlor. From everywhere ladies began to gather round to watch the paddling. Billy Boy kicked both Leota and Mrs. Fletcher as hard as he could, Mrs. Fletcher with her new fixed smile.

Billy Boy stomped through the group of wild-haired ladies and went out the door, but flung back the words, “If you’re so smart, why ain’t you rich?”

1941

ELIZABETH BISHOP

1911–1979

“The enormous power of reticence,” the poet Octavio Paz said in a tribute, “—that is the great lesson of Elizabeth Bishop.” Bishop’s reticence originates in a temperament indistinguishable from her style; her remarkable formal gifts allowed her to create ordered and lucid structures that hold strong feelings in place. Chief among these feelings was a powerful sense of loss. Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, she was eight months old when her father died. Her mother suffered a series of breakdowns and was permanently institutionalized when Elizabeth was five. “I’ve never concealed this,” Bishop once wrote, “although I don’t like to make too much of it. But of course it is an important fact, to me. I didn’t see her again.” Her understatement is characteristic. When Bishop wrote about her early life—as she first did in several poems and stories in the 1950s and last did in her extraordinary final book, Geography III (1976)—she resisted sentimentality and self-pity. It was as if she could look at the events of her own life with the same unflinching gaze she turned on the landscapes that so consistently compelled her. The deep feeling in her poems rises out of direct and particular description, but Bishop does more than simply observe. Whether writing about her childhood landscape of Nova Scotia or her adopted Brazil, she often opens a poem with long perspectives on time, with landscapes that dwarf the merely human, emphasizing the dignified frailty of a human observer.

Examining her own case, she traces the observer’s instinct to early childhood. “In the Waiting Room,” a poem written in the early 1970s, probes the sources of her interest in details. Using an incident from when she was seven—a little girl waits for her aunt in the dentist’s anteroom—Bishop shows how in the course of the episode she became aware, as if wounded, of the utter strangeness and engulfing power of the world. The spectator in that poem hangs on to details as a kind of life jacket; she observes because she has to.

After her father’s death, Bishop and her mother lived with Bishop’s maternal grandparents in Great Village, Nova Scotia. She remained there for several years after her mother was institutionalized, until she was removed (“kidnapped,” as she says in one of her stories) by her paternal grandparents and taken to live in Worcester, Massachusetts. This experience was followed by a series of illnesses (eczema, bronchitis, and asthma), which plagued her for years. Bishop later lived with an aunt and attended Walnut Hill School, a private high school. In 1934 she graduated from Vassar College, where she had been introduced to Marianne Moore. Moore’s meticulous taste for fact was to influence Bishop’s poetry, but more immediately Moore’s independent life as a poet seemed an alternative to Bishop’s vaguer intentions to attend medical school. Bishop lived in New York City and in Key West, Florida; a traveling fellowship took her to Brazil, where she met Lotade Macedo Soares, an architect with whom she lived for sixteen years. Lota committed suicide in 1967, a loss registered in Bishop’s late villanelle “One Art” (1976).

Exile and travel were always at the heart of Bishop's poems. The title of her first book, North & South (1946), looks backward to the northern seas of Nova Scotia and forward to the tropical worlds of Brazil. Her poems are set among these landscapes, where she can stress the sweep and violence of encircling and eroding geological powers or, in the case of Brazil, a bewildering botanical plenty. Questions of Travel (1965), her third volume, constitutes a sequence of poems initiating her, with her botanist-geologist-anthropologist's curiosity, into Brazilian life and the mysteries of what questions a traveler-exile should ask. In this series with its increasing penetration of a new country, a process is at work similar to one Bishop identifies in the great English naturalist Charles Darwin, of whom Bishop once said: "One admires the beautiful solid case being built up out of his endless, heroic observations, almost unconscious or automatic—and then comes a sudden relaxation, a forgetful phrase, and one feels the strangeness of his undertaking, sees the lonely young man, his eyes fixed on facts and minute details, sinking or sliding giddily off into the unknown."

In 1969 Bishop's Complete Poems appeared, an ironic title in light of the fact that she continued to publish new poetry. Geography III contains some of her best work, poems that, from the perspective of her return to the United States, look back on the appetite for exploration apparent in her earlier verse. The influence of her long friendship with the poet Robert Lowell, and their high regard for one another's work, may be felt in the way Geography III explores the memory and autobiography more directly than does her earlier work. Bishop, however, believed that there were limits on the ways in which poems could use the materials of a life. In a well-known 1972 letter to Lowell, she discusses these limits. Having left Brazil, Bishop lived in Boston from 1970 and taught at Harvard University until 1977. She received the Pulitzer Prize for the combined volume North & South and A Cold Spring (1955) and the National Book Award for The Complete Poems, and in 1976 was the first woman and the first American to receive the Books Abroad Neustadt International Prize for Literature. Since Bishop's death, most of her published work has been gathered in two volumes: The Complete Poems 1929–1979 and The Collected Prose. An edition of her unpublished poems and drafts, Edgar Allan Poe & The Juke-Box, was published to some controversy in 2006.

The Man-Moth¹

Here, above,
 cracks in the buildings are filled with battered moonlight.
 The whole shadow of Man is only as big as his hat.
 It lies at his feet like a circle for a doll to stand on, and he makes an inverted pin, the point magnetized to the moon. 5
 He does not see the moon; he observes only her vast properties, feeling the queer light on his hands, neither warm nor cold,
 of a temperature impossible to record in thermometers.

But when the Man-Moth pays his rare, although occasional, visits to the surface, 10 the moon looks rather different to him. He emerges from an opening under the edge of one of the sidewalks

1. Newspaper misprint for "mammoth" [Bishop's note]. Bishop explained that when she saw this misprint in the New York Times she took it as "an oracle . . . kindly explaining New York City to me, at least for a moment."

and nervously begins to scale the faces of buildings.
 He thinks the moon is a small hole at the top of the sky, proving the sky quite useless for protection. 15
 He trembles, but must investigate as high as he can climb.

Up the façades,
 his shadow dragging like a photographer's cloth behind him, he climbs fearfully, thinking that this time he will manage to push his small head through that round clean opening 20 and be forced through, as from a tube, in black scrolls on the light.

(Man, standing below him, has no such illusions.)
 But what the Man-Moth fears most he must do, although he fails, of course, and falls back scared but quite unhurt.

Then he returns 25 to the pale subways of cement he calls his home. He flits, he flutters, and cannot get aboard the silent trains fast enough to suit him. The doors close swiftly.
 The Man-Moth always seats himself facing the wrong way and the train starts at once at its full, terrible speed, 30 without a shift in gears or a gradation of any sort.
 He cannot tell the rate at which he travels backwards.

Each night he must be carried through artificial tunnels and dream recurrent dreams.
 Just as the ties recur beneath his train, these underlie 35 his rushing brain. He does not dare look out the window, for the third rail,² the unbroken draught of poison, runs there beside him. He regards it as disease he has inherited susceptibility to. He has to keep his hands in pockets, as others must wear mufflers. 40

If you catch him, hold up a flashlight to his eye. It's all dark pupil, an entire night itself, whose haired horizon tightens as he stares back, and closes up the eye. Then from the lids one tear, his only possession, like the bee's sting, slips. 45
 Slyly he palms it, and if you're not paying attention he'll swallow it. However, if you watch, he'll hand it over, cool as from underground springs and pure enough to drink.

1935

The Fish

I caught a tremendous fish and held him beside the boat half out of water, with my hook

2. The exposed electrical conductor of a railway that carries high-voltage power and thus the threat of electrocution.

fast in a corner of his mouth.
 He didn't fight. 5
 He hadn't fought at all.
 He hung a grunting weight, battered and venerable and homely. Here and there his brown skin hung in strips 10 like ancient wallpaper, and its pattern of darker brown was like wallpaper:
 shapes like full-blown roses stained and lost through age. 15
 He was speckled with barnacles, fine rosettes of lime,
 and infested
 with tiny white sea-lice, and underneath two or three 20
 rags of green weed hung down.
 While his gills were breathing in the terrible oxygen
 —the frightening gills,
 fresh and crisp with blood, 25
 that can cut so badly—
 I thought of the coarse white flesh packed in like feathers,
 the big bones and the little bones, the dramatic reds and blacks 30
 of his shiny entrails, and the pink swim-bladder
 like a big peony.
 I looked into his eyes which were far larger than mine 35 but shallower, and yellowed, the irises backed and packed with tarnished tinfoil seen through the lenses of old scratched isinglass.¹ 40
 They shifted a little, but not to return my stare.
 —It was more like the tipping of an object toward the light.
 I admired his sullen face, 45
 the mechanism of his jaw, and then I saw that from his lower lip
 —if you could call it a lip—grim, wet, and weaponlike, 50 hung five old pieces of fish-line, or four and a wire leader
 with the swivel still attached,

1. A whitish, semitransparent substance, originally obtained from the swim bladders of some freshwater fish and occasionally used for windows.

with all their five big hooks grown firmly in his mouth. 55
 A green line, frayed at the end where he broke it, two heavier lines, and a fine black thread
 still crimped from the strain and snap when it broke and he got away. 60
 Like medals with their ribbons
 frayed and wavering,
 a five-haired beard of wisdom trailing from his aching jaw.
 I stared and stared 65
 and victory filled up
 the little rented boat,
 from the pool of bilge
 where oil had spread a rainbow around the rusted engine 70 to the bailer rusted orange,
 the sun-cracked thwarts,
 the oarlocks on their strings,
 the gunnels—until everything was rainbow, rainbow, rainbow! 75
 And I let the fish go.

1946

Over 2,000 Illustrations and a Complete Concordance¹

Thus should have been our travels:
 serious, engravable.
 The Seven Wonders of the World are tired and a touch familiar, but the other scenes, innumerable, though equally sad and still, 5 are foreign. Often the squatting Arab, or group of Arabs, plotting, probably, against our Christian Empire,
 while one apart, with outstretched arm and hand points to the Tomb, the Pit, the Sepulcher.² 10
 The branches of the date-palms look like files.
 The cobbled courtyard, where the Well is dry, is like a diagram, the brickwork conduits are vast and obvious, the human figure far gone in history or theology, 15 gone with its camel or its faithful horse.
 Always the silence, the gesture, the specks of birds suspended on invisible threads above the Site, or the smoke rising solemnly, pulled by threads.

1. Part of the title of an old edition of the Bible described in the opening lines of the poem. A concordance is a guide to occurrences of words and proper names and places in a book.

2. Jesus's burial place, depicted (along with other places associated with his life, such as the Well and the Site) among the "2,000 illustrations" of the title.

Granted a page alone or a page made up 20 of several scenes arranged in catty-cornered rectangles or circles set on stippled gray, granted a grim lunette,³ caught in the toils of an initial letter, when dwelt upon, they all resolve themselves. 25
 The eye drops, weighted, through the lines the burin⁴ made, the lines that move apart like ripples above sand, dispersing storms, God's spreading fingerprint, and painfully, finally, that ignite 30
 in watery prismatic white-and-blue.

Entering the Narrows at St. Johns⁵
 the touching bleat of goats reached to the ship.
 We glimpsed them, reddish, leaping up the cliffs 35 among the fog-soaked weeds and butter-and-eggs.⁶
 And at St. Peter's⁷ the wind blew and the sun shone madly.
 Rapidly, purposefully, the Collegians⁸ marched in lines,
 crisscrossing the great square with black, like ants.
 In Mexico the dead man lay in a blue arcade; the dead volcanoes 40
 glistened like Easter lilies.
 The jukebox went on playing "Ay, Jalisco!"
 And at Volubilis⁹ there were beautiful poppies splitting the mosaics; the fat old guide made eyes.
 In Dingle¹ harbor a golden length of evening 45
 the rotting hulks held up their dripping plush.
 The Englishwoman poured tea, informing us that the Duchess was going to have a baby.
 And in the brothels of Marrakesh²
 the little pockmarked prostitutes 50 balanced their tea-trays on their heads and did their belly-dances; flung themselves naked and giggling against our knees, asking for cigarettes. It was somewhere near there
 I saw what frightened me most of all: 55
 A holy grave, not looking particularly holy, one of a group under a keyhole-arched stone baldaquin³
 open to every wind from the pink desert.
 An open, gritty, marble trough, carved solid with exhortation, yellowed 60
 as scattered cattle-teeth;
 half-filled with dust, not even the dust of the poor prophet paynim who once lay there.
 In a smart burnoose⁴ Khadour looked on amused.

3. An oval framing an illustration, often part of an enlarged initial letter.

4. An engraver's tool.

5. In Newfoundland.

6. A plant whose flowers are two shades of yellow.

7. The papal basilica in Rome.

8. Members of constituent orders of the Catholic Church.

9. A ruined Roman city in Morocco.

1. A town in southwest Ireland.

2. A city in Morocco.

3. Architectural canopy.

4. A long cloak with a hood. "Paynim": archaic literary word for pagan, especially Muslim.

Everything only connected by “and” and “and.” 65
 Open the book. (The gilt rubs off the edges of the pages and pollinates the fingertips.)
 Open the heavy book. Why couldn’t we have seen this old Nativity while we were at it?
 —the dark ajar, the rocks breaking with light, 70 an undisturbed, unbreathing flame, colorless, sparkless, freely fed on straw,
 and, lulled within, a family with pets,
 —and looked and looked our infant⁵ sight away.

1955

The Bight¹

On My Birthday

At low tide like this how sheer the water is.
 White, crumbling ribs of marl protrude and glare and the boats are dry, the pilings dry as matches.
 Absorbing, rather than being absorbed,
 the water in the bight doesn’t wet anything, 5
 the color of the gas flame turned as low as possible.
 One can smell it turning to gas; if one were Baudelaire² one could probably hear it turning to marimba music.
 The little ocher dredge at work off the end of the dock already plays the dry perfectly off-beat claves. 10
 The birds are outside. Pelicans crash into this peculiar gas unnecessarily hard,
 it seems to me, like pickaxes,
 rarely coming up with anything to show for it,
 and going off with humorous elbowings. 15
 Black-and-white man-of-war birds soar on impalpable drafts and open their tails like scissors on the curves or tense them like wishbones, till they tremble.
 The frowsy sponge boats keep coming in 20 with the obliging air of retrievers, bristling with jackstraw gaffs and hooks and decorated with bobbles of sponges.
 There is a fence of chicken wire along the dock where, glinting like plowshares, 25
 the blue-gray shark tails are hung up to dry for the Chinese-restaurant trade.
 Some of the little white boats are still piled up against each other, or lie on their sides, stove in,
 and not yet salvaged, if they ever will be, from the last bad storm, 30

5. Its Latin root (infans) means “speechless.”

1. A bay or an inlet.

2. Charles Baudelaire (1821–1867), French poet whose theory of correspondences (see line 32) promised links, through poetry, between the physical and spiritual worlds.

like torn-open, unanswered letters.
 The bight is littered with old correspondences.
 Click. Click. Goes the dredge, and brings up a dripping jawful of marl.
 All the untidy activity continues,
 awful but cheerful. 35

1955

At the Fishhouses

Although it is a cold evening, down by one of the fishhouses
 an old man sits netting, his net, in the gloaming almost invisible
 a dark purple-brown, 5
 and his shuttle worn and polished.
 The air smells so strong of codfish
 it makes one's nose run and one's eyes water.
 The five fishhouses have steeply peaked roofs and narrow, cleated gangplanks slant up 10 to storerooms in the gables for the wheelbarrows to be pushed up and down on.
 All is silver: the heavy surface of the sea,
 swelling slowly as if considering spilling over,
 is opaque, but the silver of the benches, 15
 the lobster pots, and masts, scattered among the wild jagged rocks, is of an apparent translucence like the small old buildings with an emerald moss growing on their shoreward walls. 20
 The big fish tubs are completely lined with layers of beautiful herring scales and the wheelbarrows are similarly plastered with creamy iridescent coats of mail, with small iridescent flies crawling on them. 25
 Up on the little slope behind the houses, set in the sparse bright sprinkle of grass, is an ancient wooden capstan,¹ cracked, with two long bleached handles and some melancholy stains, like dried blood, 30 where the ironwork has rusted.
 The old man accepts a Lucky Strike.²
 He was a friend of my grandfather.
 We talk of the decline in the population and of codfish and herring 35 while he waits for a herring boat to come in.
 There are sequins on his vest and on his thumb.

1. Cylindrical drum around which rope is wound, used for winching or hoisting the anchor of a ship.

2. Brand of cigarettes.

He has scraped the scales, the principal beauty,
 from unnumbered fish with that black old knife,
 the blade of which is almost worn away. 40

Down at the water's edge, at the place where they haul up the boats, up the long ramp descending into the water, thin silver tree trunks are laid horizontally across the gray stones, down and down 45 at intervals of four or five feet.

Cold dark deep and absolutely clear,
 element bearable to no mortal, to fish and to seals . . . One seal particularly
 I have seen here evening after evening. 50
 He was curious about me. He was interested in music; like me a believer in total immersion,³ so I used to sing him Baptist hymns.

I also sang "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God."
 He stood up in the water and regarded me 55 steadily, moving his head a little.

Then he would disappear, then suddenly emerge almost in the same spot, with a sort of shrug as if it were against his better judgment.

Cold dark deep and absolutely clear, 60
 the clear gray icy water . . . Back, behind us, the dignified tall firs begin.

Bluish, associating with their shadows,
 a million Christmas trees stand waiting for Christmas. The water seems suspended 65 above the rounded gray and blue-gray stones.

I have seen it over and over, the same sea, the same, slightly, indifferently swinging above the stones,
 icily free above the stones,
 above the stones and then the world. 70

If you should dip your hand in,
 your wrist would ache immediately, your bones would begin to ache and your hand would burn as if the water were a transmutation of fire that feeds on stones and burns with a dark gray flame. 75

If you tasted it, it would first taste bitter, then briny, then surely burn your tongue.
 It is like what we imagine knowledge to be:
 dark, salt, clear, moving, utterly free, drawn from the cold hard mouth 80 of the world, derived from the rocky breasts forever, flowing and drawn, and since our knowledge is historical, flowing, and flown.

1955

3. Form of baptism favored by Baptists.

Questions of Travel

There are too many waterfalls here; the crowded streams hurry too rapidly down to the sea, and the pressure of so many clouds on the mountaintops makes them spill over the sides in soft slow-motion, turning to waterfalls under our very eyes. 5
 —For if those streaks, those mile-long, shiny, tearstains, aren't waterfalls yet,
 in a quick age or so, as ages go here,
 they probably will be.
 But if the streams and clouds keep travelling, travelling, 10 the mountains look like the hulls of capsized ships, slime-hung and barnacled.

Think of the long trip home.
 Should we have stayed at home and thought of here?
 Where should we be today? 15
 Is it right to be watching strangers in a play in this strangest of theatres?
 What childishness is it that while there's a breath of life in our bodies, we are determined to rush to see the sun the other way around? 20
 The tiniest green hummingbird in the world?
 To stare at some inexplicable old stonework, inexplicable and impenetrable,
 at any view,
 instantly seen and always, always delightful? 25
 Oh, must we dream our dreams and have them, too?
 And have we room
 for one more folded sunset, still quite warm?

But surely it would have been a pity 30 not to have seen the trees along this road, really exaggerated in their beauty,
 not to have seen them gesturing like noble pantomimists, robed in pink.
 —Not to have had to stop for gas and heard 35
 the sad, two-noted, wooden tune of disparate wooden clogs carelessly clacking over a grease-stained filling-station floor.
 (In another country the clogs would all be tested. 40 Each pair there would have identical pitch.)
 —A pity not to have heard the other, less primitive music of the fat brown bird who sings above the broken gasoline pump in a bamboo church of Jesuit baroque: 45 three towers, five silver crosses.
 —Yes, a pity not to have pondered,

blurr'dly and inconclusively,
 on what connection can exist for centuries between the crudest wooden footwear 50 and, careful and finicky,
 the whittled fantasies of wooden cages.
 —Never to have studied history in the weak calligraphy of songbirds' cages.
 —And never to have had to listen to rain 55
 so much like politicians' speeches:
 two hours of unrelenting oratory and then a sudden golden silence in which the traveller takes a notebook, writes:

*"Is it lack of imagination that makes us come 60
 to imagined places, not just stay at home?
 Or could Pascal¹ have been not entirely right about just sitting quietly in one's room?"*

*Continent, city, country, society:
 the choice is never wide and never free. 65
 And here, or there . . . No. Should we have stayed at home, wherever that may be?"*

1965

The Armadillo

for Robert Lowell

This is the time of year when almost every night
 the frail, illegal fire balloons appear.
 Climbing the mountain height, rising toward a saint 5

 still honored in these parts, the paper chambers flush and fill with light that comes and goes, like hearts.

Once up against the sky it's hard to tell them from the stars— 10 planets, that is—the tinted ones:
 Venus going down, or Mars, or the pale green one. With a wind, they flare and falter, wobble and toss;

 but if it's still they steer between 15
 the kite sticks of the Southern Cross,

1. French mathematician and philosopher (1623–1662) who said, "Men's misfortunes spring from the single cause that they are unable to stay quietly in one room" (Pensées, trans. J. M. Cohen).

receding, dwindling, solemnly and steadily forsaking us, or, in the downdraft from a peak, suddenly turning dangerous. 20

Last night another big one fell.
 It splattered like an egg of fire against the cliff behind the house.
 The flame ran down. We saw the pair of owls who nest there flying up 25 and up, their whirling black-and-white stained bright pink underneath, until they shrieked up out of sight.

The ancient owls' nest must have burned.
 Hastily, all alone, 30
 a glistening armadillo left the scene,
 rose-flecked, head down, tail down,

and then a baby rabbit jumped out,
short-eared, to our surprise.
 So soft!—a handful of intangible ash 35 with fixed, ignited eyes.

Too pretty, dreamlike mimicry!
O falling fire and piercing cry and panic, and a weak mailed fist¹ clenched ignorant against the sky! 40

1965

Sestina¹

September rain falls on the house.
 In the failing light, the old grandmother sits in the kitchen with the child beside the Little Marvel Stove, reading the jokes from the almanac, 5
 laughing and talking to hide her tears.

She thinks that her equinoctial tears and the rain that beats on the roof of the house were both foretold by the almanac, but only known to a grandmother. 10
 The iron kettle sings on the stove.
 She cuts some bread and says to the child,

1. The armadillo, curled tight and protected against everything but fire.

1. A fixed verse form in which the end words of the first six-line stanza must be used at the ends of the lines in the following stanzas in a rotating order;

 the final three lines must contain all six words.

It's time for tea now; but the child is watching the teakettle's small hard tears dance like mad on the hot black stove, 15
 the way the rain must dance on the house.
 Tidying up, the old grandmother hangs up the clever almanac on its string. Birdlike, the almanac hovers half open above the child, 20 hovers above the old grandmother and her teacup full of dark brown tears.

 She shivers and says she thinks the house feels chilly, and puts more wood in the stove.

It was to be, says the Marvel Stove. 25
I know what I know, says the almanac.
 With crayons the child draws a rigid house and a winding pathway. Then the child puts in a man with buttons like tears and shows it proudly to the grandmother. 30

But secretly, while the grandmother busies herself about the stove, the little moons fall down like tears from between the pages of the almanac into the flower bed the child 35 has carefully placed in the front of the house.

Time to plant tears, says the almanac.
 The grandmother sings to the marvellous stove and the child draws another inscrutable house.

1965

In the Waiting Room

In Worcester, Massachusetts,
 I went with Aunt Consuelo to keep her dentist's appointment and sat and waited for her in the dentist's waiting room. 5
 It was winter. It got dark early. The waiting room was full of grown-up people, arctics and overcoats,
 lamps and magazines. 10
 My aunt was inside
 what seemed like a long time and while I waited I read
 the National Geographic

(I could read) and carefully studied the photographs: 15
 the inside of a volcano,
 black, and full of ashes;
 then it was spilling over in rivulets of fire. 20
 Osa and Martin Johnson¹
 dressed in riding breeches, laced boots, and pith helmets.
 A dead man slung on a pole
 —“Long Pig,”² the caption said. 25
 Babies with pointed heads wound round and round with string;
 black, naked women with necks wound round and round with wire like the necks of light bulbs. 30
 Their breasts were horrifying.
 I read it right straight through.
 I was too shy to stop.
 And then I looked at the cover:
 the yellow margins, the date. 35

Suddenly, from inside, came an oh! of pain
 —Aunt Consuelo’s voice—
 not very loud or long.
 I wasn’t at all surprised; 40
 even then I knew she was a foolish, timid woman.
 I might have been embarrassed, but wasn’t. What took me completely by surprise 45
 was that it was me:
 my voice, in my mouth.
 Without thinking at all
 I was my foolish aunt,
 I—we—were falling, falling, 50
 our eyes glued to the cover of the National Geographic,
 February, 1918.

I said to myself: three days and you’ll be seven years old. 55
 I was saying it to stop the sensation of falling off the round, turning world into cold, blue-black space.
 But I felt: you are an I, 60
 you are an Elizabeth,

1. Famous explorers and travel writers.

2. Polynesian cannibals’ name for the human carcass.

you are one of them.
 Why should you be one, too?
 I scarcely dared to look.
 to see what it was I was. 65
 I gave a sidelong glance
 —I couldn't look any higher—at shadowy gray knees, trousers and skirts and boots and different pairs of hands 70 lying under the lamps.
 I knew that nothing stranger had ever happened, that nothing stranger could ever happen.
 Why should I be my aunt, 75 or me, or anyone?
 What similarities—
 boots, hands, the family voice
 I felt in my throat, or even the National Geographic 80 and those awful hanging breasts—held us all together or made us all just one?
 How—I didn't know any word for it—how “unlikely” . . . 85
 How had I come to be here, like them, and overhear
 a cry of pain that could have got loud and worse but hadn't?

The waiting room was bright 90 and too hot. It was sliding beneath a big black wave, another, and another.

Then I was back in it.
 The War was on. Outside, 95
 in Worcester, Massachusetts, were night and slush and cold, and it was still the fifth of February, 1918.

1976

The Moose

for Grace Bulmer Bowers

From narrow provinces of fish and bread and tea, home of the long tides

where the bay leaves the sea twice a day and takes the herrings long rides, 5

where if the river enters or retreats
in a wall of brown foam depends on if it meets 10
the bay coming in,
the bay not at home;

where, silted red,
sometimes the sun sets facing a red sea, 15
and others, veins the flats' lavender, rich mud
in burning rivulets;

on red, gravelly roads,
down rows of sugar maples, past clapboard farmhouses 20
and neat, clapboard churches, bleached, ridged as clamshells,
past twin silver birches,

through late afternoon 25
a bus journeys west,
the windshield flashing pink,
pink glancing off of metal,
brushing the dented flank of blue, beat-up enamel; 30 down hollows, up rises, and waits, patient, while a lone traveller gives kisses and embraces to seven relatives 35

and a collie supervises.

Goodbye to the elms,
to the farm, to the dog.
The bus starts. The light grows richer; the fog, 40
shifting, salty, thin, comes closing in.

Its cold, round crystals form and slide and settle in the white hens' feathers, 45
in gray glazed cabbages, on the cabbage roses
and lupins like apostles;

the sweet peas cling to their wet white string 50
on the whitewashed fences;
bumblebees creep
inside the foxgloves,
and evening commences.

One stop at Bass River. 55
Then the Economies—
Lower, Middle, Upper;
Five Islands, Five Houses,¹ where a woman shakes a tablecloth out after supper. 60

A pale flickering. Gone.
The Tantramar marshes
and the smell of salt hay.
An iron bridge trembles and a loose plank rattles 65
but doesn't give way.

On the left, a red light swims through the dark:
a ship's port lantern.
Two rubber boots show, 70
illuminated, solemn.
A dog gives one bark.

A woman climbs in with two market bags, brisk, freckled, elderly. 75
"A grand night. Yes, sir, all the way to Boston."
She regards us amicably.

Moonlight as we enter the New Brunswick woods, 80 hairy, scratchy, splintery;
moonlight and mist
caught in them like lamb's wool on bushes in a pasture.

The passengers lie back. 85
Snores. Some long sighs.
A dreamy divagation begins in the night,
a gentle, auditory,
slow hallucination. . . . 90

1. These are small towns and villages in Nova Scotia, near Halifax.

In the creakings and noises, an old conversation
 —not concerning us,
 but recognizable, somewhere,
 back in the bus: 95
 Grandparents' voices

uninterruptedly talking, in Eternity:
 names being mentioned,
 things cleared up finally; 100
 what he said, what she said,
 who got pensioned;

deaths, deaths and sicknesses;
 the year he remarried;
 the year (something) happened. 105
 She died in childbirth.
 That was the son lost
 when the schooner foundered.

He took to drink. Yes.
 She went to the bad. 110
 When Amos began to pray even in the store and finally the family had to put him away.

“Yes . . .” that peculiar 115
 affirmative. “Yes . . .”
 A sharp, indrawn breath,
 half groan, half acceptance,
 that means “Life’s like that.
 We know it (also death).” 120

Talking the way they talked in the old featherbed, peacefully, on and on,
 dim lamplight in the hall,
 down in the kitchen, the dog 125
 tucked in her shawl.

Now, it’s all right now even to fall asleep
 just as on all those nights.
 —Suddenly the bus driver 130
 stops with a jolt,
 turns off his lights.

A moose has come out of the impenetrable wood and stands there, looms, rather, 135

in the middle of the road.
It approaches; it sniffs at the bus's hot hood.

Towering, antlerless, high as a church, 140
homely as a house
(or, safe as houses).
A man's voice assures us
"Perfectly harmless . . ."

Some of the passengers 145
exclaim in whispers,
childishly, softly,
"Sure are big creatures."
"It's awful plain."
"Look! It's a she!" 150

Taking her time,
she looks the bus over,
grand, otherworldly.
Why, why do we feel
(we all feel) this sweet 155 sensation of joy?

"Curious creatures," says our quiet driver,
rolling his r's.
"Look at that, would you." 160
Then he shifts gears.
For a moment longer,

by craning backward,
the moose can be seen on the moonlit macadam; 165
then there's a dim smell of moose, an acrid smell of gasoline.

1976

One Art

The art of losing isn't hard to master;
so many things seem filled with the intent to be lost that their loss is no disaster.

Lose something every day. Accept the fluster of lost door keys, the hour badly spent. 5
The art of losing isn't hard to master.

Then practice losing farther, losing faster:
places, and names, and where it was you meant to travel. None of these will bring disaster.

I lost my mother's watch. And look! my last, or next-to-last, of three loved houses went. 10
The art of losing isn't hard to master.

I lost two cities, lovely ones. And, vaster, some realms I owned, two rivers, a continent. 15
I miss them, but it wasn't a disaster.

—Even losing you (the joking voice, a gesture
I love) I shan't have lied. It's evident the art of losing's not too hard to master though it may look like (Write it!) like disaster.

1976

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

1911–1983

Speaking of Blanche DuBois, the heroine of A Streetcar Named Desire, Tennessee Williams once said, “She was a demonic creature; the size of her feeling was too great for her to contain.” In Williams’s plays—he wrote and rewrote more than twenty full-length dramas as well as screenplays and shorter works—his characters are driven by the size of their feelings, much as Williams felt driven to write about them.

He was born Thomas Lanier Williams in Columbus, Mississippi. His mother, “Miss Edwina,” the daughter of an Episcopalian minister, was repressed and genteel, very much the southern belle in her youth. His father, Cornelius, was a traveling salesman, often away from his family and often violent and drunk when at home. As a child, Williams was sickly and overly protected by his mother; he was closely attached to his sister, Rose, repelled by the roughhouse world of boys, and alienated from his father. The family’s move from Mississippi to St. Louis, where Cornelius became a sales manager of the shoe company he had traveled for, was a shock to Mrs. Williams and her young children, used to living in small southern towns where a minister’s daughter was an important person. Yet Mrs. Williams could take care of herself; she was a “survivor.”

Williams went to the University of Missouri but left after two years; his father then found him a job in the shoe-factory warehouse. He worked there for nearly three years, writing feverishly at night. (His closest friend at the time was a burly coworker, easygoing and attractive to women, named Stanley Kowalski, whose name and characteristics Williams would borrow for A Streetcar Named Desire.) Williams found the life so difficult, however, that he succumbed to a nervous breakdown. After recovering at the home of his beloved grandparents, he went on to further studies, finally graduating at the age of twenty-seven. Earlier, Rose had been suffering increasing mental imbalance; the final trauma was apparently brought on by one of Cornelius’s alcoholic rages, in which he beat Edwina and, trying to calm Rose, made a gesture that she took to be sexual. Shortly thereafter Edwina signed the papers allowing Rose to be “tragically becalmed” by a prefrontal lobotomy. Rose spent most of her life in sanatoriums, except when Williams brought her out for visits.

The next year, Williams left for New Orleans, the first of many temporary homes; it would provide the setting for A Streetcar Named Desire. In New Orleans he changed his name to “Tennessee,” later giving—as often when discussing his life—various romantic reasons for doing so. There also he actively entered the homosexual world.

Williams had had plays produced at local theaters and in 1939 he won a prize for a collection of one-act plays, American Blues. The next year Battle of Angels failed (in 1957 he would rewrite it as Orpheus Descending). His first success was The Glass Menagerie (1945). Williams called it a “memory play,” seen through the recollections of the writer, Tom, who talks to the audience about himself and about the scenes depicting his mother, Amanda, poverty-stricken but genteelly living on memories of her southern youth and her “gentlemen callers”; his crippled sister, Laura, who finds refuge in her “menagerie” of little glass animals; and the traumatic effect of a modern “gentleman caller” on them. While there are similarities between Edwina, Rose, and Tennessee on the one hand, and Amanda, Laura, and Tom on the other, there are also differences: the play is not literally autobiographical.

The financial success of Menagerie proved exhilarating, then debilitating. Williams fled to Mexico to work full-time on an earlier play, The Poker Night. It had begun as The Moth; its first image, as Williams’s biographer, Donald Spoto, tells us, was “simply that of a woman, sitting with folded hands near a window, while moonlight streamed in and she awaited in vain the arrival of her boyfriend”: named Blanche, she was at first intended as a young Amanda. During rehearsals of Menagerie, Williams had asked members of the stage crew to teach him to play poker, and he began to visualize his new play as a series of confrontations between working-class poker players and two refined southern women.

As the focus of his attention changed from Stanley to Blanche, The Poker Night turned into A Streetcar Named Desire. Upon opening in 1947, it was an even greater success than The Glass Menagerie, and it won the Pulitzer Prize. Williams was able to travel and to buy a home in Key West, Florida, where he did much of his ensuing work. At about this time his “transitory heart” found “a home at last” in a young man named Frank Merlo.

For more than a decade thereafter a new Williams play appeared almost every two years. Among the most successful were The Rose Tattoo (1950), in which the tempestuous heroine, Serafina, worshiping the memory of her dead husband, finds love again; the Pulitzer Prize-winning Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955), which portrays the conflict of the dying Big Daddy and his impotent son, Brick, watched and controlled by Brick’s wife, “Maggie the Cat”; and The Night of the Iguana (1961), which brings a varied group of tormented people together at a rundown hotel on the Mexican coast. His plays were produced widely abroad and also became equally successful films. Yet some of the ones now regarded as the best of this period were commercial failures: Summer and Smoke (1948), for example, and the surrealistic and visionary Camino Real (1953).

For years Williams had depended on a wide variety of drugs, especially to help him sleep and to keep him awake in the early mornings, when he invariably worked. In the 1960s the drugs began to take a real toll. Other factors contributed to the decline of his later years: Frank Merlo’s death, the emergence of younger playwrights of whom he felt blindly jealous, and the violent nature of the 1960s, which seemed both to mirror his inner chaos and to leave him behind.

Yet despite Broadway failures, critical disparagements, and a breakdown for which he was hospitalized, he valiantly kept working. Spoto notes that in Williams’s late work, Rose was “the source and inspiration of everything he wrote, either directly—with a surrogate character representing her—or indirectly, in the situation of romanticized mental illness or unvarnished verisimilitude.” This observation is certainly true of his last Broadway play, the failed Clothes for a Summer Hotel (1980), ostensibly about the ghosts of Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, and of the play he obsessively wrote and rewrote, The Two Character Play, which chronicles the descent of a brother and sister, who are also lovers, into madness and death.

A game of seven-card stud poker continues as the action of A Streetcar Named Desire concludes. Original Broadway production, 1947.

Despite Williams's self-destructiveness, in his writing and in his social life, the work of his great years was now being seriously studied and often revived by regional and community theaters. Critics began to see that he was one of America's best and most dedicated playwrights. And he kept on working. He was collaborating on a film of two stories about Rose when he died, apparently having choked to death on the lid of a pill bottle.

Always reluctant to talk about his work (likening it to a "bird that will be startled away, as by a hawk's shadow"), Williams did not see himself in a tradition of American dramaturgy. He acknowledged the influence of Anton Chekhov, the nineteenth-century Russian writer of dramas with lonely, searching characters; of D. H. Lawrence, the British novelist who emphasized the theme of a sexual life force; and above all of the American Hart Crane, homosexual poète maudit, who, he said, "touched fire that burned [himself] alive," adding that "perhaps it is only through self-immolation of such a nature that we living beings can offer to you the entire truth of ourselves." Such a statement indicates the deeply confessional quality of Williams's writing, even in plays not directly autobiographical.

Although he never acknowledged any debt to the American playwright Eugene O'Neill, Williams shared with O'Neill an impatience over the theatrical conventions of realism. The Glass Menagerie, for example, uses screened projections, lighting effects, and music to emphasize that it takes place in Tom's memory. A Streetcar Named Desire moves in and out of the house on Elysian Fields, while music and lighting reinforce all the major themes. Williams also relies on the effects of language, especially of a vivid and colloquial Southern speech that may be compared with that of William Faulkner, Eudora Welty, or Flannery O'Connor. Rhythms of language become almost a musical indication of character, distinguishing Blanche from other characters. Reading or seeing his plays, we become aware of how symbolic repetitions—in Blanche's and Stanley's turns of phrase, the naked light bulb and the paper lantern, the Mexican woman selling flowers for the dead, the "Varsoviana" waltz and the reverberating voices—produce a heightening of reality: what Williams called "poetic realism."

More than a half century later, does the destruction of Blanche, the "lady," still have the power to move us? Elia Kazan, in his director's notes, calls her "an outdated creature, approaching extinction . . . like a dinosaur." But Blythe Danner, who played Blanche in a 1988 revival, acutely observes that Williams "was attached to the things that were going to destroy him" and that Blanche, similarly, is attracted to and repelled by Stanley: "It's Tennessee fighting, fighting, fighting what he doesn't want to get into, what is very prevalent in his mind. That incredible contradiction in so many people is what he captures better than any other playwright."

Contemporary criticisms of Williams's plays focused on their violence and their obsession with sexuality, which in some of the later work struck some commentators as an almost morbid preoccupation with "perversion"—murder, rape, drugs, incest, nymphomania. The shriller voices making such accusations were attacking Williams for his homosexuality, which could not be publicly spoken of in this country until comparatively recently. These taboo topics, however, figure as instances of Williams's deeper subjects: desire and loneliness. As he said in an interview, "Desire is rooted in a longing for companionship, a release from the loneliness that haunts every individual." Loneliness and desire propel his characters into extreme behavior, no doubt, but such behavior literally dramatizes the plight that Williams saw as universal.

The following text is from The Theatre of Tennessee Williams, volume 1 (1971).

A Streetcar Named Desire

*And so it was I entered the broken world
To trace the visionary company of love, its voice
An instant in the wind (I know not whither hurled)
But not for long to hold each desperate choice.
—"The Broken Tower" by Hart Crane¹*

THE CHARACTERS

BLANCHE	PABLO
STELLA	A NEGRO WOMAN
STANLEY	A DOCTOR
MITCH	A NURSE
EUNICE	A YOUNG COLLECTOR
STEVE	A MEXICAN WOMAN

Scene One

The exterior of a two-story corner building on a street in New Orleans which is named Elysian Fields and runs between the L & N tracks and the river.² The section is poor but, unlike corresponding sections in other American cities, it has a

1. American poet (1899–1932).

2. Elysian Fields is a New Orleans street at the northern tip of the French Quarter, between the Louisville & Nashville railroad tracks and the Mississippi River. In Greek mythology the Elysian Fields are the abode of the blessed in the afterlife.

raffish charm. The houses are mostly white frame, weathered grey, with rickety outside stairs and galleries and quaintly ornamented gables. This building contains two flats, upstairs and down. Faded white stairs ascend to the entrances of both.

It is first dark of an evening early in May. The sky that shows around the dim white building is a peculiarly tender blue, almost a turquoise, which invests the scene with a kind of lyricism and gracefully attenuates the atmosphere of decay. You can almost feel the warm breath of the brown river beyond the river warehouses with their faint redolences of bananas and coffee. A corresponding air is evoked by the music of Negro entertainers at a barroom around the corner. In this part of New Orleans you are practically always just around the corner, or a few doors down the street, from a tinny piano being played with the infatuated fluency of brown fingers. This "Blue Piano" expresses the spirit of the life which goes on here.

Two women, one white and one colored, are taking the air on the steps of the building. The white woman is EUNICE, who occupies the upstairs flat; the colored woman a neighbor, for New Orleans is a cosmopolitan city where there is a relatively warm and easy intermingling of races in the old part of town.

Above the music of the "Blue Piano" the voices of people on the street can be heard overlapping.

[Two men come around the corner, STANLEY KOWALSKI and MITCH. They are about twenty-eight or thirty years old, roughly dressed in blue denim work clothes. STANLEY carries his bowling jacket and a red-stained package from a butcher's. They stop at the foot of the steps.]

STANLEY [bellowing] Hey there! Stella, baby!

[STELLA comes out on the first floor landing, a gentle young woman, about twenty-five, and of a background obviously quite different from her husband's.]

STELLA [mildly] Don't holler at me like that. Hi, Mitch.

STANLEY Catch!

STELLA What?

STANLEY Meat!

[He heaves the package at her. She cries out in protest but manages to catch it: then she laughs breathlessly. Her husband and his companion have already started back around the corner.]

STELLA [calling after him] Stanley! Where are you going?

STANLEY Bowling!

STELLA Can I come watch?

STANLEY Come on. [He goes out.]

STELLA Be over soon. [to the white woman] Hello, Eunice. How are you?

EUNICE I'm all right. Tell Steve to get him a poor boy's sandwich 'cause nothing's left here.

[They all laugh; the colored woman does not stop. STELLA goes out.]

COLORED WOMAN What was that package he th'ew at 'er? [She rises from steps, laughing louder.]

EUNICE You hush, now!

NEGRO WOMAN Catch what!

[She continues to laugh. BLANCHE comes around the corner, carrying a valise. She looks at a slip of paper, then at the building, then again at the slip and again at the building. Her expression is one of shocked disbelief. Her appearance is incongruous to this setting. She is daintily dressed in a white suit with a fluffy bodice, necklace and earrings of pearl, white gloves and hat, looking as if she were arriving at a summer tea or cocktail party in the garden district. She is about five years older than STELLA. Her delicate beauty must avoid a strong light. There is something about her uncertain manner, as well as her white clothes, that suggests a moth.]

EUNICE [finally] What's the matter, honey? Are you lost?

BLANCHE [with faintly hysterical humor] They told me to take a street-car named Desire, and then transfer to one called Cemeteries³ and ride six blocks and get off at—Elysian Fields!

EUNICE That's where you are now.

BLANCHE At Elysian Fields?

EUNICE This here is Elysian Fields.

BLANCHE They mustn't have—understood—what number I wanted . . .

EUNICE What number you lookin' for?

[BLANCHE wearily refers to the slip of paper.]

BLANCHE Six thirty-two.

EUNICE You don't have to look no further.

BLANCHE [uncomprehendingly] I'm looking for my sister, Stella DuBois, I mean—Mrs. Stanley Kowalski.

EUNICE That's the party.—You just did miss her, though.

BLANCHE This—can this be—her home?

EUNICE She's got the downstairs here and I got the up.

BLANCHE Oh. She's—out?

EUNICE You noticed that bowling alley around the corner?

BLANCHE I'm—not sure I did.

EUNICE Well, that's where she's at, watchin' her husband bowl. [There is a pause.] You want to leave your suitcase here an' go find her?

BLANCHE No.

NEGRO WOMAN I'll go tell her you come.

BLANCHE Thanks.

NEGRO WOMAN You welcome. [She goes out.]

EUNICE She wasn't expecting you?

BLANCHE No. No, not tonight.

EUNICE Well, why don't you just go in and make yourself at home till they get back.

BLANCHE How could I—do that?

EUNICE We own this place so I can let you in.

[She gets up and opens the downstairs door. A light goes on behind the blind, turning it light blue. BLANCHE slowly follows her into the downstairs flat. The surrounding areas dim out as the interior is lighted. Two rooms can be seen, not too clearly defined. The one first entered is primarily a kitchen but contains a folding bed to be used by BLANCHE. The room beyond this is a bedroom. Off this room is a narrow door to a bathroom.]

EUNICE [defensively, noticing BLANCHE's look] It's sort of messed up right now but when it's clean it's real sweet.

BLANCHE Is it?

EUNICE Uh-huh, I think so. So you're Stella's sister?

BLANCHE Yes. [wanting to get rid of her] Thanks for letting me in.

EUNICE Por nada,⁴ as the Mexicans say, por nada! Stella spoke of you.

3. The end of a streetcar line that stopped at a cemetery. Desire is a New Orleans street.

4. It's nothing (Spanish).

BLANCHE Yes?

EUNICE I think she said you taught school.

BLANCHE Yes.

EUNICE And you're from Mississippi, huh?

BLANCHE Yes.

EUNICE She showed me a picture of your home-place, the plantation.

BLANCHE Belle Reve?⁵

EUNICE A great big place with white columns.

BLANCHE Yes . . .

EUNICE A place like that must be awful hard to keep up.

BLANCHE If you will excuse me, I'm just about to drop.

EUNICE Sure, honey. Why don't you set down?

BLANCHE What I meant was I'd like to be left alone.

EUNICE [offended] Aw. I'll make myself scarce, in that case.

BLANCHE I didn't meant to be rude, but—

EUNICE I'll drop by the bowling alley an' hustle her up. [She goes out the door.]

[BLANCHE sits in a chair very stiffly with her shoulders slightly hunched and her legs pressed close together and her hands tightly clutching her purse as if she were quite cold. After a while the blind look goes out of her eyes and she begins to look slowly around. A cat screeches. She catches her breath with a startled gesture. Suddenly she notices something in a half opened closet. She springs up and crosses to it, and removes a whiskey bottle. She pours a half tumbler of whiskey and tosses it down. She carefully replaces the bottle and washes out the tumbler at the sink. Then she resumes her seat in front of the table.]

BLANCHE [faintly to herself] I've got to keep hold of myself! [STELLA comes quickly around the corner of the building and runs to the door of the downstairs flat.]

STELLA [calling out joyfully] Blanche!

[For a moment they stare at each other. Then BLANCHE springs up and runs to her with a wild cry.]

BLANCHE Stella, oh, Stella, Stella! Stella for Star!

[She begins to speak with feverish vivacity as if she feared for either of them to stop and think. They catch each other in a spasmodic embrace.]

BLANCHE Now, then, let me look at you. But don't you look at me, Stella, no, no, no, not till later, not till I've bathed and rested! And turn that over-light off! Turn that off! I won't be looked at in this merciles glare! [STELLA laughs and complies.] Come back here now! Oh, my baby! Stella! Stella for Star! [She embraces her again.] I thought you would never come back to this horrible place! What am I saying? I didn't mean to say that. I meant to be nice about it and say—Oh, what a convenient location and such—Ha-a-ha! Precious lamb! You haven't said a word to me.

STELLA You haven't given me a chance to, honey! [She laughs, but her glance at BLANCHE is a little anxious.]

BLANCHE Well, now you talk. Open your pretty mouth and talk while I look around for some liquor! I know you must have some liquor on the place! Where could it be, I wonder? Oh, I spy, I spy!

5. Beautiful Dream (French).

[She rushes to the closet and removes the bottle; she is shaking all over and panting for breath as she tries to laugh. The bottle nearly slips from her grasp.]

STELLA [noticing] Blanche, you sit down and let me pour the drinks. I don't know what we've got to mix with. Maybe a coke's in the icebox. Look'n see, honey, while I'm—

BLANCHE No coke, honey, not with my nerves tonight! Where—where—where is—?

STELLA Stanley? Bowling! He loves it. They're having a—found some soda!—tournament . . .

BLANCHE Just water, baby, to chase it! Now don't get worried, your sister hasn't turned into a drunkard, she's just all shaken up and hot and tired and dirty! You sit down, now, and explain this place to me! What are you doing in a place like this?

STELLA Now, Blanche—

BLANCHE Oh, I'm not going to be hypocritical, I'm going to be honestly critical about it! Never, never, never in my worst dreams could I picture—Only Poe! Only Mr. Edgar Allan Poe!—could do it justice! Out there I suppose is the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir!⁶ [She laughs.]

STELLA No, honey, those are the L & N tracks.

BLANCHE No, now seriously, putting joking aside. Why didn't you tell me, why didn't you write me, honey, why didn't you let me know?

STELLA [carefully, pouring herself a drink] Tell you what, Blanche?

BLANCHE Why, that you had to live in these conditions!

STELLA Aren't you being a little intense about it? It's not that bad at all! New Orleans isn't like other cities.

BLANCHE This has got nothing to do with New Orleans. You might as well say—forgive me, blessed baby! [She suddenly stops short.] The subject is closed!

STELLA [a little drily] Thanks.

[During the pause, BLANCHE stares at her. She smiles at BLANCHE.]

BLANCHE [looking down at her glass, which shakes in her hand] You're all I've got in the world, and you're not glad to see me!

STELLA [sincerely] Why, Blanche, you know that's not true.

BLANCHE No?—I'd forgotten how quiet you were.

STELLA You never did give me a chance to say much, Blanche. So I just got in the habit of being quiet around you.

BLANCHE [vaguely] A good habit to get into . . . [then, abruptly] You haven't asked me how I happened to get away from the school before the spring term ended.

STELLA Well, I thought you'd volunteer that information—if you wanted to tell me.

BLANCHE You thought I'd been fired?

STELLA No, I—thought you might have—resigned . . .

BLANCHE I was so exhausted by all I'd been through my—nerves broke. [nervously tamping cigarette] I was on the verge of—lunacy, almost! So Mr. Graves—Mr. Graves is the high school superintendent—he suggested I take a leave of absence. I couldn't put all of those details into

6. From the refrain of Poe's gothic ballad "Ulalume" (1847).

the wire . . . [She drinks quickly.] Oh, this buzzes right through me and feels so good!

STELLA Won't you have another?

BLANCHE No, one's my limit.

STELLA Sure?

BLANCHE You haven't said a word about my appearance.

STELLA You look just fine.

BLANCHE God love you for a liar! Daylight never exposed so total a ruin!

But you—you've put on some weight, yes, you're just as plump as a little partridge! And it's so becoming to you!

STELLA Now, Blanche—

BLANCHE Yes, it is, it is or I wouldn't say it! You just have to watch around the hips a little. Stand up.

STELLA Not now.

BLANCHE You hear me? I said stand up! [STELLA complies reluctantly.]

You messy child, you, you've spilt something on that pretty white lace collar! About your hair—you ought to have it cut in a feather bob with your dainty features. Stella, you have a maid, don't you?

STELLA No. With only two rooms it's—

BLANCHE What? Two rooms, did you say?

STELLA This one and— [She is embarrassed.]

BLANCHE The other one? [She laughs sharply. There is an embarrassed silence.]

BLANCHE I am going to take just one little tiny nip more, sort of to put the stopper on, so to speak. . . . Then put the bottle away so I won't be tempted. [She rises.] I want you to look at my figure! [She turns around.] You know I haven't put on one ounce in ten years, Stella? I weigh what I weighed the summer you left Belle Reve. The summer Dad died and you left us . . .

STELLA [a little wearily] It's just incredible, Blanche, how well you're looking.

BLANCHE [They both laugh uncomfortably.] But, Stella, there's only two rooms, I don't see where you're going to put me!

STELLA We're going to put you in here.

BLANCHE What kind of bed's this—one of those collapsible things? [She sits on it.]

STELLA Does it feel all right?

BLANCHE [dubiously] Wonderful, honey. I don't like a bed that gives much. But there's no door between the two rooms, and Stanley—will it be decent?

STELLA Stanley is Polish, you know.

BLANCHE Oh, yes. They're something like Irish, aren't they?

STELLA Well—

BLANCHE Only not so—highbrow? [They both laugh again in the same way.] I brought some nice clothes to meet all your lovely friends in.

STELLA I'm afraid you won't think they are lovely.

BLANCHE What are they like?

STELLA They're Stanley's friends.

BLANCHE Polacks?

STELLA They're a mixed lot, Blanche.

BLANCHE Heterogeneous—types?

STELLA Oh, yes. Yes, types is right!

BLANCHE Well—anyhow—I brought nice clothes and I'll wear them. I guess you're hoping I'll say I'll put up at a hotel, but I'm not going to put up at a hotel. I want to be near you, got to be with somebody, I can't be alone! Because—as you must have noticed—I'm—not very well. . . .
[Her voice drops and her look is frightened.]

STELLA You seem a little bit nervous or overwrought or something.

BLANCHE Will Stanley like me, or will I be just a visiting in-law, Stella? I couldn't stand that.

STELLA You'll get along fine together, if you'll just try not to—well—compare him with men that we went out with at home.

BLANCHE Is he so—different?

STELLA Yes. A different species.

BLANCHE In what way; what's he like?

STELLA Oh, you can't describe someone you're in love with! Here's a picture of him! [She hands a photograph to BLANCHE.]

BLANCHE An officer?

STELLA A Master Sergeant in the Engineers' Corps. Those are decorations!

BLANCHE He had those on when you met him?

STELLA I assure you I wasn't just blinded by all the brass.

BLANCHE That's not what I—

STELLA But of course there were things to adjust myself to later on.

BLANCHE Such as his civilian background! [STELLA laughs uncertainly.]

How did he take it when you said I was coming?

STELLA Oh, Stanley doesn't know yet.

BLANCHE [frightened] You—haven't told him?

STELLA He's on the road a good deal.

BLANCHE Oh. Travels?

STELLA Yes.

BLANCHE Good. I mean—isn't it?

STELLA [half to herself] I can hardly stand it when he is away for a night . . .

BLANCHE Why, Stella!

STELLA When he's away for a week I nearly go wild!

BLANCHE Gracious!

STELLA And when he comes back I cry on his lap like a baby . . . [She smiles to herself.]

BLANCHE I guess that is what is meant by being in love . . . [STELLA looks up with a radiant smile.] Stella—

STELLA What?

BLANCHE [in an uneasy rush] I haven't asked you the things you probably thought I was going to ask. And so I'll expect you to be understanding about what I have to tell you.

STELLA What, Blanche? [Her face turns anxious.]

BLANCHE Well, Stella—you're going to reproach me, I know that you're bound to reproach me—but before you do—take into consideration—you left! I stayed and struggled! You came to New Orleans and looked out for yourself! I stayed at Belle Reve and tried to hold it together! I'm not meaning this in any reproachful way, but all the burden descended on my shoulders.

STELLA The best I could do was make my own living, Blanche.

[BLANCHE begins to shake again with intensity.]

BLANCHE I know, I know. But you are the one that abandoned Belle Reve, not I! I stayed and fought for it, bled for it, almost died for it!

STELLA Stop this hysterical outburst and tell me what's happened? What do you mean fought and bled? What kind of—BLANCHE I knew you would, Stella. I knew you would take this attitude about it!

STELLA About—what?—please!

BLANCHE [slowly] The loss—the loss . . .

STELLA Belle Reve? Lost, is it? No!

BLANCHE Yes, Stella.

[They stare at each other across the yellow-checked linoleum of the table.]

BLANCHE slowly nods her head and STELLA looks slowly down at her hands folded on the table. The music of the "Blue Piano" grows louder.

BLANCHE touches her handkerchief to her forehead.]

STELLA But how did it go? What happened?

BLANCHE [springing up] You're a fine one to ask me how it went!

STELLA Blanche!

BLANCHE You're a fine one to sit there accusing me of it!

STELLA Blanche!

BLANCHE I, I, I took the blows in my face and my body! All of those deaths! The long parade to the graveyard! Father, mother! Margaret, that dreadful way! So big with it, it couldn't be put in a coffin! But had to be burned like rubbish! You just came home in time for the funerals, Stella. And funerals are pretty compared to deaths. Funerals are quiet, but deaths—not always. Sometimes their breathing is hoarse, and sometimes it rattles, and sometimes they even cry out to you, "Don't let me go!" Even the old, sometimes, say, "Don't let me go." As if you were able to stop them! But funerals are quiet, with pretty flowers. And, oh, what gorgeous boxes they pack them away in! Unless you were there at the bed when they cried out, "Hold me!" you'd never suspect there was the struggle for breath and bleeding. You didn't dream, but I saw! Saw! Saw! And now you sit there telling me with your eyes that I let the place go! How in hell do you think all that sickness and dying was paid for? Death is expensive, Miss Stella! And old Cousin Jessie's right after Margaret's, hers! Why, the Grim Reaper had put up his tent on our doorstep! . . . Stella. Belle Reve was his headquarters! Honey—that's how it slipped through my fingers! Which of them left us a fortune? Which of them left a cent of insurance even? Only poor Jessie—one hundred to pay for her coffin. That was all, Stella! And I with my pitiful salary at the school. Yes, accuse me! Sit there and stare at me, thinking I let the place go! I let the place go? Where were you! In bed with your—Polack!

STELLA [springing] Blanche! You be still! That's enough! [She starts out.]

BLANCHE Where are you going?

STELLA I'm going into the bathroom to wash my face.

BLANCHE Oh, Stella, Stella, you're crying!

STELLA Does that surprise you?

BLANCHE Forgive me—I didn't mean to—

[The sound of men's voices is heard. STELLA goes into the bathroom, closing the door behind her. When the men appear, and BLANCHE realizes it must be STANLEY returning, she moves uncertainly from the bathroom door to the dressing table, looking apprehensively toward the front door. STANLEY enters, followed by STEVE and MITCH. STANLEY pauses near his door, STEVE by the foot of the spiral stair, and MITCH is slightly above and to the right of them, about to go out. As the men enter, we hear some of the following dialogue.]

STANLEY Is that how he got it?

STEVE Sure that's how he got it. He hit the old weather-bird for 300 bucks on a six-number-ticket.

MITCH Don't tell him those things; he'll believe it.

[Mitch starts out.]

STANLEY [restraining Mitch] Hey, Mitch—come back here.

[BLANCHE, at the sound of voices, retires in the bedroom. She picks up STANLEY's photo from dressing table, looks at it, puts it down. When STANLEY enters the apartment, she darts and hides behind the screen at the head of bed.]

STEVE [to STANLEY and MITCH] Hey, are we playin' poker tomorrow?

STANLEY Sure—at Mitch's.

MITCH [hearing this, returns quickly to the stair rail] No—not at my place. My mother's still sick!

STANLEY Okay, at my place . . . [MITCH starts out again.] But you bring the beer!

[MITCH pretends not to hear—calls out "Good night, all," and goes out, singing. EUNICE's voice is heard, above.]

EUNICE Break it up down there! I made the spaghetti dish and ate it myself.

STEVE [going upstairs] I told you and phoned you we was playing. [to the men] Jax beer!⁷

EUNICE You never phoned me once.

STEVE I told you at breakfast—and phoned you at lunch . . .

EUNICE Well, never mind about that. You just get yourself home here once in a while.

STEVE You want it in the papers?

[More laughter and shouts of parting come from the men. STANLEY throws the screen door of the kitchen open and comes in. He is of medium height, about five feet eight or nine, and strongly, compactly built. Animal joy in his being is implicit in all his movements and attitudes. Since earliest manhood the center of his life has been pleasure with women, the giving and taking of it, not with weak indulgence, dependently, but with the power and pride of a richly feathered male bird among hens. Branching out from this complete and satisfying center are all the auxiliary channels of his life, such as his heartiness with men, his appreciation of rough humor, his love of good drink and food and games, his car, his radio, everything that is his, that bears his emblem of the gaudy seed-bearer. He sizes women up at a glance, with sexual classifications, crude images flashing into his mind and determining the way he smiles at them.]

BLANCHE [drawing involuntarily back from his stare] You must be Stanley. I'm Blanche.

7. A local brand.

STANLEY Stella's sister?

BLANCHE Yes.

STANLEY H'lo. Where's the little woman?

BLANCHE In the bathroom.

STANLEY Oh. Didn't know you were coming in town.

BLANCHE I—uh—

STANLEY Where you from, Blanche?

BLANCHE Why, I—live in Laurel.

[He has crossed to the closet and removed the whiskey bottle.]

STANLEY In Laurel, huh? Oh, yeah. Yeah, in Laurel, that's right. Not in my territory. Liquor goes fast in hot weather. [He holds the bottle to the light to observe its depletion.] Have a shot?

BLANCHE No, I—rarely touch it.

STANLEY Some people rarely touch it, but it touches them often.

BLANCHE [faintly] Ha-ha.

STANLEY My clothes're stickin' to me. Do you mind if I make myself comfortable? [He starts to remove his shirt.]

BLANCHE Please, please do.

STANLEY Be comfortable is my motto.

BLANCHE It's mine, too. It's hard to stay looking fresh. I haven't washed or even powdered my face and—here you are!

STANLEY You know you can catch cold sitting around in damp things, especially when you been exercising hard like bowling is. You're a teacher, aren't you?

BLANCHE Yes.

STANLEY What do you teach, Blanche?

BLANCHE English.

STANLEY I never was a very good English student. How long you here for, Blanche?

BLANCHE I—don't know yet.

STANLEY You going to shack up here?

BLANCHE I thought I would if it's not inconvenient for you all.

STANLEY Good.

BLANCHE Traveling wears me out.

STANLEY Well, take it easy.

[A cat screeches near the window, BLANCHE springs up.]

BLANCHE What's that?

STANLEY Cats . . . Hey, Stella!

STELLA [faintly, from the bathroom] Yes, Stanley.

STANLEY Haven't fallen in, have you? [He grins at BLANCHE. She tries unsuccessfully to smile back. There is a silence.] I'm afraid I'll strike you as being the unrefined type. Stella's spoke of you a good deal. You were married once, weren't you?

[The music of the polka rises up, faint in the distance.]

BLANCHE Yes. When I was quite young.

STANLEY What happened?

BLANCHE The boy—the boy died. [She sinks back down.] I'm afraid I'm—going to be sick! [Her head falls on her arms.]

Scene Two

It is six o'clock the following evening. BLANCHE is bathing. STELLA is completing her toilette. BLANCHE's dress, a flowered print, is laid out on STELLA's bed.

STANLEY enters the kitchen from outside, leaving the door open on the perpetual "Blue Piano" around the corner.

STANLEY What's all this monkey doings?

STELLA Oh, Stan! [She jumps up and kisses him, which he accepts with lordly composure.] I'm taking Blanche to Galatoire's⁸ for supper and then to a show, because it's your poker night.

STANLEY How about my supper, huh? I'm not going to no Galatoire's for supper!

STELLA I put you a cold plate on ice.

STANLEY Well, isn't that just dandy!

STELLA I'm going to try to keep Blanche out till the party breaks up because I don't know how she would take it. So we'll go to one of the little places in the Quarter afterward and you'd better give me some money.

STANLEY Where is she?

STELLA She's soaking in a hot tub to quiet her nerves. She's terribly upset.

STANLEY Over what?

STELLA She's been through such an ordeal.

STANLEY Yeah?

STELLA Stan, we've—lost Belle Reve!

STANLEY The place in the country?

STELLA Yes.

STANLEY How?

STELLA [vaguely] Oh, it had to be—sacrificed or something. [There is a pause while STANLEY considers. STELLA is changing into her dress.] When she comes in be sure to say something nice about her appearance. And, oh! Don't mention the baby. I haven't said anything yet, I'm waiting until she gets in a quieter condition.

STANLEY [ominously] So?

STELLA And try to understand her and be nice to her, Stan.

BLANCHE [singing in the bathroom] "From the land of the sky blue water,
They brought a captive maid!"

STELLA She wasn't expecting to find us in such a small place. You see I'd tried to gloss things over a little in my letters.

STANLEY So?

STELLA And admire her dress and tell her she's looking wonderful. That's important with Blanche. Her little weakness!

STANLEY Yeah. I get the idea. Now let's skip back a little to where you said the country place was disposed of.

STELLA Oh!—yes . . .

STANLEY How about that? Let's have a few more details on that subject.

STELLA It's best not to talk much about it until she's calmed down.

STANLEY So that's the deal, huh? Sister Blanche cannot be annoyed with business details right now!

8. Renowned fancy restaurant with traditional New Orleans cuisine.

STELLA You saw how she was last night.

STANLEY Uh-hum, I saw how she was. Now let's have a gander at the bill of sale.

STELLA I haven't seen any.

STANLEY She didn't show you no papers, no deed of sale or nothing like that, huh?

STELLA It seems like it wasn't sold.

STANLEY Well, what in hell was it then, give away? To charity?

STELLA Shhh! She'll hear you.

STANLEY I don't care if she hears me. Let's see the papers!

STELLA There weren't any papers, she didn't show any papers, I don't care about papers.

STANLEY Have you ever heard of the Napoleonic code?⁹

STELLA No, Stanley, I haven't heard of the Napoleonic code and if I have, I don't see what it—

STANLEY Let me enlighten you on a point or two, baby.

STELLA Yes?

STANLEY In the state of Louisiana we have the Napoleonic code according to which what belongs to the wife belongs to the husband and vice versa. For instance if I had a piece of property, or you had a piece of property—

STELLA My head is swimming!

STANLEY All right. I'll wait till she gets through soaking in a hot tub and then I'll inquire if she is acquainted with the Napoleonic code. It looks to me like you have been swindled, baby, and when you're swindled under the Napoleonic code I'm swindled too. And I don't like to be swindled.

STELLA There's plenty of time to ask her questions later but if you do now she'll go to pieces again. I don't understand what happened to Belle Reve but you don't know how ridiculous you are being when you suggest that my sister or I or anyone of our family could have perpetrated a swindle on anyone else.

STANLEY Then where's the money if the place was sold?

STELLA Not sold—lost, lost!

[He stalks into bedroom, and she follows him.]

Stanley!

[He pulls open the wardrobe trunk standing in middle of room and jerks out an armful of dresses.]

STANLEY Open your eyes to this stuff! You think she got them out of a teacher's pay?

STELLA Hush!

STANLEY Look at these feathers and furs that she come here to preen herself in! What's this here? A solid-gold dress, I believe! And this one! What is these here? Fox-pieces! [He blows on them.] Genuine fox fur-pieces, a half a mile long! Where are your fox-pieces, Stella? Bushy snow-white ones, no less! Where are your white fox-pieces?

STELLA Those are inexpensive summer furs that Blanche has had a long time.

9. This codification of French law (1802), made by Napoleon as emperor, is the basis for Louisiana's civil law.

STANLEY I got an acquaintance who deals in this sort of merchandise. I'll have him in here to appraise it. I'm willing to bet you there's thousands of dollars invested in this stuff here!

STELLA Don't be such an idiot, Stanley!

[He hurls the furs to the day bed. Then he jerks open a small drawer in the trunk and pulls up a fistful of costume jewelry.]

STANLEY And what have we here? The treasure chest of a pirate!

STELLA Oh, Stanley!

STANLEY Pearls! Ropes of them! What is this sister of yours, a deep-sea diver? Bracelets of solid gold, too! Where are your pearls and gold bracelets?

STELLA Shhh! Be still, Stanley!

STANLEY And diamonds! A crown for an empress!

STELLA A rhinestone tiara she wore to a costume ball.

STANLEY What's rhinestone?

STELLA Next door to glass.

STANLEY Are you kidding? I have an acquaintance that works in a jewelry store. I'll have him in here to make an appraisal of this. Here's your plantation, or what was left of it, here!

STELLA You have no idea how stupid and horrid you're being! Now close that trunk before she comes out of the bathroom!

[He kicks the trunk partly closed and sits on the kitchen table.]

STANLEY The Kowalskis and the DuBoises have different notions.

STELLA [angrily] Indeed they have, thank heavens!—I'm going outside.

[She snatches up her white hat and gloves and crosses to the outside door.]

You come out with me while Blanche is getting dressed.

STANLEY Since when do you give me orders?

STELLA Are you going to stay here and insult her?

STANLEY You're damn tootin' I'm going to stay here.

[STELLA goes out to the porch. BLANCHE comes out of the bathroom in a red satin robe.]

BLANCHE [airily] Hello, Stanley! Here I am, all freshly bathed and scented, and feeling like a brand new human being!

[He lights a cigarette.]

STANLEY That's good.

BLANCHE [drawing the curtains at the windows] Excuse me while I slip on my pretty new dress!

STANLEY Go right ahead, Blanche.

[She closes the drapes between the rooms.]

BLANCHE I understand there's to be a little card party to which we ladies are cordially not invited!

STANLEY [ominously] Yeah?

[BLANCHE throws off her robe and slips into a flowered print dress.]

BLANCHE Where's Stella?

STANLEY Out on the porch.

BLANCHE I'm going to ask a favor of you in a moment.

STANLEY What could that be, I wonder?

BLANCHE Some buttons in back! You may enter! [He crosses through drapes with a smoldering look.] How do I look?

STANLEY You look all right.

BLANCHE Many thanks! Now the buttons!

STANLEY I can't do nothing with them.

BLANCHE You men with your big clumsy fingers. May I have a drag on your cig?

STANLEY Have one for yourself.

BLANCHE Why, thanks! . . . It looks like my trunk has exploded.

STANLEY Me an' Stella were helping you unpack.

BLANCHE Well, you certainly did a fast and thorough job of it!

STANLEY It looks like you raided some stylish shops in Paris.

BLANCHE Ha-ha! Yes—clothes are my passion!

STANLEY What does it cost for a string of fur-pieces like that?

BLANCHE Why, those were a tribute from an admirer of mine!

STANLEY He must have had a lot of—admiration!

BLANCHE Oh, in my youth I excited some admiration. But look at me now!
 [She smiles at him radiantly.] Would you think it possible that I was once considered to be—attractive?

STANLEY Your looks are okay.

BLANCHE I was fishing for a compliment, Stanley.

STANLEY I don't go in for that stuff.

BLANCHE What—stuff?

STANLEY Compliments to women about their looks. I never met a woman that didn't know if she was good-looking or not without being told, and some of them give themselves credit for more than they've got. I once went out with a doll who said to me, "I am the glamorous type, I am the glamorous type!" I said, "So what?"

BLANCHE And what did she say then?

STANLEY She didn't say nothing. That shut her up like a clam.

BLANCHE Did it end the romance?

STANLEY It ended the conversation—that was all. Some men are took in by this Hollywood glamor stuff and some men are not.

BLANCHE I'm sure you belong in the second category.

STANLEY That's right.

BLANCHE I cannot imagine any witch of a woman casting a spell over you.

STANLEY That's—right.

BLANCHE You're simple, straightforward and honest, a little bit on the primitive side I should think. To interest you a woman would have to—
 [She pauses with an indefinite gesture.]

STANLEY [slowly] Lay . . . her cards on the table.

BLANCHE [smiling] Well, I never cared for wishy-washy people. That was why, when you walked in here last night, I said to myself—"My sister has married a man!"—Of course that was all that I could tell about you.

STANLEY [booming] Now let's cut the re-bop!¹

BLANCHE [pressing hands to her ears] Ouuuuu!

STELLA [calling from the steps] Stanley! You come out here and let Blanche finish dressing!

BLANCHE I'm through dressing, honey.

1. Nonsense (from "bebop," a form of jazz).

STELLA Well, you come out, then.

STANLEY Your sister and I are having a little talk.

BLANCHE [lightly] Honey, do me a favor. Run to the drugstore and get me a lemon Coke with plenty of chipped ice in it!—Will you do that for me, sweetie?

STELLA [uncertainly] Yes. [She goes around the corner of the building.]

BLANCHE The poor little thing was out there listening to us, and I have an idea she doesn't understand you as well as I do. . . . All right; now, Mr. Kowalski, let us proceed without any more double-talk. I'm ready to answer all questions. I've nothing to hide. What is it?

STANLEY There is such a thing in this state of Louisiana as the Napoleonic code, according to which whatever belongs to my wife is also mine—and vice versa.

BLANCHE My, but you have an impressive judicial air!

[She sprays herself with her atomizer; then playfully sprays him with it. He seizes the atomizer and slams it down on the dresser. She throws back her head and laughs.]

STANLEY If I didn't know that you was my wife's sister I'd get ideas about you!

BLANCHE Such as what!

STANLEY Don't play so dumb. You know what!

BLANCHE [she puts the atomizer on the table] All right. Cards on the table. That suits me. [She turns to STANLEY.] I know I fib a good deal. After all, a woman's charm is fifty per cent illusion, but when a thing is important I tell the truth, and this is the truth: I haven't cheated my sister or you or anyone else as long as I have lived.

STANLEY Where's the papers? In the trunk?

BLANCHE Everything that I own is in that trunk.

[STANLEY crosses to the trunk, shoves it roughly open and begins to open compartments.]

BLANCHE What in the name of heaven are you thinking of! What's in the back of that little boy's mind of yours? That I am absconding with something, attempting some kind of treachery on my sister?—Let me do that! It will be faster and simpler. . . . [She crosses to the trunk and takes out a box.] I keep my papers mostly in this tin box. [She opens it.]

STANLEY What's them underneath? [He indicates another sheaf of paper.]

BLANCHE These are love-letters, yellowing with antiquity, all from one boy. [He snatches them up. She speaks fiercely.] Give those back to me!

STANLEY I'll have a look at them first!

BLANCHE The touch of your hands insults them!

STANLEY Don't pull that stuff!

[He rips off the ribbon and starts to examine them. BLANCHE snatches them from him, and they cascade to the floor.]

BLANCHE Now that you've touched them I'll burn them!

STANLEY [staring, baffled] What in hell are they?

BLANCHE [on the floor gathering them up] Poems a dead boy wrote. I hurt him the way that you would like to hurt me, but you can't! I'm not young and vulnerable any more. But my young husband was and I—never mind about that! Just give them back to me!

STANLEY What do you mean by saying you'll have to burn them?

BLANCHE I'm sorry, I must have lost my head for a moment. Everyone has something he won't let others touch because of their—intimate nature . . .

[She now seems faint with exhaustion and she sits down with the strong box and puts on a pair of glasses and goes methodically through a large stack of papers.]

Ambler & Ambler. Hm. . . . Crabtree. . . . More Ambler & Ambler.

STANLEY What is Ambler & Ambler?

BLANCHE A firm that made loans on the place.

STANLEY Then it was lost on a mortgage?

BLANCHE [touching her forehead] That must've been what happened.

STANLEY I don't want no ifs, ands or buts! What's all the rest of them papers?

[She hands him the entire box. He carries it to the table and starts to examine the paper.]

BLANCHE [picking up a large envelope containing more papers] There are thousands of papers, stretching back over hundreds of years, affecting Belle Reve as, piece by piece, our improvident grandfathers and father and uncles and brothers exchanged the land for their epic fornications—to put it plainly! [She removes her glasses with an exhausted laugh.] The four-letter word deprived us of our plantation, till finally all that was left—and Stella can verify that!—was the house itself and about twenty acres of ground, including a graveyard, to which now all but Stella and I have retreated. [She pours the contents of the envelope on the table.] Here all of them are, all papers! I hereby endow you with them! Take them, peruse them—commit them to memory, even! I think it's wonderfully fitting that Belle Reve should finally be this bunch of old papers in your big, capable hands! . . . I wonder if Stella's come back with my lemon Coke . . . [She leans back and closes her eyes.]

STANLEY I have a lawyer acquaintance who will study these out.

BLANCHE Present them to him with a box of aspirin tablets.

STANLEY [becoming somewhat sheepish] You see, under the Napoleonic code—a man has to take an interest in his wife's affairs—especially now that she's going to have a baby.

[BLANCHE opens her eyes. The "Blue Piano" sounds louder.]

BLANCHE Stella? Stella going to have a baby? [dreamily] I didn't know she was going to have a baby!

[She gets up and crosses to the outside door. STELLA appears around the corner with a carton from the drugstore. STANLEY goes into the bedroom with the envelope and the box. The inner rooms fade to darkness and the outside wall of the house is visible, BLANCHE meets STELLA at the foot of the steps to the sidewalk.]

BLANCHE Stella, Stella for star! How lovely to have a baby! It's all right. Everything's all right.

STELLA I'm sorry he did that to you.

BLANCHE Oh, I guess he's just not the type that goes for jasmine perfume, but maybe he's what we need to mix with our blood now that we've lost Belle Reve. We thrashed it out. I feel a bit shaky, but I think I handled it nicely, I laughed and treated it all as a joke. [STEVE and PABLO appear, carrying a case of beer.] I called him a little boy and laughed and flirted. Yes, I was flirting with your husband! [as the men approach] The guests are gathering for the poker party. [The two men pass between them, and enter the house.] Which way do we go now, Stella—this way?

STELLA No, this way. [She leads BLANCHE away.]

BLANCHE [laughing] The blind are leading the blind!

[A tamale VENDOR is heard calling.]

VENDOR'S VOICE Red-hot!

Scene Three

THE POKER NIGHT²

There is a picture of Van Gogh's³ of a billiard-parlor at night. The kitchen now suggests that sort of lurid nocturnal brilliance, the raw colors of childhood's spectrum. Over the yellow linoleum of the kitchen table hangs an electric bulb with a vivid green glass shade. The poker players—STANLEY, STEVE, MITCH and PABLO—wear colored shirts, solid blues, a purple, a red-and-white check, a light green, and they are men at the peak of their physical manhood, as coarse and direct and powerful as the primary colors. There are vivid slices of watermelon on the table, whiskey bottles and glasses. The bedroom is relatively dim with only the light that spills between the portieres and through the wide window on the street.

For a moment, there is absorbed silence as a hand is dealt.

STEVE Anything wild this deal?

PABLO One-eyed jacks are wild.

STEVE Give me two cards.

PABLO You, Mitch?

MITCH I'm out.

PABLO One.

MITCH Anyone want a shot?

STANLEY Yeah. Me.

PABLO Why don't somebody go to the Chinaman's and bring back a load of chop suey?

STANLEY When I'm losing you want to eat! Ante up! Openers? Openers! Get y'r ass off the table, Mitch. Nothing belongs on a poker table but cards, chips and whiskey.

[He lurches up and tosses some watermelon rinds to the floor.]

MITCH Kind of on your high horse, ain't you?

STANLEY How many?

STEVE Give me three.

STANLEY One.

MITCH I'm out again. I oughta go home pretty soon.

STANLEY Shut up.

MITCH I gotta sick mother. She don't go to sleep until I come in at night.

STANLEY Then why don't you stay home with her?

MITCH She says to go out, so I go, but I don't enjoy it. All the while I keep wondering how she is.

STANLEY Aw, for the sake of Jesus, go home, then!

PABLO What've you got?

2. Williams's first title for A Streetcar Named Desire (see headnote).

3. The Night Café, by the Dutch Postimpressionist painter Vincent van Gogh (1853–1890).

STEVE Spade flush.

MITCH You all are married. But I'll be alone when she goes.—I'm going to the bathroom.

STANLEY Hurry back and we'll fix you a sugar-tit.

MITCH Aw, go rut. [He crosses through the bedroom into the bathroom.]

STEVE [dealing a hand] Seven card stud.⁴ [telling his joke as he deals] This ole farmer is out in back of his house sittin' down th'owing corn to the chickens when all at once he hears a loud cackle and this young hen comes lickety split around the side of the house with the rooster right behind her and gaining on her fast.

STANLEY [impatient with the story] Deal!

STEVE But when the rooster catches sight of the farmer th'owing the corn he puts on the brakes and lets the hen get away and starts pecking corn. And the old farmer says, "Lord God, I hopes I never gits that hongry!"

[STEVE and PABLO laugh. The sisters appear around the corner of the building.]

STELLA The game is still going on.

BLANCHE How do I look?

STELLA Lovely, Blanche.

BLANCHE I feel so hot and frazzled. Wait till I powder before you open the door. Do I look done in?

STELLA Why no. You are as fresh as a daisy.

BLANCHE One that's been picked a few days.

[STELLA opens the door and they enter.]

STELLA Well, well, well. I see you boys are still at it?

STANLEY Where you been?

STELLA Blanche and I took in a show. Blanche, this is Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Hubbell.

BLANCHE Please don't get up.

STANLEY Nobody's going to get up, so don't be worried.

STELLA How much longer is this game going to continue?

STANLEY Till we get ready to quit.

BLANCHE Poker is so fascinating. Could I kibitz?

STANLEY You could not. Why don't you women go up and sit with Eunice?

STELLA Because it is nearly two-thirty. [BLANCHE crosses into the bedroom and partially closes the portieres.] Couldn't you call it quits after one more hand?

[A chair scrapes. STANLEY gives a loud whack of his hand on her thigh.]

STELLA [sharply] That's not fun, Stanley.

[The men laugh, STELLA goes into the bedroom.]

STELLA It makes me so mad when he does that in front of people.

BLANCHE I think I will bathe.

STELLA Again?

BLANCHE My nerves are in knots. Is the bathroom occupied?

STELLA I don't know.

[BLANCHE knocks, MITCH opens the door and comes out, still wiping his hands on a towel.]

4. An adventurous and risky variant of poker.

BLANCHE Oh!—good evening.

MITCH Hello. [He stares at her.]

STELLA Blanche, this is Harold Mitchell. My sister, Blanche DuBois.

MITCH [with awkward courtesy] How do you do, Miss DuBois.

STELLA How is your mother now, Mitch?

MITCH About the same, thanks. She appreciated your sending over that custard.—Excuse me, please.

[He crosses slowly back into the kitchen, glancing back at BLANCHE and coughing a little shyly. He realizes he still has the towel in his hands and with an embarrassed laugh hands it to STELLA. BLANCHE looks after him with a certain interest.]

BLANCHE That one seems—superior to the others.

STELLA Yes, he is.

BLANCHE I thought he had a sort of sensitive look.

STELLA His mother is sick.

BLANCHE Is he married?

STELLA No.

BLANCHE Is he a wolf?

STELLA Why, Blanche! [BLANCHE laughs.] I don't think he would be.

BLANCHE What does—what does he do? [She is unbuttoning her blouse.]

STELLA He's on the precision bench in the spare parts department. At the plant Stanley travels for.

BLANCHE Is that something much?

STELLA No. Stanley's the only one of his crowd that's likely to get anywhere.

BLANCHE What makes you think Stanley will?

STELLA Look at him.

BLANCHE I've looked at him.

STELLA Then you should know.

BLANCHE I'm sorry, but I haven't noticed the stamp of genius even on Stanley's forehead.

[She takes off the blouse and stands in her pink silk brassiere and white skirt in the light through the portieres. The game has continued in undertones.]

STELLA It isn't on his forehead and it isn't genius.

BLANCHE Oh. Well, what is it, and where? I would like to know.

STELLA It's a drive that he has. You're standing in the light, Blanche!

BLANCHE Oh, am I!

[She moves out of the yellow streak of light. STELLA has removed her dress and put on a light blue satin kimona.]

STELLA [with girlish laughter] You ought to see their wives.

BLANCHE [laughingly] I can imagine. Big, beefy things, I suppose.

STELLA You know that one upstairs? [more laughter] One time [laughing] the plaster—[laughing] cracked—

STANLEY You hens cut out that conversation in there!

STELLA You can't hear us.

STANLEY Well, you can hear me and I said to hush up!

STELLA This is my house and I'll talk as much as I want to!

BLANCHE Stella, don't start a row.

STELLA He's half drunk!—I'll be out in a minute.

[She goes into the bathroom, BLANCHE rises and crosses leisurely to a small white radio and turns it on.]

STANLEY Awright, Mitch, you in?

MITCH What? Oh!—No, I'm out!

[BLANCHE moves back into the streak of light. She raises her arms and stretches, as she moves indolently back to the chair. Rhumba music comes over the radio. MITCH rises at the table.]

STANLEY Who turned that on in there?

BLANCHE I did. Do you mind?

STANLEY Turn it off!

STEVE Aw, let the girls have their music.

PABLO Sure, that's good, leave it on!

STEVE Sounds like Xavier Cugat!⁵

[STANLEY jumps up and, crossing to the radio, turns it off. He stops short at the sight of BLANCHE in the chair. She returns his look without flinching. Then he sits again at the poker table. Two of the men have started arguing hotly.]

STEVE I didn't hear you name it.

PABLO Didn't I name it, Mitch?

MITCH I wasn't listenin'.

PABLO What were you doing, then?

STANLEY He was looking through them drapes. [He jumps up and jerks roughly at curtains to close them.] Now deal the hand over again and let's play cards or quit. Some people get ants when they win.

[MITCH rises as STANLEY returns to his seat.]

STANLEY [yelling] Sit down!

MITCH I'm going to the "head." Deal me out.

PABLO Sure he's got ants now. Seven five-dollar bills in his pants pocket folded up tight as spitballs.

STEVE Tomorrow you'll see him at the cashier's window getting them changed into quarters.

STANLEY And when he goes home he'll deposit them one by one in a piggy bank his mother give him for Christmas. [dealing] This game is Spit in the Ocean.⁶

[MITCH laughs uncomfortably and continues through the portieres. He stops just inside.]

BLANCHE [softly] Hello! The Little Boys' Room is busy right now.

MITCH We've—been drinking beer.

BLANCHE I hate beer.

MITCH It's—a hot weather drink.

BLANCHE Oh, I don't think so; it always makes me warmer. Have you got any cigs? [She has slipped on the dark red satin wrapper.]

MITCH Sure.

BLANCHE What kind are they?

MITCH Luckies.

BLANCHE Oh, good. What a pretty case. Silver?

MITCH Yes. Yes; read the inscription.

5. Cuban bandleader (1900–1990), well known for composing and playing rhumbas.

6. Another variant of poker.

BLANCHE Oh, is there an inscription? I can't make it out. [He strikes a match and moves closer.] Oh! [reading with feigned difficulty] "And if God choose, / I shall but love thee better—after—death!" Why, that's from my favorite sonnet by Mrs. Browning.⁷

MITCH You know it?

BLANCHE Certainly I do!

MITCH There's a story connected with that inscription.

BLANCHE It sounds like a romance.

MITCH A pretty sad one.

BLANCHE Oh?

MITCH The girl's dead now.

BLANCHE [in a tone of deep sympathy] Oh!

MITCH She knew she was dying when she give me this. A very strange girl, very sweet—very!

BLANCHE She must have been fond of you. Sick people have such deep, sincere attachments.

MITCH That's right, they certainly do.

BLANCHE Sorrow makes for sincerity, I think.

MITCH It sure brings it out in people.

BLANCHE The little there is belongs to people who have experienced some sorrow.

MITCH I believe you are right about that.

BLANCHE I'm positive that I am. Show me a person who hasn't known any sorrow and I'll show you a shuperficial—Listen to me! My tongue is a little—thick! You boys are responsible for it. The show let out at eleven and we couldn't come home on account of the poker game so we had to go somewhere and drink. I'm not accustomed to having more than one drink. Two is the limit—and three! [She laughs.] Tonight I had three.

STANLEY Mitch!

MITCH Deal me out. I'm talking to Miss—

BLANCHE DuBois.

MITCH Miss DuBois?

BLANCHE It's a French name. It means woods and Blanche means white, so the two together mean white woods. Like an orchard in spring! You can remember it by that.

MITCH You're French?

BLANCHE We are French by extraction. Our first American ancestors were French Huguenots.

MITCH You are Stella's sister, are you not?

BLANCHE Yes, Stella is my precious little sister. I call her little in spite of the fact she's somewhat older than I. Just slightly. Less than a year. Will you do something for me?

MITCH Sure. What?

BLANCHE I bought this adorable little colored paper lantern at a Chinese shop on Bourbon. Put it over the light bulb! Will you, please?

MITCH Be glad to.

7. Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–1861), British poet, most famous for her sequence of love poems, Sonnets from the Portuguese. The quotation here is from sonnet 43, better known by its first line, "How do I love thee?"

BLANCHE I can't stand a naked light bulb, any more than I can a rude remark or a vulgar action.

MITCH [adjusting the lantern] I guess we strike you as being a pretty rough bunch.

BLANCHE I'm very adaptable—to circumstances.

MITCH Well, that's a good thing to be. You are visiting Stanley and Stella?

BLANCHE Stella hasn't been so well lately, and I came down to help her for a while. She's very run down.

MITCH You're not—?

BLANCHE Married? No, no. I'm an old maid schoolteacher!

MITCH You may teach school but you're certainly not an old maid.

BLANCHE Thank you, sir! I appreciate your gallantry!

MITCH So you are in the teaching profession?

BLANCHE Yes. Ah, yes . . .

MITCH Grade school or high school or—

STANLEY [bellowing] Mitch!

MITCH Coming!

BLANCHE Gracious, what lung-power! . . . I teach high school. In Laurel.

MITCH What do you teach? What subject?

BLANCHE Guess!

MITCH I bet you teach art or music? [BLANCHE laughs delicately.] Of course I could be wrong. You might teach arithmetic.

BLANCHE Never arithmetic, sir; never arithmetic! [with a laugh] I don't even know my multiplication tables! No, I have the misfortune of being an English instructor. I attempt to instill a bunch of bobby-soxers and drugstore Romeos with reverence for Hawthorne and Whitman and Poe!

MITCH I guess that some of them are more interested in other things.

BLANCHE How very right you are! Their literary heritage is not what most of them treasure above all else! But they're sweet things! And in the spring, it's touching to notice them making their first discovery of love! As if nobody had ever known it before!

[The bathroom door opens and STELLA comes out. BLANCHE continues talking to MITCH.]

Oh! Have you finished? Wait—I'll turn on the radio.

[*She turns the knobs on the radio and it begins to play "Wien, Wien, nur du allein."*⁸ BLANCHE waltzes to the music with romantic gestures, MITCH is delighted and moves in awkward imitation like a dancing bear. STANLEY stalks fiercely through the portieres into the bedroom. He crosses to the small white radio and snatches it off the table. With a shouted oath, he tosses the instrument out the window.]

STELLA Drunk—drunk—animal thing, you! [She rushes through to the poker table.] All of you—please go home! If any of you have one spark of decency in you—

BLANCHE [wildly] Stella, watch out, he's—

[STANLEY charges after STELLA.]

MEN [feebly] Take it easy, Stanley. Easy, fellow.—Let's all—

STELLA You lay your hands on me and I'll—

[She backs out of sight. He advances and disappears. There is the sound of a blow. STELLA cries out. BLANCHE screams and runs into the kitchen.]

8. Vienna, Vienna, you are my only (German); a waltz from an operetta by Franz Lehár (1870–1948).

The men rush forward and there is grappling and cursing. Something is overturned with a crash.

BLANCHE [shrilly] My sister is going to have a baby!

MITCH This is terrible.

BLANCHE Lunacy, absolute lunacy!

MITCH Get him in here, men.

[STANLEY is forced, pinioned by the two men, into the bedroom. He nearly throws them off. Then all at once he subsides and is limp in their grasp. They speak quietly and lovingly to him and he leans his face on one of their shoulders.]

STELLA [in a high, unnatural voice, out of sight] I want to go away, I want to go away!

MITCH Poker shouldn't be played in a house with women.

[BLANCHE rushes into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE I want my sister's clothes! We'll go to that woman's upstairs!

MITCH Where is the clothes?

BLANCHE [opening the closet] I've got them! [She rushes through to STELLA.]

Stella, Stella, precious! Dear, dear little sister, don't be afraid!

[With her arm around STELLA, BLANCHE guides her to the outside door and upstairs.]

STANLEY [dully] What's the matter; what's happened?

MITCH You just blew your top, Stan.

PABLO He's okay, now.

STEVE Sure, my boy's okay!

MITCH Put him on the bed and get a wet towel.

PABLO I think coffee would do him a world of good, now.

STANLEY [thickly] I want water.

MITCH Put him under the shower!

[The men talk quietly as they lead him to the bathroom.]

STANLEY Let the rut go of me, you sons of bitches!

[Sounds of blows are heard. The water goes on full tilt.]

STEVE Let's get quick out of here!

[They rush to the poker table and sweep up their winnings on their way out.]

MITCH [sadly but firmly] Poker should not be played in a house with women.

[The door closes on them and the place is still. The Negro entertainers in the bar around the corner play "Paper Doll"⁹ slow and blue. After a moment STANLEY comes out of the bathroom dripping water and still in his clinging wet polka dot drawers.]

STANLEY Stella! [There is a pause.] My baby doll's left me!

[He breaks into sobs. Then he goes to the phone and dials, still shuddering with sobs.]

Eunice? I want my baby! [He waits a moment; then he hangs up and dials again.] Eunice! I'll keep on ringin' until I talk with my baby!

[An indistinguishable shrill voice is heard. He hurls phone to floor. Dissonant brass and piano sounds as the rooms dim out to darkness and the outer walls appear in the night light. The "Blue Piano" plays for a brief interval. Finally, STANLEY stumbles half-dressed out to the porch and down the wooden steps to the pavement before the building. There he throws back his head like a baying hound and bellows his wife's name: "Stella! Stella, sweetheart! Stella!"

9. Popular song of the early 1940s by Johnny Black.

STANLEY Stell-lahhhhh!

EUNICE [calling down from the door of her upper apartment] Quit that howling out there an' go back to bed!

STANLEY I want my baby down here. Stella, Stella!

EUNICE She ain't comin' down so you quit! Or you'll git th' law on you!

STANLEY Stella!

EUNICE You can't beat on a woman an' then call 'er back! She won't come! And her goin' t' have a baby! . . . You stinker! You whelp of a Polack, you! I hope they do haul you in and turn the fire hose on you, same as the last time!

STANLEY [humbly] Eunice, I want my girl to come down with me!

EUNICE Hah! [She slams her door.]

STANLEY [with heaven-splitting violence] STELL-LAHHHHH!

[The low-tone clarinet moans. The door upstairs opens again. STELLA slips down the rickety stairs in her robe. Her eyes are glistening with tears and her hair loose about her throat and shoulders. They stare at each other. Then they come together with low, animal moans. He falls to his knees on the steps and presses his face to her belly, curving a little with maternity. Her eyes go blind with tenderness as she catches his head and raises him level with her. He snatches the screen door open and lifts her off her feet and bears her into the dark flat. BLANCHE comes out the upper landing in her robe and slips fearfully down the steps.]

BLANCHE Where is my little sister? Stella? Stella?

[She stops before the dark entrance of her sister's flat. Then catches her breath as if struck. She rushes down to the walk before the house. She looks right and left as if for a sanctuary. The music fades away, MITCH appears from around the corner.]

MITCH Miss DuBois?

BLANCHE Oh!

MITCH All quiet on the Potomac now?

BLANCHE She ran downstairs and went back in there with him.

MITCH Sure she did.

BLANCHE I'm terrified!

MITCH Ho-ho! There's nothing to be scared of. They're crazy about each other.

BLANCHE I'm not used to such—

MITCH Naw, it's a shame this had to happen when you just got here. But don't take it serious.

BLANCHE Violence! Is so—

MITCH Set down on the steps and have a cigarette with me.

BLANCHE I'm not properly dressed.

MITCH That don't make no difference in the Quarter.

BLANCHE Such a pretty silver case.

MITCH I showed you the inscription, didn't I?

BLANCHE Yes. [During the pause, she looks up at the sky.] There's so much— so much confusion in the world . . . [He coughs diffidently.] Thank you for being so kind! I need kindness now.

Scene Four

It is early the following morning. There is a confusion of street cries like a choral chant.

STELLA is lying down in the bedroom. Her face is serene in the early morning sunlight. One hand rests on her belly, rounding slightly with new maternity. From the other dangles a book of colored comics. Her eyes and lips have that almost narcotized tranquility that is in the faces of Eastern idols.

The table is sloppy with remains of breakfast and the debris of the preceding night, and STANLEY's gaudy pyjamas lie across the threshold of the bathroom. The outside door is slightly ajar on a sky of summer brilliance.

BLANCHE appears at this door. She has spent a sleepless night and her appearance entirely contrasts with STELLA's. She presses her knuckles nervously to her lips as she looks through the door, before entering.

BLANCHE Stella?

STELLA [stirring lazily] Hmmh?

[BLANCHE utters a moaning cry and runs into the bedroom, throwing herself down beside STELLA in a rush of hysterical tenderness.]

BLANCHE Baby, my baby sister!

STELLA [drawing away from her] Blanche, what is the matter with you?

[BLANCHE straightens up slowly and stands beside the bed looking down at her sister with knuckles pressed to her lips.]

BLANCHE He's left?

STELLA Stan? Yes.

BLANCHE Will he be back?

STELLA He's gone to get the car greased. Why?

BLANCHE Why! I've been half crazy, Stella! When I found out you'd been insane enough to come back in here after what happened—I started to rush in after you!

STELLA I'm glad you didn't.

BLANCHE What were you thinking of? [STELLA makes an indefinite gesture.] Answer me! What? What?

STELLA Please, Blanche! Sit down and stop yelling.

BLANCHE All right, Stella. I will repeat the question quietly now. How could you come back in this place last night? Why, you must have slept with him!

[STELLA gets up in a calm and leisurely way.]

STELLA Blanche, I'd forgotten how excitable you are. You're making much too much fuss about this.

BLANCHE Am I?

STELLA Yes, you are, Blanche. I know how it must have seemed to you and I'm awful sorry it had to happen, but it wasn't anything as serious as you seem to take it. In the first place, when men are drinking and playing poker anything can happen. It's always a powder-keg. He didn't know what he was doing. . . . He was as good as a lamb when I came back and he's really very, very ashamed of himself.

BLANCHE And that—that makes it all right?

STELLA No, it isn't all right for anybody to make such a terrible row, but—people do sometimes. Stanley's always smashed things. Why, on our wedding night—soon as we came in here—he snatched off one of my slippers and rushed about the place smashing light bulbs with it.

BLANCHE He did—what?

STELLA He smashed all the light bulbs with the heel of my slipper! [She laughs.]

BLANCHE And you—you let him? Didn't run, didn't scream?

STELLA I was—sort of—thrilled by it. [She waits for a moment.] Eunice and you had breakfast?

BLANCHE Do you suppose I wanted any breakfast?

STELLA There's some coffee left on the stove.

BLANCHE You're so—matter of fact about it, Stella.

STELLA What other can I be? He's taken the radio to get it fixed. It didn't land on the pavement so only one tube was smashed.

BLANCHE And you are standing there smiling!

STELLA What do you want me to do?

BLANCHE Pull yourself together and face the facts.

STELLA What are they, in your opinion?

BLANCHE In my opinion? You're married to a madman!

STELLA No!

BLANCHE Yes, you are, your fix is worse than mine is! Only you're not being sensible about it. I'm going to do something. Get hold of myself and make myself a new life!

STELLA Yes?

BLANCHE But you've given in. And that isn't right, you're not old! You can get out.

STELLA [slowly and emphatically] I'm not in anything I want to get out of.

BLANCHE [incredulously] What—Stella?

STELLA I said I am not in anything that I have a desire to get out of. Look at the mess in this room! And those empty bottles! They went through two cases last night! He promised this morning that he was going to quit having these poker parties, but you know how long such a promise is going to keep. Oh, well, it's his pleasure, like mine is movies and bridge. People have got to tolerate each other's habits, I guess.

BLANCHE I don't understand you. [STELLA turns toward her.] I don't understand your indifference. Is this a Chinese philosophy you've—cultivated?

STELLA Is what—what?

BLANCHE This—shuffling about and mumbling—'One tube smashed—beer bottles—mess in the kitchen!'—as if nothing out of the ordinary has happened! [STELLA laughs uncertainly and picking up the broom, twirls it in her hands.]

BLANCHE Are you deliberately shaking that thing in my face?

STELLA No.

BLANCHE Stop it. Let go of that broom. I won't have you cleaning up for him!

STELLA Then who's going to do it? Are you?

BLANCHE I? I!

STELLA No, I didn't think so.

BLANCHE Oh, let me think, if only my mind would function! We've got to get hold of some money, that's the way out!

STELLA I guess that money is always nice to get hold of.

BLANCHE Listen to me. I have an idea of some kind. [Shakily she twists a cigarette into her holder.] Do you remember Shep Huntleigh? [STELLA shakes her head.] Of course you remember Shep Huntleigh. I went out with him at college and wore his pin for a while. Well—

STELLA Well?

BLANCHE I ran into him last winter. You know I went to Miami during the Christmas holidays?

STELLA No.

BLANCHE Well, I did. I took the trip as an investment, thinking I'd meet someone with a million dollars.

STELLA Did you?

BLANCHE Yes. I ran into Shep Huntleigh—I ran into him on Biscayne Boulevard, on Christmas Eve, about dusk . . . getting into his car—Cadillac convertible; must have been a block long!

STELLA I should think it would have been—inconvenient in traffic!

BLANCHE You've heard of oil wells?

STELLA Yes—remotely.

BLANCHE He has them, all over Texas. Texas is literally spouting gold in his pockets.

STELLA My, my.

BLANCHE Y'know how indifferent I am to money. I think of money in terms of what it does for you. But he could do it, he could certainly do it!

STELLA Do what, Blanche?

BLANCHE Why—set us up in a—shop!

STELLA What kind of a shop?

BLANCHE Oh, a—shop of some kind! He could do it with half what his wife throws away at the races.

STELLA He's married?

BLANCHE Honey, would I be here if the man weren't married? [STELLA laughs a little. BLANCHE suddenly springs up and crosses to phone. She speaks shrilly.] How do I get Western Union?—Operator! Western Union!

STELLA That's a dial phone, honey.

BLANCHE I can't dial, I'm too—

STELLA Just dial O.

BLANCHE O?

STELLA Yes, "O" for Operator! [BLANCHE considers a moment; then she puts the phone down.]

BLANCHE Give me a pencil. Where is a slip of paper? I've got to write it down first—the message, I mean . . . [She goes to the dressing table, and grabs up a sheet of Kleenex and an eyebrow pencil for writing equipment.] Let me see now . . . [She bites the pencil.] 'Darling Shep. Sister and I in desperate situation.'

STELLA I beg your pardon!

BLANCHE 'Sister and I in desperate situation. Will explain details later. Would you be interested in—?' [She bites the pencil again.] 'Would you be—interested—in . . . ' [She smashes the pencil on the table and springs up.] You never get anywhere with direct appeals!

STELLA [with a laugh] Don't be so ridiculous, darling!

BLANCHE But I'll think of something, I've got to think of—something! Don't laugh at me, Stella! Please, please don't—I—I want you to look at the contents of my purse! Here's what's in it! [She snatches her purse open.] Sixty-five measly cents in coin of the realm!

STELLA [crossing to bureau] Stanley doesn't give me a regular allowance, he likes to pay bills himself, but—this morning he gave me ten dollars to smooth things over. You take five of it, Blanche, and I'll keep the rest.

BLANCHE Oh, no. No, Stella.

STELLA [insisting] I know how it helps your morale just having a little pocket-money on you.

BLANCHE No, thank you—I'll take to the streets!

STELLA Talk sense! How did you happen to get so low on funds?

BLANCHE Money just goes—it goes places. [She rubs her forehead.] Sometime today I've got to get hold of a Bromo!¹

STELLA I'll fix you one now.

BLANCHE Not yet—I've got to keep thinking!

STELLA I wish you'd just let things go, at least for a—while . . .

BLANCHE Stella, I can't live with him! You can, he's your husband. But how could I stay here with him, after last night, with just those curtains between us?

STELLA Blanche, you saw him at his worst last night.

BLANCHE On the contrary, I saw him at his best! What such a man has to offer is animal force and he gave a wonderful exhibition of that! But the only way to live with such a man is to—go to bed with him! And that's your job—not mine!

STELLA After you've rested a little, you'll see it's going to work out. You don't have to worry about anything while you're here. I mean—expenses . . .

BLANCHE I have to plan for us both, to get us both—out!

STELLA You take it for granted that I am in something that I want to get out of.

BLANCHE I take it for granted that you still have sufficient memory of Belle Reve to find this place and these poker players impossible to live with.

STELLA Well, you're taking entirely too much for granted.

BLANCHE I can't believe you're in earnest.

STELLA No?

BLANCHE I understand how it happened—a little. You saw him in uniform, an officer, not here but—

STELLA I'm not sure it would have made any difference where I saw him.

BLANCHE Now don't say it was one of those mysterious electric things between people! If you do I'll laugh in your face.

STELLA I am not going to say anything more at all about it!

BLANCHE All right, then, don't!

STELLA But there are things that happen between a man and a woman in the dark—that sort of make everything else seem—unimportant. [Pause.]

BLANCHE What you are talking about is brutal desire—just—Desire!—the name of that rattle-trap streetcar that bangs through the Quarter, up one old narrow street and down another . . .

STELLA Haven't you ever ridden on that streetcar?

1. Short for Bromo-Seltzer, a headache and heartburn remedy.

BLANCHE It brought me here.—Where I'm not wanted and where I'm ashamed to be . . .

STELLA Then don't you think your superior attitude is a bit out of place?

BLANCHE I am not being or feeling at all superior, Stella. Believe me I'm not! It's just this. This is how I look at it. A man like that is someone to go out with—once—twice—three times when the devil is in you. But live with? Have a child by?

STELLA I have told you I love him.

BLANCHE Then I tremble for you! I just—tremble for you. . . .

STELLA I can't help your trembling if you insist on trembling!

[There is a pause.]

BLANCHE May I—speak—plainly?

STELLA Yes, do. Go ahead. As plainly as you want to.

[Outside, a train approaches. They are silent till the noise subsides. They are both in the bedroom. Under cover of the train's noise STANLEY enters from outside. He stands unseen by the women, holding some packages in his arms, and overhears their following conversation. He wears an undershirt and grease-stained seersucker pants.]

BLANCHE Well—if you'll forgive me—he's common!

STELLA Why, yes, I suppose he is.

BLANCHE Suppose! You can't have forgotten that much of our bringing up, Stella, that you just suppose that any part of a gentleman's in his nature! Not one particle, no! Oh, if he was just—ordinary! Just plain—but good and wholesome, but—no. There's something downright—bestial—about him! You're hating me saying this, aren't you?

STELLA [coldly] Go on and say it all, Blanche.

BLANCHE He acts like an animal, has an animal's habits! Eats like one, moves like one, talks like one! There's even something—sub-human—something not quite to the stage of humanity yet! Yes, something—ape-like about him, like one of those pictures I've seen in—anthropological studies! Thousands and thousands of years have passed him right by, and there he is—Stanley Kowalski—survivor of the Stone Age! Bearing the raw meat home from the kill in the jungle! And you—you here—waiting for him! Maybe he'll strike you or maybe grunt and kiss you! That is, if kisses have been discovered yet! Night falls and the other apes gather! There in the front of the cave, all grunting like him, and swilling and gnawing and hulking! His poker night! you call it—this party of apes! Somebody growls—some creature snatches at something—the fight is on! God! Maybe we are a long way from being made in God's image, but Stella—my sister—there has been some progress since then! Such things as art—as poetry and music—such kinds of new light have come into the world since then! In some kinds of people some tenderer feelings have had some little beginning! That we have got to make grow! And cling to, and hold as our flag! In this dark march toward whatever it is we're approaching. . . . Don't—don't hang back with the brutes!

[Another train passes outside. STANLEY hesitates, licking his lips. Then suddenly he turns stealthily about and withdraws through front door. The women are still unaware of his presence. When the train has passed he calls through the closed front door.]

STANLEY Hey! Hey, Stella!

STELLA [who has listened gravely to BLANCHE] Stanley!

BLANCHE Stell, I—

[But STELLA has gone to the front door. STANLEY enters casually with his packages.]

STANLEY Hiyuh, Stella. Blanche back?

STELLA Yes, she's back.

STANLEY Hiyuh, Blanche. [He grins at her.]

STELLA You must've got under the car.

STANLEY Them darn mechanics at Fritz's don't know their ass fr'm—Hey!

[STELLA has embraced him with both arms, fiercely, and full in the view of BLANCHE. He laughs and clasps her head to him. Over her head he grins through the curtains at BLANCHE. As the lights fade away, with a lingering brightness on their embrace, the music of the "Blue Piano" and trumpet and drums is heard.]

Scene Five

BLANCHE is seated in the bedroom fanning herself with a palm leaf as she reads over a just-completed letter. Suddenly she bursts into a peal of laughter. STELLA is dressing in the bedroom.

STELLA What are you laughing at, honey?

BLANCHE Myself, myself, for being such a liar! I'm writing a letter to Shep.

[She picks up the letter.] "Darling Shep. I am spending the summer on the wing, making flying visits here and there. And who knows, perhaps I shall take a sudden notion to swoop down on Dallas! How would you feel about that? Ha-ha! [She laughs nervously and brightly, touching her throat as if actually talking to SHEP.] Forewarned is forearmed, as they say!"—
How does that sound?

STELLA Uh-huh . . .

BLANCHE [going on nervously] "Most of my sister's friends go north in the summer but some have homes on the Gulf and there has been a continued round of entertainments, teas, cocktails, and luncheons—"

[A disturbance is heard upstairs at the Hubbells' apartment.]

STELLA Eunice seems to be having some trouble with Steve.

[EUNICE's voice shouts in terrible wrath.]

EUNICE I heard about you and that blonde!

STEVE That's a damn lie!

EUNICE You ain't pulling the wool over my eyes! I wouldn't mind if you'd stay down at the Four Deuces, but you always going up.

STEVE Who ever seen me up?

EUNICE I seen you chasing her 'round the balcony—I'm gonna call the vice squad!

STEVE Don't you throw that at me!

EUNICE [shrieking] You hit me! I'm gonna call the police!

[A clatter of aluminum striking a wall is heard, followed by a man's angry roar, shouts and overturned furniture. There is a crash; then a relative hush.]

BLANCHE [brightly] Did he kill her?

[EUNICE appears on the steps in daemonic disorder.]

STELLA No! She's coming downstairs.

EUNICE Call the police, I'm going to call the police! [She rushes around the corner.]

[They laugh lightly. STANLEY comes around the corner in his green and scarlet silk bowling shirt. He trots up the steps and bangs into the kitchen. BLANCHE registers his entrance with nervous gestures.]

STANLEY What's a matter with Eun-uss?

STELLA She and Steve had a row. Has she got the police?

STANLEY Naw. She's gettin' a drink.

STELLA That's much more practical!

[STEVE comes down nursing a bruise on his forehead and looks in the door.]

STEVE She here?

STANLEY Naw, naw. At the Four Deuces.

STEVE That rutting hunk! [He looks around the corner a bit timidly, then turns with affected boldness and runs after her.]

BLANCHE I must jot that down in my notebook. Ha-ha! I'm compiling a notebook of quaint little words and phrases I've picked up here.

STANLEY You won't pick up nothing here you ain't heard before.

BLANCHE Can I count on that?

STANLEY You can count on it up to five hundred.

BLANCHE That's a mighty high number. [He jerks open the bureau drawer, slams it shut and throws shoes in a corner. At each noise BLANCHE winces slightly. Finally she speaks.] What sign were you born under?

STANLEY [while he is dressing] Sign?

BLANCHE Astrological sign. I bet you were born under Aries. Aries people are forceful and dynamic. They dote on noise! They love to bang things around! You must have had lots of banging around in the army and now that you're out, you make up for it by treating inanimate objects with such a fury!

[STELLA has been going in and out of closet during this scene. Now she pops her head out of the closet.]

STELLA Stanley was born just five minutes after Christmas.

BLANCHE Capricorn—the Goat!

STANLEY What sign were you born under?

BLANCHE Oh, my birthday's next month, the fifteenth of September; that's under Virgo.

STANLEY What's Virgo?

BLANCHE Virgo is the Virgin.

STANLEY [contemptuously] Hah! [He advances a little as he knots his tie.]

Say, do you happen to know somebody named Shaw?

[Her face expresses a faint shock. She reaches for the cologne bottle and dampens her handkerchief as she answers carefully.]

BLANCHE Why, everybody knows somebody named Shaw!

STANLEY Well, this somebody named Shaw is under the impression he met you in Laurel, but I figure he must have got you mixed up with some other party because this other party is someone he met at a hotel called the Flamingo.

[BLANCHE laughs breathlessly as she touches the cologne-dampened handkerchief to her temples.]

BLANCHE I'm afraid he does have me mixed up with this "other party."
The Hotel Flamingo is not the sort of establishment I would dare to be seen in!

STANLEY You know of it?

BLANCHE Yes, I've seen it and smelled it.

STANLEY You must've got pretty close if you could smell it.

BLANCHE The odor of cheap perfume is penetrating.

STANLEY That stuff you use is expensive?

BLANCHE Twenty-five dollars an ounce! I'm nearly out. That's just a hint if you want to remember my birthday! [She speaks lightly but her voice has a note of fear.]

STANLEY Shaw must've got you mixed up. He goes in and out of Laurel all the time so he can check on it and clear up any mistake.

[He turns away and crosses to the portieres. BLANCHE closes her eyes as if faint. Her hand trembles as she lifts the handkerchief again to her forehead. STEVE and EUNICE come around corner. STEVE's arm is around EUNICE's shoulder and she is sobbing luxuriously and he is cooing love-words. There is a murmur of thunder as they go slowly upstairs in a tight embrace.]

STANLEY [to STELLA] I'll wait for you at the Four Deuces!

STELLA Hey! Don't I rate one kiss?

STANLEY Not in front of your sister.

[He goes out. BLANCHE rises from her chair. She seems faint; looks about her with an expression of almost panic.]

BLANCHE Stella! What have you heard about me?

STELLA Huh?

BLANCHE What have people been telling you about me?

STELLA Telling?

BLANCHE You haven't heard any—unkind—gossip about me?

STELLA Why, no, Blanche, of course not!

BLANCHE Honey, there was—a good deal of talk in Laurel.

STELLA About you, Blanche?

BLANCHE I wasn't so good the last two years or so, after Belle Reve had started to slip through my fingers.

STELLA All of us do things we—

BLANCHE I never was hard or self-sufficient enough. When people are soft—soft people have got to shimmer and glow—they've got to put on soft colors, the colors of butterfly wings, and put a—paper lantern over the light. . . . It isn't enough to be soft. You've got to be soft and attractive. And I—I'm fading now! I don't know how much longer I can turn the trick.

[The afternoon has faded to dusk. STELLA goes into the bedroom and turns on the light under the paper lantern. She holds a bottled soft drink in her hand.]

BLANCHE Have you been listening to me?

STELLA I don't listen to you when you are being morbid! [She advances with the bottled Coke.]

BLANCHE [with abrupt change to gaiety] Is that Coke for me?

STELLA Not for anyone else!

BLANCHE Why, you precious thing, you! Is it just Coke?

STELLA [turning] You mean you want a shot in it!

BLANCHE Well, honey, a shot never does a Coke any harm! Let me! You mustn't wait on me!

STELLA I like to wait on you, Blanche. It makes it seem more like home.
[She goes into the kitchen, finds a glass and pours a shot of whiskey into it.]

BLANCHE I have to admit I love to be waited on . . .

[She rushes into the bedroom. STELLA goes to her with the glass. BLANCHE suddenly clutches STELLA's free hand with a moaning sound and presses the hand to her lips. STELLA is embarrassed by her show of emotion.]

BLANCHE speaks in a choked voice.]

You're—you're—so good to me! And I—

STELLA Blanche.

BLANCHE I know, I won't! You hate me to talk sentimental! But honey, believe I feel things more than I tell you! I won't stay long! I won't, I promise I—

STELLA Blanche!

BLANCHE [hysterically] I won't, I promise, I'll go! Go soon! I will really! I won't hang around until he—throws me out . . .

STELLA Now will you stop talking foolish?

BLANCHE Yes, honey. Watch how you pour—that fizzy stuff foams over!
[BLANCHE laughs shrilly and grabs the glass, but her hand shakes so it almost slips from her grasp. STELLA pours the Coke into the glass. It foams over and spills. BLANCHE gives a piercing cry.]

STELLA [shocked by the cry] Heavens!

BLANCHE Right on my pretty white skirt!

STELLA Oh . . . Use my hanky. Blot gently.

BLANCHE [slowly recovering] I know—gently—gently . . .

STELLA Did it stain?

BLANCHE Not a bit. Ha-ha! Isn't that lucky? [She sits down shakily, taking a grateful drink. She holds the glass in both hands and continues to laugh a little.]

STELLA Why did you scream like that?

BLANCHE I don't know why I screamed! [continuing nervously] Mitch—Mitch is coming at seven. I guess I am just feeling nervous about our relations. [She begins to talk rapidly and breathlessly.] He hasn't gotten a thing but a good-night kiss, that's all I have given him, Stella. I want his respect. And men don't want anything they get too easy. But on the other hand men lose interest quickly. Especially when the girl is over—thirty. They think a girl over thirty ought to—the vulgar term is—"put out." . . . And I—I'm not "putting out." Of course he—he doesn't know—I mean I haven't informed him—of my real age!

STELLA Why are you sensitive about your age?

BLANCHE Because of hard knocks my vanity's been given. What I mean is—he thinks I'm sort of—prim and proper, you know! [She laughs out sharply.] I want to deceive him enough to make him—want me . . .

STELLA Blanche, do you want him?

BLANCHE I want to rest! I want to breathe quietly again! Yes—I want Mitch . . . very badly! Just think! If it happens! I can leave here and not be anyone's problem . . .

- [STANLEY comes around the corner with a drink under his belt.]
 STANLEY [bawling] Hey, Steve! Hey, Eunice! Hey, Stella!
 [There are joyous calls from above. Trumpet and drums are heard from around the corner.]
- STELLA [kissing BLANCHE impulsively] It will happen!
 BLANCHE [doubtfully] It will?
 STELLA It will! [She goes across into the kitchen, looking back at BLANCHE.]
 It will, honey, it will. . . . But don't take another drink! [Her voice catches as she goes out the door to meet her husband.]
 [BLANCHE sinks faintly back in her chair with her drink. EUNICE shrieks with laughter and runs down the steps. STEVE bounds after her with goatlike screeches and chases her around corner. STANLEY and STELLA twine arms as they follow, laughing. Dusk settles deeper. The music from the Four Deuces is slow and blue.]
- BLANCHE Ah, me, ah, me, ah, me . . .
 [Her eyes fall shut and the palm leaf fan drops from her fingers. She slaps her hand on the chair arm a couple of times. There is a little glimmer of lightning about the building. A YOUNG MAN comes along the street and rings the bell.]
- BLANCHE Come in.
 [The YOUNG MAN appears through the portieres. She regards him with interest.]
- BLANCHE Well, well! What can I do for you?
 YOUNG MAN I'm collecting for The Evening Star.
 BLANCHE I didn't know that stars took up collections.
 YOUNG MAN It's the paper.
 BLANCHE I know, I was joking—feebly! Will you—have a drink?
 YOUNG MAN No, ma'am. No, thank you. I can't drink on the job.
 BLANCHE Oh, well, now, let's see. . . . No, I don't have a dime! I'm not the lady of the house. I'm her sister from Mississippi. I'm one of those poor relations you've heard about.
 YOUNG MAN That's all right. I'll drop by later. [He starts to go out. She approaches a little.]
 BLANCHE Hey! [He turns back shyly. She puts a cigarette in a long holder.]
 Could you give me a light? [She crosses toward him. They meet at the door between the two rooms.]
 YOUNG MAN Sure. [He takes out a lighter.] This doesn't always work.
 BLANCHE It's temperamental? [It flares.] Ah!—thank you. [He starts away again.] Hey! [He turns again, still more uncertainly. She goes close to him.]
 Uh—what time is it?
 YOUNG MAN Fifteen of seven, ma'am.
 BLANCHE So late? Don't you just love these long rainy afternoons in New Orleans when an hour isn't just an hour—but a little piece of eternity dropped into your hands—and who knows what to do with it? [She touches his shoulders.] You—uh—didn't get wet in the rain?
 YOUNG MAN No, ma'am. I stepped inside.
 BLANCHE In a drugstore? And had a soda?
 YOUNG MAN Uh-huh.
 BLANCHE Chocolate?
 YOUNG MAN No, ma'am. Cherry.
 BLANCHE [laughing] Cherry!

YOUNG MAN A cherry soda.

BLANCHE You make my mouth water. [She touches his cheek lightly, and smiles. Then she goes to the trunk.]

YOUNG MAN Well, I'd better be going—

BLANCHE [stopping him] Young man!

[He turns. She takes a large, gossamer scarf from the trunk and drapes it about her shoulders. In the ensuing pause, the "Blue Piano" is heard. It continues through the rest of this scene and the opening of the next. The young man clears his throat and looks yearningly at the door.]

Young man! Young, young, young man! Has anyone ever told you that you look like a young Prince out of the Arabian Nights?

[The YOUNG MAN laughs uncomfortably and stands like a bashful kid. BLANCHE speaks softly to him.]

Well, you do, honey lamb! Come here. I want to kiss you, just once, softly and sweetly on your mouth!

[Without waiting for him to accept, she crosses quickly to him and presses her lips to his.]

Now run along, now, quickly! It would be nice to keep you, but I've got to be good—and keep my hands off children.

[He stares at her a moment. She opens the door for him and blows a kiss at him as he goes down the steps with a dazed look. She stands there a little dreamily after he has disappeared. Then MITCH appears around the corner with a bunch of roses.]

BLANCHE [gaily] Look who's coming! My Rosenkavalier! Bow to me first . . . now present them! Ahhhh—Merci!!!²

[She looks at him over them, coquettishly pressing them to her lips. He beams at her self-consciously.]

Scene Six

It is about two A.M on the same evening. The outer wall of the building is visible. BLANCHE and MITCH come in. The utter exhaustion which only a neurasthenic personality can know is evident in BLANCHE's voice and manner. MITCH is stolid but depressed. They have probably been out to the amusement park on Lake Pontchartrain, for MITCH is bearing, upside down, a plaster statuette of Mae West, the sort of prize won at shooting galleries and carnival games of chance.

BLANCHE [stopping lifelessly at the steps] Well— [MITCH laughs uneasily.]
Well . . .

MITCH I guess it must be pretty late—and you're tired.

BLANCHE Even the hot tamale man has deserted the street, and he hangs on till the end. [MITCH laughs uneasily again.] How will you get home?

MITCH I'll walk over to Bourbon and catch an owl-car.

BLANCHE [laughing grimly] Is that streetcar named Desire still grinding along the tracks at this hour?

MITCH [heavily] I'm afraid you haven't gotten much fun out of this evening, Blanche.

BLANCHE I spoiled it for you.

2. "Merci": thank you (French). "My Rosenkavalier": Knight of the Rose (German); title of a romantic opera (1911) by Richard Strauss.

MITCH No, you didn't, but I felt all the time that I wasn't giving you much—entertainment.

BLANCHE I simply couldn't rise to the occasion. That was all. I don't think I've ever tried so hard to be gay and made such a dismal mess of it. I get ten points for trying!—I did try.

MITCH Why did you try if you didn't feel like it, Blanche?

BLANCHE I was just obeying the law of nature.

MITCH Which law is that?

BLANCHE The one that says the lady must entertain the gentleman—or no dice! See if you can locate my door key in this purse. When I'm so tired my fingers are all thumbs!

MITCH [rooting in her purse] This it?

BLANCHE No, honey, that's the key to my trunk which I must soon be packing.

MITCH You mean you are leaving here soon?

BLANCHE I've overstayed my welcome.

MITCH This it?

[The music fades away.]

BLANCHE Eureka! Honey, you open the door while I take a last look at the sky. [She leans on the porch rail. He opens the door and stands awkwardly behind her.] I'm looking for the Pleiades, the Seven Sisters, but these girls are not out tonight. Oh, yes they are, there they are! God bless them! All in a bunch going home from their little bridge party. . . . Y' get the door open? Good boy! I guess you—want to go now . . .

[He shuffles and coughs a little.]

MITCH Can I—uh—kiss you—good night?

BLANCHE Why do you always ask me if you may?

MITCH I don't know whether you want me to or not.

BLANCHE Why should you be so doubtful?

MITCH That night when we parked by the lake and I kissed you, you—

BLANCHE Honey, it wasn't the kiss I objected to. I liked the kiss very much. It was the other little—familiarity—that I—felt obliged to—discourage. . . . I didn't resent it! Not a bit in the world! In fact, I was somewhat flattered that you—desired me! But, honey, you know as well as I do that a single girl, a girl alone in the world, has got to keep a firm hold on her emotions or she'll be lost!

MITCH [solemnly] Lost?

BLANCHE I guess you are used to girls that like to be lost. The kind that get lost immediately, on the first date!

MITCH I like you to be exactly the way that you are, because in all my—experience—I have never known anyone like you.

[BLANCHE looks at him gravely; then she bursts into laughter and then claps a hand to her mouth.]

MITCH Are you laughing at me?

BLANCHE No, honey. The lord and lady of the house have not yet returned, so come in. We'll have a nightcap. Let's leave the lights off. Shall we?

MITCH You just—do what you want to.

[BLANCHE precedes him into the kitchen. The outer wall of the building disappears and the interiors of the two rooms can be dimly seen.]

BLANCHE [remaining in the first room] The other room's more comfortable—go on in. This crashing around in the dark is my search for some liquor.

MITCH You want a drink?

BLANCHE I want you to have a drink! You have been so anxious and solemn all evening, and so have I; we have both been anxious and solemn and now for these few last remaining moments of our lives together—I want to create—joie de vivre! I'm lighting a candle.

MITCH That's good.

BLANCHE We are going to be very Bohemian. We are going to pretend that we are sitting in a little artists' cafe on the Left Bank in Paris! [She lights a candle stub and puts it in a bottle.] *Je suis la Dame aux Camélias! Vous êtes—Armand!*³ Understand French?

MITCH [heavily] Naw. Naw, I—

BLANCHE *Voulez-vous couchez avec moi ce soir? Vous ne comprenez pas? Ah, quelle dommage!*⁴—I mean it's a damned good thing. . . . I've found some liquor! Just enough for two shots without any dividends, honey . . .

MITCH [heavily] That's—good.

[She enters the bedroom with the drinks and the candle.]

BLANCHE Sit down! Why don't you take off your coat and loosen your collar?

MITCH I better leave it on.

BLANCHE No. I want you to be comfortable.

MITCH I am ashamed of the way I perspire. My shirt is sticking to me.

BLANCHE Perspiration is healthy. If people didn't perspire they would die in five minutes. [She takes his coat from him.] This is a nice coat. What kind of material is it?

MITCH They call that stuff alpaca.

BLANCHE Oh. Alpaca.

MITCH It's very light-weight alpaca.

BLANCHE Oh. Light-weight alpaca.

MITCH I don't like to wear a wash-coat even in summer because I sweat through it.

BLANCHE Oh.

MITCH And it don't look neat on me. A man with a heavy build has got to be careful of what he puts on him so he don't look too clumsy.

BLANCHE You are not too heavy.

MITCH You don't think I am?

BLANCHE You are not the delicate type. You have a massive bone-structure and a very imposing physique.

MITCH Thank you. Last Christmas I was given a membership to the New Orleans Athletic Club.

BLANCHE Oh, good.

MITCH It was the finest present I ever was given. I work out there with the weights and I swim and I keep myself fit. When I started there, I was

3. I am the Lady of the Camélias! You are—Armand! (French). Both are characters in the popular romantic play La Dame aux Camélias (1852), by the French author Alexandre Dumas filis; she is a courtesan who gives up her true love, Armand.

4. Would you like to sleep with me this evening? You don't understand? Ah, what a pity! (French).

getting soft in the belly but now my belly is hard. It is so hard now that a man can punch me in the belly and it don't hurt me. Punch me! Go on! See?

[She pokes lightly at him.]

BLANCHE Gracious. [Her hand touches her chest.]

MITCH Guess how much I weigh, Blanche?

BLANCHE Oh, I'd say in the vicinity of—one hundred and eighty?

MITCH Guess again.

BLANCHE Not that much?

MITCH No. More.

BLANCHE Well, you're a tall man and you can carry a good deal of weight without looking awkward.

MITCH I weigh two hundred and seven pounds and I'm six feet one and one half inches tall in my bare feet—without shoes on. And that is what I weigh stripped.

BLANCHE Oh, my goodness, me! It's awe-inspiring.

MITCH [embarrassed] My weight is not a very interesting subject to talk about. [He hesitates for a moment.] What's yours?

BLANCHE My weight?

MITCH Yes.

BLANCHE Guess!

MITCH Let me lift you.

BLANCHE Samson!⁵ Go on, lift me. [He comes behind her and puts his hands on her waist and raises her lightly off the ground.] Well?

MITCH You are light as a feather.

BLANCHE Ha-ha! [He lowers her but keeps his hands on her waist. BLANCHE speaks with an affectation of demureness.] You may release me now.

MITCH Huh?

BLANCHE [gaily] I said unhand me, sir. [He fumblingly embraces her. Her voice sounds gently reproving.] Now, Mitch. Just because Stanley and Stella aren't at home is no reason why you shouldn't behave like a gentleman.

MITCH Just give me a slap whenever I step out of bounds.

BLANCHE That won't be necessary. You're a natural gentleman, one of the very few that are left in the world. I don't want you to think that I am severe and old maid school-teacherish or anything like that. It's just—well—

MITCH Huh?

BLANCHE I guess it is just that I have—old-fashioned ideals! [She rolls her eyes, knowing he cannot see her face. MITCH goes to the front door. There is a considerable silence between them. BLANCHE sighs and MITCH coughs self-consciously.]

MITCH [finally] Where's Stanley and Stella tonight?

BLANCHE They have gone out. With Mr. and Mrs. Hubbell upstairs.

MITCH Where did they go?

BLANCHE I think they were planning to go to a midnight prevue at Loew's State.

MITCH We should all go out together some night.

5. Legendary strong man in the Bible's Book of Judges; he is captured by the Philistines after he reveals the secret of his strength, his long hair, to the temptress Delilah.

BLANCHE No. That wouldn't be a good plan.

MITCH Why not?

BLANCHE You are an old friend of Stanley's?

MITCH We was together in the Two-Forty-First.⁶

BLANCHE I guess he talks to you frankly?

MITCH Sure.

BLANCHE Has he talked to you about me?

BLANCHE Oh—not very much.

BLANCHE The way you say that, I suspect that he has.

MITCH No, he hasn't said much.

BLANCHE But what he has said. What would you say his attitude toward me was?

MITCH Why do you want to ask that?

BLANCHE Well—

MITCH Don't you get along with him?

BLANCHE What do you think?

MITCH I don't think he understands you.

BLANCHE That is putting it mildly. If it weren't for Stella about to have a baby, I wouldn't be able to endure things here.

MITCH He isn't—nice to you?

BLANCHE He is insufferably rude. Goes out of his way to offend me.

MITCH In what way, Blanche?

BLANCHE Why, in every conceivable way.

MITCH I'm surprised to hear that.

BLANCHE Are you?

MITCH Well, I—don't see how anybody could be rude to you.

BLANCHE It's really a pretty frightful situation. You see, there's no privacy here. There's just these portieres between the two rooms at night. He stalks through the rooms in his underwear at night. And I have to ask him to close the bathroom door. That sort of commonness isn't necessary. You probably wonder why I don't move out. Well, I'll tell you frankly. A teacher's salary is barely sufficient for her living expenses. I didn't save a penny last year and so I had to come here for the summer. That's why I have to put up with my sister's husband. And he has to put up with me, apparently so much against his wishes. . . . Surely he must have told you how much he hates me!

MITCH I don't think he hates you.

BLANCHE He hates me. Or why would he insult me? The first time I laid eyes on him I thought to myself, that man is my executioner! That man will destroy me, unless—

MITCH Blanche—

BLANCHE Yes, honey?

MITCH Can I ask you a question?

BLANCHE Yes. What?

MITCH How old are you?

[She makes a nervous gesture.]

BLANCHE Why do you want to know?

6. Engineering battalion in World War II.

MITCH I talked to my mother about you and she said, “How old is Blanche?”

And I wasn’t able to tell her. [There is another pause.]

BLANCHE You talked to your mother about me?

MITCH Yes.

BLANCHE Why?

MITCH I told my mother how nice you were, and I liked you.

BLANCHE Were you sincere about that?

MITCH You know I was.

BLANCHE Why did your mother want to know my age?

MITCH Mother is sick.

BLANCHE I’m sorry to hear it. Badly?

MITCH She won’t live long. Maybe just a few months.

BLANCHE Oh.

MITCH She worries because I’m not settled.

BLANCHE Oh.

MITCH She wants me to be settled down before she— [His voice is hoarse and he clears his throat twice, shuffling nervously around with his hands in and out of his pockets.]

BLANCHE You love her very much, don’t you?

MITCH Yes.

BLANCHE I think you have a great capacity for devotion. You will be lonely when she passes on, won’t you? [MITCH clears his throat and nods.]

I understand what that is.

MITCH To be lonely?

BLANCHE I loved someone, too, and the person I loved I lost.

MITCH Dead? [She crosses to the window and sits on the sill, looking out. She pours herself another drink.] A man?

BLANCHE He was a boy, just a boy, when I was a very young girl. When I was sixteen, I made the discovery—love. All at once and much, much too completely. It was like you suddenly turned a blinding light on something that had always been half in shadow, that’s how it struck the world for me. But I was unlucky. Deluded. There was something different about the boy, a nervousness, a softness and tenderness which wasn’t like a man’s, although he wasn’t the least bit effeminate looking—still—that thing was there. . . . He came to me for help. I didn’t know that. I didn’t find out anything till after our marriage when we’d run away and come back and all I knew was I’d failed him in some mysterious way and wasn’t able to give the help he needed but couldn’t speak of! He was in the quicksands and clutching at me—but I wasn’t holding him out, I was slipping in with him! I didn’t know that. I didn’t know anything except I loved him unendurably but without being able to help him or help myself. Then I found out. In the worst of all possible ways. By coming suddenly into a room that I thought was empty—which wasn’t empty, but had two people in it . . . the boy I had married and an older man who had been his friend for years . . .

[A locomotive is heard approaching outside. She claps her hands to her ears and crouches over. The headlight of the locomotive glares into the room as it thunders past. As the noise recedes she straightens slowly and continues speaking.]

Afterward we pretended that nothing had been discovered. Yes, the three of us drove out to Moon Lake Casino, very drunk and laughing all the way.

[Polka music sounds, in a minor key faint with distance.]

We danced the Varsouviana!⁷ Suddenly in the middle of the dance the boy I had married broke away from me and ran out of the casino. A few moments later—a shot!

[The polka stops abruptly. BLANCHE rises stiffly. Then, the polka resumes in a major key.]

I ran out—all did!—all ran and gathered about the terrible thing at the edge of the lake! I couldn't get near for the crowding. Then somebody caught my arm. "Don't go any closer! Come back! You don't want to see!" See? See what! Then I heard voices say—Allan! Allan! The Grey boy! He'd stuck the revolver into his mouth, and fired—so that the back of his head had been—blown away!

[She sways and covers her face.]

It was because—on the dance floor—unable to stop myself—I'd suddenly said—"I saw! I know! You disgust me . . ." And then the searchlight which had been turned on the world was turned off again and never for one moment since has there been any light that's stronger than this—kitchen—candle . . .

[MITCH gets up awkwardly and moves toward her a little. The polka music increases. MITCH stands beside her.]

MITCH [drawing her slowly into his arms] You need somebody. And I need somebody, too. Could it be—you and me, Blanche?

[She stares at him vacantly for a moment. Then with a soft cry huddles in his embrace. She makes a sobbing effort to speak but the words won't come. He kisses her forehead and her eyes and finally her lips. The Polka tune fades out. Her breath is drawn and released in long, grateful sobs.]

BLANCHE Sometimes—there's God—so quickly!

Scene Seven

It is late afternoon in mid-September.

The portieres are open and a table is set for a birthday supper, with cake and flowers.

STELLA is completing the decorations as STANLEY comes in.

STANLEY What's all this stuff for?

STELLA Honey, it's Blanche's birthday.

STANLEY She here?

STELLA In the bathroom.

STANLEY [mimicking] "Washing out some things"?

STELLA I reckon so.

STANLEY How long she been in there?

STELLA All afternoon.

STANLEY [mimicking] "Soaking in a hot tub"?

STELLA Yes.

STANLEY Temperature 100 on the nose, and she soaks herself in a hot tub.

7. Fast Polish waltz, similar to the polka.

STELLA She says it cools her off for the evening.

STANLEY And you run out an' get her cokes, I suppose? And serve 'em to Her Majesty in the tub? [STELLA shrugs.] Set down here a minute.

STELLA Stanley, I've got things to do.

STANLEY Set down! I've got th' dope on your big sister, Stella.

STELLA Stanley, stop picking on Blanche.

STANLEY That girl calls me common!

STELLA Lately you been doing all you can think of to rub her the wrong way, Stanley, and Blanche is sensitive and you've got to realize that Blanche and I grew up under very different circumstances than you did.

STANLEY So I been told. And told and told and told! You know she's been feeding us a pack of lies here?

STELLA No, I don't, and—

STANLEY Well, she has, however. But now the cat's out of the bag! I found out some things!

STELLA What—things?

STANLEY Things I already suspected. But now I got proof from the most reliable sources—which I have checked on!

[BLANCHE is singing in the bathroom a saccharine popular ballad which is used contrapuntally with STANLEY's speech.]

STELLA [to STANLEY] Lower your voice!

STANLEY Some canary bird, huh!

STELLA Now please tell me quietly what you think you've found out about my sister.

STANLEY Lie Number One: All this squeamishness she puts on! You should just know the line she's been feeding to Mitch. He thought she had never been more than kissed by a fellow! But Sister Blanche is no lily! Ha-ha! Some lily she is!

STELLA What have you heard and who from?

STANLEY Our supply-man down at the plant has been going through Laurel for years and he knows all about her and everybody else in the town of Laurel knows all about her. She is as famous in Laurel as if she was the President of the United States, only she is not respected by any party! This supply-man stops at a hotel called the Flamingo.

BLANCHE [singing blithely] "Say, it's only a paper moon, Sailing over a cardboard sea—But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me!"⁸

STELLA What about the—Flamingo?

STANLEY She stayed there, too.

STELLA My sister lived at Belle Reve.

STANLEY This is after the home-place had slipped through her lily-white fingers! She moved to the Flamingo! A second-class hotel which has the advantage of not interfering in the private social life of the personalities there! The Flamingo is used to all kinds of goings-on. But even the management of the Flamingo was impressed by Dame Blanche! In fact they was so impressed by Dame Blanche that they requested her to turn in her room key—for permanently! This happened a couple of weeks before she showed here.

8. From "It's Only a Paper Moon" (1933), a popular song by Harold Arlen.

BLANCHE [singing] "It's a Barnum and Bailey world, Just as phony as it can be—But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me!"

STELLA What—contemptible—lies!

STANLEY Sure, I can see how you would be upset by this. She pulled the wool over your eyes as much as Mitch's!

STELLA It's pure invention! There's not a word of truth in it and if I were a man and this creature had dared to invent such things in my presence—

BLANCHE [singing] "Without your love, It's a honky-tonk parade! Without your love, It's a melody played In a penny arcade . . ."

STANLEY Honey, I told you I thoroughly checked on these stories! Now wait till I finished. The trouble with Dame Blanche was that she couldn't put on her act any more in Laurel! They got wised up after two or three dates with her and then they quit, and she goes on to another, the same old line, same old act, same old hooey! But the town was too small for this to go on forever! And as time went by she became a town character. Regarded as not just different but downright loco—nuts. [STELLA draws back.] And for the last year or two she has been washed up like poison. That's why she's here this summer, visiting royalty, putting on all this act—because she's practically told by the mayor to get out of town! Yes, did you know there was an army camp near Laurel and your sister's was one of the places called "Out-of-Bounds"?

BLANCHE "It's only a paper moon, Just as phony as it can be—But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me!"

STANLEY Well, so much for her being such a refined and particular type of girl. Which brings us to Lie Number Two.

STELLA I don't want to hear any more!

STANLEY She's not going back to teach school! In fact I am willing to bet you that she never had no idea of returning to Laurel! She didn't resign temporarily from the high school because of her nerves! No, siree, Bob! She didn't. They kicked her out of that high school before the spring term ended—and I hate to tell you the reason that step was taken! A seventeen-year-old boy—she'd gotten mixed up with!

BLANCHE "It's a Barnum and Bailey world, Just as phony as it can be—"
 [In the bathroom the water goes on loud; little breathless cries and peals of laughter are heard as if a child were frolicking in the tub.]

STELLA This is making me—sick!

STANLEY The boy's dad learned about it and got in touch with the high school superintendent. Boy, oh, boy, I'd like to have been in that office when Dame Blanche was called on the carpet! I'd like to have seen her trying to squirm out of that one! But they had her on the hook good and proper that time and she knew that the jig was all up! They told her she better move on to some fresh territory. Yep, it was practically a town ordinance passed against her!

[The bathroom door is opened and BLANCHE thrusts her head out, holding a towel about her hair.]

BLANCHE Stella!

STELLA [faintly] Yes, Blanche?

BLANCHE Give me another bath-towel to dry my hair with. I've just washed it.

STELLA Yes, Blanche. [She crosses in a dazed way from the kitchen to the bathroom door with a towel.]

BLANCHE What's the matter, honey?

STELLA Matter? Why?

BLANCHE You have such a strange expression on your face!

STELLA Oh— [she tries to laugh] I guess I'm a little tired!

BLANCHE Why don't you bathe, too, soon as I get out?

STANLEY [calling from the kitchen] How soon is that going to be?

BLANCHE Not so terribly long! Possess your soul in patience!

STANLEY It's not my soul, it's my kidneys I'm worried about!

[BLANCHE slams the door. STANLEY laughs harshly. STELLA comes slowly back into the kitchen.]

STANLEY Well, what do you think of it?

STELLA I don't believe all of those stories and I think your supply-man was mean and rotten to tell them. It's possible that some of the things he said are partly true. There are things about my sister I don't approve of—things that caused sorrow at home. She was always—flighty!

STANLEY Flighty!

STELLA But when she was young, very young, she married a boy who wrote poetry. . . . He was extremely good-looking. I think Blanche didn't just love him but worshipped the ground he walked on! Adored him and thought him almost too fine to be human! But then she found out—

STANLEY What?

STELLA This beautiful and talented young man was a degenerate. Didn't your supply-man give you that information?

STANLEY All we discussed was recent history. That must have been a pretty long time ago.

STELLA Yes, it was—a pretty long time ago . . .

[STANLEY comes up and takes her by the shoulders rather gently. She gently withdraws from him. Automatically she starts sticking little pink candles in the birthday cake.]

STANLEY How many candles you putting in that cake?

STELLA I'll stop at twenty-five.

STANLEY Is company expected?

STELLA We asked Mitch to come over for cake and ice-cream.

[STANLEY looks a little uncomfortable. He lights a cigarette from the one he has just finished.]

STANLEY I wouldn't be expecting Mitch over tonight.

[STELLA pauses in her occupation with candles and looks slowly around at STANLEY.]

STELLA Why?

STANLEY Mitch is a buddy of mine. We were in the same outfit together—Two-forty-first Engineers. We work in the same plant and now on the same bowling team. You think I could face him if—

STELLA Stanley Kowalski, did you—did you repeat what that—?

STANLEY You're goddam right I told him! I'd have that on my conscience the rest of my life if I knew all that stuff and let my best friend get caught!

STELLA Is Mitch through with her?

STANLEY Wouldn't you be if—?

STELLA I said, Is Mitch through with her?

[BLANCHE's voice is lifted again, serenely as a bell. She sings "But it wouldn't be make-believe If you believed in me."]

STANLEY No, I don't think he's necessarily through with her—just wised up!

STELLA Stanley, she thought Mitch was—going to—going to marry her. I was hoping so, too.

STANLEY Well, he's not going to marry her. Maybe he was, but he's not going to jump in a tank with a school of sharks—now! [He rises.] Blanche!

Oh, Blanche! Can I please get in my bathroom? [There is a pause.]

BLANCHE Yes, indeed, sir! Can you wait one second while I dry?

STANLEY Having waited one hour I guess one second ought to pass in a hurry.

STELLA And she hasn't got her job? Well, what will she do!

STANLEY She's not stayin' here after Tuesday. You know that, don't you? Just to make sure I bought her ticket myself. A bus ticket.

STELLA In the first place, Blanche wouldn't go on a bus.

STANLEY She'll go on a bus and like it.

STELLA No, she won't, no, she won't, Stanley!

STANLEY She'll go! Period. P.S. She'll go Tuesday!

STELLA [slowly] What'll—she—do? What on earth will she—do!

STANLEY Her future is mapped out for her.

STELLA What do you mean?

[BLANCHE sings.]

STANLEY Hey, canary bird! Toots! Get OUT of the BATHROOM!

[The bathroom door flies open and BLANCHE emerges with a gay peal of laughter, but as STANLEY crosses past her, a frightened look appears in her face, almost a look of panic. He doesn't look at her but slams the bathroom door shut as he goes in.]

BLANCHE [snatching up a hairbrush] Oh, I feel so good after my long, hot bath, I feel so good and cool and—rested!

STELLA [sadly and doubtfully from the kitchen] Do you, Blanche?

BLANCHE [snatching up a hairbrush] Yes, I do, so refreshed! [She tinkles her highball glass.] A hot bath and a long, cold drink always give me a brand new outlook on life! [She looks through the portieres at STELLA, standing between them, and slowly stops brushing.] Something has happened!—What is it?

STELLA [turning away quickly] Why, nothing has happened, Blanche.

BLANCHE You're lying! Something has!

[She stares fearfully at STELLA, who pretends to be busy at the table. The distant piano goes into a hectic breakdown.]

Scene Eight

Three quarters of an hour later.

The view through the big windows is fading gradually into a still-golden dusk. A torch of sunlight blazes on the side of a big water-tank or oil-drum across the empty lot toward the business district which is now pierced by pinpoint of lighted windows or windows reflecting the sunset.

The three people are completing a dismal birthday supper. STANLEY looks sullen. STELLA is embarrassed and sad.

BLANCHE has a tight, artificial smile on her drawn face. There is a fourth place at the table which is left vacant.

BLANCHE [suddenly] Stanley, tell us a joke, tell us a funny story to make us all laugh. I don't know what's the matter, we're all so solemn. Is it because I've been stood up by my beau?

[STELLA laughs feebly.]

It's the first time in my entire experience with men, and I've had a good deal of all sorts, that I've actually been stood up by anybody! Ha-ha! I don't know how to take it. . . . Tell us a funny little story, Stanley! Something to help us out.

STANLEY I didn't think you liked my stories, Blanche.

BLANCHE I like them when they're amusing but not indecent.

STANLEY I don't know any refined enough for your taste.

BLANCHE Then let me tell one.

STELLA Yes, you tell one, Blanche. You used to know lots of good stories.

[The music fades.]

BLANCHE Let me see, now. . . . I must run through my repertoire! Oh, yes—I love parrot stories! Do you all like parrot stories? Well, this one's about the old maid and the parrot. This old maid, she had a parrot that cursed a blue streak and knew more vulgar expressions than Mr. Kowalski!

STANLEY Huh.

BLANCHE And the only way to hush the parrot up was to put the cover back on its cage so it would think it was night and go back to sleep. Well, one morning the old maid had just uncovered the parrot for the day—when who should she see coming up the front walk but the preacher! Well, she rushed back to the parrot and slipped the cover back on the cage and then she let in the preacher. And the parrot was perfectly still, just as quiet as a mouse, but just as she was asking the preacher how much sugar he wanted in his coffee—the parrot broke the silence with a loud—[She whistles.—and said—“God damn, but that was a short day!”

[She throws back her head and laughs. STELLA also makes an ineffectual effort to seem amused. STANLEY pays no attention to the story but reaches way over the table to spear his fork into the remaining chop which he eats with his fingers.]

BLANCHE Apparently Mr. Kowalski was not amused.

STELLA Mr. Kowalski is too busy making a pig of himself to think of anything else!

STANLEY That's right, baby.

STELLA Your face and your fingers are disgustingly greasy. Go and wash up and then help me clear the table.

[He hurls a plate to the floor.]

STANLEY That's how I'll clear the table! [He seizes her arm.] Don't ever talk that way to me! “Pig—Polack—disgusting—vulgar—greasy!”—them kind of words have been on your tongue and your sister's too much around here! What do you two think you are? A pair of queens? Remember what Huey Long⁹ said—“Every Man is a King!” And I am the king

9. Demagogic Louisiana political leader, governor, and senator (1893–1935).

around here, so don't forget it! [He hurls a cup and saucer to the floor.]
My place is cleared! You want me to clear your places?

[STELLA begins to cry weakly. STANLEY stalks out on the porch and lights a cigarette. The Negro entertainers around the corner are heard.]

BLANCHE What happened while I was bathing? What did he tell you, Stella?

STELLA Nothing, nothing, nothing!

BLANCHE I think he told you something about Mitch and me! You know why Mitch didn't come but you won't tell me! [STELLA shakes her head helplessly.] I'm going to call him!

STELLA I wouldn't call him, Blanche.

BLANCHE I am, I'm going to call him on the phone.

STELLA [miserably] I wish you wouldn't.

BLANCHE I intend to be given some explanation from someone!

[She rushes to the phone in the bedroom. STELLA goes out on the porch and stares reproachfully at her husband. He grunts and turns away from her.]

STELLA I hope you're pleased with your doings. I never had so much trouble swallowing food in my life, looking at that girl's face and the empty chair! [She cries quietly.]

BLANCHE [at the phone] Hello. Mr. Mitchell, please. . . . Oh. . . . I would like to leave a number if I may. Magnolia 9047. And say it's important to call. . . . Yes, very important. . . . Thank you.

[She remains by the phone with a lost, frightened look. STANLEY turns slowly back toward his wife and takes her clumsily in his arms.]

STANLEY Stell, it's gonna be all right after she goes and after you've had the baby. It's gonna be all right again between you and me the way that it was. You remember the way that it was? Them nights we had together? God, honey, it's gonna be sweet when we can make noise in the night the way that we used to and get the colored lights going with nobody's sister behind the curtains to hear us!

[Their upstairs neighbors are heard in bellowing laughter at something. STANLEY chuckles.]

Steve an' Eunice . . .

STELLA Come on back in. [She returns to the kitchen and starts lighting the candles on the white cake.] Blanche?

BLANCHE Yes. [She returns from the bedroom to the table in the kitchen.]

Oh, those pretty, pretty little candles! Oh, don't burn them, Stella.

STELLA I certainly will.

[STANLEY comes back in.]

BLANCHE You ought to save them for baby's birthdays. Oh, I hope candles are going to glow in his life and I hope that his eyes are going to be like candles, like two blue candles lighted in a white cake!

STANLEY [sitting down] What poetry!

BLANCHE [she pauses reflectively for a moment] I shouldn't have called him.

STELLA There's lots of things could have happened.

BLANCHE There's no excuse for it, Stella. I don't have to put up with insults. I won't be taken for granted.

STANLEY Goddamn, it's hot in here with the steam from the bathroom.

BLANCHE I've said I was sorry three times. [The piano fades out.] I take hot baths for my nerves. Hydrotherapy, they call it. You healthy Polack, without a nerve in your body, of course you don't know what anxiety feels like!

STANLEY I am not a Polack. People from Poland are Poles, not Polacks. But what I am is a one-hundred-per-cent American, born and raised in the greatest country on earth and proud as hell of it, so don't ever call me a Polack.

[The phone rings. BLANCHE rises expectantly.]

BLANCHE Oh, that's for me, I'm sure.

STANLEY I'm not sure. Keep your seat. [He crosses leisurely to phone.] H'lo. Aw, yeh, hello, Mac.

[He leans against wall, staring insultingly in at BLANCHE. She sinks back in her chair with a frightened look. STELLA leans over and touches her shoulder.]

BLANCHE Oh, keep your hands off me, Stella. What is the matter with you? Why do you look at me with that pitying look?

STANLEY [bawling] QUIET IN THERE!—We've got a noisy woman on the place.—Go on, Mac. At Riley's? No, I don't wanta bowl at Riley's. I had a little trouble with Riley last week. I'm the team captain, ain't I? All right, then, we're not gonna bowl at Riley's, we're gonna bowl at the West Side or the Gala! All right, Mac. See you!

[He hangs up and returns to the table. BLANCHE fiercely controls herself, drinking quickly from her tumbler of water. He doesn't look at her but reaches in a pocket. Then he speaks slowly and with false amiability.]

Sister Blanche, I've got a little birthday remembrance for you.

BLANCHE Oh, have you, Stanley? I wasn't expecting any, I—I don't know why Stella wants to observe my birthday! I'd much rather forget it—when you—reach twenty-seven! Well—age is a subject that you'd prefer to—ignore!

STANLEY Twenty-seven?

BLANCHE [quickly] What is it? Is it for me?
[He is holding a little envelope toward her.]

STANLEY Yes, I hope you like it!

BLANCHE Why, why—Why, it's a—

STANLEY Ticket! Back to Laurel! On the Greyhound! Tuesday!

[The Varsouviana music steals in softly and continues playing. STELLA rises abruptly and turns her back. BLANCHE tries to smile. Then she tries to laugh. Then she gives both up and springs from the table and runs into the next room. She clutches her throat and then runs into the bathroom. Coughing, gagging sounds are heard.]

Well!

STELLA You didn't need to do that.

STANLEY Don't forget all that I took off her.

STELLA You needn't have been so cruel to someone alone as she is.

STANLEY Delicate piece she is.

STELLA She is. She was. You didn't know Blanche as a girl. Nobody, nobody, was tender and trusting as she was. But people like you abused her, and forced her to change.

[He crosses into the bedroom, ripping off his shirt, and changes into a brilliant silk bowling shirt. She follows him.]

Do you think you're going bowling now?

STANLEY Sure.

STELLA You're not going bowling. [She catches hold of his shirt.] Why did you do this to her?

STANLEY I done nothing to no one. Let go of my shirt. You've torn it.

STELLA I want to know why. Tell me why.

STANLEY When we first met, me and you, you thought I was common. How right you was, baby. I was common as dirt. You showed me the snapshot of the place with the columns. I pulled you down off them columns and how you loved it, having them colored lights going! And wasn't we happy together, wasn't it all okay till she showed here?

[STELLA makes a slight movement. Her look goes suddenly inward as if some interior voice had called her name. She begins a slow, shuffling progress from the bedroom to the kitchen, leaning and resting on the back of the chair and then on the edge of a table with a blind look and listening expression. STANLEY, finishing with his shirt, is unaware of her reaction.]

And wasn't we happy together? Wasn't it all okay? Till she showed here.

Hoity-Toity, describing me as an ape. [He suddenly notices the change in STELLA.] Hey, what is it, Stel? [He crosses to her.]

STELLA [quietly] Take me to the hospital.

[He is with her now, supporting her with his arm, murmuring indistinguishably as they go outside.]

Scene Nine

A while later that evening. BLANCHE is seated in a tense hunched position in a bedroom chair that she has recovered with diagonal green and white stripes. She has on her scarlet satin robe. On the table beside chair is a bottle of liquor and a glass. The rapid, feverish polka tune, the "Varsouviana," is heard. The music is in her mind; she is drinking to escape it and the sense of disaster closing in on her, and she seems to whisper the words of the song. An electric fan is turning back and forth across her.

MITCH comes around the corner in work clothes: blue denim shirt and pants. He is unshaven. He climbs the steps to the door and rings. BLANCHE is startled.

BLANCHE Who is it, please?

MITCH [hoarsely] Me. Mitch.

[The polka tune stops.]

BLANCHE Mitch!—Just a minute.

[She rushes about frantically, hiding the bottle in a closet, crouching at the mirror and dabbing her face with cologne and powder. She is so excited that her breath is audible as she dashes about. At last she rushes to the door in the kitchen and lets him in.]

Mitch!—Y'know, I really shouldn't let you in after the treatment I have received from you this evening! So utterly uncavalier! But hello, beautiful!

[She offers him her lips. He ignores it and pushes past her into the flat. She looks fearfully after him as he stalks into the bedroom.]

My, my, what a cold shoulder! And such uncouth apparel! Why, you haven't even shaved! The unforgivable insult to a lady! But I forgive you. I forgive you because it's such a relief to see you. You've stopped that polka tune that I had caught in my head. Have you ever had anything caught in your head? No, of course you haven't, you dumb angel-puss, you'd never get anything awful caught in your head!

[He stares at her while she follows him while she talks. It is obvious that he has had a few drinks on the way over.]

MITCH Do we have to have that fan on?

BLANCHE No!

MITCH I don't like fans.

BLANCHE Then let's turn it off, honey. I'm not partial to them!

[She presses the switch and the fan nods slowly off. She clears her throat uneasily as MITCH plumps himself down on the bed in the bedroom and lights a cigarette.]

I don't know what there is to drink. I—haven't investigated.

MITCH I don't want Stan's liquor.

BLANCHE It isn't Stan's. Everything here isn't Stan's. Some things on the premises are actually mine! How is your mother? Isn't your mother well?

MITCH Why?

BLANCHE Something's the matter tonight, but never mind. I won't cross-examine the witness. I'll just—[She touches her forehead vaguely. The polka tune starts up again.—]pretend I don't notice anything different about you! That—music again . . .

MITCH What music?

BLANCHE The "Varsourviana"! The polka tune they were playing when Allan—Wait!

[A distant revolver shot is heard. BLANCHE seems relieved.]

There now, the shot! It always stops after that.

[The polka music dies out again.]

Yes, now it's stopped.

MITCH Are you boxed out of your mind?

BLANCHE I'll go and see what I can find in the way of— [She crosses into the closet, pretending to search for the bottle.] Oh, by the way, excuse me for not being dressed. But I'd practically given you up! Had you forgotten your invitation to supper?

MITCH I wasn't going to see you any more.

BLANCHE Wait a minute. I can't hear what you're saying and you talk so little that when you do say something, I don't want to miss a single syllable of it. . . . What am I looking around here for? Oh, yes—liquor! We've had so much excitement around here this evening that I am boxed out of my mind! [She pretends suddenly to find the bottle. He draws his foot up on the bed and stares at her contemptuously.] Here's something. Southern Comfort! What is that, I wonder?

MITCH If you don't know, it must belong to Stan.

BLANCHE Take your foot off the bed. It has a light cover on it. Of course you boys don't notice things like that. I've done so much with this place since I've been here.

MITCH I bet you have.

BLANCHE You saw it before I came. Well, look at it now! This room is almost—dainty! I want to keep it that way. I wonder if this stuff ought to be mixed with something? Ummm, it's sweet, so sweet! It's terribly, terribly sweet! Why, it's a liqueur, I believe! Yes, that's what it is, a liqueur! [MITCH grunts.] I'm afraid you won't like it, but try it, and maybe you will.

MITCH I told you already I don't want none of his liquor and I mean it. You ought to lay off his liquor. He says you been lapping it up all summer like a wild cat!

BLANCHE What a fantastic statement! Fantastic of him to say it, fantastic of you to repeat it! I won't descend to the level of such cheap accusations to answer them, even!

MITCH Huh.

BLANCHE What's in your mind? I see something in your eyes!

MITCH [getting up] It's dark in here.

BLANCHE I like it dark. The dark is comforting to me.

MITCH I don't think I ever seen you in the light. [BLANCHE laughs breathlessly.] That's a fact!

BLANCHE Is it?

MITCH I've never seen you in the afternoon.

BLANCHE Whose fault is that?

MITCH You never want to go out in the afternoon.

BLANCHE Why, Mitch, you're at the plant in the afternoon!

MITCH Not Sunday afternoon. I've asked you to go out with me sometimes on Sundays but you always make an excuse. You never want to go out till after six and then it's always some place that's not lighted much.

BLANCHE There is some obscure meaning in this but I fail to catch it.

MITCH What it means is I've never had a real good look at you, Blanche.

Let's turn the light on here.

BLANCHE [fearfully] Light? Which light? What for?

MITCH This one with the paper thing on it. [He tears the paper lantern off the light bulb. She utters a frightened gasp.]

BLANCHE What did you do that for?

MITCH So I can take a look at you good and plain!

BLANCHE Of course you don't really mean to be insulting!

MITCH No, just realistic.

BLANCHE I don't want realism. I want magic! [MITCH laughs.] Yes, yes, magic! I try to give that to people. I misrepresent things to them. I don't tell truth, I tell what ought to be truth. And if that is sinful, then let me be damned for it!—Don't turn the light on!

[MITCH crosses to the switch. He turns the light on and stares at her. She cries out and covers her face. He turns the lights off again.]

MITCH [slowly and bitterly] I don't mind you being older than what I thought. But all the rest of it—Christ! That pitch about your ideals being so old-fashioned and all the malarkey that you've dished out all summer. Oh, I knew you weren't sixteen any more. But I was a fool enough to believe you was straight.

BLANCHE Who told you I wasn't—"straight"? My loving brother-in-law. And you believed him.

MITCH I called him a liar at first. And then I checked on the story. First I asked our supply-man who travels through Laurel. And then I talked directly over long-distance to this merchant.

BLANCHE Who is this merchant?

MITCH Kiefaber.

BLANCHE The merchant Kiefaber of Laurel! I know the man. He whistled at me. I put him in his place. So now for revenge he makes up stories about me.

MITCH Three people, Kiefaber, Stanley and Shaw, swore to them!

BLANCHE Rub-a-dub-dub, three men in a tub! And such a filthy tub!

MITCH Didn't you stay at a hotel called The Flamingo?

BLANCHE Flamingo? No! Tarantula was the name of it! I stayed at a hotel called The Tarantula Arms!

MITCH [stupidly] Tarantula?

BLANCHE Yes, a big spider! That's where I brought my victims. [She pours herself another drink.] Yes, I had many intimacies with strangers. After the death of Allan—intimacies with strangers was all I seemed able to fill my empty heart with. . . . I think it was panic, just panic, that drove me from one to another, hunting for some protection—here and there, in the most—unlikely places—even, at last, in a seventeen-year-old boy but—somebody wrote the superintendent about it—"This woman is morally unfit for her position!"

[She throws back her head with convulsive, sobbing laughter. Then she repeats the statement, gasps, and drinks.]

True? Yes, I suppose—unfit somehow—anyway. . . . So I came here. There was nowhere else I could go. I was played out. You know what played out is? My youth was suddenly gone up the water-spout, and—I met you. You said you needed somebody. Well, I needed somebody, too. I thanked God for you, because you seemed to be gentle—a cleft in the rock of the world that I could hide in! But I guess I was asking, hoping—too much! Kiefaber, Stanley and Shaw have tied an old tin can to the tail of the kite.

[There is a pause. MITCH stares at her dumbly.]

MITCH You lied to me, Blanche.

BLANCHE Don't say I lied to you.

MITCH Lies, lies, inside and out, all lies.

BLANCHE Never inside, I didn't lie in my heart . . .

[A VENDOR comes around the corner. She is a blind MEXICAN WOMAN in a dark shawl, carrying bunches of those gaudy tin flowers that lower-class Mexicans display at funerals and other festive occasions. She is calling barely audibly. Her figure is only faintly visible outside the building.]

MEXICAN WOMAN Flores. Flores, Flores para los muertos.¹ Flores. Flores.

BLANCHE What? Oh! Somebody outside . . . [She goes to the door, opens it and stares at the MEXICAN WOMAN.]

MEXICAN WOMAN [she is at the door and offers BLANCHE some of her flowers] Flores? Flores para los muertos?

BLANCHE [frightened] No, no! Not now! Not now!

[She darts back into the apartment, slamming the door.]

MEXICAN WOMAN [she turns away and starts to move down the street] Flores para los muertos.

[The polka tune fades in.]

BLANCHE [as if to herself] Crumble and fade and—regrets—recriminations . . . "If you'd done this, it wouldn't've cost me that!"

1. Flowers for the dead (Spanish).

MEXICAN WOMAN Coronas para los muertos.² Coronas . . .

BLANCHE Legacies! Huh. . . . And other things such as bloodstained pillow-slips—"Her linen needs changing"—"Yes, Mother. But couldn't we get a colored girl to do it?" No, we couldn't of course. Everything gone but the—

MEXICAN WOMAN Flores.

BLANCHE Death—I used to sit here and she used to sit over there and death was as close as you are. . . . We didn't dare even admit we had ever heard of it!

MEXICAN WOMAN Flores para los muertos, flores—flores . . .

BLANCHE The opposite is desire. So do you wonder? How could you possibly wonder! Not far from Belle Reve, before we had lost Belle Reve, was a camp where they trained young soldiers. On Sunday nights they would go in town to get drunk—

MEXICAN WOMAN [softly] Coronas . . .

BLANCHE —and on the way back they would stagger onto my lawn and call—"Blanche! Blanche!"—the deaf old lady remaining suspected nothing. But sometimes I slipped outside to answer their calls. . . . Later the paddy-wagon would gather them up like daisies . . . the long way home . . .

[The MEXICAN WOMAN turns slowly and drifts back off with her soft mournful cries. BLANCHE goes to the dresser and leans forward on it. After a moment, MITCH rises and follows her purposefully. The polka music fades away. He places his hands on her waist and tries to turn her about.]

BLANCHE What do you want?

MITCH [fumbling to embrace her] What I been missing all summer.

BLANCHE Then marry me, Mitch!

MITCH I don't think I want to marry you anymore.

BLANCHE No?

MITCH [dropping his hands from her waist] You're not clean enough to bring in the house with my mother.

BLANCHE Go away, then. [He stares at her.] Get out of here quick before I start screaming fire! [Her throat is tightening with hysteria.] Get out of here quick before I start screaming fire.

[He still remains staring. She suddenly rushes to the big window with its pale blue square of the soft summer light and cries wildly.]

Fire! Fire! Fire!

[With a startled gasp, MITCH turns and goes out the outer door, clatters awkwardly down the steps and around the corner of the building.

BLANCHE staggers back from the window and falls to her knees. The distant piano is slow and blue.]

Scene Ten

It is a few hours later that night.

BLANCHE has been drinking fairly steadily since MITCH left. She has dragged her wardrobe trunk into the center of the bedroom. It hangs open with flowery dresses thrown across it. As the drinking and packing went on, a mood of hysterical exhilaration came into her and she has decked herself out in a somewhat

2. Wreaths for the dead (Spanish).

soiled and crumpled white satin evening gown and a pair of scuffed silver slippers with brilliants set in their heels.

Now she is placing the rhinestone tiara on her head before the mirror of the dressing-table and murmuring excitedly as if to a group of spectral admirers.

BLANCHE How about taking a swim, a moonlight swim at the old rock-quarry? If anyone's sober enough to drive a car! Ha-ha! Best way in the world to stop your head buzzing! Only you've got to be careful to dive where the deep pool is—if you hit a rock you don't come up till tomorrow . . .

[Tremblingly she lifts the hand mirror for a closer inspection. She catches her breath and slams the mirror face down with such violence that the glass cracks. She moans a little and attempts to rise. STANLEY appears around the corner of the building. He still has on the vivid green silk bowling shirt. As he rounds the corner the honky-tonk music is heard. It continues softly throughout the scene. He enters the kitchen, slamming the door. As he peers in at BLANCHE he gives a low whistle. He has had a few drinks on the way and has brought some quart beer bottles home with him.]

BLANCHE How is my sister?

STANLEY She is doing okay.

BLANCHE And how is the baby?

STANLEY [grinning amiably] The baby won't come before morning so they told me to go home and get a little shut-eye.

BLANCHE Does that mean we are to be alone in here?

STANLEY Yep. Just me and you, Blanche. Unless you got somebody hid under the bed. What've you got on those fine feathers for?

BLANCHE Oh, that's right. You left before my wire came.

STANLEY You got a wire?

BLANCHE I received a telegram from an old admirer of mine.

STANLEY Anything good?

BLANCHE I think so. An invitation.

STANLEY What to? A fireman's ball?

BLANCHE [throwing back her head] A cruise of the Caribbean on a yacht!

STANLEY Well, well. What do you know?

BLANCHE I have never been so surprised in my life.

STANLEY I guess not.

BLANCHE It came like a bolt from the blue!

STANLEY Who did you say it was from?

BLANCHE An old beau of mine.

STANLEY The one that give you the white fox-pieces?

BLANCHE Mr. Shep Huntleigh. I wore his ATO pin my last year at college. I hadn't seen him again until last Christmas. I ran in to him on Biscayne Boulevard. Then—just now—this wire—inviting me on a cruise of the Caribbean! The problem is clothes. I tore into my trunk to see what I have that's suitable for the tropics!

STANLEY And come up with that—gorgeous—diamond—tiara?

BLANCHE This old relic? Ha-ha! It's only rhinestones.

STANLEY Gosh. I thought it was Tiffany diamonds. [He unbuttons his shirt.]

BLANCHE Well, anyhow, I shall be entertained in style.

STANLEY Uh-huh. It goes to show, you never know what is coming.

BLANCHE Just when I thought my luck had begun to fail me—

STANLEY Into the picture pops this Miami millionaire.

BLANCHE This man is not from Miami. This man is from Dallas.

STANLEY This man is from Dallas?

BLANCHE Yes, this man is from Dallas where gold spouts out of the ground!

STANLEY Well, just so he's from somewhere! [He starts removing his shirt.]

BLANCHE Close the curtains before you undress any further.

STANLEY [amiably] This is all I'm going to undress right now. [He rips the sack off a quart beer bottle] Seen a bottle-opener?

[She moves slowly toward the dresser, where she stands with her hands knotted together.]

I used to have a cousin who could open a beer bottle with his teeth. [pounding the bottle cap on the corner of table] That was his only accomplishment, all he could do—he was just a human bottle-opener. And then one time, at a wedding party, he broke his front teeth off! After that he was so ashamed of himself he used t' sneak out of the house when company came . . .

[The bottle cap pops off and a geyser of foam shoots up. Stanley laughs happily, holding up the bottle over his head.]

Ha-ha! Rain from heaven! [He extends the bottle toward her] Shall we bury the hatchet and make it a loving-cup? Huh?

BLANCHE No, thank you.

STANLEY Well, it's a red-letter night for us both. You having an oil millionaire and me having a baby.

[He goes to the bureau in the bedroom and crouches to remove something from the bottom drawer.]

BLANCHE [drawing back] What are you doing in here?

STANLEY Here's something I always break out on special occasions like this. The silk pyjamas I wore on my wedding night!

BLANCHE Oh.

STANLEY When the telephone rings and they say, "You've got a son!" I'll tear this off and wave it like a flag! [He shakes out a brilliant pyjama coat.]

I guess we are both entitled to put on the dog. [He goes back to the kitchen with the coat over his arm.]

BLANCHE When I think of how divine it is going to be to have such a thing as privacy once more—I could weep with joy!

STANLEY This millionaire from Dallas is not going to interfere with your privacy any?

BLANCHE It won't be the sort of thing you have in mind. This man is a gentleman and he respects me. [improvising feverishly] What he wants is my companionship. Having great wealth sometimes makes people lonely! A cultivated woman, a woman of intelligence and breeding, can enrich a man's life—immeasurably! I have those things to offer, and this doesn't take them away. Physical beauty is passing. A transitory possession. But beauty of the mind and richness of the spirit and tenderness of the heart—and I have all of those things—aren't taken away, but grow! Increase with the years! How strange that I should be called a destitute woman! When I have all of these treasures locked in my heart. [A choked sob comes from her.] I think of myself as a very, very rich woman! But I have been foolish—casting my pearls before swine!

STANLEY Swine, huh?

BLANCHE Yes, swine! Swine! And I'm thinking not only of you but of your friend, Mr. Mitchell. He came to see me tonight. He dared to come here in his work clothes! And to repeat slander to me, vicious stories that he had gotten from you! I gave him his walking papers . . .

STANLEY You did, huh?

BLANCHE But then he came back. He returned with a box of roses to beg my forgiveness! He implored my forgiveness. But some things are not forgivable. Deliberate cruelty is not forgivable. It is the one unforgivable thing in my opinion and it is the one thing of which I have never, never been guilty. And so I told him, I said to him. "Thank you," but it was foolish of me to think that we could ever adapt ourselves to each other. Our ways of life are too different. Our attitudes and our backgrounds are incompatible. We have to be realistic about such things. So farewell, my friend! And let there be no hard feelings . . .

STANLEY Was this before or after the telegram came from the Texas oil millionaire?

BLANCHE What telegram? No! No, after! As a matter of fact, the wire came just as—

STANLEY As a matter of fact there wasn't no wire at all!

BLANCHE Oh, oh!

STANLEY There isn't no millionaire! And Mitch didn't come back with roses 'cause I know where he is—

BLANCHE Oh!

STANLEY There isn't a goddam thing but imagination!

BLANCHE Oh!

STANLEY And lies and conceit and tricks!

BLANCHE Oh!

STANLEY And look at yourself! Take a look at yourself in that worn-out Mardi Gras outfit, rented for fifty cents from some rag-picker! And with the crazy crown on! What queen do you think you are?

BLANCHE Oh—God . . .

STANLEY I've been on to you from the start! Not once did you pull any wool over this boy's eyes! You come in here and sprinkle the place with powder and spray perfume and cover the light-bulb with a paper lantern, and lo and behold the place has turned into Egypt and you are the Queen of the Nile! Sitting on your throne and swilling down my liquor! I say—Ha!—Ha! Do you hear me? Ha—ha—ha! [He walks into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE Don't come in here!

[Lurid reflections appear on the walls around BLANCHE. The shadows are of a grotesque and menacing form. She catches her breath, crosses to the phone and jiggles the hook. STANLEY goes into the bathroom and closes the door.]

Operator, operator! Give me long-distance, please. . . . I want to get in touch with Mr. Shep Huntleigh of Dallas. He's so well known he doesn't require any address. Just ask anybody who—Wait!!—No, I couldn't find it right now. . . . Please understand, I—No! No, wait!. . . . One moment! Someone is—Nothing! Hold on, please!

[She sets the phone down and crosses warily into the kitchen. The night is filled with inhuman voices like cries in a jangle. The shadows and lurid reflections move sinuously as flames along the wall spaces. Through the back wall of the rooms, which have become transparent, can be seen the sidewalk. A prostitute has rolled a drunkard. He pursues her along the walk, overtakes her and there is a struggle. A policeman's whistle breaks it up. The figures disappear. Some moments later the Negro Woman appears around the corner with a sequined bag which the prostitute had dropped on the walk. She is rooting excitedly through it. BLANCHE presses her knuckles to her lips and returns slowly to the phone. She speaks in a hoarse whisper.]

BLANCHE Operator! Operator! Never mind long-distance. Get Western Union. There isn't time to be—Western—Western Union!

[She waits anxiously.]

Western Union? Yes! I—want to—Take down this message! “In desperate, desperate circumstances! Help me! Caught in a trap. Caught in—”
Oh!

[The bathroom door is thrown open and STANLEY comes out in the brilliant silk pyjamas. He grins at her as he knots the tasseled sash about his waist. She gasps and backs away from the phone. He stares at her for a count of ten. Then a clicking becomes audible from the telephone, steady and rasping.]

STANLEY You left th' phone off th' hook.

[He crosses to it deliberately and sets it back on the hook. After he has replaced it, he stares at her again, his mouth slowly curving into a grin, as he weaves between BLANCHE and the outer door. The barely audible “Blue Piano” begins to drum up louder. The sound of it turns into the roar of an approaching locomotive. BLANCHE crouches, pressing her fists to her ears until it has gone by.]

BLANCHE [finally straightening] Let me—let me get by you!

STANLEY Get by me? Sure. Go ahead. [He moves back a pace in the doorway.]

BLANCHE You—you stand over there! [She indicates a further position.]

STANLEY [grinning] You got plenty of room to walk by me now.

BLANCHE Not with you there! But I've got to get out somehow!

STANLEY You think I'll interfere with you? Ha-ha!

[The “Blue Piano” goes softly. She turns confusedly and makes a faint gesture. The inhuman jungle voices rise up. He takes a step toward her, biting his tongue which protrudes between his lips.]

STANLEY [softly] Come to think of it—maybe you wouldn't be bad to—interfere with . . .

[BLANCHE moves backward through the door into the bedroom.]

BLANCHE Stay back! Don't you come toward me another step or I'll—

STANLEY What?

BLANCHE Some awful thing will happen! It will!

STANLEY What are you putting on now?

[They are now both inside the bedroom.]

BLANCHE I warn you, don't, I'm in danger!

[He takes another step. She smashes a bottle on the table and faces him, clutching the broken top.]

STANLEY What did you do that for?

BLANCHE So I could twist the broken end in your face!

STANLEY I bet you would do that!

BLANCHE I would! I will if you—

STANLEY Oh! So you want some roughhouse! All right, let's have some roughhouse!

[He springs toward her, overturning the table. She cries out and strikes at him with the bottle top but he catches her wrist.]

Tiger—tiger! Drop the bottle-top! Drop it! We've had this date with each other from the beginning!

[She moans. The bottle-top falls. She sinks to her knees: He picks up her inert figure and carries her to the bed. The hot trumpet and drums from the Four Deuces sound loudly.]

Scene Eleven

It is some weeks later. STELLA is packing BLANCHE's things. Sounds of water can be heard running in the bathroom.

The portieres are partly open on the poker players—STANLEY, STEVE, MITCH and PABLO—who sit around the table in the kitchen. The atmosphere of the kitchen is now the same raw, lurid one of the disastrous poker night.

The building is framed by the sky of turquoise. STELLA has been crying as she arranges the flowery dresses in the open trunk.

EUNICE comes down the steps from her flat above and enters the kitchen. There is an outburst from the poker table.

STANLEY Drew to an inside straight and made it, by God.

PABLO Maldita sea tu suerte!

STANLEY Put it in English, greaseball.

PABLO I am cursing your rutting luck.

STANLEY [prodigiously elated] You know what luck is? Luck is believing you're lucky. Take at Salerno.³ I believed I was lucky. I figured that 4 out of 5 would not come through but I would . . . and I did. I put that down as a rule. To hold front position in this rat-race you've got to believe you are lucky.

MITCH You . . . you . . . you . . . Brag . . . brag . . . bull . . . bull.

[STELLA goes into the bedroom and starts folding a dress.]

STANLEY What's the matter with him?

EUNICE [walking past the table] I always did say that men are callous things with no feelings, but this does beat anything. Making pigs of yourselves. [She comes through the portieres into the bedroom.]

STANLEY What's the matter with her?

STELLA How is my baby?

EUNICE Sleeping like a little angel. Brought you some grapes. [She puts them on a stool and lowers her voice.] Blanche?

STELLA Bathing.

EUNICE How is she?

STELLA She wouldn't eat anything but asked for a drink.

EUNICE What did you tell her?

STELLA I—just told her that—we'd made arrangements for her to rest in the country. She's got it mixed in her mind with Shep Huntleigh.

[BLANCHE opens the bathroom door slightly.]

BLANCHE Stella.

3. Important beachhead in the Allied invasion of Italy in World War II.

STELLA Yes, Blanche.

BLANCHE If anyone calls while I'm bathing take the number and tell them I'll call right back.

STELLA Yes.

BLANCHE That cool yellow silk—the bouclé. See if it's crushed. If it's not too crushed I'll wear it and on the lapel that silver and turquoise pin in the shape of a seahorse. You will find them in the heart-shaped box I keep my accessories in. And Stella . . . Try and locate a bunch of artificial violets in that box, too, to pin with the seahorse on the lapel of the jacket.

[She closes the door. STELLA turns to EUNICE.]

STELLA I don't know if I did the right thing.

EUNICE What else could you do?

STELLA I couldn't believe her story and go on living with Stanley.

EUNICE Don't ever believe it. Life has got to go on. No matter what happens, you've got to keep on going.

[The bathroom door opens a little.]

BLANCHE [looking out] Is the coast clear?

STELLA Yes, Blanche. [to EUNICE] Tell her how well she's looking.

BLANCHE Please close the curtains before I come out.

STELLA They're closed.

STANLEY —How many for you?

PABLO Two.

STEVE Three.

[BLANCHE appears in the amber light of the door. She has a tragic radiance in her red satin robe following the sculptural lines of her body. The "Varsouviana" rises audibly as BLANCHE enters the bedroom.]

BLANCHE [with faintly hysterical vivacity] I have just washed my hair.

STELLA Did you?

BLANCHE I'm not sure I got the soap out.

EUNICE Such fine hair!

BLANCHE [accepting the compliment] It's a problem. Didn't I get a call?

STELLA Who from, Blanche?

BLANCHE Shep Huntleigh . . .

STELLA Why, not yet, honey!

BLANCHE How strange! I—

[At the sound of BLANCHE's voice MITCH's arm supporting his cards has sagged and his gaze is dissolved into space. STANLEY slaps him on the shoulder.]

STANLEY Hey, Mitch, come to!

[The sound of this new voice shocks BLANCHE. She makes a shocked gesture, forming his name with her lips. STELLA nods and looks quickly away. BLANCHE stands quite still for some moments—the silver-backed mirror in her hand and a look of sorrowful perplexity as though all human experience shows on her face. BLANCHE finally speaks but with sudden hysteria.]

BLANCHE What's going on here?

[She turns from STELLA to EUNICE and back to STELLA. Her rising voice penetrates the concentration of the game. MITCH ducks his head lower but STANLEY shoves back his chair as if about to rise. STEVE places a restraining hand on his arm.]

BLANCHE [continuing] What's happened here? I want an explanation of what's happened here.

STELLA [agonizingly] Hush! Hush!

EUNICE Hush! Hush! Honey.

STELLA Please, Blanche.

BLANCHE Why are you looking at me like that? Is something wrong with me?

EUNICE You look wonderful, Blanche. Don't she look wonderful?

STELLA Yes.

EUNICE I understand you are going on a trip.

STELLA Yes, Blanche is. She's going on a vacation.

EUNICE I'm green with envy.

BLANCHE Help me, help me get dressed!

STELLA [handing her dress] Is this what you—

BLANCHE Yes, it will do! I'm anxious to get out of here—this place is a trap!

EUNICE What a pretty blue jacket.

STELLA It's lilac colored.

BLANCHE You're both mistaken. It's Della Robbia blue.⁴ The blue of the robe in the old Madonna pictures. Are these grapes washed?

[She fingers the bunch of grapes which EUNICE had brought in.]

EUNICE Huh?

BLANCHE Washed, I said. Are they washed?

EUNICE They're from the French Market.

BLANCHE That doesn't mean they've been washed. [The cathedral bells chime.] Those cathedral bells—they're the only clean thing in the Quarter. Well, I'm going now. I'm ready to go.

EUNICE [whispering] She's going to walk out before they get here.

STELLA Wait, Blanche.

BLANCHE I don't want to pass in front of those men.

EUNICE Then wait'll the game breaks up.

STELLA Sit down and . . .

[BLANCHE turns weakly, hesitantly about. She lets them push her into a chair.]

BLANCHE I can smell the sea air. The rest of my time I'm going to spend on the sea. And when I die, I'm going to die on the sea. You know what I shall die of [She plucks a grape.] I shall die of eating an unwashed grape one day out on the ocean. I will die—with my hand in the hand of some nice-looking ship's doctor, a very young one with a small blond mustache and a big silver watch. "Poor lady," they'll say, "the quinine did her no good. That unwashed grape has transported her soul to heaven." [The cathedral chimes are heard.] And I'll be buried at sea sewn up in a clean white sack and dropped overboard—at noon—in the blaze of summer—and into an ocean as blue as [chimes again] my first lover's eyes!

[A DOCTOR and a MATRON have appeared around the corner of the building and climbed the steps to the porch. The gravity of their profession is exaggerated—the unmistakable aura of the state institution with its cynical detachment. The DOCTOR rings the doorbell. The murmur of the game is interrupted.]

4. A shade of light blue seen in terra cottas made by the Della Robbia family during the Italian Renaissance.

EUNICE [whispering to STELLA] That must be them.

[STELLA presses her fists to her lips.]

BLANCHE [rising slowly] What is it?

EUNICE [affectedly casual] Excuse me while I see who's at the door.

STELLA Yes.

[EUNICE goes into the kitchen.]

BLANCHE [tensely] I wonder if it's for me.

[A whispered colloquy takes place at the door.]

EUNICE [returning, brightly] Someone is calling for Blanche.

BLANCHE It is for me, then! [She looks fearfully from one to the other and then to the portieres. The "Varsouviana" faintly plays.] Is it the gentleman I was expecting from Dallas?

EUNICE I think it is, Blanche.

BLANCHE I'm not quite ready.

STELLA Ask him to wait outside.

BLANCHE I . . .

[EUNICE goes back to the portieres. Drums sound very softly.]

STELLA Everything packed?

BLANCHE My silver toilet articles are still out.

STELLA Ah!

EUNICE [returning] They're waiting in front of the house.

BLANCHE They! Who's "they"?

EUNICE There's a lady with him.

BLANCHE I cannot imagine who this "lady" could be! How is she dressed?

EUNICE Just—just a sort of a—plain-tailored outfit.

BLANCHE Possibly she's— [Her voice dies out nervously.]

STELLA Shall we go, Blanche?

BLANCHE Must we go through that room?

STELLA I will go with you.

BLANCHE How do I look?

STELLA Lovely.

EUNICE [echoing] Lovely.

[BLANCHE moves fearfully to the portieres. EUNICE draws them open for her. BLANCHE goes into the kitchen.]

BLANCHE [to the men] Please don't get up. I'm only passing through.

[She crosses quickly to outside door. STELLA and EUNICE follow. The poker players stand awkwardly at the table—all except MITCH who remains seated, looking down at the table. BLANCHE steps out on a small porch at the side of the door. She stops short and catches her breath.]

DOCTOR How do you do?

BLANCHE You are not the gentleman I was expecting. [She suddenly gasps and starts back up the steps. She stops by STELLA, who stands just outside the door, and speaks in a frightening whisper.] That man isn't Shep Huntleigh.

[The "Varsouviana" is playing distantly. STELLA stares back at BLANCHE. EUNICE is holding STELLA's arm. There is a moment of silence—no sound but that of STANLEY steadily shuffling the cards. BLANCHE catches her breath again and slips back into the flat. She enters the flat with a peculiar smile, her eyes wide and brilliant. As soon as her sister goes past her, STELLA closes her eyes and clenches her hands. EUNICE throws her arms comfortingly about her. Then she starts up to her flat. BLANCHE stops just inside the door. MITCH keeps staring down at his hands on the table, but the other men look at her curiously. At last she starts around the table toward the bedroom. As she does, STANLEY suddenly pushes back his chair and rises as if to block her way. The MATRON follows her into the flat.]

STANLEY Did you forget something?

BLANCHE [shrilly] Yes! Yes, I forgot something!

[She rushes past him into the bedroom. Lurid reflections appear on the walls in odd, sinuous shapes. The "Varsouviana" is filtered into a weird distortion, accompanied by the cries and noises of the jungle. BLANCHE seizes the back of a chair as if to defend herself.]

STANLEY [sotto voce]⁵ Doc, you better go in.

DOCTOR [sotto voce, motioning to the MATRON] Nurse, bring her out.

[The MATRON advances on one side, STANLEY on the other. Divested of all the softer properties of womanhood, the MATRON is a peculiarly sinister figure in her severe dress. Her voice is bold and toneless as a firebell.]

MATRON Hello, Blanche.

[The greeting is echoed and re-echoed by other mysterious voices behind the walls, as if reverberated through a canyon of rock.]

STANLEY She says that she forgot something.

[The echo sounds in threatening whispers.]

MATRON That's all right.

STANLEY What did you forget, Blanche?

BLANCHE I—I—

MATRON It don't matter. We can pick it up later.

STANLEY Sure. We can send it along with the trunk.

BLANCHE [retreating in panic] I don't know you—I don't know you. I want to be—left alone—please!

MATRON Now, Blanche!

ECHOES [rising and falling] Now, Blanche—now, Blanche—now, Blanche!

STANLEY You left nothing here but spilt talcum and old empty perfume bottles—unless it's the paper lantern you want to take with you. You want the lantern?

[He crosses to dressing table and seizes the paper lantern, tearing it off the light bulb, and extends it toward her. She cries out as if the lantern was herself. The MATRON steps boldly toward her. She screams and tries to break past the MATRON. All the men spring to their feet. STELLA runs out to the porch, with EUNICE following to comfort her, simultaneously with the confused voices of the men in the kitchen. STELLA rushes into EUNICE's embrace on the porch.]

STELLA Oh, my God, Eunice help me! Don't let them do that to her, don't let them hurt her! Oh, God, oh, please God, don't hurt her! What are they doing to her? What are they doing? [She tries to break from EUNICE's arms.]

EUNICE No, honey, no, no, honey. Stay here. Don't go back in there. Stay with me and don't look.

STELLA What have I done to my sister? Oh, God, what have I done to my sister?

EUNICE You done the right thing, the only thing you could do. She couldn't stay here; there wasn't no other place for her to go.

5. In an undertone [Italian].

[While STELLA and EUNICE are speaking on the porch the voices of the men in the kitchen overlap them. MITCH has started toward the bedroom. STANLEY crosses to block him. STANLEY pushes him aside. MITCH lunges and strikes at STANLEY. STANLEY pushes MITCH back. MITCH collapses at the table, sobbing. During the preceding scenes, the MATRON catches hold of BLANCHE's arm and prevents her flight. BLANCHE turns wildly and scratches at the MATRON. The heavy woman pinions her arms. BLANCHE cries out hoarsely and slips to her knees.]

MATRON These fingernails have to be trimmed. [The DOCTOR comes into the room and she looks at him.] Jacket, Doctor?

DOCTOR Not unless necessary.

[He takes off his hat and now he becomes personalized. The unhuman quality goes. His voice is gentle and reassuring as he crosses to BLANCHE and crouches in front of her. As he speaks her name, her terror subsides a little. The lurid reflections fade from the walls, the inhuman cries and noises die out and her own hoarse crying is calmed.]

DOCTOR Miss DuBois.

[She turns her face to him and stares at him with desperate pleading. He smiles; then he speaks to the MATRON.]

It won't be necessary.

BLANCHE [faintly] Ask her to let go of me.

DOCTOR [to the MATRON] Let go.

[The MATRON releases her. BLANCHE extends her hands toward the DOCTOR. He draws her up gently and supports her with his arm and leads her through the portieres.]

BLANCHE [holding tight to his arm] Whoever you are—I have always depended on the kindness of strangers.

[The poker players stand back as BLANCHE and the DOCTOR cross the kitchen to the front door. She allows him to lead her as if she were blind. As they go out on the porch, STELLA cries out her sister's name from where she is crouched a few steps up on the stairs.]

STELLA Blanche! Blanche, Blanche!

[BLANCHE walks on without turning, followed by the DOCTOR and the MATRON. They go around the corner of the building. EUNICE descends to STELLA and places the child in her arms. It is wrapped in a pale blue blanket. STELLA accepts the child, sobbingly. EUNICE continues downstairs and enters the kitchen where the men, except for STANLEY, are returning silently to their places about the table. STANLEY has gone out on the porch and stands at the foot of the steps looking at STELLA.]

STANLEY [a bit uncertainly] Stella?

[She sobs with inhuman abandon. There is something luxurious in her complete surrender to crying now that her sister is gone.]

STANLEY [voluptuously, soothingly] Now, honey. Now, love. Now, now, love. [He kneels beside her and his fingers find the opening of her blouse.]

Now, now, love. Now, love. . . .

[The luxurious sobbing, the sensual murmur fade away under the swelling music of the "Blue Piano" and the muted trumpet.]

STEVE This game is seven-card stud.

CURTAIN

JOHN CHEEVER

1912–1982

“It seems to me that man’s inclination toward light, toward brightness, is very nearly botanical—and I mean spiritual light. One not only needs it, one struggles for it.” These sentences from an interview with John Cheever, conducted by the novelist John Hersey, at first glance look strange coming from a “New Yorker writer” of entertaining stories in which harried, well-to-do, white middle-class suburbanites conduct their lives. “Our Chekhov of the exurbs,” he was dubbed by the reviewer John Leonard, with reference to the mythical community of Shady Hill (which Cheever created along the lines of existing ones in Fairfield, Connecticut, or Westchester County, New York). Yet Chekhov’s own characters, living in darkness, aspire toward “spiritual light,” with a similarly “botanical” inclination. Trapped in their beautifully appointed houses and neighborhoods but carried along by the cool, effortless prose of their creator, Cheever’s characters are viewed with a sympathetic irony, well-seasoned by sadness.

Cheever’s early years were not notably idyllic, and he displays little nostalgia for a lost childhood. Born in Quincy, Massachusetts, he grew up in what he describes as shabby gentility, with his father departing the family when his son was fifteen. (Cheever had an older brother, Fred, with whom he formed a strong but troubled relationship.) Two years later his father lost the family’s money in the crash of 1929, and by that time Cheever had been expelled from Thayer Academy, in Braintree. The expulsion marked the end of his formal education and the beginning of his career as a writer; for, remarkably, he wrote a short story about the experience, titled it “Expelled,” and sent it to the New Republic, where Malcolm Cowley (who would become a lifelong friend) published it.

During the 1930s Cheever lived in New York City, in impoverished circumstances, taking odd jobs to support himself and winning a fellowship to the writer’s colony at Yaddo, in Saratoga Springs, New York. His New York life would provide the material for many of his early stories, whose protagonists are rather frequently in desperate economic situations. With the coming of World War II, Cheever joined the armed forces and served in the Pacific theater but saw no combat. In 1941 he married Mary Winternitz. About the marriage, which produced three children and lasted through four decades, Cheever said, “That two people—both of us temperamental, quarrelsome, and intensely ambitious—could have gotten along for such a vast period of time is for me a very good example of the boundlessness of human nature.” Meanwhile, with the help of Malcolm Cowley, he began to publish in the New Yorker, and in 1943, while he was serving in the military, his first book of stories (The Way Some People Live) was published to favorable reviews. Over the decades to follow the stories continued to appear, largely in the New Yorker, where he became—along with J. D. Salinger and John Updike—a recurrent phenomenon. Five further volumes of short fiction were published, and in 1978 The Stories of John Cheever gathered those he wished to be remembered for.

Although he is praised for his skill as a realist depicter of suburban manners and morals, Cheever’s art cannot be adequately understood in such terms alone. As Stephen C. Moore has pointed out, “His best stories move from a base in a mimetic presentation of surface reality—the scenery of apparently successful American middle class life—to fables of heroism.” Cheever’s embattled heroes express themselves in taking up challenges that are essentially fabulous, and foolhardy: swimming home across the backyard pools of Westchester (“The Swimmer,” printed here); performing feats of physical daredevilry in suburban living rooms (“O Youth and Beauty”); or dealing with the myriad demands and temptations that beset the hero who, having escaped death in an airplane, returns home to more severe trials (“The Country Husband”). Whatever the specific narrative, we are always aware of the storyteller’s art, shaping ordinary life into the odder, more willful figures of fantasy and romance.

While Cheever will be remembered primarily as a short-story writer, his output includes a respectable number of novels. In 1957 he won a National Book Award for his first one, The Wapshot Chronicle (it was followed by The Wapshot Scandal, in 1964), notable for its New England seacoast setting and domestic flavor, if less so for a continuously engaging narrative line. Perhaps his most gripping novel is Bullet Park (1969), which, like the best of the stories, is both realistic and fabulous. The suburban milieu, seen from the 5:42 train from New York, has never been depicted more accurately, even lovingly, by Cheever. And as is to be expected, his protagonist’s carefully built, pious suburban existence turns out to be a mess. The novel provoked interesting disagreement about its merits (some critics felt the narrative manipulations both ruthless and sentimental), but there was no disagreement about the vivid quality of its represented life, on the commuter train or at the cocktail party. In the years just previous to his death, and after a bout with alcohol and drug addiction, Cheever published his two final novels, Falconer (1978) and Oh What a Paradise It Seems (1980), the former receiving much praise for its harrowing rendering of prison life. (Farragut, the novel’s hero, is sent to Falconer Prison for killing his brother; Cheever lived in Ossining, New York, home of Sing Sing Prison, during his later years.)

From the beginning to the end of his career he was and remained a thoroughly professional writer, wary of pronouncing on the world at large (there is a noticeable absence of politics and ideology in his work) or on the meaning and significance of his own art. As one sees from his Journals (1991), he agonized over the disruptive facts of his alcoholism and his homosexuality. But he remained a private man, seemingly untouched by experiments—or fads—in fiction writing. Whether or not, as T. S. Eliot said about Henry James, he had a mind so fine that no idea could violate it, Cheever remained firmly resistant to ideas of all sorts. This insular tendency is probably a reason why his work makes less than a “major” claim on us, but it is also the condition responsible for his devoted and scrupulous attention to the particularities of middle-class life at the far edge of its promised dream.

This text of “The Swimmer” is from The Brigadier and the Golf Widow (1964).

The Swimmer

It was one of those midsummer Sundays when everyone sits around saying: “I drank too much last night.” You might have heard it whispered by the parishioners leaving church, heard it from the lips of the priest himself, struggling with his cassock in the vestiarium,¹ heard it from the golf links and the tennis courts, heard it from the wildlife preserve where the leader of the Audubon group was suffering from a terrible hangover. “I drank too much,” said Donald Westerhazy. “We all drank too much,” said Lucinda Merrill. “It must have been the wine,” said Helen Westerhazy. “I drank too much of that claret.”

This was at the edge of the Westerhazys’ pool. The pool, fed by an artesian well with a high iron content, was a pale shade of green. It was a fine day. In the west there was a massive stand of cumulus cloud so like a city seen from a distance—from the bow of an approaching ship—that it might have had a name. Lisbon. Hackensack.² The sun was hot. Neddy Merrill sat by the green water, one hand in it, one around a glass of gin. He was a slender man—he seemed to have the especial slenderness of youth—and while he was far from young he had slid down his banister that morning and given the bronze backside of Aphrodite³ on the hall table a smack, as he jogged toward the smell of coffee in his dining room. He might have been compared to a summer's day, particularly the last hours of one, and while he lacked a tennis racket or a sail bag the impression was definitely one of youth, sport, and clement weather. He had been swimming and now he was breathing deeply, stertorously as if he could gulp into his lungs the components of that moment, the heat of the sun, the intenseness of his pleasure. It all seemed to flow into his chest. His own house stood in Bullet Park,⁴ eight miles to the south, where his four beautiful daughters would have had their lunch and might be playing tennis. Then it occurred to him that by taking a dogleg to the southwest he could reach his home by water.

1. Cloakroom for religious vestments adjacent to a church’s sanctuary.

His life was not confining and the delight he took in this observation could not be explained by its suggestion of escape. He seemed to see, with a cartographer's eye, that string of swimming pools, that quasi-subterranean stream that curved across the county. He had made a discovery, a contribution to modern geography; he would name the stream Lucinda after his wife. He was not a practical joker nor was he a fool but he was determinedly original and had a vague and modest idea of himself as a legendary figure. The day was beautiful and it seemed to him that a long swim might enlarge and celebrate its beauty.

He took off a sweater that was hung over his shoulders and dove in. He had an inexplicable contempt for men who did not hurl themselves into pools. He swam a choppy crawl, breathing either with every stroke or every fourth stroke and counting somewhere well in the back of his mind the one-two one-two of a flutter kick. It was not a serviceable stroke for long distances but the domestication of swimming had saddled the sport with some customs and in his part of the world a crawl was customary. To be embraced and sustained by the light green water was less a pleasure, it seemed, than the resumption of a natural condition, and he would have liked to swim without trunks, but this was not possible, considering his project. He hoisted himself up on the far curb—he never used the ladder—and started across the lawn. When Lucinda asked where he was going he said he was going to swim home.

The only maps and charts he had to go by were remembered or imaginary but these were clear enough. First there were the Grahams, the Hammers, the Lears, the Howlands, and the Crosscups. He would cross Ditmar Street to the Bunkers and come, after a short portage, to the Levys, the Welchers, and the public pool in Lancaster. Then there were the Hallorans, the Sachses, the Biswangers, Shirley Adams, the Gilmartins, and the Clydes. The day was lovely, and that he lived in a world so generously supplied with water seemed like a clemency, a beneficence. His heart was high and he ran across the grass. Making his way home by an uncommon route gave him

2. A town in New Jersey. Lisbon is the capital of Portugal.

3. Greek goddess of love and beauty.

4. Fictive suburb used as a location for many of Cheever's stories and novels.

the feeling that he was a pilgrim, an explorer, a man with a destiny, and he knew that he would find friends all along the way; friends would line the banks of the Lucinda River.

He went through a hedge that separated the Westerhazys' land from the Grahams', walked under some flowering apple trees, passed the shed that housed their pump and filter, and came out at the Grahams' pool. "Why, Neddy," Mrs. Graham said, "what a marvelous surprise. I've been trying to get you on the phone all morning. Here, let me get you a drink." He saw then, like any explorer, that the hospitable customs and traditions of the natives would have to be handled with diplomacy if he was ever going to reach his destination. He did not want to mystify or seem rude to the Grahams nor did he have the time to linger there. He swam the length of their pool and joined them in the sun and was rescued, a few minutes later, by the arrival of two carloads of friends from Connecticut. During the uproarious reunions he was able to slip away. He went down by the front of the Grahams' house, stepped over a thorny hedge, and crossed a vacant lot to the Hammers'. Mrs. Hammer, looking up from her roses, saw him swim by although she wasn't quite sure who it was. The Lears heard him splashing past the open windows of their living room. The Howlands and the Crosscups were away. After leaving the Howlands' he crossed Ditmar Street and started for the Bunkers', where he could hear, even at that distance, the noise of a party.

The water refracted the sound of voices and laughter and seemed to suspend it in midair. The Bunkers' pool was on a rise and he climbed some stairs to a terrace where twenty-five or thirty men and women were drinking. The only person in the water was Rusty Towers, who floated there on a rubber raft. Oh how bonny and lush were the banks of the Lucinda River! Prosperous men and women gathered by the sapphire-colored waters while caterer's men in white coats passed them cold gin. Overhead a red de Haviland trainer was circling around and around and around in the sky with something like the glee of a child in a swing. Ned felt a passing affection for the scene, a tenderness for the gathering, as if it was something he might touch. In the distance he heard thunder. As soon as Enid Bunker saw him she began to scream: "Oh look who's here! What a marvelous surprise! When Lucinda said that you couldn't come I thought I'd die." She made her way to him through the crowd, and when they had finished kissing she led him to the bar, a progress that was slowed by the fact that he stopped to kiss eight or ten other women and shake the hands of as many men. A smiling bartender he had seen at a hundred parties gave him a gin and tonic and he stood by the bar for a moment, anxious not to get stuck in any conversation that would delay his voyage. When he seemed about to be surrounded he dove in and swam close to the side to avoid colliding with Rusty's raft. At the far end of the pool he bypassed the Tomlinsons with a broad smile and jogged up the garden path. The gravel cut his feet but this was the only unpleasantness. The party was confined to the pool, and as he went toward the house he heard the brilliant, watery sound of voices fade, heard the noise of a radio from the Bunkers' kitchen, where someone was listening to a ballgame. Sunday afternoon. He made his way through the parked cars and down the grassy border of their driveway to Alewives' Lane. He did not want to be seen on the road in his bathing trunks but there was no traffic and he made the short distance to the Levys' driveway, marked with a private property sign and a green tube for the New York Times. All the doors and windows of the big house were open but there were no signs of life; not even a dog barked. He went around the side of the house to the pool and saw that the Levys had only recently left. Glasses and bottles and dishes of nuts were on a table at the deep end, where there was a bathhouse or gazebo, hung with Japanese lanterns. After swimming the pool he got himself a glass and poured a drink. It was his fourth or fifth drink and he had swum nearly half the length of the Lucinda River. He felt tired, clean, and pleased at that moment to be alone; pleased with everything.

It would storm. The stand of cumulus cloud—that city—had risen and darkened, and while he sat there he heard the percussiveness of thunder again. The de Haviland trainer was still circling overhead and it seemed to Ned that he could almost hear the pilot laugh with pleasure in the afternoon; but when there was another peal of thunder he took off for home. A train whistle blew and he wondered what time it had gotten to be. Four? Five? He thought of the provincial station at that hour, where a waiter, his tuxedo concealed by a raincoat, a dwarf with some flowers wrapped in newspaper, and a woman who had been crying would be waiting for the local. It was suddenly growing dark; it was that moment when the pin-headed birds seem to organize their song into some acute and knowledgeable recognition of the storm's approach. Then there was a fine noise of rushing water from the crown of an oak at his back, as if a spigot there had been turned. Then the noise of fountains came from the crowns of all the tall trees. Why did he love storms, what was the meaning of his excitement when the door sprang open and the rain wind fled rudely up the stairs, why had the simple task of shutting the windows of an old house seemed fitting and urgent, why did the first watery notes of a storm wind have for him the unmistakable sound of good news, cheer, glad tidings? Then there was an explosion, a smell of cordite, and rain lashed the Japanese lanterns that Mrs. Levy had bought in Kyoto the year before last, or was it the year before that?

He stayed in the Levys' gazebo until the storm had passed. The rain had cooled the air and he shivered. The force of the wind had stripped a maple of its red and yellow leaves and scattered them over the grass and the water. Since it was midsummer the tree must be blighted, and yet he felt a peculiar sadness at this sign of autumn. He braced his shoulders, emptied his glass, and started for the Welchers' pool. This meant crossing the Lindleys' riding ring and he was surprised to find it overgrown with grass and all the jumps dismantled. He wondered if the Lindleys had sold their horses or gone away for the summer and put them out to board. He seemed to remember having heard something about the Lindleys and their horses but the memory was unclear. On he went, barefoot through the wet grass, to the Welchers', where he found their pool was dry.

This breach in his chain of water disappointed him absurdly, and he felt like some explorer who seeks a torrential headwater and finds a dead stream. He was disappointed and mystified. It was common enough to go away for the summer but no one ever drained his pool. The Welchers had definitely gone away. The pool furniture was folded, stacked, and covered with a tarpaulin. The bathhouse was locked. All the windows of the house were shut, and when he went around to the driveway in front he saw a for-sale sign nailed to a tree. When had he last heard from the Welchers—when, that is, had he and Lucinda last regretted an invitation to dine with them? It seemed only a week or so ago. Was his memory failing or had he so disciplined it in the repression of unpleasant facts that he had damaged his sense of the truth? Then in the distance he heard the sound of a tennis game. This cheered him, cleared away all his apprehensions and let him regard the overcast sky and the cold air with indifference. This was the day that Neddy Merrill swam across the county. That was the day! He started off then for his most difficult portage.

Had you gone for a Sunday afternoon ride that day you might have seen him, close to naked, standing on the shoulders of route 424, waiting for a chance to cross. You might have wondered if he was the victim of foul play, had his car broken down, or was he merely a fool. Standing barefoot in the deposits of the highway—beer cans, rags, and blowout patches—exposed to all kinds of ridicule, he seemed pitiful. He had known when he started that this was a part of his journey—it had been on his maps—but confronted with the lines of traffic, worming through the summery light, he found himself unprepared. He was laughed at, jeered at, a beer can was thrown at him, and he had no dignity or humor to bring to the situation. He could have gone back, back to the Westerhazys', where Lucinda would still be sitting in the sun. He had signed nothing, vowed nothing, pledged nothing, not even to himself. Why, believing as he did, that all human obduracy was susceptible to common sense, was he unable to turn back? Why was he determined to complete his journey even if it meant putting his life in danger? At what point had this prank, this joke, this piece of horseplay become serious? He could not go back, he could not even recall with any clearness the green water at the Westerhazys', the sense of inhaling the day's components, the friendly and relaxed voices saying that they had drunk too much. In the space of an hour, more or less, he had covered a distance that made his return impossible.

An old man, tooling down the highway at fifteen miles an hour, let him get to the middle of the road, where there was a grass divider. Here he was exposed to the ridicule of the northbound traffic, but after ten or fifteen minutes he was able to cross. From here he had only a short walk to the Recreation Center at the edge of the Village of Lancaster, where there were some handball courts and a public pool.

The effect of the water on voices, the illusion of brilliance and suspense, was the same here as it had been at the Bunkers' but the sounds here were louder, harsher, and more shrill, and as soon as he entered the crowded enclosure he was confronted with regimentation. "ALL SWIMMERS MUST TAKE A SHOWER BEFORE USING THE POOL. ALL SWIMMERS MUST USE THE FOOTBATH. ALL SWIMMERS MUST WEAR THEIR IDENTIFICATION DISKS." He took a shower, washed his feet in a cloudy and bitter solution and made his way to the edge of the water. It stank of chlorine and looked to him like a sink. A pair of life-guards in a pair of towers blew police whistles at what seemed to be regular intervals and abused the swimmers through a public address system. Neddy remembered the sapphire water at the Bunkers' with longing and thought that he might contaminate himself—damage his own prosperousness and charm—by swimming in this murk, but he reminded himself that he was an explorer, a pilgrim, and that this was merely a stagnant bend in the Lucinda River. He dove, scowling with distaste, into the chlorine and had to swim with his head above water to avoid collisions, but even so he was bumped into, splashed and jostled. When he got to the shallow end both lifeguards were shouting at him: "Hey, you, you without the identification disk, get outa the water." He did, but they had no way of pursuing him and he went through the reek of suntan oil and chlorine out through the hurricane fence and passed the handball courts. By crossing the road he entered the wooded part of the Halloran estate. The woods were not cleared and the footing was treacherous and difficult until he reached the lawn and the clipped beech hedge that encircled their pool.

The Hallorans were friends, an elderly couple of enormous wealth who seemed to bask in the suspicion that they might be Communists. They were zealous reformers but they were not Communists, and yet when they were accused, as they sometimes were, of subversion, it seemed to gratify and excite them. Their beech hedge was yellow and he guessed this had been blighted like the Levys' maple. He called hullo, hullo, to warn the Hallorans of his approach, to palliate his invasion of their privacy. The Hallorans, for reasons that had never been explained to him, did not wear bathing suits. No explanations were in order, really. Their nakedness was a detail in their uncompromising zeal for reform and he stepped politely out of his trunks before he went through the opening in the hedge.

Mrs. Halloran, a stout woman with white hair and a serene face, was reading the Times. Mr. Halloran was taking beech leaves out of the water with a scoop. They seemed not surprised or displeased to see him. Their pool was perhaps the oldest in the county, a fieldstone rectangle, fed by a brook. It had no filter or pump and its waters were the opaque gold of the stream.

"I'm swimming across the county," Ned said.

"Why, I didn't know one could," exclaimed Mrs. Halloran.

"Well, I've made it from the Westerhazys," Ned said. "That must be about four miles."

He left his trunks at the deep end, walked to the shallow end, and swam this stretch. As he was pulling himself out of the water he heard Mrs. Halloran say: "We've been terribly sorry to hear about all your misfortunes, Neddy."

"My misfortunes?" Ned asked. "I don't know what you mean."

"Why, we heard that you'd sold the house and that your poor children . . ."

"I don't recall having sold the house," Ned said, "and the girls are at home."

"Yes," Mrs. Halloran sighed. "Yes . . ." Her voice filled the air with an unseasonable melancholy and Ned spoke briskly. "Thank you for the swim."

"Well, have a nice trip," said Mrs. Halloran.

Beyond the hedge he pulled on his trunks and fastened them. They were loose and he wondered if, during the space of an afternoon, he could have lost some weight. He was cold and he was tired and the naked Hallorans and their dark water had depressed him. The swim was too much for his strength but how could he have guessed this, sliding down the banister that morning and sitting in the Westerhazys' sun? His arms were lame. His legs felt rubbery and ached at the joints. The worst of it was the cold in his bones and the feeling that he might never be warm again. Leaves were falling down around him and he smelled woodsmoke on the wind. Who would be burning wood at this time of year?

He needed a drink. Whiskey would warm him, pick him up, carry him through the last of his journey, refresh his feeling that it was original and valorous to swim across the county. Channel swimmers took brandy. He needed a stimulant. He crossed the lawn in front of the Hallorans' house and went down a little path to where they had built a house for their only daughter Helen and her husband Eric Sachs. The Sachses' pool was small and he found Helen and her husband there.

"Oh, Neddy," Helen said. "Did you lunch at Mother's?"

"Not really," Ned said. "I did stop to see your parents." This seemed to be explanation enough. "I'm terribly sorry to break in on you like this but I've taken a chill and I wonder if you'd give me a drink."

"Why, I'd love to," Helen said, "but there hasn't been anything in this house to drink since Eric's operation. That was three years ago."

Was he losing his memory, had his gift for concealing painful facts let him forget that he had sold his house, that his children were in trouble, and that his friend had been ill? His eyes slipped from Eric's face to his abdomen, where he saw three pale, sutured scars, two of them at least a foot long. Gone was his navel, and what, Neddy thought, would the roving hand, bed-checking one's gifts at 3 A.M. make of a belly with no navel, no link to birth, this breach in the succession?

"I'm sure you can get a drink at the Biswangers'," Helen said. "They're having an enormous do. You can hear it from here. Listen!"

She raised her head and from across the road, the lawns, the gardens, the woods, the fields, he heard again the brilliant noise of voices over water. "Well, I'll get wet," he said, still feeling that he had no freedom of choice about his means of travel. He dove into the Sachses' cold water and, gasping, close to drowning, made his way from one end of the pool to the other. "Lucinda and I want terribly to see you," he said over his shoulder, his face set toward the Biswangers'. "We're sorry it's been so long and we'll call you very soon."

He crossed some fields to the Biswangers' and the sounds of revelry there. They would be honored to give him a drink, they would be happy to give him a drink, they would in fact be lucky to give him a drink. The Biswangers invited him and Lucinda for dinner four times a year, six weeks in advance. They were always rebuffed and yet they continued to send out their invitations, unwilling to comprehend the rigid and undemocratic realities of their society. They were the sort of people who discussed the price of things at cocktails, exchanged market tips during dinner, and after dinner told dirty stories to mixed company. They did not belong to Neddy's set—they were not even on Lucinda's Christmas card list. He went toward their pool with feelings of indifference, charity, and some unease, since it seemed to be getting dark and these were the longest days of the year. The party when he joined it was noisy and large. Grace Biswanger was the kind of hostess who asked the optometrist, the veterinarian, the real-estate dealer and the dentist. No one was swimming and the twilight, reflected on the water of the pool, had a wintry gleam. There was a bar and he started for this. When Grace Biswanger saw him she came toward him, not affectionately as he had every right to expect, but belliciously.

"Why, this party has everything," she said loudly, "including a gate crasher."

She could not deal him a social blow—there was no question about this and he did not flinch. “As a gate crasher,” he asked politely, “do I rate a drink?”

“Suit yourself,” she said. “You don’t seem to pay much attention to invitations.”

She turned her back on him and joined some guests, and he went to the bar and ordered a whiskey. The bartender served him but he served him rudely. His was a world in which the caterer’s men kept the social score, and to be rebuffed by a part-time barkeep meant that he had suffered some loss of social esteem. Or perhaps the man was new and uninformed. Then he heard Grace at his back say: “They went for broke overnight—nothing but income—and he showed up drunk one Sunday and asked us to loan him five thousand dollars. . . .” She was always talking about money. It was worse than eating your peas off a knife. He dove into the pool, swam its length and went away.

The next pool on his list, the last but two, belonged to his old mistress, Shirley Adams. If he had suffered any injuries at the Biswangers’ they would be cured here. Love—sexual roughhouse in fact—was the supreme elixir, the painkiller, the brightly colored pill that would put the spring back into his step, the joy of life in his heart. They had had an affair last week, last month, last year. He couldn’t remember. It was he who had broken it off, his was the upper hand, and he stepped through the gate of the wall that surrounded her pool with nothing so considered as self-confidence. It seemed in a way to be his pool as the lover, particularly the illicit lover, enjoys the possessions of his mistress with an authority unknown to holy matrimony. She was there, her hair the color of brass, but her figure, at the edge of the lighted, cerulean water, excited in him no profound memories. It had been, he thought, a light-hearted affair, although she had wept when he broke it off. She seemed confused to see him and he wondered if she was still wounded. Would she, God forbid, weep again?

“What do you want?” she asked.

“I’m swimming across the county.”

“Good Christ. Will you ever grow up?”

“What’s the matter?”

“If you’ve come here for money,” she said, “I won’t give you another cent.”

“You could give me a drink.”

“I could but I won’t. I’m not alone.”

“Well, I’m on my way.”

He dove in and swam the pool, but when he tried to haul himself up onto the curb he found that the strength in his arms and his shoulders had gone, and he paddled to the ladder and climbed out. Looking over his shoulder he saw, in the lighted bathhouse, a young man. Going out onto the dark lawn he smelled chrysanthemums or marigolds—some stubborn autumnal fragrance—on the night air, strong as gas. Looking overhead he saw that the stars had come out, but why should he seem to see Andromeda, Cepheus, and Cassiopeia? What had become of the constellations of midsummer? He began to cry.

It was probably the first time in his adult life that he had ever cried, certainly the first time in his life that he had ever felt so miserable, cold, tired, and bewildered. He could not understand the rudeness of the caterer’s barkeep or the rudeness of a mistress who had come to him on her knees and showered his trousers with tears. He had swum too long, he had been immersed too long, and his nose and his throat were sore from the water. What he needed then was a drink, some company, and some clean dry clothes, and while he could have cut directly across the road to his home he went on to the Gilmartins' pool. Here, for the first time in his life, he did not dive but went down the steps into the icy water and swam a hobbled side stroke that he might have learned as a youth. He staggered with fatigue on his way to the Clydes' and paddled the length of their pool, stopping again and again with his hand on the curb to rest. He climbed up the ladder and wondered if he had the strength to get home. He had done what he wanted, he had swum the county, but he was so stupefied with exhaustion that his triumph seemed vague. Stooped, holding onto the gateposts for support, he turned up the driveway of his house.

The place was dark. Was it so late that they had all gone to bed? Had Lucinda stayed at the Westerhazys' for supper? Had the girls joined her there or gone someplace else? Hadn't they agreed, as they usually did on Sunday, to regret all their invitations and stay at home? He tried the garage doors to see what cars were in but the doors were locked and rust came off the handles onto his hands. Going toward the house, he saw that the force of the thunderstorm had knocked one of the rain gutters loose. It hung down over the front door like an umbrella rib, but it could be fixed in the morning. The house was locked, and he thought that the stupid cook or the stupid maid must have locked the place up until he remembered that it had been some time since they had employed a maid or a cook. He shouted, pounded on the door, tried to force it with his shoulder, and then, looking in at the windows, saw that the place was empty.

1964

ROBERT HAYDEN

1913–1980

“Hayden is by far the best chronicler and rememberer of the African American heritage in these Americas that I know of,” the poet Michael Harper, whose own sense of history is indebted to Robert Hayden’s work, has said. Hayden’s poems save what has vanished, what has been lost to standard histories, like a 1920s prizefighter from the Midwest (“Free Fantasia: Tiger Flowers”) or a miner trapped in Crystal Cave (“Beginnings, V”). He records the loss of what others never noticed as missing, and in their recovery he discovers a significance in the passing moment, the passed-over figure, the inarticulate gesture, which lasts through time. Always, in his words, “opposed to the chauvinistic and the doctrinaire” in art, he cherished the freedom of the poet to write about whatever seized the imagination. But his imagination was in its nature elegiac and historical. As he remembers and re-creates the African American heritage, he speaks to the struggles of the individual spirit for freedom and to painful self-divisions known to the people of many times and places. But if the circumstances he confronts in his poems are often harsh, his work captures the energy and joyfulness that make survival possible.

Born in Detroit, Michigan, Hayden grew up in a poor neighborhood called by its inhabitants, with affectionate irony, "Paradise Valley." His powerful sequence Elegies for Paradise Valley (1978) resurrects the neighborhood in its racial and ethnic mix. Memory for Hayden is an act of love that leads to self-awareness; in this sequence and in poems like "Those Winter Sundays," he writes about his own past, confronts its pain, and preserves its sustaining moments of happiness.

Hayden had a deep understanding of the conflicts that divide the self. His family history gave him an early acquaintance with such self-division: his parents' marriage ended when he was young, and his mother left him in the care of foster parents (whose surname he adopted) when she left Detroit to look for work. He remained with the Haydens even after his mother returned to Detroit when he was a teenager and lived for a period with his foster family until conflict arose between her and his foster mother. "I lived in the midst of so much turmoil all the time I didn't know if I loved or hated," he once said. As an African American and as a poet Hayden also lived between worlds. He courageously maintained his sense of vocation through years of critical neglect and amid the demands of full-time teaching at Fisk University from 1946 to 1968. He published his first book, Heart-Shape in the Dust, in 1940, but his mature work did not appear in quantity until his volume Ballad of Remembrance (1962). At the same time his belief that the poet should not be restricted by any set of themes, racial or otherwise, and the highly formal quality of his work led to criticism by some young African American writers in the 1960s. But Hayden never abandoned his belief in the power of art to speak universally. In a 1974 interview he told Dennis Gendron of rereading Yeats's poem "Easter 1916" in the wake of the riots in Detroit—"that is the kind of poetry I want to write," he said, in admiration of the ways Yeats conceived a particular historical and political moment so that it speaks across time and place.

In fact, Hayden did himself write that kind of poetry. His most famous poem, "Middle Passage," demonstrates his transfiguring imagination and the knowledge of historical documents, which began early in his career. In 1936, after leaving college because of increasingly difficult economic conditions, Hayden joined the Federal Writers Project of the Works Progress Administration, and for two years he researched the history of abolition movements and the Underground Railroad in Michigan. "Middle Passage" is a collage of accounts of the slave ships that transported men and women from Africa into slavery in the New World. Through the multiple voices in the poem, Hayden lets the accounts of those who participated in (and profited from) the slave trade reveal the evidence of their own damnation. The blindness that attacks one of the ships becomes a symbol of the devastating suffering of those transported into slavery and of the moral blindness everywhere evident in the traders' accounts. The collage technique allows Hayden to suggest the fragmentation of the story; the silences in the poem evoke the missing voices of those who suffered and died on the voyages or in the intolerable conditions of slavery. At the heart of the poem is the account of a rebellion led by one of the slaves (Cinquez) on the ship Amistad. Cinquez is one of several figures in Hayden's poems who dramatize "The deep immortal human wish / the timeless will" ("Middle Passage") that for Hayden is the indomitable yearning for freedom. This "timeless will" and struggle also appear in his poems about Harriet Tubman ("Runagate Runagate"), Nat Turner, Frederick Douglass, Phillis Wheatley, and the later figures Paul Robeson and Bessie Smith.

Hayden's experiment with collage technique in "Middle Passage" connects him to modernist poets like T. S. Eliot and William Carlos Williams and to an African American tradition acutely aware of the power of voice. He continued to experiment with poetic form and with the creation of different voices, always testing the possibilities of craft and forging a language to express what he knew and felt. His sequences Beginnings and Elegies for Paradise Valley demonstrate his formal originality, as does his late poem “American Journal,” with its long lines and its approximation to prose. Hayden loved language and was unafraid to be lushly descriptive as well as to be precisely imagistic. His work summons us to notice the world as we had not before and offers us candor, clear-sightedness, and a transforming gaiety.

From 1968 until his death, Hayden was professor of English at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. In 1976 he became the first African American to be appointed poetry consultant to the Library of Congress, the position now known as poet laureate of the United States.

Middle Passage¹

I

*Jesús, Estrella, Esperanza, Mercy*²

Sails flashing to the wind like weapons, sharks following the moans the fever and the dying;
horror the corposant and compass rose.³

Middle Passage: 5
voyage through death
to life upon these shores.

“10 April 1800—
Blacks rebellious. Crew uneasy. Our linguist says their moaning is a prayer for death, 10 ours and their own. Some try to starve themselves.
Lost three this morning leaped with crazy laughter to the waiting sharks, sang as they went under.”

Desire, Adventure, Tartar, Ann:

Standing to America, bringing home 15
black gold, black ivory, black seed.

*Deep in the festering hold thy father lies,
of his bones New England pews are made,
those are altar lights that were his eyes.*⁴

Jesus Saviour Pilot Me 20
Over Life's Tempestuous Sea⁵

We pray that Thou wilt grant, O Lord, safe passage to our vessels bringing heathen souls unto Thy chastening.

1. Main route for the slave trade in the Atlantic between Africa and the West Indies.

2. Names of slave ships. (Estrella and Esperanza are Spanish for “Star” and “Hope,” respectively.)

3. Circle printed on a map showing compass directions. “Corposant”: a fiery luminousness that can appear on the decks of ships during electrical storms.

4. “Full fathom five thy father lies; / Of his bones are coral made; / Those are pearls that were his eyes” (Shakespeare’s Tempest 1.2.400–402). The sprite Ariel is singing about the supposed death by drowning of the king of Naples.

5. Words from a Protestant hymn.

Jesus Saviour

25

“8 bells. I cannot sleep, for I am sick with fear, but writing eases fear a little since still my eyes can see these words take shape upon the page & so I write, as one would turn to exorcism. 4 days scudding, 30 but now the sea is calm again. Misfortune follows in our wake like sharks (our grinning tutelary gods). Which one of us has killed an albatross?⁶ A plague among our blacks—Ophthalmia: blindness—& we 35 have jettisoned the blind to no avail.
 It spreads, the terrifying sickness spreads.
 Its claws have scratched sight from the Capt.’s eyes
 & there is blindness in the fo’c’sle⁷
 & we must sail 3 weeks before we come 40 to port.”

What port awaits us, Davy Jones’ or home? I’ve heard of slavers drifting, drifting, playthings of wind and storm and chance, their crews gone blind, the jungle hatred 45 crawling up on deck.

Thou Who Walked On Galilee

“Deponent further sayeth The Bella J left the Guinea Coast with cargo of five hundred blacks and odd 50 for the barracoons⁸ of Florida:

“That there was hardly room ’tween-decks for half the sweltering cattle stowed spoon-fashion there; that some went mad of thirst and tore their flesh and sucked the blood: 55

“That Crew and Captain lusted with the comeliest of the savage girls kept naked in the cabins;
 that there was one they called The Guinea Rose and they cast lots and fought to lie with her:

“That when the Bo’s’n piped all hands,⁹ the flames 60 spreading from starboard already were beyond control, the negroes howling and their chains entangled with the flames:

6. A bird of good omen; to kill one is an unlucky and impious act (as in Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s Rime of the Ancient Mariner).

7. Short for forecassle, the place in a ship where sailors are quartered.

8. Barracks or enclosures for slaves.

9. I.e., when the boatswain (petty officer aboard a ship) signaled to summon all the crew on deck.

“That the burning blacks could not be reached, that the Crew abandoned ship, 65 leaving their shrieking negresses behind, that the Captain perished drunken with the wenches:

“Further Deponent sayeth not.”

Pilot Oh Pilot Me

II

Aye, lad, and I have seen those factories, 70
 Gambia, Rio Pongo, Calabar;¹ have watched the artful mongos² baiting traps of war wherein the victor and the vanquished

Were caught as prizes for our barracoons.
 Have seen the nigger kings whose vanity 75
 and greed turned wild black hides of Fellatah,
 Mandingo, Ibo, Kru³ to gold for us.

And there was one—King Anthracite we named him—fetish face beneath French parasols of brass and orange velvet, impudent mouth 80 whose cups were carven skulls of enemies:

He'd honor us with drum and feast and conjo⁴ and palm-oil-glistening wenches deft in love,
 and for tin crowns that shone with paste,
 red calico and German-silver trinkets 85

Would have the drums talk war and send his warriors to burn the sleeping villages and kill the sick and old and lead the young in coffles⁵ to our factories.

Twenty years a trader, twenty years, 90 for there was wealth aplenty to be harvested from those black fields, and I'd be trading still but for the fevers melting down my bones.

III

Shuttles in the rocking loom of history, the dark ships move, the dark ships move, 95 their bright ironical names like jests of kindness on a murderer's mouth;

1. A city in southeast Nigeria. Gambia is a river and nation in West Africa. Rio Pongo is a watercourse, dry for most of the year, in East Africa.
 2. I.e., Africans.

3. African tribes.

4. Dance.

5. Train of slaves fastened together.

plough through thrashing glister toward fata morgana's lucent melting shore, weave toward New World littorals⁶ that are mirage and myth and actual shore. 100

Voyage through death,
 voyage whose chartings are unlove.

A charnel stench, effluvium of living death spreads outward from the hold,
 where the living and the dead, the horribly dying, lie interlocked, lie foul with blood and excrement. 105

*Deep in the festering hold thy father lies,
 the corpse of mercy rots with him,
 rats eat love's rotten gelid eyes.* 110

But, oh, the living look at you with human eyes whose suffering accuses you, whose hatred reaches through the swill of dark to strike you like a leper's claw.

*You cannot stare that hatred down or chain the fear that stalks the watches and breathes on you its fetid scorching breath; cannot kill the deep immortal human wish,
 the timeless will.* 115

"But for the storm that flung up barriers of wind and wave, The Amistad,⁷ señores, would have reached the port of Príncipe in two, three days at most; but for the storm we should have been prepared for what befell. 120

Swift as the puma's leap it came. There was that interval of moonless calm filled only with the water's and the rigging's usual sounds, then sudden movement, blows and snarling cries and they had fallen on us with machete and marlinspike. It was as though the very air, the night itself were striking us. 130

Exhausted by the rigors of the storm, we were no match for them. Our men went down before the murderous Africans. Our loyal Celestino ran from below with gun and lantern and I saw, before the cane-knife's wounding flash, Cinquez, that surly brute who calls himself a prince, 135

6. Coastal regions. "Fata morgana": mirage.

7. A Spanish ship—the name means "Friendship"—that carried fifty-three illegally obtained slaves out of Havana, Cuba, in July 1839. The slaves revolted and seized the ship.

directing, urging on the ghastly work.⁸
 He hacked the poor mulatto down, and then 140 he turned on me. The decks were slippery when daylight finally came. It sickens me to think of what I saw, of how these apes threw overboard the butchered bodies of our men, true Christians all, like so much jetsam. 145 Enough, enough. The rest is quickly told:
 Cinquez was forced to spare the two of us
 you see to steer the ship to Africa, and we like phantoms doomed to rove the sea voyaged east by day and west by night, 150 deceiving them, hoping for rescue, prisoners on our own vessel, till at length we drifted to the shores of this your land, America, where we were freed from our unspeakable misery. Now we 155 demand, good sirs, the extradition of Cinquez and his accomplices to La Havana.⁹ And it distresses us to know there are so many here who seem inclined to justify the mutiny of these blacks. 160
 We find it paradoxical indeed that you whose wealth, whose tree of liberty are rooted in the labor of your slaves should suffer the august John Quincy Adams to speak with so much passion of the right 165 of chattel slaves to kill their lawful masters and with his Roman rhetoric weave a hero's garland for Cinquez.¹ I tell you that we are determined to return to Cuba with our slaves and there see justice done. Cinquez— 170 or let us say 'the Prince'—Cinquez shall die."

The deep immortal human wish,
 the timeless will:

Cinquez its deathless primaveral image, life that transfigures many lives. 175

Voyage through death
 to life upon these shores.

1962

8. During the mutiny the Africans, led by a man called Cinqué, or Cinquez, killed the captain, his slave Celestino, and the mate, but spared the two slave owners.

9. After two months the Amistad reached Long Island Sound, where it was detained by the American ship Washington, the slaves were imprisoned, and the owners were freed. The owners began litigation to return the slaves to Havana to be tried for murder.

1. The case reached the Supreme Court in 1841; the Africans were defended by former president John Quincy Adams, and the court released the thirty-seven survivors to return to Africa.

Homage to the Empress of the Blues¹

Because there was a man somewhere in a candystripe silk shirt, gracile and dangerous as a jaguar and because a woman moaned for him in sixty-watt gloom and mourned him Faithless Love
 Twotiming Love Oh Love Oh Careless Aggravating Love,

She came out on the stage in yards of pearls, emerging like 5 a favorite scenic view, flashed her golden smile and sang.

Because grey laths began somewhere to show from underneath torn hurdygurdy² lithographs of dollfaced heaven; and because there were those who feared alarming fists of snow on the door and those who feared the riot-squad of statistics, 10

She came out on the stage in ostrich feathers, beaded satin, and shone that smile on us and sang.

1962

Those Winter Sundays

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him. 5

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
 When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
 and slowly I would rise and dress,
 fearing the chronic angers of that house,

Speaking indifferently to him, 10 who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
 What did I know, what did I know of love's austere and lonely offices?

1962

1. Bessie Smith (1895–1937), one of the greatest American blues singers. Her flamboyant style, which grew out of the black vaudeville tradition, made her popular in the 1920s.

2. A disreputable kind of dance hall, so called because of the hurdy-gurdies (barrel organs) that provided the music for dancing. "Laths": the strips of wood that form a backing for wall plaster.

Free Fantasia: Tiger Flowers¹

for Michael

The sporting people along St. Antoine—² that scufflers'
 paradise of ironies—bet salty money 5
 on his righteous hook and jab.

I was a boy then, running (unbeknownst to Pa)
 errands for Miss Jackie 10 and Stack-o'-Diamonds' Eula Mae.
 . . . Their perfumes,
 rouged Egyptian faces.
 Their pianolas jazzing.

O Creole babies, 15
 Dixie odalisques,³ speeding through cutglass
 dark to see the macho angel trick you'd never turn, his bluesteel prowess 20
 in the ring.

Hardshell believers amen'd the wreck
 as God A'mighty's will. I'd thought 25
 such gaiety could not die. Nor could our elegant avenger.

The Virgin Forest
 by Rousseau⁴— 30
 its psychedelic flowers
 towering, its deathless dark dream figure death the leopard claws—I choose it 35
 now as elegy
 for Tiger Flowers.

1975

1. A midwestern boxer (1895–1927) who in 1926 became the first African American middleweight champion.

2. Street in Detroit, Michigan.

3. Female slaves or concubines in a harem.

4. Henri Rousseau (1844–1910), French painter known for jungle scenes and exotic colors.

RANDALL JARRELL

1914–1965

“Monstrously knowing and monstrously innocent. . . . A Wordsworth with the obsession of a Lewis Carroll”—so Robert Lowell once described his friend and fellow poet Randall Jarrell. Jarrell was a teacher and a critic as well as a poet, and for many writers of his generation—Lowell, Delmore Schwartz, and John Berryman among them—he was the critic whose taste was most unerring, who seemed to know instantly what was genuine and what was not. An extraordinary teacher, he loved the activity of teaching, both in and out of the classroom; “the gods who had taken away the poet’s audience had given him students,” he once said. The novelist Peter Taylor recalls that when he came to Vanderbilt University as a freshman in the mid-1930s, Jarrell, then a graduate student, had already turned the literary students into disciples; he held court discussing Chekhov on the sidelines of touch football games. For all his brilliance Jarrell was, at heart, democratic. Believing that poetry belongs to every life, his teaching, his literary criticism, and his poetry aimed to recapture and reeducate a general audience lost to poetry in an age of specialization. Jarrell’s interests were democratic as well, and he had a lifelong fascination with popular culture. Witty and incisive, Jarrell could be intimidating; at the same time he remained deeply in touch with childhood’s mystery and enchantment. It was as if, his close friend the philosopher Hannah Arendt once said, he “had emerged from the enchanted forests.” He loved fairy tales, translated a number of them, and wrote several books for children, among them The Bat-Poet (1964). The childlike quality of the person informs Jarrell’s poems as well; he is unembarrassed by the adult heart still in thrall to childhood’s wishes.

Jarrell was born in Nashville, Tennessee, but spent much of his childhood in Long Beach, California. After his parents divorced when he was eleven, he remained for a year with his grandparents in Hollywood, then returned to live with his mother in Nashville. He majored in psychology at Vanderbilt and stayed on there to do graduate work in English. In 1937 he left Nashville to teach at Kenyon College (Gambier, Ohio) at the invitation of his old Vanderbilt professor John Crowe Ransom, the New Critic and Fugitive poet. From that time on Jarrell almost always had some connection with a university: after Kenyon, the University of Texas, Sarah Lawrence College, and from 1947 until his death, the Women’s College of the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. But, as suggested by his novel Pictures from an Institution (1954) with its mixed satiric and tender views of academic life, he was never satisfied with a cloistered education. As poetry editor of The Nation (1946), and then in a series of essays and reviews collected as Poetry and the Age (1953), he introduced readers to the work of his contemporaries—Elizabeth Bishop, Robert Lowell, John Berryman, the William Carlos Williams of Paterson—and influentially reassessed the reputations of Walt Whitman and Robert Frost.

Among the poets who emerged after World War II, Jarrell stands out for his colloquial plainness. While others—Richard Wilbur and the early Robert Lowell, for example—were writing highly structured poems with complicated imagery, Jarrell’s work feels and sounds close to what he calls in one poem the “dailiness of life” (“Well Water”). He is master of the everyday heartbreak and identifies with ordinary forms of loneliness. Jarrell’s gift of imaginative sympathy appears in the treatment of soldiers in his war poems, the strongest to come out of World War II. He had been trained as an Army Air Force pilot and after that as a control operator, and he had a sense of the war's special casualties. With their understanding of soldiers as both destructive and innocent at the same time, these poems make his volumes Little Friend, Little Friend (1945) and Losses (1948) powerful and moving. Jarrell also empathized with the dreams, loneliness, and disappointments of women, whose perspective he often adopted, as in the title poem of his collection The Woman at the Washington Zoo (1960) and his poem "Next Day."

The Gotham Book Mart. This midtown Manhattan store was famous for its literary eminences. A December 1948 party drew a roomful of midcentury writers, including, clockwise, W. H. Auden on the ladder, Elizabeth Bishop, Delmore Schwartz, Randall Jarrell, Charles Henri Ford, William Rose Benét, Stephen Spender, Marya Zaturenska, Horace Gregory, Tennessee Williams, Richard Eberhart, Gore Vidal, and José García Villa.

Against the blasted or unrealized possibilities of adult life Jarrell often poised the rich mysteries of childhood. The title poem of his last book, The Lost World (1965), looks back to his Los Angeles playtime, the movie sets and plaster dinosaurs and pterodactyls against whose eternal lighthearted presence he measures his own aging. The poem has Jarrell's characteristic sense of loss but also his capacity for a mysterious happiness, which animates the poem even as he holds "nothing" in his hands.

Jarrell suffered a nervous breakdown in February 1965, but returned to teaching that fall. In October he was struck by a car and died. His Complete Poems were published posthumously (1969), as were a translation of Goethe's Faust, Part I, in preparation at his death, and two books of essays, The Third Book of Criticism (1969) and Kipling, Auden & Co. (1980).

90 North¹

At home, in my flannel gown, like a bear to its floe,
 I clambered to bed; up the globe's impossible sides
 I sailed all night—till at last, with my black beard,
 My furs and my dogs, I stood at the northern pole.

There in the childish night my companions lay frozen, 5
 The stiff furs knocked at my starveling throat,
 And I gave my great sigh: the flakes came huddling,
 Were they really my end? In the darkness I turned to my rest.

—Here, the flag snaps in the glare and silence
 Of the unbroken ice. I stand here, 10
 The dogs bark, my beard is black, and I stare
 At the North Pole . . .

And now what? Why, go back.

Turn as I please, my step is to the south.
 The world—my world spins on this final point
 Of cold and wretchedness: all lines, all winds 15
 End in this whirlpool I at last discover.

And it is meaningless. In the child's bed
 After the night's voyage, in that warm world
 Where people work and suffer for the end
 That crowns the pain—in that Cloud-Cuckoo-Land² 20

I reached my North and it had meaning.
 Here at the actual pole of my existence,
 Where all that I have done is meaningless,
 Where I die or live by accident alone—

Where, living or dying, I am still alone; 25
 Here where North, the night, the berg of death
 Crowd me out of the ignorant darkness,
 I see at last that all the knowledge

I wrung from the darkness—that the darkness flung me—
 Is worthless as ignorance: nothing comes from nothing, 30
 The darkness from the darkness. Pain comes from the darkness
 And we call it wisdom. It is pain.

1942

1. The latitude of the North Pole.

2. A fantasy world; in Aristophanes' comedy The Birds (414 B.C.E.), an imaginary city the cuckoos build in the sky.

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner¹

From my mother's sleep I fell into the State,
 And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
 Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
 I woke to black flak² and the nightmare fighters.
 When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose. 5

1945

Second Air Force

Far off, above the plain the summer dries,
 The great loops of the hangars sway like hills.
 Buses and weariness and loss, the nodding soldiers
 Are wire, the bare frame building, and a pass
 To what was hers; her head hides his square patch 5
 And she thinks heavily: My son is grown.
 She sees a world: sand roads, tar-paper barracks,
 The bubbling asphalt of the runways, sage,
 The dunes rising to the interminable ranges, 10
 The dim flights moving over clouds like clouds.
 The armorers in their patched faded green,
 Sweat-stiffened, banded with brass cartridges,
 Walk to the line; their Fortresses,¹ all tail,
 Stand wrong and flimsy on their skinny legs,
 And the crews climb to them clumsily as bears. 15
 The head withdraws into its hatch (a boy's),
 The engines rise to their blind laboring roar,
 And the green, made beasts run home to air.
 Now in each aspect death is pure.
 (At twilight they wink over men like stars 20
 And hour by hour, through the night, some see
 The great lights floating in—from Mars, from Mars.)
 How emptily the watchers see them gone.

They go, there is silence; the woman and her son
 Stand in the forest of the shadows, and the light 25
 Washes them like water. In the long-sunken city
 Of evening, the sunlight stills like sleep
 The faint wonder of the drowned; in the evening,
 In the last dreaming light, so fresh, so old,

1. A ball turret was a plexiglass sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24 [bomber], and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine-guns and one man, a short, small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine-guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside-down in his little sphere, he looked like the foetus in the womb. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose [Jarrell's note].

 2. Antiaircraft fire.

1. B-17 Flying Fortresses, an American bomber in World War II.

The soldiers pass like beasts, unquestioning, 30
 And the watcher for an instant understands
 What there is then no need to understand;
 But she wakes from her knowledge, and her stare,
 A shadow now, moves emptily among
 The shadows learning in their shadowy fields 35
 The empty missions.

Remembering,
 She hears the bomber calling, *Little Friend!*²
 To the fighter hanging in the hostile sky,
 And sees the ragged flame eat, rib by rib, 40
 Along the metal of the wing into her heart:
 The lives stream out, blossom, and float steadily
 To the flames of the earth, the flames
 That burn like stars above the lands of men.

She saves from the twilight that takes everything 45
 A squadron shipping, in its last parade—
 Its dogs run by it, barking at the band—
 A gunner walking to his barracks, half-asleep,
 Starting at something, stumbling (above, invisible,
 The crews in the steady winter of the sky 50
 Tremble in their wired fur); and feels for them
 The love of life for life. The hopeful cells
 Heavy with someone else's death, cold carriers
 Of someone else's victory, grope past their lives
 Into her own bewilderment: The years meant this? 55

But for them the bombers answer everything.

1945

Next Day

Moving from Cheer to Joy, from Joy to All,
 I take a box
 And add it to my wild rice, my Cornish game hens.
 The slacked or shorted, basketed, identical
 Food-gathering flocks 5
 Are selves I overlook. Wisdom, said William James,¹

Is learning what to overlook. And I am wise
 If that is wisdom.
 Yet somehow, as I buy All from these shelves

2. In "Second Air Force" the woman visiting her son remembers what she has read on the front page of her newspaper the week before, a conversation between a bomber, in flames over Germany, and one of the fighters protecting it: "Then I heard the bomber call me in: 'Little Friend, Little Friend, I got two engines on fire. Can you see me, Little Friend?' I said, 'I'm crossing right over you. Let's go home'" [Jarrell's note].

1. From The Principles of Psychology, by the American philosopher William James (1842–1910).

And the boy takes it to my station wagon,
 What I've become
 Troubles me even if I shut my eyes. 10

When I was young and miserable and pretty
 And poor, I'd wish
 What all girls wish: to have a husband,
 A house and children. Now that I'm old, my wish
 Is womanish: 15
 That the boy putting groceries in my car

See me. It bewilders me he doesn't see me.
 For so many years 20
 I was good enough to eat: the world looked at me
 And its mouth watered. How often they have undressed me,
 The eyes of strangers!
 And, holding their flesh within my flesh, their vile

Imaginings within my imagining, 25
 I too have taken
 The chance of life. Now the boy pats my dog
 And we start home. Now I am good.
 The last mistaken,
 Ecstatic, accidental bliss, the blind 30

Happiness that, bursting, leaves upon the palm
 Some soap and water—
 It was so long ago, back in some Gay
 Twenties, Nineties, I don't know . . . Today I miss
 My lovely daughter 35
 Away at school, my sons away at school,

My husband away at work—I wish for them.
 The dog, the maid,
 And I go through the sure unvarying days
 At home in them. As I look at my life,
 I am afraid 40
 Only that it will change, as I am changing:

I am afraid, this morning, of my face.
 It looks at me
 From the rear-view mirror, with the eyes I hate,
 The smile I hate. Its plain, lined look 45
 Of gray discovery
 Repeats to me: "You're old." That's all, I'm old.

And yet I'm afraid, as I was at the funeral
 I went to yesterday. 50
 My friend's cold made-up face, granite among its flowers,
 Her undressed, operated-on, dressed body
 Were my face and body.
 As I think of her I hear her telling me

How young I seem; I am exceptional; 55
 I think of all I have.
 But really no one is exceptional,
 No one has anything, I'm anybody,
 I stand beside my grave
 Confused with my life, that is commonplace and solitary. 60

1965

Well Water

What a girl called "the dailiness of life" (Adding an errand to your errand. Saying,
 "Since you're up . . ." Making you a means to
 A means to a means to) is well water
 Pumped from an old well at the bottom of the world. 5
 The pump you pump the water from is rusty
 And hard to move and absurd, a squirrel-wheel
 A sick squirrel turns slowly, through the sunny
 Inexorable hours. And yet sometimes
 The wheel turns of its own weight, the rusty 10
 Pump pumps over your sweating face the clear
 Water, cold, so cold! you cup your hands
 And gulp from them the dailiness of life.

1965

Thinking of the Lost World

This spoonful of chocolate tapioca
 Tastes like—like peanut butter, like the vanilla
 Extract Mama told me not to drink.
 Swallowing the spoonful, I have already traveled Through time to my childhood. It puzzles me 5
 That age is like it.
 Come back to that calm country
 Through which the stream of my life first meandered,
 My wife, our cat, and I sit here and see
 Squirrels quarreling in the feeder, a mockingbird 10
 Copying our chipmunk, as our end copies
 Its beginning.
 Back in Los Angeles, we missed
 Los Angeles. The sunshine of the Land
 Of Sunshine is a gray mist now, the atmosphere 15
 Of some factory planet: when you stand and look
 You see a block or two, and your eyes water.
 The orange groves are all cut down . . . My bow
 Is lost, all my arrows are lost or broken,
 My knife is sunk in the eucalyptus tree 20

Too far for even Pop to get it out,
 And the tree's sawed down. It and the stair-sticks
 And the planks of the tree house are all firewood
 Burned long ago; its gray smoke smells of Vicks.¹

Twenty Years After, thirty-five years after, 25
 Is as good as ever—better than ever,
 Now that D'Artagnan² is no longer old—
 Except that it is unbelievable.
 I say to my old self: "I believe. Help thou Mine unbelief." 30

I believe the dinosaur
 Or pterodactyl's married the pink sphinx
 And lives with those Indians in the undiscovered
 Country between California and Arizona
 That the mad girl told me she was princess of— 35
 Looking at me with the eyes of a lion,
 Big, golden, without human understanding,
 As she threw paper-wads from the back seat
 Of the car in which I drove her with her mother
 From the jail in Waycross to the hospital 40
 In Daytona. If I took my eyes from the road
 And looked back into her eyes, the car would—I'd be—

Or if only I could find a crystal set³
 Sometimes, surely, I could still hear their chief
 Reading to them from Dumas or Amazing Stories; 45
 If I could find in some Museum of Cars
 Mama's dark blue Buick, Lucky's electric,
 Couldn't I be driven there? Hold out to them,
 The paraffin half picked out, Tawny's dewclaw—
 And have walk to me from among their wigwams 50
 My tall brown aunt, to whisper to me: "Dead?
 They told you I was dead?"

As if you could die!
 If I never saw you, never again
 Wrote to you, even, after a few years, 55
 How often you've visited me, having put on,
 As a mermaid puts on her sealskin, another face
 And voice, that don't fool me for a minute—
 That are yours for good . . . All of them are gone
 Except for me; and for me nothing is gone— 60
 The chicken's body is still going round
 And round in widening circles, a satellite
 From which, as the sun sets, the scientist bends
 A look of evil on the unsuspecting earth.
 Mama and Pop and Dandeen are still there 65
 In the Gay Twenties.

The Gay Twenties! You say

1. A remedy for colds.

2. Hero of The Three Musketeers (1844), by Alexandre Dumas père; its sequel was Twenty Years

After (1845).

3. Old-fashioned radio receiver, often built by children in the 1920s and '30s.

The Gay Nineties . . . But it's all right: they were gay,
 O so gay! A certain number of years after,
 Any time is Gay, to the new ones who ask: 70
 "Was that the first World War or the second?"
 Moving between the first world and the second,
 I hear a boy call, now that my beard's gray:
 "Santa Claus! Hi, Santa Claus!" It is miraculous
 To have the children call you Santa Claus. 75
 I wave back. When my hand drops to the wheel,
 It is brown and spotted, and its nails are ridged
 Like Mama's. Where's my own hand? My smooth
 White bitten-fingernailed one? I seem to see
 A shape in tennis shoes and khaki riding-pants 80
 Standing there empty-handed; I reach out to it
 Empty-handed, my hand comes back empty,
 And yet my emptiness is traded for its emptiness,
 I have found that Lost World in the Lost and Found
 Columns whose gray illegible advertisements 85
 My soul has memorized world after world:
 LOST—NOTHING. STRAYED FROM NOWHERE. NO REWARD.
 I hold in my own hands, in happiness,
 Nothing: the nothing for which there's no reward.

1965

JOHN BERRYMAN

1914–1972

From a generation whose ideal poem was short, self-contained, and ironic, John Berryman emerged as the author of two extended and passionate works: "Homage to Mistress Bradstreet" and the lyric sequence The Dream Songs. It was as if Berryman needed more space than the single lyric provided—a larger theater in which to play out an unrelenting psychic drama. He had written shorter poems—songs and sonnets—but his discovery of large-scale dramatic situations and strange new voices astonished his contemporaries.

Berryman seemed fated to intense suffering and self-preoccupation. His father, a banker, shot himself outside his son's window when the boy was twelve. The suicide haunted Berryman to the end of his own life, which also came by suicide. Berryman, who was born John Smith, took a new name from his stepfather, also a banker. His childhood was a series of displacements: ten years near McAlester, Oklahoma, then Tampa, Florida, and after his father's suicide, Gloucester, Massachusetts, and New York City. His mother's second marriage ended in divorce, but his stepfather sent him to private school in Connecticut. Berryman graduated from Columbia College in 1936 and won a fellowship to Clare College, Cambridge, England.

He was later to say of himself, "I masquerade as a writer. Actually I am a scholar." However misleading this may be about his poetry, it reminds us that throughout his life Berryman drew nourishment from teaching—at Wayne State, at Harvard (1940–43), then off and on at Princeton, and from 1955 until his death, at the University of Minnesota. He chose to teach not creative writing but literature and the “history of civilization,” and he claimed that such teaching forced him into areas in which he would not otherwise have done detailed work. A mixture of bookishness and wildness characterizes all his writing; five years of research lay behind the intensities of “Homage to Mistress Bradstreet,” while an important constituent of “huffy Henry’s” personality in The Dream Songs is his professorial awkwardness and exhibitionism.

Berryman seemed drawn to borrowing identities in his poetry. In his first important volume, The Dispossessed (1948), he had experimented with various dramatic voices in the short poems “Nervous Songs: The Song of the Demented Priest,” “A Professor’s Song,” “The Song of the Tortured Girl,” and “The Song of the Man Forsaken and Obsessed.” The dispossession of the book’s title had two opposite and urgent meanings for him: “the miserable, put out of one’s own, and the relieved, saved, undevilled, de-spelled.” Taking on such roles was for Berryman both a revelation of his cast-out, fatherless state and an exorcism of it. It was perhaps in that spirit that he entered into an imaginary dialogue with what he felt as the kindred nature of the Puritan poet Anne Bradstreet. “Both of our worlds unhandes us.” What started out to be a poem of fifty lines emerged as the fifty-seven stanzas of “Homage to Mistress Bradstreet” (1956), a work so absorbing that after completing it Berryman claimed to be “a ruin for two years.” It was not Bradstreet’s poetry that engaged him. Quite the contrary: he was fascinated by the contrast between her “bald abstract rime” and her life of passionate suffering. The poem explores the kinship between Bradstreet and Berryman as figures of turbulence and rebellion.

Berryman took literary encouragement from another American poet of the past, Stephen Crane, about whom he wrote a book-length critical study in 1950. Crane’s poems, he said, have “the character of a ‘dream,’ something seen naively in a new relation.” Berryman’s attraction to a poetry that accommodated the nightmare antics of the dream world became apparent in his own long work, The Dream Songs. It was modeled, he claimed, on “the greatest American poem,” Whitman’s “Song of Myself,” in which the speaker assumes a fluid, ever-changing persona. 77 Dream Songs was published in 1964. Additional poems, to a total of 385, appeared in His Toy, His Dream, His Rest (1968). (Some uncollected dream songs were published posthumously in Henry’s Fate, 1977, and drafts of others remained in manuscript.) Obvious links exist between Berryman and other so-called confessional writers such as Robert Lowell, Sylvia Plath, and Anne Sexton. But the special autobiographical flavor of The Dream Songs is that of a psychic vaudeville; as in dreams, the poet represents himself through a fluid series of alter egos, whose voices often flow into one another in single poems. One of these voices is that of a blackface minstrel, and Berryman’s appropriation of this dialect prompted Michael Harper’s poem “Tongue-Tied in Black and White,” written both as homage to Berryman and as part of Harper’s quarrel with the use of “that needful black idiom offending me” (“Tongue-Tied in Black and White”). Despite the suffering that these poems enact, Berryman seemed to find a secret strength through the staginess, variety, resourcefulness, and renewals of these poems.

The Dream Songs brought Berryman a success that was not entirely beneficial. The collection Love and Fame (1970) shows him beguiled by his own celebrity and wrestling with some of its temptations. In an unfinished, posthumously published novel, Recovery, he portrays himself as increasingly prey to alcoholism. Berryman had been married twice before, and his hospitalization for drinking and for periods of insanity had put a strain on his third marriage. He came to distrust his poetry as a form of exhibitionism, and in his use of the discipline of prose and in the prayers that crowd his last two volumes of poetry (Delusions, Etc. appeared posthumously), he was clearly in search of some new and humbling style. Having been raised a strict Catholic and fallen away from the church, he tried to return to it in his last years, speaking of his need for a “God of rescue.” On January 7, 1972, Berryman committed suicide by leaping from a Minneapolis bridge.

Homage to Mistress Bradstreet Anne Bradstreet (“Born 1612 Anne Dudley, married at 16 Simon Bradstreet, a Cambridge man, steward to the Countess of Warwick and protegee of her father Thomas Dudley secretary to the Earl of Lincoln. Crossed in the Arbella, 1630, under Governor Winthrop” [Berryman’s note]) came to the Massachusetts Bay Colony when she was eighteen years old. She was one of the first poets on American soil. Of this poem, Berryman says:

An American historian somewhere observes that all colonial settlements are intensely conservative, except in the initial break-off point (whether religious, political, legal, or whatever). Trying to do justice to both parts of this obvious truth—which I came upon only after the poem was finished—I concentrated upon the second and the poem laid itself out in a series of rebellions. I had her rebel first against the new environment and above all against her barrenness (which in fact lasted for years), then against her marriage (which in fact seems to have been brilliantly happy), and finally against her continuing life of illness, loss, and age. These are the three large sections of the poem; they are preceded and followed by an exordium and coda, of four stanzas each, spoken by the “I” of the twentieth-century poet, which modulates into her voice, who speaks most of the poem. Such is the plan. Each rebellion, of course, is succeeded by submission, although even in the moment of the poem’s supreme triumph—the presentment, too long to quote now, of the birth of her first child—rebellion survives.

Berryman wrote two stanzas of the poem and found himself stalled for five years, during which he gathered material, until he discovered the strategy of dialogue and inserted himself in the poem. “Homage to Mistress Bradstreet” was first published in Partisan Review in 1953, but did not appear as a book until 1956.

In his exordium (stanzas 1–4), the poet makes an intense identification between himself and Bradstreet, both of them alienated by hardship or circumstance from those around them: “We are on each other’s hands / who care. Both of our worlds unhanding us.” The identification is so complete that in the subsequent stanzas he hears her voice recounting the tribulations of life in a new country, her yearnings for the England she left behind, her lonely dedication to her poetry, and the personal suffering in her early barrenness and miscarriages. Stanza 17 continues in Bradstreet’s voice.

From Homage to Mistress Bradstreet

* * *

17

The winters close, Springs open, no child stirs under my withering heart, O seasoned heart 130
 God grudged his aid.
 All things else soil like a shirt.
 Simon is much away. My executive¹ stales.
 The town came through for the cartway by the pales,² but my patience is short, 135
 I revolt from, I am like, these savage foresters

1. Power to act.

2. Stockade fence.

18

whose passionless dicker in the shade, whose glance impassive & scant, belie their murderous cries when quarry seems to show.
 Again I must have been wrong, twice.³ 140
 Unwell in a new way. Can that begin?
 God brandishes. O love, O I love. Kin, gather. My world is strange and merciful, ingrown months, blessing a swelling trance.⁴

19

So squeezed, wince you I scream? I love you & hate 145 off with you. Ages! Useless. Below my waist he has me in Hell's vise.
 Stalling. He let go. Come back: brace me somewhere. No. No. Yes! everything down hardens I press with horrible joy down 150 my back cracks like a wrist shame I am voiding oh behind it is too late 20

hide me forever I work thrust I must free now I all muscles & bones concentrate what is living from dying? 155
 Simon I must leave you so untidy
 Monster you are killing me Be sure
 I'll have you later Women do endure
 I can can no longer and it passes the wretched trap whelming and I am me 160

21

drencht & powerful, I did it with my body!
 One proud tug greens Heaven. Marvellous, unforbidding Majesty.
 Swell, imperious bells. I fly.
 Mountainous, woman not breaks and will bend: 165
 sways God nearby: anguish comes to an end.
 Blossomed Sarah,⁵ and I blossom. Is that thing alive? I hear a famisht howl.

22

Beloved household, I am Simon's wife, and the mother of Samuel—whom greedy yet I miss 170 out of his kicking place.

3. One of the several allusions to her failure to become pregnant.

4. Her first child was not born until about 1633

[Berryman's note].

5. Wife of Abraham, barren until old age, when she gave birth to Isaac (Genesis 17.19).

More in some ways I feel at a loss, freer. Cantabanks & mummers,⁶ nears longing for you. Our chopping⁷ scores my ears, our costume bores my eyes. 175
 St. George⁸ to the good sword, rise! chop-logic's rife

23

& fever & Satan & Satan's ancient fere.⁹
 Pioneering is not feeling well, not Indians, beasts. 180
 Not all their riddling can forestall one leaving. Sam, your uncle has had to go from us to live with God. 'Then Aunt went too?'
 Dear, she does wait still.
 Stricken: 'Oh. Then he takes us one by one.' My dear.

24

Forswearing it otherwise, they starch their minds. 185
 Folkmoots, & blether, blether. John Cotton rakes¹ to the synod of Cambridge.²
 Down from my body my legs flow, out from it arms wave, on it my head shakes.
 Now Mistress Hutchinson rings forth a call— 190 should she? many creep out a broken wall—affirming the Holy Ghost dwells in one justified. Factioning passion blinds

25

all to all her good, all—can she be exiled?
 Bitter sister, victim! I miss you. 195
 —I miss you, Anne,³
 day or night weak as a child, tender & empty, doomed, quick to no tryst.
 —I hear you. Be kind, you who leaguer⁴ my image in the mist. 200
 —Be kind you, to one unchained eager far & wild

6. Ballad singers and mimes.

7. Chopping: disputing, snapping, haggling; axing [Berryman's note].

8. Patron saint of England; the slayer of dragons.

9. Fere: his friend Death [Berryman's note].

1. "Rakes: inclines, as a mast; bows" [Berryman's note]. "Folkmoots": a town assembly for debate. "Blether": nonsense.

2. In the first synod (a body for religious debate), Cotton agreed to the condemnation and banishment of his follower Anne Hutchinson. Her heresies included a deemphasis of perfect moral conduct as evidence of the justification for Christian salvation.

3. One might say: He [the poet] is enabled to speak, at last, in the fortune of an echo of her—and when she is loneliest (her former spiritual adviser [John Cotton] having deserted Anne Hutchinson, and this her [Bradstreet's] closest friend banished), as if she had summoned him; and only thus, perhaps, is she enabled to hear him. This second section of the poem is a dialogue, his voice however ceasing well before it ends at [line] 307, and hers continuing for the whole third part until the coda ([stanzas] 54–57) [Berryman's note].

4. Beleaguer, besiege.

26

and if, O my love, my heart is breaking, please neglect my cries and I will spare you. Deep in Time's grave, Love's, you lie still.
 Lie still.—Now? That happy shape 205 my forehead had under my most long, rare, ravendark, hidden, soft bodiless hair
 you award me still.
 You must not love me, but I do not bid you cease.

27

Veiled my eyes, attending. How can it be I? 210
 Moist, with parted lips, I listen, wicked.
 I shake in the morning & retch.
 Brood I do on myself naked.
 A fading world I dust, with fingers new.
 —I have earned the right to be alone with you. 215
 —What right can that be?
 Convulsing, if you love, enough, like a sweet lie.

28

Not that, I know, you can. This cratered skin, like the crabs & shells of my Palissy⁵ ewer, touch!
 Oh, you do, you do? 220
 Falls on me what I like a witch, for lawless holds, annihilations of law which Time and he and man abhor, foresaw:
 sharper than what my Friend⁶ brought me for my revolt when I moved smooth & thin, 225

29

faintings black, rigour, chilling, brown parching, back, brain burning, the grey pocks itch, a manic stench of pustules snapping, pain floods the palm, sleepless, or a red shaft with a dreadful start 230 rides at the chapel, like a slipping heart.
 My soul strains in one qualm ah but this is not to save me but to throw me down.

30

And out of this I lull. It lessens. Kiss me.
 That once. As sings out up in sparkling dark 235
 a trail of a star & dies,
 while the breath flutters, sounding, mark,

5. Bernard Palissy (1510–1590), French Protestant ceramicist noted for special glazes and highly ornamented pieces.

6. Allusion to the punishments of God visited on those who rebel against him (cf. Isaiah 1.6).

so shorn ought such caresses to us be who, deserving nothing, flush and flee the darkness of that light, 240
 a lurching frozen from a warm dream. Talk to me.

31⁷

—It is Spring's New England. Pussy willows wedge up in the wet. Milky crestings, fringed yellow, in heaven, eyed by the melting hand-in-hand or mere 245
 desirers single, heavy-footed, rapt, make surge poor human hearts. Venus is trapt—the hefty pike shifts, sheer⁸—in Orion blazing. Warblings, odours, nudge to an edge—

32

—Ravishing, ha, what crouches outside ought, 250 flamboyant, ill, angelic. Often, now,
 I am afraid of you.
 I am a sobersides; I know.
 I want to take you for my lover.—Do.
 —I hear a madness. Harmless I to you 255 am not, not I?—No.
 —I cannot but be. Sing a concord of our thought.

33

—Wan dolls in indigo on gold:⁹ refrain my western lust. I am drowning in this past.
 I lose sight of you 260 who mistress me from air. Unbraced in delirium of the grand depths,¹ giving away haunters what kept me, I breathe solid spray.
 —I am losing you!
 Straiten me on.²—I suffered living like a stain: 265

34

I trundle the bodies, on the iron bars,
 over that fire backward & forth; they burn;

7. Berryman (in Poets on Poetry) called this speech of the poet to Bradstreet "an only half-subdued aria-stanza."

8. Lines 246–47 are opposed images of the bottom of the sea against the summit of the sky, as imaged by the planet Venus and the constellation Orion. "Sheer" in the sense of "invisible" (quoted from comments by Berryman in the Italian translation of "Mistress Bradstreet" by Sergio Perosa).

9. Cf., on Byzantine icons [here, the impassive Madonnas painted against gold backgrounds in medieval altarpieces of the Eastern Church], Frederick Rolfe ("Baron Corvo"): "Who ever dreams of praying (with expectation of response) for the prayer of a Tintoretto or a Titian, or a Bellini, or a Botticelli? But who can refrain from crying 'O Mother!' to these unruffleable wan dolls in indigo on gold?" (quoted from The Desire and Pursuit of the Whole by Graham Greene in The Last Childhood) [Berryman's note].

1. "Délîres des grandes profondeurs," described by [the twentieth-century French marine explorer Jacques-Yves] Cousteau and others; a euphoria, sometimes fatal, in which the hallucinated diver offers passing fish his line, helmet, anything [Berryman's note; he translates the French phrase in line 262].

2. I.e., tighten your embrace.

bits fall. I wonder if I killed them. Women serve my turn.
 —Dreams! You are good.—No.—Dense with hardihood 270
 the wicked are dislodged, and lodged the good.
 In green space we are safe.
 God awaits us (but I am yielding) who Hell wars.

35

—I cannot feel myself God waits. He flies nearer a kindly world; or he is flown. 275
 One Saturday's rescue³ won't show. Man is entirely alone may be. I am a man of griefs & fits trying to be my friend. And the brown smock splits, down the pale flesh a gash 280
 broadens and Time holds up your heart against my eyes.

36

—Hard and divided heaven! creases me. Shame is failing. My breath is scented, and I throw hostile glances towards God.
 Crumpling plunge of a pestle, bray:⁴ 285 sin cross & opposite, wherein I survive nightmares of Eden. Reaches foul & live he for me, this soul
 to crunch, a minute tangle of eternal flame.

37

I fear Hell's hammer-wind. But fear does wane. 290
 Death's blossoms grain my hair; I cannot live.
 A black joy clashes joy, in twilight. The Devil said
 'I will deal toward her softly, and her enchanting cries will fool the horns of Adam.'⁵ Father of lies, 295 a male great pestle smashes small women swarming towards the mortar's rim in vain.

38

I see the cruel spread Wings black with saints!
 Silky my breasts not his, mine, mine to withhold or tender, tender. 300
 I am sifting, nervous, and bold.
 The light is changing. Surrender this loveliness

3. As of cliffhangers, movie serials wherein each week's episode ends with a train bearing down on the strapped heroine or with the hero dangling over an abyss into which Indians above him peer with satisfaction before they hatchet the rope; rescue: forcible recovery (by the owner) of goods dis-trained [Berryman's note].

4. Punning (according to Berryman's notes) on (1) the pulverizing action of a mortar and pestle and (2) the strident noise of a donkey.

5. Referring to Satan's temptation of Eve, who was to eat the apple from the Tree of Knowledge and then convince Adam to do so (cf. Genesis 3).

you cannot make me do. But I will. Yes.
 What horror, down stormy air, warps towards me? My threatening promise faints 305

39⁶ torture me, Father, lest not I be thine!

 Tribunal terrible & pure, my God,
 mercy for him and me.
 Faces half-fanged, Christ drives abroad,
 and though the crop hopes, Jane⁷ is so slipshod 310
 I cry. Evil dissolves, & love, like foam; that love. Prattle of children powers me home, my heart claps like the swan's under a frenzy of who love me & who shine.⁸

* * *

1953, 1956

FROM THE DREAM SONGS¹

I

Huffy Henry hid the day,
 unappeasable Henry sulked.
 I see his point,—a trying to put things over.
 It was the thought that they thought they could do it made Henry wicked & away. 5
 But he should have come out and talked.

All the world like a woolen lover
 once did seem on Henry's side.
 Then came a departure.
 Thereafter nothing fell out as it might or ought. 10
 I don't see how Henry, pried open for all the world to see, survived.

6. The stanza is unsettled, like [stanza] 24, by a middle line, signaling a broad transition [Berryman's note].

7. A servant.

8. The final stanzas present Bradstreet's intensified vision of death and damnation and include the death of her father, blaspheming. But in the last four stanzas the poem modulates back into the poet's voice and his vow to keep Bradstreet alive in his loving memory and in his writing. "Hover, utter, still, a sourcing whom my lost candle like the firefly loves."

1. These poems were written over a period of thirteen years. (77 Dream Songs was published in 1964, and the remaining poems appeared in His Toy, His Dream, His Rest in 1968. Some uncollected dream songs were included in the volume Henry's Fate, which appeared five years after Berryman committed suicide in 1972.) Berryman placed an introductory note at the head of His Toy, His Dream, His Rest: "The poem then, whatever its wide cast of characters, is essentially about an imaginary character (not the poet, not me) named Henry, a white American in early middle age sometimes in blackface, who has suffered an irreversible loss and talks about himself sometimes in the first person, sometimes in the third, sometimes even in the second; he has a friend, never named, who addresses him as Mr. Bones and variants thereof. Requiescant in pace." (The final sentence here is Latin for "Rest in peace.")

What he has now to say is a long wonder the world can bear & be.
Once in a sycamore I was glad 15
all at the top, and I sang.
Hard on the land wears the strong sea and empty grows every bed.

14

Life, friends, is boring. We must not say so.
After all, the sky flashes, the great sea yearns,
we ourselves flash and yearn,
and moreover my mother told me as a boy (repeatingly) 'Ever to confess you're bored 5 means you have no

Inner Resources.' I conclude now I have no inner resources, because I am heavy bored.
Peoples bore me,
literature bores me, especially great literature, 10
Henry bores me, with his plights & gripes as bad as achilles,² who loves people and valiant art, which bores me.

And the tranquil hills, & gin, look like a drag and somehow a dog 15 has taken itself & its tail considerably away into mountains or sea or sky, leaving behind: me, wag.

29

There sat down, once, a thing on Henry's heart
so heavy, if he had a hundred years
& more, & weeping, sleepless, in all them time
Henry could not make good.
Starts again always in Henry's ears 5
the little cough somewhere, an odour, a chime.

And there is another thing he has in mind like a grave Sienese face³ a thousand years would fail to blur the still profiled reproach of. Ghastly, with open eyes, he attends, blind. 10
All the bells say: too late. This is not for tears; thinking.

2. Greek hero of Homer's Iliad, who, angry at slights against his honor, sulked in his tent and refused to fight against the Trojans.

3. Allusion to the somber, austere mosaiclike religious portraits by the Italian painters who worked in Siena during the 13th and 14th centuries.

But never did Henry, as he thought he did, end anyone and hacks her body up and hide the pieces, where they may be found. 15
 He knows: he went over everyone, & nobody's missing.
 Often he reckons, in the dawn, them up.
 Nobody is ever missing.

40

I'm scared a lonely. Never see my son, easy be not to see anyone,
 combers⁴ out to sea
 know they're goin somewhere but not me.
 Got a little poison, got a little gun. 5
 I'm scared a lonely.

I'm scared a only one thing, which is me,
 from othering I don't take nothin, see,
 for any hound dog's sake.
 But this is where I livin, where I rake 10 my leaves and cop my promise,⁵ this' where we cry oursel's awake.

Wishin was dyin but I gotta make it all this way to that bed on these feet where peoples said to meet. 15
 Maybe but even if I see my son forever never, get back on the take, free, black & forty-one.⁶

384

The marker slants, flowerless, day's almost done,
 I stand above my father's grave with rage,
 often, often before
 I've made this awful pilgrimage to one who cannot visit me, who tore his page 5 out: I come back for more,

I spit upon this dreadful banker's grave who shot his heart out in a Florida dawn
 O ho alas alas
 When will indifference come, I moan & rave 10

4. Waves that roll over and break with a foamy crest.

5. Slang for "pile up potential."

6. Playing on "free, white, and twenty-one," colloquial expression for legally independent.

I'd like to scrabble till I got right down away down under the grass and ax the casket open ha to see just how he's taking it, which he sought so hard we'll tear apart

the mouldering grave clothes ha & then Henry will heft the ax once more, his final card, and fell it on the start.

15

1968

BERNARD MALAMUD

1914–1986

Bernard Malamud began late as a writer, publishing his first novel at age thirty-eight and reaching a wider audience about a decade later. It is his second novel (The Assistant, 1957) that most readers, rightly, consider his best. Malamud knew well the urban life he wrote about in that book. He was born in Brooklyn, graduated from Erasmus Hall High School in Brooklyn and the City College of New York, then earned a master's degree at Columbia. During the 1940s he taught evening classes at Erasmus Hall and Harlem Evening High School, while writing short stories that by 1950 had begun to appear in such magazines as Partisan Review and Commentary. Along with Saul Bellow, he was an important member of the group of Jewish novelists who flourished in the 1950s and beyond, but unlike Bellow, his stories were usually notable for the way they captured the speech and manners of working-class, recently immigrated Jews.

That urban Jewish milieu was absent from his first novel, The Natural (1952), which tells of an injured Major League pitcher reborn into a splendid outfielder. (Malamud may have been influenced by John R. Tunis's popular boy's book, The Kid from Tompkinsville, 1939.) The book contains much allegorical play with the Grail legend and other myths, but it held at arm's length Malamud's deeper concerns, which came to full expression in The Assistant, with its vivid but depressing rendering of a grocer's day-to-day existence. Rejecting the frenetic verbal energy of his first novel, Malamud wrote The Assistant in a low-key, rather toneless style, just right for catching the drab solemnities of his characters' lives. Like Bellow's The Victim, published a few years previously, the novel is about human responsibility and the possibilities for conversion, seen through the conflict between Jew and Gentile. This conflict is given life through faithfully rendered speech and the patient yet always surprising turns of event with which the story unfolds. If the allegorical twist at its end is too ingenious for belief, still The Assistant remains unforgettable.

In subsequent novels Malamud extended and relaxed his style. The comic A New Life (1962) is about a hapless college professor at a West Coast university (Malamud taught at Oregon State for a time). The Fixer (1966) is a parable-history of the ritual murder of a Christian child. The Tenants (1971) attempted, in eventually violent, sensationalistic terms, to portray one minority's experience confronting another's—

Jew against African American. Dubin's Lives (1979) is a somewhat conventional tale of a writer of biographies who is suddenly overtaken by life, in the form of a desirable young woman (the novel is set in Vermont, where Malamud lived for years, teaching at Bennington College from 1961 until he retired). God's Grace (1982), by contrast, is a parable or fable, set in a post-thermonuclear future.

While these later novels seem sometimes abstract and didactic, The Assistant and Malamud's short fiction present memorable portraits of embattled Jews in grotesque circumstances. At times these figures resemble heroes of folklore; at other times they threaten to collapse into caricatures. In a story such as "The Lady in the Lake," the pathetic-comic hero becomes both. At his best, in that story or ones such as "The Magic Barrel" (printed here), "Idiots First," and "The Last Mohican," Malamud imagines, intensely and purely, his lonely questers for perfection as they become entangled in the imperfections of a social world. Such occasions of tragicomic humiliation sound the deeper note that was Malamud's trademark.

The following text is from the short-story collection The Magic Barrel (1958).

The Magic Barrel

Not long ago there lived in uptown New York, in a small, almost meager room, though crowded with books, Leo Finkle, a rabbinical student at the Yeshiva University.¹ Finkle, after six years of study, was to be ordained in June and had been advised by an acquaintance that he might find it easier to win himself a congregation if he were married. Since he had no present prospects of marriage, after two tormented days of turning it over in his mind, he called in Pinye Salzman, a marriage broker whose two-line advertisement he had read in the Forward.²

The matchmaker appeared one night out of the dark fourth-floor hallway of the graystone rooming house where Finkle lived, grasping a black, strapped portfolio that had been worn thin with use. Salzman, who had been long in the business, was of slight but dignified build, wearing an old hat, and an overcoat too short and tight for him. He smelled frankly of fish, which he loved to eat, and although he was missing a few teeth, his presence was not displeasing, because of an amiable manner curiously contrasted with mournful eyes. His voice, his lips, his wisp of beard, his bony fingers were animated, but give him a moment of repose and his mild blue eyes revealed a depth of sadness, a characteristic that put Leo a little at ease although the situation, for him, was inherently tense.

He at once informed Salzman why he had asked him to come, explaining that his home was in Cleveland, and that but for his parents, who had married comparatively late in life, he was alone in the world. He had for six years devoted himself almost entirely to his studies, as a result of which, understandably, he had found himself without time for a social life and the company of young women. Therefore he thought it the better part of trial and error—of embarrassing fumbling—to call in an experienced person to advise him on these matters. He remarked in passing that the function of the marriage broker was ancient and honorable, highly approved in the Jewish community, because it made practical the necessary without hindering joy. Moreover, his own parents had been brought together by a matchmaker. They had made, if not a financially profitable marriage—since neither had possessed any worldly goods to speak of—at least a successful one in the sense of their everlasting devotion to each other. Salzman listened in embarrassed surprise, sensing a sort of apology. Later, however, he experienced a glow of pride in his work, an emotion that had left him years ago, and he heartily approved of Finkle.

1. In New York City; it offers courses in theological as well as secular disciplines. Generically, "yeshiva" is a term for a Jewish seminary.

2. The Jewish Daily Forward, a Yiddish-language daily newspaper published in New York City.

The two went to their business. Leo had led Salzman to the only clear place in the room, a table near a window that overlooked the lamp-lit city. He seated himself at the matchmaker's side but facing him, attempting by an act of will to suppress the unpleasant tickle in his throat. Salzman eagerly unstrapped his portfolio and removed a loose rubber band from a thin packet of much-handled cards. As he flipped through them, a gesture and sound that physically hurt Leo, the student pretended not to see and gazed steadfastly out the window. Although it was still February, winter was on its last legs, signs of which he had for the first time in years begun to notice. He now observed the round white moon, moving high in the sky through a cloud menagerie, and watched with half-open mouth as it penetrated a huge hen, and dropped out of her like an egg laying itself. Salzman, though pretending through eyeglasses he had just slipped on, to be engaged in scanning the writing on the cards, stole occasional glances at the young man's distinguished face, noting with pleasure the long, severe scholar's nose, brown eyes heavy with learning, sensitive yet ascetic lips, and a certain, almost hollow quality of the dark cheeks. He gazed around at shelves upon shelves of books and let out a soft, contented sigh.

When Leo's eyes fell upon the cards, he counted six spread out in Salzman's hand.

"So few?" he asked in disappointment.

"You wouldn't believe me how much cards I got in my office," Salzman replied. "The drawers are already filled to the top, so I keep them now in a barrel, but is every girl good for a new rabbi?"

Leo blushed at this, regretting all he had revealed of himself in a curriculum vitae he had sent to Salzman. He had thought it best to acquaint him with his strict standards and specifications, but in having done so, he felt he had told the marriage broker more than was absolutely necessary.

He hesitantly inquired, "Do you keep photographs of your clients on file?"

"First comes family, amount of dowry, also what kind promises," Salzman replied, unbuttoning his tight coat and settling himself in the chair. "After come pictures, rabbi."

"Call me Mr. Finkle. I'm not yet a rabbi."

Salzman said he would, but instead called him doctor, which he changed to rabbi when Leo was not listening too attentively.

Salzman adjusted his horn-rimmed spectacles, gently cleared his throat and read in an eager voice the contents of the top card:

"Sophie P. Twenty four years. Widow one year. No children. Educated high school and two years college. Father promises eight thousand dollars. Has wonderful wholesale business. Also real estate. On the mother's side comes teachers, also one actor. Well known on Second Avenue."

Leo gazed up in surprise. “Did you say a widow?”

“A widow don’t mean spoiled, rabbi. She lived with her husband maybe four months. He was a sick boy she made a mistake to marry him.”

“Marrying a widow has never entered my mind.”

“This is because you have no experience. A widow, especially if she is young and healthy like this girl, is a wonderful person to marry. She will be thankful to you the rest of her life. Believe me, if I was looking now for a bride, I would marry a widow.”

Leo reflected, then shook his head.

Salzman hunched his shoulders in an almost imperceptible gesture of disappointment. He placed the card down on the wooden table and began to read another:

“Lily H. High school teacher. Regular. Not a substitute. Has savings and new Dodge car. Lived in Paris one year. Father is successful dentist thirty-five years. Interested in professional man. Well Americanized family. Wonderful opportunity.”

“I knew her personally,” said Salzman. “I wish you could see this girl. She is a doll. Also very intelligent. All day you could talk to her about books and theater and what not. She also knows current events.”

“I don’t believe you mentioned her age?”

“Her age?” Salzman said, raising his brows. “Her age is thirty-two years.”

Leo said after a while, “I’m afraid that seems a little too old.”

Salzman let out a laugh. “So how old are you, rabbi?”

“Twenty-seven.”

“So what is the difference, tell me, between twenty-seven and thirty-two? My own wife is seven years older than me. So what did I suffer?—Nothing. If Rothschild’s³ daughter wants to marry you, would you say on account her age, no?”

“Yes,” Leo said dryly.

Salzman shook off the no in the yes. “Five years don’t mean a thing. I give you my word that when you will live with her for one week you will forget her age. What does it mean five years—that she lived more and knows more than somebody who is younger? On this girl, God bless her, years are not wasted. Each one that it comes makes better the bargain.”

“What subjects does she teach in high school?”

“Languages. If you heard the way she speaks French, you will think it is music. I am in the business twenty-five years, and I recommend her with my whole heart. Believe me, I know what I’m talking, rabbi.”

“What’s on the next card?” Leo said abruptly.

Salzman reluctantly turned up the third card:

“Ruth K. Nineteen years. Honor student. Father offers thirteen thousand cash to the right bridegroom. He is a medical doctor. Stomach specialist with marvelous practice. Brother in law owns own garment business. Particular people.”

Salzman looked as if he had read his trump card.

“Did you say nineteen?” Leo asked with interest.

“On the dot.”

“Is she attractive?” He blushed. “Pretty?”

3. Once prominent, enormously wealthy family of Jewish international bankers and business leaders.

Salzman kissed his finger tips. "A little doll. On this I give you my word. Let me call the father tonight and you will see what means pretty."

But Leo was troubled. "You're sure she's that young?"

"This I am positive. The father will show you the birth certificate."

"Are you positive there isn't something wrong with her?" Leo insisted.

"Who says there is wrong?"

"I don't understand why an American girl her age should go to a marriage broker."

A smile spread over Salzman's face.

"So for the same reason you went, she comes."

Leo flushed. "I am pressed for time."

Salzman, realizing he had been tactless, quickly explained. "The father came, not her. He wants she should have the best, so he looks around himself. When we will locate the right boy he will introduce him and encourage. This makes a better marriage than if a young girl without experience takes for herself. I don't have to tell you this."

"But don't you think this young girl believes in love?" Leo spoke uneasily.

Salzman was about to guffaw but caught himself and said soberly, "Love comes with the right person, not before."

Leo parted dry lips but did not speak. Noticing that Salzman had snatched a glance at the next card, he cleverly asked, "How is her health?"

"Perfect," Salzman said, breathing with difficulty. "Of course, she is a little lame on her right foot from an auto accident that it happened to her when she was twelve years, but nobody notices on account she is so brilliant and also beautiful."

Leo got up heavily and went to the window. He felt curiously bitter and upbraided himself for having called in the marriage broker. Finally, he shook his head.

"Why not?" Salzman persisted, the pitch of his voice rising.

"Because I detest stomach specialists."

"So what do you care what is his business? After you marry her do you need him? Who says he must come every Friday night in your house?"

Ashamed of the way the talk was going, Leo dismissed Salzman, who went home with heavy, melancholy eyes.

Though he had felt only relief at the marriage broker's departure, Leo was in low spirits the next day. He explained it as arising from Salzman's failure to produce a suitable bride for him. He did not care for his type of clientele. But when Leo found himself hesitating whether to seek out another matchmaker, one more polished than Pinye, he wondered if it could be—his protestations to the contrary, and although he honored his father and mother—that he did not, in essence, care for the matchmaking institution? This thought he quickly put out of mind yet found himself still upset. All day he ran around in the woods—missed an important appointment, forgot to give out his laundry, walked out of a Broadway cafeteria without paying and had to run back with the ticket in his hand; had even not recognized his landlady in the street when she passed with a friend and courteously called out, "A good evening to you, Doctor Finkle." By nightfall, however, he had regained sufficient calm to sink his nose into a book and there found peace from his thoughts.

Almost at once there came a knock on the door. Before Leo could say enter, Salzman, commercial cupid, was standing in the room. His face was gray and meager, his expression hungry, and he looked as if he would expire on his feet. Yet the marriage broker managed, by some trick of the muscles, to display a broad smile.

“So good evening. I am invited?”

Leo nodded, disturbed to see him again, yet unwilling to ask the man to leave.

Beaming still, Salzman laid his portfolio on the table. “Rabbi, I got for you tonight good news.”

“I’ve asked you not to call me rabbi. I’m still a student.”

“Your worries are finished. I have for you a first-class bride.”

“Leave me in peace concerning this subject,” Leo pretended lack of interest.

“The world will dance at your wedding.”

“Please, Mr. Salzman, no more.”

“But first must come back my strength,” Salzman said weakly. He fumbled with the portfolio straps and took out of the leather case an oily paper bag, from which he extracted a hard, seeded roll and a small, smoked white fish. With a quick motion of his hand he stripped the fish out of its skin and began ravenously to chew. “All day in a rush,” he muttered.

Leo watched him eat.

“A sliced tomato you have maybe?” Salzman hesitantly inquired.

“No.”

The marriage broker shut his eyes and ate. When he had finished he carefully cleaned up the crumbs and rolled up the remains of the fish, in the paper bag. His spectacled eyes roamed the room until he discovered, amid some piles of books, a one-burner gas stove. Lifting his hat he humbly asked, “A glass tea you got, rabbi?”

Conscience-stricken, Leo rose and brewed the tea. He served it with a chunk of lemon and two cubes of lump sugar, delighting Salzman.

After he had drunk his tea, Salzman’s strength and good spirits were restored.

“So tell me, rabbi,” he said amiably, “you considered some more the three clients I mentioned yesterday?”

“There was no need to consider.”

“Why not?”

“None of them suits me.”

“What then suits you?”

Leo let it pass because he could give only a confused answer.

Without waiting for a reply, Salzman asked, “You remember this girl I talked to you—the high school teacher?”

“Age thirty-two?”

But, surprisingly, Salzman’s face lit in a smile. “Age twenty-nine.”

Leo shot him a look. “Reduced from thirty-two?”

“A mistake,” Salzman avowed. “I talked today with the dentist. He took me to his safety deposit box and showed me the birth certificate. She was twenty-nine years last August. They made her a party in the mountains where she went for her vacation. When her father spoke to me the first time I forgot to write the age and I told you thirty-two, but now I remember this was a different client, a widow.”

“The same one you told me about? I thought she was twenty-four?”

“A different. Am I responsible that the world is filled with widows?”

“No, but I’m not interested in them, nor for that matter, in school teachers.”

Salzman pulled his clasped hands to his breast. Looking at the ceiling he devoutly exclaimed, “Yiddishe kinder,⁴ what can I say to somebody that he is not interested in high school teachers? So what then you are interested?”

Leo flushed but controlled himself.

“In what else will you be interested,” Salzman went on, “if you not interested in this fine girl that she speaks four languages and has personally in the bank ten thousand dollars? Also her father guarantees further twelve thousand. Also she has a new car, wonderful clothes, talks on all subjects, and she will give you a first-class home and children. How near do we come in our life to paradise?”

“If she’s so wonderful, why wasn’t she married ten years ago?”

“Why?” said Salzman with a heavy laugh. “—Why? Because she is partikiler.⁵ This is why. She wants the best.”

Leo was silent, amused at how he had entangled himself. But Salzman had aroused his interest in Lily H., and he began seriously to consider calling on her. When the marriage broker observed how intently Leo’s mind was at work on the facts he had supplied, he felt certain they would soon come to an agreement.

Late Saturday afternoon, conscious of Salzman, Leo Finkle walked with Lily Hirschorn along Riverside Drive. He walked briskly and erectly, wearing with distinction the black fedora he had that morning taken with trepidation out of the dusty hat box on his closet shelf, and the heavy black Saturday coat he had thoroughly whisked clean. Leo also owned a walking stick, a present from a distant relative, but quickly put temptation aside and did not use it. Lily, petite and not unpretty, had on something signifying the approach of spring. She was au courant,⁶ animatedly, with all sorts of subjects, and he weighed her words and found her surprisingly sound—score another for Salzman, whom he uneasily sensed to be somewhere around, hiding perhaps high in a tree along the street, flashing the lady signals with a pocket mirror; or perhaps a cloven-hoofed Pan,⁷ piping nuptial ditties as he danced his invisible way before them, strewing wild buds on the walk and purple grapes in their path, symbolizing fruit of a union, though there was of course still none.

Lily startled Leo by remarking, “I was thinking of Mr. Salzman, a curious figure, wouldn’t you say?”

Not certain what to answer, he nodded.

She bravely went on, blushing, “I for one am grateful for his introducing us. Aren’t you?”

He courteously replied, “I am.”

“I mean,” she said with a little laugh—and it was all in good taste, or at least gave the effect of being not in bad—“do you mind that we came together so?”

He was not displeased with her honesty, recognizing that she meant to set the relationship aright, and understanding that it took a certain amount of experience in life, and courage, to want to do it quite that way. One had to have some sort of past to make that kind of beginning.

4. Jewish children (Yiddish); the sense is, what do these children know of the world as their parents knew it.

5. Yiddish corruption of “particular.”

6. In keeping with the times (French).

7. Ancient Greek rural deity, part man and part goat, who presided over shepherds and flocks.

He said that he did not mind. Salzman's function was traditional and honorable—valuable for what it might achieve, which, he pointed out, was frequently nothing.

Lily agreed with a sigh. They walked on for a while and she said after a long silence, again with a nervous laugh, "Would you mind if I asked you something a little bit personal? Frankly, I find the subject fascinating." Although Leo shrugged, she went on half embarrassedly, "How was it that you came to your calling? I mean was it a sudden passionate inspiration?"

Leo, after a time, slowly replied, "I was always interested in the Law."⁸

"You saw revealed in it the presence of the Highest?"

He nodded and changed the subject. "I understand that you spent a little time in Paris, Miss Hirschorn?"

"Oh, did Mr. Salzman tell you, Rabbi Finkle?" Leo winced but she went on, "It was ages ago and almost forgotten. I remember I had to return for my sister's wedding."

And Lily would not be put off. "When," she asked in a trembly voice, "did you become enamored of God?"

He stared at her. Then it came to him that she was talking not about Leo Finkle, but of a total stranger, some mystical figure, perhaps even passionate prophet that Salzman had dreamed up for her—no relation to the living or dead. Leo trembled with rage and weakness. The trickster had obviously sold her a bill of goods, just as he had him, who'd expected to become acquainted with a young lady of twenty-nine, only to behold, the moment he laid eyes upon her strained and anxious face, a woman past thirty-five and aging rapidly. Only his self control had kept him this long in her presence.

"I am not," he said gravely, "a talented religious person," and in seeking words to go on, found himself possessed by shame and fear. "I think," he said in a strained manner, "that I came to God not because I loved Him, but because I did not."

This confession he spoke harshly because its unexpectedness shook him.

Lily wilted. Leo saw a profusion of loaves of bread go flying like ducks high over his head, not unlike the winged loaves by which he had counted himself to sleep last night. Mercifully, then, it snowed, which he would not put past Salzman's machinations.

He was infuriated with the marriage broker and swore he would throw him out of the room the minute he reappeared. But Salzman did not come that night, and when Leo's anger had subsided, an unaccountable despair grew in its place. At first he thought this was caused by his disappointment in Lily, but before long it became evident that he had involved himself with Salzman without a true knowledge of his own intent. He gradually realized—with an emptiness that seized him with six hands—that he had called in the broker to find him a bride because he was incapable of doing it himself. This terrifying insight he had derived as a result of his meeting and conversation with Lily Hirschorn. Her probing questions had somehow irritated him into revealing—to himself more than her—the true nature of his relationship to God, and from that it had come upon him, with shocking force, that apart from his parents, he had never loved anyone. Or perhaps it went the other way, that he did not love God so well as he might, because he had not loved man. It seemed to Leo that his whole life stood starkly revealed and he saw himself for the first time as he truly was—unloved and loveless. This bitter but somehow not fully unexpected revelation brought him to a point of panic, controlled only by extraordinary effort. He covered his face with his hands and cried.

8. The "Law," or Torah, consists of Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy—that part of Old Testament Scripture called the Pentateuch (Five Books of Moses).

The week that followed was the worst of his life. He did not eat and lost weight. His beard darkened and grew ragged. He stopped attending seminars and almost never opened a book. He seriously considered leaving the Yeshiva, although he was deeply troubled at the thought of the loss of all his years of study—saw them like pages torn from a book, strewn over the city—and at the devastating effect of this decision upon his parents. But he had lived without knowledge of himself, and never in the Five Books and all the Commentaries—*mea culpa*⁹—had the truth been revealed to him. He did not know where to turn, and in all this desolating loneliness there was no to whom, although he often thought of Lily but not once could bring himself to go downstairs and make the call. He became touchy and irritable, especially with his landlady, who asked him all manner of personal questions; on the other hand, sensing his own disagreeableness, he waylaid her on the stairs and apologized abjectly, until mortified, she ran from him. Out of this, however, he drew the consolation that he was a Jew and that a Jew suffered. But gradually, as the long and terrible week drew to a close, he regained his composure and some idea of purpose in life: to go on as planned. Although he was imperfect, the ideal was not. As for his quest of a bride, the thought of continuing afflicted him with anxiety and heartburn, yet perhaps with this new knowledge of himself he would be more successful than in the past. Perhaps love would now come to him and a bride to that love. And for this sanctified seeking who needed a Salzman?

The marriage broker, a skeleton with haunted eyes, returned that very night. He looked, withal, the picture of frustrated expectancy—as if he had steadfastly waited the week at Miss Lily Hirschorn’s side for a telephone call that never came.

Casually coughing, Salzman came immediately to the point: “So how did you like her?”

Leo’s anger rose and he could not refrain from chiding the matchmaker: “Why did you lie to me, Salzman?”

Salzman’s pale face went dead white, the world had snowed on him.

“Did you not state that she was twenty-nine?” Leo insisted.

“I gave you my word—”

“She was thirty-five, if a day. At least thirty-five.”

“Of this don’t be too sure. Her father told me—”

“Never mind. The worst of it was that you lied to her.”

“How did I lie to her, tell me?”

“You told her things about me that weren’t true. You made me out to be more, consequently less than I am. She had in mind a totally different person, a sort of semimystical Wonder Rabbi.”

“All I said, you was a religious man.”

9. Literally, “through my fault” (Latin), an admission of error. “Commentaries”: explanatory commentaries on the Pentateuch.

"I can imagine."

Salzman sighed. "This is my weakness that I have," he confessed. "My wife says to me I shouldn't be a salesman, but when I have two fine people that they would be wonderful to be married, I am so happy that I talk too much." He smiled wanly. "This is why Salzman is a poor man."

Leo's anger left him. "Well, Salzman, I'm afraid that's all."

The marriage broker fastened hungry eyes on him.

"You don't want anymore a bride?"

"I do," said Leo, "but I have decided to seek her in a different way. I am no longer interested in an arranged marriage. To be frank, I now admit the necessity of premarital love. That is, I want to be in love with the one I marry."

"Love?" said Salzman, astounded. After a moment he remarked, "For us, our love is our life, not for the ladies. In the ghetto they—"

"I know, I know," said Leo. "I've thought of it often. Love, I have said to myself, should be a by-product of living and worship rather than its own end. Yet for myself I find it necessary to establish the level of my need and fulfill it."

Salzman shrugged but answered, "Listen, rabbi, if you want love, this I can find for you also. I have such beautiful clients that you will love them the minute your eyes will see them."

Leo smiled unhappily. "I'm afraid you don't understand."

But Salzman hastily unstrapped his portfolio and withdrew a manila packet from it.

"Pictures," he said, quickly laying the envelope on the table.

Leo called after him to take the pictures away, but as if on the wings of the wind, Salzman had disappeared.

March came. Leo had returned to his regular routine. Although he felt not quite himself yet—lacked energy—he was making plans for a more active social life. Of course it would cost something, but he was an expert in cutting corners; and when there were no corners left he would make circles rounder. All the while Salzman's pictures had lain on the table, gathering dust. Occasionally as Leo sat studying, or enjoying a cup of tea, his eyes fell on the manila envelope, but he never opened it.

The days went by and no social life to speak of developed with a member of the opposite sex—it was difficult, given the circumstances of his situation. One morning Leo toiled up the stairs to his room and stared out the window at the city. Although the day was bright his view of it was dark. For some time he watched people in the street below hurrying along and then turned with a heavy heart to his little room. On the table was the packet. With a sudden relentless gesture he tore it open. For a half-hour he stood by the table in a state of excitement, examining the photographs of the ladies Salzman had included. Finally, with a deep sigh he put them down. There were six, of varying degrees of attractiveness, but look at them long enough and they all became Lily Hirschorn: all past their prime, all starved behind bright smiles, not a true personality in the lot. Life, despite their frantic yoo-hooings, had passed them by; they were pictures in a brief case that stank of fish. After a while, however, as Leo attempted to return the photographs into the envelope, he found in it another, a snapshot of the type taken by a machine for a quarter. He gazed at it a moment and let out a cry.

Her face deeply moved him. Why, he could at first not say. It gave him the impression of youth—spring flowers, yet age—a sense of having been used to the bone, wasted; this came from the eyes, which were hauntingly familiar, yet absolutely strange. He had a vivid impression that he had met her before, but try as he might he could not place her although he could almost recall her name, as if he had read it in her own handwriting. No, this couldn't be; he would have remembered her. It was not, he affirmed, that she had an extraordinary beauty—no, though her face was attractive enough; it was that something about her moved him. Feature for feature, even some of the ladies of the photographs could do better; but she leaped forth to his heart—had lived, or wanted to—more than just wanted, perhaps regretted how she had lived—had somehow deeply suffered: it could be seen in the depths of those reluctant eyes, and from the way the light enclosed and shone from her, and within her, opening realms of possibility: this was her own. Her he desired. His head ached and eyes narrowed with the intensity of his gazing, then as if an obscure fog had blown up in the mind, he experienced fear of her and was aware that he had received an impression, somehow, of evil. He shuddered, saying softly, it is thus with us all. Leo brewed some tea in a small pot and sat sipping it without sugar, to calm himself. But before he had finished drinking, again with excitement he examined the face and found it good: good for Leo Finkle. Only such a one could understand him and help him seek whatever he was seeking. She might, perhaps, love him. How she had happened to be among the discards in Salzman's barrel he could never guess, but he knew he must urgently go find her.

Leo rushed downstairs, grabbed up the Bronx telephone book, and searched for Salzman's home address. He was not listed, nor was his office. Neither was he in the Manhattan book. But Leo remembered having written down the address on a slip of paper after he had read Salzman's advertisement in the "personals" column of the Forward. He ran up to his room and tore through his papers, without luck. It was exasperating. Just when he needed the matchmaker he was nowhere to be found. Fortunately Leo remembered to look in his wallet. There on a card he found his name written and a Bronx address. No phone number was listed, the reason—Leo now recalled—he had originally communicated with Salzman by letter. He got on his coat, put a hat on over his skull cap and hurried to the subway station. All the way to the far end of the Bronx he sat on the edge of his seat. He was more than once tempted to take out the picture and see if the girl's face was as he remembered it, but he refrained, allowing the snapshot to remain in his inside coat pocket, content to have her so close. When the train pulled into the station he was waiting at the door and bolted out. He quickly located the street Salzman had advertised.

The building he sought was less than a block from the subway, but it was not an office building, nor even a loft, nor a store in which one could rent office space. It was a very old tenement house. Leo found Salzman's name in pencil on a soiled tag under the bell and climbed three dark flights to his apartment. When he knocked, the door was opened by a thin, asthmatic, gray-haired woman, in felt slippers.

"Yes?" she said, expecting nothing. She listened without listening. He could have sworn he had seen her, too, before but knew it was an illusion.

"Salzman—does he live here? Pinye Salzman," he said, "the matchmaker?" She stared at him a long minute. "Of course."

He felt embarrassed. "Is he in?"

"No." Her mouth, though left open, offered nothing more.

"The matter is urgent. Can you tell me where his office is?"

"In the air." She pointed upward.

"You mean he has no office?" Leo asked.

"In his socks."

He peered into the apartment. It was sunless and dingy, one large room divided by a half-open curtain, beyond which he could see a sagging metal bed. The near side of a room was crowded with rickety chairs, old bureaus, a three-legged table, racks of cooking utensils, and all the apparatus of a kitchen. But there was no sign of Salzman or his magic barrel, probably also a figment of the imagination. An odor of frying fish made Leo weak to the knees.

"Where is he?" he insisted. "I've got to see your husband."

At length she answered, "So who knows where he is? Every time he thinks a new thought he runs to a different place. Go home, he will find you."

"Tell him Leo Finkle."

She gave no sign she had heard.

He walked downstairs, depressed.

But Salzman, breathless, stood waiting at his door.

Leo was astounded and overjoyed. "How did you get here before me?"

"I rushed."

"Come inside."

They entered. Leo fixed tea, and a sardine sandwich for Salzman. As they were drinking he reached behind him for the packet of pictures and handed them to the marriage broker.

Salzman put down his glass and said expectantly, "You found somebody you like?"

"Not among these."

The marriage broker turned away.

"Here is the one I want." Leo held forth the snapshot.

Salzman slipped on his glasses and took the picture into his trembling hand. He turned ghastly and let out a groan.

"What's the matter?" cried Leo.

"Excuse me. Was an accident this picture. She isn't for you."

Salzman frantically shoved the manila packet into his portfolio. He thrust the snapshot into his pocket and fled down the stairs.

Leo, after momentary paralysis, gave chase and cornered the marriage broker in the vestibule. The landlady made hysterical outcries but neither of them listened.

"Give me back the picture, Salzman."

"No." The pain in his eyes was terrible.

"Tell me who she is then."

"This I can't tell you. Excuse me."

He made to depart, but Leo, forgetting himself, seized the matchmaker by his tight coat and shook him frenziedly.

"Please," sighed Salzman. "Please."

Leo ashamedly let him go. "Tell me who she is," he begged. "It's very important for me to know."

"She is not for you. She is a wild one—wild, without shame. This is not a bride for a rabbi."

"What do you mean wild?"

"Like an animal. Like a dog. For her to be poor was a sin. This is why to me she is dead now."

"In God's name, what do you mean?"

"Her I can't introduce to you," Salzman said.

"Why are you so excited?"

"Why, he asks," Salzman said, bursting into tears. "This is my baby, my Stella, she should burn in hell."

Leo hurried up to bed and hid under the covers. Under the covers he thought his life through. Although he soon fell asleep he could not sleep her out of his mind. He woke, beating his breast. Though he prayed to be rid of her, his prayers went unanswered. Through days of torment he endlessly struggled not to love her; fearing success, he escaped it. He then concluded to convert her to goodness, himself to God. The idea alternately nauseated and exalted him.

He perhaps did not know that he had come to a final decision until he encountered Salzman in a Broadway cafeteria. He was sitting alone at a rear table, sucking the bony remains of a fish. The marriage broker appeared haggard, and transparent to the point of vanishing.

Salzman looked up at first without recognizing him. Leo had grown a pointed beard and his eyes were weighted with wisdom.

"Salzman," he said, "love has at last come to my heart."

"Who can love from a picture?" mocked the marriage broker.

"It is not impossible."

"If you can love her, then you can love anybody. Let me show you some new clients that they just sent me their photographs. One is a little doll."

"Just her I want," Leo murmured.

"Don't be a fool, doctor. Don't bother with her."

"Put me in touch with her, Salzman," Leo said humbly. "Perhaps I can be of service."

Salzman had stopped eating and Leo understood with emotion that it was now arranged.

Leaving the cafeteria, he was, however, afflicted by a tormenting suspicion that Salzman had planned it all to happen this way.

Leo was informed by letter that she would meet him on a certain corner, and she was there one spring night, waiting under a street lamp. He appeared, carrying a small bouquet of violets and rosebuds. Stella stood by the lamp post, smoking. She wore white with red shoes, which fitted his expectations, although in a troubled moment he had imagined the dress red, and only the shoes white. She waited uneasily and shyly. From afar he saw that her eyes—clearly her father's—were filled with desperate innocence. He pictured, in her, his own redemption. Violins and lit candles revolved in the sky. Leo ran forward with flowers outthrust.

Around the corner, Salzman, leaning against a wall, chanted prayers for the dead.

RALPH ELLISON

1914–1994

When Ralph Waldo Ellison began writing what would become Invisible Man (1952), American readers and critics were skeptical that black experience could rise to the level of “universal” significance that defined high literary ambition at the time. Asked in 1953 whether he thought “the Negro writer” could “escape provincialism when his literature is concerned with a minority,” Ellison stressed the universality of the individual human being. Ellison was true to the experience, thoughts, imagination, and inner truth of the individual in his fiction. He consciously departed from the model of his mentor, Richard Wright, setting aside the social realism perfected by Wright—and thereafter expected of black writers—in favor of the styles and techniques of Modernism. Inspired by Melville, Hemingway, Joyce, and others, he stepped away from realism to reconsider humanity through the eyes of an unnamed black narrator described only as “invisible.”

Ellison was born and raised in Oklahoma, won a state scholarship, and attended the Tuskegee Institute, where he was a music major, his instrument the trumpet. He embraced both the Western classical repertoire and the world of Kansas City jazz then just reaching its heyday. Befriending the blues singer Jimmy Rushing and other members of what would be the great Count Basie band of the 1930s, Ellison saw in this “deep, rowdy stream of jazz” the power and control that constituted art. His abiding love of music is found in some of the essays in his collection Shadow and Act (1964). Ellison also immersed himself in the visual arts, admiring the African American sculptor Richmond Barthé, with whom he studied for a short time after he arrived in New York City in the early 1940s. He invoked Picasso as a master artist who could transform folk content into universal form, and he was inspired by the photography in Richard Wright’s Twelve Million Black Voices (1941). Ellison collected art throughout his life, and readers of his fiction have noted that visual elements such as framing, color, shape, pigment, and the image of the canvas recur in his work as often as the more commonly noted elements of sound and music.

Ellison created Invisible Man through an arduous, seven-year process of planning and revision, inspired by his Modernist literary models and informed by his knowledge of music and the visual arts. When the novel was published in 1952, he was criticized for being less political than he should be as a black writer. The most prominent of these critics, Irving Howe, took the author to task for not following Wright’s lead and devoting his fiction to the “Negro cause”. Howe believed that African Americans should write social protest novels about the tragedy of black ghetto life. But Ellison’s intellectual sphere was much broader, and in his life he crossed and recrossed what W. E. B. Du Bois called “the color line.” He married a white woman at a time when this was against the law in several states, and he enjoyed an artistic circle that included not only the artists, writers, and musicians of the Harlem Renaissance but also the thriving Yiddish language writers in New York (an acquaintance reported that he was nearly fluent in Yiddish). Ellison wrote parts of Invisible Man at the office of a Jewish friend on Fifth Avenue, and in a letter he noted that white people at Radio City Music Hall looking through his windows as he typed seemed to think he was doing something obscene. For a short time he lived in the Hudson Valley with Saul Bellow, also featured in this volume, who was the son of Russian Jewish parents. Both Bellow and Ellison aspired to be great American writers.

"I wasn't, and am not, primarily concerned with injustice, but with art," Ellison declared. And yet he saw the novel as a driver of social change. "Serious literature" engaged what Ellison described as the "moral core" of a society; for Ellison, this meant the values of democracy and equality. Ellison called Invisible Man an "attempt to return to the mood of personal moral responsibility for democracy which typified the best of our nineteenth-century fiction." Readers may note that the narrator is told by a wealthy trustee to read Ralph Waldo Emerson (Ellison's namesake); the speech in "Battle Royal" sounds Emersonian, and references to Emerson and Melville can be found throughout the narrative. Ellison believed that in devoting himself to the novel as an art form, he took on "the responsibilities inherited by those who practice the craft in the U.S."—those of "describing for all that fragment of the huge diverse American experience which I know best" and of "shaping . . . the culture as I should like it to be." "The American novel," Ellison explained, "is in this sense a conquest of the frontier; as it describes our experience, it creates it."

Invisible Man won the National Book Award, and Ellison subsequently received a number of awards and lectureships. He taught at the Salzburg Seminar, Bard College, and the University of Chicago. In 1970 he was named Albert Schweitzer Professor of the Humanities at New York University, where he taught until his retirement. Always humble, Ellison called Invisible Man "an attempt" at a great novel, and he wondered whether it would "be around in 20 years." Ellison's self-critical habits of mind kept him from completing another book after Invisible Man; when he died in 1994 he left a mass of notes and manuscript material meant for several novels. Editors assembled the late novel Juneteenth (1999) from over 2,000 manuscript pages. A version of the novel Ellison worked on right after Invisible Man, titled Three Days Before the Shooting . . ., was similarly pieced together and published in 2010.

"Battle Royal," the excerpt from Invisible Man reprinted here, was originally published as a stand-alone story called "Invisible Man" in a 1947 issue of Cyril Connolly's Horizon, a leading British art and literature journal. It appeared in a special double issue titled "Art on the American Horizon," alongside contributions from the American poets Wallace Stevens, Marianne Moore, and E.E. Cummings; art critic Clement Greenberg; and media critic Marshall McLuhan. It was republished in the United States in 1948 as "Battle Royal" in '48: The Magazine of the Year. Because many readers assumed that black writers drew only from personal experience, the story was received as if it were fact. Ellison had to insist that the story was "an imaginative re-creation of certain aspects of our American life and the effect these have upon our personality. As such," he advised, "it is to be read as a near allegory or an extended metaphor. . . . The facts themselves are of no moment, are, for me, even amusing."

From Invisible Man

Prologue¹

I am an invisible man. No, I am not a spook like those who haunted Edgar Allan Poe; nor am I one of your Hollywood-movie ectoplasms. I am a man of substance, of flesh and bone, fiber and liquids—and I might even be said to possess a mind. I am invisible, understand, simply because people refuse to see me. Like the bodiless heads you see sometimes in circus sideshows, it is as though I have been surrounded by mirrors of hard, distorting glass.

1. Ras the Destroyer, Rinehart, and Brother Jack, mentioned in the prologue, are characters who will appear later in the novel.

When they approach me they see only my surroundings, themselves, or figments of their imagination—indeed, everything and anything except me.

Nor is my invisibility exactly a matter of a bio-chemical accident to my epidermis. That invisibility to which I refer occurs because of a peculiar disposition in the eyes of those with whom I come in contact. A matter of the construction of their inner eyes, those eyes with which they look through their physical eyes upon reality. I am not complaining, nor am I protesting either. It is sometimes advantageous to be unseen, although it is most often rather wearing on the nerves. Then too, you're constantly being bumped against by those of poor vision. Or again, you often doubt if you really exist. You wonder whether you aren't simply a phantom in other people's minds. Say, a figure in a nightmare which the sleeper tries with all his strength to destroy. It's when you feel like this that, out of resentment, you begin to bump people back. And, let me confess, you feel that way most of the time. You ache with the need to convince yourself that you do exist in the real world, that you're a part of all the sound and anguish, and you strike out with your fists, you curse and you swear to make them recognize you. And, alas, it's seldom successful.

One night I accidentally bumped into a man, and perhaps because of the near darkness he saw me and called me an insulting name. I sprang at him, seized his coat lapels and demanded that he apologize. He was a tall blond man, and as my face came close to his he looked insolently out of his blue eyes and cursed me, his breath hot in my face as he struggled. I pulled his chin down sharp upon the crown of my head, butting him as I had seen the West Indians do, and felt his flesh tear and the blood gush out, and I yelled, "Apologize! Apologize!" But he continued to curse and struggle, and I butted him again and again until he went down heavily, on his knees, profusely bleeding. I kicked him repeatedly, in a frenzy because he still uttered insults though his lips were frothy with blood. Oh yes, I kicked him! And in my outrage I got out my knife and prepared to slit his throat, right there beneath the lamplight in the deserted street, holding him in the collar with one hand, and opening the knife with my teeth—when it occurred to me that the man had not seen me, actually; that he, as far as he knew, was in the midst of a walking nightmare! And I stopped the blade, slicing the air as I pushed him away, letting him fall back to the street. I stared at him hard as the lights of a car stabbed through the darkness. He lay there, moaning on the asphalt; a man almost killed by a phantom. It unnerved me. I was both disgusted and ashamed. I was like a drunken man myself, wavering about on weakened legs. Then I was amused: Something in this man's thick head had sprung out and beaten him within an inch of his life. I began to laugh at this crazy discovery. Would he have awakened at the point of death? Would Death himself have freed him for wakeful living? But I didn't linger. I ran away into the dark, laughing so hard I feared I might rupture myself. The next day I saw his picture in the Daily News, beneath a caption stating that he had been "mugged." Poor fool, poor blind fool, I thought with sincere compassion, mugged by an invisible man!

Most of the time (although I do not choose as I once did to deny the violence of my days by ignoring it) I am not so overtly violent. I remember that I am invisible and walk softly so as not to awaken the sleeping ones. Sometimes it is best not to awaken them; there are few things in the world as dangerous as sleepwalkers. I learned in time though that it is possible to carry on a fight against them without their realizing it. For instance, I have been carrying on a fight with Monopolated Light & Power for some time now. I use their service and pay them nothing at all, and they don't know it. Oh, they suspect that power is being drained off, but they don't know where. All they know is that according to the master meter back there in their power station a hell of a lot of free current is disappearing somewhere into the jungle of Harlem. The joke, of course, is that I don't live in Harlem but in a border area. Several years ago (before I discovered the advantages of being invisible) I went through the routine process of buying service and paying their outrageous rates. But no more. I gave up all that, along with my apartment, and my old way of life: That way based upon the fallacious assumption that I, like other men, was visible. Now, aware of my invisibility, I live rent-free in a building rented strictly to whites, in a section of the basement that was shut off and forgotten during the nineteenth century, which I discovered when I was trying to escape in the night from Ras the Destroyer. But that's getting too far ahead of the story, almost to the end, although the end is in the beginning and lies far ahead.

The point now is that I found a home—or a hole in the ground, as you will. Now don't jump to the conclusion that because I call my home a "hole" it is damp and cold like a grave; there are cold holes and warm holes. Mine is a warm hole. And remember, a bear retires to his hole for the winter and lives until spring; then he comes strolling out like the Easter chick breaking from its shell. I say all this to assure you that it is incorrect to assume that, because I'm invisible and live in a hole, I am dead. I am neither dead nor in a state of suspended animation. Call me Jack-the-Bear,² for I am in a state of hibernation.

My hole is warm and full of light. Yes, full of light. I doubt if there is a brighter spot in all New York than this hole of mine, and I do not exclude Broadway. Or the Empire State Building on a photographer's dream night. But that is taking advantage of you. Those two spots are among the darkest of our whole civilization—pardon me, our whole culture (an important distinction, I've heard)—which might sound like a hoax, or a contradiction, but that (by contradiction, I mean) is how the world moves: Not like an arrow, but a boomerang. (Beware of those who speak of the spiral of history; they are preparing a boomerang. Keep a steel helmet handy.) I know; I have been boomeranged across my head so much that I now can see the darkness of lightness. And I love light. Perhaps you'll think it strange that an invisible man should need light, desire light, love light. But maybe it is exactly because I am invisible. Light confirms my reality, gives birth to my form. A beautiful girl once told me of a recurring nightmare in which she lay in the center of a large dark room and felt her face expand until it filled the whole room, becoming a formless mass while her eyes ran in bilious jelly up the chimney. And so it is with me. Without light I am not only invisible, but formless as well; and to be unaware of one's form is to live a death. I myself, after existing some twenty years, did not become alive until I discovered my invisibility.

That is why I fight my battle with Monopolated Light & Power. The deeper reason, I mean: It allows me to feel my vital aliveness. I also fight them for taking so much of my money before I learned to protect myself. In my hole in the basement there are exactly 1,369 lights. I've wired the entire ceiling, every inch of it. And not with fluorescent bulbs, but with the older, more-expensive-to-operate kind, the filament type. An act of sabotage, you know. I've already begun to wire the wall. A junk man I know, a man of vision, has supplied me with wire and sockets. Nothing, storm or flood, must get in the way of our need for light and ever more and brighter light. The truth is the light and light is the truth. When I finish all four walls, then I'll start on the floor. Just how that will go, I don't know. Yet when you have lived invisible as long as I have you develop a certain ingenuity. I'll solve the problem. And maybe I'll invent a gadget to place my coffee pot on the fire while I lie in bed, and even invent a gadget to warm my bed—like the fellow I saw in one of the picture magazines who made himself a gadget to warm his shoes! Though invisible, I am in the great American tradition of tinkers. That makes me kin to Ford, Edison and Franklin. Call me, since I have a theory and a concept, a “thinker-tinker.” Yes, I'll warm my shoes; they need it, they're usually full of holes. I'll do that and more.

2. Also the title of a 1940 jazz recording by Duke Ellington and his orchestra.

Now I have one radio-phonograph; I plan to have five. There is a certain acoustical deadness in my hole, and when I have music I want to feel its vibration, not only with my ear but with my whole body. I'd like to hear five recordings of Louis Armstrong playing and singing “What Did I Do to Be So Black and Blue”—all at the same time. Sometimes now I listen to Louis while I have my favorite dessert of vanilla ice cream and sloe gin. I pour the red liquid over the white mound, watching it glisten and the vapor rising as Louis bends that military instrument into a beam of lyrical sound. Perhaps I like Louis Armstrong because he's made poetry out of being invisible. I think it must be because he's unaware that he is invisible. And my own grasp of invisibility aids me to understand his music. Once when I asked for a cigarette, some jokers gave me a reefer, which I lighted when I got home and sat listening to my phonograph. It was a strange evening. Invisibility, let me explain, gives one a slightly different sense of time, you're never quite on the beat. Sometimes you're ahead and sometimes behind. Instead of the swift and imperceptible flowing of time, you are aware of its nodes, those points where time stands still or from which it leaps ahead. And you slip into the breaks and look around. That's what you hear vaguely in Louis' music.

Once I saw a prizefighter boxing a yokel. The fighter was swift and amazingly scientific. His body was one violent flow of rapid rhythmic action. He hit the yokel a hundred times when the yokel held up his arms in stunned surprise. But suddenly the yokel, rolling about in the gale of boxing gloves, struck one blow and knocked science, speed and footwork as cold as a well-digger's posterior. The smart money hit the canvas. The long shot got the nod. The yokel had simply stepped inside of his opponent's sense of time. So under the spell of the reefer I discovered a new analytical way of listening to music. The unheard sounds came through, and each melodic line existed of itself, stood out clearly from all the rest, said its piece, and waited patiently for the other voices to speak. That night I found myself hearing not only in time, but in space as well. I not only entered the music but descended, like Dante, into its depths. And beneath the swiftness of the hot tempo there was a slower tempo and a cave and I entered it and looked around and heard an old woman singing a spiritual as full of Weltschmerz as flamenco, and beneath that lay a still lower level on which I saw a beautiful girl the color of ivory pleading in a voice like my mother's as she stood before a group of slaveowners who bid for her naked body, and below that I found a lower level and a more rapid tempo and I heard someone shout:

"Brothers and sisters, my text this morning is the 'Blackness of Blackness.'"

And a congregation of voices answered: "That blackness is most black, brother, most black . . ."

"In the beginning . . ."

"At the very start," they cried.

". . . there was blackness . . ."

"Preach it . . ."

". . . and the sun . . ."

"The sun, Lawd . . ."

". . . was blood red . . ."

"Red . . ."

"Now black is . . ." the preacher shouted.

"Bloody . . ."

"I said black is . . ."

"Preach it, brother . . ."

". . . an' black ain't . . ."

"Red, Lawd, red: He said it's red!"

"Amen, brother . . ."

"Black will git you . . ."

"Yes, it will . . ."

". . . an' black won't . . ."

"Now, it won't!"

"It do . . ."

"It do, Lawd . . ."

". . . an' it don't."

"Halleluiah . . ."

". . . It'll put you, glory, glory, Oh my Lawd, in the WHALE'S BELLY."

"Preach it, dear brother . . ."

". . . an' make you tempt . . ."

"Good God a-mighty!"

"Old Aunt Nelly!"

"Black will make you . . ."

"Black . . ."

". . . or black will un-make you."

"Ain't it the truth, Lawd?"

And at that point a voice of trombone timbre screamed at me, "Git out of here, you fool! Is you ready to commit treason?"

And I tore myself away, hearing the old singer of spirituals moaning, "Go curse your God, boy, and die."

I stopped and questioned her, asked her what was wrong.

"I dearly loved my master, son," she said.

"You should have hated him," I said.

"He gave me several sons," she said, "and because I loved my sons I learned to love their father though I hated him too."

"I too have become acquainted with ambivalence," I said. "That's why I'm here."

"What's that?"

"Nothing, a word that doesn't explain it. Why do you moan?"

"I moan this way 'cause he's dead," she said.

"Then tell me, who is that laughing upstairs?"

"Them's my sons. They glad."

"Yes, I can understand that too," I said.

"I laughs too, but I moans too. He promised to set us free but he never could bring hisself to do it. Still I loved him . . ."

"Loved him? You mean . . .?"

"Oh, yes, but I loved something else even more."

"What more?"

"Freedom."

"Freedom," I said. "Maybe freedom lies in hating."

"Naw, son, it's in loving. I loved him and give him the poison and he withered away like a frost-bit apple. Them boys woulda tore him to pieces with they homemade knives."

"A mistake was made somewhere," I said, "I'm confused." And I wished to say other things, but the laughter upstairs became too loud and moan-like for me and I tried to break out of it, but I couldn't. Just as I was leaving I felt an urgent desire to ask her what freedom was and went back. She sat with her head in her hands, moaning softly; her leather-brown face was filled with sadness.

"Old woman, what is this freedom you love so well?" I asked around a corner of my mind.

She looked surprised, then thoughtful, then baffled. "I done forgot, son. It's all mixed up. First I think it's one thing, then I think it's another. It gits my head to spinning. I guess now it ain't nothing but knowing how to say what I got up in my head. But it's a hard job, son. Too much is done happen to me in too short a time. Hit's like I have a fever. Ever'time I starts to walk my head gits to swirling and I falls down. Or if it ain't that, it's the boys; they gits to laughing and wants to kill up the white folks. They's bitter, that's what they is . . ."

"But what about freedom?"

"Leave me 'lone, boy; my head aches!"

I left her, feeling dizzy myself. I didn't get far.

Suddenly one of the sons, a big fellow six feet tall, appeared out of nowhere and struck me with his fist.

"What's the matter, man?" I cried.

"You made Ma cry!"

"But how?" I said, dodging a blow.

"Askin' her them questions, that's how. Git outa here and stay, and next time you got questions like that, ask yourself!"

He held me in a grip like cold stone, his fingers fastening upon my windpipe until I thought I would suffocate before he finally allowed me to go. I stumbled about dazed, the music beating hysterically in my ears. It was dark. My head cleared and I wandered down a dark narrow passage, thinking I heard his footsteps hurrying behind me. I was sore, and into my being had come a profound craving for tranquillity, for peace and quiet, a state I felt I could never achieve. For one thing, the trumpet was blaring and the rhythm was too hectic. A tomtom beating like heart-thuds began drowning out the trumpet, filling my ears. I longed for water and I heard it rushing through the cold mains my fingers touched as I felt my way, but I couldn't stop to search because of the footsteps behind me.

"Hey, Ras," I called. "Is it you, Destroyer? Rinehart?"

No answer, only the rhythmic footsteps behind me. Once I tried crossing the road, but a speeding machine struck me, scraping the skin from my leg as it roared past.

Then somehow I came out of it, ascending hastily from this underworld of sound to hear Louis Armstrong innocently asking,

*What did I do
To be so black
And blue?*

At first I was afraid; this familiar music had demanded action, the kind of which I was incapable, and yet had I lingered there beneath the surface I might have attempted to act. Nevertheless, I know now that few really listen to this music. I sat on the chair's edge in a soaking sweat, as though each of my 1,369 bulbs had everyone become a klieg light³ in an individual setting for a third degree with Ras and Rinehart in charge. It was exhausting—as though I had held my breath continuously for an hour under the terrifying serenity that comes from days of intense hunger. And yet, it was a strangely satisfying experience for an invisible man to hear the silence of sound. I had discovered unrecognized compulsions of my being—even though I could not answer "yes" to their promptings. I haven't smoked a reefer since, however; not because they're illegal, but because to see around corners is enough (that is not unusual when you are invisible). But to hear around them is too much; it inhibits action. And despite Brother Jack and all that sad, lost period of the Brotherhood, I believe in nothing if not in action.

Please, a definition: A hibernation is a covert preparation for a more overt action.

Besides, the drug destroys one's sense of time completely. If that happened, I might forget to dodge some bright morning and some cluck would run me down with an orange and yellow street car, or a bilious bus! Or I might forget to leave my hole when the moment for action presents itself.

Meanwhile I enjoy my life with the compliments of Monopolated Light & Power. Since you never recognize me even when in closest contact with me, and since, no doubt, you'll hardly believe that I exist, it won't matter if you know that I tapped a power line leading into the building and ran it into my hole in the ground. Before that I lived in the darkness into which I was chased, but now I see. I've illuminated the blackness of my invisibility—and vice versa. And so I play the invisible music of my isolation. The last statement doesn't seem just right, does it? But it is; you hear this music simply because music is heard and seldom seen, except by musicians. Could this compulsion to put invisibility down in black and white be thus an urge to make music of invisibility? But I am an orator, a rabble rouser—Am? I was, and perhaps shall be again. Who knows? All sickness is not unto death, neither is invisibility.

I can hear you say, "What a horrible, irresponsible bastard!" And you're right. I leap to agree with you. I am one of the most irresponsible beings that ever lived. Irresponsibility is part of my invisibility; any way you face it, it is a denial. But to whom can I be responsible, and why should I be, when you refuse to see me? And wait until I reveal how truly irresponsible I am. Responsibility rests upon recognition, and recognition is a form of agreement. Take the man whom I almost killed: Who was responsible for that near murder—I? I don't think so, and I refuse it. I won't buy it. You can't give it to me. He bumped me, he insulted me. Shouldn't he, for his own personal safety, have recognized my hysteria, my "danger potential"? He, let us say, was lost in a dream world. But didn't he control that dream world—which, alas, is only too real!—and didn't he rule me out of it? And if he had yelled for a policeman, wouldn't I have been taken for the offending one? Yes, yes, yes! Let me agree with you, I was the irresponsible one; for I should have used my knife to protect the higher interests of society. Some day that kind of foolishness will cause us tragic trouble. All dreamers and sleepwalkers must pay the price, and even the invisible victim is responsible for the fate of all. But I shirked that responsibility; I became too snarled in the incompatible notions that buzzed within my brain. I was a coward . . .

3. Powerful arc light used in making movies.

But what did I do to be so blue? Bear with me.

Chapter I

[BATTLE ROYAL]

It goes a long way back, some twenty years. All my life I had been looking for something, and everywhere I turned someone tried to tell me what it was. I accepted their answers too, though they were often in contradiction and even self-contradictory. I was naïve. I was looking for myself and asking everyone except myself questions which I, and only I, could answer. It took me a long time and much painful boomeranging of my expectations to achieve a realization everyone else appears to have been born with: That I am nobody but myself. But first I had to discover that I am an invisible man!

And yet I am no freak of nature, nor of history. I was in the cards, other things having been equal (or unequal) eighty-five years ago. I am not ashamed of my grandparents for having been slaves. I am only ashamed of myself for having at one time been ashamed. About eighty-five years ago they were told that they were free, united with others of our country in everything pertaining to the common good, and, in everything social, separate like the fingers of the hand. And they believed it. They exulted in it. They stayed in their place, worked hard, and brought up my father to do the same. But my grandfather is the one. He was an odd old guy, my grandfather, and I am told I take after him. It was he who caused the trouble. On his deathbed he called my father to him and said, "Son, after I'm gone I want you to keep up the good fight. I never told you, but our life is a war and I have been a traitor all my born days, a spy in the enemy's country ever since I give up my gun back in the Reconstruction. Live with your head in the lion's mouth. I want you to overcome 'em with yeses, undermine 'em with grins, agree 'em to death and destruction, let 'em swoller you till they vomit or bust wide open." They thought the old man had gone out of his mind. He had been the meekest of men. The younger children were rushed from the room, the shades drawn and the flame of the lamp turned so low that it sputtered on the wick like the old man's breathing. "Learn it to the younguns," he whispered fiercely; then he died.

But my folks were more alarmed over his last words than over his dying. It was as though he had not died at all, his words caused so much anxiety. I was warned emphatically to forget what he had said and, indeed, this is the first time it has been mentioned outside the family circle. It had a tremendous effect upon me, however. I could never be sure of what he meant. Grandfather had been a quiet old man who never made any trouble, yet on his deathbed he had called himself a traitor and a spy, and he had spoken of his meekness as a dangerous activity. It became a constant puzzle which lay unanswered in the back of my mind. And whenever things went well for me I remembered my grandfather and felt guilty and uncomfortable. It was as though I was carrying out his advice in spite of myself. And to make it worse, everyone loved me for it. I was praised by the most lily-white men of the town. I was considered an example of desirable conduct—just as my grandfather had been. And what puzzled me was that the old man had defined it as treachery. When I was praised for my conduct I felt a guilt that in some way I was doing something that was really against the wishes of the white folks, that if they had understood they would have desired me to act just the opposite, that I should have been sulky and mean, and that that really would have been what they wanted, even though they were fooled and thought they wanted me to act as I did. It made me afraid that some day they would look upon me as a traitor and I would be lost. Still I was more afraid to act any other way because they didn't like that at all. The old man's words were like a curse. On my graduation day I delivered an oration in which I showed that humility was the secret, indeed, the very essence of progress. (Not that I believed this—how could I, remembering my grandfather?—I only believed that it worked.) It was a great success. Everyone praised me and I was invited to give the speech at a gathering of the town's leading white citizens. It was a triumph for our whole community.

It was in the main ballroom of the leading hotel. When I got there I discovered that it was on the occasion of a smoker, and I was told that since I was to be there anyway I might as well take part in the battle royal to be fought by some of my schoolmates as part of the entertainment. The battle royal came first.

All of the town's big shots were there in their tuxedos, wolfing down the buffet foods, drinking beer and whiskey and smoking black cigars. It was a large room with a high ceiling. Chairs were arranged in neat rows around three sides of a portable boxing ring. The fourth side was clear, revealing a gleaming space of polished floor. I had some misgivings over the battle royal, by the way. Not from a distaste for fighting, but because I didn't care too much for the other fellows who were to take part. They were tough guys who seemed to have no grandfather's curse worrying their minds. No one could mistake their toughness. And besides, I suspected that fighting a battle royal might detract from the dignity of my speech. In those pre-invisible days I visualized myself as a potential Booker T. Washington.⁴ But the other fellows didn't care too much for me either, and there were nine of them. I felt superior to them in my way, and I didn't like the manner in which we were all crowded together into the servants' elevator. Nor did they like my being there. In fact, as the warmly lighted floors flashed past the elevator we had words over the fact that I, by taking part in the fight, had knocked one of their friends out of a night's work.

4. African American author and educator (1856–1915).

We were led out of the elevator through a rococo hall into an anteroom and told to get into our fighting togs. Each of us was issued a pair of boxing gloves and ushered out into the big mirrored hall, which we entered looking cautiously about us and whispering, lest we might accidentally be heard above the noise of the room. It was foggy with cigar smoke. And already the whiskey was taking effect. I was shocked to see some of the most important men of the town quite tipsy. They were all there—bankers, lawyers, judges, doctors, fire chiefs, teachers, merchants. Even one of the more fashionable pastors. Something we could not see was going on up front. A clarinet was vibrating sensuously and the men were standing up and moving eagerly forward. We were a small tight group, clustered together, our bare upper bodies touching and shining with anticipatory sweat; while up front the big shots were becoming increasingly excited over something we still could not see. Suddenly I heard the school superintendent, who had told me to come, yell, "Bring up the shines, gentlemen! Bring up the little shines!"

We were rushed up to the front of the ballroom, where it smelled even more strongly of tobacco and whiskey. Then we were pushed into place. I almost wet my pants. A sea of faces, some hostile, some amused, ringed around us, and in the center, facing us, stood a magnificent blonde—stark naked. There was dead silence. I felt a blast of cold air chill me. I tried to back away, but they were behind me and around me. Some of the boys stood with lowered heads, trembling. I felt a wave of irrational guilt and fear. My teeth chattered, my skin turned to goose flesh, my knees knocked. Yet I was strongly attracted and looked in spite of myself. Had the price of looking been blindness, I would have looked. The hair was yellow like that of a circus kewpie doll, the face heavily powdered and rouged, as though to form an abstract mask, the eyes hollow and smeared a cool blue, the color of a baboon's butt. I felt a desire to spit upon her as my eyes brushed slowly over her body. Her breasts were firm and round as the domes of East Indian temples, and I stood so close as to see the fine skin texture and beads of pearly perspiration glistening like dew around the pink and erected buds of her nipples. I wanted at one and the same time to run from the room, to sink through the floor, or go to her and cover her from my eyes and the eyes of the others with my body; to feel the soft thighs, to caress her and destroy her, to love her and murder her, to hide from her, and yet to stroke where below the small American flag tattooed upon her belly her thighs formed a capital V. I had a notion that of all in the room she saw only me with her personal eyes.

And then she began to dance, a slow sensuous movement; the smoke of a hundred cigars clinging to her like the thinnest of veils. She seemed like a fair bird-girl girdled in veils calling to me from the angry surface of some gray and threatening sea. I was transported. Then I became aware of the clarinet playing and the big shots yelling at us. Some threatened us if we looked and others if we did not. On my right I saw one boy faint. And now a man grabbed a silver pitcher from a table and stepped close as he dashed ice water upon him and stood him up and forced two of us to support him as his head hung and moans issued from his thick bluish lips. Another boy began to plead to go home. He was the largest of the group, wearing dark red fighting trunks much too small to conceal the erection which projected from him as though in answer to the insinuating low-registered moaning of the clarinet. He tried to hide himself with his boxing gloves.

And all the while the blonde continued dancing, smiling faintly at the big shots who watched her with fascination, and faintly smiling at our fear. I noticed a certain merchant who followed her hungrily, his lips loose and drooling. He was a large man who wore diamond studs in a shirtfront which swelled with the ample paunch underneath, and each time the blonde swayed her undulating hips he ran his hand through the thin hair of his bald head and, with his arms upheld, his posture clumsy like that of an intoxicated panda, wound his belly in a slow and obscene grind. This creature was completely hypnotized. The music had quickened. As the dancer flung herself about with a detached expression on her face, the men began reaching out to touch her. I could see their beefy fingers sink into the soft flesh. Some of the others tried to stop them and she began to move around the floor in graceful circles, as they gave chase, slipping and sliding over the polished floor. It was mad. Chairs went crashing, drinks were spilt, as they ran laughing and howling after her. They caught her just as she reached a door, raised her from the floor, and tossed her as college boys are tossed at a hazing, and above her red, fixed-smiling lips I saw the terror and disgust in her eyes, almost like my own terror and that which I saw in some of the other boys. As I watched, they tossed her twice and her soft breasts seem to flatten against the air and her legs flung wildly as she spun. Some of the more sober ones helped her to escape. And I started off the floor, heading for the anteroom with the rest of the boys.

Some were still crying and in hysteria. But as we tried to leave we were stopped and ordered to get into the ring. There was nothing to do but what we were told. All ten of us climbed under the ropes and allowed ourselves to be blindfolded with broad bands of white cloth. One of the men seemed to feel a bit sympathetic and tried to cheer us up as we stood with our backs against the ropes. Some of us tried to grin. "See that boy over there?" one of the men said. "I want you to run across at the bell and give it to him right in the belly. If you don't get him, I'm going to get you. I don't like his looks." Each of us was told the same. The blindfolds were put on. Yet even then I had been going over my speech. In my mind each word was as bright as flame. I felt the cloth pressed into place, and frowned so that it would be loosened when I relaxed.

But now I felt a sudden fit of blind terror. I was unused to darkness. It was as though I had suddenly found myself in a dark room filled with poisonous cottonmouths. I could hear the bleary voices yelling insistently for the battle royal to begin.

"Get going in there!"

"Let me at that big nigger!"

I strained to pick up the school superintendent's voice, as though to squeeze some security out of that slightly more familiar sound.

"Let me at those black sonsabitches!" someone yelled.

"No, Jackson, no!" another voice yelled. "Here, somebody, help me hold Jack."

"I want to get at that ginger-colored nigger. Tear him limb from limb," the first voice yelled.

I stood against the ropes trembling. For in those days I was what they called ginger-colored, and he sounded as though he might crunch me between his teeth like a crisp ginger cookie.

Quite a struggle was going on. Chairs were being kicked about and I could hear voices grunting as with a terrific effort. I wanted to see, to see more desperately than ever before. But the blindfold was tight as a thick skin-puckering scab and when I raised my gloved hands to push the layers of white aside a voice yelled, "Oh, no you don't, black bastard! Leave that alone!"

"Ring the bell before Jackson kills him a coon!" someone boomed in the sudden silence. And I heard the bell clang and the sound of the feet scuffling forward.

A glove smacked against my head. I pivoted, striking out stiffly as someone went past, and felt the jar ripple along the length of my arm to my shoulder. Then it seemed as though all nine of the boys had turned upon me at once. Blows pounded me from all sides while I struck out as best I could. So many blows landed upon me that I wondered if I were not the only blindfolded fighter in the ring, or if the man called Jackson hadn't succeeded in getting me after all.

Blindfolded, I could no longer control my motions. I had no dignity. I stumbled about like a baby or a drunken man. The smoke had become thicker and with each new blow it seemed to sear and further restrict my lungs. My saliva became like hot bitter glue. A glove connected with my head, filling my mouth with warm blood. It was everywhere. I could not tell if the moisture I felt upon my body was sweat or blood. A blow landed hard against the nape of my neck. I felt myself going over, my head hitting the floor. Streaks of blue light filled the black world behind the blindfold. I lay prone, pretending that I was knocked out, but felt myself seized by hands and yanked to my feet. "Get going, black boy! Mix it up!" My arms were like lead, my head smarting from blows. I managed to feel my way to the ropes and held on, trying to catch my breath. A glove landed in my mid-section and I went over again, feeling as though the smoke had become a knife jabbed into my guts. Pushed this way and that by the legs milling around me, I finally pulled erect and discovered that I could see the black, sweat-washed forms weaving in the smoky-blue atmosphere like drunken dancers weaving to the rapid drum-like thuds of blows.

Everyone fought hysterically. It was complete anarchy. Everybody fought everybody else. No group fought together for long. Two, three, four, fought one, then turned to fight each other, were themselves attacked. Blows landed below the belt and in the kidney, with the gloves open as well as closed, and with my eye partly opened now there was not so much terror. I moved carefully, avoiding blows, although not too many to attract attention, fighting from group to group. The boys groped about like blind, cautious crabs crouching to protect their mid-sections, their heads pulled in short against their shoulders, their arms stretched nervously before them, with their fists testing the smoke-filled air like the knobbed feelers of hypersensitive snails. In one corner I glimpsed a boy violently punching the air and heard him scream in pain as he smashed his hand against a ring post. For a second I saw him bent over holding his hand, then going down as a blow caught his unprotected head. I played one group against the other, slipping in and throwing a punch then stepping out of range while pushing the others into the melee to take the blows blindly aimed at me. The smoke was agonizing and there were no rounds, no bells at three minute intervals to relieve our exhaustion. The room spun around me, a swirl of lights, smoke, sweating bodies surrounded by tense white faces. I bled from both nose and mouth, the blood spattering upon my chest.

The men kept yelling, "Slug him, black boy! Knock his guts out!"
"Uppercut him! Kill him! Kill that big boy!"

Taking a fake fall, I saw a boy going down heavily beside me as though we were felled by a single blow, saw a sneaker-clad foot shoot into his groin as the two who had knocked him down stumbled upon him. I rolled out of range, feeling a twinge of nausea.

The harder we fought the more threatening the men became. And yet, I had begun to worry about my speech again. How would it go? Would they recognize my ability? What would they give me?

I was fighting automatically when suddenly I noticed that one after another of the boys was leaving the ring. I was surprised, filled with panic, as though I had been left alone with an unknown danger. Then I understood. The boys had arranged it among themselves. It was the custom for the two men left in the ring to slug it out for the winner's prize. I discovered this too late. When the bell sounded two men in tuxedos leaped into the ring and removed the blindfold. I found myself facing Tatlock, the biggest of the gang. I felt sick at my stomach. Hardly had the bell stopped ringing in my ears than it clanged again and I saw him moving swiftly toward me. Thinking of nothing else to do I hit him smash on the nose. He kept coming, bringing the rank sharp violence of stale sweat. His face was a black blank of a face, only his eyes alive—with hate of me and aglow with a feverish terror from what had happened to us all. I became anxious. I wanted to deliver my speech and he came at me as though he meant to beat it out of me. I smashed him again and again, taking his blows as they came. Then on a sudden impulse I struck him lightly and as we clinched, I whispered, "Fake like I knocked you out, you can have the prize."

"I'll break your behind," he whispered hoarsely.

"For them?"

"For me, sonofabitch!"

They were yelling for us to break it up and Tatlock spun me half around with a blow, and as a joggled camera sweeps in a reeling scene, I saw the howling red faces crouching tense beneath the cloud of blue-gray smoke. For a moment the world wavered, unraveled, flowed, then my head cleared and Tatlock bounced before me. That fluttering shadow before my eyes was his jabbing left hand. Then falling forward, my head against his damp shoulder, I whispered,

"I'll make it five dollars more."

"Go to hell!"

But his muscles relaxed a trifle beneath my pressure and I breathed, "Seven?"

"Give it to your ma," he said, ripping me beneath the heart.

And while I still held him I butted him and moved away. I felt myself bombarded with punches. I fought back with hopeless desperation. I wanted to deliver my speech more than anything else in the world, because I felt that only these men could judge truly my ability, and now this stupid clown was ruining my chances. I began fighting carefully now, moving in to punch him and out again with my greater speed. A lucky blow to his chin and I had him going too—until I heard a loud voice yell, “I got my money on the big boy.”

Hearing this, I almost dropped my guard. I was confused: Should I try to win against the voice out there? Would not this go against my speech, and was not this a moment for humility, for nonresistance? A blow to my head as I danced about sent my right eye popping like a jack-in-the-box and settled my dilemma. The room went red as I fell. It was a dream fall, my body languid and fastidious as to where to land, until the floor became impatient and smashed up to meet me. A moment later I came to. An hypnotic voice said FIVE emphatically. And I lay there, hazily watching a dark red spot of my own blood shaping itself into a butterfly, glistening and soaking into the soiled gray world of the canvas.

When the voice drawled TEN I was lifted up and dragged to a chair. I sat dazed. My eye pained and swelled with each throb of my pounding heart and I wondered if now I would be allowed to speak. I was wringing wet, my mouth still bleeding. We were grouped along the wall now. The other boys ignored me as they congratulated Tatlock and speculated as to how much they would be paid. One boy whimpered over his smashed hand. Looking up front, I saw attendants in white jackets rolling the portable ring away and placing a small square rug in the vacant space surrounded by chairs. Perhaps, I thought, I will stand on the rug to deliver my speech.

Then the M.C. called to us, “Come on up here boys and get your money.”

We ran forward to where the men laughed and talked in their chairs, waiting. Everyone seemed friendly now.

“There it is on the rug,” the man said. I saw the rug covered with coins of all dimensions and a few crumpled bills. But what excited me, scattered here and there, were the gold pieces.

“Boys, it’s all yours,” the man said. “You get all you grab.”

“That’s right, Sambo,” a blond man said, winking at me confidentially.

I trembled with excitement, forgetting my pain. I would get the gold and the bills, I thought. I would use both hands. I would throw my body against the boys nearest me to block them from the gold.

“Get down around the rug now,” the man commanded, “and don’t anyone touch it until I give the signal.”

“This ought to be good,” I heard.

As told, we got around the square rug on our knees. Slowly the man raised his freckled hand as we followed it upward with our eyes.

I heard, “These niggers look like they’re about to pray!”

Then, “Ready,” the man said. “Go!”

I lunged for a yellow coin lying on the blue design of the carpet, touching it and sending a surprised shriek to join those rising around me. I tried frantically to remove my hand but could not let go. A hot, violent force tore through my body, shaking me like a wet rat. The rug was electrified. The hair bristled up on my head as I shook myself free. My muscles jumped, my nerves jangled, writhed. But I saw that this was not stopping the other boys. Laughing in fear and embarrassment, some were holding back and scooping up the coins knocked off by the painful contortions of the others. The men roared above us as we struggled.

"Pick it up, goddamnit, pick it up!" someone called like a bass-voiced parrot. "Go on, get it!"

I crawled rapidly around the floor, picking up the coins, trying to avoid the coppers and to get greenbacks and the gold. Ignoring the shock by laughing, as I brushed the coins off quickly, I discovered that I could contain the electricity—a contradiction, but it works. Then the men began to push us onto the rug. Laughing embarrassedly, we struggled out of their hands and kept after the coins. We were all wet and slippery and hard to hold. Suddenly I saw a boy lifted into the air, glistening with sweat like a circus seal, and dropped, his wet back landing flush upon the charged rug, heard him yell and saw him literally dance upon his back, his elbows beating a frenzied tattoo upon the floor, his muscles twitching like the flesh of a horse stung by many flies. When he finally rolled off, his face was gray and no one stopped him when he ran from the floor amid booming laughter.

"Get the money," the M.C. called. "That's good hard American cash!"

And we snatched and grabbed, snatched and grabbed. I was careful not to come too close to the rug now, and when I felt the hot whiskey breath descend upon me like a cloud of foul air I reached out and grabbed the leg of a chair. It was occupied and I held on desperately.

"Leggo, nigger! Leggo!"

The huge face wavered down to mine as he tried to push me free. But my body was slippery and he was too drunk. It was Mr. Colcord, who owned a chain of movie houses and "entertainment palaces." Each time he grabbed me I slipped out of his hands. It became a real struggle. I feared the rug more than I did the drunk, so I held on, surprising myself for a moment by trying to topple him upon the rug. It was such an enormous idea that I found myself actually carrying it out. I tried not to be obvious, yet when I grabbed his leg, trying to tumble him out of the chair, he raised up roaring with laughter, and, looking at me with soberness dead in the eye, kicked me viciously in the chest. The chair leg flew out of my hand and I felt myself going and rolled. It was as though I had rolled through a bed of hot coals. It seemed a whole century would pass before I would roll free, a century in which I was seared through the deepest levels of my body to the fearful breath within me and the breath seared and heated to the point of explosion. It'll all be over in a flash, I thought as I rolled clear. It'll all be over in a flash.

But not yet, the men on the other side were waiting, red faces swollen as though from apoplexy as they bent forward in their chairs. Seeing their fingers coming toward me I rolled away as a fumbled football rolls off the receiver's fingertips, back into the coals. That time I luckily sent the rug sliding out of place and heard the coins ringing against the floor and the boys scuffling to pick them up and the M.C. calling, "All right, boys, that's all. Go get dressed and get your money."

I was limp as a dish rag. My back felt as though it had been beaten with wires.

When we had dressed the M.C. came in and gave us each five dollars, except Tatlock, who got ten for being last in the ring. Then he told us to leave. I was not to get a chance to deliver my speech, I thought. I was going out into the dim alley in despair when I was stopped and told to go back. I returned to the ballroom, where the men were pushing back their chairs and gathering in groups to talk.

The M.C. knocked on a table for quiet. "Gentlemen," he said, "we almost forgot an important part of the program. A most serious part, gentlemen. This boy was brought here to deliver a speech which he made at his graduation yesterday . . ."

"Bravo!"

"I'm told that he is the smartest boy we've got out there in Greenwood. I'm told that he knows more big words than a pocket-sized dictionary."

Much applause and laughter.

"So now, gentlemen, I want you to give him your attention."

There was still laughter as I faced them, my mouth dry, my eye throbbing. I began slowly, but evidently my throat was tense, because they began shouting, "Louder! Louder!"

"We of the younger generation extol the wisdom of that great leader and educator," I shouted, "who first spoke these flaming words of wisdom: 'A ship lost at sea for many days suddenly sighted a friendly vessel. From the mast of the unfortunate vessel was seen a signal: "Water, water; we die of thirst!" The answer from the friendly vessel came back: "Cast down your bucket where you are." The captain of the distressed vessel, at last heeding the injunction, cast down his bucket, and it came up full of fresh sparkling water from the mouth of the Amazon River.' And like him I say, and in his words, 'To those of my race who depend upon bettering their condition in a foreign land, or who underestimate the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the Southern white man, who is his next-door neighbor, I would say: "Cast down your bucket where you are"—cast it down in making friends in every manly way of the people of all races by whom we are surrounded . . .'"

I spoke automatically and with such fervor that I did not realize that the men were still talking and laughing until my dry mouth, filling up with blood from the cut, almost strangled me. I coughed, wanting to stop and go to one of the tall brass, sand-filled spittoons to relieve myself, but a few of the men, especially the superintendent, were listening and I was afraid. So I gulped it down, blood, saliva and all, and continued. (What powers of endurance I had during those days! What enthusiasm! What a belief in the lightness of things!) I spoke even louder in spite of the pain. But still they talked and still they laughed, as though deaf with cotton in dirty ears. So I spoke with greater emotional emphasis. I closed my ears and swallowed blood until I was nauseated. The speech seemed a hundred times as long as before, but I could not leave out a single word. All had to be said, each memorized nuance considered, rendered. Nor was that all. Whenever I uttered a word of three or more syllables a group of voices would yell for me to repeat it. I used the phrase "social responsibility," and they yelled:

"What's that word you say, boy?"

"Social responsibility," I said.

"What?"

"Social . . ."

"Louder."

". . . responsibility."

"More!"

“Respon—”

“Repeat!”

“—sibility.”

The room filled with the uproar of laughter until, no doubt, distracted by having to gulp down my blood, I made a mistake and yelled a phrase I had often seen denounced in newspaper editorials, heard debated in private.

“Social . . .”

“What?” they yelled.

“. . . equality—”

The laughter hung smokelike in the sudden stillness. I opened my eyes, puzzled. Sounds of displeasure filled the room. The M.C. rushed forward. They shouted hostile phrases at me. But I did not understand.

A small dry mustached man in the front row blared out, “Say that slowly, son!”

“What, sir?”

“What you just said!”

“Social responsibility, sir,” I said.

“You weren’t being smart, were you, boy?” he said, not unkindly.

“No, sir!”

“You sure that about ‘equality’ was a mistake?”

“Oh, yes, sir,” I said. “I was swallowing blood.”

“Well, you had better speak more slowly so we can understand. We mean to do right by you, but you’ve got to know your place at all times. All right, now, go on with your speech.”

I was afraid. I wanted to leave but I wanted also to speak and I was afraid they’d snatch me down.

“Thank you, sir,” I said, beginning where I had left off, and having them ignore me as before.

Yet when I finished there was a thunderous applause. I was surprised to see the superintendent come forth with a package wrapped in white tissue paper, and, gesturing for quiet, address the men.

“Gentlemen, you see that I did not overpraise the boy. He makes a good speech and some day he’ll lead his people in the proper paths. And I don’t have to tell you that that is important in these days and times. This is a good, smart boy, and so to encourage him in the right direction, in the name of the Board of Education I wish to present him a prize in the form of this . . .”

He paused, removing the tissue paper and revealing a gleaming calfskin brief case.

“. . . in the form of this first-class article from Shad Whitmore’s shop.”

“Boy,” he said, addressing me, “take this prize and keep it well. Consider it a badge of office. Prize it. Keep developing as you are and some day it will be filled with important papers that will help shape the destiny of your people.”

I was so moved that I could hardly express my thanks. A rope of bloody saliva forming a shape like an undiscovered continent drooled upon the leather and I wiped it quickly away. I felt an importance that I had never dreamed.

“Open it and see what’s inside,” I was told.

My fingers a-tremble, I complied, smelling the fresh leather and finding an official-looking document inside. It was a scholarship to the state college for Negroes. My eyes filled with tears and I ran awkwardly off the floor.

I was overjoyed; I did not even mind when I discovered that the gold pieces I had scrambled for were brass pocket tokens advertising a certain make of automobile.

When I reached home everyone was excited. Next day the neighbors came to congratulate me. I even felt safe from grandfather, whose deathbed curse usually spoiled my triumphs. I stood beneath his photograph with my brief case in hand and smiled triumphantly into his stolid black peasant's face. It was a face that fascinated me. The eyes seemed to follow everywhere I went.

That night I dreamed I was at a circus with him and that he refused to laugh at the clowns no matter what they did. Then later he told me to open my brief case and read what was inside and I did, finding an official envelope stamped with the state seal; and inside the envelope I found another and another, endlessly, and I thought I would fall of weariness. "Them's years," he said. "Now open that one." And I did and in it I found an engraved document containing a short message in letters of gold. "Read it," my grandfather said. "Out loud!"

"To Whom It May Concern," I intoned. "Keep This Nigger-Boy Running."

I awoke with the old man's laughter ringing in my ears.

(It was a dream I was to remember and dream again for many years after. But at that time I had no insight into its meaning. First I had to attend college.)

1952

SAUL BELLOW

1915–2005

Winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1976, Saul Bellow distinguished himself through a writing career that spanned nearly two-thirds of a century. Bellow, the child of Russian Jewish immigrants, was born in Lachine, Quebec, a suburb of Montreal, and spent nine years there before moving with his family to Chicago. While relishing the style of big-city life typical of the 1920s and 1930s, he pursued an increasingly intellectual track through Tuley High School, the University of Chicago, and Northwestern University. Literature was always Bellow's great love, but as his biographer James Atlas explains, the antisemitic establishment was unreceptive to his ambitions. "In search of career advice," Atlas notes, Bellow sought counsel from the chair of Northwestern's English Department, William Frank Bryan, who warned him against postgraduate study in the field, because "no Jew could really grasp the tradition of English literature. . . . No Jew would ever have the right feeling for it." Bellow therefore began work toward a master's degree in sociology and anthropology at the University of Wisconsin. Discouraged by the technical work required and chided by his new advisor for being too literary, he dropped out after just one semester, returning to Chicago and a lifelong career in literature that involved teaching (initially at a downtown teachers college, later most prestigiously as a member of the University of Chicago's Committee on Social Thought), editing (first for the Encyclopaedia Britannica, then for his own journal, The Noble Savage), and writing fiction. Except for brief service in the bureaucracy of the merchant marine during World War II, a Guggenheim Fellowship year in Paris (1948–49), and some time living in New York City and the New England countryside, Bellow made Chicago his primary residence and the setting for his most characteristic work, most famously The Adventures of Augie March (1953). In finding a voice for the protagonist of this novel Bellow discovered his own style, a mix of the urban colloquial and the erudite.

Bellow's first novel, Dangling Man, was not published until he was nearly thirty. It is a short series of elegantly morose meditations, told through the journal of a young man waiting to be inducted into the army and with the "freedom" of having nothing to do but wait. Eventually he is drafted: "Long live regimentation," he sardonically exults. Bellow's second novel, The Victim (1947), continues the investigation of ways people strive to be relieved of self-determination. This book concerns a week in the life of Asa Leventhal, alone in New York City while his wife visits a relative; he is suddenly confronted by a figure from the past (Kirby Allbee, a Gentile) who succeeds in implicating Leventhal with the past and its present manifestations. The Victim is Bellow's most somberly naturalistic depiction of a man brought up against forces larger than himself, yet from the opening sentence ("On some nights New York is as hot as Bangkok") a poetic dimension appears and helps create the sense of mystery and disturbance felt by both the main character and the reader.

Dangling Man and The Victim are highly wrought, mainly humorless books; in two long novels published in the 1950s Bellow opened up into new ranges of aspiration and situational zaniness, which brought him respectful admiration from many critics. The Adventures of Augie March and Henderson the Rain King (1959) are each narrated by an "I" who, like Mark Twain's Huck Finn, is good at lighting out for the territory ahead of whoever means to tie him down. The hero's adventures, whether occurring in Chicago, Mexico, or Africa, are exuberantly delivered in an always stimulating and sometimes overactive prose. Augie is filled with sights and sounds, colors and surfaces; its tone is self-involved, affectionate, and affirmative; Henderson, Bellow's most extravagant narrative, has the even more fabulous air of a quest-romance, in which the hero returns home from Africa at peace with the world he had been warring against.

The ironic motto for Bellow's novels of the 1950s may well be "Seize the Day," as in the title of perhaps his most sharply defined piece of fiction. This short novel (1956) is both painful and exhilarating because it so fully exposes its hero (Tommy Wilhelm, an aging out-of-work ex-actor) to the insults of other people who don't understand him, to a city (New York, particularly its Upper West Side) impervious to his needs, and to a narrative prose that mixes ridicule and affection so thoroughly as to make them scarcely distinguishable. Seize the Day combines, within Tommy's monologues, a wildness and pathos of bitter comedy that was a powerful new element in Bellow's work.

In "Where Do We Go from Here? The Future of Fiction," an essay published in 1965, Bellow pointed out that nineteenth-century American literature—Emerson, Thoreau, Whitman, Melville—was highly didactic in its efforts to "instruct a young and raw nation." Bellow sees himself in this instructive tradition and in the international company of "didactic" novelists like Dostoyevsky, D. H. Lawrence, and Joseph Conrad; he believes also that "the imagination is looking for new ways to express virtue . . . we have barely begun to comprehend what a human being is." These concerns animate the novels Bellow wrote in the years since Henderson. In Herzog (1964) the hero is another down-and-outer, a professor-intellectual, a student of Romanticism and of the glorification of Self, which Herzog believes both modern life and modernist literature have been undercutting. At the same time he is a comic and pathetic victim of marital disorder; like all Bellow's heroes (and Bellow himself), Herzog has a terrible time with women, yet cannot live without them. In Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970), written out of the disorders of the late 1960s, the atmosphere is grimmer. Sammler, an aging Jew living (again) on New York's Upper West Side, analyzes and judges but cannot understand the young or blacks, or the mass of people gathered at Broadway and Ninety-Sixth Street. He sees about him everywhere "poverty of soul" but admits that he too has "a touch of the same disease—the disease of the single self explaining what was what and who was who."

These novels, as well as Humboldt's Gift (1975), have been accused of parading too single-handedly attitudes toward which their author is sympathetic, whereas The Dean's December (1982) was criticized by John Updike, in a review, for being too much "about Saul Bellow," even though indirectly. Subsequently, a collection of shorter fiction, Him with His Foot in His Mouth (1984); the novels More Die of Heartbreak (1987) and Ravelstein (2000); three novellas, The Bellarosa Connection (1989), A Theft (1989), and The Actual (1997); and three stories collected as Something to Remember Me By (1991) exhibit various talky, informal protagonists and narrators with a lot on their minds. Matters of form and plot in these works seem less important than the ideas and active energy struck off by human beings in turmoil—usually comic turmoil. What Bellow finds moving in Theodore Dreiser's work, "his balkiness and sullenness, and then his allegiance to life," is still found in his own: complaint and weariness, fault-finding, accusation of self and others—these gestures directed at "life" also make up the stuff of life and the "allegiance" out of which Bellow's heroes are made. We read him for this range of interest; for flexibility and diversity of style and idiom; and for the eloquences of nostalgia, invective, and lamentation that make up his intensely imagined world.

Married five times, he ended his academic career with a brief residency at Boston University, afterward retiring to rural Vermont, where he died two months short of his ninetieth birthday and five years after publishing Ravelstein, his nineteenth book and a work indicative of the conservative, traditionalist posture of his later career.

From The Adventures of Augie March

Chapter 1

I am an American, Chicago born—Chicago, that somber city—and go at things as I have taught myself, free-style, and will make the record in my own way: first to knock, first admitted; sometimes an innocent knock, sometimes a not so innocent. But a man's character is his fate, says Heraclitus,¹ and in the end there isn't any way to disguise the nature of the knocks by acoustical work on the door or gloving the knuckles.

Everybody knows there is no fineness or accuracy of suppression; if you hold down one thing you hold down the adjoining.

My own parents were not much to me, though I cared for my mother. She was simple-minded, and what I learned from her was not what she taught, but on the order of object lessons. She didn't have much to teach, poor woman. My brothers and I loved her. I speak for them both; for the elder it is safe enough; for the younger one, Georgie, I have to answer—he was born an idiot—but I'm in no need to guess, for he had a song he sang as he ran drag-footed with his stiff idiot's trot, up and down along the curl-wired fence in the backyard:

1. Early Greek philosopher (fl. c. 480 B.C.E.) famous for his cryptic aphorisms and for positing the existence of the human soul.

Georgie Mahchy, Augie, Simey
 Winnie Mahchy, evwy, evwy love Mama.

He was right about everyone save Winnie, Grandma Lausch's poodle, a pursy old overfed dog. Mama was Winnie's servant, as she was Grandma Lausch's. Loud-breathing and wind-breaking, she lay near the old lady's stool on a cushion embroidered with a Berber² aiming a rifle at a lion. She was personally Grandma's, belonged to her suite; the rest of us were the governed, and especially Mama. Mama passed the dog's dish to Grandma, and Winnie received her food at the old lady's feet from the old lady's hands. These hands and feet were small; she wore a shriveled sort of lisle on her legs and her slippers were gray—ah, the gray of that felt, the gray despotic to souls—with pink ribbons. Mama, however, had large feet, and around the house she wore men's shoes, usually without strings, and a dusting or mobcap like somebody's fanciful cotton effigy of the form of the brain. She was meek and long, round-eyed like Georgie—gentle green round eyes and a gentle freshness of color in her long face. Her hands were work-reddened, she had very few of her teeth left—to heed the knocks as they come—and she and Simon wore the same ravelly coat-sweaters. Besides having round eyes, Mama had circular glasses that I went with her to the free dispensary on Harrison Street³ to get. Coached by Grandma Lausch, I went to do the lying. Now I know it wasn't so necessary to lie, but then everyone thought so, and Grandma Lausch especially, who was one of those Machiavellis of small street and neighborhood that my young years were full of. So Grandma, who had it all ready before we left the house and must have put in hours plotting it out in thought and phrase, lying small in her chilly small room under the featherbed, gave it to me at breakfast. The idea was that Mama wasn't keen enough to do it right. That maybe one didn't need to be keen didn't occur to us; it was a contest. The dispensary would want to know why the Charities didn't pay for the glasses. So you must say nothing about the Charities, but that sometimes money from my father came and sometimes it didn't, and that Mama took boarders. This was, in a delicate and choosy way, by ignoring and omitting certain large facts, true. It was true enough for them, and at the age of nine I could appreciate this perfectly. Better than my brother Simon, who was too blunt for this kind of maneuver and, anyway, from books, had gotten hold of some English schoolboy notions of honor. *Tom Brown's Schooldays*⁴ for many years had an influence we were not in a position to afford.

Simon was a blond boy with big cheekbones and wide gray eyes and had the arms of a cricketer—I go by the illustrations; we never played anything but softball. Opposed to his British style was his patriotic anger at George III.⁵ The mayor was at that time ordering the schoolboard to get history books that dealt more harshly with the king, and Simon was very hot at Cornwallis.⁶ I admired this patriotic flash, his terrific personal wrath at the general, and his satisfaction over his surrender at Yorktown,⁷ which would

2. Non-Arab North African tribesman.

3. Downtown location of Chicago's social welfare agency.

4. Novel (1857) based on experiences at Rugby School, by the English jurist and religious reformer Thomas Hughes (1822–1896).

5. King (1738–1820) of England, Scotland, and Ireland during a period (r. 1760–1820) that included the American Revolution.

6. Charles Cornwallis (1738–1805), British general who made the final surrender in the American Revolution.

7. Village in southeast Virginia where in 1781 British forces surrendered to George Washington's Continental Army, effectively ending the American Revolution.

often come over him at lunch while we ate our bologna sandwiches. Grandma had a piece of boiled chicken at noon, and sometimes there was the gizzard for bristle-headed little Georgie, who loved it and blew at the ridgy thing more to cherish than to cool it. But this martial true-blood pride of Simon's disqualified him for the crafty task to be done at the dispensary; he was too disdainful to lie and might denounce everybody instead. I could be counted on to do the job, because I enjoyed it. I loved a piece of strategy. I had enthusiasms too; I had Simon's, though there was never much meat in Cornwallis for me, and I had Grandma Lausch's as well. As for the truth of these statements I was instructed to make—well, it was a fact that we had a boarder. Grandma Lausch was our boarder, not a relation at all. She was supported by two sons, one from Cincinnati and one from Racine, Wisconsin. The daughters-in-law did not want her, and she, the widow of a powerful Odessa⁸ businessman—a divinity over us, bald, whiskery, with a fat nose, greatly armored in a cutaway, a double-breasted vest, powerfully buttoned (his blue photo, enlarged and retouched by Mr. Lulov, hung in the parlor, doubled back between the portico columns of the full-length mirror, the dome of the stove beginning where his trunk ended)—she preferred to live with us, because for so many years she was used to direct a house, to command, to govern, to manage, scheme, devise, and intrigue in all her languages. She boasted French and German besides Russian, Polish, and Yiddish; and who but Mr. Lulov, the retouch artist from Division Street,⁹ could have tested her claim to French? And he was a serene bogus too, that triple-backed gallant tea-drinker. Except that he had been a hackie in Paris, once, and if he told the truth about that might have known French among other things, like playing tunes on his teeth with a pencil or singing and keeping time with a handful of coins that he rattled by jiggling his thumb along the table, and how to play chess.

Grandma Lausch played like Timur, whether chess or klabyasch,¹ with palatal catty harshness and sharp gold in her eyes. Klabyasch she played with Mr. Kreindl, a neighbor of ours who had taught her the game. A powerful stub-handed man with a large belly, he swatted the table with those hard hands of his, flinging down his cards and shouting "Shtoch! Yasch! Menél! Klabyasch!"² Grandma looked sardonically at him. She often said, after he left, "If you've got a Hungarian friend you don't need an enemy." But there was nothing of the enemy about Mr. Kreindl. He merely, sometimes, sounded menacing because of his drill-sergeant's bark. He was an old-time Austro-Hungarian³ conscript, and there was something soldierly about him: a neck that had strained with pushing artillery wheels, a campaigner's red in the face, a powerful bite in his jaw and gold-crowned teeth, green cockeyes and soft short hair, altogether Napoleonic.⁴ His feet slanted out on the ideal of

8. City in the Ukraine on the Black Sea, departure point for many Russian Jews who emigrated to North America in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

9. Commercial and shopping street on Chicago's North Side.

1. Card game taking its name from the Yiddish verb for "to gather." "Timur": also known as Tamerlane, Mongol warrior (1336–1405) whose conquests stretched from the Ukraine to northern India.

2. Successive winning tricks.

3. The dual monarchy of Austria and Hungary (1867–1918) encompassed Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, and parts of Poland, Romania, Italy, and the Balkans.

4. Era and style of Napoléon Bonaparte's (1769–1821) rule as Napoléon I, emperor of the French (1804–15).

Frederick the Great,⁵ but he was about a foot under the required height for guardsmen. He had a masterly look of independence. He and his wife—a woman quiet and modest to the neighbors and violently quarrelsome at home—and his son, a dental student, lived in what was called the English basement at the front of the house. The son, Kotzie, worked evenings in the corner drugstore and went to school in the neighborhood of County Hospital, and it was he who told Grandma about the free dispensary. Or rather, the old woman sent for him to find out what one could get from those state and county places. She was always sending for people, the butcher, the grocer, the fruit peddler, and received them in the kitchen to explain that the Marches had to have discounts. Mama usually had to stand by. The old woman would tell them, “You see how it is—do I have to say more? There’s no man in the house and children to bring up.” This was her most frequent argument. When Lubin, the caseworker, came around and sat in the kitchen, familiar, bald-headed, in his gold glasses, his weight comfortable, his mouth patient, she shot it at him: “How do you expect children to be brought up?” While he listened, trying to remain comfortable but gradually becoming like a man determined not to let a grasshopper escape from his hand. “Well, my dear, Mrs. March could raise your rent,” he said. She must often have answered—for there were times when she sent us all out to be alone with him—“Do you know what things would be like without me? You ought to be grateful for the way I hold them together.” I’m sure she even said, “And when I die, Mr. Lubin, you’ll see what you’ve got on your hands.” I’m one hundred per cent sure of it. To us nothing was ever said that might weaken her rule by suggesting it would ever end. Besides, it would have shocked us to hear it, and she, in her miraculous knowledge of us, able to be extremely close to our thoughts—she was one sovereign who knew exactly the proportions of love, respect, and fear of power in her subjects—understood how we would have been shocked. But to Lubin, for reasons of policy and also because she had to express feelings she certainly had, she must have said it. He had a harassed patience with her of “deliver me from such clients,” though he tried to appear master of the situation. He held his derby between his thighs (his suits, always too scanty in the pants, exposed white socks and bulldog shoes, crinkled, black, and bulging with toes), and he looked into the hat as though debating whether it was wise to release his grasshopper on the lining for a while.

“I pay as much as I can afford,” she would say.

She took her cigarette case out from under her shawl, she cut a Murad⁶ in half with her sewing scissors and picked up the holder. This was still at a time when women did not smoke. Save the intelligentsia—the term she applied to herself. With the holder in her dark little gums between which all her guile, malice, and command issued, she had her best inspirations of strategy. She was as wrinkled as an old paper bag, an autocrat, hard-shelled and jesuitical,⁷

5. Frederick II (1712–1786), called “the Great,” king of Prussia (r. 1740–86), patron of the arts and philosophy.

6. A Turkish cigarette, named for the Murad River.

7. Reference to the Society of Jesus, commonly called Jesuits, a Catholic religious order famous for its intellectual rigor, founded in 1540 by the Spanish priest Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556).

a pouncy old hawk of a Bolshevik,⁸ her small ribboned gray feet immobile on the shoekit and stool Simon had made in the manual-training class, dingy old wool Winnie whose bad smell filled the flat on the cushion beside her. If wit and discontent don't necessarily go together, it wasn't from the old woman that I learned it. She was impossible to satisfy. Kreindl, for example, on whom we could depend, Kreindl who carried up the coal when Mama was sick and who instructed Kotzie to make up our prescriptions for nothing, she called "that trashy Hungarian," or "Hungarian pig." She called Kotzie "the baked apple"; she called Mrs. Kreindl "the secret goose," Lubin "the shoemaker's son," the dentist "the butcher," the butcher "the timid swindler." She detested the dentist, who had several times unsuccessfully tried to fit her with false teeth. She accused him of burning her gums when taking the impressions. But then she tried to pull his hands away from her mouth. I saw that happen: the stolid, square-framed Dr. Wernick, whose compact forearms could have held off a bear, painfully careful with her, determined, concerned at her choked screams, and enduring her scratches. To see her struggle like that was no easy thing for me, and Dr. Wernick was sorry to see me there too, I know, but either Simon or I had to squire her wherever she went. Here particularly she needed a witness to Wernick's cruelty and clumsiness as well as a shoulder to lean on when she went weakly home. Already at ten I was only a little shorter than she and big enough to hold her small weight.

"You saw how he put his paws over my face so I couldn't breathe?" she said. "God made him to be a butcher. Why did he become a dentist? His hands are too heavy. The touch is everything to a dentist. If his hands aren't right he shouldn't be let practice. But his wife worked hard to send him through school and make a dentist of him. And I must go to him and be burned because of it."

The rest of us had to go to the dispensary—which was like the dream of a multitude of dentists' chairs, hundreds of them in a space as enormous as an armory, and green bowls with designs of glass grapes, drills lifted zigzag as insects' legs, and gas flames on the porcelain swivel trays—a thundery gloom in Harrison Street of limestone county buildings and cumbersome red streetcars with metal grillwork on their windows and monarchical iron whiskers of cowcatchers front and rear. They lumbered and clanged, and their brake tanks panted in the slushy brown of a winter afternoon or the bare stone brown of a summer's, salted with ash, smoke, and prairie dust, with long stops at the clinics to let off dumpers, cripples, hunchbacks, brace-legs, crutch-wielders, tooth and eye sufferers, and all the rest.

So before going with my mother for the glasses I was always instructed by the old woman and had to sit and listen with profound care. My mother too had to be present, for there must be no slip-up. She must be coached to say nothing. "Remember, Rebecca," Grandma would rerepeat, "let him answer everything." To which Mama was too obedient even to say yes, but only sat and kept her long hands folded on the bottle-fly iridescence of the dress the old woman had picked for her to wear. Very healthy and smooth, her color; none of us inherited this high a color from her, or the form of her nose with nostrils turned back and showing a little of the partition. "You keep out of it. If they ask you something, you look at Augie like this." And she illustrated how Mama was to turn to me, terribly exact, if she had only been able to drop her habitual grandeur. “Don’t tell anything. Only answer questions,” she said to me. My mother was anxious that I should be worthy and faithful. Simon and I were her miracles or accidents; Georgie was her own true work in which she returned to her fate after blessed and undeserved success. “Augie, listen to Grandma. Hear what she says,” was all she ever dared when the old woman unfolded her plan.

8. Left-wing political party allied with other Communist forces in the Russian Revolution (1917).

“When they ask you, ‘Where is your father?’ you say, ‘I don’t know where, miss.’ No matter how old she is, you shouldn’t forget to say ‘miss.’ If she wants to know where he was the last time you heard from him, you must tell her that the last time he sent a money order was about two years ago from Buffalo, New York. Never say a word about the Charity. The Charity you should never mention, you hear that? Never. When she asks you how much the rent is, tell her eighteen dollars. When she asks where the money comes from, say you have boarders. How many? Two boarders. Now, say to me, how much rent?”

“Eighteen dollars.”

“And how many boarders?”

“Two.”

“And how much do they pay?”

“How much should I say?”

“Eight dollars each a week.”

“Eight dollars.”

“So you can’t go to a private doctor, if you get sixty-four dollars a month. The eyedrops alone cost me five when I went, and he scalded my eyes. And these specs”—she tapped the case—“cost ten dollars the frames and fifteen the glasses.”

Never but at such times, by necessity, was my father mentioned. I claimed to remember him; Simon denied that I did, and Simon was right. I liked to imagine it.

“He wore a uniform,” I said. “Sure I remember. He was a soldier.”

“Like hell he was. You don’t know anything about it.”

“Maybe a sailor.”

“Like hell. He drove a truck for Hall Brothers laundry on Marshfield,⁹ that’s what he did. I said he used to wear a uniform. Monkey sees, monkey does; monkey hears, monkey says.” Monkey was the basis of much thought with us. On the sideboard, on the Turkestan runner, with their eyes, ears, and mouth covered, we had see-no-evil, speak-no-evil, hear-no-evil, a lower trinity of the house. The advantage of lesser gods is that you can take their names any way you like. “Silence in the courthouse, monkey wants to speak; speak, monkey, speak.” “The monkey and the bamboo were playing in the grass . . .” Still the monkeys could be potent, and awesome besides, and deep social critics when the old woman, like a great lama—for she is Eastern to me, in the end—would point to the squatting brown three, whose mouths and nostrils were drawn in sharp blood-red, and with profound wit, her unkindness finally touching greatness, say, “Nobody asks you to love the whole world, only to be honest, ehrlich.¹ Don’t have a loud mouth. The more you love people the more they’ll mix you up. A child loves, a person respects.

9. Commercial avenue on Chicago’s North Side.

1. Sincere (German).

Respect is better than love. And that's respect, the middle monkey." It never occurred to us that she sinned mischievously herself against that convulsed speak-no-evil who hugged his lips with his hands; but no criticism of her came near our minds at any time, much less when the resonance of a great principle filled the whole kitchen.

She used to read us lessons off poor Georgie's head. He would kiss the dog. This bickering handmaiden of the old lady, at one time. Now a dozy, long-sighing crank and proper object of respect for her years of right-minded but not exactly lovable busyness. But Georgie loved her—and Grandma, whom he would kiss on the sleeve, on the knee, taking knee or arm in both hands and putting his underlip forward, chaste, lummoxy, caressing, gentle and diligent when he bent his narrow back, blouse bagging all over it, whitish hair pointy and close as a burr or sunflower when the seeds have been picked out of it. The old lady let him embrace her and spoke to him in the following way: "Hey, you, boy, clever junge,² you like the old Grandma, my minister, my cavalier?³ That's-a-boy. You know who's good to you, who gives you gizzards and necks? Who? Who makes noodles for you? Yes. Noodles are slippery, hard to pick up with a fork and hard to pick up with the fingers. You see how the little bird pulls the worm? The little worm wants to stay in the ground. The little worm doesn't want to come out. Enough, you're making my dress wet." And she'd sharply push his forehead off with her old prim hand, having fired off for Simon and me, mindful always of her duty to wise us up, one more animadversion on the trustful, loving, and simple surrounded by the cunning-hearted and tough, a fighting nature of birds and worms, and a desperate mankind without feelings. Illustrated by Georgie. But the principal illustration was not Georgie but Mama, in her love-originated servitude, simpleminded, abandoned with three children. This was what old lady Lausch was driving at, now, in the later wisdom of her life, that she had a second family to lead.

And what must Mama have thought when in any necessary connection my father was brought into the conversation? She sat docile. I conceive that she thought of some detail about him—a dish he liked, perhaps meat and potatoes, perhaps cabbage or cranberry sauce; perhaps that he disliked a starched collar, or a soft collar; that he brought home the Evening American or the Journal.⁴ She thought this because her thoughts were always simple; but she felt abandonment, and greater pains than conscious mental ones put a dark streak to her simplicity. I don't know how she made out before, when we were alone after the desertion, but Grandma came and put a regulating hand on the family life. Mama surrendered powers to her that maybe she had never known she had and took her punishment in drudgery; occupied a place, I suppose, among women conquered by a superior force of love, like those women whom Zeus got the better of in animal form and who next had to take cover from his furious wife. Not that I can see my big, gentle, dilapidated, scrubbing, and lugging mother as a fugitive of immense beauty from such classy wrath, or our father as a marble-legged Olympian. She had sewed buttonholes in a coat factory in a Wells Street⁵ loft and he was a laundry

2. Young man (German).

3. Yiddish borrowing from the German kavalier (gentleman) and Polish kawaler (bachelor, gallant).

4. Chicago newspapers of the era.

5. Light-industrial street immediately north of Chicago's downtown area.

driver—there wasn't even so much as a picture of him left when he blew. But she does have a place among such women by the deeper right of continual payment. And as for vengeance from a woman, Grandma Lausch was there to administer the penalties under the standards of legitimacy, representing the main body of married womankind.

Still the old lady had a heart. I don't mean to say she didn't. She was tyrannical and a snob about her Odessa luster and her servants and governesses, but though she had been a success herself she knew what it was to fall through susceptibility. I began to realize this when I afterward read some of the novels she used to send me to the library for. She taught me the Russian alphabet so that I could make out the titles. Once a year she read Anna Karenina and Eugene Onegin.⁶ Occasionally I got into hot water by bringing a book she didn't want. "How many times do I have to tell you if it doesn't say roman I don't want it? You didn't look inside. Are your fingers too weak to open the book? Then they should be too weak to play ball or pick your nose. For that you've got strength! *Bozhe moy!*⁷ God in Heaven! You haven't got the brains of a cat, to walk two miles and bring me a book about religion because it says Tolstoi on the cover."

The old grande dame, I don't want to be misrepresenting her. She was suspicious of what could have been, given one wrong stitch of heredity, a family vice by which we could have been exploited. She didn't want to read Tolstoi on religion. She didn't trust him as a family man because the countess had had such trouble with him. But although she never went to the synagogue, ate bread on Passover, sent Mama to the pork butcher where meat was cheaper, loved canned lobster and other forbidden food, she was not an atheist and free-thinker. Mr. Anticol, the old junky she called (search me why) "Rameses"—after the city named with Pithom in the Scriptures maybe;⁸ no telling what her inspirations were—was that. A real rebel to God. Icy and canny, she would listen to what he had to say and wouldn't declare herself. He was ruddy, and gloomy; his leathery serge cap made him flat-headed, and his alley calls for rags, old iron—"recks aline," he sung it—made him gravel-voiced and gruff. He had tough hair and brows and despising brown eyes; he was a studious, shaggy, meaty old man. Grandma bought a set of the Encyclopedia Americana—edition of 1892, I think—from him and saw to it that Simon and I read it; and he too, whenever he met us, asked, "How's the set?" believing, I reckon, that it taught irreverence to religion. What had made him an atheist was a massacre of Jews in his town. From the cellar where he was hidden he saw a laborer pissing on the body of his wife's younger brother, just killed. "So don't talk to me about God," he said. But it was he that talked about God, all the time. And while Mrs. Anticol stayed pious, it was his idea of grand apostasy to drive to the reform synagogue on the high holidays and park his pink-eye nag among the luxurious, whirl-wired touring cars of the rich Jews who bared their heads inside as if they were attending a theater, a kind of abjectness in them that gave him grim entertainment to the end of his life. He caught a cold in the rain and died of pneumonia.

6. Verse narrative (1823–31) by the Russian poet Aleksandr Pushkin (1799–1837). "Anna Karenina"; novel (1875–77) by the Russian novelist Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910).

7. My God! (Russian).

8. Exodus 1.11: "Therefore they set taskmasters over them to afflict them with heavy burdens; and they built for Pharaoh store-cities, Pithom and Raamses."

Grandma, all the same, burned a candle on the anniversary of Mr. Lausch's death, threw a lump of dough on the coals when she was baking, as a kind of offering, had incantations over baby teeth and stunts against the evil eye. It was kitchen religion and had nothing to do with the giant God of the Creation who turned back the waters and exploded Gomorrah, but it was on the side of religion at that. And while we're on that side I'll mention the Poles—we were just a handful of Jews among them in the neighborhood—and the swollen, bleeding hearts on every kitchen wall, the pictures of saints, baskets of death flowers tied at the door, communions, Easters, and Christmases. And sometimes we were chased, stoned, bitten, and beat up for Christ-killers, all of us, even Georgie, articed, whether we liked it or not, to this mysterious trade. But I never had any special grief from it, or brooded, being by and large too larky and boisterous to take it to heart, and looked at it as needing no more special explanation than the stone-and-bat wars of the street gangs or the swarming on a fall evening of parish punks to rip up fences, screech and bawl at girls, and beat up strangers. It wasn't in my nature to fatigue myself with worry over being born to this occult work, even though some of my friends and playmates would turn up in the middle of these mobs to trap you between houses from both ends of a passageway. Simon had less truck with them. School absorbed him more, and he had his sentiments anyway, a mixed extract from Natty Bumppo, Quentin Durward, Tom Brown, Clark at Kaskaskia, the messenger who brought the good news from Ratisbon,⁹ and so on, that kept him more to himself. I was just a slow understudy to this, just as he never got me to put in hours on his Sandow muscle builder¹ and the gimmick for developing the sinews of the wrist. I was an easy touch for friendships, and most of the time they were cut short by older loyalties. I was pals longest with Stashu Kopecs, whose mother was a midwife graduated from the Aesculapian School of Midwifery on Milwaukee Avenue.² Well to do, the Kopecses had an electric player piano and linoleums in all the rooms, but Stashu was a thief, and to run with him I stole too: coal off the cars, clothes from the lines, rubber balls from the dime store, and pennies off the newsstands. Mostly for the satisfaction of dexterity, though Stashu invented the game of stripping in the cellar and putting on girls' things swiped from the clotheslines. Then he too showed up in a gang that caught me one cold afternoon of very little snow while I was sitting on a crate frozen into the mud, eating Nabisco³ wafers, my throat full of the sweet dust. Foremost, there was a thug of a kid, about thirteen but undersized, hard and grieved-looking. He came up to accuse me, and big Moonya Staplanski, just out of the St. Charles Reformatory⁴ and headed next for the one at Pontiac,⁵ backed him up.

"You little Jew bastard, you hit my brother," Moonya said.

9. The French name for the German city of Regensburg, which was captured by Napoleon's armies in 1809. "Natty Bumppo": protagonist of the Leatherstocking novels by the American novelist James Fenimore Cooper (1789–1851). "Quentin Durward": eponymous hero in the novel (1823) by the Scottish poet and novelist Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832). "Tom Brown": see n. 4, p. 211. "Clark at Kaskaskia": the American military leader George Rogers Clark (1752–1818) captured the British frontier fort at Kaskaskia, Illinois, in 1778.

1. Device named after Eugen Sandow (1867–1925), American physical culturist born in Germany, famous for his performances as a bodybuilder and for advocacy of physical education.

2. Commercial and shopping street on Chicago's North Side, at this time a Polish-American neighborhood.

3. Brand name of the National Biscuit Company.

4. Site of the Illinois State Reformatory for Boys.

5. Site of the Illinois Correctional Center.

"I never did. I never even saw him before."

"You took away a nickel from him. How did you buy them biscuits else, you?"

"I got them at home."

Then I caught sight of Stashu, hayheaded and jeering, pleased to sickness with his deceit and his new-revealed brotherhood with the others, and I said, "Hey, you lousy bed-wetter, Stashu, you know Moon ain't even got a brother."

Here the kid hit me and the gang jumped me, Stashu with the rest, tearing the buckles from my sheepskin coat and bloodying my nose.

"Who is to blame?" said Grandma Lausch when I came home. "You know who? You are, Augie, because that's all the brains you have to go with that piss-in-bed *accoucherka's*⁶ son. Does Simon hang around with them? Not Simon. He has too much sense." I thanked God she didn't know about the stealing. And in a way, because that was her schooling temperament, I suspect she was pleased that I should see where it led to give your affections too easily. But Mama, the prime example of this weakness, was horrified. Against the old lady's authority she didn't dare to introduce her feelings during the hearing, but when she took me into the kitchen to put a compress on me she near-sightedly pored over my scratches, whispering and sighing to me, while Georgie tottered around behind her, long and white, and Winnie lapped water under the sink.

1953

6. Yiddish borrowing from the Polish akuszerka (midwife).

ARTHUR MILLER

1915–2005

For much modern American drama the family is the central subject, as the anthology selections show. In Long Day's Journey into Night Eugene O'Neill studied his own family through the Tyrones; in Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire the Kowalskis are one family, which Blanche invades, while Blanche and Stella, as sisters, are another. Most of Arthur Miller's plays, as well, concentrate on the family and envision an ideal world as, perhaps, an enlarged family. Often the protagonist's sense of family draws him into conflict with—and eventual doom in—the outside world. Yet Miller recognized that an ideal is sometimes a rationalization. Joe Keller insists in All My Sons (1947) that during the war he shipped damaged airplane parts to support his family, but a desire for commercial success was part of his motive. Eddie Carbone in A View from the Bridge (1955) accepts death because of his sense of responsibility to his niece, but married man though he is, he may also be in love with that same niece. In Death of a Salesman (1949) Willy Loman's delusions and self-deceptions derive from, and return to, his image of himself as family provider, an image he cannot live up to; driven by his desire to be “well liked,” a successful social personality, he fails to connect with either of his sons and neglects his wife. Thus Miller’s treatment of the family leads to a treatment both of personal ideals and of the society within which families have to operate.

Miller was born into a German Jewish family in Manhattan; his father was a well-to-do but almost illiterate clothing manufacturer, his mother an avid reader. When his father’s business collapsed after the stock market crash in 1929, the family moved to Brooklyn, where Miller graduated from high school. His subsequent two years of work in an automobile-parts warehouse to earn money for college tuition are warmly recalled in his play A Memory of Two Mondays (1955). At the University of Michigan he enrolled as a journalism student. These were the years of the Spanish Civil War, the rise of fascism, and the attraction of Marxism as a way out of the Depression, and here Miller formed his political views. He also began to write plays, which won prizes at the university and in New York. He then went to work for the Federal Theater Project, wrote radio plays, toured army camps to gather material for a film, and married Mary Slattery, the first of his three wives.

In 1947 Miller enjoyed his first Broadway success, All My Sons. (The Man Who Had All the Luck had failed in 1944.) This strongly realistic portrayal of a family divided because of the father’s insistence on business as usual during World War II drew the attention of audiences and theater critics. Death of a Salesman, his masterpiece, was produced two years later and won the Pulitzer Prize. An adaptation of Ibsen’s An Enemy of the People followed in 1951. It was suggested to him by the actors Fredric March and Florence Eldridge, but Miller was clearly drawn by Ibsen’s hero, Dr. Stockmann, who leads a fight against pollution with strong but confused idealism.

In the early 1950s, the hysterical search for supposed Communist infiltration of American life reached its height as Senator Joseph McCarthy summoned suspect after suspect to hearings in Washington. Miller later said that at this time he was reading a book about the Salem witch trials and saw that “the main point of the hearings, precisely as in seventeenth-century Salem, was that the accused make public confession, damn his confederates as well as his Devil master, and guarantee his sterling new allegiance by breaking disgusting old vows—whereupon he was let loose to rejoin the society of extremely decent people.” Out of this insight came The Crucible (1953), in which the hero, John Proctor, allows himself to be executed rather than sign away his name and his children’s respect. Hysteria touched Miller personally when he was denied a passport and in 1957 was convicted of contempt of Congress for refusing to name suspected Communists (this conviction was unanimously overturned by the Supreme Court the following year).

Miller had long been looking for a way to dramatize what he had earlier learned about mob control of the Brooklyn waterfront and finally did so in the one-act play A View from the Bridge, produced with A Memory of Two Mondays in 1955; later he would rework View into a full-length play. Meanwhile, he had met the glamorous movie actress Marilyn Monroe; they married in 1956, after he divorced his first wife. He wrote the screenplay The Misfits for Monroe, but in their private life, their complex natures were ill-sorted. The marriage ended in divorce in 1961, and a year later he married the photographer Ingeborg Morath, with whom he collaborated on several books of photographs and essays.

In 1964 two plays opened: After the Fall (in which the protagonist is a thinly disguised Miller investigating his family, his responsibilities, and his wives) and Incident at Vichy (about Jews and Nazis in Vichy, France). While these were by no means as successful as Salesman, they returned him seriously to the stage. Among later plays are The Price (1968), The Creation of the World and Other Business (1972), The Archbishop’s Ceiling (1977), and two one-act plays under the title Danger: Memory! (1986). These last fared poorly in New York, but found successful productions elsewhere in the world.

Actor Lee J. Cobb as Willy Loman being restrained by actors Arthur Kennedy (left) and Cameron Mitchell (right) as his sons Biff and Hap, respectively, in the 1949 original Broadway production of Death of a Salesman.

Miller in his later years was something of an activist. In the late 1960s he was asked to become president of PEN (Poets, Essayists, Novelists), the international writers' group. By opening this organization to writers in what were then Iron Curtain countries and speaking out for those repressed by totalitarian regimes, he became a respected champion of human rights.

Like his contemporary Tennessee Williams, Miller rejected the influence of "mawkish twenties slang" and "deadly repetitiveness." Again like Williams, Miller was impatient with prosy dialogue and well-made structures. As he explained, the success of A Streetcar Named Desire in 1947 helped him write Death of a Salesman:

With Streetcar, Tennessee had printed a license to speak at full throat, and it helped strengthen me as I turned to Willy Loman, a salesman always full of words, and better yet, a man who could never cease trying, like Adam, to name himself and the world's wonders. I had known all along that this play could not be encompassed by conventional realism, and for one integral reason: in Willy the past was as alive as what was happening at the moment, sometimes even crashing in to completely overwhelm his mind. I wanted precisely the same fluidity of form.

In Salesman the action moves effortlessly from the present—the last twenty-four hours of Willy's life—into moments in his memory, symbolized in the stage setting by the idyllic leaves around his house that, in these past moments, block out the threatening apartment houses. The successful realization of this fluidity on the stage was greatly aided by Miller's director, Elia Kazan, and his stage designer, Jo Mielziner, both of whom had worked with Williams two years earlier on Streetcar. A striking difference between Williams and Miller, however, is the latter's overt moralizing, which adds a didactic element to his plays not to be found in those of Williams.

The text is from Arthur Miller's Collected Plays (1957).

Death of a Salesman

Certain Private Conversations in Two Acts and a Requiem

THE CHARACTERS

WILLY LOMAN	THE WOMAN	JENNY
LINDA	CHARLEY	STANLEY
BIFF	UNCLE BEN	MISS FORSYTHE
HAPPY	HOWARD WAGNER	LETTA
BERNARD

The action takes place in WILLY LOMAN's house and yard and in various places he visits in the New York and Boston of today.

Act One

A melody is heard, playing upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon. The curtain rises.

Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry flow of orange. As more light appears, we see a solid vault of apartment houses around the small, fragile-seeming home. An air of the dream clings to the place, a dream rising out of reality. The kitchen at center seems actual enough, for there is a kitchen table with three chairs, and a refrigerator. But no other fixtures are seen. At the back of the kitchen there is a draped entrance, which leads to the living-room. To the right of the kitchen, on a level raised two feet, is a bedroom furnished only with a brass bedstead and a straight chair. On a shelf over the bed a silver athletic trophy stands. A window opens onto the apartment house at the side.

Behind the kitchen, on a level raised six and a half feet, is the boys' bedroom, at present barely visible. Two beds are dimly seen, and at the back of the room a dormer window. (This bedroom is above the unseen living-room.) At the left a stairway curves up to it from the kitchen.

The entire setting is wholly or, in some places, partially transparent. The roofline of the house is one-dimensional; under and over it we see the apartment buildings. Before the house lies an apron, curving beyond the forestage into the orchestra. This forward area serves as the back yard as well as the locale of all WILLY's imaginings and of his city scenes. Whenever the action is in the present the actors observe the imaginary wall-lines, entering the house only through its door at the left. But in the scenes of the past these boundaries are broken, and characters enter or leave a room by stepping "through" a wall onto the forestage.

From the right, WILLY LOMAN, the Salesman, enters, carrying two large sample cases. The flute plays on. He hears but is not aware of it. He is past sixty years of age, dressed quietly. Even as he crosses the stage to the doorway of the house, his exhaustion is apparent. He unlocks the door, comes into the kitchen, and thankfully lets his burden down, feeling the soreness of his palms. A word-sigh escapes his lips—it might be "Oh, boy, oh, boy." He closes the door, then carries his cases out into the living-room, through the draped kitchen doorway.

LINDA, his wife, has stirred in her bed at the right. She gets out and puts on a robe, listening. Most often jovial, she has developed an iron repression of her exceptions to WILLY's behavior—she more than loves him, she admires him, as though his mercurial nature, his temper, his massive dreams and little cruelties, served her only as sharp reminders of the turbulent longings within him, longings which she shares but lacks the temperament to utter and follow to their end.

LINDA [hearing WILLY outside the bedroom, calls with some trepidation]

Willy!

WILLY It's all right. I came back.

LINDA Why? What happened? [slight pause] Did something happen, Willy?

WILLY No, nothing happened.

LINDA You didn't smash the car, did you?

WILLY [with casual irritation] I said nothing happened. Didn't you hear me?

LINDA Don't you feel well?

WILLY I'm tired to the death. [The flute has faded away. He sits on the bed beside her, a little numb.] I couldn't make it. I just couldn't make it, Linda.

LINDA [very carefully, delicately] Where were you all day? You look terrible.

WILLY I got as far as a little above Yonkers. I stopped for a cup of coffee.

Maybe it was the coffee.

LINDA What?

WILLY [after a pause] I suddenly couldn't drive any more. The car kept going off onto the shoulder, y'know?

LINDA [helpfully] Oh. Maybe it was the steering again. I don't think Angelo knows the Studebaker.

WILLY No, it's me, it's me. Suddenly I realize I'm goin' sixty miles an hour and I don't remember the last five minutes. I'm—I can't seem to—keep my mind to it.

LINDA Maybe it's your glasses. You never went for your new glasses.

WILLY No, I see everything. I came back ten miles an hour. It took me nearly four hours from Yonkers.

LINDA [resigned] Well, you'll just have to take a rest, Willy, you can't continue this way.

WILLY I just got back from Florida.

LINDA But you didn't rest your mind. Your mind is overactive, and the mind is what counts, dear.

WILLY I'll start out in the morning. Maybe I'll feel better in the morning. [She is taking off his shoes.] These goddam arch supports are killing me.

LINDA Take an aspirin. Should I get you an aspirin? It'll soothe you.

WILLY [with wonder] I was driving along, you understand? And I was fine. I was even observing the scenery. You can imagine, me looking at scenery, on the road every week of my life. But it's so beautiful up there, Linda, the trees are so thick, and the sun is warm. I opened the windshield and just let the warm air bathe over me. And then all of a sudden I'm goin' off the road! I'm tellin' ya, I absolutely forgot I was driving. If I'd've gone the other way over the white line I might've killed somebody. So I went on again—and five minutes later I'm dreamin' again, and I nearly— [He presses two fingers against his eyes.] I have such thoughts, I have such strange thoughts.

LINDA Willy, dear. Talk to them again. There's no reason why you can't work in New York.

WILLY They don't need me in New York. I'm the New England man. I'm vital in New England.

LINDA But you're sixty years old. They can't expect you to keep traveling every week.

WILLY I'll have to send a wire to Portland. I'm supposed to see Brown and Morrison tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to show the line. Goddammit, I could sell them! [He starts putting on his jacket.]

LINDA [taking the jacket from him] Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear.

WILLY If old man Wagner was alive I'd a been in charge of New York now! That man was a prince, he was a masterful man. But that boy of his, that Howard, he don't appreciate. When I went north the first time, the Wagner Company didn't know where New England was!

LINDA Why don't you tell those things to Howard, dear?

WILLY [encouraged] I will, I definitely will. Is there any cheese?

LINDA I'll make you a sandwich.

WILLY No, go to sleep. I'll take some milk. I'll be up right away. The boys in?

LINDA They're sleeping. Happy took Biff on a date tonight.

WILLY [interested] That so?

LINDA It was so nice to see them shaving together, one behind the other, in the bathroom. And going out together. You notice? The whole house smells of shaving lotion.

WILLY Figure it out. Work a lifetime to pay off a house. You finally own it, and there's nobody to live in it.

LINDA Well, dear, life is a casting off. It's always that way.

WILLY No, no, some people—some people accomplish something. Did Biff say anything after I went this morning?

LINDA You shouldn't have criticized him, Willy, especially after he just got off the train. You mustn't lose your temper with him.

WILLY When the hell did I lose my temper? I simply asked him if he was making any money. Is that a criticism?

LINDA But, dear, how could he make any money?

WILLY [worried and angered] There's such an undercurrent in him. He became a moody man. Did he apologize when I left this morning?

LINDA He was crestfallen, Willy. You know how he admires you. I think if he finds himself, then you'll both be happier and not fight any more.

WILLY How can he find himself on a farm? Is that a life? A farmhand? In the beginning, when he was young, I thought, well, a young man, it's good for him to tramp around, take a lot of different jobs. But it's more than ten years now and he has yet to make thirty-five dollars a week?

LINDA He's finding himself, Willy.

WILLY Not finding yourself at the age of thirty-four is a disgrace!

LINDA Shh!

WILLY The trouble is he's lazy, goddammit!

LINDA Willy, please!

WILLY Biff is a lazy bum!

LINDA They're sleeping. Get something to eat. Go on down.

WILLY Why did he come home? I would like to know what brought him home.

LINDA I don't know. I think he's still lost, Willy. I think he's very lost.

WILLY Biff Loman is lost. In the greatest country in the world a young man with such—personal attractiveness, gets lost. And such a hard worker. There's one thing about Biff—he's not lazy.

LINDA Never.

WILLY [with pity and resolve] I'll see him in the morning; I'll have a nice talk with him. I'll get him a job selling. He could be big in no time. My God! Remember how they used to follow him around in high school? When he smiled at one of them their faces lit up. When he walked down the street . . . [He loses himself in reminiscences.]

LINDA [trying to bring him out of it] Willy, dear, I got a new kind of American-type cheese today. It's whipped.

WILLY Why do you get American when I like Swiss?

LINDA I just thought you'd like a change—

WILLY I don't want a change! I want Swiss cheese. Why am I always being contradicted?

LINDA [with a covering laugh] I thought it would be a surprise.

WILLY Why don't you open a window in here, for God's sake?

LINDA [with infinite patience] They're all open, dear.

WILLY The way they boxed us in here. Bricks and windows, windows and bricks.

LINDA We should've bought the land next door.

WILLY The street is lined with cars. There's not a breath of fresh air in the neighborhood. The grass don't grow any more, you can't raise a carrot in the back yard. They should've had a law against apartment houses. Remember those two beautiful elm trees out there? When I and Biff hung the swing between them?

LINDA Yeah, like being a million miles from the city.

WILLY They should've arrested the builder for cutting those down. They massacred the neighborhood. [lost] More and more I think of those days, Linda. This time of year it was lilac and wisteria. And then the peonies would come out, and the daffodils. What fragrance in this room!

LINDA Well, after all, people had to move somewhere.

WILLY No, there's more people now.

LINDA I don't think there's more people. I think—

WILLY There's more people! That's what's ruining this country! Population is getting out of control. The competition is maddening! Smell the stink from that apartment house! And another one on the other side . . . How can they whip cheese?

[On WILLY's last line, BIFF and HAPPY raise themselves up in their beds, listening.]

LINDA Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY [turning to LINDA, guiltily] You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

BIFF What's the matter?

HAPPY Listen!

LINDA You've got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY You're my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.

WILLY I won't fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.

LINDA He'll find his way.

WILLY Sure. Certain men just don't get started till later in life. Like Thomas Edison, I think. Or B. F. Goodrich. One of them was deaf. [He starts for the bedroom doorway.] I'll put my money on Biff.

LINDA And Willy—if it's warm Sunday we'll drive in the country. And we'll open the windshield, and take lunch.

WILLY No, the windshields don't open on the new cars.

LINDA But you opened it today.

WILLY Me? I didn't. [He stops.] Now isn't that peculiar! Isn't that a remarkable—[He breaks off in amazement and fright as the flute is heard distantly.]

LINDA What, darling?

WILLY That is the most remarkable thing.

LINDA What, dear?

WILLY I was thinking of the Chevy. [slight pause] Nineteen twenty-eight . . . when I had that red Chevy—[breaks off] That funny? I coulda sworn I was driving that Chevy today.

LINDA Well, that's nothing. Something must've reminded you.

WILLY Remarkable. Ts. Remember those days? The way Biff used to simulate that car? The dealer refused to believe there was eighty thousand miles on it. [He shakes his head.] Heh! [to LINDA] Close your eyes, I'll be right up. [He walks out of the bedroom.]

HAPPY [to BIFF] Jesus, maybe he smashed up the car again!

LINDA [calling after WILLY] Be careful on the stairs, dear! The cheese is on the middle shelf! [She turns, goes over to the bed, takes his jacket, and goes out of the bedroom.]

[Light has risen on the boys' room. Unseen, WILLY is heard talking to himself, "Eighty thousand miles," and a little laugh. BIFF gets out of bed, comes downstage a bit, and stands attentively. BIFF is two years older than his brother HAPPY, well built, but in these days bears a worn air and seems less self-assured. He has succeeded less, and his dreams are stronger and less acceptable than HAPPY's. HAPPY is tall, powerfully made.]

Sexuality is like a visible color on him, or a scent that many women have discovered. He, like his brother, is lost, but in a different way, for he has never allowed himself to turn his face toward defeat and is thus more confused and hard-skinned, although seemingly more content.

HAPPY [getting out of bed] He's going to get his license taken away if he keeps that up. I'm getting nervous about him, y'know, Biff?

BIFF His eyes are going.

HAPPY No, I've driven with him. He sees all right. He just doesn't keep his mind on it. I drove into the city with him last week. He stops at a green light and then it turns red and he goes. [He laughs.]

BIFF Maybe he's color-blind.

HAPPY Pop? Why he's got the finest eye for color in the business. You know that.

BIFF [sitting down on his bed] I'm going to sleep.

HAPPY You're not still sour on Dad, are you Biff?

BIFF He's all right, I guess.

WILLY [underneath them, in the living-room] Yes, sir, eighty thousand miles—eighty-two thousand!

BIFF You smoking?

HAPPY [holding out a pack of cigarettes] Want one?

BIFF [taking a cigarette] I can never sleep when I smell it.

WILLY What a simonizing job, heh!

HAPPY [with deep sentiment] Funny, Biff, y'know? Us sleeping in here again? The old beds. [He pats his bed affectionately.] All the talk that went across those two beds, huh? Our whole lives.

BIFF Yeah. Lotta dreams and plans.

HAPPY [with a deep and masculine laugh] About five hundred women would like to know what was said in this room.

[They share a soft laugh.]

BIFF Remember that big Betsy something—what the hell was her name—over on Bushwick Avenue?

HAPPY [combing his hair] With the collie dog!

BIFF That's the one. I got you in there, remember?

HAPPY Yeah, that was my first time—I think. Boy, there was a pig! [They laugh, almost crudely.] You taught me everything I know about women. Don't forget that.

BIFF I bet you forgot how bashful you used to be. Especially with girls.

HAPPY Oh, I still am, Biff.

BIFF Oh, go on.

HAPPY I just control it, that's all. I think I got less bashful and you got more so. What happened, Biff? Where's the old humor, the old confidence? [He shakes BIFF's knee. BIFF gets up and moves restlessly about the room.] What's the matter?

BIFF Why does Dad mock me all the time?

HAPPY He's not mocking you, he—

BIFF Everything I say there's a twist of mockery on his face. I can't get near him.

HAPPY He just wants you to make good, that's all. I wanted to talk to you about Dad for a long time, Biff. Something's—happening to him. He—talks to himself.

BIFF I noticed that this morning. But he always mumbled.

HAPPY But not so noticeable. It got so embarrassing I sent him to Florida.

And you know something? Most of the time he's talking to you.

BIFF What's he say about me?

HAPPY I can't make it out.

BIFF What's he say about me?

HAPPY I think the fact that you're not settled, that you're still kind of up in the air . . .

BIFF There's one or two other things depressing him, Happy.

HAPPY What do you mean?

BIFF Never mind. Just don't lay it all to me.

HAPPY But I think if you just got started—I mean—is there any future for you out there?

BIFF I tell ya, Hap, I don't know what the future is. I don't know—what I'm supposed to want.

HAPPY What do you mean?

BIFF Well, I spent six or seven years after high school trying to work myself up. Shipping clerk, salesman, business of one kind or another. And it's a measly manner of existence. To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella. And still—that's how you build a future.

HAPPY Well, you really enjoy it on a farm? Are you content out there?

BIFF [with rising agitation] Hap, I've had twenty or thirty different kinds of jobs since I left home before the war, and it always turns out the same. I just realized it lately. In Nebraska when I herded cattle, and the Dakotas, and Arizona, and now in Texas. It's why I came home now, I guess, because I realized it. This farm I work on, it's spring there now, see? And they've got about fifteen new colts. There's nothing more inspiring or—beautiful than the sight of a mare and a new colt. And it's cool there now, see? Texas is cool now, and it's spring. And whenever spring comes to where I am, I suddenly get the feeling, my God, I'm not gettin' anywhere! What the hell am I doing, playing around with horses, twenty-eight dollars a week! I'm thirty-four years old. I oughta be makin' my future. That's when I come running home. And now, I get here, and I don't know what to do with myself. [after a pause] I've always made a point of not wasting my life, and everytime I come back here I know that all I've done is to waste my life.

HAPPY You're a poet, you know that, Biff? You're a—you're an idealist!

BIFF No, I'm mixed up very bad. Maybe I oughta get married. Maybe I oughta get stuck into something. Maybe that's my trouble. I'm like a boy. I'm not married. I'm not in business, I just—I'm like a boy. Are you content, Hap? You're a success, aren't you? Are you content?

HAPPY Hell, no!

BIFF Why? You're making money, aren't you?

HAPPY [moving about with energy, expressiveness] All I can do now is wait for the merchandise manager to die. And suppose I get to be merchandise manager? He's a good friend of mine, and he just built a terrific estate on Long Island. And he lived there about two months and sold it, and now he's building another one. He can't enjoy it once it's finished. And I know that's just what I would do. I don't know what the hell I'm workin' for. Sometimes I sit in my apartment—all alone. And I think of the rent I'm paying. And it's crazy. But then, it's what I always wanted. My own apartment, a car, and plenty of women. And still, goddammit, I'm lonely.

BIFF [with enthusiasm] Listen why don't you come out West with me?

HAPPY You and I, heh?

BIFF Sure, maybe we could buy a ranch. Raise cattle, use our muscles.

Men built like we are should be working out in the open.

HAPPY [avidly] The Loman Brothers, heh?

BIFF [with vast affection] Sure, we'd be known all over the counties!

HAPPY [enthralled] That's what I dream about, Biff. Sometimes I want to just rip my clothes off in the middle of the store and outbox that goddam merchandise manager. I mean I can outbox, outrun, and outlift anybody in that store, and I have to take orders from those common, petty sons-of-bitches till I can't stand it any more.

BIFF I'm tellin' you, kid, if you were with me I'd be happy out there.

HAPPY [enthused] See, Biff, everybody around me is so false that I'm constantly lowering my ideals . . .

BIFF Baby, together we'd stand up for one another, we'd have someone to trust.

HAPPY If I were around you—

BIFF Hap, the trouble is we weren't brought up to grub for money. I don't know how to do it.

HAPPY Neither can I!

BIFF Then let's go!

HAPPY The only thing is—what can you make out there?

BIFF But look at your friend. Builds an estate and then hasn't the peace of mind to live in it.

HAPPY Yeah, but when he walks into the store the waves part in front of him. That's fifty-two thousand dollars a year coming through the revolving door, and I got more in my pinky finger than he's got in his head.

BIFF Yeah, but you just said—

HAPPY I gotta show some of those pompous, self-important executives over there that Hap Loman can make the grade. I want to walk into the store the way he walks in. Then I'll go with you, Biff. We'll be together yet, I swear. But take those two we had tonight. Now weren't they gorgeous creatures?

BIFF Yeah, yeah, most gorgeous I've had in years.

HAPPY I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin' them over and it doesn't mean anything. You still run around a lot?

BIFF Naa. I'd like to find a girl—steady, somebody with substance.

HAPPY That's what I long for.

BIFF Go on! You'd never come home.

HAPPY I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y'know? You're gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. [He tries on his new hat.]

BIFF No kiddin'!

HAPPY Sure, the guy's in line for the vice-presidency of the store. I don't know what gets into me, maybe I just have an overdeveloped sense of competition or something, but I went and ruined her, and furthermore I can't get rid of her. And he's the third executive I've done that to. Isn't that a crummy characteristic? And to top it all, I go to their weddings! [indignantly, but laughing] Like I'm not supposed to take bribes. Manufacturers offer me a hundred-dollar bill now and then to throw an order their way. You know how honest I am, but it's like this girl, see. I hate myself for it. Because I don't want the girl, and, still, I take it and—I love it!

BIFF Let's go to sleep.

HAPPY I guess we didn't settle anything, heh?

BIFF I just got one idea that I think I'm going to try.

HAPPY What's that?

BIFF Remember Bill Oliver?

HAPPY Sure, Oliver is very big now. You want to work for him again?

BIFF No, but when I quit he said something to me. He put his arm on my shoulder, and he said, "Biff, if you ever need anything, come to me."

HAPPY I remember that. That sounds good.

BIFF I think I'll go to see him. If I could get ten thousand or even seven or eight thousand dollars I could buy a beautiful ranch.

HAPPY I bet he'd back you. 'Cause he thought highly of you, Biff. I mean, they all do. You're well liked, Biff. That's why I say to come back here, and we both have the apartment. And I'm tellin' you, Biff, any babe you want . . .

BIFF No, with a ranch I could do the work I like and still be something. I just wonder though. I wonder if Oliver still thinks I stole that carton of basketballs.

HAPPY Oh, he probably forgot that long ago. It's almost ten years. You're too sensitive. Anyway, he didn't really fire you.

BIFF Well, I think he was going to. I think that's why I quit. I was never sure whether he knew or not. I know he thought the world of me, though. I was the only one he'd let lock up the place.

WILLY [below] You gonna wash the engine, Biff?

HAPPY Shh!

[BIFF looks at HAPPY, who is gazing down, listening. WILLY is mumbling in the parlor.]

HAPPY You hear that?

[They listen. WILLY laughs warmly.]

BIFF [growing angry] Doesn't he know Mom can hear that?

WILLY Don't get your sweater dirty, Biff!

[A look of pain crosses BIFF's face.]

HAPPY Isn't that terrible? Don't leave again, will you? You'll find a job here. You gotta stick around. I don't know what to do about him, it's getting embarrassing.

WILLY What a simonizing job!

BIFF Mom's hearing that!

WILLY No kiddin', Biff, you got a date? Wonderful!

HAPPY Go on to sleep. But talk to him in the morning, will you?

BIFF [reluctantly getting into bed] With her in the house. Brother!

HAPPY [getting into bed] I wish you'd have a good talk with him.

[The light on their room begins to fade.]

BIFF [to himself in bed] That selfish, stupid . . .

HAPPY Sh . . . Sleep, Biff.

[Their light is out. Well before they have finished speaking, WILLY's form is dimly seen below in the darkened kitchen. He opens the refrigerator, searches in there, and takes out a bottle of milk. The apartment houses are fading out, and the entire house and surroundings become covered with leaves. Music insinuates itself as the leaves appear.]

WILLY Just wanna be careful with those girls, Biff, that's all. Don't make any promises. No promises of any kind. Because a girl, y'know, they always believe what you tell 'em, and you're very young, Biff, you're too young to be talking seriously to girls.

[Light rises on the kitchen. WILLY, talking, shuts the refrigerator door and comes downstage to the kitchen table. He pours milk into a glass. He is totally immersed in himself, smiling faintly.]

WILLY Too young entirely, Biff. You want to watch your schooling first. Then when you're all set, there'll be plenty of girls for a boy like you. [He smiles broadly at a kitchen chair.] That so? The girls pay for you? [He laughs.] Boy, you must really be makin' a hit.

[WILLY is gradually addressing—physically—a point offstage, speaking through the wall of the kitchen, and his voice has been rising in volume to that of a normal conversation.]

WILLY I been wondering why you polish the car so careful. Ha! Don't leave the hubcaps, boys. Get the chamois to the hubcaps. Happy, use newspaper on the windows, it's the easiest thing. Show him how to do it, Biff! You see, Happy? Pad it up, use it like a pad. That's it, that's it, good work. You're doin' all right, Hap. [He pauses, then nods in approbation for a few seconds, then looks upward.] Biff, first thing we gotta do when we get time is clip that big branch over the house. Afraid it's gonna fall in a storm and hit the roof. Tell you what. We get a rope and sling her around, and then we climb up there with a couple of saws and take her down. Soon as you finish the car, boys, I wanna see ya. I got a surprise for you, boys.

BIFF [offstage] Whatta ya got, Dad?

WILLY No, you finish first. Never leave a job till you're finished—remember that, [looking toward the "big trees"] Biff, up in Albany I saw a beautiful hammock. I think I'll buy it next trip, and we'll hang it right between those two elms. Wouldn't that be something? Just swingin' there under those branches. Boy, that would be . . .

[YOUNG BIFF and YOUNG HAPPY appear from the direction WILLY was addressing. HAPPY carries rags and a pail of water. BIFF, wearing a sweater with a block "S," carries a football.]

BIFF [pointing in the direction of the car offstage] How's that, Pop, professional?

WILLY Terrific. Terrific job, boys. Good work, Biff.

HAPPY Where's the surprise, Pop?

WILLY In the back seat of the car.

HAPPY Boy! [He runs off.]

BIFF What is it, Dad? Tell me, what'd you buy?

WILLY [laughing, cuffs him] Never mind, something I want you to have.

BIFF [turns and starts off] What is it, Hap?

HAPPY [offstage] It's a punching bag!

BIFF Oh, Pop!

WILLY It's got Gene Tunney's¹ signature on it!
[HAPPY runs onstage with a punching bag.]

BIFF Gee, how'd you know we wanted a punching bag?

WILLY Well, it's the finest thing for the timing.

HAPPY [lies down on his back and pedals with his feet] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

WILLY [to HAPPY] Jumping rope is good too.

BIFF Did you see the new football I got?

WILLY [examining the ball] Where'd you get a new ball?

BIFF The coach told me to practice my passing.

WILLY That so? And he gave you the ball, heh?

BIFF Well, I borrowed it from the locker room. [He laughs confidentially.]

WILLY [laughing with him at the left] I want you to return that.

HAPPY I told you he wouldn't like it!

BIFF [angrily] Well, I'm bringing it back!

WILLY [stopping the incipient argument, to HAPPY] Sure, he's gotta practice with a regulation ball, doesn't he? [to BIFF] Coach'll probably congratulate you on your initiative!

BIFF Oh, he keeps congratulating my initiative all the time, Pop.

WILLY That's because he likes you. If somebody else took that ball there'd be an uproar. So what's the report, boys, what's the report?

BIFF Where'd you go this time, Dad? Gee we were lonesome for you.

WILLY [pleased, puts an arm around each boy and they come down to the apron] Lonesome, heh?

BIFF Missed you every minute.

WILLY Don't say? Tell you a secret, boys. Don't breathe it to a soul. Someday I'll have my own business, and I'll never have to leave home any more.

HAPPY Like Uncle Charley, heh?

WILLY Bigger than Uncle Charley! Because Charley is not—liked. He's liked, but he's not—well liked.

BIFF Where'd you go this time, Dad?

WILLY Well, I got on the road, and I went north to Providence. Met the Mayor.

BIFF The Mayor of Providence!

WILLY He was sitting in the hotel lobby.

BIFF What'd he say?

WILLY He said, "Morning!" And I said, "You got a fine city here, Mayor." And then he had coffee with me. And then I went to Waterbury. Waterbury is a fine city. Big clock city, the famous Waterbury clock. Sold a nice bill there. And then Boston—Boston is the cradle of the Revolution. A fine city. And a couple of other towns in Mass., and on to Portland and Bangor and straight home!

BIFF Gee, I'd love to go with you sometime, Dad.

WILLY Soon as summer comes.

HAPPY Promise?

1. World heavyweight boxing champion from 1926 to 1928.

WILLY You and Hap and I, and I'll show you all the towns. America is full of beautiful towns and fine, upstanding people. And they know me, boys, they know me up and down New England. The finest people. And when I bring you fellas up, there'll be open sesame for all of us, 'cause one thing, boys: I have friends. I can park my car in any street in New England, and the cops protect it like their own. This summer, heh?

BIFF and HAPPY [together] Yeah! You bet!

WILLY We'll take our bathing suits.

HAPPY We'll carry your bags, Pop!

WILLY Oh, won't that be something! Me comin' into the Boston stores with you boys carryin' my bags. What a sensation!

[BIFF is prancing around, practicing passing the ball.]

WILLY You nervous, Biff, about the game?

BIFF Not if you're gonna be there.

WILLY What do they say about you in school, now that they made you captain?

HAPPY There's a crowd of girls behind him everytime the classes change.

BIFF [taking WILLY's hand] This Saturday, Pop, this Saturday—just for you, I'm going to break through for a touchdown.

HAPPY You're supposed to pass.

BIFF I'm takin' one play for Pop. You watch me, Pop, and when I take off my helmet, that means I'm breakin' out. Then you watch me crash through that line!

WILLY [kisses BIFF] Oh, wait'll I tell this in Boston!

[BERNARD enters in knickers. He is younger than BIFF, earnest and loyal, a worried boy.]

BERNARD Biff, where are you? You're supposed to study with me today.

WILLY Hey, looka Bernard. What're you lookin' so anemic about, Bernard?

BERNARD He's gotta study, Uncle Willy. He's got Regents² next week.

HAPPY [tauntingly, spinning BERNARD around] Let's box, Bernard!

BERNARD Biff! [He gets away from HAPPY.] Listen, Biff, I heard Mr. Birnbaum say that if you don't start studyin' math he's gonna flunk you, and you won't graduate. I heard him!

WILLY You better study with him, Biff. Go ahead now.

BERNARD I heard him!

BIFF Oh, Pop, you didn't see my sneakers! [He holds up a foot for WILLY to look at.]

WILLY Hey, that's a beautiful job of printing!

BERNARD [wiping his glasses] Just because he printed University of Virginia on his sneakers doesn't mean they've got to graduate him, Uncle Willy!

WILLY [angrily] What're you talking about? With scholarships to three universities they're gonna flunk him?

BERNARD But I heard Mr. Birnbaum say—

WILLY Don't be a pest, Bernard! [to his boys] What an anemic!

BERNARD Okay, I'm waiting for you in my house, Biff.

[BERNARD goes off. The Lomans laugh.]

WILLY Bernard is not well liked, is he?

BIFF He's liked, but he's not well liked.

2. Compulsory statewide high school examinations in New York.

HAPPY That's right, Pop.

WILLY That's just what I mean. Bernard can get the best marks in school, y'understand, but when he gets out in the business world, y'understand, you are going to be five times ahead of him. That's why I thank Almighty God you're both built like Adonises.³ Because the man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want. You take me, for instance. I never have to wait in line to see a buyer. "Willy Loman is here!" That's all they have to know, and I go right through.

BIFF Did you knock them dead, Pop?

WILLY Knocked 'em cold in Providence, slaughtered 'em in Boston.

HAPPY [on his back, pedaling again] I'm losing weight, you notice, Pop?

[LINDA enters, as of old, a ribbon in her hair, carrying a basket of washing.]

LINDA [with youthful energy] Hello, dear!

WILLY Sweetheart!

LINDA How'd the Chevy run?

WILLY Chevrolet, Linda, is the greatest car ever built. [to the boys] Since when do you let your mother carry wash up the stairs?

BIFF Grab hold there, boy!

HAPPY Where to, Mom?

LINDA Hang them up on the line. And you better go down to your friends, Biff. The cellar is full of boys. They don't know what to do with themselves.

BIFF Ah, when Pop comes home they can wait!

WILLY [laughs appreciatively] You better go down and tell them what to do, Biff.

BIFF I think I'll have them sweep out the furnace room.

WILLY Good work, Biff.

BIFF [goes through wall-line of kitchen to doorway at back and calls down]

Fellas! Everybody sweep out the furnace room! I'll be right down!

VOICES All right! Okay, Biff.

BIFF George and Sam and Frank, come out back! We're hangin' up the wash! Come on, Hap, on the double!

[He and HAPPY carry out the basket.]

LINDA The way they obey him!

WILLY Well, that training, the training. I'm tellin' you, I was sellin' thousands and thousands, but I had to come home.

LINDA Oh, the whole block'll be at that game. Did you sell anything?

WILLY I did five hundred gross in Providence and seven hundred gross in Boston.

LINDA No! Wait a minute, I've got a pencil. [She pulls pencil and paper out of her apron pocket.] That makes your commission . . . Two hundred—my God! Two hundred and twelve dollars!

WILLY Well, I didn't figure it yet, but . . .

LINDA How much did you do?

WILLY Well, I—I did—about a hundred and eighty gross in Providence.

Well, no—it came to—roughly two hundred gross on the whole trip.

LINDA [without hesitation] Two hundred gross. That's . . . [She figures.]

3. In Greek mythology Adonis was a beautiful youth favored by Aphrodite, the goddess of love.

WILLY The trouble was that three of the stores were half closed for inventory in Boston. Otherwise I woulda broke records.

LINDA Well, it makes seventy dollars and some pennies. That's very good.

WILLY What do we owe?

LINDA Well, on the first there's sixteen dollars on the refrigerator—

WILLY Why sixteen?

LINDA Well, the fan belt broke, so it was a dollar eighty.

WILLY But it's brand new.

LINDA Well, the man said that's the way it is. Till they work themselves in, y'know.

[They move through the wall-line into the kitchen.]

WILLY I hope we didn't get stuck on that machine.

LINDA They got the biggest ads of any of them!

WILLY I know, it's a fine machine. What else?

LINDA Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.

WILLY It don't leak, does it?

LINDA No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.

WILLY I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!

LINDA Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth.

WILLY A hundred and twenty dollars! My God, if business don't pick up I don't know what I'm gonna do!

LINDA Well, next week you'll do better.

WILLY Oh, I'll knock 'em dead next week. I'll go to Hartford. I'm very well liked in Hartford. You know, the trouble is, Linda, people don't seem to take to me.

[They move onto the forestage.]

LINDA Oh, don't be foolish.

WILLY I know it when I walk in. They seem to laugh at me.

LINDA Why? Why would they laugh at you? Don't talk that way, Willy.

[WILLY moves to the edge of the stage. LINDA goes into the kitchen and starts to darn stockings.]

WILLY I don't know the reason for it, but they just pass me by. I'm not noticed.

LINDA But you're doing wonderful, dear. You're making seventy to a hundred dollars a week.

WILLY But I gotta be at it ten, twelve hours a day. Other men—I don't know—they do it easier. I don't know why—I can't stop myself—I talk too much. A man oughta come in with a few words. One thing about Charley. He's a man of few words, and they respect him.

LINDA You don't talk too much, you're just lively.

WILLY [smiling] Well, I figure, what the hell, life is short, a couple of jokes. [to himself] I joke too much! [The smiles goes.]

LINDA Why? You're—

WILLY I'm fat. I'm very—foolish to look at, Linda. I didn't tell you, but Christmas time I happened to be calling on F. H. Stewarts, and a salesman I know, as I was going in to see the buyer I heard him say something about—walrus. And I—I cracked him right across the face. I won't take that. I simply will not take that. But they do laugh at me. I know that.

LINDA Darling . . .

WILLY I gotta overcome it. I know I gotta overcome it. I'm not dressing to advantage, maybe.

LINDA Willy, darling, you're the handsomest man in the world—

WILLY Oh, no, Linda.

LINDA To me you are. [slight pause] The handsomest.

[From the darkness is heard the laughter of a woman. WILLY doesn't turn to it, but it continues through LINDA's lines.]

LINDA And the boys, Willy. Few men are idolized by their children the way you are.

[Music is heard as behind a scrim,⁴ to the left of the house, THE WOMAN, dimly seen, is dressing.]

WILLY [with great feeling] You're the best there is, Linda, you're a pal, you know that? On the road—on the road I want to grab you sometimes and just kiss the life outa you.

[The laughter is loud now, and he moves into a brightening area at the left, where THE WOMAN has come from behind the scrim and is standing, putting on her hat, looking into a "mirror" and laughing.]

WILLY 'Cause I get so lonely—especially when business is bad and there's nobody to talk to. I get the feeling that I'll never sell anything again, that I won't make a living for you, or a business, a business for the boys. [He talks through THE WOMAN's subsiding laughter; THE WOMAN primps at the "mirror."] There's so much I want to make for—

THE WOMAN Me? You didn't make me, Willy. I picked you.

WILLY [pleased] You picked me?

THE WOMAN [who is quite proper-looking, WILLY's age] I did. I've been sitting at that desk watching all the salesmen go by, day in, day out. But you've got such a sense of humor, and we do have such a good time together, don't we?

WILLY Sure, sure. [He takes her in his arms.] Why do you have to go now?

THE WOMAN It's two o'clock . . .

WILLY No, come on in! [He pulls her.]

THE WOMAN . . . my sisters'll be scandalized. When'll you be back?

WILLY Oh, two weeks about. Will you come up again?

THE WOMAN Sure thing. You do make me laugh. It's good for me. [She squeezes his arm, kisses him.] And I think you're a wonderful man.

WILLY You picked me, heh?

THE WOMAN Sure. Because you're so sweet. And such a kidder.

WILLY Well, I'll see you next time I'm in Boston.

THE WOMAN I'll put you right through to the buyers.

WILLY [slapping her bottom] Right. Well, bottoms up!

THE WOMAN [slaps him gently and laughs] You just kill me, Willy. [He suddenly grabs her and kisses her roughly.] You kill me. And thanks for the stockings. I love a lot of stockings. Well, good night.

4. Part of a stage set; a painted gauze curtain that becomes transparent when lighted from the back.

WILLY Good night. And keep your pores open!

THE WOMAN Oh, Willy!

[THE WOMAN bursts out laughing, and LINDA's laughter blends in. THE WOMAN disappears into the dark. Now the area at the kitchen table brightens. LINDA is sitting where she was at the kitchen table, but now is mending a pair of her silk stockings.]

LINDA You are, Willy. The handsomest man. You've got no reason to feel that—

WILLY [coming out of THE WOMAN's dimming area and going over to LINDA]

I'll make it all up to you, Linda. I'll—

LINDA There's nothing to make up, dear. You're doing fine, better than—

WILLY [noticing her mending] What's that?

LINDA Just mending my stockings. They're so expensive—

WILLY [angrily, taking them from her] I won't have you mending stockings in this house! Now throw them out!

[LINDA puts the stockings in her pocket.]

BERNARD [entering on the run] Where is he? If he doesn't study!

WILLY [moving to the forestage, with great agitation] You'll give him the answers!

BERNARD I do, but I can't on a Regents! That's a state exam! They're liable to arrest me!

WILLY Where is he? I'll whip him, I'll whip him!

LINDA And he'd better give back that football, Willy, it's not nice.

WILLY Biff! Where is he? Why is he taking everything?

LINDA He's too rough with the girls, Willy. All the mothers are afraid of him!

WILLY I'll whip him!

BERNARD He's driving the car without a license!

[THE WOMAN's laugh is heard.]

WILLY Shut up!

LINDA All the mothers—

WILLY Shut up!

BERNARD [backing quietly away and out] Mr. Birnbaum says he's stuck up.

WILLY Get outa here!

BERNARD If he doesn't buckle down he'll flunk math! [He goes off.]

LINDA He's right, Willy, you've gotta—

WILLY [exploding at her] There's nothing the matter with him! You want him to be a worm like Bernard? He's got spirit, personality . . .

[As he speaks, LINDA, almost in tears, exits into the living-room. WILLY is alone in the kitchen, wilting and staring. The leaves are gone. It is night again, and the apartment houses look down from behind.]

WILLY Loaded with it. Loaded! What is he stealing? He's giving it back, isn't he? Why is he stealing? What did I tell him? I never in my life told him anything but decent things.

[HAPPY in pajamas has come down the stairs; WILLY suddenly becomes aware of HAPPY's presence.]

HAPPY Let's go now, come on.

WILLY [sitting down at the kitchen table] Huh! Why did she have to wax the floors herself? Everytime she waxes the floors she keels over. She knows that!

HAPPY Shh! Take it easy. What brought you back tonight?

WILLY I got an awful scare. Nearly hit a kid in Yonkers. God! Why didn't I go to Alaska with my brother Ben that time! Ben! That man was a genius, that man was success incarnate! What a mistake! He begged me to go.

HAPPY Well, there's no use in—

WILLY You guys! There was a man started with the clothes on his back and ended up with diamond mines!

HAPPY Boy, someday I'd like to know how he did it.

WILLY What's the mystery? The man knew what he wanted and went out and got it! Walked into a jungle, and comes out, the age of twenty-one, and he's rich! The world is an oyster, but you don't crack it open on a mattress!

HAPPY Pop, I told you I'm gonna retire you for life.

WILLY You'll retire me for life on seventy goddam dollars a week? And your women and your car and your apartment, and you'll retire me for life! Christ's sake, I couldn't get past Yonkers today! Where are you guys, where are you? The woods are burning! I can't drive a car!

[CHARLEY has appeared in the doorway. He is a large man, slow of speech, laconic, immovable. In all he says, despite what he says, there is pity, and, now, trepidation. He has a robe over pajamas, slippers on his feet. He enters the kitchen.]

CHARLEY Everything all right?

HAPPY Yeah, Charley, everything's . . .

WILLY What's the matter?

CHARLEY I heard some noise. I thought something happened. Can't we do something about the walls? You sneeze in here, and in my house hats blow off.

HAPPY Let's go to bed, Dad. Come on.

[CHARLEY signals to HAPPY to go.]

WILLY You go ahead, I'm not tired at the moment.

HAPPY [to WILLY] Take it easy, huh? [He exits.]

WILLY What're you doin' up?

CHARLEY [sitting down at the kitchen table opposite WILLY] Couldn't sleep good. I had a heartburn.

WILLY Well, you don't know how to eat.

CHARLEY I eat with my mouth.

WILLY No, you're ignorant. You gotta know about vitamins and things like that.

CHARLEY Come on, let's shoot. Tire you out a little.

WILLY [hesitantly] All right. You got cards?

CHARLEY [taking a deck from his pocket] Yeah, I got them. Someplace. What is it with those vitamins?

WILLY [dealing] They build up your bones. Chemistry.

CHARLEY Yeah, but there's no bones in a heartburn.

WILLY What are you talkin' about? Do you know the first thing about it?

CHARLEY Don't get insulted.

WILLY Don't talk about something you don't know anything about.

[They are playing. Pause.]

CHARLEY What're you doin' home?

WILLY A little trouble with the car.

CHARLEY Oh. [pause] I'd like to take a trip to California.

WILLY Don't say.

CHARLEY You want a job?

WILLY I got a job, I told you that. [after a slight pause] What the hell are you offering me a job for?

CHARLEY Don't get insulted.

WILLY Don't insult me.

CHARLEY I don't see no sense in it. You don't have to go on this way.

WILLY I got a good job. [slight pause] What do you keep comin' in here for?

CHARLEY You want me to go?

WILLY [after a pause, withering] I can't understand it. He's going back to Texas again. What the hell is that?

CHARLEY Let him go.

WILLY I got nothin' to give him, Charley, I'm clean, I'm clean.

CHARLEY He won't starve. None a them starve. Forget about him.

WILLY Then what have I got to remember?

CHARLEY You take it too hard. To hell with it. When a deposit bottle is broken you don't get your nickel back.

WILLY That's easy enough for you to say.

CHARLEY That ain't easy for me to say.

WILLY Did you see the ceiling I put up in the living-room?

CHARLEY Yeah, that's a piece of work. To put up a ceiling is a mystery to me. How do you do it?

WILLY What's the difference?

CHARLEY Well, talk about it.

WILLY You gonna put up a ceiling?

CHARLEY How could I put up a ceiling?

WILLY Then what the hell are you bothering me for?

CHARLEY You're insulted again.

WILLY A man who can't handle tools is not a man. You're disgusting.

CHARLEY Don't call me disgusting, Willy.

[UNCLE BEN, carrying a valise and an umbrella, enters the forestage from around the right corner of the house. He is a stolid man, in his sixties, with a mustache and an authoritative air. He is utterly certain of his destiny, and there is an aura of far places about him. He enters exactly as WILLY speaks.]

WILLY I'm getting awfully tired, Ben.

[BEN'S music is heard. BEN looks around at everything.]

CHARLEY Good, keep playing; you'll sleep better. Did you call me Ben?

[BEN looks at his watch.]

WILLY That's funny. For a second there you reminded me of my brother Ben.

BEN I only have a few minutes. [He strolls, inspecting the place. WILLY and CHARLEY continue playing.]

CHARLEY You never heard from him again, heh? Since that time?

WILLY Didn't Linda tell you? Couple of weeks ago we got a letter from his wife in Africa. He died.

CHARLEY That so.

BEN [chuckling] So this is Brooklyn, eh?

CHARLEY Maybe you're in for some of his money.

WILLY Naa, he had seven sons. There's just one opportunity I had with that man . . .

BEN I must make a train, William. There are several properties I'm looking at in Alaska.

WILLY Sure, sure! If I'd gone with him to Alaska that time, everything would've been totally different.

CHARLEY Go on, you'd froze to death up there.

WILLY What're you talking about?

BEN Opportunity is tremendous in Alaska, William. Surprised you're not up there.

WILLY Sure, tremendous.

CHARLEY Heh?

WILLY There was the only man I ever met who knew the answers.

CHARLEY Who?

BEN How are you all?

WILLY [taking a pot, smiling] Fine, fine.

CHARLEY Pretty sharp tonight.

BEN Is Mother living with you?

WILLY No, she died a long time ago.

CHARLEY Who?

BEN That's too bad. Fine specimen of a lady, Mother.

WILLY [to CHARLEY] Heh?

BEN I'd hoped to see the old girl.

CHARLEY Who died?

BEN Heard anything from Father, have you?

WILLY [unnerved] What do you mean, who died?

CHARLEY [taking a pot] What're you talkin' about?

BEN [looking at his watch] William, it's half-past eight!

WILLY [as though to dispel his confusion he angrily stops CHARLEY's hand] That's my build!

CHARLEY I put the ace—

WILLY If you don't know how to play the game I'm not gonna throw my money away on you!

CHARLEY [rising] It was my ace, for God's sake!

WILLY I'm through, I'm through!

BEN When did Mother die?

WILLY Long ago. Since the beginning you never knew how to play cards.

CHARLEY [picks up the cards and goes to the door] All right! Next time I'll bring a deck with five aces.

WILLY I don't play that kind of game!

CHARLEY [turning to him] You ought to be ashamed of yourself!

WILLY Yeah?

CHARLEY Yeah! [He goes out.]

WILLY [slamming the door after him] Ignoramus!

BEN [as WILLY comes toward him through the wall-line of the kitchen] So you're William.

WILLY [shaking BEN's hand] Ben! I've been waiting for you so long! What's the answer? How did you do it?

BEN Oh, there's a story in that.

[LINDA enters the forestage, as of old, carrying the wash basket.]

LINDA Is this Ben?

BEN [gallantly] How do you do, my dear.

LINDA Where've you been all these years? Willy's always wondered why you—

WILLY [pulling BEN away from her impatiently] Where is Dad? Didn't you follow him? How did you get started?

BEN Well, I don't know how much you remember.

WILLY Well, I was just a baby, of course, only three or four years old—

BEN Three years and eleven months.

WILLY What a memory, Ben!

BEN I have many enterprises, William, and I have never kept books.

WILLY I remember I was sitting under the wagon in—was it Nebraska?

BEN It was South Dakota, and I gave you a bunch of wild flowers.

WILLY I remember you walking away down some open road.

BEN [laughing] I was going to find Father in Alaska.

WILLY Where is he?

BEN At that age I had a very faulty view of geography, William. I discovered after a few days that I was heading due south, so instead of Alaska, I ended up in Africa.

LINDA Africa!

WILLY The Gold Coast!

BEN Principally diamond mines.

LINDA Diamond mines!

BEN Yes, my dear. But I've only a few minutes—

WILLY No! Boys! Boys! [YOUNG BIFF and HAPPY appear.] Listen to this. This is your Uncle Ben, a great man! Tell my boys, Ben!

BEN Why, boys, when I was seventeen I walked into the jungle, and when I was twenty-one I walked out. [He laughs.] And by God I was rich.

WILLY [to the boys] You see what I been talking about? The greatest things can happen!

BEN [glancing at his watch] I have an appointment in Ketchikan Tuesday week.

WILLY No, Ben! Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from. All I remember is a man with a big beard, and I was in Mamma's lap, sitting around a fire, and some kind of high music.

BEN His flute. He played the flute.

WILLY Sure, the flute, that's right!

[New music is heard, a high, rollicking tune.]

BEN Father was a very great and a very wild-hearted man. We would start in Boston, and he'd toss the whole family into the wagon, and then he'd drive the team right across the country; through Ohio, and Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and all the Western states. And we'd stop in the towns and sell the flutes that he'd made on the way. Great inventor, Father. With one gadget he made more in a week than a man like you could make in a lifetime.

WILLY That's just the way I'm bringing them up, Ben—rugged, well liked, all-around.

BEN Yeah? [to BIFF] Hit that, boy—hard as you can. [He pounds his stomach.]

BIFF Oh, no, sir!

BEN [taking boxing stance] Come on, get to me! [He laughs.]

WILLY Go to it, Biff! Go ahead, show him!

BIFF Okay! [He cocks his fist and starts in.]

LINDA [to WILLY] Why must he fight, dear?

BEN [sparring with BIFF] Good boy! Good boy!

WILLY How's that, Ben, heh?

HAPPY Give him the left, Biff!

LINDA Why are you fighting?

BEN Good boy! [Suddenly comes in, trips BIFF, and stands over him, the point of his umbrella poised over BIFF's eye.]

LINDA Look out, Biff!

BIFF Gee!

BEN [patting BIFF's knee] Never fight fair with a stranger, boy. You'll never get out of the jungle that way. [taking LINDA's hand and bowing] It was an honor and a pleasure to meet you, Linda.

LINDA [withdrawing her hand coldly, frightened] Have a nice—trip.

BEN [to WILLY] And good luck with your—what do you do?

WILLY Selling.

BEN Yes. Well . . . [He raises his hand in farewell to all.]

WILLY No, Ben, I don't want you to think . . . [He takes BEN's arm to show him.] It's Brooklyn, I know, but we hunt too.

BEN Really, now.

WILLY Oh, sure, there's snakes and rabbits and—that's why I moved out here. Why, Biff can fell any one of these trees in no time! Boys! Go right over to where they're building the apartment house and get some sand. We're gonna rebuild the entire front stoop right now! Watch this, Ben!

BIFF Yes, sir! On the double, Hap!

HAPPY [as he and BIFF run off] I lost weight, Pop, you notice?

[CHARLEY enters in knickers, even before the boys are gone.]

CHARLEY Listen, if they steal any more from that building the watchman'll put the cops on them!

LINDA [to WILLY] Don't let Biff . . .

[BEN laughs lustily.]

WILLY You shoulda seen the lumber they brought home last week. At least a dozen six-by-tens worth all kinds a money.

CHARLEY Listen, if that watchman—

WILLY I gave them hell, understand. But I got a couple of fearless characters there.

CHARLEY Willy, the jails are full of fearless characters.

BEN [clapping WILLY on the back, with a laugh at CHARLEY] And the stock exchange, friend!

WILLY [joining in BEN's laughter] Where are the rest of your pants?

CHARLEY My wife bought them.

WILLY Now all you need is a golf club and you can go upstairs and go to sleep. [to BEN] Great athlete! Between him and his son Bernard they can't hammer a nail!

BERNARD [rushing in] The watchman's chasing Biff!

WILLY [angrily] Shut up! He's not stealing anything!

LINDA [alarmed, hurrying off left] Where is he? Biff, dear! [She exits.]

WILLY [moving toward the left, away from BEN] There's nothing wrong. What's the matter with you?

BEN Nervy boy. Good!

WILLY [laughing] Oh, nerves of iron, that Biff!

CHARLEY Don't know what it is. My New England man comes back and he's bleedin', they murdered him up there.

WILLY It's contacts, Charley, I got important contacts!

CHARLEY [sarcastically] Glad to hear it, Willy. Come in later, we'll shoot a little casino. I'll take some of your Portland money. [He laughs at WILLY and exits.]

WILLY [turning to BEN] Business is bad, it's murderous. But not for me, of course.

BEN I'll stop by on my way back to Africa.

WILLY [longingly] Can't you stay a few days? You're just what I need, Ben, because I—I have a fine position here, but I—well, Dad left when I was such a baby and I never had a chance to talk to him and I still feel—kind of temporary about myself.

BEN I'll be late for my train.

[They are at opposite ends of the stage.]

WILLY Ben, my boys—can't we talk? They'd go into the jaws of hell for me, see, but I—

BEN William, you're being first-rate with your boys. Outstanding, manly chaps!

WILLY [hanging on to his words] Oh, Ben, that's good to hear! Because sometimes I'm afraid that I'm not teaching them the right kind of—Ben, how should I teach them?

BEN [giving great weight to each word, and with a certain vicious audacity] William, when I walked into the jungle, I was seventeen. When I walked out I was twenty-one. And, by God, I was rich! [He goes off into darkness around the right corner of the house.]

WILLY . . . was rich! That's just the spirit I want to imbue them with! To walk into a jungle! I was right! I was right! I was right!

[BEN is gone, but WILLY is still speaking to him as LINDA, in nightgown and robe, enters the kitchen, glances around for WILLY, then goes to the door of the house, looks out and sees him. Comes down to his left. He looks at her.]

LINDA Willy, dear? Willy?

WILLY I was right!

LINDA Did you have some cheese? [He can't answer.] It's very late, darling. Come to bed, heh?

WILLY [looking straight up] Gotta break your neck to see a star in this yard.

LINDA You coming in?

WILLY Whatever happened to that diamond watch fob? Remember? When Ben came from Africa that time? Didn't he give me a watch fob with a diamond in it?

LINDA You pawned it, dear. Twelve, thirteen years ago. For Biff's radio correspondence course.

WILLY Gee, that was a beautiful thing. I'll take a walk.

LINDA But you're in your slippers.

WILLY [starting to go around the house at the left] I was right! I was! [half to LINDA, as he goes, shaking his head] What a man! There was a man worth talking to. I was right!

LINDA [calling after WILLY] But in your slippers, Willy!

[WILLY is almost gone when BIFF, in his pajamas, comes down the stairs and enters the kitchen.]

BIFF What is he doing out there?

LINDA Sh!

BIFF God Almighty, Mom, how long has he been doing this?

LINDA Don't, he'll hear you.

BIFF What the hell is the matter with him?

LINDA It'll pass by morning.

BIFF Shouldn't we do anything?

LINDA Oh, my dear, you should do a lot of things, but there's nothing to do so go to sleep.

[HAPPY comes down the stairs and sits on the steps.]

HAPPY I never heard him so loud, Mom.

LINDA Well, come around more often; you'll hear him. [She sits down at the table and mends the lining of WILLY's jacket.]

BIFF Why didn't you ever write me about this, Mom?

LINDA How would I write to you? For over three months you had no address.

BIFF I was on the move. But you know I thought of you all the time. You know that, don't you, pal?

LINDA I know, dear, I know. But he likes to have a letter. Just to know that there's still a possibility for better things.

BIFF He's not like this all the time, is he?

LINDA It's when you come home he's always the worst.

BIFF When I come home?

LINDA When you write you're coming, he's all smiles, and talks about the future, and—he's just wonderful. And then the closer you seem to come, the more shaky he gets, and then, by the time you get here, he's arguing, and he seems angry at you. I think it's just that maybe he can't bring himself to—to open up to you. Why are you so hateful to each other? Why is that?

BIFF [evasively] I'm not hateful, Mom.

LINDA But you no sooner come in the door than you're fighting!

BIFF I don't know why. I mean to change. I'm tryin', Mom, you understand?

LINDA Are you home to stay now?

BIFF I don't know. I want to look around, see what's doin'.

LINDA Biff, you can't look around all your life, can you?

BIFF I just can't take hold, Mom. I can't take hold of some kind of a life.

LINDA Biff, a man is not a bird, to come and go with the springtime.

BIFF Your hair . . . [He touches her hair.] Your hair got so gray.

LINDA Oh, it's been gray since you were in high school. I just stopped dyeing it, that's all.

BIFF Dye it again, will ya? I don't want my pal looking old. [He smiles.]

LINDA You're such a boy! You think you can go away for a year and . . .
You've got to get it into your head now that one day you'll knock on this door and there'll be strange people here—

BIFF What are you talking about? You're not even sixty, Mom.

LINDA But what about your father?

BIFF [lamely] Well, I meant him too.

HAPPY He admires Pop.

LINDA Biff, dear, if you don't have any feeling for him, then you can't have any feeling for me.

BIFF Sure I can, Mom.

LINDA No. You can't just come to see me, because I love him. [with a threat, but only a threat, of tears] He's the dearest man in the world to me, and I won't have anyone making him feel unwanted and low and blue. You've got to make up your mind now, darling, there's no leeway any more. Either he's your father and you pay him that respect, or else you're not to come here. I know he's not easy to get along with—nobody knows that better than me—but . . .

WILLY [from the left, with a laugh] Hey, hey, Biffo!

BIFF [starting to go out after WILLY] What the hell is the matter with him?
[HAPPY stops him.]

LINDA Don't—don't go near him!

BIFF Stop making excuses for him! He always, always wiped the floor with you. Never had an ounce of respect for you.

HAPPY He's always had respect for—

BIFF What the hell do you know about it?

HAPPY [surlily] Just don't call him crazy!

BIFF He's got no character—Charley wouldn't do this. Not in his own house—spewing out that vomit from his mind.

HAPPY Charley never had to cope with what he's got to.

BIFF People are worse off than Willy Loman. Believe me, I've seen them!

LINDA Then make Charley your father, Biff. You can't do that, can you? I don't say he's a great man. Willy Loman never made a lot of money. His name was never in the paper. He's not the finest character that ever lived. But he's a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid. He's not to be allowed to fall into his grave like an old dog. Attention, attention must be finally paid to such a person. You called him crazy—

BIFF I didn't mean—

LINDA No, a lot of people think he's lost his—balance. But you don't have to be very smart to know what his trouble is. The man is exhausted.

HAPPY Sure!

LINDA A small man can be just as exhausted as a great man. He works for a company thirty-six years this March, opens up unheard-of territories to their trademark, and now in his old age they take his salary away.

HAPPY [indignantly] I didn't know that, Mom.

LINDA You never asked, my dear! Now that you get your spending money someplace else you don't trouble your mind with him.

HAPPY But I gave you money last—

LINDA Christmas time, fifty dollars! To fix the hot water it cost ninety-seven fifty! For five weeks he's been on straight commission, like a beginner, an unknown!

BIFF Those ungrateful bastards!

LINDA Are they any worse than his sons? When he brought them business, when he was young, they were glad to see him. But now his old friends, the old buyers that loved him so and always found some order to hand him in a pinch—they're all dead, retired. He used to be able to make six, seven calls a day in Boston. Now he takes his valises out of the car and puts them back and takes them out again and he's exhausted. Instead of walking he talks now. He drives seven hundred miles, and when he gets there no one knows him any more, no one welcomes him. And what goes through a man's mind, driving seven hundred miles home without having earned a cent? Why shouldn't he talk to himself? Why? When he has to go to Charley and borrow fifty dollars a week and pretend to me that it's his pay? How long can that go on? How long? You see what I'm sitting here and waiting for? And you tell me he has no character? The man who never worked a day but for your benefit? When does he get the medal for that? Is this his reward—to turn around at the age of sixty-three and find his sons, who he loved better than his life, one a philandering bum—

HAPPY Mom!

LINDA That's all you are, my baby! [to BIFF] And you! What happened to the love you had for him? You were such pals! How you used to talk to him on the phone every night! How lonely he was till he could come home to you!

BIFF All right, Mom. I'll live here in my room, and I'll get a job. I'll keep away from him, that's all.

LINDA No, Biff. You can't stay here and fight all the time.

BIFF He threw me out of this house, remember that.

LINDA Why did he do that? I never knew why.

BIFF Because I know he's a fake and he doesn't like anybody around who knows!

LINDA Why a fake? In what way? What do you mean?

BIFF Just don't lay it all at my feet. It's between me and him—that's all I have to say. I'll chip in from now on. He'll settle for half my pay check.

He'll be all right. I'm going to bed. [He starts for the stairs.]

LINDA He won't be all right.

BIFF [turning on the stairs, furiously] I hate this city and I'll stay here. Now what do you want?

LINDA He's dying, Biff.

[HAPPY turns quickly to her, shocked.]

BIFF [after a pause] Why is he dying?

LINDA He's been trying to kill himself.

BIFF [with great horror] How?

LINDA I live from day to day.

BIFF What're you talking about?

LINDA Remember I wrote you that he smashed up the car again? In February?

BIFF Well?

LINDA The insurance inspector came. He said that they have evidence. That all these accidents in the last year—weren't—weren't—accidents.

HAPPY How can they tell that? That's a lie.

LINDA It seems there's a woman . . . [she takes a breath as] { BIFF [sharply but contained] What woman?

{ LINDA [simultaneously] . . . and this woman . . .

LINDA What?

BIFF Nothing. Go ahead.

LINDA What did you say?

BIFF Nothing. I just said what woman?

HAPPY What about her?

LINDA Well, it seems she was walking down the road and saw his car. She says that he wasn't driving fast at all, and that he didn't skid. She says he came to that little bridge, and then deliberately smashed into the railing, and it was only the shallowness of the water that saved him.

BIFF Oh, no, he probably just fell asleep again.

LINDA I don't think he fell asleep.

BIFF Why not?

LINDA Last month . . . [with great difficulty] Oh, boys, it's so hard to say a thing like this! He's just a big stupid man to you, but I tell you there's more good in him than in many other people. [She chokes, wipes her eyes.] I was looking for a fuse. The lights blew out, and I went down the cellar. And behind the fuse box—it happened to fall out—was a length of rubber pipe—just short.

HAPPY No kidding?

LINDA There's a little attachment on the end of it. I knew right away. And sure enough, on the bottom of the water heater there's a new little nipple on the gas pipe.

HAPPY [angrily] That—jerk.

BIFF Did you have it taken off?

LINDA I'm—I'm ashamed to. How can I mention it to him? Every day I go down and take away that little rubber pipe. But, when he comes home, I put it back where it was. How can I insult him that way? I don't know what to do. I live from day to day, boys. I tell you, I know every thought in his mind. It sounds so old-fashioned and silly, but I tell you he put his whole life into you and you've turned your backs on him. [She is bent over in the chair, weeping, her face in her hands.] Biff, I swear to God! Biff, his life is in your hands!

HAPPY [to BIFF] How do you like that damned fool!

BIFF [kissing her] All right, pal, all right. It's all settled now. I've been remiss. I know that, Mom. But now I'll stay, and I swear to you, I'll apply myself. [kneeling in front of her, in a fever of self-reproach] It's just—you see, Mom, I don't fit in business. Not that I won't try. I'll try, and I'll make good.

HAPPY Sure you will. The trouble with you in business was you never tried to please people.

BIFF I know, I—

HAPPY Like when you worked for Harrison's. Bob Harrison said you were tops, and then you go and do some damn fool thing like whistling whole songs in the elevator like a comedian.

BIFF [against HAPPY] So what? I like to whistle sometimes.

HAPPY You don't raise a guy to a responsible job who whistles in the elevator!

LINDA Well, don't argue about it now.

HAPPY Like when you'd go off and swim in the middle of the day instead of taking the line around.

BIFF [his resentment rising] Well, don't you run off? You take off sometimes, don't you? On a nice summer day?

HAPPY Yeah, but I cover myself!

LINDA Boys!

HAPPY If I'm going to take a fade the boss can call any number where I'm supposed to be and they'll swear to him that I just left. I'll tell you something that I hate to say, Biff, but in the business world some of them think you're crazy.

BIFF [angered] Screw the business world!

HAPPY All right, screw it! Great, but cover yourself!

LINDA Hap, Hap!

BIFF I don't care what they think! They've laughed at Dad for years, and you know why? Because we don't belong in this nuthouse of a city! We should be mixing cement on some open plain, or—or carpenters. A carpenter is allowed to whistle!

[WILLY walks in from the entrance of the house, at left.]

WILLY Even your grandfather was better than a carpenter. [Pause. They watch him.] You never grew up. Bernard does not whistle in the elevator, I assure you.

BIFF [as though to laugh WILLY out of it] Yeah, but you do, Pop.

WILLY I never in my life whistled in an elevator! And who in the business world thinks I'm crazy?

BIFF I didn't mean it like that, Pop. Now don't make a whole thing out of it, will ya?

WILLY Go back to the West! Be a carpenter, a cowboy, enjoy yourself!

LINDA Willy, he was just saying—

WILLY I heard what he said!

HAPPY [trying to quiet WILLY] Hey, Pop, come on now . . .

WILLY [continuing over HAPPY's line] They laugh at me, heh? Go to Filene's, go to the Hub, go to Slattery's, Boston. Call out the name Willy Loman and see what happens! Big Shot!

BIFF All right, Pop.

WILLY Big!

BIFF All right!

WILLY Why do you always insult me?

BIFF I didn't say a word. [to LINDA] Did I say a word?

LINDA He didn't say anything, Willy.

WILLY [going to the doorway of the living-room] All right, good night, good night.

LINDA Willy, dear, he just decided . . .

WILLY [to BIFF] If you get tired hanging around tomorrow, paint the ceiling I put up in the living-room.

BIFF I'm leaving early tomorrow.

HAPPY He's going to see Bill Oliver, Pop.

WILLY [interestedly] Oliver? For what?

BIFF [with reserve, but trying, trying] He always said he'd stake me. I'd like to go into business, so maybe I can take him up on it.

LINDA Isn't that wonderful?

WILLY Don't interrupt. What's wonderful about it? There's fifty men in the City of New York who'd stake him. [to BIFF] Sporting goods?

BIFF I guess so. I know something about it and—

WILLY He knows something about it! You know sporting goods better than Spalding, for God's sake! How much is he giving you?

BIFF I don't know, I didn't even see him yet, but—

WILLY Then what're you talkin' about?

BIFF [getting angry] Well, all I said was I'm gonna see him, that's all!

WILLY [turning away] Ah, you're counting your chickens again.

BIFF [starting left for the stairs] Oh, Jesus, I'm going to sleep!

WILLY [calling after him] Don't curse in this house!

BIFF [turning] Since when did you get so clean?

HAPPY [trying to stop them] Wait a . . .

WILLY Don't use that language to me! I won't have it!

HAPPY [grabbing BIFF, shouts] Wait a minute! I got an idea. I got a feasible idea. Come here, Biff, let's talk this over now, let's talk some sense here. When I was down in Florida last time, I thought of a great idea to sell sporting goods. It just came back to me. You and I, Biff—we have a line, the Loman Line. We train a couple of weeks, and put on a couple of exhibitions, see?

WILLY That's an idea!

HAPPY Wait! We form two basketball teams, see? Two water-polo teams. We play each other. It's a million dollars' worth of publicity. Two brothers, see? The Loman Brothers. Displays in the Royal Palms—all the hotels. And banners over the ring and the basketball court: "Loman Brothers." Baby, we could sell sporting goods!

WILLY That is a one-million-dollar idea!

LINDA Marvelous!

BIFF I'm in great shape as far as that's concerned.

HAPPY And the beauty of it is, Biff, it wouldn't be like a business. We'd be out playin' ball again . . .

BIFF [enthused] Yeah, that's . . .

WILLY Million-dollar . . .

HAPPY And you wouldn't get fed up with it, Biff. It'd be the family again. There'd be the old honor, and comradeship, and if you wanted to go off for a swim or somethin'—well, you'd do it! Without some smart cooky gettin' up ahead of you!

WILLY Lick the world! You guys together could absolutely lick the civilized world.

BIFF I'll see Oliver tomorrow. Hap, if we could work that out . . .

LINDA Maybe things are beginning to—

WILLY [wildly enthused, to LINDA] Stop interrupting! [to BIFF] But don't wear sport jacket and slacks when you see Oliver.

BIFF No, I'll—

WILLY A business suit, and talk as little as possible, and don't crack any jokes.

BIFF He did like me. Always liked me.

LINDA He loved you!

WILLY [to LINDA] Will you stop! [to BIFF] Walk in very serious. You are not applying for a boy's job. Money is to pass. Be quiet, fine, and serious. Everybody likes a kidder, but nobody lends him money.

HAPPY I'll try to get some myself, Biff. I'm sure I can.

WILLY I see great things for you kids, I think your troubles are over. But remember, start big and you'll end big. Ask for fifteen. How much you gonna ask for?

BIFF Gee, I don't know—

WILLY And don't say "Gee." "Gee" is a boy's word. A man walking in for fifteen thousand dollars does not say "Gee!"

BIFF Ten, I think, would be top though.

WILLY Don't be so modest. You always started too low. Walk in with a big laugh. Don't look worried. Start off with a couple of your good stories to lighten things up. It's not what you say, it's how you say it—because personality always wins the day.

LINDA Oliver always thought the highest of him—

WILLY Will you let me talk?

BIFF Don't yell at her, Pop, will ya?

WILLY [angrily] I was talking, wasn't I?

BIFF I don't like you yelling at her all the time, and I'm tellin' you, that's all.

WILLY What're you, takin' over this house?

LINDA Willy—

WILLY [turning on her] Don't take his side all the time, goddammit!

BIFF [furiously] Stop yelling at her!

WILLY [suddenly pulling on his cheek, beaten down, guilt ridden] Give my best to Bill Oliver—he may remember me. [He exits through the living-room doorway.]

LINDA [her voice subdued] What'd you have to start that for? [BIFF turns away.] You see how sweet he was as soon as you talked hopefully? [She goes over to BIFF.] Come up and say good night to him. Don't let him go to bed that way.

HAPPY Come on, Biff, let's buck him up.

LINDA Please, dear. Just say good night. It takes so little to make him happy. Come. [She goes through the living-room doorway, calling upstairs from within the living-room] Your pajamas are hanging in the bathroom, Willy!

HAPPY [looking toward where LINDA went out] What a woman! They broke the mold when they made her. You know that, Biff?

BIFF He's off salary. My God, working on commission!

HAPPY Well, let's face it: he's no hot-shot selling man. Except that sometimes, you have to admit, he's a sweet personality.

BIFF [deciding] Lend me ten bucks, will ya? I want to buy some new ties.

HAPPY I'll take you to a place I know. Beautiful stuff. Wear one of my striped shirts tomorrow.

BIFF She got gray. Mom got awful old. Gee, I'm gonna go in to Oliver tomorrow and knock him for a—HAPPY Come on up. Tell that to Dad. Let's give him a whirl. Come on.

BIFF [steamed up] You know, with ten thousand bucks, boy!

HAPPY [as they go into the living-room] That's the talk, Biff, that's the first time I've heard the old confidence out of you! [from within the living-room, fading off] You're gonna live with me, kid, and any babe you want just say the word . . . [The last lines are hardly heard. They are mounting the stairs to their parents' bedroom.]

LINDA [entering her bedroom and addressing WILLY, who is in the bathroom. She is straightening the bed for him.] Can you do anything about the shower? It drips.

WILLY [from the bathroom] All of a sudden everything falls to pieces! Goddam plumbing, oughta be sued, those people. I hardly finished putting it in and the thing . . . [His words rumble off.]

LINDA I'm just wondering if Oliver will remember him. You think he might?

WILLY [coming out of the bathroom in his pajamas] Remember him? What's the matter with you, you crazy? If he'd've stayed with Oliver he'd be on top by now! Wait'll Oliver gets a look at him. You don't know the average caliber any more. The average young man today—[he is getting into bed—is got a caliber of zero. Greatest thing in the world for him was to bum around.

[BIFF and HAPPY enter the bedroom. Slight pause.]

WILLY [stops short, looking at BIFF] Glad to hear it, boy.

HAPPY He wanted to say good night to you, sport.

WILLY [to BIFF] Yeah. Knock him dead, boy. What'd you want to tell me?

BIFF Just take it easy, Pop. Good night. [He turns to go.]

WILLY [unable to resist] And if anything falls off the desk while you're talking to him—like a package or something—don't you pick it up. They have office boys for that.

LINDA I'll make a big breakfast—

WILLY Will you let me finish? [to BIFF] Tell him you were in the business in the West. Not farm work.

BIFF All right, Dad.

LINDA I think everything—

WILLY [going right through her speech] And don't undersell yourself. No less than fifteen thousand dollars.

BIFF [unable to bear him] Okay. Good night, Mom. [He starts moving.]

WILLY Because you got a greatness in you, Biff, remember that. You got all kinds a greatness . . . [He lies back, exhausted. BIFF walks out.]

LINDA [calling after BIFF] Sleep well, darling!

HAPPY I'm gonna get married, Mom. I wanted to tell you.

LINDA Go to sleep, dear.

HAPPY [going] I just wanted to tell you.

WILLY Keep up the good work. [HAPPY exits.] God . . . remember that Ebbets Field⁵ game? The championship of the city?

5. Brooklyn sports stadium.

LINDA Just rest. Should I sing to you?

WILLY Yeah. Sing to me. [LINDA hums a soft lullaby.] When that team came out—he was the tallest, remember?

LINDA Oh, yes. And in gold.

[BIFF enters the darkened kitchen, takes a cigarette, and leaves the house. He comes downstage into a golden pool of light. He smokes, staring at the night.]

WILLY Like a young god. Hercules⁶—something like that. And the sun, the sun all around him. Remember how he waved to me? Right up from the field, with the representatives of three colleges standing by? And the buyers I brought, and the cheers when he came out—Loman, Loman, Loman! God Almighty, he'll be great yet. A star like that, magnificent, can never really fade away!

[The light on WILLY is fading. The gas heater begins to glow through the kitchen wall, near the stairs, a blue flame beneath red coils.]

LINDA [timidly] Willy dear, what has he got against you?

WILLY I'm so tired. Don't talk any more.

[BIFF slowly returns to the kitchen. He stops, stares toward the heater.]

LINDA Will you ask Howard to let you work in New York?

WILLY First thing in the morning. Everything'll be all right.

[BIFF reaches behind the heater and draws out a length of rubber tubing. He is horrified and turns his head toward WILLY's room, still dimly lit, from which the strains of LINDA's desperate but monotonous humming rise.]

WILLY [staring through the window into the moonlight] Gee, look at the moon moving between the buildings!

[BIFF wraps the tubing around his hand and quickly goes up the stairs.]

CURTAIN

Act Two

Music is heard, gay and bright. The curtain rises as the music fades away. WILLY, in shirt sleeves, is sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, his hat in his lap. LINDA is filling his cup when she can.

WILLY Wonderful coffee. Meal in itself.

LINDA Can I make you some eggs?

WILLY No. Take a breath.

LINDA You look so rested, dear.

WILLY I slept like a dead one. First time in months. Imagine, sleeping till ten on a Tuesday morning. Boys left nice and early, heh?

LINDA They were out of here by eight o'clock.

WILLY Good work!

LINDA It was so thrilling to see them leaving together. I can't get over the shaving lotion in this house!

WILLY [smiling] Mmm—

LINDA Biff was very changed this morning. His whole attitude seemed to be hopeful. He couldn't wait to get downtown to see Oliver.

6. In Greek and Roman mythology the son of the chief god (Zeus, Jupiter), famous for his great strength.

WILLY He's heading for a change. There's no question, there simply are certain men that take longer to get—solidified. How did he dress?

LINDA His blue suit. He's so handsome in that suit. He could be a—anything in that suit!

[WILLY gets up from the table. LINDA holds his jacket for him.]

WILLY There's no question, no question at all. Gee, on the way home tonight I'd like to buy some seeds.

LINDA [laughing] That'd be wonderful. But not enough sun gets back there. Nothing'll grow any more.

WILLY You wait, kid, before it's all over we're gonna get a little place out in the country, and I'll raise some vegetables, a couple of chickens . . .

LINDA You'll do it yet, dear.

[WILLY walks out of his jacket. LINDA follows him.]

WILLY And they'll get married, and come for a weekend. I'd build a little guest house. 'Cause I got so many fine tools, all I'd need would be a little lumber and some peace of mind.

LINDA [joyfully] I sewed the lining . . .

WILLY I could build two guest houses, so they'd both come. Did he decide how much he's going to ask Oliver for?

LINDA [getting him into the jacket] He didn't mention it, but I imagine ten or fifteen thousand. You going to talk to Howard today?

WILLY Yeah. I'll put it to him straight and simple. He'll just have to take me off the road.

LINDA And Willy, don't forget to ask for a little advance, because we've got the insurance premium. It's the grace period now.

WILLY That's a hundred . . . ?

LINDA A hundred and eight, sixty-eight. Because we're a little short again.

WILLY Why are we short?

LINDA Well, you had the motor job on the car . . .

WILLY That goddam Studebaker!

LINDA And you got one more payment on the refrigerator . . .

WILLY But it just broke again!

LINDA Well, it's old, dear.

WILLY I told you we should've bought a well-advertised machine. Charley bought a General Electric and it's twenty years old and it's still good, that son-of-a-bitch.

LINDA But, Willy—

WILLY Whoever heard of a Hastings refrigerator? Once in my life I would like to own something outright before it's broken! I'm always in a race with the junkyard! I just finished paying for the car and it's on its last legs. The refrigerator consumes belts like a goddam maniac. They time those things. They time them so when you finally paid for them, they're used up.

LINDA [buttoning up his jacket as he unbuttons it] All told, about two hundred dollars would carry us, dear. But that includes the last payment on the mortgage. After this payment, Willy, the house belongs to us.

WILLY It's twenty-five years!

LINDA Biff was nine years old when we bought it.

WILLY Well, that's a great thing. To weather a twenty-five year mortgage is—

LINDA It's an accomplishment.

WILLY All the cement, the lumber, the reconstruction I put in this house! There ain't a crack to be found in it anymore.

LINDA Well, it served its purpose.

WILLY What purpose? Some stranger'll come along, move in, and that's that. If only Biff would take this house, and raise a family . . . [He starts to go.] Good-by, I'm late.

LINDA [suddenly remembering] Oh, I forgot! You're supposed to meet them for dinner.

WILLY Me?

LINDA At Frank's Chop House on Forty-eighth near Sixth Avenue.

WILLY Is that so! How about you?

LINDA No, just the three of you. They're gonna blow you to a big meal!

WILLY Don't say! Who thought of that?

LINDA Biff came to me this morning, Willy, and he said, "Tell Dad, we want to blow him to a big meal." Be there six o'clock. You and your two boys are going to have dinner.

WILLY Gee whiz! That's really somethin'. I'm gonna knock Howard for a loop, kid. I'll get an advance, and I'll come home with a New York job. Goddammit, now I'm gonna do it!

LINDA Oh, that's the spirit, Willy!

WILLY I will never get behind a wheel the rest of my life!

LINDA It's changing, Willy, I can feel it changing!

WILLY Beyond a question. G'by, I'm late. [He starts to go again.]

LINDA [calling after him as she runs to the kitchen table for a handkerchief]

You got your glasses?

WILLY [feels for them, then comes back in] Yeah, yeah, got my glasses.

LINDA [giving him the handkerchief] And a handkerchief.

WILLY Yeah, handkerchief.

LINDA And your saccharine?

WILLY Yeah, my saccharine.

LINDA Be careful on the subway stairs.

[She kisses him, and a silk stocking is seen hanging from her hand. WILLY notices it.]

WILLY Will you stop mending stockings? At least while I'm in the house. It gets me nervous. I can't tell you. Please.

[LINDA hides the stocking in her hand as she follows WILLY across the forestage in front of the house.]

LINDA Remember, Frank's Chop House.

WILLY [passing the apron] Maybe beets would grow out there.

LINDA [laughing] But you tried so many times.

WILLY Yeah. Well, don't work hard today. [He disappears around the right corner of the house.]

LINDA Be careful!

[As WILLY vanishes, LINDA waves to him. Suddenly the phone rings. She runs across the stage and into the kitchen and lifts it.]

LINDA Hello? Oh, Biff! I'm so glad you called, I just . . . Yes, sure, I just told him. Yes, he'll be there for dinner at six o'clock, I didn't forget. Listen, I was just dying to tell you. You know that little rubber pipe I told you about? That he connected to the gas heater? I finally decided to go down the cellar this morning and take it away and destroy it. But it's gone! Imagine? He took it away himself, it isn't there! [She listens.] When? Oh, then you took it. Oh—nothing, it's just that I'd hoped he'd taken it away himself. Oh, I'm not worried, darling, because this morning he left in such high spirits, it was like the old days! I'm not afraid any more. Did Mr. Oliver see you? . . . Well, you wait there then. And make a nice impression on him, darling. Just don't perspire too much before you see him. And have a nice time with Dad. He may have big news too! . . . That's right, a New York job. And be sweet to him tonight, dear. Be loving to him. Because he's only a little boat looking for a harbor. [She is trembling with sorrow and joy.] Oh, that's wonderful, Biff, you'll save his life. Thanks, darling. Just put your arm around him when he comes into the restaurant. Give him a smile. That's the boy . . . Good-by, dear. . . . You got your comb? . . . That's fine. Good-by, Biff dear.

[In the middle of her speech, HOWARD WAGNER, thirty-six, wheels in a small typewriter table on which is a wire-recording machine and proceeds to plug it in. This is on the left forestage. Light slowly fades on LINDA as it rises on HOWARD. HOWARD is intent on threading the machine and only glances over his shoulder as WILLY appears.]

WILLY Pst! Pst!

HOWARD Hello, Willy, come in.

WILLY Like to have a little talk with you, Howard.

HOWARD Sorry to keep you waiting. I'll be with you in a minute.

WILLY What's that, Howard?

HOWARD Didn't you ever see one of these? Wire recorder.

WILLY Oh. Can we talk a minute?

HOWARD Records things. Just got delivery yesterday. Been driving me crazy, the most terrific machine I ever saw in my life. I was up all night with it.

WILLY What do you do with it?

HOWARD I bought it for dictation, but you can do anything with it. Listen to this. I had it home last night. Listen to what I picked up. The first one is my daughter. Get this. [He flicks the switch and "Roll out the Barrel" is heard being whistled.] Listen to that kid whistle.

WILLY That is lifelike, isn't it?

HOWARD Seven years old. Get that tone.

WILLY Ts, ts. Like to ask a little favor if you . . .

[The whistling breaks off, and the voice of HOWARD's daughter is heard.]

HIS DAUGHTER "Now you, Daddy."

HOWARD She's crazy for me! [Again the same song is whistled.] That's me!

Ha! [He winks.]

WILLY You're very good!

[The whistling breaks off again. The machine runs silent for a moment.]

HOWARD Sh! Get this now, this is my son.

HIS SON "The capital of Alabama is Montgomery; the capital of Arizona is Phoenix; the capital of Arkansas is Little Rock; the capital of California is Sacramento . . ." [and on, and on]

HOWARD [holding up five fingers] Five years old, Willy!

WILLY He'll make an announcer some day!

HIS SON [continuing] “The capital . . .”

HOWARD Get that—alphabetical order! [The machine breaks off suddenly.]

Wait a minute. The maid kicked the plug out.

WILLY It certainly is a—

HOWARD Sh, for God’s sake!

HIS SON “It’s nine o’clock, Bulova watch time. So I have to go to sleep.”

WILLY That really is—

HOWARD Wait a minute! The next is my wife.

[They wait.]

HOWARD’S VOICE “Go on, say something.” [pause] “Well, you gonna talk?”

HIS WIFE “I can’t think of anything.”

HOWARD’S VOICE “Well, talk—it’s turning.”

HIS WIFE [shyly, beaten] “Hello.” [silence] “Oh, Howard, I can’t talk into this . . .”

HOWARD [snapping the machine off] That was my wife.

WILLY That is a wonderful machine. Can we—

HOWARD I tell you, Willy, I’m gonna take my camera, and my handsaw, and all my hobbies, and out they go. This is the most fascinating relaxation I ever found.

WILLY I think I’ll get one myself.

HOWARD Sure, they’re only a hundred and a half. You can’t do without it.

Supposing you wanna hear Jack Benny,⁷ see? But you can’t be at home at that hour. So you tell the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . .

WILLY And when you come home you . . .

HOWARD You can come home twelve o’clock, one o’clock, any time you like, and you get yourself a Coke and sit yourself down, throw the switch, and there’s Jack Benny’s program in the middle of the night!

WILLY I’m definitely going to get one. Because lots of time I’m on the road, and I think to myself, what I must be missing on the radio!

HOWARD Don’t you have a radio in the car?

WILLY Well, yeah, but who ever thinks of turning it on?

HOWARD Say, aren’t you supposed to be in Boston?

WILLY That’s what I want to talk to you about, Howard. You got a minute?

[He draws a chair in from the wing.]

HOWARD What happened? What’re you doing here?

WILLY Well . . .

HOWARD You didn’t crack up again, did you?

WILLY Oh, no. No . . .

HOWARD Geez, you had me worried there for a minute. What’s the trouble?

WILLY Well, tell you the truth, Howard. I’ve come to the decision that I’d rather not travel any more.

HOWARD Not travel! Well, what’ll you do?

WILLY Remember, Christmas time, when you had the party here? You said you’d try to think of some spot for me here in town.

HOWARD With us?

WILLY Well, sure.

7. Vastly popular radio comedian of the 1930s and 1940s.

HOWARD Oh, yeah, yeah. I remember. Well, I couldn't think of anything for you, Willy.

WILLY I tell ya, Howard. The kids are all grown up, y'know. I don't need much any more. If I could take home—well, sixty-five dollars a week, I could swing it.

HOWARD Yeah, but Willy, see I—

WILLY I tell ya why, Howard. Speaking frankly and between the two of us, y'know—I'm just a little tired.

HOWARD Oh, I could understand that, Willy. But you're a road man, Willy, and we do a road business. We've only got a half-dozen salesmen on the floor here.

WILLY God knows, Howard, I never asked a favor of any man. But I was with the firm when your father used to carry you in here in his arms.

HOWARD I know that, Willy, but—

WILLY Your father came to me the day you were born and asked me what I thought of the name of Howard, may he rest in peace.

HOWARD I appreciate that, Willy, but there just is no spot here for you. If I had a spot I'd slam you right in, but I just don't have a single solitary spot.

[He looks for his lighter. WILLY has picked it up and gives it to him. Pause.]

WILLY [with increasing anger] Howard, all I need to set my table is fifty dollars a week.

HOWARD But where am I going to put you, kid?

WILLY Look, it isn't a question of whether I can sell merchandise, is it?

HOWARD No, but it's a business, kid, and everybody's gotta pull his own weight.

WILLY [desperately] Just let me tell you a story, Howard—

HOWARD 'Cause you gotta admit, business is business.

WILLY [angrily] Business is definitely business, but just listen for a minute. You don't understand this. When I was a boy—eighteen, nineteen—I was already on the road. And there was a question in my mind as to whether selling had a future for me. Because in those days I had a yearning to go to Alaska. See, there were three gold strikes in one month in Alaska, and I felt like going out. Just for the ride, you might say.

HOWARD [barely interested] Don't say.

WILLY Oh, yeah, my father lived many years in Alaska. He was an adventurous man. We've got quite a little streak of self-reliance in our family. I thought I'd go out with my older brother and try to locate him, and maybe settle in the North with the old man. And I was almost decided to go, when I met a salesman in the Parker House. His name was Dave Singleman. And he was eighty-four years old, and he'd drummed merchandise in thirty-one states. And old Dave, he'd go up to his room, y'understand, put on his green velvet slippers—I'll never forget—and pick up his phone and call the buyers, and without ever leaving his room, at the age of eighty-four, he made a living. And when I saw that, I realized that selling was the greatest career a man could want. 'Cause what could be more satisfying than to be able to go, at the age of eighty-four, into twenty or thirty different cities, and pick up a phone, and be remembered and loved and helped by so many different people? Do you know? when he died—and by the way he died the death of a salesman, in his green velvet slippers in the smoker of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, going into Boston—when he died, hundreds of salesmen and buyers were at his funeral. Things were sad on a lotta trains for months after that. [He stands up. HOWARD has not looked at him.] In those days there was personality in it, Howard. There was respect, and comradeship, and gratitude in it. Today, it's all cut and dried, and there's no chance for bringing friendship to bear—or personality. You see what I mean? They don't know me anymore.

HOWARD [moving away, toward the right] That's just the thing, Willy.

WILLY If I had forty dollars a week—that's all I'd need. Forty dollars, Howard.

HOWARD Kid, I can't take blood from a stone, I—

WILLY [desperation is on him now] Howard, the year Al Smith⁸ was nominated, your father came to me and—

HOWARD [starting to go off] I've got to see some people, kid.

WILLY [stopping him] I'm talking about your father! There were promises made across this desk! You mustn't tell me you've got people to see—I put thirty-four years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit! [after a pause] Now pay attention. Your father—in 1928 I had a big year. I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in commissions.

HOWARD [impatiently] Now, Willy, you never averaged—

WILLY [banging his hand on the desk] I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in the year of 1928! And your father came to me—or rather, I was in the office here—it was right over this desk—and he put his hand on my shoulder—

HOWARD [getting up] You'll have to excuse me, Willy, I gotta see some people. Pull yourself together. [going out] I'll be back in a little while.

[On HOWARD'S exit, the light on his chair grows very bright and strange.]

WILLY Pull myself together! What the hell did I say to him? My God, I was yelling at him! How could I! [WILLY breaks off, staring at the light, which occupies the chair, animating it. He approaches this chair, standing across the desk from it.] Frank, Frank, don't you remember what you told me that time? How you put your hand on my shoulder, and Frank . . . [He leans on the desk and as he speaks the dead man's name he accidentally switches on the recorder, and instantly]

HOWARD'S SON “. . . of New York is Albany. The capital of Ohio is Cincinnati, the capital of Rhode Island is . . .” [The recitation continues.]

WILLY [leaping away with fright, shouting] Ha! Howard! Howard! Howard!

HOWARD [rushing in] What happened?

WILLY [pointing at the machine, which continues nasally, childishly, with the capital cities] Shut it off! Shut it off!

HOWARD [pulling the plug out] Look, Willy . . .

WILLY [pressing his hands to his eyes] I gotta get myself some coffee. I'll get some coffee . . .

[WILLY starts to walk out. HOWARD stops him.]

8. Democratic candidate for president in 1928.

HOWARD [rolling up the cord] Willy, look . . .

WILLY I'll go to Boston.

HOWARD Willy, you can't go to Boston for us.

WILLY Why can't I go?

HOWARD I don't want you to represent us. I've been meaning to tell you for a long time now.

WILLY Howard, are you firing me?

HOWARD I think you need a good long rest, Willy.

WILLY Howard—

HOWARD And when you feel better, come back, and we'll see if we can work something out.

WILLY But I gotta earn money, Howard. I'm in no position to—

HOWARD Where are your sons? Why don't your sons give you a hand?

WILLY They're working on a very big deal.

HOWARD This is no time for false pride, Willy. You go to your sons and you tell them that you're tired. You've got two great boys, haven't you?

WILLY Oh, no question, no question, but in the meantime . . .

HOWARD Then that's that, heh?

WILLY All right, I'll go to Boston tomorrow.

HOWARD No, no.

WILLY I can't throw myself on my sons. I'm not a cripple!

HOWARD Look, kid, I'm busy, I'm busy this morning.

WILLY [grasping HOWARD's arm] Howard, you've got to let me go to Boston!

HOWARD [hard, keeping himself under control] I've got a line of people to see this morning. Sit down, take five minutes, and pull yourself together, and then go home, will ya? I need the office, Willy. [He starts to go, turns, remembering the recorder, starts to push off the table holding the recorder.] Oh, yeah. Whenever you can this week, stop by and drop off the samples. You'll feel better, Willy, and then come back and we'll talk. Pull yourself together, kid, there's people outside.

[HOWARD exits, pushing the table off left. WILLY stares into space, exhausted. Now the music is heard—BEN's music—first distantly, then closer, closer. As WILLY speaks, BEN enters from the right. He carries valise and umbrella.]

WILLY Oh, Ben, how did you do it? What is the answer? Did you wind up the Alaska deal already?

BEN Doesn't take much time if you know what you're doing. Just a short business trip. Boarding ship in an hour. Wanted to say good-by.

WILLY Ben, I've got to talk to you.

BEN [glancing at his watch] Haven't the time, William.

WILLY [crossing the apron to BEN] Ben, nothing's working out. I don't know what to do.

BEN Now, look here, William. I've bought timberland in Alaska and I need a man to look after things for me.

WILLY God, timberland! Me and my boys in those grand outdoors!

BEN You've a new continent at your doorstep, William. Get out of these cities, they're full of talk and time payments and courts of law. Screw on your fists and you can fight for a fortune up there.

WILLY Yes, yes! Linda, Linda!

[LINDA enters as of old, with the wash.]

LINDA Oh, you're back?

BEN I haven't much time.

WILLY No, wait! Linda, he's got a proposition for me in Alaska.

LINDA But you've got— [to BEN] He's got a beautiful job here.

WILLY But in Alaska, kid, I could—

LINDA You're doing well enough, Willy!

BEN [to LINDA] Enough for what, my dear?

LINDA [frightened of BEN and angry at him] Don't say those things to him!

Enough to be happy right here, right now. [to WILLY, while BEN laughs]

Why must everybody conquer the world? You're well liked, and the boys love you, and someday—[to BEN]—why, old man Wagner told him just the other day that if he keeps it up he'll be a member of the firm, didn't he, Willy?

WILLY Sure, sure. I am building something with this firm, Ben, and if a man is building something he must be on the right track, mustn't he?

BEN What are you building? Lay your hand on it. Where is it?

WILLY [hesitantly] That's true, Linda, there's nothing.

LINDA Why? [to BEN] There's a man eighty-four years old—

WILLY That's right, Ben, that's right. When I look at that man I say, what is there to worry about?

BEN Bah!

WILLY It's true, Ben. All he has to do is go into any city, pick up the phone, and he's making his living and you know why?

BEN [picking up his valise] I've got to go.

WILLY [holding BEN back] Look at this boy!

[BIFF, in his high school sweater, enters carrying suitcase. HAPPY carries BIFF's shoulder guards, gold helmet, and football pants.]

WILLY Without a penny to his name, three great universities are begging for him, and from there the sky's the limit, because it's not what you do, Ben. It's who you know and the smile on your face! It's contacts, Ben, contacts! The whole wealth of Alaska passes over the lunch table at the Commodore Hotel, and that's the wonder, the wonder of this country, that a man can end with diamonds here on the basis of being liked! [He turns to BIFF.] And that's why when you get out on that field today it's important. Because thousands of people will be rooting for you and loving you. [to BEN, who has again begun to leave] And Ben! when he walks into a business office his name will sound out like a bell and all the doors will open to him! I've seen it, Ben, I've seen it a thousand times! You can't feel it with your hand like timber, but it's there!

BEN Good-by, William.

WILLY Ben, am I right? Don't you think I'm right? I value your advice.

BEN There's a new continent at your doorstep, William. You could walk out rich. Rich! [He is gone.]

WILLY We'll do it here, Ben! You hear me? We're gonna do it here!

[Young BERNARD rushes in. The gay music of the Boys is heard.]

BERNARD Oh, gee, I was afraid you left already!

WILLY Why? What time is it?

BERNARD It's half-past one!

WILLY Well, come on, everybody! Ebbets Field next stop! Where's the pennants? [He rushes through the wall-line of the kitchen and out into the living-room.]

LINDA [to BIFF] Did you pack fresh underwear?

BIFF [who has been limbering up] I want to go!

BERNARD Biff, I'm carrying your helmet, ain't I?

HAPPY No, I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD Oh, Biff, you promised me.

HAPPY I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD How am I going to get in the locker room?

LINDA Let him carry the shoulder guards. [She puts her coat and hat on in the kitchen.]

BERNARD Can I, Biff? 'Cause I told everybody I'm going to be in the locker room.

HAPPY In Ebbets Field it's the clubhouse.

BERNARD I meant the clubhouse. Biff!

HAPPY Biff!

BIFF [grandly, after a slight pause] Let him carry the shoulder guards.

HAPPY [as he gives BERNARD the shoulder guards] Stay close to us now. [WILLY rushes in with the pennants.]

WILLY [handing them out] Everybody wave when Biff comes out on the field. [HAPPY and BERNARD run off.] You set now, boy? [The music has died away.]

BIFF Ready to go, Pop. Every muscle is ready.

WILLY [at the edge of the apron] You realize what this means?

BIFF That's right, Pop.

WILLY [feeling BIFF's muscles] You're comin' home this afternoon captain of the All-Scholastic Championship Team of the City of New York.

BIFF I got it, Pop. And remember, pal, when I take off my helmet, that touchdown is for you.

WILLY Let's go! [He is starting out, with his arm around BIFF, when CHARLEY enters, as of old, in knickers.] I got no room for you, Charley.

CHARLEY Room? For what?

WILLY In the car.

CHARLEY You goin' for a ride? I wanted to shoot some casino.

WILLY [furiously] Casino! [incredulously] Don't you realize what today is?

LINDA Oh, he knows, Willy. He's just kidding you.

WILLY That's nothing to kid about!

CHARLEY No, Linda, what's goin' on?

LINDA He's playing in Ebbets Field.

CHARLEY Baseball in this weather?

WILLY Don't talk to him. Come on, come on! [He is pushing them out.]

CHARLEY Wait a minute, didn't you hear the news?

WILLY What?

CHARLEY Don't you listen to the radio? Ebbets Field just blew up.

WILLY You go to hell! [CHARLEY laughs. Pushing them out] Come on, come on! We're late.

CHARLEY [as they go] Knock a homer, Biff, knock a homer!

WILLY [the last to leave, turning to CHARLEY] I don't think that was funny, Charley. This is the greatest day of his life.

CHARLEY Willy, when are you going to grow up?

WILLY Yeah, heh? When this game is over, Charley, you'll be laughing out of the other side of your face. They'll be calling him another Red Grange.⁹ Twenty-five thousand a year.

CHARLEY [kidding] Is that so?

WILLY Yeah, that's so.

CHARLEY Well, then, I'm sorry, Willy. But tell me something.

WILLY What?

CHARLEY Who is Red Grange?

WILLY Put up your hands. Goddam you, put up your hands!

[CHARLEY, chuckling, shakes his head and walks away, around the left corner of the stage. WILLY follows him. The music rises to a mocking frenzy.]

WILLY Who the hell do you think you are, better than everybody else? You don't know everything, you big, ignorant, stupid . . . Put up your hands!

[Light rises, on the right side of the forestage, on a small table in the reception room of CHARLEY's office. Traffic sounds are heard. BERNARD, now mature, sits whistling to himself. A pair of tennis rackets and an overnight bag are on the floor beside him.]

WILLY [offstage] What are you walking away for? Don't walk away! If you're going to say something say it to my face! I know you laugh at me behind my back. You'll laugh out of the other side of your goddam face after this game. Touchdown! Touchdown! Eighty thousand people! Touchdown! Right between the goal posts.

[BERNARD is a quiet, earnest, but self-assured young man. WILLY's voice is coming from right upstage now. BERNARD lowers his feet off the table and listens. JENNY, his father's secretary, enters.]

JENNY [distressed] Say, Bernard, will you go out in the hall?

BERNARD What is that noise? Who is it?

JENNY Mr. Loman. He just got off the elevator.

BERNARD [getting up] Who's he arguing with?

JENNY Nobody. There's nobody with him. I can't deal with him any more, and your father gets all upset everytime he comes. I've got a lot of typing to do, and your father's waiting to sign it. Will you see him?

WILLY [entering] Touchdown! Touch— [He sees JENNY.] Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya? Workin'? Or still honest?

JENNY Fine. How've you been feeling?

WILLY Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha! [He is surprised to see the rackets.]

BERNARD Hello, Uncle Willy.

WILLY [almost shocked] Bernard! Well, look who's here! [He comes quickly, guiltily to BERNARD and warmly shakes his hand.]

BERNARD How are you? Good to see you.

WILLY What are you doing here?

BERNARD Oh, just stopped by to see Pop. Get off my feet till my train leaves. I'm going to Washington in a few minutes.

WILLY Is he in?

9. Harold Edward Grange (1903–1991), all-American halfback at the University of Illinois from 1923 to 1925, who then played professionally for the Chicago Bears.

BERNARD Yes, he's in his office with the accountant. Sit down.

WILLY [sitting down] What're you going to do in Washington?

BERNARD Oh, just a case I've got there, Willy.

WILLY That so? [indicating the rackets] You going to play tennis there?

BERNARD I'm staying with a friend who's got a court.

WILLY Don't say. His own tennis court. Must be fine people, I bet.

BERNARD They are, very nice. Dad tells me Biff's in town.

WILLY [with a big smile] Yeah, Biff's in. Working on a very big deal, Bernard.

BERNARD What's Biff doing?

WILLY Well, he's been doing very big things in the West. But he decided to establish himself here. Very big. We're having dinner. Did I hear your wife had a boy?

BERNARD That's right. Our second.

WILLY Two boys! What do you know!

BERNARD What kind of a deal has Biff got?

WILLY Well, Bill Oliver—very big sporting-goods man—he wants Biff very badly. Called him in from the West. Long distance, carte blanche, special deliveries. Your friends have their own private tennis court?

BERNARD You still with the old firm, Willy?

WILLY [after a pause] I'm—I'm overjoyed to see how you made the grade, Bernard, overjoyed. It's an encouraging thing to see a young man really—really—Looks very good for Biff—very—[He breaks off, then] Bernard—[He is so full of emotion, he breaks off again.]

BERNARD What is it, Willy?

WILLY [small and alone] What—what's the secret?

BERNARD What secret?

WILLY How—how did you? Why didn't he ever catch on?

BERNARD I wouldn't know that, Willy.

WILLY [confidentially, desperately] You were his friend, his boyhood friend. There's something I don't understand about it. His life ended after that Ebbets Field game. From the age of seventeen nothing good ever happened to him.

BERNARD He never trained himself for anything.

WILLY But he did, he did. After high school he took so many correspondence courses. Radio mechanics; television; God knows what, and never made the slightest mark.

BERNARD [taking off his glasses] Willy, do you want to talk candidly?

WILLY [rising, faces BERNARD] I regard you as a very brilliant man, Bernard. I value your advice.

BERNARD Oh, the hell with the advice, Willy. I couldn't advise you. There's just one thing I've always wanted to ask you. When he was supposed to graduate, and the math teacher flunked him—

WILLY Oh, that son-of-a-bitch ruined his life.

BERNARD Yeah, but, Willy, all he had to do was go to summer school and make up that subject.

WILLY That's right, that's right.

BERNARD Did you tell him not to go to summer school?

WILLY Me? I begged him to go. I ordered him to go!

BERNARD Then why wouldn't he go?

WILLY Why? Why! Bernard, that question has been trailing me like a ghost for the last fifteen years. He flunked the subject, and laid down and died like a hammer hit him!

BERNARD Take it easy, kid.

WILLY Let me talk to you—I got nobody to talk to. Bernard, Bernard, was it my fault? Y’see? It keeps going around in my mind, maybe I did something to him. I got nothing to give him.

BERNARD Don’t take it so hard.

WILLY Why did he lay down? What is the story there? You were his friend!

BERNARD Willy, I remember, it was June, and our grades came out. And he’d flunked math.

WILLY That son-of-a-bitch!

BERNARD No, it wasn’t right then. Biff just got very angry, I remember, and he was ready to enroll in summer school.

WILLY [surprised] He was?

BERNARD He wasn’t beaten by it at all. But then, Willy, he disappeared from the block for almost a month. And I got the idea that he’d gone up to New England to see you. Did he have a talk with you then?

[WILLY stares in silence.]

BERNARD Willy?

WILLY [with a strong edge of resentment in his voice] Yeah, he came to Boston. What about it?

BERNARD Well, just that when he came back—I’ll never forget this, it always mystifies me. Because I’d thought so well of Biff, even though he’d always taken advantage of me. I loved him, Willy, y’know? And he came back after that month and took his sneakers—remember those sneakers with “University of Virginia” printed on them? He was so proud of those, wore them every day. And he took them down in the cellar, and burned them up in the furnace. We had a fist fight. It lasted at least half an hour. Just the two of us, punching each other down the cellar, and crying right through it. I’ve often thought of how strange it was that I knew he’d given up his life. What happened in Boston, Willy?

[WILLY looks at him as at an intruder.]

BERNARD I just bring it up because you asked me.

WILLY [angrily] Nothing. What do you mean, “What happened?” What’s that got to do with anything?

BERNARD Well, don’t get sore.

WILLY What are you trying to do, blame it on me? If a boy lays down is that my fault?

BERNARD Now, Willy, don’t get—

WILLY Well, don’t—don’t talk to me that way! What does that mean, “What happened?”

[CHARLEY enters. He is in his vest, and he carries a bottle of bourbon.]

CHARLEY Hey, you’re going to miss that train. [He waves the bottle.]

BERNARD Yeah, I’m going. [He takes the bottle.] Thanks, Pop. [He picks up his rackets and bag.] Good-by, Willy, and don’t worry about it. You know, “If at first you don’t succeed . . .”

WILLY Yes, I believe in that.

BERNARD But sometimes, Willy, it’s better for a man just to walk away.

WILLY Walk away?

BERNARD That's right.

WILLY But if you can't walk away?

BERNARD [after a slight pause] I guess that's when it's tough. [extending his hand] Good-by, Willy.

WILLY [shaking BERNARD's hand] Good-by, boy.

CHARLEY [an arm on BERNARD's shoulder] How do you like this kid? Gonna argue a case in front of the Supreme Court.

BERNARD [protesting] Pop!

WILLY [genuinely shocked, pained, and happy] No! The Supreme Court!

BERNARD I gotta run. 'By, Dad!

CHARLEY Knock 'em dead, Bernard!

[BERNARD goes off.]

WILLY [as CHARLEY takes out his wallet] The Supreme Court! And he didn't even mention it!

CHARLEY [counting out money on the desk] He don't have to—he's gonna do it.

WILLY And you never told him what to do, did you? You never took any interest in him.

CHARLEY My salvation is that I never took any interest in anything. There's some money—fifty dollars. I got an accountant inside.

WILLY Charley, look . . . [with difficulty] I got my insurance to pay. If you can manage it—I need a hundred and ten dollars.

[CHARLEY doesn't reply for a moment; merely stops moving.]

WILLY I'd draw it from my bank but Linda would know, and I . . .

CHARLEY Sit down, Willy.

WILLY [moving toward the chair] I'm keeping an account of everything, remember. I'll pay every penny back. [He sits.]

CHARLEY Now listen to me, Willy.

WILLY I want you to know I appreciate . . .

CHARLEY [sitting down on the table] Willy, what're you doin'? What the hell is goin' on in your head?

WILLY Why? I'm simply . . .

CHARLEY I offered you a job. You can make fifty dollars a week. And I won't send you on the road.

WILLY I've got a job.

CHARLEY Without pay? What kind of job is a job without pay? [He rises.]

Now, look kid, enough is enough. I'm no genius but I know when I'm being insulted.

WILLY Insulted!

CHARLEY Why don't you want to work for me?

WILLY What's the matter with you? I've got a job.

CHARLEY Then what're you walkin' in here every week for?

WILLY [getting up] Well, if you don't want me to walk in here—

CHARLEY I am offering you a job!

WILLY I don't want your goddam job!

CHARLEY When the hell are you going to grow up?

WILLY [furiously] You big ignoramus, if you say that to me again I'll rap you one! I don't care how big you are! [He's ready to fight. Pause.]

CHARLEY [kindly, going to him] How much do you need, Willy?

WILLY Charley, I'm strapped, I'm strapped. I don't know what to do. I was just fired.

CHARLEY Howard fired you?

WILLY That snotnose. Imagine that? I named him. I named him Howard.

CHARLEY Willy, when're you gonna realize that them things don't mean anything? You named him Howard, but you can't sell that. The only thing you got in this world is what you can sell. And the funny thing is that you're a salesman, and you don't know that.

WILLY I've always tried to think otherwise. I guess. I always felt that if a man was impressive, and well liked, that nothing—

CHARLEY Why must everybody like you? Who liked J. P. Morgan?¹ Was he impressive? In a Turkish bath he'd look like a butcher. But with his pockets on he was very well liked. Now listen, Willy, I know you don't like me, and nobody can say I'm in love with you, but I'll give you a job because—just for the hell of it, put it that way. Now what do you say?

WILLY I—I just can't work for you, Charley.

CHARLEY What're you, jealous of me?

WILLY I can't work for you, that's all, don't ask me why.

CHARLEY [angered, takes out more bills] You been jealous of me all your life, you damned fool! Here, pay your insurance. [He puts the money in WILLY'S hand.]

WILLY I'm keeping strict accounts.

CHARLEY I've got some work to do. Take care of yourself. And pay your insurance.

WILLY [moving to the right] Funny, y'know? After all the highways, and the trains, and the appointments, and the years, you end up worth more dead than alive.

CHARLEY Willy, nobody's worth nothin' dead. [after a slight pause] Did you hear what I said?

[WILLY stands still, dreaming.]

CHARLEY Willy!

WILLY Apologize to Bernard for me when you see him. I didn't mean to argue with him. He's a fine boy. They're all fine boys, and they'll end up big—all of them. Someday they'll all play tennis together. Wish me luck, Charley. He saw Bill Oliver today.

CHARLEY Good luck.

WILLY [on the verge of tears] Charley, you're the only friend I got. Isn't that a remarkable thing? [He goes out.]

CHARLEY Jesus!

[CHARLEY stares after him a moment and follows. All light blacks out. Suddenly raucous music is heard, and a red glow rises behind the screen at right. STANLEY, a young waiter, appears, carrying a table, followed by HAPPY, who is carrying two chairs.]

STANLEY [putting the table down] That's all right, Mr. Loman, I can handle it myself. [He turns and takes the chairs from HAPPY and places them at the table.]

HAPPY [glancing around] Oh, this is better.

1. John Pierpont Morgan (1837–1913), American banker and philanthropist famed for his enormous wealth.

STANLEY Sure, in the front there you're in the middle of all kinds a noise. Whenever you got a party. Mr. Loman, you just tell me and I'll put you back here. Y'know, there's a lotta people they don't like it private, because when they go out they like to see a lotta action around them because they're sick and tired to stay in the house by theirself. But I know you, you ain't from Hackensack. You know what I mean?

HAPPY [sitting down] So how's it coming, Stanley?

STANLEY Ah, it's a dog life. I only wish during the war they'd a took me in the Army. I coulda been dead by now.

HAPPY My brother's back, Stanley.

STANLEY Oh, he come back, heh? From the Far West.

HAPPY Yeah, big cattle man, my brother, so treat him right. And my father's coming too.

STANLEY Oh, your father too!

HAPPY You got a couple of nice lobsters?

STANLEY Hundred per cent, big.

HAPPY I want them with the claws.

STANLEY Don't worry, I don't give you no mice. [HAPPY laughs.] How about some wine? It'll put a head on the meal.

HAPPY No. You remember, Stanley, that recipe I brought you from overseas? With the champagne in it?

STANLEY Oh, yeah, sure. I still got it tacked up yet in the kitchen. But that'll have to cost a buck apiece anyways.

HAPPY That's all right.

STANLEY What'd you, hit a number or somethin'?

HAPPY No, it's a little celebration. My brother is—I think he pulled off a big deal today. I think we're going into business together.

STANLEY Great! That's the best for you. Because a family business, you know what I mean?—that's the best.

HAPPY That's what I think.

STANLEY 'Cause what's the difference? Somebody steals? It's in the family. Know what I mean? [sotto voce]² Like this bartender here. The boss is goin' crazy what kinda leak he's got in the cash register. You put it in but it don't come out.

HAPPY [raising his head] Sh!

STANLEY What?

HAPPY You notice I wasn't lookin' right or left, was I?

STANLEY No.

HAPPY And my eyes are closed.

STANLEY So what's the—?

HAPPY Strudel's comin'.

STANLEY [catching on, looks around] Ah, no, there's no—

[He breaks off as a furred, lavishly dressed girl enters and sits at the next table. Both follow her with their eyes.]

STANLEY Geez, how'd ya know?

HAPPY I got radar or something. [staring directly at her profile] Ooooooooo . . . Stanley.

STANLEY I think that's for you, Mr. Loman.

2. In an undertone [Italian].

HAPPY Look at that mouth. Oh, God. And the binoculars.

STANLEY Geez, you got a life, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY Wait on her.

STANLEY [going to the girl's table] Would you like a menu, ma'am?

GIRL I'm expecting someone, but I'd like a—

HAPPY Why don't you bring her—excuse me, miss, do you mind? I sell champagne, and I'd like you to try my brand. Bring her a champagne, Stanley.

GIRL That's awfully nice of you.

HAPPY Don't mention it. It's all company money. [He laughs.]

GIRL That's a charming product to be selling, isn't it?

HAPPY Oh, gets to be like everything else. Selling is selling, y'know.

GIRL I suppose.

HAPPY You don't happen to sell, do you?

GIRL No, I don't sell.

HAPPY Would you object to a compliment from a stranger? You ought to be on a magazine cover.

GIRL [looking at him a little archly] I have been.

[STANLEY comes in with a glass of champagne.]

HAPPY What'd I say before, Stanley? You see? She's a cover girl.

STANLEY Oh, I could see, I could see.

HAPPY [to the GIRL] What magazine?

GIRL Oh, a lot of them. [She takes the drink.] Thank you.

HAPPY You know what they say in France, don't you? "Champagne is the drink of the complexion"—Hya, Biff!

[BIFF has entered and sits with HAPPY.]

BIFF Hello, kid. Sorry I'm late.

HAPPY I just got here. Uh, Miss—?

GIRL Forsythe.

HAPPY Miss Forsythe, this is my brother.

BIFF Is Dad here?

HAPPY His name is Biff. You might've heard of him. Great football player.

GIRL Really? What team?

HAPPY Are you familiar with football?

GIRL No, I'm afraid I'm not.

HAPPY Biff is quarterback with the New York Giants.

GIRL Well, that's nice, isn't it? [She drinks.]

HAPPY Good health.

GIRL I'm happy to meet you.

HAPPY That's my name. Hap. It's really Harold, but at West Point they called me Happy.

GIRL [now really impressed] Oh, I see. How do you do? [She turns her profile.]

BIFF Isn't Dad coming?

HAPPY You want her?

BIFF Oh, I could never make that.

HAPPY I remember the time that idea would never come into your head. Where's the old confidence, Biff?

BIFF I just saw Oliver—

HAPPY Wait a minute. I've got to see that old confidence again. Do you want her? She's on call.

BIFF Oh, no. [He turns to look at the GIRL.]

HAPPY I'm telling you. Watch this. [turning to the GIRL] Honey? [She turns to him.] Are you busy?

GIRL Well, I am . . . but I could make a phone call.

HAPPY Do that, will you, honey? And see if you can get a friend. We'll be here for a while. Biff is one of the greatest football players in the country.

GIRL [standing up] Well, I'm certainly happy to meet you.

HAPPY Come back soon.

GIRL I'll try.

HAPPY Don't try, honey, try hard.

[The GIRL exits. STANLEY follows, shaking his head in bewildered admiration.]

HAPPY Isn't that a shame now? A beautiful girl like that? That's why I can't get married. There's not a good woman in a thousand. New York is loaded with them, kid!

BIFF Hap, look—

HAPPY I told you she was on call!

BIFF [strangely unnerved] Cut it out, will ya? I want to say something to you.

HAPPY Did you see Oliver?

BIFF I saw him all right. Now look, I want to tell Dad a couple of things and I want you to help me.

HAPPY What? Is he going to back you?

BIFF Are you crazy? You're out of your goddam head, you know that?

HAPPY Why? What happened?

BIFF [breathlessly] I did a terrible thing today, Hap. It's been the strangest day I ever went through. I'm all numb, I swear.

HAPPY You mean he wouldn't see you?

BIFF Well, I waited six hours for him, see? All day. Kept sending my name in. Even tried to date his secretary so she'd get me to him, but no soap.

HAPPY Because you're not showin' the old confidence, Biff. He remembered you, didn't he?

BIFF [stopping HAPPY with a gesture] Finally, about five o'clock, he comes out. Didn't remember who I was or anything. I felt like such an idiot, Hap.

HAPPY Did you tell him my Florida idea?

BIFF He walked away. I saw him for one minute. I got so mad I could've torn the walls down! How the hell did I ever get the idea I was a salesman there? I even believed myself that I'd been a salesman for him! And then he gave me one look and—I realized what a ridiculous lie my whole life has been! We've been talking in a dream for fifteen years. I was a shipping clerk.

HAPPY What'd you do?

BIFF [with great tension and wonder] Well, he left, see. And the secretary went out. I was all alone in the waiting-room. I don't know what came over me, Hap. The next thing I know I'm in his office—paneled walls, everything. I can't explain it. I—Hap, I took his fountain pen.

HAPPY Geez, did he catch you?

BIFF I ran out. I ran down all eleven flights. I ran and ran and ran.

HAPPY That was an awful dumb—what'd you do that for?

BIFF [agonized] I don't know, I just—wanted to take something, I don't know. You gotta help me, Hap, I'm gonna tell Pop.

HAPPY You crazy? What for?

BIFF Hap, he's got to understand that I'm not the man somebody lends that kind of money to. He thinks I've been spiting him all these years and it's eating him up.

HAPPY That's just it. You tell him something nice.

BIFF I can't.

HAPPY Say you got a lunch date with Oliver tomorrow.

BIFF So what do I do tomorrow?

HAPPY You leave the house tomorrow and come back at night and say Oliver is thinking it over. And he thinks it over for a couple of weeks, and gradually it fades away and nobody's the worse.

BIFF But it'll go on forever!

HAPPY Dad is never so happy as when he's looking forward to something!
[WILLY enters.]

HAPPY Hello, scout!

WILLY Gee, I haven't been here in years!

[STANLEY has followed WILLY in and sets a chair for him. STANLEY starts off but HAPPY stops him.]

HAPPY Stanley!

[STANLEY stands by, waiting for an order.]

BIFF [going to WILLY with guilt, as to an invalid] Sit down, Pop. You want a drink?

WILLY Sure, I don't mind.

BIFF Let's get a load on.

WILLY You look worried.

BIFF N-no. [to STANLEY] Scotch all around. Make it doubles.

STANLEY Doubles, right. [He goes.]

WILLY You had a couple already, didn't you?

BIFF Just a couple, yeah.

WILLY Well, what happened, boy? [nodding affirmatively, with a smile]
Everything go all right?

BIFF [takes a breath, then reaches out and grasps WILLY's hand] Pal . . . [He is smiling bravely, and WILLY is smiling too.] I had an experience today.

HAPPY Terrific, Pop.

WILLY That so? What happened?

BIFF [high, slightly alcoholic, above the earth] I'm going to tell you everything from first to last. It's been a strange day. [Silence. He looks around, composes himself as best he can, but his breath keeps breaking the rhythm of his voice.] I had to wait quite a while for him, and—

WILLY Oliver?

BIFF Yeah, Oliver. All day, as a matter of cold fact. And a lot of—instances—facts, Pop, facts about my life came back to me. Who was it, Pop? Who ever said I was a salesman with Oliver?

WILLY Well, you were.

BIFF No, Dad, I was a shipping clerk.

WILLY But you were practically—

BIFF [with determination] Dad, I don't know who said it first, but I was never a salesman for Bill Oliver.

WILLY What're you talking about?

BIFF Let's hold on to the facts tonight, Pop. We're not going to get anywhere bullin' around. I was a shipping clerk.

WILLY [angrily] All right, now listen to me—

BIFF Why don't you let me finish?

WILLY I'm not interested in stories about the past or any crap of that kind because the woods are burning, boys, you understand? There's a big blaze going on all around. I was fired today.

BIFF [shocked] How could you be?

WILLY I was fired, and I'm looking for a little good news to tell your mother, because the woman has waited and the woman has suffered. The gist of it is that I haven't got a story left in my head, Biff. So don't give me a lecture about facts and aspects. I am not interested. Now what've you got to say to me?

[STANLEY enters with three drinks. They wait until he leaves.]

WILLY Did you see Oliver?

BIFF Jesus, Dad!

WILLY You mean you didn't go up there?

HAPPY Sure he went up there.

BIFF I did. I—saw him. How could they fire you?

WILLY [on the edge of his chair] What kind of a welcome did he give you?

BIFF He won't even let you work on commission?

WILLY I'm out! [driving] So tell me, he gave you a warm welcome?

HAPPY Sure, Pop, sure!

BIFF [driven] Well, it was kind of—

WILLY I was wondering if he'd remember you. [to HAPPY] Imagine, man doesn't see him for ten, twelve years and gives him that kind of a welcome!

HAPPY Damn right!

BIFF [trying to return to the offensive] Pop, look—

WILLY You know why he remembered you, don't you? Because you impressed him in those days.

BIFF Let's talk quietly and get this down to the facts, huh?

WILLY [as though BIFF had been interrupting] Well, what happened? It's great news, Biff. Did he take you into his office or'd you talk in the waiting-room?

BIFF Well, he came in, see, and—

WILLY [with a big smile] What'd he say? Betcha he threw his arm around you.

BIFF Well, he kinda—

WILLY He's a fine man. [to HAPPY] Very hard man to see, y'know.

HAPPY [agreeing] Oh, I know.

WILLY [to BIFF] Is that where you had the drinks?

BIFF Yeah, he gave me a couple of—no, no!

HAPPY [cutting in] He told him my Florida idea.

WILLY Don't interrupt. [to BIFF] How'd he react to the Florida idea?

BIFF Dad, will you give me a minute to explain?

WILLY I've been waiting for you to explain since I sat down here! What happened? He took you into his office and what?

BIFF Well—I talked. And—he listened, see.

WILLY Famous for the way he listens, y'know. What was his answer?

BIFF His answer was— [He breaks off, suddenly angry.] Dad, you're not letting me tell you what I want to tell you!

WILLY [accusing, angered] You didn't see him, did you?

BIFF I did see him!

WILLY What'd you insult him or something? You insulted him, didn't you?

BIFF Listen, will you let me out of it, will you just let me out of it!

HAPPY What the hell!

WILLY Tell me what happened!

BIFF [to HAPPY] I can't talk to him!

[A single trumpet note jars the ear. The light of green leaves stains the house, which holds the air of night and a dream. YOUNG BERNARD enters and knocks on the door of the house.]

YOUNG BERNARD [frantically] Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

HAPPY Tell him what happened!

BIFF [to HAPPY] Shut up and leave me alone!

WILLY No, no. You had to go and flunk math!

BIFF What math? What're you talking about?

YOUNG BERNARD Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

[LINDA appears in the house, as of old.]

WILLY [wildly] Math, math, math!

BIFF Take it easy, Pop!

YOUNG BERNARD Mrs. Loman!

WILLY [furiously] If you hadn't flunked you'd've been set by now!

BIFF Now, look, I'm gonna tell you what happened, and you're going to listen to me.

YOUNG BERNARD Mrs. Loman!

BIFF I waited six hours—

HAPPY What the hell are you saying?

BIFF I kept sending in my name but he wouldn't see me. So finally he . . . [He continues unheard as light fades low on the restaurant.]

YOUNG BERNARD Biff flunked math!

LINDA No!

YOUNG BERNARD Birnbaum flunked him! They won't graduate him!

LINDA But they have to. He's gotta go to the university. Where is he? Biff! Biff!

YOUNG BERNARD No, he left. He went to Grand Central.

LINDA Grand—You mean he went to Boston!

YOUNG BERNARD Is Uncle Willy in Boston?

LINDA Oh, maybe Willy can talk to the teacher. Oh, the poor, poor boy!

[Light on house area snaps out.]

BIFF [at the table, now audible, holding up a gold fountain pen] . . . so I'm washed up with Oliver, you understand? Are you listening to me?

WILLY [at a loss] Yeah, sure. If you hadn't flunked—

BIFF Flunked what? What're you talking about?

WILLY Don't blame everything on me! I didn't flunk math—you did! What pen?

HAPPY That was awful dumb, Biff, a pen like that is worth—

WILLY [seeing the pen for the first time] You took Oliver's pen?

BIFF [weakening] Dad, I just explained it to you.

WILLY You stole Bill Oliver's fountain pen!

BIFF I didn't exactly steal it! That's just what I've been explaining to you!

HAPPY He had it in his hand and just then Oliver walked in, so he got nervous and stuck it in his pocket!

WILLY My God, Biff!

BIFF I never intended to do it, Dad!

OPERATOR'S VOICE Standish Arms, good evening!

WILLY [shouting] I'm not in my room!

BIFF [frightened] Dad, what's the matter? [He and HAPPY stand up.]

OPERATOR Ringing Mr. Loman for you!

WILLY I'm not there, stop it!

BIFF [horrified, gets down on one knee before WILLY] Dad, I'll make good,

I'll make good. [WILLY tries to get to his feet. BIFF holds him down.] Sit down now.

WILLY No, you're no good, you're no good for anything.

BIFF I am, Dad, I'll find something else, you understand? Now don't worry about anything. [He holds up WILLY's face.] Talk to me, Dad.

OPERATOR Mr. Loman does not answer. Shall I page him?

WILLY [attempting to stand, as though to rush and silence the OPERATOR]

No, no, no!

HAPPY He'll strike something, Pop.

WILLY No, no . . .

BIFF [desperately, standing over WILLY] Pop, listen! Listen to me! I'm telling you something good. Oliver talked to his partner about the Florida idea. You listening? He—he talked to his partner, and he came to me . . .

I'm going to be all right, you hear? Dad, listen to me, he said it was just a question of the amount!

WILLY Then you . . . got it?

HAPPY He's gonna be terrific, Pop!

WILLY [trying to stand] Then you got it, haven't you? You got it! You got it!

BIFF [agonized, holds WILLY down] No, no. Look, Pop. I'm supposed to have lunch with them tomorrow. I'm just telling you this so you'll know that I can still make an impression, Pop. And I'll make good somewhere, but I can't go tomorrow, see?

WILLY Why not? You simply—

BIFF But the pen, Pop!

WILLY You give it to him and tell him it was an oversight!

HAPPY Sure, have lunch tomorrow!

BIFF I can't say that—

WILLY You were doing a crossword puzzle and accidentally used his pen!

BIFF Listen, kid, I took those balls years ago, now I walk in with his fountain pen? That clinches it, don't you see? I can't face him like that! I'll try elsewhere.

PAGE'S VOICE Paging Mr. Loman!

WILLY Don't you want to be anything?

BIFF Pop, how can I go back?

WILLY You don't want to be anything, is that what's behind it?

BIFF [now angry at WILLY for not crediting his sympathy] Don't take it that way! You think it was easy walking into that office after what I'd done to him? A team of horses couldn't have dragged me back to Bill Oliver!

WILLY Then why'd you go?

BIFF Why did I go? Why did I go! Look at you! Look at what's become of you!

[Off left, THE WOMAN laughs.]

WILLY Biff, you're going to go to that lunch tomorrow, or—

BIFF I can't go. I've got no appointment!

HAPPY Biff for . . . !

WILLY Are you spiting me?

BIFF Don't take it that way! Goddammit!

WILLY [strikes BIFF and falters away from the table] You rotten little louse! Are you spiting me?

THE WOMAN Someone's at the door, Willy!

BIFF I'm no good, can't you see what I am?

HAPPY [separating them] Hey, you're in a restaurant! Now cut it out, both of you? [The girls enter.] Hello, girls, sit down.

[THE WOMAN laughs, off left.]

MISS FORSYTHE I guess we might as well. This is Letta.

THE WOMAN Willy, are you going to wake up?

BIFF [ignoring WILLY] How're ya, miss, sit down. What do you drink?

MISS FORSYTHE Letta might not be able to stay long.

LETTA I gotta get up early tomorrow. I got jury duty. I'm so excited! Were you fellows ever on a jury?

BIFF No, but I been in front of them! [The girls laugh.] This is my father.

LETTA Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop.

HAPPY Sit him down, Biff!

BIFF [going to him] Come on, slugger, drink us under the table. To hell with it! Come on, sit down, pal.

[On BIFF's last insistence, WILLY is about to sit.]

THE WOMAN [now urgently] Willy, are you going to answer the door!

[THE WOMAN's call pulls WILLY back. He starts right, befuddled.]

BIFF Hey, where are you going?

WILLY Open the door.

BIFF The door?

WILLY The washroom . . . the door . . . where's the door?

BIFF [leading WILLY to the left] Just go straight down.

[WILLY moves left.]

THE WOMAN Willy, Willy, are you going to get up, get up, get up, get up?

[WILLY exits left.]

LETTA I think it's sweet you bring your daddy along.

MISS FORSYTHE Oh, he isn't really your father!

BIFF [at left, turning to her resentfully] Miss Forsythe, you've just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled prince. A hard-working, unappreciated prince. A pal, you understand? A good companion. Always for his boys.

LETTA That's so sweet.

HAPPY Well, girls, what's the program? We're wasting time. Come on, Biff.

Gather round. Where would you like to go?

BIFF Why don't you do something for him?

HAPPY Me!

BIFF Don't you give a damn for him, Hap?

HAPPY What're you talking about? I'm the one who—

BIFF I sense it, you don't give a good goddam about him. [He takes the rolled-up hose from his pocket and puts it on the table in front of HAPPY.]

Look what I found in the cellar, for Christ's sake. How can you bear to let it go on?

HAPPY Me? Who goes away? Who runs off and—BIFF Yeah, but he doesn't mean anything to you. You could help him—I can't! Don't you understand what I'm talking about? He's going to kill himself, don't you know that?

HAPPY Don't I know it! Me!

BIFF Hap, help him! Jesus . . . help him . . . Help me, help me, I can't bear to look at his face! [Ready to weep, he hurries out, up right.]

HAPPY [starting after him] Where are you going?

MISS FORSYTHE What's he so mad about?

HAPPY Come on, girls, we'll catch up with him.

MISS FORSYTHE [as HAPPY pushes her out] Say, I don't like that temper of his!

HAPPY He's just a little overstrung, he'll be all right!

WILLY [off left, as THE WOMAN laughs] Don't answer! Don't answer!

LETTA Don't you want to tell your father—

HAPPY No, that's not my father. He's just a guy. Come on, we'll catch Biff, and, honey, we're going to paint this town! Stanley, where's the check! Hey, Stanley!

[They exit. STANLEY looks toward left.]

STANLEY [calling to HAPPY indignantly] Mr. Loman! Mr. Loman!

[STANLEY picks up a chair and follows them off. Knocking is heard off left. THE WOMAN enters, laughing. WILLY follows her. She is in a black slip; he is buttoning his shirt. Raw, sensuous music accompanies their speech.]

WILLY Will you stop laughing? Will you stop?

THE WOMAN Aren't you going to answer the door? He'll wake the whole hotel.

WILLY I'm not expecting anybody.

THE WOMAN Whyn't you have another drink, honey, and stop being so damn self-centered?

WILLY I'm so lonely.

THE WOMAN You know you ruined me, Willy? From now on, whenever you come to the office, I'll see that you go right through to the buyers. No waiting at my desk any more, Willy. You ruined me.

WILLY That's nice of you to say that.

THE WOMAN Gee, you are self-centered! Why so sad? You are the saddest, self-centeredest soul I ever did see-saw. [She laughs. He kisses her.] Come on inside, drummer boy. It's silly to be dressing in the middle of the night. [As knocking is heard] Aren't you going to answer the door?

WILLY They're knocking on the wrong door.

THE WOMAN But I felt the knocking. And he heard us talking in here. Maybe the hotel's on fire!

WILLY [his terror rising] It's a mistake.

THE WOMAN Then tell them to go away!

WILLY There's nobody there.

THE WOMAN It's getting on my nerves, Willy. There's somebody standing out there and it's getting on my nerves!

WILLY [pushing her away from him] All right, stay in the bathroom here, and don't come out. I think there's a law in Massachusetts about it, so don't come out. It may be that new room clerk. He looked very mean. So don't come out. It's a mistake, there's no fire.

[The knocking is heard again. He takes a few steps away from her, and she vanishes into the wing. The light follows him, and now he is facing YOUNG BIFF, who carries a suitcase. BIFF steps toward him. The music is gone.]

BIFF Why didn't you answer?

WILLY Biff! What are you doing in Boston?

BIFF Why didn't you answer? I've been knocking for five minutes, I called you on the phone—

WILLY I just heard you. I was in the bathroom and had the door shut. Did anything happen home?

BIFF Dad—I let you down.

WILLY What do you mean?

BIFF Dad . . .

WILLY Biffo, what's this about? [putting his arm around BIFF] Come on, let's go downstairs and get you a malted.

BIFF Dad, I flunked math.

WILLY Not for the term?

BIFF The term. I haven't got enough credits to graduate.

WILLY You mean to say Bernard wouldn't give you the answers?

BIFF He did, he tried, but I only got a sixty-one.

WILLY And they wouldn't give you four points?

BIFF Birnbaum refused absolutely. I begged him, Pop, but he won't give me those points. You gotta talk to him before they close the school. Because if he saw the kind of man you are, and you just talked to him in your way, I'm sure he'd come through for me. The class came right before practice, see, and I didn't go enough. Would you talk to him? He'd like you, Pop. You know the way you could talk.

WILLY You're on. We'll drive right back.

BIFF Oh, Dad, good work! I'm sure he'll change for you!

WILLY Go downstairs and tell the clerk I'm checkin' out. Go right down.

BIFF Yes, sir! See, the reason he hates me, Pop—one day he was late for class so I got up at the blackboard and imitated him. I crossed my eyes and talked with a lithp.

WILLY [laughing] You did? The kids like it?

BIFF They nearly died laughing!

WILLY Yeah? What'd you do?

BIFF The thquare root of thixthy twee is . . . [WILLY bursts out laughing; BIFF joins him.] And in the middle of it he walked in!

[WILLY laughs and THE WOMAN joins in offstage.]

WILLY [without hesitation] Hurry downstairs and—

BIFF Somebody in there?

WILLY No, that was next door.

[THE WOMAN laughs offstage.]

BIFF Somebody got in your bathroom!

WILLY No, it's the next room, there's a party—

THE WOMAN [enters laughing. She lisps this] Can I come in? There's something in the bathtub, Willy, and it's moving!

[WILLY looks at BIFF, who is staring open-mouthed and horrified at THE WOMAN.]

WILLY Ah—you better go back to your room. They must be finished painting by now. They're painting her room so I let her take a shower here. Go back, go back . . . [He pushes her.]

THE WOMAN [resisting] But I've got to get dressed, Willy, I can't—

WILLY Get out of here! Go back, go back . . . [suddenly striving for the ordinary] This is Miss Francis, Biff, she's a buyer. They're painting her room. Go back, Miss Francis, go back . . .

THE WOMAN But my clothes, I can't go out naked in the hall!

WILLY [pushing her offstage] Get outa here! Go back, go back!

[BIFF slowly sits down on his suitcase as the argument continues offstage.]

THE WOMAN Where's my stockings? You promised me stockings, Willy!

WILLY I have no stockings here!

THE WOMAN You had two boxes of size nine sheers for me, and I want them!

WILLY Here, for God's sake, will you get outa here!

THE WOMAN [enters holding a box of stockings] I just hope there's nobody in the hall. That's all I hope. [to BIFF] Are you football or baseball?

BIFF Football.

THE WOMAN [angry, humiliated] That's me too. G'night. [She snatches her clothes from WILLY, and walks out.]

WILLY [after a pause] Well, better get going. I want to get to the school first thing in the morning. Get my suits out of the closet. I'll get my valise. [BIFF doesn't move.] What's the matter? [BIFF remains motionless, tears falling.] She's a buyer. Buys for J. H. Simmons. She lives down the hall—they're painting. You don't imagine— [He breaks off. After a pause] Now listen, pal, she's just a buyer. She sees merchandise in her room and they have to keep it looking just so . . . [Pause. Assuming command] All right, get my suits. [BIFF doesn't move.] Now stop crying and do as I say. I gave you an order. Biff, I gave you an order! Is that what you do when I give you an order? How dare you cry! [putting his arm around BIFF] Now look, Biff, when you grow up you'll understand about these things. You mustn't—you mustn't overemphasize a thing like this. I'll see Birnbaum first thing in the morning.

BIFF Never mind.

WILLY [getting down beside BIFF] Never mind! He's going to give you those points. I'll see to it.

BIFF He wouldn't listen to you.

WILLY He certainly will listen to me. You need those points for the U. of Virginia.

BIFF I'm not going there.

WILLY Heh? If I can't get him to change that mark you'll make it up in summer school. You've got all summer to—

BIFF [his weeping breaking from him] Dad . . .

WILLY [infected by it] Oh, my boy . . .

BIFF Dad . . .

WILLY She's nothing to me, Biff. I was lonely, I was terribly lonely.

BIFF You—you gave her Mama's stockings! [His tears break through and he rises to go.]

WILLY [grabbing for BIFF] I gave you an order!

BIFF Don't touch me, you—liar!

WILLY Apologize for that!

BIFF You fake! You phony little fake! You fake! [Overcome, he turns quickly and weeping fully goes out with his suitcase, WILLY is left on the floor on his knees.]

WILLY I gave you an order! Biff, come back here or I'll beat you! Come back here! I'll whip you!

[STANLEY comes quickly in from the right and stands in front of WILLY.]

WILLY [shouts at STANLEY] I gave you an order . . .

STANLEY Hey, let's pick it up, pick it up, Mr. Loman. [He helps WILLY to his feet.] Your boys left with the chippies. They said they'll see you home.

[A second waiter watches some distance away.]

WILLY But we were supposed to have dinner together.

[Music is heard, WILLY's theme.]

STANLEY Can you make it?

WILLY I'll—sure, I can make it. [suddenly concerned about his clothes] Do I—I look all right?

STANLEY Sure, you look all right. [He flicks a speck off WILLY's lapel.]

WILLY Here—here's a dollar.

STANLEY Oh, your son paid me. It's all right.

WILLY [putting it in STANLEY's hand] No, take it. You're a good boy.

STANLEY Oh, no, you don't have to . . .

WILLY Here—here's some more, I don't need it any more. [after a slight pause] Tell me—is there a seed store in the neighborhood?

STANLEY Seeds? You mean like to plant?

[As WILLY turns, STANLEY slips the money back into his jacket pocket.]

WILLY Yes. Carrots, peas . . .

STANLEY Well, there's hardware stores on Sixth Avenue, but it may be too late now.

WILLY [anxiously] Oh, I'd better hurry. I've got to get some seeds. [He starts off to the right.] I've got to get some seeds, right away. Nothing's planted. I don't have a thing in the ground.

[WILLY hurries out as the light goes down. STANLEY moves over to the right after him, watches him off. The other waiter has been staring at WILLY.]

STANLEY [to the waiter] Well, whatta you looking at?

[The waiter picks up the chairs and moves off right. STANLEY takes the table and follows him. The light fades on this area. There is a long pause, the sound of the flute coming over. The light gradually rises on the kitchen, which is empty. HAPPY appears at the door of the house, followed by BIFF. HAPPY is carrying a large bunch of long-stemmed roses. He enters the kitchen, looks around for LINDA. Not seeing her, he turns to BIFF, who is just outside the house door, and makes a gesture with his hands, indicating "Not here, I guess." He looks into the living-room and freezes. Inside, LINDA, unseen, is seated, WILLY's coat on her lap. She rises ominously and quietly and moves toward HAPPY, who backs up into the kitchen, afraid.]

HAPPY Hey, what're you doing up? [LINDA says nothing but moves toward him implacably.] Where's Pop? [He keeps backing to the right, and now LINDA is in full view in the doorway to the living-room.] Is he sleeping?

LINDA Where were you?

HAPPY [trying to laugh it off] We met two girls, Mom, very fine types. Here, we brought you some flowers. [offering them to her] Put them in your room, Ma.

[She knocks them to the floor at BIFF's feet. He has now come inside and closed the door behind him. She stares at BIFF, silent.]

HAPPY Now what'd you do that for? Mom, I want you to have some flowers—

LINDA [cutting HAPPY off, violently to BIFF] Don't you care whether he lives or dies?

HAPPY [going to the stairs] Come upstairs, Biff.

BIFF [with a flare of disgust, to HAPPY] Go away from me! [to LINDA] What do you mean, lives or dies? Nobody's dying around here, pal.

LINDA Get out of my sight! Get out of here!

BIFF I wanna see the boss.

LINDA You're not going near him!

BIFF Where is he? [He moves into the living-room and LINDA follows.]

LINDA [shouting after BIFF] You invite him for dinner. He looks forward to it all day—[BIFF appears in his parents' bedroom, looks around and exits]—and then you desert him there. There's no stranger you'd do that to!

HAPPY Why? He had a swell time with us. Listen, when I—[LINDA comes back into the kitchen]—desert him I hope I don't outlive the day!

LINDA Get out of here!

HAPPY Now look, Mom . . .

LINDA Did you have to go to women tonight? You and your lousy rotten whores!

[BIFF re-enters the kitchen.]

HAPPY Mom, all we did was follow Biff around trying to cheer him up! [to BIFF] Boy, what a night you gave me!

LINDA Get out of here, both of you, and don't come back! I don't want you tormenting him any more. Go on now, get your things together! [to BIFF] You can sleep in his apartment. [She starts to pick up the flowers and stops herself.] Pick up this stuff, I'm not your maid any more. Pick it up, you bum, you!

[HAPPY turns his back to her in refusal. BIFF slowly moves over and gets down on his knees, picking up the flowers.]

LINDA You're a pair of animals! Not one, not another living soul would have had the cruelty to walk out on that man in a restaurant!

BIFF [not looking at her] Is that what he said?

LINDA He didn't have to say anything. He was so humiliated he nearly limped when he came in.

HAPPY But, Mom, he had a great time with us—

BIFF [cutting him off violently] Shut up!

[Without another word, HAPPY goes upstairs.]

LINDA You! You didn't even go in to see if he was all right!

BIFF [still on the floor in front of LINDA, the flowers in his hand; with self-loathing] No. Didn't. Didn't do a damned thing. How do you like that, eh? Left him babbling in a toilet.

LINDA You louse. You . . .

BIFF Now you hit it on the nose! [He gets up, throws the flowers in the waste-basket.] The scum of the earth, and you're looking at him!

LINDA Get out of here!

BIFF I gotta talk to the boss, Mom. Where is he?

LINDA You're not going near him. Get out of this house!

BIFF [with absolute assurance, determination] No. We're gonna have an abrupt conversation, him and me.

LINDA You're not talking to him!

[Hammering is heard from outside the house, off right. BIFF turns toward the noise.]

LINDA [suddenly pleading] Will you please leave him alone?

BIFF What's he doing out there?

LINDA He's planting the garden!

BIFF [quietly] Now? Oh, my God!

[BIFF moves outside, LINDA following. The light dies down on them and comes up on the center of the apron as WILLY walks into it. He is carrying a flashlight, a hoe, and a handful of seed packets. He raps the top of the hoe sharply to fix it firmly, and then moves to the left, measuring off the distance with his foot. He holds the flashlight to look at the seed packets, reading off the instructions. He is in the blue of night.]

WILLY Carrots . . . quarter-inch apart. Rows . . . one-foot rows. [He measures it off.] One foot. [He puts down a package and measures off.] Beets. [He puts down another package and measures again.] Lettuce. [He reads the package, puts it down.] One foot— [He breaks off as BEN appears at the right and moves slowly down to him.] What a proposition, ts, ts. Terrific, terrific. 'Cause she's suffered, Ben, the woman has suffered. You understand me? A man can't go out the way he came in, Ben, a man has got to add up to something. You can't, you can't— [BEN moves toward him as though to interrupt.] You gotta consider, now. Don't answer so quick. Remember, it's a guaranteed twenty-thousand-dollar proposition. Now look, Ben, I want you to go through the ins and outs of this thing with me. I've got nobody to talk to, Ben, and the woman has suffered, you hear me?

BEN [standing still, considering] What's the proposition?

WILLY It's twenty thousand dollars on the barrelhead. Guaranteed, gilt-edged, you understand?

BEN You don't want to make a fool of yourself. They might not honor the policy.

WILLY How can they dare refuse? Didn't I work like a coolie to meet every premium on the nose? And now they don't pay off! Impossible!

BEN It's called a cowardly thing, William.

WILLY Why? Does it take more guts to stand here the rest of my life ringing up a zero?

BEN [yielding] That's a point, William. [He moves, thinking, turns.] And twenty thousand—that is something one can feel with the hand, it is there.

WILLY [now assured, with rising power] Oh, Ben, that's the whole beauty of it! I see it like a diamond, shining in the dark, hard and rough, that I can pick up and touch in my hand. Not like—like an appointment! This would not be another damned-fool appointment, Ben, and it changes all the aspects. Because he thinks I'm nothing, see, and so he spites me. But the funeral— [straightening up] Ben, that funeral will be massive! They'll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates—that boy will be thunder-struck, Ben, because he never realized—I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey—I am known, Ben, and he'll see it with his eyes once and for all. He'll see what I am, Ben! He's in for a shock, that boy!

BEN [coming down to the edge of the garden] He'll call you a coward.

WILLY [suddenly fearful] No, that would be terrible.

BEN Yes. And a damned fool.

WILLY No, no, he mustn't, I won't have that! [He is broken and desperate.]

BEN He'll hate you, William.

[The gay music of the Boys is heard.]

WILLY Oh, Ben, how do we get back to all the great times? Used to be so full of light, and comradeship, the sleigh-riding in winter, and the rudeness on his cheeks. And always some kind of good news coming up, always something nice coming up ahead. And never even let me carry the valises in the house, and simonizing, simonizing that little red car! Why, why can't I give him something and not have him hate me?

BEN Let me think about it. [He glances at his watch.] I still have a little time. Remarkable proposition, but you've got to be sure you're not making a fool of yourself.

[BEN drifts off upstage and goes out of sight. BIFF comes down from the left.]

WILLY [suddenly conscious of BIFF, turns and looks up at him, then begins picking up the packages of seeds in confusion] Where the hell is that seed? [indignantly] You can't see nothing out here! They boxed in the whole goddam neighborhood!

BIFF There are people all around here. Don't you realize that?

WILLY I'm busy. Don't bother me.

BIFF [taking the hoe from WILLY] I'm saying good-by to you, Pop. [WILLY looks at him, silent, unable to move.] I'm not coming back any more.

WILLY You're not going to see Oliver tomorrow?

BIFF I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY He put his arm around you, and you've got no appointment?

BIFF Pop, get this now, will you? Everytime I've left it's been a fight that sent me out of here. Today I realized something about myself and I tried to explain it to you and I—I think I'm just not smart enough to make any sense out of it for you. To hell with whose fault it is or anything like that. [He takes WILLY's arm.] Let's just wrap it up, heh? Come on in, we'll tell Mom. [He gently tries to pull WILLY to left.]

WILLY [frozen, immobile, with guilt in his voice] No, I don't want to see her.

BIFF Come on! [He pulls again, and WILLY tries to pull away.]

WILLY [highly nervous] No, no, I don't want to see her.

BIFF [tries to look into WILLY's face, as if to find the answer there] Why don't you want to see her?

WILLY [more harshly now] Don't bother me, will you?

BIFF What do you mean, you don't want to see her? You don't want them calling you yellow, do you? This isn't your fault; it's me, I'm a bum. Now come inside! [WILLY strains to get away.] Did you hear what I said to you?

[WILLY pulls away and quickly goes by himself into the house. BIFF follows.]

LINDA [to WILLY] Did you plant, dear?

BIFF [at the door, to LINDA] All right, we had it out. I'm going and I'm not writing any more.

LINDA [going to WILLY in the kitchen] I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along.

[WILLY doesn't respond.]

BIFF People ask where I am and what I'm doing, you don't know, and you don't care. That way it'll be off your mind and you can start brightening up again. All right? That clears it, doesn't it? [WILLY is silent, and BIFF goes to him.] You gonna wish me luck, scout? [He extends his hand.] What do you say?

LINDA Shake his hand, Willy.

WILLY [turning to her, seething with hurt] There's no necessity to mention the pen at all, y'know.

BIFF [gently] I've got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY [erupting fiercely] He put his arm around . . . ?

BIFF Dad, you're never going to see what I am, so what's the use of arguing? If I strike oil I'll send you a check. Meantime forget I'm alive.

WILLY [to LINDA] Spite, see?

BIFF Shake hands, Dad.

WILLY Not my hand.

BIFF I was hoping not to go this way.

WILLY Well, this is the way you're going. Good-by.

[BIFF looks at him a moment, then turns sharply and goes to the stairs.]

WILLY [stops him with] May you rot in hell if you leave this house!

BIFF [turning] Exactly what is it that you want from me?

WILLY I want you to know, on the train, in the mountains, in the valleys, wherever you go, that you cut down your life for spite!

BIFF No, no.

WILLY Spite, spite, is the word of your undoing! And when you're down and out, remember what did it. When you're rotting somewhere beside the railroad tracks, remember, and don't you dare blame it on me!

BIFF I'm not blaming it on you!

WILLY I won't take the rap for this, you hear?

[HAPPY comes down the stairs and stands on the bottom step, watching.]

BIFF That's just what I'm telling you!

WILLY [sinking into a chair at the table, with full accusation] You're trying to put a knife in me—don't think I don't know what you're doing!

BIFF All right, phony! Then let's lay it on the line. [He whips the rubber tube out of his pocket and puts it on the table.]

HAPPY You crazy—

LINDA Biff! [She moves to grab the hose, but BIFF holds it down with his hand.]

BIFF Leave it there! Don't move it!

WILLY [not looking at it] What is that?

BIFF You know goddam well what that is.

WILLY [caged, wanting to escape] I never saw that.

BIFF You saw it. The mice didn't bring it into the cellar! What is this supposed to do, make a hero out of you? This supposed to make me sorry for you?

WILLY Never heard of it.

BIFF There'll be no pity for you, you hear it? No pity!

WILLY [to LINDA] You hear the spite!

BIFF No, you're going to hear the truth—what you are and what I am!

LINDA Stop it!

WILLY Spite!

HAPPY [coming down toward BIFF] You cut it now!

BIFF [to HAPPY] The man don't know who we are! The man is gonna know! [to WILLY] We never told the truth for ten minutes in this house!

HAPPY We always told the truth!

BIFF [turning on him] You big blow, are you the assistant buyer? You're one of the two assistants to the assistant, aren't you?

HAPPY Well, I'm practically—

BIFF You're practically full of it! We all are! And I'm through with it. [to WILLY] Now hear this, Willy, this is me.

WILLY I know you!

BIFF You know why I had no address for three months? I stole a suit in Kansas City and I was in jail. [to LINDA, who is sobbing] Stop crying. I'm through with it.

[LINDA turns away from them, her hands covering her face.]

WILLY I suppose that's my fault!

BIFF I stole myself out of every good job since high school!

WILLY And whose fault is that?

BIFF And I never got anywhere because you blew me so full of hot air I could never stand taking orders from anybody! That's whose fault it is!

WILLY I hear that!

LINDA Don't, Biff!

BIFF It's goddam time you heard that! I had to be boss big shot in two weeks, and I'm through with it!

WILLY Then hang yourself! For spite, hang yourself!

BIFF No! Nobody's hanging himself, Willy! I ran down eleven flights with a pen in my hand today. And suddenly I stopped, you hear me? And in the middle of that office building, do you hear this? I stopped in the middle of that building and I saw—the sky. I saw the things that I love in this world. The work and the food and time to sit and smoke. And I looked at the pen and said to myself, what the hell am I grabbing this for? Why am I trying to become what I don't want to be? What am I doing in an office, making a contemptuous, begging fool of myself, when all I want is out there, waiting for me the minute I say I know who I am! Why can't I say that, Willy? [He tries to make WILLY face him, but WILLY pulls away and moves to the left.]

WILLY [with hatred, threateningly] The door of your life is wide open!

BIFF Pop! I'm a dime a dozen, and so are you!

WILLY [turning on him now in an uncontrolled outburst] I am not a dime a dozen! I am Willy Loman, and you are Biff Loman!

[BIFF starts for WILLY, but is blocked by HAPPY. In his fury, BIFF seems on the verge of attacking his father.]

BIFF I am not a leader of men, Willy, and neither are you. You were never anything but a hard-working drummer who landed in the ash can like all the rest of them! I'm one dollar an hour, Willy! I tried seven states and couldn't raise it. A buck an hour! Do you gather my meaning? I'm not bringing home any prizes any more, and you're going to stop waiting for me to bring them home!

WILLY [directly to BIFF] You vengeful, spiteful mut!

[BIFF breaks from HAPPY. WILLY, in fright, starts up the stairs. BIFF grabs him.]

BIFF [at the peak of his fury] Pop, I'm nothing! I'm nothing, Pop. Can't you understand that? There's no spite in it any more. I'm just what I am, that's all.

[BIFF's fury has spent itself, and he breaks down, sobbing, holding on to WILLY, who dumbly fumbles for BIFF's face.]

WILLY [astonished] What're you doing? What're you doing? [to LINDA] Why is he crying?

BIFF [crying, broken] Will you let me go, for Christ's sake? Will you take that phony dream and burn it before something happens? [Struggling to contain himself, he pulls away and moves to the stairs.] I'll go in the morning. Put him—put him to bed. [Exhausted, BIFF moves up the stairs to his room.]

WILLY [after a long pause, astonished, elevated] Isn't that—isn't that remarkable? Biff—he likes me!

LINDA He loves you, Willy!

HAPPY [deeply moved] Always did, Pop.

WILLY Oh, Biff! [staring wildly] He cried! Cried to me. [He is choking with his love, and now cries out his promise.] That boy—that boy is going to be magnificent!

[BEN appears in the light just outside the kitchen.]

BEN Yes, outstanding, with twenty thousand behind him.

LINDA [sensing the racing of his mind, fearfully, carefully] Now come to bed, Willy. It's all settled now.

WILLY [finding it difficult not to rush out of the house] Yes, we'll sleep. Come on. Go to sleep, Hap.

BEN And it does take a great kind of a man to crack the jungle.

[In accents of dread, BEN's idyllic music starts up.]

HAPPY [his arm around LINDA] I'm getting married, Pop, don't forget it. I'm changing everything. I'm gonna run that department before the year is up. You'll see, Mom. [He kisses her.] BEN The jungle is dark but full of diamonds, Willy.

[WILLY turns, moves, listening to BEN.]

LINDA Be good. You're both good boys, just act that way, that's all.

HAPPY 'Night, Pop. [He goes upstairs.]

LINDA [to WILLY] Come, dear.

BEN [with greater force] One must go in to fetch a diamond out.

WILLY [to LINDA, as he moves slowly along the edge of the kitchen, toward the door] I just want to get settled down, Linda. Let me sit alone for a little.

LINDA [almost uttering her fear] I want you upstairs.

WILLY [taking her in his arms] In a few minutes, Linda. I couldn't sleep right now. Go on, you look awful tired. [He kisses her.] BEN Not like an appointment at all. A diamond is rough and hard to the touch.

WILLY Go on now. I'll be right up.

LINDA I think this is the only way, Willy.

WILLY Sure, it's the best thing.

BEN Best thing!

WILLY The only way. Everything is gonna be—go on, kid, get to bed. You look so tired.

LINDA Come right up.

WILLY Two minutes.

[LINDA goes into the living-room, then reappears in her bedroom. WILLY moves just outside the kitchen door.]

WILLY Loves me. [wonderingly] Always loved me. Isn't that a remarkable thing? Ben, he'll worship me for it!

BEN [with promise] It's dark there, but full of diamonds.

WILLY Can you imagine that magnificence with twenty thousand dollars in his pocket?

LINDA [calling from her room] Willy! Come up!

WILLY [calling into the kitchen] Yes! Yes. Coming! It's very smart, you realize that, don't you, sweetheart? Even Ben sees it. I gotta go, baby. 'By! 'By! [going over to BEN, almost dancing] Imagine? When the mail comes he'll be ahead of Bernard again!

BEN A perfect proposition all around.

WILLY Did you see how he cried to me? Oh, if I could kiss him, Ben!

BEN Time, William, time!

WILLY Oh, Ben, I always knew one way or another we were gonna make it, Biff and I!

BEN [looking at his watch] The boat. We'll be late. [He moves slowly off into the darkness.]

WILLY [elegiacally, turning to the house] Now when you kick off, boy, I want a seventy-yard boot, and get right down the field under the ball, and when you hit, hit low and hit hard, because it's important, boy. [He swings around and faces the audience.] There's all kinds of important people in the stands, and the first thing you know . . . [suddenly realizing he is alone] Ben! Ben, where do I . . . ? [He makes a sudden movement of search.] Ben, how do I . . . ?

LINDA [calling] Willy, you coming up?

WILLY [uttering a gasp of fear, whirling about as if to quiet her] Sh! [He turns around as if to find his way; sounds, faces, voices, seem to be swarming in upon him and he flicks at them, crying.] Sh! Sh! [Suddenly music, faint and high, stops him. It rises in intensity, almost to an unbearable scream. He goes up and down on his toes, and rushes off around the house.] Shhh!

LINDA Willy?

[There is no answer. LINDA waits. BIFF gets up off his bed. He is still in his clothes. HAPPY sits up. BIFF stands listening.]

LINDA [with real fear] Willy, answer me! Willy!

[There is the sound of a car starting and moving away at full speed.]

LINDA No!

BIFF [rushing down the stairs] Pop!

[As the car speeds off, the music crashes down in a frenzy of sound, which becomes the soft pulsation of a single cello string. BIFF slowly returns to his bedroom. He and HAPPY gravely don their jackets. LINDA slowly walks out of her room. The music has developed into a dead march. The leaves of day are appearing over everything. CHARLEY and BERNARD somberly dressed, appear and knock on the kitchen door. BIFF and HAPPY slowly descend the stairs to the kitchen as CHARLEY and BERNARD enter. All stop a moment when LINDA, in clothes of mourning, bearing a little bunch of roses, comes through the draped doorway into the kitchen. She goes to CHARLEY and takes his arm. Now all move toward the audience, through the wall-line of the kitchen. At the limit of the apron, LINDA lays down the flowers, kneels, and sits back on her heels. All stare down at the grave.]

Requiem

CHARLEY It's getting dark, Linda.

[LINDA doesn't react. She stares at the grave.]

BIFF How about it, Mom? Better get some rest, heh? They'll be closing the gate soon.

[LINDA makes no move. Pause.]

HAPPY [deeply angered] He had no right to do that. There was no necessity for it. We would've helped him.

CHARLEY [grunting] Hmmmm.

BIFF Come along, Mom.

LINDA Why didn't anybody come?

CHARLEY It was a very nice funeral.

LINDA But where are all the people he knew? Maybe they blame him.

CHARLEY Naa. It's a rough world, Linda. They wouldn't blame him.

LINDA I can't understand it. At this time especially. First time in thirty-five years we were just about free and clear. He only needed a little salary. He was even finished with the dentist.

CHARLEY No man only needs a little salary.

LINDA I can't understand it.

BIFF There were a lot of nice days. When he'd come home from a trip; or on Sundays, making the stoop; finishing the cellar; putting on the new porch; when he built the extra bathroom; and put up the garage. You know something, Charley, there's more of him in that front stoop than in all the sales he ever made.

CHARLEY Yeah. He was a happy man with a batch of cement.

LINDA He was so wonderful with his hands.

BIFF He had the wrong dreams. All, all, wrong.

HAPPY [almost ready to fight BIFF] Don't say that!

BIFF He never knew who he was.

CHARLEY [stopping HAPPY's movement and reply. To BIFF] Nobody dast blame this man. You don't understand: Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to the life. He don't put a bolt to a nut, he don't tell you the law or give you medicine. He's a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. And when they start not smiling back—that's an earthquake. And then you get yourself a couple of spots on your hat, and you're finished. Nobody dast blame this man. A salesman is got to dream, boy. It comes with the territory.

BIFF Charley, the man didn't know who he was.

HAPPY [infuriated] Don't say that!

BIFF Why don't you come with me, Happy?

HAPPY I'm not licked that easily. I'm staying right in this city, and I'm gonna beat this racket! [He looks at BIFF, his chin set.] The Loman Brothers!

BIFF I know who I am, kid.

HAPPY All right, boy. I'm gonna show you and everybody else that Willy Loman did not die in vain. He had a good dream. It's the only dream you can have—to come out number-one man. He fought it out here, and this is where I'm gonna win it for him.

BIFF [with a hopeless glance at HAPPY, bends toward his mother] Let's go, Mom.

LINDA I'll be with you in a minute. Go on, Charley. [He hesitates.] I want to, just for a minute. I never had a chance to say good-by.

[CHARLEY moves away, followed by HAPPY. BIFF remains a slight distance up and left of LINDA. She sits there, summoning herself. The flute begins, not far away, playing behind her speech.]

LINDA Forgive me, dear. I can't cry. I don't know what it is, but I can't cry. I don't understand it. Why did you ever do that? Help me, Willy, I can't cry. It seems to me that you're just on another trip. I keep expecting you. Willy, dear, I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. [A sob rises in her throat.] We're free and clear. [Sobbing more fully, released] We're free. [BIFF comes slowly toward her.] We're free . . . We're free . . .

[BIFF lifts her to her feet and moves out up right with her in his arms. LINDA sobs quietly. BERNARD and CHARLEY come together and follow them, followed by HAPPY. Only the music of the flute is left on the darkening stage as over the house the hard towers of the apartment buildings rise into sharp focus, and]

CURTAIN

1949

ROBERT LOWELL

1917–1977

In “North Haven,” her poem in memory of Robert Lowell, Elizabeth Bishop translates the birdsong as Lowell seemed to hear it: “repeat, repeat, repeat, revise, revise, revise.” Repeatedly, even obsessively, Lowell returned to certain subjects in his poems. Each return confirmed an existing pattern even as it opened the possibility for revision. In fact, Lowell's life was full of revision. Descended from Protestant New Englanders, he converted to Catholicism, then fell away from it; he married three times; and he changed his poetic style more than once. In the later part of his career Lowell revised even his published poems and did so repeatedly. "Revision is inspiration," he once said, "no reading of the finished work as exciting as writing-in the last changes." Revision allowed for Lowell's love of stray events, his attraction to the fluidity of life (in this, he resembles Wallace Stevens). But Lowell also wanted to organize life into formal patterns, to locate the random moment in the design of an epic history (his Catholicism can be seen, in part, as an expression of this desire). History offered plot and repetition: just as patterns of his childhood recurred in adult life, the sins of his New England ancestors were reenacted by contemporary America. Lowell's vision of history leaned toward apocalypse, toward the revelation of a prior meaning that the poet agonized to determine, and yet he cherished the freedom of "human chances," with all their indeterminacy. His poems had to accommodate these opposing impulses. Concerning the sequence of poems in Notebook 1967-1968, begun as a poetic diary, he said: "Accident threw up the subject and the plot swallowed them—famished for human chances." If Lowell often swallowed up the casual, the random, the ordinary, and the domestic into the forms of his poems, his best plots have a spontaneity whose meanings cannot be fixed.

The burden of family history was substantial for Lowell, whose ancestors included members of Boston's patrician families. His grandfather was a well-known Episcopal minister and head of the fashionable St. Mark's School, which the poet was later to attend. His great-granduncle James Russell Lowell had been a poet and the ambassador to England. The family's light note was provided by the poet Amy Lowell, "big and a scandal, as if Mae West were a cousin." In the context of this history Lowell's father, who fared badly in business after his retirement from service as a naval officer, appeared as a diminished figure.

Lowell's first act of revising family history was to leave New England after two years at Harvard (1935-37) in order to study at Ohio's Kenyon College with John Crowe Ransom, the poet and critic. The move brought him in closer touch with the New Criticism and its predilections for "formal difficult poems," the wit and irony of English Metaphysical writers such as John Donne. He also, through Ransom and the poet Allen Tate, came into contact with (although he never formally joined) the Fugitive movement, whose members were southern agrarians opposed to what they regarded as the corrupting values of northern industrialism.

Two of the acts that most decisively separated Lowell from family history were his conversion to Roman Catholicism (1940) and his resistance to American policies in World War II. Although he tried to enlist in the navy, he refused to be drafted into the army. He opposed the saturation bombing of Hamburg and the Allied policy of unconditional surrender and was as a result sentenced to a year's confinement in New York City's West Street jail. The presiding judge at his hearing admonished him for "marring" his family traditions. In his first book, Lord Weary's Castle (1946), his Catholicism provided a set of symbols and a distanced platform from which to express his violent antagonism to Protestant mercantile Boston. The stunning, apocalyptic conclusions of these early poems ("the Lord survives the rainbow of his will" or "The blue kingfisher dives on you in fire") render the devastating judgment of the eternal on the fallen history of the individual and the nation.

Alongside these poems drawing on Old Testament anger in Lord Weary's Castle were poems, such as "Mr. Edwards and the Spider," that explored from within the nervous intensity that underlay Puritan revivalism. Later dramatic narratives with modern settings, such as "The Mills of the Kavanaghs" and "Falling Asleep over the Aeneid," reveal his psychological interest in and obsession with ruined New England families.

In Life Studies (1959) Lowell changed his style dramatically. His subjects became explicitly autobiographical, his language more open and direct. In 1957 he gave readings in California, where Allen Ginsberg and the other Beats had just made their strongest impact in San Francisco. In contrast to their candid, breezy writing, Lowell felt his own seemed “distant, symbol-ridden, and willfully difficult. . . . I felt my old poems hid what they were really about, and many times offered a stiff, humorless, and even impenetrable surface.” Although more controlled and severe than Beat writers, he was stimulated by Ginsberg’s self-revelations to write more openly than he had about his parents and grandparents, about the mental breakdowns he suffered in the 1950s, and about the difficulties of marriage. (Lowell divorced his first wife, the novelist Jean Stafford, and married the critic Elizabeth Hardwick in 1949.)

Life Studies, by and large, records his ambivalence toward the New England where he resettled after the war, on Boston’s “hardly passionate Marlborough Street.” Revising his stance toward New England and family history, he no longer denounces the city of his fathers as if he were a privileged outsider. In complicated psychological portraits of his childhood and his relation to his parents and his wives, he assumes a portion of the weakness and vulnerability for himself.

In 1960 Lowell left Boston to live in New York City. For the Union Dead (1964), the book that followed, continued the autobiographical vein of Life Studies. Lowell called it a book about “witheredness . . . lemony, soured and dry, the drouth I had touched with my own hands.” These poems seem more carefully controlled than his earlier Life Studies. Often they organize key images from the past into a pattern that illuminates the present. The book includes a number of poems that fuse private and public themes, such as “Fall 1961” and the volume’s title poem.

In 1969 Lowell published Notebook 1967–1968 and then revised these poems for a second, augmented edition, called simply Notebook (1970). In 1973, in a characteristic act, he once more revised, rearranged, and expanded Notebook’s poems and published them in two separate books. The more personal poems, recording the breakup of his second marriage and his separation from his wife and daughter, were published as For Lizzie and Harriet. Those dealing more with public subjects, past and present, were published as History. These two books show Lowell once again engaged with the relations between the random event, or the moment in a personal life, and an epic design. In these unrhymed, loosely blank-verse revisions of the sonnet, Lowell responded to the books he was reading, to the events of his personal life, and to the Vietnam War, of which he was an outspoken critic. “Things I felt or saw, or read were drift in the whirlpool.”

At the same time a new collection of sonnets, The Dolphin (1973), appeared, recording his marriage to Lady Caroline Blackwood. (Lowell’s friend the poet Elizabeth Bishop objected to his use of Blackwood’s letters in the volume.) He divided his time between Blackwood’s home in England and periods of teaching writing and literature at Harvard—a familiar pattern for him, in which the old tensions between New England and “elsewhere” were being constantly explored and renewed. His last book, Day by Day (1977), records those stresses as well as new marital difficulties. It also contains some of his most powerful poems about his childhood.

For those who cherish the work of the early Lowell, with its manic, rhythmic energy and its enjambed lines building to fierce power, or those who admire the passionate engagement of Life Studies or For the Union Dead, the poems of his last four books can be disappointing. At times flat and dispirited, they can seem worked up rather than fully imagined. Yet the later Lowell demonstrates his substantial gifts in a quieter mode.

Lowell’s career included an interest in the theater, for which he wrote a version of Prometheus Bound, a translation of Racine’s Phaedra, and adaptations of Melville and Hawthorne stories gathered as The Old Glory. He also translated from modern European poetry and the classics, often freely as “imitations,” which brought important poetic voices into English currency. His Selected Poems (his own choices) appeared in 1976. When he died suddenly at the age of sixty, he was the dominant and most honored poet of his generation—not only for his ten volumes of verse but for his broad activity as a man of letters. He took upon himself the role of poet as public figure, sometimes at great personal cost. He was with the group of writers who led Vietnam War protesters against the Pentagon in 1967, where Norman Mailer, a fellow protester, observed that “Lowell gave off at times the unwilling haunted saintliness of a man who was repaying the moral debts of ten generations of ancestors.”

Colloquy in Black Rock¹

Here the jack-hammer jabs into the ocean;
 My heart, you race and stagger and demand
 More blood-gangs for your nigger-brass percussions,
 Till I, the stunned machine of your devotion,
 Clanging upon this cymbal of a hand, 5
 Am rattled screw and footloose. All discussions

End in the mud-flat detritus of death.
 My heart, beat faster, faster. In Black Mud²
 Hungarian workmen give their blood
 For the martyre Stephen,³ who was stoned to death. 10

Black Mud, a name to conjure with: O mud
 For watermelons gutted to the crust,
 Mud for the mole-tide⁴ harbor, mud for mouse,
 Mud for the armored Diesel fishing tubs that thud
 A year and a day⁵ to wind and tide; the dust 15
 Is on this skipping heart that shakes my house,

House of our Savior who was hanged till death.
 My heart, beat faster, faster. In Black Mud
 Stephen the martyre was broken down to blood: 20
 Our ransom is the rubble of his death.
 Christ walks on the black water. In Black Mud
 Darts the kingfisher. On Corpus Christi, heart,
 Over the drum-beat of St. Stephen's choir
 I hear him, Stupor Mundi,⁶ and the mud
 Flies from his hunching wings and beak—my heart, 25
 The blue kingfisher dives on you in fire.

1946

1. A section of Bridgeport, Connecticut, where Lowell went to live in 1944 after serving his jail term as a conscientious objector. It had a large Hungarian population.

2. The speaker's name for mud flats near Black Rock.

3. A reference to the wartime blood donations of the workers; the patron saint of Hungary, King Stephen I (977–1038); and St. Stephen Promartyr, the first Christian to be killed for his faith.

4. Special currents produced by a mole (break-water).

5. Perhaps the “year and a day” of Lowell's prison sentence.

6. Marvel of the world. “Kingfisher”: a short-tailed bird that dives for fish; associated in the poem's last line with Christ, the “fisher of men.” “Corpus Christi”: a Catholic feast day, celebrating the transformation of the communion wafer into the body of Christ.

The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket

[For Warren Winslow,¹ Dead at Sea]

Let man have dominion over the fishes of the sea and the fowls of the air and the beasts of the whole earth, and every creeping creature that moveth upon the earth.²

I

A brackish reach of shoal off Madaket³—
 The sea was still breaking violently and night
 Had steamed into our North Atlantic Fleet,
 When the drowned sailor clutched the drag-net. Light Flashed from his matted head and marble feet, 5
 He grappled at the net
 With the coiled, hurdling muscles of his thighs:
 The corpse was bloodless, a botch of reds and whites,
 Its open, staring eyes
 Were lustreless dead-lights⁴ 10
 Or cabin-windows on a stranded hulk
 Heavy with sand. We weight the body, close
 Its eyes and heave it seaward whence it came,
 Where the heel-headed dogfish barks its nose
 On Ahab's⁵ void and forehead; and the name 15
 Is blocked in yellow chalk.
 Sailors, who pitch this portent at the sea
 Where dreadnaughts shall confess
 Its hell-bent deity,
 When you are powerless 20
 To sand-bag this Atlantic bulwark, faced
 By the earth-shaker, green, unwearied, chaste
 In his steel scales: ask for no Orphean lute
 To pluck life back.⁶ The guns of the steeled fleet
 Recoil and then repeat 25
 The hoarse salute.

II

Whenever winds are moving and their breath
 Heaves at the roped-in bulwarks of this pier,
 The terns and sea-gulls tremble at your death
 In these home waters. Sailor, can you hear 30
 The Pequod's⁷ sea wings, beating landward, fall
 Headlong and break on our Atlantic wall

1. A cousin of Lowell's who died in the sinking of a naval vessel during World War II.

2. From Genesis 1.26, the account of the creation of humankind.

3. On Nantucket Island.

4. Shutters over portholes to keep out water in a storm. The images in lines 4–11 come from "The Shipwreck," the opening chapter of Cape Cod, by Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862).

5. Protagonist of the novel Moby-Dick, by Herman Melville (1819–1891); he drowns as the culmination of his obsessive hunt for the white whale. Melville uses Ahab's forehead as an emblem of his monomaniac passion.

6. In Greek mythology Orpheus, through his music, tried to win the freedom of his bride, Eurydice, from the Underworld. "Earth-shaker": an epithet for Poseidon, the Greek god of the oceans and of earthquakes.

7. Ahab's ship, destroyed by Moby-Dick.

Off 'Sconset, where the yawing S-boats⁸ splash
 The bellbuoy, with ballooning spinnakers,
 As the entangled, screeching mainsheet clears 35
 The blocks: off Madaket, where lubbers⁹ lash
 The heavy surf and throw their long lead squids
 For blue-fish? Sea-gulls blink their heavy lids Seaward. The winds' wings beat upon the stones,
 Cousin, and scream for you and the claws rush 40
 At the sea's throat and wring it in the slush
 Of this old Quaker graveyard where the bones
 Cry out in the long night for the hurt beast
 Bobbing by Ahab's whaleboats in the East.

III

All you recovered from Poseidon died 45
 With you, my cousin, and the harrowed brine
 Is fruitless on the blue beard of the god,
 Stretching beyond us to the castles in Spain,
 Nantucket's westward haven. To Cape Cod
 Guns, cradled on the tide, 50
 Blast the eelgrass about a waterclock
 Of bilge and backwash, roil the salt and sand
 Lashing earth's scaffold, rock
 Our warships in the hand
 Of the great God, where time's contrition blues 55
 Whatever it was these Quaker¹ sailors lost
 In the mad scramble of their lives. They died
 When time was open-eyed,
 Wooden and childish; only bones abide
 There, in the nowhere, where their boats were tossed 60
 Sky-high, where mariners had fabled news
 Of IS,² the whited monster. What it cost
 Them is their secret. In the sperm-whale's slick
 I see the Quakers drown and hear their cry:
 "If God himself had not been on our side, 65
 If God himself had not been on our side,
 When the Atlantic rose against us, why,
 Then it had swallowed us up quick."

IV

This is the end of the whaleroad³ and the whale
 Who spewed Nantucket bones on the thrashed swell 70
 And stirred the troubled waters to whirlpools
 To send the Pequod packing off to hell:
 This is the end of them, three-quarters fools,
 Snatching at straws to sail

8. Type of large racing sailboats. "Yawing": steering wildly in heavy seas.

9. Sailor's term for clumsy crew members.

1. The whaling population of Nantucket included many Quakers.

2. The white whale is here imagined as a force like the God of Exodus 3.14, who, when asked his name by Moses, replies, "I AM THAT I AM." Also an abbreviation of Iesu Salvator, Latin for Jesus, savior of men.

3. An Anglo-Saxon epithet for the sea.

Seaward and seaward on the turntail whale, 75
 Spouting out blood and water as it rolls,
 Sick as a dog to these Atlantic shoals:
Clamavimus,⁴ O depths. Let the sea-gulls wail

For water, for the deep where the high tide 80
 Mutters to its hurt self, mutters and ebbs.
 Waves wallow in their wash, go out and out,
 Leave only the death-rattle of the crabs,
 The beach increasing, its enormous snout
 Sucking the ocean's side.
 This is the end of running on the waves; 85
 We are poured out like water. Who will dance
 The mast-lashed master of Leviathans
 Up from this field of Quakers in their unstoned graves?

v

When the whale's viscera go and the roll 90
 Of its corruption overruns this world
 Beyond tree-swept Nantucket and Woods Hole⁵
 And Martha's Vineyard, Sailor, will your sword
 Whistle and fall and sink into the fat?
 In the great ash-pit of Jehoshaphat⁶
 The bones cry for the blood of the white whale, 95
 The fat flukes arch and whack about its ears,
 The death-lance churns into the sanctuary, tears
 The gun-blue swingle,⁷ heaving like a flail,
 And hacks the coiling life out: it works and drags
 And rips the sperm-whale's midriff into rags, 100
 Gobbets of blubber spill to wind and weather,
 Sailor, and gulls go round the stoven timbers
 Where the morning stars sing out together
 And thunder shakes the white surf and dismembers
 The red flag hammered in the mast-head.⁸ Hide, 105
 Our steel, Jonas Messias, in Thy side.⁹

VI. OUR LADY OF WALSINGHAM¹

There once the penitents took off their shoes
 And then walked barefoot the remaining mile;
 And the small trees, a stream and hedgerows file
 Slowly along the munching English lane, 110
 Like cows to the old shrine, until you lose

4. We have called (Latin), adapting the opening of Psalm 130: "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord."

5. On the coast of Massachusetts, near the island of Martha's Vineyard.

6. "The day of judgment. The world, according to some prophets, will end in fire" [Lowell's note]. In Joel 3, the Last Judgment takes place in the valley of Jehoshaphat.

7. Knifelike wooden instrument for beating flax (into fiber for spinning).

8. At the end of Moby-Dick, the arm of the American Indian Tashtego appears from the waves and nails Ahab's flag to the sinking mast.

9. Because he emerged alive from the belly of a whale, the prophet Jonah is often linked with the messiah as a figure of salvation.

1. Lowell took these details from E. I. Watkin's Catholic Art and Culture (1942), which includes a description of the medieval shrine of the Virgin at Walsingham.

Track of your dragging pain.
 The stream flows down under the druid tree,
 Shiloah's² whirlpools gurgle and make glad
 The castle of God. Sailor, you were glad 115
 And whistled Sion by that stream. But see:

Our Lady, too small for her canopy,
 Sits near the altar. There's no comeliness
 At all or charm in that expressionless
 Face with its heavy eyelids. As before, 120
 This face, for centuries a memory,
*Non est species, neque decor,*³
 Expressionless, expresses God: it goes
 Past castled Sion. She knows what God knows,
 Not Calvary's Cross nor crib at Bethlehem 125
 Now, and the world shall come to Walsingham.

VII

The empty winds are creaking and the oak
 Splatters and splatters on the cenotaph,
 The boughs are trembling and a gaff
 Bobs on the untimely stroke 130
 Of the greased wash exploding on a shoal-bell
 In the old mouth of the Atlantic. It's well;
 Atlantic, you are fouled with the blue sailors,
 Sea-monsters, upward angel, downward fish:
 Unmarried and corroding, spare of flesh 135
 Mart once of supercilious, wing'd clippers,
 Atlantic, where your bell-trap guts its spoil
 You could cut the brackish winds with a knife
 Here in Nantucket, and cast up the time
 When the Lord God formed man from the sea's slime 140
 And breathed into his face the breath of life,
 And blue-lung'd combers lumbered to the kill.
 The Lord survives the rainbow⁴ of His will.

1946

Mr. Edwards and the Spider¹

I saw the spiders marching through the air,
 Swimming from tree to tree that mildewed day
 In latter August when the hay Came creaking to the barn. But where

2. The stream that flows past God's Temple on Mount Sion (Isaiah 8.6). In Isaiah 51.11 the redeemed come "singing into Zion."

3. There is no ostentation or elegance (Latin).

4. Alluding to God's covenant with Noah after the Flood. The rainbow symbolized the fact that humanity would never again be destroyed by flood (Genesis 9.11).

1. Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), Puritan preacher and theologian. Lowell quotes his writings throughout. The details of the first stanza come from his youthful essay "Of Insects" ("The Habits of Spiders").

The wind is westerly, 5
 Where gnarled November makes the spiders fly
 Into the apparitions of the sky,
 They purpose nothing but their ease and die
 Urgently beating east to sunrise and the sea;

What are we in the hands of the great God? 10
 It was in vain you set up thorn and briar
 In battle array against the fire
 And treason crackling in your blood;
 For the wild thorns grow tame
 And will do nothing to oppose the flame; 15
 Your lacerations tell the losing game
 You play against a sickness past your cure.
 How will the hands be strong? How will the heart endure?²

A very little thing, a little worm,
 Or hourglass-blazoned spider,³ it is said, 20
 Can kill a tiger. Will the dead
 Hold up his mirror and affirm
 To the four winds the smell
 And flash of his authority? It's well
 If God who holds you to the pit of hell, 25
 Much as one holds a spider, will destroy,
 Baffle and dissipate your soul. As a small boy

On Windsor Marsh,⁴ I saw the spider die
 When thrown into the bowels of fierce fire:
 There's no long struggle, no desire 30
 To get up on its feet and fly—
 It stretches out its feet
 And dies. This is the sinner's last retreat;
 Yes, and no strength exerted on the heat
 Then sinews the abolished will, when sick 35
 And full of burning, it will whistle on a brick.

But who can plumb the sinking of that soul?
 Josiah Hawley,⁵ picture yourself cast
 Into a brick-kiln where the blast
 Fans your quick vitals to a coal— 40
 If measured by a glass,
 How long would it seem burning! Let there pass
 A minute, ten, ten trillion; but the blaze
 Is infinite, eternal: this is death,
 To die and know it. This is the Black Widow, death. 45

1946

2. This stanza draws on Edwards's sermon "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," whose point of departure is Ezekiel 22.14: "Can thine heart endure or can thine hands be strong in the days that I shall deal with thee?" (cf. line 18).
 3. The poisonous black widow spider has, on the underside of its abdomen, a red marking that resembles an hourglass.

4. East Windsor, Connecticut, Edwards's childhood home.

5. Edwards's uncle, Joseph Hawley.

My Last Afternoon with Uncle Devereux Winslow

1922: the stone porch of my grandfather's summer house

I

"I won't go with you. I want to stay with Grandpa!"
 That's how I threw cold water on my Mother and Father's watery martini pipe dreams at Sunday dinner.
 . . . Fontainebleau, Mattapoisett, Puget Sound. . . .¹ 5
 Nowhere was anywhere after a summer at my Grandfather's farm.
 Diamond-pointed, athirst and Norman,² its alley of poplars paraded from Grandmother's rose garden 10 to a scary stand of virgin pine, scrub, and paths forever pioneering.

One afternoon in 1922,
 I sat on the stone porch, looking through screens as black-grained as drifting coal. 15
Tockytock, tockytock clumped our Alpine, Edwardian cuckoo clock, slung with strangled, wooden game.
 Our farmer was cementing a root-house³ under the hill.
 One of my hands was cool on a pile 20 of black earth, the other warm on a pile of lime. All about me were the works of my Grandfather's hands:
 snapshots of his Liberty Bell silver mine;
 his high school at Stuttgart am Neckar,⁴ 25
 stogie-brown beams; fools'-gold nuggets;
 octagonal red tiles,
 sweaty with a secret dank, crummy with ant-stale;
 a Rocky Mountain chaise longue, its legs, shellacked saplings. 30
 A pastel-pale Huckleberry Finn fished with a broom straw in a basin hollowed out of a millstone.
 Like my Grandfather, the décor was manly, comfortable, 35 overbearing, disproportioned.

What were those sunflowers? Pumpkins floating shoulder-high?
 It was sunset, Sadie and Nellie bearing pitchers of ice-tea,

1. Sound connected to the Pacific Ocean via the Strait of Juan de Fuca, in the Pacific Northwest. "Fontainebleau": rich pastoral suburb of Paris, site of one of the royal châteaux. "Mattapoisett": town in Plymouth County, Massachusetts, first settled in the 1750s.

2. A stage of Romanesque architecture developed in the French province of Normandy.

3. For storing bulbs, root vegetables, etc.

4. City in Germany, on the Neckar River. "Liberty Bell silver mine": located near Telluride, Colorado; it boomed in the 1890s.

oranges, lemons, mint, and peppermints, 40
 and the jug of shandygaff, which Grandpa made by blending half and half yeasty, wheezing homemade sarsaparilla with beer.
 The farm, entitled Char-de-sa
 in the Social Register, 45 was named for my Grandfather's children:
 Charlotte, Devereux, and Sarah.
 No one had died there in my lifetime . . .
 Only Cinder, our Scottie puppy paralyzed from gobbling toads. 50
 I sat mixing black earth and lime.

II

I was five and a half.
 My formal pearl gray shorts had been worn for three minutes.
 My perfection was the Olympian 55 poise of my models in the imperishable autumn display windows of Rogers Peet's boys' store below the State House in Boston. Distorting drops of water pinpricked my face in the basin's mirror. 60
 I was a stuffed toucan with a bibulous, multicolored beak.

III

Up in the air
 by the lakeview window in the billards-room, lurid in the doldrums of the sunset hour, 65
 my Great Aunt Sarah was learning Samson and Delilah.⁵
 She thundered on the keyboard of her dummy piano, with gauze curtains like a boudoir table,
 accordionlike yet soundless. 70
 It had been bought to spare the nerves of my Grandmother,
 tone-deaf, quick as a cricket,
 now needing a fourth for "Auction,"⁶ and casting a thirsty eye 75 on Aunt Sarah, risen like the phoenix from her bed of troublesome snacks and Tauchnitz classics.⁷

Forty years earlier,
 twenty, auburn headed,
 grasshopper notes of genius! 80
 Family gossip says Aunt Sarah

5. A piano version of the opera by Camille Saint-Saëns (1835–1921).

6. Auction bridge, a card game.

7. German paperback editions that included standard English and American works (in English).

tilted her archaic Athenian nose and jilted an Astor.⁸
 Each morning she practiced on the grand piano at Symphony Hall, 85 deathlike in the off-season summer—its naked Greek statues draped with purple like the saints in Holy Week. . . .
 On the recital day, she failed to appear.

IV

I picked with a clean finger nail at the blue anchor 90 on my sailor blouse washed white as a spinnaker.
 What in the world was I wishing?
 . . . A sail-colored horse browsing in the bullrushes . . .
 A fluff of the west wind puffing my blouse, kiting me over our seven chimneys, 95 troubling the waters. . . .
 As small as sapphires were the ponds: Quittacus, Snippituit, and Assawompses, halved by “the Island,” where my Uncle’s duck blind floated in a barrage of smoke-clouds. 100
 Double-barreled shotguns stuck out like bundles of baby crow-bars.
 A single sculler in a camouflaged kayak was quacking to the decoys. . . .

At the cabin between the waters, 105
 the nearest windows were already boarded.
 Uncle Devereux was closing camp for the winter.
 As if posed for “the engagement photograph,” he was wearing his severe war-uniform of a volunteer Canadian officer. 110 Daylight from the doorway riddled his student posters, tacked helter-skelter on walls as raw as a boardwalk.
 Mr. Punch,⁹ a water melon in hockey tights, was tossing off a decanter of Scotch.
La Belle France in a red, white and blue toga 115 was accepting the arm of her “protector,” the ingenu and porcine Edward VII.¹
 The pre-war music hall belles had goose necks, glorious signatures, beauty-moles, and coils of hair like rooster tails. 120
 The finest poster was two or three young men in khaki kilts being bushwhacked on the veldt²—
 They were almost life-size. . . .

8. A member of the wealthiest family in the United States during the 19th century.

9. A plump cartoon-figure emblem of the English humor magazine Punch, founded in 1841.

1. Edward VII (1841–1910), king of England, famous as a ladies’ man, is depicted with his arm around the female emblem of France in a poster celebrating the Entente Cordiale, a rapprochement between England and France.

2. Open country in South Africa. The Boer War (1899–1902) was fought by the English against the Boers, descendants of Dutch settlers there.

My Uncle was dying at twenty-nine.
 "You are behaving like children," 125
 said my Grandfather,
 when my Uncle and Aunt left their three baby daughters, and sailed for Europe on a last honeymoon . . .
 I cowered in terror.
 I wasn't a child at all— 130
 unseen and all-seeing, I was Agrippina³ in the Golden House of Nero. . . .
 Near me was the white measuring-door
 my Grandfather had penciled with my Uncle's heights.
 In 1911, he had stopped growing at just six feet. 135
 While I sat on the tiles,
 and dug at the anchor on my sailor blouse,
 Uncle Devereux stood behind me.
 He was as brushed as Bayard, our riding horse.
 His face was putty. 140
 His blue coat and white trousers grew sharper and straighter.
 His coat was a blue jay's tail,
 his trousers were solid cream from the top of the bottle.
 He was animated, hierarchical, 145 like a ginger snap man in a clothes-press.
 He was dying of the incurable Hodgkin's disease. . . .
 My hands were warm, then cool, on the piles of earth and lime,
 a black pile and a white pile. . . . 150
 Come winter,
 Uncle Devereux would blend to the one color.

1959

Home after Three Months Away¹

Gone now the baby's nurse, a lioness who ruled the roost
 and made the Mother cry.
 She used to tie
 gobbets of porkrind² in bowknots of gauze— 5 three months they hung like soggy toast on our eight foot magnolia tree, and helped the English sparrows weather a Boston winter.

3. Mother of the Roman emperor Nero. Involved in court intrigue and affairs of state, she poisoned her second husband and was later murdered by her son.

1. This poem was written following one of Lowell's hospitalizations at McLean Psychiatric Hospital in Belmont, Massachusetts.

2. Small chunks of fried or roasted skin of a pig.

Three months, three months! 10
 Is Richard now himself again?³
 Dimpled with exaltation,
 my daughter holds her levee in the tub.
 Our noses rub,
 each of us pats a stringy lock of hair— 15
 they tell me nothing's gone.
 Though I am forty-one,
 not forty now, the time I put away was child's-play. After thirteen weeks my child still dabs her cheeks 20 to start me shaving. When we dress her in her sky-blue corduroy,
 she changes to a boy,
 and floats my shaving brush and washcloth in the flush. . . . 25
 Dearest, I cannot loiter here in lather like a polar bear.

Recuperating, I neither spin nor toil.⁴
 Three stories down below,
 a choreman tends our coffin's length of soil, 30 and seven horizontal tulips blow.
 Just twelve months ago,
 these flowers were pedigreed imported Dutchmen; now no one need distinguish them from weed. 35
 Bushed by the late spring snow,
 they cannot meet
 another year's snowballing enervation.

I keep no rank nor station.
 Cured, I am frizzled, stale and small. 40

1958

Memories of West Street and Lepke¹

Only teaching on Tuesdays, book-worming in pajamas fresh from the washer each morning,
 I hog a whole house on Boston's "hardly passionate Marlborough Street,"²

3. Variation of "Richard's himself again," a line spoken by Richard III before the battle of Bosworth in a 1700 adaptation of Shakespeare's Richard III (1591?) by English actor-manager and playwright Colley Cibber (1671–1757).

4. Allusion to Matthew 6.28: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they neither toil nor spin."

1. In 1943 Lowell was sentenced to a year in New York City's West Street jail for his refusal to serve in the armed forces. Among the prisoners was Lepke Buchalter, head of the organized crime syndicate Murder Incorporated, who had been convicted of murder.

2. William James's phrase for a street in the elegant Back Bay section of Boston, where Lowell lived in the 1950s.

where even the man 5
 scavenging filth in the back alley trash cans, has two children, a beach wagon, a helpmate, and is a “young Republican.”
 I have a nine months’ daughter, young enough to be my granddaughter. 10
 Like the sun she rises in her flame-flamingo infants’ wear.

These are the tranquilized Fifties, and I am forty. Ought I to regret my seedtime?
 I was a fire-breathing Catholic C.O.,³ and made my manic statement, 15 telling off the state and president, and then sat waiting sentence in the bull pen beside a Negro boy with curlicues of marijuana in his hair.

Given a year. 20
 I walked on the roof of the West Street Jail, a short enclosure like my school soccer court, and saw the Hudson River once a day through sooty clothesline entanglements and bleaching khaki tenements. 25
 Strolling, I yammered metaphysics with Abramowitz, a jaundice-yellow (“it’s really tan”)
 and fly-weight pacifist,
 so vegetarian,
 he wore rope shoes and preferred fallen fruit. 30
 He tried to convert Bioff and Brown, the Hollywood pimps, to his diet.
 Hairy, muscular, suburban,
 wearing chocolate double-breasted suits,
 they blew their tops and beat him black and blue. 35

I was so out of things, I’d never heard of the Jehovah’s Witnesses.⁴
 “Are you a C.O.?” I asked a fellow jailbird.
 “No,” he answered, “I’m a J.W.”
 He taught me the “hospital tuck,”⁵ 40 and pointed out the T-shirted back of Murder Incorporated’s Czar Lepke, there piling towels on a rack, or dawdling off to his little segregated cell full of things forbidden the common man: 45 a portable radio, a dresser, two toy American flags tied together with a ribbon of Easter palm.
 Flabby, bald, lobotomized,
 he drifted in a sheepish calm,
 where no agonizing reappraisal 50

3. Conscientious objector (to war).

4. A Christian revivalist sect that strongly opposes war and denies the power of the state in matters of conscience.

5. The authorized, efficient way of making beds in a hospital.

jarred his concentration on the electric chair—hanging like an oasis in his air of lost connections. . . .

1959

Skunk Hour

for Elizabeth Bishop

Nautilus Island's¹ hermit heiress still lives through winter in her Spartan cottage;
 her sheep still graze above the sea.
 Her son's a bishop. Her farmer is first selectman in our village; 5
 she's in her dotage.

Thirsting for the hierarchic privacy of Queen Victoria's century, she buys up all 10
 the eyesores facing her shore,
 and lets them fall.

The season's ill—
 we've lost our summer millionaire, who seemed to leap from an L. L. Bean 15 catalogue.² His nine-knot yawl was auctioned off to lobstermen.
 A red fox stain covers Blue Hill.

And now our fairy decorator brightens his shop for fall; 20 his fishnet's filled with orange cork, orange, his cobbler's bench and awl;
 there is no money in his work,
 he'd rather marry.

One dark night, 25
 my Tudor Ford climbed the hill's skull;
 I watched for love-cars. Lights turned down, they lay together, hull to hull,
 where the graveyard shelves on the town. . . .
 My mind's not right. 30

A car radio bleats,
 "Love, O careless Love. . . ." I hear

1. The poem is set in Castine, Maine, where Lowell had a summer house.

2. From a mail-order house in Maine that primarily sells sporting goods and clothing to the wealthy and upper middle class.

my ill-spirit sob in each blood cell,
 as if my hand were at its throat. . . .
 I myself am hell;³ 35
 nobody's here—

only skunks, that search in the moonlight for a bite to eat.
 They march on their soles up Main Street:
 white stripes, moonstruck eyes' red fire 40 under the chalk-dry and spar spire of the Trinitarian Church.

I stand on top of our back steps and breathe the rich air—a mother skunk with her column of kittens swills the garbage pail. 45
 She jabs her wedge-head in a cup of sour cream, drops her ostrich tail, and will not scare.

1959

Night Sweat

Work-table, litter, books and standing lamp, plain things, my stalled equipment, the old broom—but I am living in a tidied room, for ten nights now I've felt the creeping damp float over my pajamas' wilted white . . . 5
 Sweet salt embalms me and my head is wet, everything streams and tells me this is right;
 my life's fever is soaking in night sweat—one life, one writing! But the downward glide and bias of existing wrings us dry— 10 always inside me is the child who died, always inside me is his will to die—
 one universe, one body . . . in this urn
 the animal night sweats of the spirit burn.
 Behind me! You! Again I feel the light 15 lighten my leaded eyelids, while the gray skulled horses whinny for the soot of night.
 I dabble in the dapple of the day,
 a heap of wet clothes, seamy, shivering,
 I see my flesh and bedding washed with light, 20
 my child exploding into dynamite, my wife . . . your lightness alters everything,
 and tears the black web from the spider's sack,
 as your heart hops and flutters like a hare.
 Poor turtle, tortoise, if I cannot clear 25

3. "Which way I fly is Hell, myself am Hell" (Satan in Milton's Paradise Lost 4.75).

the surface of these troubled waters here, absolve me, help me, Dear Heart, as you bear this world's dead weight and cycle on your back.

1964

For the Union Dead¹

"Relinquant Omnia Servare Rem Publicam."²

The old South Boston Aquarium stands in a Sahara of snow now. Its broken windows are boarded.
The bronze weathervane cod has lost half its scales.
The airy tanks are dry.

Once my nose crawled like a snail on the glass; 5
my hand tingled
to burst the bubbles
drifting from the noses of the cowed, compliant fish.

My hand draws back. I often sigh still 10 for the dark downward and vegetating kingdom of the fish and reptile. One morning last March,
I pressed against the new barbed and galvanized fence on the Boston Common. Behind their cage, yellow dinosaur steamshovels were grunting as they cropped up tons of mush and grass 15 to gouge their underworld garage.

Parking spaces luxuriate like civic sandpiles in the heart of Boston.
A girdle of orange, Puritan-pumpkin colored girders braces the tingling Statehouse, 20 shaking over the excavations, as it faces Colonel Shaw and his bell-cheeked Negro infantry on St. Gaudens' shaking Civil War relief, propped by a plank splint against the garage's earthquake.

Two months after marching through Boston, 25 half the regiment was dead;

1. First published as "Colonel Shaw and the Massachusetts' 54th" in a paperback edition of Life Studies (1960). It became the title poem of For the Union Dead (1964).

2. Robert Gould Shaw (1837–1863) led the first all-African American regiment in the Union army during the Civil War. He was killed in the attack against Fort Wagner, South Carolina. A bronze relief by the sculptor Augustus Saint-

Gaudens (1848–1897), dedicated in 1897, standing opposite the Massachusetts State House on Boston Common, commemorates the deaths. A Latin inscription on the monument reads Omnia Relinquit Servare Rem Publicam ("He leaves all behind to save the Republic"). Lowell's epigraph alters the inscription slightly, changing the third-person singular (he) to the third-person plural: "They give up everything to save the Republic."

at the dedication
William James³ could almost hear the bronze Negroes breathe.

Their monument sticks like a fishbone in the city's throat. 30
Its Colonel is as lean as a compass-needle.

He has an angry wrenlike vigilance,
a greyhound's gentle tautness;
he seems to wince at pleasure, 35
and suffocate for privacy.

He is out of bounds now. He rejoices in man's lovely, peculiar power to choose life and die—when he leads his black soldiers to death, he cannot bend his back. 40

On a thousand small town New England greens, the old white churches hold their air of sparse, sincere rebellion; frayed flags quilt the graveyards of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The stone statues of the abstract Union Soldier 45 grow slimmer and younger each year—wasp-waisted, they doze over muskets and muse through their sideburns . . .

Shaw's father wanted no monument except the ditch, 50 where his son's body was thrown⁴ and lost with his "niggers."

The ditch is nearer.
There are no statues for the last war⁵ here;
on Boylston Street,⁶ a commercial photograph 55 shows Hiroshima boiling⁷

over a Mosler Safe, the "Rock of Ages"⁸ that survived the blast. Space is nearer.
When I crouch to my television set, the drained faces of Negro school-children rise like balloons.⁹ 60

Colonel Shaw
is riding on his bubble, he waits
for the blessed break.

3. Philosopher and psychologist (1842–1910) who taught at Harvard.

4. By the Confederate soldiers at Fort Wagner.

5. World War II.

6. In Boston, where the poem is set.

7. On August 6, 1945, the United States dropped an atomic bomb on this Japanese city.

8. Biblical reference to an indestructible and supernatural rock, the foundation of an everlasting kingdom. Used as an advertising slogan by Mosler Safes.

9. Probably news photographs connected with contemporary civil rights demonstrations to secure desegregation of schools in the South.

The Aquarium is gone. Everywhere, giant finned cars nose forward like fish;
a savage servility
slides by on grease.

65

1960, 1964

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

1917–2000

“If there was ever a born poet,” the writer Alice Walker once said in an interview, “I think it is Brooks.” A passionate sense of language and an often daring use of formal structures are hallmarks of Gwendolyn Brooks’s poetry. She used these gifts in a career characterized by dramatic evolution, a career that linked two very different generations of African American poets. “Until 1967,” Brooks said, “my own Blackness did not confront me with a shrill spelling of itself.” She then grouped herself with militant black writers and defined her work as belonging primarily to the African American community. In her earlier work, however, Brooks followed the example of the older writers of the Harlem Renaissance, Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen among them, who honored the ideal of an integrated society. In that period her work received support largely from white audiences. But Brooks’s changing sense of her commitments should not obscure her persistent, underlying concerns. She never lacked political awareness, and in remarkably versatile poems, both early and late, she wrote about black experience and black rage, with a particular awareness of the complex lives of black women.

Brooks was born in Topeka, Kansas; she grew up in Chicago and is closely identified with the energies and problems of its black community. She went to Chicago’s Englewood High School and graduated from Wilson Junior College. Brooks remembered writing poetry from the time she was seven and keeping poetry notebooks from the time she was eleven. She got her education in the moderns—poets such as Pound and Eliot—under the guidance of a rich Chicago socialite, Inez Cunningham Stark, who was a reader for Poetry magazine and taught a poetry class at the Southside Community Art Center. Her first book, A Street in Bronzeville (1945), took its title from the name journalists gave to Chicago’s black ghetto. Her poems portrayed the waste and loss that are the inevitable result of what Langston Hughes called the “dream deferred.” With her second book of poems, Annie Allen (1949), Brooks became the first African American to receive the Pulitzer Prize for poetry.

In Annie Allen and in her Bronzeville poems (Bronzeville Boys and Girls, 1956, continued the work begun in A Street in Bronzeville), Brooks concentrated on portraits of what Hughes called “the ordinary aspects of black life,” stressing the vitality and the often subversive morality of ghetto figures. She portrayed the good girls who want to be bad; the bored children of hardworking, pious mothers; the laments of women, some of them mothers, abandoned by their men. Brooks’s diction was a combination of street talk, the florid biblical speech of black Protestant preachers, and the traditional vocabulary of English and American verse. She wrote vigorous, strongly accented, and strongly rhymed lines with a great deal of alliteration.

She also cultivated traditional lyric forms; for example, she was one of the few modern poets to write extensively in the sonnet form.

A great change in Brooks's life came at Fisk University in 1967 with the Second Black Writers' Conference, in whose charged activist atmosphere she encountered many of the new young black poets. After this, Brooks tested the possibility of writing poetry exclusively for black audiences. She drew closer to militant political groups as a result of conducting poetry workshops for some members of the Blackstone Rangers, a teenage gang in Chicago. In autobiographical writings such as her prose Report from Part One (1972), Brooks became more self-conscious about her own potential role as a leader of black feminists. She left her New York publisher to have her work printed by African American publishers, especially the Broadside Press. Brooks's poetry, too, changed, in both its focus and its technique. Her subjects tended to be more explicitly political and to deal with questions of revolutionary violence and issues of African American identity. Stylistically, her work evolved out of the concentrated imagery and narratives of her earlier writing, with its often formal diction, and moved toward an increased use of the energetic, improvisatory rhythms of jazz, the combinations of African chants, and an emphatically spoken language. The resulting poetry constantly revises itself and its sense of the world, open to change but evoking history. "How does one convey the influence Gwendolyn Brooks has had on generations—not only writers but people from all walks of life?" the poet Rita Dove has remarked, remembering how, as a young woman, she was "struck by these poems . . . that weren't afraid to take language and swamp it, twist it, and engage it so that it shimmered and dashed and lingered."

FROM A STREET IN BRONZEVILLE to David and Keziah Brooks

kitchenette building

We are things of dry hours and the involuntary plan,
 Grayed in, and gray. "Dream" makes a giddy sound, not strong
 Like "rent," "feeding a wife," "satisfying a man."

But could a dream send up through onion fumes
 Its white and violet, fight with fried potatoes 5
 And yesterday's garbage ripening in the hall,
 Flutter, or sing an aria down these rooms

Even if we were willing to let it in,
 Had time to warm it, keep it very clean,
 Anticipate a message, let it begin? 10

We wonder. But not well! not for a minute!
 Since Number Five is out of the bathroom now,
 We think of lukewarm water, hope to get in it.

the mother

Abortions will not let you forget.
 You remember the children you got that you did not get,
 The damp small pulps with a little or with no hair,
 The singers and workers that never handled the air.
 You will never neglect or beat 5
 Them, or silence or buy with a sweet.
 You will never wind up the sucking-thumb
 Or scuttle off ghosts that come.
 You will never leave them, controlling your luscious sigh,
 Return for a snack of them, with gobbling mother-eye. 10

I have heard in the voices of the wind the voices of my dim killed children.
 I have contracted. I have eased
 My dim dears at the breasts they could never suck.
 I have said, Sweets, if I sinned, if I seized
 Your luck 15
 And your lives from your unfinished reach,
 If I stole your births and your names,
 Your straight baby tears and your games,
 Your stilted or lovely loves, your tumults, your marriages, aches,
 and your deaths,
 If I poisoned the beginnings of your breaths, 20
 Believe that even in my deliberateness I was not deliberate.
 Though why should I whine,
 Whine that the crime was other than mine?—
 Since anyhow you are dead.
 Or rather, or instead, 25
 You were never made.

But that too, I am afraid,
 Is faulty: oh, what shall I say, how is the truth to be said?
 You were born, you had body, you died.
 It is just that you never giggled or planned or cried. 30

Believe me, I loved you all.
 Believe me, I knew you, though faintly, and I loved, I loved you All.

1945

a song in the front yard

I've stayed in the front yard all my life.
 I want a peek at the back
 Where it's rough and untended and hungry weed grows.
 A girl gets sick of a rose.

I want to go in the back yard now 5
 And maybe down the alley,

To where the charity children play.
I want a good time today.

They do some wonderful things.
They have some wonderful fun. 10
My mother sneers, but I say it's fine
How they don't have to go in at quarter to nine.
My mother, she tells me that Johnnie Mae
Will grow up to be a bad woman.
That George'll be taken to Jail soon or late 15
(On account of last winter he sold our back gate.)

But I say it's fine. Honest, I do.
And I'd like to be a bad woman, too,
And wear the brave stockings of night-black lace
And strut down the streets with paint on my face. 20

1945

the white troops had their orders but the Negroes looked like men

They had supposed their formula was fixed.
They had obeyed instructions to devise
A type of cold, a type of hooded gaze.
But when the Negroes came they were perplexed.
These Negroes looked like men. Besides, it taxed 5
Time and the temper to remember those Congenital iniquities that cause
Disfavor of the darkness. Such as boxed
Their feelings properly, complete to tags—
A box for dark men and a box for Other— 10
Would often find the contents had been scrambled.
Or even switched. Who really gave two figs?
Neither the earth nor heaven ever trembled.
And there was nothing startling in the weather.

1945

From The Womanhood

The Children of the Poor

II

What shall I give my children? who are poor,
Who are adjudged the leastwise of the land,
Who are my sweetest lepers, who demand

No velvet and no velvety velour;
 But who have begged me for a brisk contour, 5
 Crying that they are quasi, contraband
 Because unfinished, graven by a hand
 Less than angelic, admirable or sure.
 My hand is stuffed with mode, design, device.
 But I lack access to my proper stone. 10
 And plenitude of plan shall not suffice
 Nor grief nor love shall be enough alone
 To ratify my little halves who bear
 Across an autumn freezing everywhere.

1949

We Real Cool

THE POOL PLAYERS.
 SEVEN AT THE GOLDEN SHOVEL.

We real cool. We Left school. We

Lurk late. We Strike straight. We

Sing sin. We 5
 Thin gin. We

Jazz June. We Die soon.

1960

The Bean Eaters

They eat beans mostly, this old yellow pair.
 Dinner is a casual affair.
 Plain chipware on a plain and creaking wood,
 Tin flatware.

Two who are Mostly Good. 5
 Two who have lived their day,
 But keep on putting on their clothes
 And putting things away.

And remembering . . .
 Remembering, with twinklings and twinges, 10
 As they lean over the beans in their rented back room that is full of beads and receipts and dolls and cloths, tobacco crumbs, vases and fringes.

1960

A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon

From the first it had been like a Ballad. It had the beat inevitable. It had the blood.
A wildness cut up, and tied in little bunches,
Like the four-line stanzas of the ballads she had never quite Understood—the ballads they had set her to, in school. 5

Herself: the milk-white maid, the “maid mild”
Of the ballad. Pursued
By the Dark Villain. Rescued by the Fine Prince.
The Happiness-Ever-After.
That was worth anything. 10
It was good to be a “maid mild.”
That made the breath go fast.

Her bacon burned. She Hastened to hide it in the step-on can, and Drew more strips from the meat case. The eggs and sour-milk biscuits 15
Did well. She set out a jar
Of her new quince preserve.

. . . But there was a something about the matter of the Dark Villain.
He should have been older, perhaps.
The hacking down of a villain was more fun to think about 20
When his menace possessed undisputed breadth, undisputed height,
And a harsh kind of vice.
And best of all, when his history was cluttered
With the bones of many eaten knights and princesses.

The fun was disturbed, then all but nullified 25
When the Dark Villain was a blackish child
Of fourteen, with eyes still too young to be dirty,
And a mouth too young to have lost every reminder
Of its infant softness.

That boy must have been surprised! For 30
These were grown-ups. Grown-ups were supposed to be wise.
And the Fine Prince—and that other—so tall, so broad, so Grown! Perhaps the boy had never guessed That the trouble with grown-ups was that under the magnificent shell of adulthood, just under,
Waited the baby full of tantrums. 35

It occurred to her that there may have been something Ridiculous in the picture of the Fine Prince Rushing (rich with the breadth and height and Mature solidness whose lack, in the Dark Villain, was impressing her,
Confronting her more and more as this first day after the trial 40
And acquittal wore on) rushing

With his heavy companion to hack down (unhorsed)
 That little foe.
 So much had happened, she could not remember now what that foe had done
 Against her, or if anything had been done. 45
 The one thing in the world that she did know and knew
 With terrifying clarity was that her composition
 Had disintegrated. That, although the pattern prevailed,
 The breaks were everywhere. That she could think
 Of no thread capable of the necessary 50
 Sew-work.

She made the babies sit in their places at the table.
 Then, before calling Him, she hurried
 To the mirror with her comb and lipstick. It was necessary
 To be more beautiful than ever. 55
 The beautiful wife.
 For sometimes she fancied he looked at her as though Measuring her. As if he considered, Had she been worth It?

Had she been worth the blood, the cramped cries, the little stuttering bravado,
 The gradual dulling of those Negro eyes, 60
 The sudden, overwhelming little-boyiness in that barn?
 Whatever she might feel or half-feel, the lipstick necessity was something apart. He must never conclude
 That she had not been worth It.

He sat down, the Fine Prince, and Began buttering a biscuit. He looked at his hands. 65
 He twisted in his chair, he scratched his nose.
 He glanced again, almost secretly, at his hands.
 More papers were in from the North, he mumbled. More meddling headlines.
 With their pepper-words, “bestiality,” and “barbarism,” and “Shocking.” 70
 The half-sneers he had mastered for the trial worked across
 His sweet and pretty face.

What he'd like to do, he explained, was kill them all.
 The time lost. The unwanted fame.
 Still, it had been fun to show those intruders 75
 A thing or two. To show that snappy-eyed mother,
 That sassy, Northern, brown-black——

Nothing could stop Mississippi.
 He knew that. Big Fella
 Knew that. 80
 And, what was so good, Mississippi knew that.
 Nothing and nothing could stop Mississippi.
 They could send in their petitions, and scar
 Their newspapers with bleeding headlines. Their governors
 Could appeal to Washington. . . . 85

“What I want,” the older baby said, “is ’lasses on my jam.”
 Whereupon the younger baby
 Picked up the molasses pitcher and threw
 The molasses in his brother’s face. Instantly
 The Fine Prince leaned across the table and slapped 90
 The small and smiling criminal.

She did not speak. When the Hand
 Came down and away, and she could look at her child,
 At her baby-child,
 She could think only of blood. 95
 Surely her baby’s cheek
 Had disappeared, and in its place, surely,
 Hung a heaviness, a lengthening red, a red that had no end.
 She shook her head. It was not true, of course.
 It was not true at all. The 100
 Child’s face was as always, the Color of the paste in her paste-jar.

She left the table, to the tune of the children’s lamentations, which were shriller
 Than ever. She Looked out of a window. She said not a word. That 105
 Was one of the new Somethings—
 The fear,
 Tying her as with iron.

Suddenly she felt his hands upon her. He had followed her
 To the window. The children were whimpering now. 110
 Such bits of tots. And she, their mother,
 Could not protect them. She looked at her shoulders, still Gripped in the claim of his hands. She tried, but could not resist the idea
 That a red ooze was seeping, spreading darkly, thickly, slowly,
 Over her white shoulders, her own shoulders, 115
 And over all of Earth and Mars.

He whispered something to her, did the Fine Prince, something About love, something about love and night and intention.

She heard no hoof-beat of the horse and saw no flash of the shining steel.
 He pulled her face around to meet 120
 His, and there it was, close close,
 For the first time in all those days and nights,
 His mouth, wet and red,
 So very, very, very red,
 Closed over hers. 125

Then a sickness heaved within her. The courtroom Coca-Cola,
 The courtroom beer and hate and sweat and drone,
 Pushed like a wall against her. She wanted to bear it.
 But his mouth would not go away and neither would the Decapitated exclamation points in that Other Woman’s eyes. 130

She did not scream.
 She stood there.
 But a hatred for him burst into glorious flower,
 And its perfume enclasped them—big,
 Bigger than all magnolias. 135

The last bleak news of the ballad.
 The rest of the rugged music.
 The last quatrain. 1960

The Last Quatrain of the Ballad of Emmett Till¹

after the murder,
 after the burial

Emmett's mother is a pretty-faced thing;
 the tint of pulled taffy.
 She sits in a red room, 5 drinking black coffee.
 She kisses her killed boy.
 And she is sorry.
 Chaos in windy grays
 through a red prairie. 10
 1960

The Blackstone Rangers¹

I. As Seen by Disciplines²

There they are.
 Thirty at the corner.
 Black, raw, ready.
 Sores in the city
 that do not want to heal. 5

II. The Leaders

Jeff. Gene. Geronimo. And Bop.
 They cancel, cure and curry.
 Hardly the dupes of the downtown thing
 the cold bonbon,
 the rhinestone thing. And hardly 10
 in a hurry.

1. A fourteen-year-old African American boy lynched in Mississippi in 1955 for allegedly "leering" at a white woman.

1. A tough Chicago street gang, Blackstone Street is the eastern boundary of Chicago's black ghetto.
 2. I.e., law enforcers.

Hardly Belafonte, King,
 Black Jesus, Stokely, Malcolm X or Rap.³
 Bungled trophies.
 Their country is a Nation on no map. 15

Jeff, Gene, Geronimo and Bop
 in the passionate noon,
 in bewitching night
 are the detailed men, the copious men.
 They curry, cure, 20
 they cancel, cancelled images whose Concerts are not divine, vivacious; the different tins are intense last entries; pagan argument;
 translations of the night.

The Blackstone bitter bureaus 25 (bureaucracy is footloose) edit, fuse unfashionable damnations and descent;
 and exulting, monstrous hand on monstrous hand,
 construct, strangely, a monstrous pearl or grace.

III. Gang Girls

A RANGERETTE

Gang Girls are sweet exotics. 30
 Mary Ann
 uses the nutrients of her orient, but sometimes sighs for Cities of blue and jewel beyond her Ranger rim of Cottage Grove.⁴
 (Bowery Boys, Disciples, Whip-Birds will 35 dissolve no margins, stop no savory sanctities.)

Mary is a rose in a whiskey glass.

Mary's
 Februaries shudder and are gone. Aprils 40 fret frankly, lilac hurries on.
 Summer is a hard irregular ridge.
 October looks away.
 And that's the Year!

3. "Belafonte": Harold George Belafonte (b. 1927), Jamaican American musician, actor, and social activist, who popularized the Caribbean musical style and has advocated for civil rights and humanitarian causes throughout his career. "King": Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968), Baptist pastor, one of the most prominent civil rights activists of the 1950s and 1960s. He followed a philosophy of nonviolence and led non-violent demonstrations against segregation and injustice. He was also a gifted and eloquent orator on the subject of civil rights. "Black Jesus": one representation of Jesus, generally accepted by the black Christian community in Africa. "Stokely":

Stokely Carmichael (1941–1998), Trinidadian American black activist, leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Black Panthers. He urged African Americans to form and lead their own organizations and to reject the values and cultural mores of American society. "Malcolm X": born Malcolm Little (1925–1965), also known as Malik El-Shabazz, a Black Muslim minister, a national spokesman for the Nation of Islam, and one of the most prominent black nationalist leaders in the United States. He advocated black pride, economic self-reliance, and identity politics.

4. Street of overcrowded tenements in the ghetto.

Save for her bugle-love. 45
 Save for the bleat of not-obese devotion.
 Save for Somebody Terribly Dying, under the philanthropy of robins. Save for her Ranger bringing an amount of rainbow in a string-drawn bag. 50 “Where did you get the diamond?” Do not ask:
 but swallow, straight, the spirals of his flask and assist him at your zipper; pet his lips and help him clutch you.

Love’s another departure. 55
 Will there be any arrivals, confirmations?
 Will there be gleaning?

Mary, the Shakedancer’s child from the rooming-flat, pants carefully, peers at her laboring lover. . . . 60
 Mary! Mary Ann!
 Settle for sandwiches! settle for stocking caps!
 for sudden blood, aborted carnival, the props and niceties of non-loneliness—
 the rhymes of Leaning. 65

1968

To the Diaspora¹

you did not know you were Afrika

When you set out for Afrika you did not know you were going.
 Because
 you did not know you were Afrika.
 You did not know the Black continent 5 that had to be reached was you.

I could not have told you then that some sun would come,
 somewhere over the road, 10 would come evoking the diamonds of you, the Black continent—
 somewhere over the road.
 You would not have believed my mouth.

When I told you, meeting you somewhere close 15 to the heat and youth of the road, liking my loyalty, liking belief,
 you smiled and you thanked me but very little believed me.

1. People settled far from their ancestral homelands.

Here is some sun. Some.
 Now off into the places rough to reach. 20
 Though dry, though drowsy, all unwillingly a-wobble, into the dissonant and dangerous crescendo.
 Your work, that was done, to be done to be done to be done.

1981

PATRICIA HIGHSMITH

1921–1995

Patricia Highsmith's career is connected to the most popular entertainments of the late twentieth century. Born in 1921 in Fort Worth, Texas, Highsmith worked in a comic book studio during World War II, writing heroic, jingoistic comic books with titles like "The Destroyer" and "The Fighting Yank." The influences of comics, crime and detective fiction, science fiction, horror, and Hollywood film are all palpable in her work, even as she consistently invoked such canonical European writers as Fyodor Dostoyevsky and André Gide when discussing her primary influences. The premise of one of her most famous novels, The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955), was inspired by Henry James's great novel The Ambassadors (1903), which features a naïve American man sent to retrieve the scion of a wealthy American family who has fallen prey to the seductions of Europe. Highsmith won prizes for detective and crime fiction throughout her life, in both Europe and America, but more traditional literary honors were elusive.

Highsmith's blend of the popular and the highbrow, of the visceral and the intellectual, distinguishes her work and has startled readers for over half a century. She died in 1995, just days before the publication of her thirtieth work of fiction. She had also written, in 1966, a handbook for writing suspense stories, and two additional story collections were published in the years following her death. Because Highsmith deftly combined the suspense plots of genre fiction with knotty philosophical questions and unforgettable characters, her work found a natural outlet in the movies. Her first novel, Strangers on a Train (1950), was adapted by Alfred Hitchcock in 1951. Later film adaptations of The Talented Mr. Ripley (in France in 1960 and in the United States in 1999) and The Price of Salt (1952; adapted as Carol in 2015) have helped to keep Highsmith's fiction steadily in front of audiences.

Highsmith's most famous work—the five-novel Ripley series that began with The Talented Mr. Ripley and ended with Ripley Under Water (1991)—dared readers to sympathize with Tom Ripley, murderer of his rich friend, Dickie Greenleaf. Tom impersonates Greenleaf for a time after the murder, eventually taking over Dickie's clothes, possessions, relationships, and trust fund. Inheriting Dickie's money, Tom reverts to his own identity and goes on to lead a life of wealth and intrigue in subsequent novels. Readers found themselves rooting for Tom to succeed as Highsmith skillfully drew on class resentments, the dynamics of homophobia and homoerotic attraction, and the American tradition of the self-made man to craft her unlikely hero. As recent criticism points out, readers could understand Ripley as deviating from a 1950s repressive society, but in his materialism and upper-class strivings, they could also think of him as a model American citizen. Highsmith so identified with Tom Ripley that she would sign letters “Pat H, alias Ripley,” and said that she often had the feeling that Ripley was writing the novels and she was “merely typing” them.

Murder and eroticism were linked in Highsmith’s mind: “Murder is a kind of making love, a kind of possessing,” she wrote in her journal, reflecting upon a woman she became attracted to while working at Bloomingdale’s. That attraction inspired Highsmith’s other major literary accomplishment: the novel The Price of Salt, published under the pseudonym Claire Morgan. The novel is widely regarded as the first lesbian love story with a happy ending. In it, the young protagonist, Therese, a set designer, meets Carol, a beautiful and married older woman. The experienced Carol seduces Therese, Therese subsequently leaves her fiancé, and the two women set out on a road trip, followed by a private detective hired by Carol’s husband. Carol faces the agonizing choice of abandoning Therese or giving up her child in divorce proceedings. Carol eventually chooses Therese, and they live happily together in an apartment in New York City.

In her short fiction, Highsmith explored human relationships with animals, a theme that drives “The Quest for Blank Claveringi,” the story reprinted here, in which an aging scientist seeks to crown his life’s work by documenting and then naming after himself a species of giant snails. The story is typical Highsmith in that she was particularly attracted to animals that were not usual human companions. In the 1960s, she kept a collection of over 300 beloved snails, pets she would bring out at dinner parties to slither around the table. In many stories, especially those contained in The Animal-Lover’s Book of Beastly Murder (1975), she imagined animals of all kinds taking violent revenge on human beings for acts of abuse. Highsmith’s ability—and willingness—to enter into the minds of creatures operating far from human social norms (whether those creatures were mammal, reptile, human, or otherwise) makes her fiction both daring and strange, reminding us of the work of writers such as Franz Kafka, who famously imagined a man transformed into a dung beetle, or the playwright Eugene Ionesco, who in 1959 staged a play in which the inhabitants of a French town turn into rhinoceroses.

Highsmith moved to Europe permanently in 1963 to be near women who were romantically important to her; her work has been much appreciated there. Late in her life, her fiction reflected the topics of her times—including the Israeli-Arab conflict, fundamentalist Christianity, and the AIDS crisis. She became increasingly and publicly anti-Semitic as she aged, losing some of her public admiration as a consequence. Today her reputation stands on the unique qualities and literary strength of her first two decades as a writer. Her fiction brings news of humanity’s darkest, strangest, and most fundamental elements.

The Quest for Blank Claveringi

Avery Clavering, a professor of zoology at a California university, heard of the giant snails of Kuwa in a footnote of a book on molluscs. His sabbatical had been coming up in three months when he read the few lines:

It is said by Matusas Islands natives that snails even larger than this exist on the uninhabited island of Kuwa, twenty-five miles distant from the Matusas. The Matusans claim that these snails have a shell diameter of twenty feet and that they are man-eating. Dr. Wm. J. Stead, now living in the Matusas, visited Kuwa in 1949 without finding any snails at all, but the legend persists.

The item aroused Professor Clavering's interest, because he very much wanted to discover some animal, bird, reptile or even mollusc to which he could give his name. Something-or-other Claveringi.¹ The professor was forty-eight. His time, perhaps, was not growing short, but he had achieved no particular renown. The discovery of a new species would win him immortality in his field.

The Matusas, the professor saw on a map, were three small islands arranged like the points of an isosceles triangle not far from Hawaii. He wrote a letter to Dr. Stead and received the following reply, written on an abominable typewriter, so many words pale, he could scarcely read it:

April 8th, 19—

Dear Professor Clavering:

I have long heard of the giant snails of Kuwa, but before you make a trip of such length, I must tell you that the natives here assure me a group of them went about twenty years ago to Kuwa to exterminate these so-called man-eating snails which they imagined could swim the ocean between Kuwa and the Matusas and do some damage to the latter islands. They claim to have killed off the whole community of them except for one old fellow they could not kill. This is typical of native stories—there's always one that got away. I haven't much doubt the snails were no bigger than three feet across and that they were not * * * * (here a word was illegible, due both to the pale ribbon and a squashed insect). You say you read of my effort in 1949 to find the giant snails. What the footnote did not say is that I have made several trips since to find them. I retired to the Matusas, in fact, for that purpose. I now believe the snails to be mere folklore, a figment of the natives' imagination. If I were you, I would not waste time or money on an expedition.

Yours sincerely,
Wm. J. Stead, M.D.

Professor Clavering had the money and the time. He detected a sourness in Dr. Stead's letter. Maybe Dr. Stead had just had bad luck. By post, Professor Clavering hired a thirty-foot sailboat with an auxiliary motor from Hawaii. He wanted to make the trip alone from the Matusas. Blank Claveringi. Regardless of the size, the snail was apt to be different from any known snail, because of its isolation—if it existed. He planned to go one month ahead of his wife and to join her and their twenty-year-old daughter Wanda in Hawaii for a more orthodox holiday after he had visited Kuwa. A month would give him plenty of time to find the snail, even if there were only one, to take photographs, and make notes.

It was late June when Professor Clavering, equipped with water tanks, tinned beef, soup and milk, biscuits, writing materials, camera, knife,

1. In scientific naming (called "binomial nomenclature"), each species of animal is given two Latin names, designating first the genus, or group, to which an animal belongs, and, second, the animal's particular species. Species may be named after the person who first records the animal's existence in modern scientific classification. In this case, the person's name is given a Latin ending. Prof. Clavering does not know the genus to which a giant snail may belong ("Something-or-other"), but he plans to name the species after himself, "Claveringi."

hatchet, and a Winchester .22² which he hardly knew how to use, set forth from one of the Matusas bound for Kuwa. Dr. Stead, who had been his host for a few days, saw him off. Dr. Stead was seventy-five, he said, but he looked older, due perhaps to the ravages of drink and the apparently aimless life he led now. He had not looked for the giant snail in two years, he said.

"I've given the last third of my life to looking for this snail, you might say," Dr. Stead added. "But that's man's fate, I suppose, the pursuit of the non-existent. Well—good luck to you, Professor Clavering!" He waved his old American straw hat as the Samantha left the dock under motor power.

Professor Clavering had made out to Stead that if he did find snails, he would come back at once, get some natives to accompany him, and return to Kuwa with materials to make crates for the snails. Stead had expressed doubt whether he could persuade any natives to accompany him, if the snail or snails were really large. But then, Dr. Stead had been negative about everything pertaining to Professor Clavering's quest. Professor Clavering was glad to get away from him.

After about an hour, Professor Clavering cut the motor and tentatively hoisted some sail. The wind was favorable, but he knew little about sails, and he paid close attention to his compass. At last, Kuwa came into view, a tan hump on a sea of blue. He was quite close before he saw any greenery, and this was only the tops of some trees. Already, he was looking for anything resembling a giant snail, and regretting he had not brought binoculars, but the island was only three miles long and one mile broad. He decided to aim for a small beach. He dropped anchor, two of them, in water so clear he could see the sand under it. He stood for a few minutes on the deck.

The only life he saw was a few birds in the tops of trees, brightly colored, crested birds, making cries he had never heard before. There was no low-lying vegetation whatsoever, none of the grass and reeds that might have been expected on an island such as this—much like the Matusas in soil color—and this augured well of the presence of snails that might have devoured everything green within their reach. It was only a quarter to two. Professor Clavering ate part of a papaya, two boiled eggs, and brewed coffee on his alcohol burner, as he had had nothing to eat since 6 a.m. Then with his hunting knife and hatchet in the belt of his khaki shorts, and his camera around his neck, he lowered himself into the water. The Samantha carried no rowboat.

He sank up to his neck, but he could walk on the bottom. He held the camera high. He emerged panting, as he was some twenty pounds overweight. Professor Clavering was to regret every one of those pounds before the day was over, but as he got his breath and looked around him, and felt himself drying off in the warm sunlight, he was happy. He wiped his hatchet and knife with dry sand, then walked inland, alert for the rounded form of a snail's shell, moving or stationary, anywhere. But as snails were more or less nocturnal, he thought any snails might well be sleeping in some cave or crevice with no idea of emerging until nightfall.

He decided to cross the island first, then follow the coast to right or left and circle the island. He had not gone a quarter of a mile, when his heart gave a leap. Ten yards before him, he saw three bent saplings with their top leaves chewed off. The young trees were four inches in diameter at their bases. It would have taken a considerable weight to bend them down, something like a hundred pounds. The professor looked on the trees and the ground for the glaze left by snails, but found none. But rain could have washed it away. A snail whose shell was three feet in diameter would not weigh enough to bend such a tree, so Professor Clavering now hoped for something bigger. He pushed on.

2. A small-bore rifle used largely for target shooting and small game.

He arrived at the other side of the island. The sea had eaten a notch into the shore, forming a mostly dry gully of a hundred yards' length and a depth of thirty feet. The land here was sandy but moist, and there was, he saw, a little vegetation in the form of patchy grass. But here, the lower branches of all the trees had been divested of their leaves, and so long ago that the branches had dried and fallen off. All this bespoke the presence of land snails. Professor Clavering stooped and looked down into the gully. He saw, just over the edge of his side of the crevice, the pink-tan curve of something that was neither rock nor sand. If it was a snail, it was monstrous. Involuntarily, he took a step backward, scattering pebbles down the gully.

The professor ran round the gully to have a better look. It was a snail, and its shell was about fifteen feet high. He had a view of its left side, the side without the spiral. It resembled a peach-colored sail filled with wind, and the sunlight made nacreous,³ silvery patches gleam and twinkle as the great thing stirred. The little rain of pebbles had aroused it, the professor realized. If the shell was fifteen or eighteen feet in diameter, he reckoned that the snail's body or foot would be something like six yards long when extended. Rooted to the spot, the professor stood, thrilled as much by the (as yet) empty phrase Blank Claveringi which throbbed in his head as by the fact he was looking upon something no man had seen before, or at least no scientist. The crate would have to be bigger than he had thought, but the Samantha would be capable of taking it on her forward deck.

The snail was backing to pull its head from the narrow part of the gully. The moist body, the color of tea with milk, came into view with the slowness of an enormous snake awakening from slumber. All was silent, except for pebbles dropping from the snail's underside as it lifted its head, except for the professor's constrained breathing. The snail's head, facing inland, rose higher and higher, and its antennae, with which it saw, began to extend. Professor Clavering realized he had disturbed it from its diurnal sleep, and a brief terror caused him to retreat again, sending more pebbles down the slope.

The snail heard this, and slowly turned its enormous head toward him.

The professor felt paralyzed. A gigantic face regarded him, a face with drooping, scalloped cheeks or lips, with antennae six feet long now, the eyes on the ends of them scrutinizing him at his own level and scarcely ten feet away, with the disdain of a Herculean lorgnette,⁴ with the unknown potency of a pair of oversized telescopes. The snail reared so high, it had to arch its

3. Resembling the iridescent coating from which pearls are formed and that lines the inside of shells.

4. Of the size of the Greek hero, Hercules, renowned for his strength. A lorgnette is a pair of glasses or opera glasses held in front of the eyes by a long side handle.

antennae to keep him in view. Six yards long? It would be more like eight or ten yards. The snail turned itself to move toward him.

Still, the professor did not budge. He knew about snails' teeth, the twenty-odd thousand pairs of them even in a small garden snail, set in comblike structures, the upper front teeth visible, moving up and down constantly just under transparent flesh. A snail of this size, with proportionate teeth, could chew through a tree as quickly as a woodsman's axe, the professor thought. The snail was advancing up the bank with monumental confidence. He had to stand still for a few seconds simply to admire it. His snail! The professor opened his camera and took a picture, just as the snail was hauling its shell over the edge of the quarry.

"You are magnificent!" Professor Clavering said in a soft and awestruck voice. Then he took a few steps backward.

It was pleasant to think he could skip nimbly about, comparatively speaking, observing the snail from all angles, while the snail could only creep toward him at what seemed the rate of one yard in ten seconds. The professor thought to watch the snail for an hour or so, then go back to the Samantha and write some notes. He would sleep aboard the boat, take some more photographs tomorrow morning, then start under engine power back to the Matusas. He trotted for twenty yards, then turned to watch the snail approach.

The snail travelled with its head lifted three feet above the ground, keeping the professor in the focus of its eyes. It was moving faster. Professor Clavering retreated sooner than he intended, and before he could get another picture.

Now Professor Clavering looked around for a mate of the snail. He was rather glad not to see another snail, but he cautioned himself not to rule out the possibility of a mate. It wouldn't be pleasant to be cornered by two snails, yet the idea excited him. Impossible to think of a situation in which he could not escape from two slow, lumbering creatures like the—the what? Amygdalus Persica (his mind stuck on peaches, because of the beautiful color of the shell) *Carnivora*⁵ (perhaps) Claveringi. That could be improved upon, the professor thought as he walked backward, watching.

A little grove of trees gave him an idea. If he stood in the grove, the snail could not reach him, and he would also have a close view. The professor took a stand amid twelve or fifteen trees, all about twenty feet high. The snail did not slacken its speed, but began to circle the grove, still watching the professor. Finding no opening big enough between two trees, the snail raised its head higher, fifteen feet high, and began to creep up on the trees. Branches cracked, and one tree snapped.

Professor Clavering ducked and retreated. He had a glimpse of a great belly gliding unhurt over a jagged tree trunk, of a circular mouth two feet across, open and showing the still wider upper band of teeth like shark's teeth, munching automatically up and down. The snail cruised gently down over the tree tops, some of which sprang back into position as the snail's weight left them.

Click! went the professor's camera.

5. The genus comprising carnivores, or meat-eaters. "Amygdalus Persica": scientific name for the peach tree.

What a sight that had been! Something like a slow hurdle. He imagined entertaining friends with an account of it, substantiated by the photograph, once he got back to California. Old Professor McIlroy of the biology department had laughed at him for spending seven thousand dollars on an effort he predicted would be futile!

Professor Clavering was tiring, so he cut directly for the Samantha. He noticed that the snail veered also in a direction that would intercept him, if they kept on at their steady though different speeds, and the professor chuckled and trotted for a bit. The snail also picked up speed, and the professor remembered the wide, upward rippling of the snail's body as it had hurdled the trees. It would be interesting to see how fast the snail could go on a straight course. Such a test would have to wait for America.

He reached the water and saw his beach a few yards away to his right, but no ship was there. He'd made a mistake, he thought, and his beach was on the other side of the island. Then he caught sight of the Samantha half a mile out on the ocean, drifting away.

'Damn!' Professor Clavering said aloud. He'd done something wrong with the anchors. Did he dare try to swim to it? The distance frightened him, and it was growing wider every moment.

A rattle of pebbles behind him made him turn. The snail was hardly twenty feet away.

The professor trotted down toward the beach. There was bound to be some slit on the coast, a cave however small, where he could be out of reach of the snail. He wanted to rest for a while. What really annoyed him now was the prospect of a chilly night without blankets or food. The Matusas natives had been right: there was nothing to eat on Kuwa.

Professor Clavering stopped dead, his shoes sliding on sand and pebbles. Before him, not fifty feet away on the beach, was another snail as big as the one following him, and somewhat lighter in colour. Its tail was in the sea, and its muzzle dripped water as it reared itself to get a look at him.

It was this snail, the professor realized, that had chewed through the hemp ropes and let the boat go free. Was there something about new hemp ropes that appealed to snails? This question he put out of his mind for the nonce. He had a snail before and behind him. The professor trotted on along the shore. The only crevice of shelter he was sure existed was the gully on the other side of the island. He forced himself to walk at a moderate pace for a while, to breathe normally, then he sat down and treated himself to a rest.

The first snail was the first to appear, and as it had lost sight of him, it lifted its head and looked slowly to right and left, though without slackening its progress. The professor sat motionless, bare head lowered, hoping the snail would not see him. But he was not that lucky. The snail saw him and altered its course to a straight line for him. Behind it came the second snail—its wife? its husband?—the professor could not tell and there was no way of telling.

Professor Clavering had to leave his resting place. The weight of his hatchet reminded him that he at least had a weapon. A good scare, he thought, a minor wound might discourage them. He knew they were hungry, that their teeth could tear his flesh more easily than they tore trees, and that alive or dead, he would be eaten by these snails if he permitted it to happen. He drew his hatchet and faced them, conscious that he cut a not very formidable figure with his slight paunch, his pale, skinny legs, his height of five feet seven, about a third the snails' height, but his brows above his glasses were set with a determination to defend his life.

The first snail reared when it was ten feet away. The professor advanced and swung the hatchet at the projecting mantle on the snail's left side. He had not dared get close enough, his aim was inches short, and the weight of the hatchet pulled the professor off balance. He staggered and fell under the raised muzzle, and had just time to roll himself from under the descending mouth before it touched the ground where he had been. Angry now, he circled the snail and swung a blow at the nacreous shell, which turned the blade. The hatchet took an inch-deep chip, but nothing more. The professor swung again, higher this time and in the center of the shell's posterior, trying for the lung valve beneath, but the valve was still higher, he knew, ten feet from the ground, and once more his hatchet took only a chip. The snail began to turn itself to face him.

The professor then confronted the second snail, rushed at it and swung the hatchet, cutting it in the cheek. The hatchet sank up to its wooden handle, and he had to tug to get it out, and then had to run a few yards, as the snail put on speed and reared its head for a biting attack. Glancing back, the professor saw that no liquid (he had not, of course, expected blood) came from the cut in the snail's cheek, and in fact he couldn't see the cut. And the blow had certainly been no discouragement to the snail's advance.

Professor Clavering began to walk at a sensible pace straight for the snails' lair on the other side of the island. By the time he scrambled down the side of the gully, he was winded and his legs hurt. But he saw to his relief that the gully narrowed to a sharp V. Wedged in that, he would be safe. Professor Clavering started into the V, which had an overhanging top rather like a cave, when he saw that what he had taken for some rounded rocks were moving—at least some of them were. They were baby snails! They were larger than good-sized beach balls. And the professor saw, from the way a couple of them were devouring grass blades, that they were hungry.

A snail's head appeared high on his left. The giant parent snail began to descend the gully. A crepitation,⁶ a pair of antennae against the sky on his right, heralded the arrival of the second snail. He had nowhere to turn except the sea, which was not a bad idea, he thought, as these were land snails. The professor waded out and turned left, walking waist-deep in water. It was slow going, and a snail was coming after him. He got closer to the land and ran in thigh-deep water.

The first snail, the darker one, entered the water boldly and crept along in a depth of several inches, showing signs of being willing to go into deeper water when it got abreast of Professor Clavering. The professor hoped the other snail, maybe the mother, had stayed with the young. But it hadn't. It was following along the land, and accelerating. The professor plunged wildly for the shore where he would be able to move faster.

Now, thank goodness, he saw rocks. Great igneous masses of rocks covered a sloping hill down to the sea. There was bound to be a niche, some place there where he could take shelter. The sun was sinking into the ocean,

6. A crackling sound.

it would be dark soon, and there was no moon, he knew. The professor was thirsty. When he reached the rocks, he flung himself like a corpse into a trough made by four or five scratchy boulders, which caused him to lie in a curve. The rocks rose two feet above his body, and the trough was hardly a foot wide. A snail couldn't, he reasoned, stick its head down here and bite him.

The peachy curves of the snails' shells appeared, and one, the second, drew closer.

'I'll strike it with my hatchet if it comes!' the professor swore to himself. 'I'll cut its face to ribbons with my knife!' He was now reconciled to killing both adults, because he could take back a pair of the young ones, and in fact more easily because they were smaller.

The snail seemed to sniff like a dog, though inaudibly, as its muzzle hovered over the professor's hiding place. Then with majestic calm it came down on the rocks between which the professor lay. Its slimy foot covered the aperture and within seconds had blocked out almost all the light.

Professor Clavering drew his hunting knife in anger and panic, and plunged it several times into the snail's soft flesh. The snail seemed not even to wince. A few seconds later, it stopped moving, though the professor knew that it was not only not dead, as the stabs hadn't touched any vital organs, but that it had fastened itself over his trench in the firmest possible way. No slit of light showed. The professor was only grateful that the irregularity of the rocks must afford a supply of air. Now he pressed frantically with his palms against the snail's body, and felt his hands slip and scrape against rock. The firmness of the snail, his inability to budge it, made him feel slightly sick for a moment.

An hour passed. The professor almost slept, but the experience was more like a prolonged hallucination. He dreamed, or feared, that he was being chewed by twenty thousand pairs of teeth into a heap of mince,⁷ which the two giant snails shared with their offspring. To add to his misery, he was cold and hungry. The snail's body gave no warmth, and was even cool.

Some hours later, the professor awoke and saw stars above him. The snail had departed. It was pitch dark. He stood up cautiously, trying not to make a sound, and stepped out of the crevice. He was free! On a sandy stretch of beach a few yards away, Professor Clavering lay down, pressed against a vertical face of rock. Here he slept the remaining hours until dawn.

He awakened just in time, and perhaps not the dawn but a sixth sense had awakened him. The first snail was coming toward him and was only ten feet away. The professor got up on trembling legs, and trotted inland, up a slope. An idea came to him: if he could push a boulder of, say, five hundred pounds—possible with a lever—onto an adult snail in the gully, and smash the spot below which its lung lay, then he could kill it. Otherwise, he could think of no other means at his disposal that could inflict a fatal injury. His gun might, but the gun was on the Samantha. He had already estimated that it might be a week, or never, that help would come from the Matusas. The Samantha would not necessarily float back to the Matusas, would not necessarily be seen by any other ship for days, and even if it was seen, would it be apparent she was drifting? And if so, would the spotters make a beeline for the Matusas to report it? Not necessarily. The professor bent quickly and licked some dew from a leaf. The snails were twenty yards behind him now.

7. Ground food, especially meat.

The trouble is, I'm becoming exhausted, he said to himself.

He was even more tired at noon. Only one snail pursued him, but the professor imagined the other resting or eating a tree top, in order to be fresh later. The professor could trot a hundred yards, find a spot to rest in, but he dared not shut his eyes for long, lest he sleep. And he was definitely weak from lack of food.

So the day passed. His idea of dropping a rock down the gully was thwarted by two factors: the second snail was guarding the gully now, at the top of its V, and there was no such rock as he needed within a hundred yards.

When dusk came, the professor could not find the hill where the igneous rocks were. Both snails had him in their sight now. His watch said a quarter to seven. Professor Clavering took a deep breath and faced the fact that he must make an attempt to kill one or both snails before dark. Almost without thinking, or planning—he was too spent for that—he chopped down a slender tree and hacked off its branches. The leaves of these branches were devoured by the two snails five minutes after the branches had fallen to the ground. The professor dragged his tree several yards inland, and sharpened one end of it with the hatchet. It was too heavy a weapon for one hand to wield, but in two hands, it made a kind of battering ram, or giant spear.

At once, Professor Clavering turned and attacked, running with the spear pointed slightly upward. He aimed for the first snail's mouth, but struck too low, and the tree end penetrated about four inches into the snail's chest—or the area below its face. No vital organ here, except the long, straight esophagus, which in these giant snails would be set deeper than four inches. He had nothing for his trouble but lacerated hands. His spear hung for a few seconds in the snail's flesh, then fell out onto the ground. The professor retreated, pulling his hatchet from his belt. The second snail, coming up abreast of the other, paused to chew off a few inches of the tree stump, then joined its mate in giving attention to Professor Clavering. There was something contemptuous, something absolutely assured, about the snails' slow progress toward him, as if they were thinking, "Escape us a hundred, a thousand times, we shall finally reach you and devour every trace of you."

The professor advanced once more, circled the snail he had just hit with the tree spear, and swung his hatchet at the rear of its shell. Desperately, he attacked the same spot with five or six direct hits, for now he had a plan. His hacking operation had to be halted, because the second snail was coming up behind him. Its snout and an antenna even brushed the professor's legs moistly and staggered him, before he could step out of its way. Two more hatchet blows the professor got in, and then he stopped, because his right arm hurt. He had by no means gone through the shell, but he had no strength for more effort with the hatchet. He went back for his spear. His target was a small one, but he ran toward it with desperate purpose.

The blow landed. It even broke through.

The professor's hands were further torn, but he was oblivious of them. His success made him as joyous as if he had killed both his enemies, as if a rescue ship with food, water, and a bed were even then sailing into Kuwa's beach.

The snail was twisting and rearing up with pain.

Professor Clavering ran forward, lifted the drooping spear and pushed it with all his might farther into the snail, pointing it upward to go as close as possible to the lung. Whether the snail died soon or not, it was hors de combat,⁸ the professor saw. And he himself experienced something like physical collapse an instant after seeing the snail's condition. He was quite incapable of taking on the other snail in the same manner, and the other snail was coming after him. The professor tried to walk in a straight line away from both snails, but he weaved with fatigue and faintness. He looked behind him. The unhurt snail was thirty feet away. The wounded snail faced him, but was motionless, half in and half out of its shell, suffering in silence some agony of asphyxiation. Professor Clavering walked on.

Quite by accident, just as it was growing dark, he came upon his field of rocks. Among them he took shelter for the second time. The snail's snout probed the trench in which he lay, but could not quite reach him. Would it not be better to remain in the trench tomorrow, to hope for rain for water? He fell asleep before he could come to any decision.

Again, when the professor awakened at dawn, the snail had departed. His hands throbbed. Their palms were encrusted with dried blood and sand. He thought it wise to go to the sea and wash them in salt water.

The giant snail lay between him and the sea, and at his approach, the snail very slowly began to creep toward him. Professor Clavering made a wobbling detour and continued on his way toward the water. He dipped his hands and moved them rapidly back and forth, at last lifted water to his face, longed to wet his dry mouth, warned himself that he should not, and yielded anyway, spitting out the water almost at once. Land snails hated salt and could be killed by salt crystals. The professor angrily flung handfuls of water at the snail's face. The snail only lifted its head higher, out of the professor's range. Its form was slender now, and it had, oddly, the grace of a horned gazelle, of some animal of the deer family. The snail lowered its snout, and the professor trudged away, but not quickly enough: the snail came down on his shoulder and the suctorial⁹ mouth clamped.

The professor screamed. My God, he thought, as a piece of his shirt, a piece of flesh and possibly bone was torn from his left shoulder, why was I such an ass as to linger? The snail's weight pushed him under, but it was shallow here, and he struggled to his feet and walked toward the land. Blood streamed hotly down his side. He could not bear to look at his shoulder to see what had happened, and would not have been surprised if his left arm had dropped off in the next instant. The professor walked on aimlessly in shallow water near the land. He was still going faster than the snail.

Then he lifted his eyes to the empty horizon, and saw a dark spot in the water in the mid-distance. He stopped, wondering if it were real or a trick of his eyes: but now he made out the double body of a catamaran,¹ and he thought he saw Dr. Stead's straw hat. They had come from the Matusas!

"Hello!" The professor was shocked at the hoarseness, the feebleness of his voice. Not a chance that he had been heard.

But with hope now, the professor's strength increased. He headed for a little beach—not his beach, a smaller one—and when he got there he stood

8. "Out of action" because of injury in battle (French).

9. Adapted for sucking.
1. A boat with two hulls.

in its center, his good arm raised, and shouted, “Dr. Stead! This way!—On the beach!” He could definitely see Dr. Stead’s hat and four dark heads.

There was no answering shout. Professor Clavering could not tell if they had heard him or not. And the accursed snail was only thirty feet away now! He’d lost his hatchet, he realized. And the camera that had been under water with him was now ruined, and so were the two pictures in it. No matter. He would live.

“Here!” he shouted, again lifting his arm.

The natives heard this. Suddenly all heads in the catamaran turned to him.

Dr. Stead pointed to him and gesticulated, and dimly Professor Clavering heard the good doctor urging the boatman to make for the shore. He saw Dr. Stead half stand up in the catamaran.

The natives gave a whoop—at first Professor Clavering thought it a whoop of joy, or of recognition, but almost at once a wild swing of the sail, a splash of a couple of oars, told him that the natives were trying to change their course.

Pebbles crackled. The snail was near. And this of course was what the natives had seen—the giant snail.

“Please—Here!” the professor screamed. He plunged again into the water. “Please!”

Dr. Stead was trying, that the professor could see. But the natives were rowing, paddling with hands even, and their sail was carrying them obliquely away.

The snail made a splash as it entered the sea. To drown or to be eaten alive? the professor wondered. He was waist-deep when he stumbled, waist-deep but head under when the snail crashed down upon him, and he realized as the thousands of pairs of teeth began to gnaw at his back, that his fate was both to drown and to be chewed to death.

1967, 1970

RICHARD WILBUR

b. 1921

Richard Wilbur was born in New York City and grew up in the country in New Jersey. His father was a painter, and his mother came from a family prominent in journalism. He was educated at Amherst College, where Robert Frost was a frequent guest and teacher, and Wilbur’s remarkable gifts as a prosodist often remind us of the older poet. Of the effects of his college years Wilbur says: “Most American poets of my generation were taught to admire the English metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century and such contemporary masters of irony as John Crowe Ransom. We were led by our teachers and by the critics whom we read to feel that the most adequate and convincing poetry is that which accommodates mixed feelings, clashing ideas, and incongruous images.” Nevertheless, over his long and varied career he has written in a wide range of forms, including the dramatic monologue.

After graduation and service in the infantry in Italy and France (1943–45), Wilbur returned to study for an M.A. at Harvard, with a firm notion of what he expected to get out of poetry. “My first poems were written in answer to the inner and outer disorders of the Second World War and they helped me . . . to take ahold of raw events and convert them, provisionally, into experience.” He reasserted the balance of mind against instinct and violence: “The praiseful, graceful soldier / Shouldn’t be fired by his gun.” The poised lyrics in The Beautiful Changes (1947), including the lovely title poem of that volume, and Ceremony (1950) also reclaimed the value of pleasure, defined as an interplay of intelligence with sensuous enjoyment. Whether looking at a real French landscape, as in “Grasse: The Olive Trees,” or a French landscape painting, as in “Ceremony,” the point was to show the witty shaping power of the mind in nature.

Wilbur prefers strict stanzaic forms and meters; “limitation makes for power: the strength of the genie comes of his being confined in a bottle.” In individual lines and the structure of an entire poem, his emphasis is on a civilized balancing of perceptions. “A World without Objects Is a Sensible Emptiness” begins with the “tall camels of the spirit” but qualifies our views of lonely spiritual impulses. The poem summons us back to find visionary truth grasped through sensual experience. “All shining things need to be shaped and borne.” Wilbur favors what he has called “a spirituality which is not abstracted, not dissociated and world-renouncing,” as is clear from “Love Calls Us to the Things of This World,” a hymn of praise to clothes hanging on a laundry line (“Oh, let there be nothing on earth but laundry”). “A good part of my work could, I suppose, be understood as a public quarrel with the aesthetics of Edgar Allan Poe”—presumably with Poe’s notion that poetry provided indefinite sensations and aspired to the abstract condition of music.

Wilbur was among the first of the younger postwar poets to adopt a style of living and working different from the masters of an earlier generation—from Eliot, an ironic priestlike modernist who lived as a publisher-poet in England, or William Carlos Williams, a doctor in New Jersey, or Wallace Stevens, a remote insurance executive in Connecticut. Wilbur was a teacher-poet and gave frequent readings. Instead of thinking of himself as an alienated artist, he came to characterize himself as a “poet-citizen,” part of what he judged a widening community of poets addressing themselves to an audience increasingly responsive to poetry. Wilbur’s taste for civilized wit and his metrical skill made him an ideal translator of the seventeenth-century satirical comedies of Molière, The Misanthrope (1955) and Tartuffe (1963). They are frequently staged, as is the musical version of Voltaire’s Candide for which Wilbur was one of the collaborating lyricists. Wilbur received the Pulitzer Prize for his volume Things of This World (1956) and served as the second poet laureate of the United States in 1987–88. In 1989 he won his second Pulitzer Prize, for his New and Collected Poems. Wilbur’s Collected Poems, 1943–2004 appeared in 2004.

The Beautiful Changes

One wading a Fall meadow finds on all sides
 The Queen Anne’s Lace lying like lilies
 On water; it glides
 So from the walker, it turns
 Dry grass to a lake, as the slightest shade of you Valleys my mind in fabulous blue Lucernes.¹

5

1. Lakes having the quality of Switzerland’s Lake Lucerne, known for its beauty.

The beautiful changes as a forest is changed
By a chameleon's tuning his skin to it;
As a mantis, arranged
On a green leaf, grows 10
Into it, makes the leaf leafier, and proves
Any greenness is deeper than anyone knows.

Your hands hold roses always in a way that says
They are not only yours; the beautiful changes
In such kind ways, 15
Wishing ever to sunder
Things and things' selves for a second finding, to lose
For a moment all that it touches back to wonder.

1947

The Death of a Toad

A toad the power mower caught,
Chewed and clipped of a leg, with a hobbling hop has got To the garden verge, and sanctuaried him
Under the cineraria leaves, in the shade
Of the ashen heartshaped leaves, in a dim, 5
Low, and a final glade.

The rare original heartsblood goes,
Spends on the earthen hide, in the folds and wizenings, flows
In the gutters of the banked and staring eyes. He lies
As still as if he would return to stone, 10
And soundlessly attending, dies
Toward some deep monotone,

Toward misted and ebullient seas
And cooling shores, toward lost Amphibia's emperies.¹
Day dwindles, drowning, and at length is gone 15
In the wide and antique eyes, which still appear
To watch, across the castrate lawn,
The haggard daylight steer.

1950

"A World without Objects Is a Sensible Emptiness"¹

The tall camels of the spirit
Steer for their deserts, passing the last groves loud

1. Archaic for "empires." "Amphibia" refers to "double life" and animals who live on water or land.

1. From "Meditation 65," by the English Metaphysical poet Thomas Traherne (c. 1638–1674): "Life without objects is sensible emptiness, and that is a greater misery than death or nothing." ("Sensible" = "palpable to the senses.")

With the sawmill shrill of the locust, to the whole honey of the arid
Sun. They are slow, proud,

And move with a stilted stride 5
To the land of sheer horizon, hunting Traherne's
Sensible emptiness, there where the brain's lantern-slide Revels in vast returns.

O connoisseurs of thirst,
Beasts of my soul who long to learn to drink 10
Of pure mirage, those prosperous islands are accurst
That shimmer on the brink

Of absence; auras, lustres,
And all shinings need to be shaped and borne. 15
Think of those painted saints, capped by the early masters
With bright, jauntily-worn

Aureate plates, or even Merry-go-round rings. Turn, O turn
From the fine sleights of the sand, from the long empty oven
Where flames in flamings burn 20

Back to the trees arrayed
In bursts of glare, to the halo-dialing run
Of the country creeks, and the hills' bracken tiaras made
Gold in the sunken sun,

Wisely watch for the sight 25
Of the supernova² burgeoning over the barn,
Lampshine blurred in the stream of beasts, the spirit's right
Oasis, light incarnate.

1950

Love Calls Us to the Things of This World

The eyes open to a cry of pulleys,
And spirited from sleep, the astounded soul
Hangs for a moment bodiless and simple
As false dawn. 5
Outside the open window
The morning air is all awash with angels.

Some are in bed-sheets, some are in blouses,
Some are in smocks: but truly there they are.
Now they are rising together in calm swells

2. A scientific term for an exploding star, here associated with the Star of Bethlehem.

Of halcyon¹ feeling, filling whatever they wear 10
 With the deep joy of their impersonal breathing;

Now they are flying in place, conveying
 The terrible speed of their omnipresence, moving
 And staying like white water; and now of a sudden
 They swoon down into so rapt a quiet 15
 That nobody seems to be there.
 The soul shrinks

From all that it is about to remember,
 From the punctual rape of every blessed day,
 And cries, 20
 “Oh, let there be nothing on earth but laundry,
 Nothing but rosy hands in the rising steam
 And clear dances done in the sight of heaven.”

Yet, as the sun acknowledges
 With a warm look the world’s hunks and colors, 25
 The soul descends once more in bitter love
 To accept the waking body, saying now
 In a changed voice as the man yawns and rises,

“Bring them down from their ruddy gallows;
 Let there be clean linen for the backs of thieves; 30
 Let lovers go fresh and sweet to be undone,
 And the heaviest nuns walk in a pure floating
 Of dark habits,
 keeping their difficult balance.”

1956

1. Calm, peaceful. The word originated as the name of a mythological bird anciently fabled to breed at about the time of the winter solstice in a nest floating on the sea, and then to charm the wind and waves so that the sea became especially calm.

JACK KEROUAC

1922–1969

Like many trailblazing writers, Jack Kerouac led a life filled with contradictions. Regarded as a liberator of prose and champion of idiomatic American expression, he did not start learning English until grade school and did not feel comfortable speaking it until he finished high school (his parents were French Canadian, and French was the family’s language at home in Lowell, Massachusetts; his given name was “Jean-Louis”). Having won a football scholarship to Columbia University, he rejected the athletic crowd to join the literary innovators gathering at the college neighborhood's popular West End Bar, among them Allen Ginsberg and William S. Burroughs, who would achieve fame as a poet and a novelist, respectively. Not famous himself until the late 1950s, when a wave of interest in the Beat Movement installed him as its unwilling leader, Kerouac rode the crest of the counterculture's growing fascination with Eastern religions, most notably Zen Buddhism, while never rejecting the Catholicism of his childhood. Even adulatory responses to his work risked contradiction. Critics praised his most famous novel, On the Road (1957), for its seeming embrace of expansive westward energies reminiscent of America's Manifest Destiny myth, even though the book in fact moves from the West Coast to the East. The final chapter is set in New York City.

Kerouac's ambitions were monumental, but his heavy drinking killed him by age forty-seven. His several marriages, until the last one, ended in annulment, desertion, or divorce. His greatest loyalty as an adult was to his widowed mother, in later years an invalid, for whom he cared until his death. Wartime service in the merchant marine had given Kerouac skills useful during the wanderings that characterized his life; railroad brakeman and forest-fire lookout were among the jobs he took during the late 1940s and early 1950s. Once royalties from On the Road could sustain the transient life he preferred, he spent his time visiting friends and writing as inspiration struck. "Home" was a series of addresses in Massachusetts, New York (on Long Island), and Florida, most of them chosen for his mother's convenience.

Kerouac is known for a writing practice he called "spontaneous prose," reminiscent of jazz improvisation in its emphasis on rhythms, inflections, and freewheeling references. A rejection of what he and other Beat writers saw as the overly formal and elite style of the Modernist literary works that then dominated the high-cultural landscape, the practice of spontaneous prose sought to eliminate the gap between thought and word, between experience and voice, between life and art. Asked by his friends Ginsberg and Burroughs in 1953 to explain how he wrote his novel The Subterraneans in three days flat, he composed a manifesto called "The Essentials of Spontaneous Prose," which he then taped above his desk. (It was published in the Black Mountain Review in 1957.) Among its tenets are these: "No time for poetry but exactly what is"; "Remove literary grammatical and syntactical inhibition"; "Bookmovie is the movie in words, the visual American form." He advocated "not 'selectivity' of expression but following free deviation (association) of mind into limitless blow-on-subject seas of thought, swimming in sea of English with no discipline other than rhythms of rhetorical exhalation and expostulated statement, like a fist coming down on a table with each complete utterance, bang!" After his first book, The Town and the City (1950), a social novel in a realistic mode, he composed all his novels in the exuberant form of prose he perfected.

"My work comprises one vast book like [Marcel] Proust's except that my remembrances are written on the run instead of afterwards in a sick bed," Kerouac observes at the start of his novel Big Sur (1962), comparing his project to the French modernist Proust's seven-volume Remembrance of Things Past (1913–27). Though Kerouac's canon consists of more than a dozen novels published during his lifetime and others recovered from manuscript and issued after his death, the author had seen them as one grand project, the parts of which he intended to revise, integrate, and present to readers as a single massive narrative. Neither writing nor publishing them in the order in which he had conceived their action, Kerouac did not live long enough to begin his intended synthesis. But he named the project "the Duluoos Legend," from the name of his protagonist in Big Sur and other works. Central to the legend is Kerouac's close friendship with legendary counterculture and Beat figure Neal Cassady (fictionalized as Dean Moriarity in On the Road and as Cody Pomeray in Visions of Cody, 1972). Their relationship had been the motivation for both the author's wanderings and his impulsive, sometimes explosive manner of writing.

On the Road, the first and last chapters of which are reprinted here, was written in 1951, though by then Kerouac had been thinking about writing a road novel for several years. He composed much of it on a single scroll of typing paper in a three-week rush fueled by wine, coffee, and Benzedrine. In the opening chapter, the Kerouac figure and narrator, Sal Paradise, describes Dean Moriarty's kinetic speech and the foundations of their remarkable friendship. Readers meet "Carlo Marx," based on Allen Ginsberg; "Old Bull Lee" and "Jane," based on William and Jane Burroughs; and "Elmer Hassel," based on Kerouac's friend from his Columbia days, Herbert Huncke. In the book's final chapter, Sal has returned to New York disillusioned after Dean abandoned him in Mexico, where Sal was broke and suffering from a fever. Dean's too-little, too-late show of friendship—traveling cross-country by bus and hitching rides, apparently just to see Sal for a day or two and meet Sal's new girlfriend—confounds Sal. But for Kerouac, Dean's return leads to the book's famous final sentence, honoring Dean as the muse for a new, ecstatic prose.

Jack Kerouac's hand-drawn map of his travels in the summer and fall of 1947.

From On the Road

Part One

I

I first met Dean not long after my wife and I split up. I had just gotten over a serious illness that I won't bother to talk about, except that it had something to do with the miserably weary split-up and my feeling that everything was dead. With the coming of Dean Moriarty began the part of my life you could call my life on the road. Before that I'd often dreamed of going West to see the country, always vaguely planning and never taking off. Dean is the perfect guy for the road because he actually was born on the road, when his parents were passing through Salt Lake City in 1926, in a jalopy, on their way to Los Angeles. First reports of him came to me through Chad King, who'd shown me a few letters from him written in a New Mexico reform school. I was tremendously interested in the letters because they so naïvely and sweetly asked Chad to teach him all about Nietzsche¹ and all the wonderful intellectual things that Chad knew. At one point Carlo and I talked about the letters and wondered if we would ever meet the strange Dean Moriarty. This is all far back, when Dean was not the way he is today, when he was a young jailkid shrouded in mystery. Then news came that Dean was out of reform school and was coming to New York for the first time; also there was talk that he had just married a girl called Marylou.

One day I was hanging around the campus and Chad and Tim Gray told me Dean was staying in a cold-water pad² in East Harlem, the Spanish Harlem. Dean had arrived the night before, the first time in New York, with his beautiful little sharp chick Marylou; they got off the Greyhound bus at 50th Street and cut around the corner looking for a place to eat and went right in Hector's, and since then Hector's cafeteria has always been a big symbol of New York for Dean. They spent money on beautiful big glazed cakes and creampuffs.

All this time Dean was telling Marylou things like this: "Now, darling, here we are in New York and although I haven't quite told you everything that I was thinking about when we crossed Missouri and especially at the point when we passed the Boonville reformatory which reminded me of my jail problem, it is absolutely necessary now to postpone all those leftover things concerning our personal lovethings and at once begin thinking of specific worklife plans . . ." and so on in the way that he had in those early days.

I went to the cold-water flat with the boys, and Dean came to the door in his shorts. Marylou was jumping off the couch; Dean had dispatched the occupant of the apartment to the kitchen, probably to make coffee, while he preoccupied with his love-problems, for to him sex was the one and only holy and important thing in life, although he had to sweat and curse to make a living and so on. You saw that in the way he stood bobbing his head, always looking down, nodding, like a young boxer to instructions, to make you think he was listening to every word, throwing in a thousand "Yeses" and "That's rights." My first impression of Dean was of a young Gene Autry³—trim, thin-hipped, blue-eyed, with a real Oklahoma accent—a sideburned hero of the snowy West. In fact he'd just been working on a ranch, Ed Wall's in Colorado, before marrying Marylou and coming East. Marylou was a pretty blonde with immense ringlets of hair like a sea of golden tresses; she sat there on the edge of the couch with her hands hanging in her lap and her smoky blue country eyes fixed in a wide stare because she was in an evil gray New York pad that she'd heard about back West, and waiting like a

1. Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), German philosopher.

2. A cheap apartment with no running hot water.

3. American actor and singer (1907–1998), known for his cowboy roles in popular Westerns.

longbodied emaciated Modigliani⁴ surrealist woman in a serious room. But, outside of being a sweet little girl, she was awfully dumb and capable of doing horrible things. That night we all drank beer and pulled wrists and talked till dawn, and in the morning, while we sat around dumbly smoking butts from ashtrays in the gray light of a gloomy day, Dean got up nervously, paced around, thinking, and decided the thing to do was to have Marylou make breakfast and sweep the floor. “In other words we’ve got to get on the ball, darling, what I’m saying, otherwise it’ll be fluctuating and lack of true knowledge or crystallization of our plans.” Then I went away.

During the following week he confided in Chad King that he absolutely had to learn how to write from him; Chad said I was a writer and he should come to me for advice. Meanwhile Dean had gotten a job in a parking lot, had a fight with Marylou in their Hoboken apartment—God knows why they went there—and she was so mad and so down deep vindictive that she reported to the police some false trumped-up hysterical crazy charge, and Dean had to lam⁵ from Hoboken. So he had no place to live. He came right out to Pater-son, New Jersey, where I was living with my aunt, and one night while I was studying there was a knock on the door, and there was Dean, bowing, shuffling obsequiously in the dark of the hall, and saying, “Hel-lo, you remember me—Dean Moriarty? I’ve come to ask you to show me how to write.”

“And where’s Marylou?” I asked, and Dean said she’d apparently whored a few dollars together and gone back to Denver—“the whore!” So we went out to have a few beers because we couldn’t talk like we wanted to talk in front of my aunt, who sat in the living room reading her paper. She took one look at Dean and decided that he was a madman.

In the bar I told Dean, “Hell, man, I know very well you didn’t come to me only to want to become a writer, and after all what do I really know about it except you’ve got to stick to it with the energy of a benny addict.”⁶ And he said, “Yes, of course, I know exactly what you mean and in fact all those problems have occurred to me, but the thing that I want is the realization of those factors that should one depend on Schopenhauer’s⁷ dichotomy for any inwardly realized . . .” and so on in that way, things I understood not a bit and he himself didn’t. In those days he really didn’t know what he was talking about; that is to say, he was a young jailkid all hung-up on the wonderful possibilities of becoming a real intellectual, and he liked to talk in the tone and using the words, but in a jumbled way, that he had heard from “real intellectuals”—although, mind you, he wasn’t so naïve as that in all other things, and it took him just a few months with Carlo Marx to become completely in there with all the terms and jargon. Nonetheless we understood each other on other levels of madness, and I agreed that he could stay at my house till he found a job and furthermore we agreed to go out West sometime. That was the winter of 1947.

One night when Dean ate supper at my house—he already had the parking-lot job in New York—he leaned over my shoulder as I typed rapidly away and said, “Come on man, those girls won’t wait, make it fast.”

4. Amedeo Modigliani (1884–1920), modernist Italian painter and sculptor, known for his elongated human forms, lived and worked in Paris after 1906.

5. To escape or live on the run, usually to evade legal troubles.

6. Benzadrine, a form of amphetamine, typically makes its users hyperactive.

7. Artur Schopenhauer (1788–1860), German Romantic philosopher.

I said, “Hold on just a minute, I’ll be right with you soon as I finish this chapter,” and it was one of the best chapters in the book. Then I dressed and off we flew to New York to meet some girls. As we rode in the bus in the weird phosphorescent void of the Lincoln Tunnel we leaned on each other with fingers waving and yelled and talked excitedly, and I was beginning to get the bug like Dean. He was simply a youth tremendously excited with life, and though he was a con-man, he was only conning because he wanted so much to live and to get involved with people who would otherwise pay no attention to him. He was conning me and I knew it (for room and board and “how-to-write,” etc.), and he knew I knew (this has been the basis of our relationship), but I didn’t care and we got along fine—no pestering, no catering; we tiptoed around each other like heartbreaking new friends. I began to learn from him as much as he probably learned from me. As far as my work was concerned he said, “Go ahead, everything you do is great.” He watched over my shoulder as I wrote stories, yelling, “Yes! That’s right! Wow! Man!” and “Phew!” and wiped his face with his handkerchief. “Man, wow, there’s so many things to do, so many things to write! How to even begin to get it all down and without modified restraints and all hung-up on like literary inhibitions and grammatical fears . . .”

“That’s right, man, now you’re talking.” And a kind of holy lightning I saw flashing from his excitement and his visions, which he described so torrentially that people in buses looked around to see the “overexcited nut.” In the West he’d spent a third of his time in the poolhall, a third in jail, and a third in the public library. They’d seen him rushing eagerly down the winter streets, bareheaded, carrying books to the poolhall, or climbing trees to get into the attics of buddies where he spent days reading or hiding from the law.

We went to New York—I forget what the situation was, two colored girls—there were no girls there; they were supposed to meet him in a diner and didn’t show up. We went to his parking lot where he had a few things to do—change his clothes in the shack in back and spruce up a bit in front of a cracked mirror and so on, and then we took off. And that was the night Dean met Carlo Marx. A tremendous thing happened when Dean met Carlo Marx. Two keen minds that they are, they took to each other at the drop of a hat. Two piercing eyes glanced into two piercing eyes—the holy con-man with the shining mind, and the sorrowful poetic con-man with the dark mind that is Carlo Marx. From that moment on I saw very little of Dean, and I was a little sorry too. Their energies met head-on, I was a lout compared, I couldn’t keep up with them. The whole mad swirl of everything that was to come began then; it would mix up all my friends and all I had left of my family in a big dust cloud over the American Night. Carlo told him of Old Bull Lee, Elmer Hassel, Jane: Lee in Texas growing weed, Hassel on Riker’s Island, Jane wandering on Times Square in a benzedrine hallucination, with her baby girl in her arms and ending up in Bellevue.⁸ And Dean told Carlo of unknown people in the West like Tommy Snark, the clubfooted poolhall rotation shark and cardplayer and queer saint. He told him of Roy Johnson, Big Ed Dunkel, his boyhood

8. New York City’s Bellevue Hospital Center, America’s oldest public hospital, has a famous psychiatric treatment facility. “Riker’s Island”: island in the East River between Queens and the buddies, his street buddies, his innumerable girls and sex-parties and pornographic pictures, his heroes, heroines, adventures. They rushed down the street together, digging everything in the early way they had, which later became so much sadder and perceptive and blank. But then they danced down the streets like dingedodies,⁹ and I shambled after as I've been doing all my life after people who interest me, because the only people for me are the mad ones, the ones who are mad to live, mad to talk, mad to be saved, desirous of everything at the same time, the ones who never yawn or say a commonplace thing, but burn, burn, burn like fabulous yellow roman candles exploding like spiders across the stars and in the middle you see the blue centerlight pop and everybody goes "Awww!" What did they call such young people in Goethe's¹ Germany? Wanting dearly to learn how to write like Carlo, the first thing you know, Dean was attacking him with a great amorous soul such as only a con-man can have. "Now, Carlo, let me speak—here's what I'm saying . . ." I didn't see them for about two weeks, during which time they cemented their relationship to fiendish allday-allnight-talk proportions.

Bronx; it is the site of New York City’s main jail complex. “Times Square”: busy hub of Manhattan’s entertainment district.

Then came spring, the great time of traveling, and everybody in the scattered gang was getting ready to take one trip or another. I was busily at work on my novel and when I came to the halfway mark, after a trip down South with my aunt to visit my brother Rocco, I got ready to travel West for the very first time.

Dean had already left. Carlo and I saw him off at the 34th Street Greyhound station. Upstairs they had a place where you could make pictures for a quarter. Carlo took off his glasses and looked sinister. Dean made a profile shot and looked coyly around. I took a straight picture that made me look like a thirty-year-old Italian who'd kill anybody who said anything against his mother. This picture Carlo and Dean neatly cut down the middle with a razor and saved a half each in their wallets. Dean was wearing a real Western business suit for his big trip back to Denver; he'd finished his first fling in New York. I say fling, but he only worked like a dog in parking lots. The most fantastic parking-lot attendant in the world, he can back a car forty miles an hour into a tight squeeze and stop at the wall, jump out, race among fenders, leap into another car, circle it fifty miles an hour in a narrow space, back swiftly into tight spot, hump, snap the car with the emergency so that you see it bounce as he flies out; then clear to the ticket shack, sprinting like a track star, hand a ticket, leap into a newly arrived car before the owner's half out, leap literally under him as he steps out, start the car with the door flapping, and roar off to the next available spot, arc, pop in, brake, out, run; working like that without pause eight hours a night, evening rush hours and after-theater rush hours, in greasy wino pants with a frayed fur-lined jacket and beat² shoes that flap. Now he'd bought a new suit to go back in; blue with pencil stripes, vest and all—eleven dollars on Third Avenue, with a watch and watch chain, and a portable typewriter with which he was going to start writing in a Denver rooming house as soon as he got a job there. We had a farewell meal of franks and beans in a Seventh Avenue Riker's,³ and

9. Kerouac's neologism: a wild, free-spirited person.

1. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), German Romantic writer of novels, poetry, drama, and memoirs.

2. Worn, beaten-down; Kerouac adopted this usage of beat to describe his postwar generation of disaffected writers, artists, and intellectuals.

3. Popular chain of New York City cafeterias. (The name is unrelated to that of the Riker's Island jail complex.)

then Dean got on the bus that said Chicago and roared off into the night. There went our wrangler. I promised myself to go the same way when spring really bloomed and opened up the land.

And this was really the way that my whole road experience began, and the things that were to come are too fantastic not to tell.

Yes, and it wasn't only because I was a writer and needed new experiences that I wanted to know Dean more, and because my life hanging around the campus had reached the completion of its cycle and was stultified, but because, somehow in spite of our difference in character, he reminded me of some long-lost brother; the sight of his suffering bony face with the long sideburns and his straining muscular sweating neck made me remember my boyhood in those dye-dumps and swim-holes and riversides of Paterson and the Passaic.⁴ His dirty workclothes clung to him so gracefully, as though you couldn't buy a better fit from a custom tailor but only earn it from the Natural Tailor of Natural Joy, as Dean had, in his stresses. And in his excited way of speaking I heard again the voices of old companions and brothers under the bridge, among the motorcycles, along the wash-lined neighborhood and drowsy doorsteps of afternoon where boys played guitars while their older brothers worked in the mills. All my other current friends were "intellectuals"—Chad the Nietzschean anthropologist, Carlo Marx and his nutty surrealist low-voiced serious staring talk, Old Bull Lee and his critical anti-everything drawl—or else they were slinking criminals like Elmer Hassel, with that hip sneer; Jane Lee the same, sprawled on the Oriental cover of her couch, sniffing at the New Yorker. But Dean's intelligence was every bit as formal and shining and complete, without the tedious intellectualness. And his "criminality" was not something that sulked and sneered; it was a wild yea-saying overburst of American joy; it was Western, the west wind, an ode from the Plains, something new, long prophesied, long a-coming (he only stole cars for joy rides). Besides, all my New York friends were in the negative, nightmare position of putting down society and giving their tired bookish or political or psychoanalytical reasons, but Dean just raced in society, eager for bread and love; he didn't care one way or the other, "so long's I can get that lil ole gal with that lil sumpin down there tween her legs, boy," and "so long's we can eat, son, y'ear me? I'm hungry, I'm starving, let's eat right now!"—and off we'd rush to eat, whereof, as saith Ecclesiastes,⁵ "It is your portion under the sun."

A western kinsman of the sun, Dean. Although my aunt warned me that he would get me in trouble, I could hear a new call and see a new horizon, and believe it at my young age; and a little bit of trouble or even Dean's eventual rejection of me as a buddy, putting me down, as he would later, on starving sidewalks and sickbeds—what did it matter? I was a young writer and I wanted to take off.

Somewhere along the line I knew there'd be girls, visions, everything; somewhere along the line the pearl would be handed to me.

4. Paterson is a city in northern New Jersey; the Passaic River runs through the region.

5. One of the 24 books of the Hebrew Bible, Ecclesiastes meditates on life's transitory nature.

Part Five

Dean drove from Mexico City and saw Victor again in Gregoria and pushed that old car all the way to Lake Charles, Louisiana, before the rear end finally dropped on the road as he had always known it would. So he wired Inez for airplane fare and flew the rest of the way. When he arrived in New York with the divorce papers in his hands, he and Inez immediately went to Newark and got married; and that night, telling her everything was all right and not to worry, and making logics where there was nothing but inestimable sorrowful sweats, he jumped on a bus and roared off again across the awful continent to San Francisco to rejoin Camille and the two baby girls. So now he was three times married, twice divorced, and living with his second wife.⁶

In the fall I myself started back home from Mexico City and one night just over Laredo border in Dilley, Texas, I was standing on the hot road underneath an arc-lamp with the summer moths smashing into it when I heard the sound of footsteps from the darkness beyond, and lo, a tall old man with flowing white hair came clomping by with a pack on his back, and when he saw me as he passed, he said, "Go moan for man," and clomped on back to his dark. Did this mean that I should at last go on my pilgrimage on foot on the dark roads around America? I struggled and hurried to New York, and one night I was standing in a dark street in Manhattan and called up to the window of a loft where I thought my friends were having a party. But a pretty girl stuck her head out the window and said, "Yes? Who is it?"

"Sal Paradise," I said, and heard his name resound in the sad and empty street.

"Come on up," she called. "I'm making hot chocolate." So I went up and there she was, the girl with the pure and innocent dear eyes that I had always searched for and for so long. We agreed to love each other madly. In the winter we planned to migrate to San Francisco, bringing all our beat furniture and broken belongings with us in a jalopy panel truck. I wrote to Dean and told him. He wrote back a huge letter eighteen thousand words long, all about his young years in Denver, and said he was coming to get me and personally select the old truck himself and drive us home. We had six weeks to save up the money for the truck and began working and counting every cent. And suddenly Dean arrived anyway, five and a half weeks in advance, and nobody had any money to go through with the plan.

I was taking a walk in the middle of the night and came back to my girl to tell her what I thought about during my walk. She stood in the dark little pad with a strange smile. I told her a number of things and suddenly I noticed the hush in the room and looked around and saw a battered book on the radio. I knew it was Dean's high-eternity-in-the-afternoon Proust.⁷ As in a dream I saw him tiptoe in from the dark hall in his stocking feet. He

6. Dean is shuttling between coasts and women. Camille, who lives in San Francisco, is Dean's second wife and mother of his two children; though they are in the process of divorcing, Dean remains attached to her. Inez, who lives in Newark, New Jersey, becomes Dean's third wife. Sal and Dean had last been together in Mexico

City, where Dean had abandoned Sal while Sal was sick.

7. Marcel Proust (1871–1922), French novelist, author of the dreamy, semi-autobiographical seven-volume novel, À la recherche du temps perdu (translated as Remembrance of Things Past or In Search of Lost Time).

couldn't talk any more. He hopped and laughed, he stuttered and fluttered his hands and said, "Ah—ah—you must listen to hear." We listened, all ears. But he forgot what he wanted to say. "Really listen—ahem. Look, dear Sal—sweet Laura—I've come—I'm gone—but wait—ah yes." And he stared with rocky sorrow into his hands. "Can't talk no more—do you understand that it is—or might be—But listen!" We all listened. He was listening to sounds in the night. "Yes!" he whispered with awe. "But you see—no need to talk any more—and further."

"But why did you come so soon, Dean?"

"Ah," he said, looking at me as if for the first time, "so soon, yes. We—we'll know—that is, I don't know. I came on the railroad pass—caboozes—old hard-bench coaches—Texas—played flute and wooden sweet potato⁸ all the way." He took out his new wooden flute. He played a few squeaky notes on it and jumped up and down in his stocking feet. "See?" he said. "But of course, Sal, I can talk as soon as ever and have many things to say to you in fact with my own little bangtail mind I've been reading and reading this gone⁹ Proust all the way across the country and digging a great number of things I'll never have TIME to tell you about and we STILL haven't talked of Mexico and our parting there in fever—but no need to talk. Absolutely, now, yes?"

"All right, we won't talk." And he started telling the story of what he did in LA on the way over in every possible detail, how he visited a family, had dinner, talked to the father, the sons, the sisters—what they looked like, what they ate, their furnishings, their thoughts, their interests, their very souls; it took him three hours of detailed elucidation, and having concluded this he said, "Ah, but you see what I wanted to REALLY tell you—much later—Arkansas, crossing on train—playing flute—play cards with boys, my dirty deck—won money, blew sweet-potato solo—for sailors. Long long awful trip five days and five nights just to SEE you, Sal."

"What about Camille?"

"Gave permission of course—waiting for me. Camille and I all straight forever-and-ever . . ."

"And Inez?"

"I—I—I want her to come back to Frisco with me live other side of town—don't you think? Don't know why I came." Later he said in a sudden moment of gaping wonder, "Well and yes, of course. I wanted to see your sweet girl and you—glad of you—love you as ever." He stayed in New York three days and hastily made preparations to get back on the train with his railroad passes and again recross the continent, five days and five nights in dusty coaches and hard-bench crummies, and of course we had no money for a truck and couldn't go back with him. With Inez he spent one night explaining and sweating and fighting, and she threw him out. A letter came for him, care of me. I saw it. It was from Camille. "My heart broke when I saw you go across the tracks with your bag. I pray and pray you get back safe. . . . I do want Sal and his friend to come and live on the same street. . . . I know you'll make it but I can't help worrying—now that we've decided everything. . . . Dear Dean, it's the end of the first half of the century. Welcome

8. A kind of ocarina, a hollow wooden wind instrument shaped like a sweet potato.

9. Slang for "great" or "fine."

with love and kisses to spend the other half with us. We all wait for you. [Signed] Camille, Amy, and Little Joanie.” So Dean’s life was settled with his most constant, most embittered, and best-knowing wife Camille, and I thanked God for him.

The last time I saw him it was under sad and strange circumstances. Remi Boncœur had arrived in New York after having gone around the world several times in ships. I wanted him to meet and know Dean. They did meet, but Dean couldn’t talk any more and said nothing, and Remi turned away. Remi had gotten tickets for the Duke Ellington¹ concert at the Metropolitan Opera and insisted Laura and I come with him and his girl. Remi was fat and sad now but still the eager and formal gentleman, and he wanted to do things the right way, as he emphasized. So he got his bookie to drive us to the concert in a Cadillac. It was a cold winter night. The Cadillac was parked and ready to go. Dean stood outside the windows with his bag, ready to go to Penn Station and on across the land.

“Good-by, Dean,” I said. “I sure wish I didn’t have to go to the concert.”

“D’you think I can ride to Fortieth Street with you?” he whispered. “Want to be with you as much as possible, m’boy, and besides it’s so durned cold in this here New Yawk . . .” I whispered to Remi. No, he wouldn’t have it, he liked me but he didn’t like my idiot friends. I wasn’t going to start all over again ruining his planned evenings as I had done at Alfred’s in San Francisco in 1947 with Roland Major.

“Absolutely out of the question, Sal!” Poor Remi, he had a special necktie made for this evening; on it was painted a replica of the concert tickets, and the names Sal and Laura and Remi and Vicki, the girl, together with a series of sad jokes and some of his favorite sayings such as “You can’t teach the old maestro a new tune.”

So Dean couldn’t ride uptown with us and the only thing I could do was sit in the back of the Cadillac and wave at him. The bookie at the wheel also wanted nothing to do with Dean. Dean, ragged in a motheaten overcoat he brought specially for the freezing temperatures of the East, walked off alone, and the last I saw of him he rounded the corner of Seventh Avenue, eyes on the street ahead, and bent to it again. Poor little Laura, my baby, to whom I’d told everything about Dean, began almost to cry.

“Oh, we shouldn’t let him go like this. What’ll we do?”

Old Dean’s gone, I thought, and out loud I said, “He’ll be all right.” And off we went to the sad and disinclined concert for which I had no stomach whatever and all the time I was thinking of Dean and how he got back on the train and rode over three thousand miles over that awful land and never knew why he had come anyway, except to see me.

So in America when the sun goes down and I sit on the old broken-down river pier watching the long, long skies over New Jersey and sense all that raw land that rolls in one unbelievable huge bulge over to the West Coast, and all that road going, all the people dreaming in the immensity of it, and in Iowa I know by now the children must be crying in the land where they let the children cry, and tonight the stars’ll be out, and don’t you know that God is

1. Edward Kennedy “Duke” Ellington (1899–1974), leading American jazz composer, pianist, and band leader.

Pooh Bear? the evening star must be drooping and shedding her sparkler dims on the prairie, which is just before the coming of complete night that blesses the earth, darkens all rivers, cups the peaks and folds the final shore in, and nobody, nobody knows what's going to happen to anybody besides the forlorn rags of growing old, I think of Dean Moriarty, I even think of Old Dean Moriarty the father we never found, I think of Dean Moriarty.

1957

KURT VONNEGUT

1922–2007

As a counterculture hero of the turbulent 1960s and a best-selling author among readers of popular fiction in the four decades afterward, Kurt Vonnegut was at once more traditional and more complicated than his enthusiasts might believe. To a generation of young people who felt their country had forsaken them, he offered examples of common decency and cultural idealism as basic as a grade-school civics lesson. For a broader readership who felt conventional fiction was inadequate to express the way their lives had been disrupted by the era's radical social changes, he wrote novels structured in more pertinently contemporary terms, bereft of such unifying devices as conclusive characterization and chronologically organized plots. His most famous novel, Slaughterhouse-Five (1969), takes as its organizing incident the Allied firebombing of the German city of Dresden late in World War II, as witnessed by the American prisoner of war Billy Pilgrim. Yet despite its origins in the 1940s, the manner of its telling is much more akin to the writing of Americans of the 1960s, who were coming to terms with the Vietnam War. Like the war in Southeast Asia, Slaughterhouse-Five abjured the certainties of an identifiable beginning, middle, and end; both presented a mesmerizing sense of confused, apparently directionless present, with no sense of completion or conclusion. Together, this World War II novel and the later war during which it was written speak for the unsettling nature of the American 1960s; the assassination of presidential candidate Robert F. Kennedy figures in the book's concluding chapter. Yet this unconventional structure is paired with the language of American vernacular (much in the manner of Vonnegut's hero, Mark Twain). Where more elevated speech would obscure his point, this author speaks plainly and simply, drawing his words, phrases, and inflections from the American middle class and its common experiences of life.

Vonnegut was born in Indianapolis, Indiana, to a family prominent in business and the arts. During the Great Depression of the 1930s, the sensitive, well-read teenager saw his mother's inherited wealth dissipate, his father's career as an architect crumble for lack of work, and his extended family scatter around the country in search of new careers. Service as a World War II infantryman taught him not only how politics reshapes the world but also how science (Vonnegut had been studying biochemistry in college before enlistment) could be used to create effects as destructive to humankind as the Dresden firestorm, which Vonnegut himself endured as a prisoner of war. Working as a publicist for the General Electric Corporation after the war, the author learned firsthand about the strategies for managing the lifestyles of millions. In short, before writing his first story in 1950 Kurt Vonnegut had shared many formative experiences of his generation. Reworking those experiences would yield fictions and a public stance that helped his fellow Americans adjust to a reinvented postwar world.

At left, Dresden in 1945, following the Allied firebombing. At right, Senator Robert F. Kennedy lies mortally wounded by an assassin's bullet on June 4, 1968. These two events bookend Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse-Five.

Vonnegut's advice, like Mark Twain's, would be unapologetically lowbrow. Part of each writer's appeal is that he pokes holes in the pseudo-sophistications of supposedly more serious approaches. In a 1982 lecture, "Fates Worse Than Death," Vonnegut noted that the self-consciously highbrow New Yorker magazine had never published his work. Indeed, he wrote his short stories of the 1950s for the immensely more general readership of Collier's and the Saturday Evening Post. These stories (collected in 1968 as Welcome to the Monkey House) deflate the pretensions of wealth, expertise, and influence with demonstrations of middle-class values and common sense. At the same time Vonnegut was writing novels in formats borrowed from popular subgenres: science fiction dystopia for Player Piano (1952), space opera for The Sirens of Titan (1959), spy thriller for Mother Night (1961), scientific apocalypse and intrigue for Cat's Cradle (1963), and prince-and-the-pauper critique of riches for God Bless You, Mr. Rosewater (1965). Each work challenges the technical and thematic conventions of the novel, yet each time within the familiarity of a popular form.

In the middle 1960s, with his family-magazine markets having gone out of business, Vonnegut began writing essays for popular magazines such as Esquire, McCall's, and the Ladies Home Journal. Reviewing The Random House Dictionary for the New York Times Book Review (October 30, 1966), he contrasted the assignment's linguistic complexity with his own shuffling, hands-in-pockets approach; as lexicographers debated theories like prescriptive versus descriptive standards of language, Vonnegut could just shrug and say that the former, "as nearly as I could tell, was like an honest cop, while descriptive was like a boozed-up war buddy from Mobile, Alabama." In other essays the author's similarly self-effacing humor undermined positions that used intellectual pretensions to support their points. To the overenthusiasts for science fiction who try to include writers like Leo Tolstoy and Franz Kafka in their brotherhood, he objects that “it is as though I were to claim everybody of note belonged fundamentally to Delta Upsilon, my own lodge, incidentally, whether he knew it or not. Kafka would have made a desperately unhappy D.U.”

With the success of Slaughterhouse-Five and the widespread appreciation of his essays and personal appearances, Kurt Vonnegut became much more publically outspoken about major issues. From his new home in New York City (where he moved in 1970 following nearly two decades of writing in obscurity on Cape Cod, Massachusetts) the author wrote novels such as Galápagos (1985), Hocus Pocus (1990), and Timequake (1997), works treating such topics as the evolution and possible devolution of humankind and America’s economic and social role at the end of the twentieth century. Vonnegut’s challenges to the conventions of traditional fiction make him as innovative as any of the literary disruptionists of the postmodern era, yet he trusts in the honesty of plain and accurate statement. His last book was a series of sociopolitical essays collected as A Man without a Country (2005). Two years before his death, the author found himself once more embraced by a new young audience seeking an explanation for their era’s woes. Hence his advice in “How to Write with Style,” from his 1981 collection, Palm Sunday: “I myself find that I trust my writing most, and others seem to trust it most, when I sound like a person from Indianapolis, which I am.”

From Slaughterhouse-Five

Chapter 1¹

All this happened, more or less. The war parts, anyway, are pretty much true. One guy I knew really was shot in Dresden² for taking a teapot that wasn’t his. Another guy I knew really did threaten to have his personal enemies killed by hired gunmen after the war. And so on. I’ve changed all the names.

I really did go back to Dresden with Guggenheim money³ (God love it) in 1967. It looked a lot like Dayton, Ohio, more open spaces than Dayton has. There must be tons of human bone meal in the ground.

I went back there with an old war buddy, Bernard V. O’Hare, and we made friends with a cab driver, who took us to the slaughterhouse where we had been locked up at night as prisoners of war. His name was Gerhard Müller. He told us that he was a prisoner of the Americans for a while. We asked him how it was to live under Communism, and he said that it was terrible at first, because everybody had to work so hard, and because there wasn’t much shelter or food or clothing. But things were much better now. He had a pleasant little apartment, and his daughter was getting an excellent education. His mother was incinerated in the Dresden fire-storm. So it goes.

He sent O’Hare a postcard at Christmastime, and here is what it said:

1. In conventional terms an autobiographical preface. Vonnegut’s innovation is to format it as indistinguishable from the eight chapters of fictive narrative that follow (in which he identifies himself as a participant three times), before a final chapter that in conventional terms would be an autobiographical epilogue.

2. City in southeastern Germany destroyed in a bombing raid by the British Royal Air Force on the night of February 13–14, 1945.

3. Fellowship funded by the Guggenheim Foundation, New York City.

“I wish you and your family also as to your friend Merry Christmas and a happy New Year and I hope that we’ll meet again in a world of peace and freedom in the taxi cab if the accident will.”

I like that very much: “If the accident will.”

I would hate to tell you what this lousy little book cost me in money and anxiety and time. When I got home from the Second World War twenty-three years ago, I thought it would be easy for me to write about the destruction of Dresden, since all I would have to do would be to report what I had seen. And I thought, too, that it would be a masterpiece or at least make me a lot of money, since the subject was so big.

But not many words about Dresden came from my mind then—not enough of them to make a book, anyway. And not many words come now, either, when I have become an old fart with his memories and his Pall Malls,⁴ with his sons full grown.

I think of how useless the Dresden part of my memory has been, and yet how tempting Dresden has been to write about, and I am reminded of the famous limerick:

There was a young man from Stamboul,
Who soliloquized thus to his tool:
“You took all my wealth
And you ruined my health,
And now you won’t pee, you old fool.”

And I’m reminded, too, of the song that goes:

My name is Yon Yonson,
I work in Wisconsin,
I work in a lumbermill there.
The people I meet when I walk down the street,

They say, “What’s your name?”
And I say,
“My name is Yon Yonson,
I work in Wisconsin . . .”

And so on to infinity.

Over the years, people I’ve met have often asked me what I’m working on, and I’ve usually replied that the main thing was a book about Dresden.

I said that to Harrison Starr,⁵ the movie-maker, one time, and he raised his eyebrows and inquired, “Is it an anti-war book?”

“Yes,” I said. “I guess.”

“You know what I say to people when I hear they’re writing anti-war books?”

“No. What do you say, Harrison Starr?”

“I say, ‘Why don’t you write an anti-glacier book instead?’”

What he meant, of course, was that there would always be wars, that they were as easy to stop as glaciers. I believe that, too.

4. Popular brand of cigarettes.

5. American filmmaker (b. 1937).

And, even if wars didn't keep coming like glaciers, there would still be plain old death.

When I was somewhat younger, working on my famous Dresden book, I asked an old war buddy named Bernard V. O'Hare if I could come to see him. He was a district attorney in Pennsylvania. I was a writer on Cape Cod.⁶ We had been privates in the war, infantry scouts. We had never expected to make any money after the war, but we were doing quite well.

I had the Bell Telephone Company find him for me. They are wonderful that way. I have this disease late at night sometimes, involving alcohol and the telephone. I get drunk, and I drive my wife away with a breath like mustard gas and roses. And then, speaking gravely and elegantly into the telephone, I ask the telephone operators to connect me with this friend or that one, from whom I have not heard in years.

I got O'Hare on the line in this way. He is short and I am tall. We were Mutt and Jeff in the war. We were captured together in the war. I told him who I was on the telephone. He had no trouble believing it. He was up. He was reading. Everybody else in his house was asleep.

"Listen—" I said, "I'm writing this book about Dresden. I'd like some help remembering stuff. I wonder if I could come down and see you, and we could drink and talk and remember."

He was unenthusiastic. He said he couldn't remember much. He told me, though, to come ahead.

"I think the climax of the book will be the execution of poor old Edgar Derby," I said. "The irony is so great. A whole city gets burned down, and thousands and thousands of people are killed. And then this one American foot soldier is arrested in the ruins for taking a teapot. And he's given a regular trial, and then he's shot by a firing squad."

"Um," said O'Hare.

"Don't you think that's really where the climax should come?"

"I don't know anything about it," he said. "That's your trade, not mine."

As a trafficker in climaxes and thrills and characterization and wonderful dialogue and suspense and confrontations, I had outlined the Dresden story many times. The best outline I ever made, or anyway the prettiest one, was on the back of a roll of wallpaper.

I used my daughter's crayons, a different color for each main character. One end of the wallpaper was the beginning of the story, and the other end was the end, and then there was all that middle part, which was the middle. And the blue line met the red line and then the yellow line, and the yellow line stopped because the character represented by the yellow line was dead. And so on. The destruction of Dresden was represented by a vertical band of orange cross-hatching, and all the lines that were still alive passed through it, came out the other side.

The end, where all the lines stopped, was a beetfield on the Elbe, outside of Halle.⁷ The rain was coming down. The war in Europe had been over for a

6. Peninsula in eastern Massachusetts; Vonnegut's residence from 1952 to 1970.

7. The River Elbe flows through Germany; Halle is a German city located on the River Saale, a tributary of the Elbe.

couple of weeks. We were formed in ranks, with Russian soldiers guarding us—Englishmen, Americans, Dutchmen, Belgians, Frenchmen, Canadians, South Africans, New Zealanders, Australians, thousands of us about to stop being prisoners of war.

And on the other side of the field were thousands of Russians and Poles and Yugoslavians and so on guarded by American soldiers. An exchange was made there in the rain—one for one. O'Hare and I climbed into the back of an American truck with a lot of others. O'Hare didn't have any souvenirs. Almost everybody else did. I had a ceremonial Luftwaffe⁸ saber, still do. The rabid little American I call Paul Lazzaro in this book had about a quart of diamonds and emeralds and rubies and so on. He had taken these from dead people in the cellars of Dresden. So it goes.

An idiotic Englishman, who had lost all his teeth somewhere, had his souvenir in a canvas bag. The bag was resting on my insteps. He would peek into the bag every now and then, and he would roll his eyes and swivel his scrawny neck, trying to catch people looking covetously at his bag. And he would bounce the bag on my insteps.

I thought this bouncing was accidental. But I was mistaken. He had to show somebody what was in the bag, and he had decided he could trust me. He caught my eye, winked, opened the bag. There was a plaster model of the Eiffel Tower in there. It was painted gold. It had a clock in it.

"There's a smashin' thing," he said.

And we were flown to a rest camp in France, where we were fed chocolate malted milkshakes and other rich foods until we were all covered with baby fat. Then we were sent home, and I married a pretty girl who was covered with baby fat, too.

And we had babies.

And they're all grown up now, and I'm an old fart with his memories and his Pall Malls. My name is Yon Yonson, I work in Wisconsin, I work in a lumbermill there.

Sometimes I try to call up old girl friends on the telephone late at night, after my wife has gone to bed. "Operator, I wonder if you could give me the number of a Mrs. So-and-So. I think she lives at such-and-such."

"I'm sorry, sir. There is no such listing."

"Thanks, Operator. Thanks just the same."

And I let the dog out, or I let him in, and we talk some. I let him know I like him, and he lets me know he likes me. He doesn't mind the smell of mustard gas and roses.

"You're all right, Sandy," I'll say to the dog. "You know that, Sandy? You're O.K."

Sometimes I'll turn on the radio and listen to a talk program from Boston or New York. I can't stand recorded music if I've been drinking a good deal.

Sooner or later I go to bed, and my wife asks me what time it is. She always has to know the time. Sometimes I don't know, and I say, "Search me."

I think about my education sometimes. I went to the University of Chicago for a while after the Second World War. I was a student in the Department of Anthropology. At that time, they were teaching that there was absolutely no difference between anybody. They may be teaching that still.

8. German Air Force.

Another thing they taught was that nobody was ridiculous or bad or disgusting. Shortly before my father died, he said to me, "You know—you never wrote a story with a villain in it."

I told him that was one of the things I learned in college after the war.

While I was studying to be an anthropologist, I was also working as a police reporter for the famous Chicago City News Bureau for twenty-eight dollars a week. One time they switched me from the night shift to the day shift, so I worked sixteen hours straight. We were supported by all the newspapers in town, and the AP and the UP⁹ and all that. And we would cover the courts and the police stations and the Fire Department and the Coast Guard out on Lake Michigan and all that. We were connected to the institutions that supported us by means of pneumatic tubes which ran under the streets of Chicago.

Reporters would telephone in stories to writers wearing headphones, and the writers would stencil the stories on mimeograph sheets. The stories were mimeographed and stuffed into the brass and velvet cartridges which the pneumatic tubes ate. The very toughest reporters and writers were women who had taken over the jobs of men who'd gone to war.

And the first story I covered I had to dictate over the telephone to one of those beastly girls. It was about a young veteran who had taken a job running an old-fashioned elevator in an office building. The elevator door on the first floor was ornamental iron lace. Iron ivy snaked in and out of the holes. There was an iron twig with two iron lovebirds perched upon it.

This veteran decided to take his car into the basement, and he closed the door and started down, but his wedding ring was caught in all the ornaments. So he was hoisted into the air and the floor of the car went down, dropped out from under him, and the top of the car squashed him. So it goes.

So I phoned this in, and the woman who was going to cut the stencil asked me, "What did his wife say?"

"She doesn't know yet," I said. "It just happened."

"Call her up and get a statement."

"What?"

"Tell her you're Captain Finn of the Police Department. Say you have some sad news. Give her the news, and see what she says."

So I did. She said about what you would expect her to say. There was a baby. And so on.

When I got back to the office, the woman writer asked me, just for her own information, what the squashed guy had looked like when he was squashed.

I told her.

"Did it bother you?" she said. She was eating a Three Musketeers Candy Bar.

"Heck no, Nancy," I said. "I've seen lots worse than that in the war."

Even then I was supposedly writing a book about Dresden. It wasn't a famous air raid back then in America. Not many Americans knew how much worse

9. Associated Press and United Press, rival wire news services subscribed to by various newspapers.

it had been than Hiroshima,¹ for instance. I didn't know that, either. There hadn't been much publicity.

I happened to tell a University of Chicago professor at a cocktail party about the raid as I had seen it, about the book I would write. He was a member of a thing called The Committee on Social Thought.² And he told me about the concentration camps, and about how the Germans had made soap and candles out of the fat of dead Jews and so on.

All I could say was, "I know, I know. I know."

World War Two had certainly made everybody very tough. And I became a public relations man for General Electric in Schenectady, New York, and a volunteer fireman in the village of Alplaus, where I bought my first home. My boss there was one of the toughest guys I ever hope to meet. He had been a lieutenant colonel in public relations in Baltimore. While I was in Schenectady he joined the Dutch Reformed Church, which is a very tough church, indeed.

He used to ask me sneeringly sometimes why I hadn't been an officer, as though I'd done something wrong.

My wife and I had lost our baby fat. Those were our scrawny years. We had a lot of scrawny veterans and their scrawny wives for friends. The nicest veterans in Schenectady, I thought, the kindest and funniest ones, the ones who hated war the most, were the ones who'd really fought.

I wrote the Air Force back then, asking for details about the raid on Dresden, who ordered it, how many planes did it, why they did it, what desirable results there had been and so on. I was answered by a man who, like myself, was in public relations. He said that he was sorry, but that the information was top secret still.

I read the letter out loud to my wife, and I said, "Secret? My God—from whom?"

We were United World Federalists back then. I don't know what we are now. Telephoners, I guess. We telephone a lot—or I do, anyway, late at night.

A couple of weeks after I telephoned my old war buddy, Bernard V. O'Hare, I really did go to see him. That must have been in 1964 or so—whatever the last year was for the New York World's Fair.³ Eheu, fugaces labuntur anni.⁴ My name is Yon Yonson. There was a young man from Stamboul.

I took two little girls with me, my daughter, Nanny, and her best friend, Allison Mitchell. They had never been off Cape Cod before. When we saw a river, we had to stop so they could stand by it and think about it for a while. They had never seen water in that long and narrow, unsalted form before. The river was the Hudson. There were carp in there and we saw them. They were as big as atomic submarines.

1. City in southwestern Japan destroyed on August 6, 1945, in the first atomic bombing, by the United States Army Air Force.

2. Prestigious interdisciplinary committee that includes the University of Chicago's most eminent professors.

3. The 1964 World's Fair was held at Flushing

Meadows, Queens, New York City, from April 22, 1964, to October 18, 1964, and again from April 21, 1965, to October 17, 1965.

4. Alas, the fleeting years are slipping by (Latin); from Ode 2.14 by the Roman poet Horace (65–8 B.C.E.).

We saw waterfalls, too, streams jumping off cliffs into the valley of the Delaware. There were lots of things to stop and see—and then it was time to go, always time to go. The little girls were wearing white party dresses and black party shoes, so strangers would know at once how nice they were. “Time to go, girls,” I’d say. And we would go.

And the sun went down, and we had supper in an Italian place, and then I knocked on the front door of the beautiful stone house of Bernard V. O’Hare. I was carrying a bottle of Irish whiskey like a dinner bell.

I met his nice wife, Mary, to whom I dedicate this book. I dedicate it to Gerhard Müller, the Dresden taxi driver, too. Mary O’Hare is a trained nurse, which is a lovely thing for a woman to be.

Mary admired the two little girls I’d brought, mixed them in with her own children, sent them all upstairs to play games and watch television. It was only after the children were gone that I sensed that Mary didn’t like me or didn’t like something about the night. She was polite but chilly.

“It’s a nice cozy house you have here,” I said, and it really was.

“I’ve fixed up a place where you can talk and not be bothered,” she said.

“Good,” I said, and I imagined two leather chairs near a fire in a paneled room, where two old soldiers could drink and talk. But she took us into the kitchen. She had put two straight-backed chairs at a kitchen table with a white porcelain top. That table top was screaming with reflected light from a two-hundred-watt bulb overhead. Mary had prepared an operating room. She put only one glass on it, which was for me. She explained that O’Hare couldn’t drink the hard stuff since the war.

So we sat down. O’Hare was embarrassed, but he wouldn’t tell me what was wrong. I couldn’t imagine what it was about me that could burn up Mary so. I was a family man. I’d been married only once. I wasn’t a drunk. I hadn’t done her husband any dirt in the war.

She fixed herself a Coca-Cola, made a lot of noise banging the ice-cube tray in the stainless steel sink. Then she went into another part of the house. But she wouldn’t sit still. She was moving all over the house, opening and shutting doors, even moving furniture around to work off anger.

I asked O’Hare what I’d said or done to make her act that way.

“It’s all right,” he said. “Don’t worry about it. It doesn’t have anything to do with you.” That was kind of him. He was lying. It had everything to do with me.

So we tried to ignore Mary and remember the war. I took a couple of belts of the booze I’d brought. We would chuckle or grin sometimes, as though war stories were coming back, but neither one of us could remember anything good. O’Hare remembered one guy who got into a lot of wine in Dresden, before it was bombed, and we had to take him home in a wheelbarrow. It wasn’t much to write a book about. I remembered two Russian soldiers who had looted a clock factory. They had a horse-drawn wagon full of clocks. They were happy and drunk. They were smoking huge cigarettes they had rolled in newspaper.

That was about it for memories, and Mary was still making noise. She finally came out in the kitchen again for another Coke. She took another tray of ice cubes from the refrigerator, banged it in the sink, even though there was already plenty of ice out.

Then she turned to me, let me see how angry she was, and that the anger was for me. She had been talking to herself, so what she said was a fragment of a much larger conversation. “You were just babies then!” she said.

“What?” I said.

“You were just babies in the war—like the ones upstairs!”

I nodded that this was true. We had been foolish virgins in the war, right at the end of childhood.

“But you’re not going to write it that way, are you.” This wasn’t a question. It was an accusation.

“I—I don’t know,” I said.

“Well, I know,” she said. “You’ll pretend you were men instead of babies, and you’ll be played in the movies by Frank Sinatra and John Wayne or some of those other glamorous, war-loving, dirty old men. And war will look just wonderful, so we’ll have a lot more of them. And they’ll be fought by babies like the babies upstairs.”

So then I understood. It was war that made her so angry. She didn’t want her babies or anybody else’s babies killed in wars. And she thought wars were partly encouraged by books and movies.

So I held up my right hand and I made her a promise: “Mary,” I said, “I don’t think this book of mine is ever going to be finished. I must have written five thousand pages by now, and thrown them all away. If I ever do finish it, though, I give you my word of honor: there won’t be a part for Frank Sinatra or John Wayne.

“I tell you what,” I said, “I’ll call it ‘The Children’s Crusade.’”

She was my friend after that.

O’Hare and I gave up on remembering, went into the living room, talked about other things. We became curious about the real Children’s Crusade, so O’Hare looked it up in a book he had, Extraordinary Popular Delusions and the Madness of Crowds, by Charles Mackay, LL.D.⁵ It was first published in London in 1841.

Mackay had a low opinion of all Crusades. The Children’s Crusade struck him as only slightly more sordid than the ten Crusades for grown-ups. O’Hare read this handsome passage out loud:

History in her solemn page informs us that the crusaders were but ignorant and savage men, that their motives were those of bigotry unmitigated, and that their pathway was one of blood and tears. Romance, on the other hand, dilates upon their piety and heroism, and portrays, in her most glowing and impassioned hues, their virtue and magnanimity, the imperishable honor they acquired for themselves, and the great services they rendered to Christianity.

And then O’Hare read this: Now what was the grand result of all these struggles? Europe expended millions of her treasures, and the blood of two million of her people; and a handful of quarrelsome knights retained possession of Palestine for about one hundred years!

Mackay told us that the Children’s Crusade started in 1213, when two monks got the idea of raising armies of children in Germany and France,

5. British poet (1814–1889), journalist, and editor (most famously of the Glasgow Argus from 1844 to 1848).

and selling them in North Africa as slaves. Thirty thousand children volunteered, thinking they were going to Palestine. They were no doubt idle and deserted children who generally swarm in great cities, nurtured on vice and daring, said Mackay, and ready for anything.

Pope Innocent the Third⁶ thought they were going to Palestine, too, and he was thrilled. “These children are awake while we are asleep!” he said.

Most of the children were shipped out of Marseilles,⁷ and about half of them drowned in shipwrecks. The other half got to North Africa where they were sold.

Through a misunderstanding, some children reported for duty at Genoa,⁸ where no slave ships were waiting. They were fed and sheltered and questioned kindly by good people there—then given a little money and a lot of advice and sent back home.

“Hooray for the good people of Genoa,” said Mary O’Hare.

I slept that night in one of the children’s bedrooms. O’Hare had put a book for me on the bedside table. It was Dresden, History, Stage and Gallery, by Mary Endell.⁹ It was published in 1908, and its introduction began:

It is hoped that this little book will make itself useful. It attempts to give to an English-reading public a bird’s-eye view of how Dresden came to look as it does, architecturally; of how it expanded musically, through the genius of a few men, to its present bloom; and it calls attention to certain permanent landmarks in art that make its Gallery the resort of those seeking lasting impressions.

I read some history further on:

Now, in 1760, Dresden underwent siege by the Prussians.¹ On the fifteenth of July began the cannonade. The Picture-Gallery took fire. Many of the paintings had been transported to the Königstein,² but some were seriously injured by splinters of bombshells,—notably Francia’s “Baptism of Christ.”³ Furthermore, the stately Kreuzkirche⁴ tower, from which the enemy’s movements had been watched day and night, stood in flames. It later succumbed. In sturdy contrast with the pitiful fate of the Kreuzkirche, stood the Frauenkirche,⁵ from the curves of whose stone dome the Prussian bombs rebounded like rain. Friedrich⁶ was obliged finally to give up the siege, because he learned of the fall of Glatz,⁷ the critical point of his new conquests. “We must be off to Silesia, so that we do not lose everything.”

The devastation of Dresden was boundless. When Goethe⁸ as a young student visited the city, he still found sad ruins: “Von der Kuppel der Frauenkirche sah ich diese leidigen Trümmer zwischen die schöne städtische Ordnung hineingesät, da rühmte mir der Küster die Kunst des Baumeisters, welcher Kirche und Kuppel auf einen so unerwünschten Fall schon eingerichtet und

6. Born Lotario dei Conti di Segni (c. 1160–1216); as Pope Innocent III, he organized the Fourth Crusade (which included the Children’s Crusade) in order to capture Muslim-controlled Jerusalem for Christendom.

7. Seaport in southern France.

8. Seaport in northwest Italy.

9. Dates and nationality unknown; writer of the introduction to this book, by the German illustrator Fritz August Gottfried Endell (1873–1955).

1. The Seven Years’ War (1756–63), in which England and Prussia defeated Austria, France, Russia, Sweden, and Saxony.

2. Fortress overlooking the town of the same name, on the Elbe’s left bank.

3. Painting (1509) by the Italian artist Francesco Raibolini (c. 1450–1517).

4. Church of the Cross (German).

5. Church of Our Lady (German).

6. Frederick II (1712–1786), known as the Great, ruler of Prussia (1740–86).

7. German name for the Polish city Klodzko in Lower Silesia, the southwestern region of today’s Poland.

8. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), German poet and dramatist.

bombenfest erbaut hatte. Der gute Sakristan deutete mir alsdann auf Ruinen nach allen Seiten und sagte bedenklich lakonisch: Das hat der Feind gethan!”⁹

The two little girls and I crossed the Delaware River where George Washington had crossed it,¹ the next morning. We went to the New York World’s Fair, saw what the past had been like, according to the Ford Motor Car Company and Walt Disney, saw what the future would be like, according to General Motors.

And I asked myself about the present: how wide it was, how deep it was, how much was mine to keep.

I taught creative writing in the famous Writers Workshop at the University of Iowa² for a couple of years after that. I got into some perfectly beautiful trouble, got out of it again. I taught in the afternoons. In the mornings I wrote. I was not to be disturbed. I was working on my famous book about Dresden.

And somewhere in there a nice man named Seymour Lawrence³ gave me a three-book contract, and I said, “O.K., the first of the three will be my famous book about Dresden.”

The friends of Seymour Lawrence call him “Sam.” And I say to Sam now: “Sam—here’s the book.”

It is so short and jumbled and jangled, Sam, because there is nothing intelligent to say about a massacre. Everybody is supposed to be dead, to never say anything or want anything ever again. Everything is supposed to be very quiet after a massacre, and it always is, except for the birds.

And what do the birds say? All there is to say about a massacre, things like “Poo-tee-weet?”

I have told my sons that they are not under any circumstances to take part in massacres, and that the news of massacres of enemies is not to fill them with satisfaction or glee.

I have also told them not to work for companies which make massacre machinery, and to express contempt for people who think we need machinery like that.

As I’ve said: I recently went back to Dresden with my friend O’Hare. We had a million laughs in Hamburg and West Berlin and East Berlin and Vienna and Salzburg and Helsinki, and in Leningrad, too. It was very good for me, because I saw a lot of authentic backgrounds for made-up stories which I will write later on. One of them will be “Russian Baroque” and another will

9. From the dome of the Church of Our Lady I saw those sad ruins strewn amidst the city’s lovely orderliness; at that point the sacristan praised the skill of the architect, who had seen to it that church and dome would withstand bombing should such an unfortunate situation occur. Then the good sacristan pointed out ruins in all directions and said in a pensive and laconic way: “The enemy did this!” (German).

1. Commanding the Continental Army during the American Revolution, George Washington

(1732–1799) crossed the Delaware River with his troops on December 25, 1776, an event depicted by the German-born American artist Emanuel Gottlieb Leutze (1816–1868) in his painting George Washington Crossing the Delaware (1851).

2. Creative writing program founded in 1936; the Famous Writers School of Greenwich, Connecticut, was a mail-order school in the 1960s.

3. American publisher (1926–1994) whose imprint was with the Delacorte Press.

be “No Kissing” and another will be “Dollar Bar” and another will be “If the Accident Will,” and so on.

And so on.

There was a Lufthansa⁴ plane that was supposed to fly from Philadelphia to Boston to Frankfurt. O’Hare was supposed to get on in Philadelphia and I was supposed to get on in Boston, and off we’d go. But Boston was socked in, so the plane flew straight to Frankfurt from Philadelphia. And I became a non-person in the Boston fog, and Lufthansa put me in a limousine with some other non-persons and sent us to a motel for a non-night.

The time would not pass. Somebody was playing with the clocks, and not only with the electric clocks, but the wind-up kind, too. The second hand on my watch would twitch once, and a year would pass, and then it would twitch again.

There was nothing I could do about it. As an Earthling, I had to believe whatever clocks said—and calendars.

I had two books with me, which I’d meant to read on the plane. One was Words for the Wind, by Theodore Roethke,⁵ and this is what I found in there:

*I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.
I feel my fate in what I cannot fear.
I learn by going where I have to go.*⁶

My other book was Erika Ostrovsky’s Céline and His Vision.⁷ Céline was a brave French soldier in the First World War—until his skull was cracked. After that he couldn’t sleep, and there were noises in his head. He became a doctor, and he treated poor people in the daytime, and he wrote grotesque novels all night. No art is possible without a dance with death, he wrote.

The truth is death, he wrote. I’ve fought nicely against it as long as I could . . . danced with it, festooned it, waltzed it around . . . decorated it with streamers, titillated it . . .

Time obsessed him. Miss Ostrovsky reminded me of the amazing scene in *Death on the Installment Plan*⁸ where Céline wants to stop the bustling of a street crowd. He screams on paper, Make them stop . . . don’t let them move anymore at all . . . There, make them freeze . . . once and for all! . . . So that they won’t disappear anymore!

I looked through the Gideon Bible in my motel room⁹ for tales of great destruction. The sun was risen upon the Earth when Lot entered into Zo-ar, I read. Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of Heaven; and He overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.

4. German national airline.

5. A 1957 collection by the American poet (1908–1963).

6. From Roethke’s 1953 poem “The Waking” (see p. 40).

7. A 1967 study, by the Austrian-born American critic (b. c. 1927) of modern French literature, of Louis-Ferdinand Destouches (1894–1961), French novelist writing under the pen name Louis-Ferdinand Céline.

8. Published in 1936.

9. The Gideons are a Christian traveling men’s association established in 1899 and active since 1908 in publishing Bibles and placing them in all hotel and motel rooms.

So it goes.

Those were vile people in both those cities, as is well known. The world was better off without them.

And Lot's wife, of course, was told not to look back where all those people and their homes had been. But she did look back, and I love her for that, because it was so human.

So she was turned to a pillar of salt. So it goes.

People aren't supposed to look back. I'm certainly not going to do it anymore. I've finished my war book now. The next one I write is going to be fun. This one is a failure, and had to be, since it was written by a pillar of salt. It begins like this:

Listen:

Billy Pilgrim has come unstuck in time.

It ends like this:

Poo-tee-weet?

1969

GRACE PALEY

1922–2007

“A Conversation with My Father” is not Grace Paley’s only story about a daughter’s visit with an elderly, terminally ill father. Like other repeated situations in her work, such visits enable Paley to explore nontraditional matters through traditional means, such as dialogue. Unlike her contemporaries whose concern with fiction making overshadows the situations their stories would otherwise convey, Paley directs her imaginative explanations to realistic events, in which larger social and moral issues reinforce her literary innovations. Her ability to adapt nontraditional techniques into realistic short stories makes her accessible to a readership otherwise unfriendly to the aesthetic solipsism of self-exploratory fiction (or “meta-fiction” as it has come to be called).

That Paley’s protagonist talks with her father rather than simply writing about him indicates an important characteristic: in such narratives the author wishes not to present a lecture (though figures in her stories sometimes give them) but rather to achieve an understanding through dialogue. This dialectic quality is evident in the stories in her first collection, The Little Disturbances of Man (1959), some of which draw on situations first encountered when adapting to marriage and family life in the difficult circumstances of an army camp. By the time of Enormous Changes at the Last Minute (1974) Paley had developed her most noteworthy theme, that of women (often single mothers) building satisfactory relationships with the world around them by talking with each other (and sometimes to themselves). The title story from this second collection also shows Paley expanding her language to include an almost poetic phraseology whose facility with metaphors and similes makes much of her narrative action happen directly on the page. Here a father, the same father, is recalled as a child first seeing the American flag, then as a young immigrant taking advantage of what that symbol represents: “Under its protection and working like a horse, he’d read Dickens, gone to medical school, and shot like a surface-to-air missile right into the middle class.” By making a comparison to current military technology erupt from the sentence’s quaint, almost century-old references, Paley startles her reader and employs a kind of alternative narrative action.

Grace Paley was born in New York City, the child of Russian Jewish immigrants from Ukraine. She attended Hunter College, but graduated from the Merchants and Bankers Business and Secretarial School. Married during college, she had two children and was later divorced, not remarrying until 1972. During the 1950s she became an activist for social issues, first working to close Washington Square (in her Greenwich Village neighborhood) to traffic, later protesting the Vietnam War; in 1978 she was arrested on the White House lawn in a demonstration against nuclear weapons. The success of Enormous Changes at the Last Minute drew the attention of other writers to her, and throughout the 1970s and 1980s she was a regular participant on literary panels with innovative fictionalists such as Donald Barthelme and William H. Gass. Her third collection, Later the Same Day (1985), continued her method of using metafictional techniques for writing otherwise realistic short stories. In the front matter of Enormous Changes at the Last Minute, where a disclaimer about correspondences between fact and fiction would customarily appear, she posted this warning: “Everyone in this book is imagined into life except the father. No matter what story he has to live in, he’s my father, I. Goodside, M.D., artist, and storyteller.”

Paley also published several volumes of poetry; like her short stories, Paley’s poems are marked by their humor, observations of life, and humanity of voice. “Here” is a late, lovely example of her gifts as a poet. In addition, Paley wrote direct social commentary. Especially noteworthy was her essay in the September 1975 issue of Ms. magazine, “Other People’s Children,” objecting to the massive and hurried evacuation of South Vietnamese children during the Vietnam War’s last days on the grounds that mothers’ rights and interests were grossly violated.

The text below is from Enormous Changes at the Last Minute (1974).

A Conversation with My Father

My father is eighty-six years old and in bed. His heart, that bloody motor, is equally old and will not do certain jobs any more. It still floods his head with brainy light. But it won’t let his legs carry the weight of his body around the house. Despite my metaphors, his muscle failure is not due to his old heart, he says, but to a potassium shortage. Sitting on one pillow, leaning on three, he offers last-minute advice and makes a request.

“I would like you to write a simple story just once more,” he says, “the kind de Maupassant wrote, or Chekhov,¹ the kind you used to write. Just recognizable people and then write down what happened to them next.”

I say, “Yes, why not? That’s possible.” I want to please him, though I don’t remember writing that way. I would like to try to tell such a story, if he means the kind that begins: “There was a woman . . .” followed by plot, the absolute line between two points which I’ve always despised. Not for literary reasons, but because it takes all hope away. Everyone, real or invented, deserves the open destiny of life.

1. Anton Chekhov (1860–1904), Russian dramatist and story writer, whose characters often discuss moral nuances at length. Guy de Maupassant (1850–1893), French author of well-made sentimental stories and novels.

Finally I thought of a story that had been happening for a couple of years right across the street. I wrote it down, then read it aloud. "Pa," I said, "how about this? Do you mean something like this?"

Once in my time there was a woman and she had a son. They lived nicely, in a small apartment in Manhattan. This boy at about fifteen became a junkie, which is not unusual in our neighborhood. In order to maintain her close friendship with him, she became a junkie too. She said it was part of the youth culture, with which she felt very much at home. After a while, for a number of reasons, the boy gave it all up and left the city and his mother in disgust. Hopeless and alone, she grieved. We all visit her.

"O.K., Pa, that's it," I said, "an unadorned and miserable tale."

"But that's not what I mean," my father said. "You misunderstood me on purpose. You know there's a lot more to it. You know that. You left everything out. Turgenev² wouldn't do that. Chekhov wouldn't do that. There are in fact Russian writers you never heard of, you don't have an inkling of, as good as anyone, who can write a plain ordinary story, who would not leave out what you have left out. I object not to facts but to people sitting in trees talking senselessly, voices from who knows where . . ."

"Forget that one, Pa, what have I left out now? In this one?"

"Her looks, for instance."

"Oh. Quite handsome, I think. Yes."

"Her hair?"

"Dark, with heavy braids, as though she were a girl or a foreigner."

"What were her parents like, her stock? That she became such a person. It's interesting, you know."

"From out of town. Professional people. The first to be divorced in their country. How's that? Enough?" I asked.

"With you, it's all a joke," he said. "What about the boy's father? Why didn't you mention him? Who was he? Or was the boy born out of wedlock?"

"Yes," I said. "He was born out of wedlock."

"For God's sake, doesn't anyone in your stories get married? Doesn't anyone have the time to run down to City Hall before they jump into bed?"

"No," I said. "In real life, yes. But in my stories, no."

"Why do you answer me like that?"

"Oh, Pa, this is a simple story about a smart woman who came to N.Y.C. full of interest love trust excitement very up to date, and about her son, what a hard time she had in this world. Married or not, it's of small consequence."

"It is of great consequence," he said.

"O.K.," I said.

"O.K. O.K. yourself," he said, "but listen. I believe you that she's good-looking, but I don't think she was so smart."

"That's true," I said. "Actually that's the trouble with stories. People start out fantastic. You think they are extraordinary, but it turns out as the work goes along, they're just average with a good education. Sometimes the other way around, the person's a kind of dumb innocent, but he outwits you and you can't even think of an ending good enough."

2. Ivan Turgenev (1818–1883), Russian novelist noted for his tragic vision.

"What do you do then?" he asked. He had been a doctor for a couple of decades and then an artist for a couple of decades and he's still interested in details, craft, technique.

"Well, you just have to let the story lie around till some agreement can be reached between you and the stubborn hero."

"Aren't you talking silly, now?" he asked. "Start again," he said. "It so happens I'm not going out this evening. Tell the story again. See what you can do this time."

"O.K.," I said. "But it's not a five-minute job." Second attempt:

Once, across the street from us, there was a fine handsome woman, our neighbor. She had a son whom she loved because she'd known him since birth (in helpless chubby infancy, and in the wrestling, hugging ages, seven to ten, as well as earlier and later). This boy, when he fell into the fist of adolescence, became a junkie. He was not a hopeless one. He was in fact hopeful, an ideologue and successful converter. With his busy brilliance, he wrote persuasive articles for his high-school newspaper. Seeking a wider audience, using important connections, he drummed into Lower Manhattan newsstand distribution a periodical called *Oh! Golden Horse!*³

In order to keep him from feeling guilty (because guilt is the stony heart of nine tenths of all clinically diagnosed cancers in America today, she said), and because she had always believed in giving bad habits room at home where one could keep an eye on them, she too became a junkie. Her kitchen was famous for a while—a center for intellectual addicts who knew what they were doing. A few felt artistic like Coleridge and others were scientific and revolutionary like Leary.⁴ Although she was often high herself, certain good mothering reflexes remained, and she saw to it that there was lots of orange juice around and honey and milk and vitamin pills. However, she never cooked anything but chili, and that no more than once a week. She explained, when we talked to her, seriously, with neighborly concern, that it was her part in the youth culture and she would rather be with the young, it was an honor, than with her own generation.

One week, while nodding through an Antonioni film,⁵ this boy was severely jabbed by the elbow of a stern and proselytizing girl, sitting beside him. She offered immediate apricots and nuts for his sugar level, spoke to him sharply, and took him home.

She had heard of him and his work and she herself published, edited, and wrote a competitive journal called Man Does Live By Bread Alone. In the organic heat of her continuous presence he could not help but become interested once more in his muscles, his arteries, and nerve

3. "Horse" is slang for heroin.

4. Timothy Leary (1920–1996), American psychologist who in the 1960s encouraged experimentation with hallucinogenic drugs. Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834), English poet who wrote "Kubla Khan" under the influence of opium.

5. Michelangelo Antonioni (1912–2007), Italian filmmaker known for his intellectual style. The boy could be "nodding" in response to the film or the heroin.

connections. In fact he began to love them, treasure them, praise them with funny little songs in Man Does Live . . .

*the fingers of my flesh transcend my transcendental soul
the tightness in my shoulders end my teeth have made me whole*

To the mouth of his head (that glory of will and determination) he brought hard apples, nuts, wheat germ, and soybean oil. He said to his old friends, from now on, I guess I'll keep my wits about me. I'm going on the natch. He said he was about to begin a spiritual deep-breathing journey. How about you too, Mom? he asked kindly.

His conversion was so radiant, splendid, that neighborhood kids his age began to say that he had never been a real addict at all, only a journalist along for the smell of the story. The mother tried several times to give up what had become without her son and his friends a lonely habit. This effort only brought it to supportable levels. The boy and his girl took their electronic mimeograph and moved to the bushy edge of another borough. They were very strict. They said they would not see her again until she had been off drugs for sixty days.

At home alone in the evening, weeping, the mother read and reread the seven issues of Oh! Golden Horse! They seemed to her as truthful as ever. We often crossed the street to visit and console. But if we mentioned any of our children who were at college or in the hospital or dropouts at home, she would cry out, My baby! My baby! and burst into terrible, face-scarring, time-consuming tears. The End.

First my father was silent, then he said, "Number One: You have a nice sense of humor. Number Two: I see you can't tell a plain story. So don't waste time." Then he said sadly, "Number Three: I suppose that means she was alone, she was left like that, his mother. Alone. Probably sick?"

I said, "Yes."

"Poor woman. Poor girl, to be born in a time of fools to live among fools. The end. The end. You were right to put that down. The end."

I didn't want to argue, but I had to say, "Well, it is not necessarily the end, Pa."

"Yes," he said, "what a tragedy. The end of a person."

"No, Pa," I begged him. "It doesn't have to be. She's only about forty. She could be a hundred different things in this world as time goes on. A teacher or a social worker. An ex-junkie! Sometimes it's better than having a master's in education."

"Jokes," he said. "As a writer that's your main trouble. You don't want to recognize it. Tragedy! Plain tragedy! Historical tragedy! No hope. The end."

"Oh, Pa," I said. "She could change."

"In your own life, too, you have to look it in the face."

He took a couple of nitroglycerin. "Turn to five," he said, pointing to the dial on the oxygen tank. He inserted the tubes into his nostrils and breathed deep. He closed his eyes and said, "No."

I had promised the family to always let him have the last word when arguing, but in this case I had a different responsibility. That woman lives across the street. She's my knowledge and my invention. I'm sorry for her. I'm not going to leave her there in that house crying. (Actually neither would Life, which unlike me has no pity.)

Therefore: She did change. Of course her son never came home again. But right now, she's the receptionist in a storefront community clinic in the East Village.⁶ Most of the customers are young people, some old friends. The head doctor has said to her, "If we only had three people in this clinic with your experiences . . ."

"The doctor said that?" My father took the oxygen tubes out of his nostrils and said, "Jokes. Jokes again."

"No, Pa, it could really happen that way, it's a funny world nowadays."

"No," he said. "Truth first. She will slide back. A person must have character. She does not."

"No, Pa," I said. "That's it. She's got a job. Forget it. She's in that storefront working."

"How long will it be?" he asked. "Tragedy! You too. When will you look it in the face?"

1974

Here

Here I am in the garden laughing an old woman with heavy breasts and a nicely mapped face

how did this happen
well that's who I wanted to be 5

at last a woman
in the old style sitting stout thighs apart under a big skirt grandchild sliding on off my lap a pleasant 10 summer perspiration

that's my old man across the yard he's talking to the meter reader¹ he's telling him the world's sad story how electricity is oil or uranium 15 and so forth I tell my grandson

6. Immigrant neighborhood east of Greenwich Village in lower Manhattan that in the 1960s became home to an antiestablishment youth counterculture.

1. A utilities worker who reads electric, gas, water, or steam consumption meters and records the volume used.

run over to your grandpa ask him to sit beside me for a minute I am suddenly exhausted by my desire to kiss his sweet explaining lips

20

2000

JAMES DICKEY

1923–1997

James Dickey was born in Atlanta, Georgia, and grew up in one of its suburbs, where he was a high school football star and a self-professed “wild motorcycle rider.” After a year (1942) at Clemson College in South Carolina, he enlisted in the army air force. As a young man he had admired the English Romantic poet Byron, largely for what he symbolized: bold, masculine swagger and a love of martial and sexual adventure. During off-hours from combat missions in the South Pacific, Dickey began to frequent wartime libraries, where he read writers like Herman Melville and James Agee and explored anthologies of modern poetry. After the war, at Vanderbilt University and through the encouragement of one of his professors, Dickey began seriously writing poetry.

His first published poem appeared in Sewanee Review while he was still a college senior; his first book of verse, Into the Stone, appeared in 1960. From that time Dickey consistently regarded poetry as the center of his career, although he was at different periods an advertising man for Coca-Cola in New York and Atlanta, a college teacher, a training officer for pilots during the Korean War, a best-selling novelist (Deliverance, 1970), and a screenwriter (adapting Deliverance for Hollywood).

Dickey’s work examines the heroic and sometimes excessive figure of the self in moments of crisis or danger. It shows a desire to ascend beyond the human world, to resist the downward pull of mortality in ways that may remind us of the modern American poet Hart Crane. In the title poem of his volume Drowning with Others (1962), for example, the speaker imagines the moment when a man feels “my own wingblades spring,” and finds himself “rising and singing / With my last breath,” free of the “down-soaring dead.” Helmets (1964) includes a powerful group of war poems in which Dickey struggles for a vision that will allow him to transcend death. In other earlier work he often explores the instinctual and unconscious aspect of experience and sometimes identifies with totemic animals, as in “The Heaven of Animals,” where he envisions a world in which “Their instincts wholly bloom / And they rise. / The soft eyes open.”

In Dickey’s earlier poems the speaker was primarily an observer, describing as if from outside these states of animal and instinctual grace. The poet tended to write in short lines—three accents or beats per line. With Buckdancer’s Choice (1965) Dickey became interested in longer “split lines,” which he used from then on. The line of verse is splintered into phrases, each group of words separated from the next by spaces designed to take the place of punctuation. The purpose is to approximate the way the mind “associates in bursts of words, in jumps.” Instead of being spoken by a distanced observer, the poem is placed within the mind of someone caught in a moment of crisis or excitement.

One of his most central later poems written in the longer line is “Falling,” with its rendering of the consciousness of a stewardess who falls from an airplane into space. Like the earlier “Drowning with Others,” this poem confirms the importance in Dickey’s work of flight, that figure for the self’s transcendence of mortality. In “Falling” he gives us the woman’s “superhuman act” as she drifts above the tiny human world and possesses, for those moments, a godlike vision. Yet even as Dickey’s poem suspends the moment of falling, it admits the pull of gravity that brings the woman closer and closer to the ground and to her death. “Falling” expresses Dickey’s enduring interest in danger and in the immortal longings of the titanic self.

Dickey’s interest in violence and power as subjects is suggested by the apocalyptic title of his 1970 volume The Eye Beaters, Blood, Victory, Madness, Buckhead and Mercy, and many of his later poems are designed to administer shocks to the reader’s system. Dickey enjoyed cutting a flamboyant public figure with a reputation for hard drinking and fast motorcycles. He also enjoyed being a publicist for the life of the poet, as if he were a latter-day Byron, sometimes situating himself in a paradoxical cross between serious literary criticism and advertisements for himself. He published the series Self-Interviews as well as a penetrating collection of reviews of other poets, Babel to Byzantium (1968). In 1966–68 he was consultant in poetry at the Library of Congress, the position later known as poet laureate of the United States.

Drowning with Others

There are moments a man turns from us
Whom we have all known until now.
Upgathered, we watch him grow,
Unshipping his shoulder bones

Like human, everyday wings 5
That he has not ever used,
Releasing his hair from his brain,
A kingfisher’s crest, confused

By the God-tilted light of Heaven.
His deep, window-watching smile 10
Comes closely upon us in waves,
And spreads, and now we are

At last within it, dancing.
Slowly we turn and shine
Upon what is holding us, 15
As under our feet he soars,

Struck dumb as the angel of Eden,¹
In wide, eye-opening rings.
Yet the hand on my shoulder fears
To feel my own wingblades spring, 20

1. Probably the cherub who guards the entrance to the Garden of Eden after Adam and Eve have been banished (Genesis 3.24).

To feel me sink slowly away
 In my hair turned loose like a thought
 Of a fisherbird dying in flight.
 If I opened my arms, I could hear

Every shell in the sea find the word 25
 It has tried to put into my mouth.
 Broad flight would become of my dancing,
 And I would obsess the whole sea,

But I keep rising and singing
 With my last breath. Upon my back, 30
 With his hand on my unborn wing,
 A man rests easy as sunlight

Who has kept himself free of the forms
 Of the deaf, down-soaring dead,
 And me laid out and alive 35
 For nothing at all, in his arms.

1962

The Heaven of Animals

Here they are. The soft eyes open.
 If they have lived in a wood
 It is a wood.
 If they have lived on plains
 It is grass rolling 5
 Under their feet forever.

Having no souls, they have come,
 Anyway, beyond their knowing.
 Their instincts wholly bloom
 And they rise. 10
 The soft eyes open.

To match them, the landscape flowers,
 Outdoing, desperately
 Outdoing what is required:
 The richest wood, 15
 The deepest field.

For some of these,
 It could not be the place
 It is, without blood.
 These hunt, as they have done, 20
 But with claws and teeth grown perfect,

More deadly than they can believe.
 They stalk more silently,

And crouch on the limbs of trees,
 And their descent 25
 Upon the bright backs of their prey

May take years
 In a sovereign floating of joy.
 And those that are hunted
 Know this as their life, 30
 Their reward: to walk

Under such trees in full knowledge
 Of what is in glory above them,
 And to feel no fear,
 But acceptance, compliance. 35
 Fulfilling themselves without pain

At the cycle's center,
 They tremble, they walk
 Under the tree,
 They fall, they are torn, 40
 They rise, they walk again.

1962

Falling

"A 29-year-old stewardess fell . . . to her death tonight when she was swept through an emergency door that suddenly sprang open. . . . The body . . . was found . . . three hours after the accident."

—New York Times

The states when they black out and lie there rolling when they turn
 To something transcontinental move by drawing moonlight out of the great
 One-sided stone hung off the starboard wingtip some sleeper next to An engine is groaning for coffee and there is faintly coming in Somewhere the vast beast-whistle of space. In the galley with its racks 5
 Of trays she rummages for a blanket and moves in her slim tailored Uniform to pin it over the cry at the top of the door. As though she blew

The door down with a silent blast from her lungs frozen she is black Out finding herself with the plane nowhere and her body taking by the throat
 The undying cry of the void falling living beginning to be something 10
 That no one has ever been and lived through screaming without enough air
 Still neat lipsticked stockings girdled by regulation her hat
 Still on her arms and legs in no world and yet spaced also strangely
 With utter placid rightness on thin air taking her time she holds it
 In many places and now, still thousands of feet from her death she seems 15
 To slow she develops interest she turns in her maneuverable body

To watch it. She is hung high up in the overwhelming middle of things in her Self in low body-whistling wrapped intensely in all her dark dance-weight
 Coming down from a marvelous leap with the delaying, dumfounding ease
 Of a dream of being drawn like endless moonlight to the harvest soil 20
 Of a central state of one's country with a great gradual warmth coming Over her floating finding more and more breath in what she has been using
 For breath as the levels become more human seeing clouds placed honestly
 Below her left and right riding slowly toward them she clasps it all
 To her and can hang her hands and feet in it in peculiar ways and 25
 Her eyes opened wide by wind, can open her mouth as wide wider and suck
 All the heat from the cornfields can go down on her back with a feeling Of stupendous pillows stacked under her and can turn turn as to someone
 In bed smile, understood in darkness can go away slant slide
 Off tumbling into the emblem of a bird with its wings half-spread 30
 Or whirl madly on herself in endless gymnastics in the growing warmth
 Of wheatfields rising toward the harvest moon. There is time to live
 In superhuman health seeing mortal unreachable lights far down seeing An ultimate highway with one late priceless car probing it arriving
 In a square town and off her starboard arm the glitter of water catches 35
 The moon by its own shaken side scaled, roaming silver My God it is good
 And evil lying in one after another of all the positions for love
 Making dancing sleeping and now cloud wisps at her no
 Raincoat no matter all small towns brokenly brighter from inside
 Cloud she walks over them like rain bursts out to behold a Greyhound 40
 Bus shooting light through its sides it is the signal to go straight Down like a glorious diver then feet first her skirt stripped beautifully
 Up her face in fear-scented cloths her legs deliriously bare then Arms out she slow-rolls over steadies out waits for something great
 To take control of her trembles near feathers planes head-down 45
 The quick movements of bird-necks turning her head gold eyes the insighteyesight of owls blazing into the hencoops a taste for chicken overwhelming
 Her the long-range vision of hawks enlarging all human lights of cars
 Freight trains looped bridges enlarging the moon racing slowly
 Through all the curves of a river all the darks of the midwest blazing 50
 From above. A rabbit in a bush turns white the smothering chickens
 Huddle for over them there is still time for something to live
 With the streaming half-idea of a long stoop a hurtling a fall
 That is controlled that plummets as it wills turns gravity
 Into a new condition, showing its other side like a moon shining 55
 New Powers there is still time to live on a breath made of nothing
 But the whole night time for her to remember to arrange her skirt

Like a diagram of a bat tightly it guides her she has this flying-skin
 Made of garments and there are also those sky-divers on TV sailing
 In sunlight smiling under their goggles swapping batons back and forth 60

And He who jumped without a chute and was handed one by a diving
 Buddy. She looks for her grinning companion white teeth nowhere
 She is screaming singing hymns her thin human wings spread out
 From her neat shoulders the air beast-crooning to her warbling
 And she can no longer behold the huge partial form of the world now 65
 She is watching her country lose its evoked master shape watching it lose
 And gain get back its houses and peoples watching it bring up
 Its local lights single homes lamps on barn roofs if she fell
 Into water she might live like a diver cleaving perfect plunge

Into another heavy silver unbreathable slowing saving 70
 Element: there is water there is time to perfect all the fine
 Points of diving feet together toes pointed hands shaped right
 To insert her into water like a needle to come out healthily dripping
 And be handed a Coca-Cola there they are there are the waters
 Of life the moon packed and coiled in a reservoir so let me begin 75
To plane across the night air of Kansas opening my eyes superhumanly
Bright to the damned moon opening the natural wings of my jacket
By Don Loper¹ moving like a hunting owl toward the glitter of water
One cannot just fall just tumble screaming all that time one must use
 It she is now through with all through all clouds damp hair 80
 Straightened the last wisp of fog pulled apart on her face like wool revealing

New darks new progressions of headlights along dirt roads from chaos

And night a gradual warming a new-made, inevitable world of one's own

Country a great stone of light in its waiting waters hold hold out
 For water: who knows when what correct young woman must take up her body 85

And fly and head for the moon-crazed inner eye of midwest imprisoned
 Water stored up for her for years the arms of her jacket slipping
 Air up her sleeves to go all over her? What final things can be said
 Of one who starts out sheerly in her body in the high middle of night
 Air to track down water like a rabbit where it lies like life itself 90
 Off to the right in Kansas? She goes toward the blazing-bare lake
 Her skirts neat her hands and face warmed more and more by the air
 Rising from pastures of beans and under her under chenille bedspreads
 The farm girls are feeling the goddess in them struggle and rise brooding
 On the scratch-shining posts of the bed dreaming of female signs 95
 Of the moon male blood like iron of what is really said by the moan
 Of airliners passing over them at dead of midwest midnight passing
 Over brush fires burning out in silence on little hills and will wake
 To see the woman they should be struggling on the roof-tree to become Stars: for her the ground is closer water is nearer she passes 100

1. Hollywood costume and clothing designer (1906–1972).

It then banks turns her sleeves fluttering differently as she rolls
 Out to face the east, where the sun shall come up from wheatfields she must

Do something with water fly to it fall in it drink it rise
 From it but there is none left upon earth the clouds have drunk it back
 The plants have sucked it down there are standing toward her only 105
 The common fields of death she comes back from flying to falling
 Returns to a powerful cry the silent scream with which she blew down
 The coupled door of the airliner nearly nearly losing hold
 Of what she has done remembers remembers the shape at the heart
 Of cloud fashionably swirling remembers she still has time to die 110 Beyond explanation. Let her now take off her hat in summer air the coutour

Of cornfields and have enough time to kick off her one remaining
 Shoe with the toes of the other foot to unhook her stockings
 With calm fingers, noting how fatally easy it is to undress in midair
 Near death when the body will assume without effort any position 115
 Except the one that will sustain it enable it to rise live
 Not die nine farms hover close widen eight of them separate, leaving
 One in the middle then the fields of that farm do the same there is no Way to back off from her chosen ground but she sheds the jacket
 With its silver sad impotent wings sheds the bat's guiding tailpiece 120
 Of her skirt the lightning-charged clinging of her blouse the intimate Inner flying-garment of her slip in which she rides like the holy ghost
 Of a virgin sheds the long windsocks of her stockings absurd
 Brassiere then feels the girdle required by regulations squirming
 Off her: no longer monobuttocked she feels the girdle flutter shake 125
 In her hand and float upward her clothes rising off her ascending
 Into cloud and fights away from her head the last sharp dangerous shoe
 Like a dumb bird and now will drop in SOON now will drop

In like this the greatest thing that ever came to Kansas down from all Heights all levels of American breath layered in the lungs from the frail 130

Chill of space to the loam where extinction slumbers in corn tassels thickly
 And breathes like rich farmers counting: will come among them after Her last superhuman act the last slow careful passing of her hands
 All over her unharmed body desired by every sleeper in his dream:
 Boys finding for the first time their loins filled with heart's blood 135
 Widowed farmers whose hands float under light covers to find themselves
 Arisen at sunrise the splendid position of blood unearthly drawn
 Toward clouds all feel something pass over them as she passes
 Her palms over her long legs her small breasts and deeply between Her thighs her hair shot loose from all pins streaming in the wind 140
 Of her body let her come openly trying at the last second to land
 On her back This is it THIS

All those who find her impressed
 In the soft loam gone down driven well into the image of her body
 The furrows for miles flowing in upon her where she lies very deep 145
 In her mortal outline in the earth as it is in cloud can tell nothing
 But that she is there inexplicable unquestionable and remember
 That something broke in them as well and began to live and die more

When they walked for no reason into their fields to where the whole earth Caught her interrupted her maiden flight told her how to lie she cannot

150

Turn go away cannot move cannot slide off it and assume another Position no sky-diver with any grin could save her hold her in his arms
 Plummet with her unfold above her his wedding silks she can no longer
 Mark the rain with whirling women that take the place of a dead wife
 Or the goddess in Norwegian farm girls or all the back-breaking whores 155
 Of Wichita. All the known air above her is not giving up quite one Breath it is all gone and yet not dead not anywhere else
 Quite lying still in the field on her back sensing the smells
 Of incessant growth try to lift her a little sight left in the corner
 Of one eye fading seeing something wave lies believing 160
 That she could have made it at the best part of her brief goddess
 State to water gone in headfirst come out smiling invulnerable
 Girl in a bathing-suit ad but she is lying like a sunbather at the last
 Of moonlight half-buried in her impact on the earth not far
 From a railroad trestle a water tank she could see if she could 165
 Raise her head from her modest hole with her clothes beginning
 To come down all over Kansas into bushes on the dewy sixth green
 Of a golf course one shoe her girdle coming down fantastically
 On a clothesline, where it belongs her blouse on a lightning rod:

Lies in the fields in this field on her broken back as though on 170
 A cloud she cannot drop through while farmers sleepwalk without Their women from houses a walk like falling toward the far waters
 Of life in moonlight toward the dreamed eternal meaning of their farms
 Toward the flowering of the harvest in their hands that tragic cost
 Feels herself go go toward go outward breathes at last fully 175
 Not and tries less once tries tries AH, GOD—

Postmodern Manifestos

The manifesto speaks in the voice of the true believer. But as the selections in this cluster show, manifestos do not always take themselves completely seriously even while—or we might say, especially because—they seek to overturn ideas that many hold dear. Whether these are prevailing ideas about art and what it should do, about people and how they might relate to each other, or about the very essence of a human being, sometimes the would-be reformer has to make fun first, just to loosen things up. Ranging, then, from the earnest to the jokey, and always driven by the energy of change, the genre of the literary manifesto is itself a literary form. All the examples of the genre here are written by literary artists experienced in the craft of writing and, for the dramatists, in the craft of creating performances.

In the twentieth century, the manifesto was an especially popular form in the early years (the 1910s and '20s) and in the 1960s and '70s. At each moment, writers felt that the forms of art had become, for one reason or another, constraining. Despite this feeling of constraint, in each case the artistic vanguard believed that existing forms of art contained the ingredients for a new artistic era. Taken together, the pieces gathered here look to four aspects of literary form for the engine of change: the process of making that the medium requires; the conceptual aspects of the medium; the social aspects of the medium; and perhaps most important, the material aspects of the medium (which means words and the physical acts and things that may be combined with words—including breathing and moving, staging and props, and, of course, paper). The writers in this cluster suggest how writers might tap into these aspects of their art to create a new vision of what art can be and do.

Feeling stifled under modernist formalism and the mainstream culture of the 1950s, many poets sought a return to the “unstructured places of being” that A. R. Ammons has called poetry’s true source. After several decades in which impersonality and objectivity were the key values in poetry criticism, poets shifted the focus from the poem as artifact (the “well-wrought urn,” in the critic Cleanth Brooks’s phrase) to the poem as open-ended process, an activity, as Ammons suggests, that is like the physical act of walking or, for the poet Charles Olson, that is rooted in the acts of breathing and voicing. The unconscious began to take up a larger place in poetry, and accident and chance became, at times, structuring principles, as we see in some of Ammons’s poems. A similar emphasis on process informed the work of the abstract expressionist painters, avant-garde theater companies, and improvisatory groups of jazz musicians. The jazz trumpeter Charlie “Bird” Parker, known for his kinetic musical explorations, became for many writers a model of artistic activity. When Olson, in his manifesto “Projective Verse,” described poetry as a “transfer of energy” he revealed the implicit physiology underlying this new paradigm; the shift from artifact to process relocated poetry in the body, with its breath, movement, and changes. For some poets and dramatists—like Audre Lorde or Charles Ludlam—a focus on the body as an element of artistic process allowed the artist to explore experiences that had been silenced or made taboo. In many cases tapping into the energy of the body led directly to the erotic, as is clear in Frank O’Hara’s remark that the appeal of poetic measure is like buying a “pair of pants . . . tight enough so everyone will want to go to bed with you.”

The rejection of traditional form—that “well-wrought urn”—did not mean, however, that form was rejected wholesale in favor of process during this period. The very physicality of process extended to a new awareness of form’s physicality. When Ronald Sukenick says that the novel “must make maximum expressive use of all elements of the printed page, including the relation of print to blank space," he is resisting the ease of realist fiction that invites the reader to forget that what he or she is reading is made of words. William Gass imagines "concepts" as the specific stuff out of which fiction is made, but treats concepts as a special kind of materiality—a materiality that "stains the fingers" like paint, even while concepts aspire to the abstract purity of mathematics. Richard Foreman seeks to explore the materiality of both objects and bodies on the stage, and similarly rejects the traditional sorts of emotional immersion that drive both plays and novels. He calls for an "engine" for drama that is somehow internal to the material form itself and to the spectator's physical, material, and sensory experience of it.

Art is for other human beings, and it speaks to our human experience of life. This fact drives the charming sociality of O'Hara's "personism"—which began as a joke between friends—and the urgent seriousness of Lorde's desire to make language new so that experience shut out of language could be made visible and sayable between persons. Ludlam's manifesto, like his theatrical practice, looks toward the interaction between audience and performance for that electric energy that can unsettle settled ideas. The manifesto is meant to be usable, something that can be activated, its fresh ideas entering the social world through speaking, thinking, writing, breathing bodies as they make and share art.

RONALD SUKENICK

Ronald Sukenick (1932–2004) was an innovative fictionist, beginning with his novel Up (1968). As the title of his collection The Death of the Novel and Other Stories (1969) suggests, he viewed critical theory about fiction as just one more story, with neither more nor less credibility than any other work of the imagination. As he argues in the text reprinted here, adapted from a publicity release he prepared for his second novel, Out (1973), and collected in his In Form: Digressions on the Act of Fiction (1985), fictive narrative is not about something but is something—not a representation of the world but something added to that world as another object to be encountered. This approach not only stands traditional mimesis on its head but argues that representation in fiction is fundamentally dishonest—a fraudulent totalization that misrepresents reality. What is reality? For Sukenick, in his story collections and novels that reached through the 1980s and 1990s to conclude with the posthumously published Last Fall (2005), fiction was above all an activity, a self-conscious act of creating a literary work with no illusions about the nature of its making. All aspects of his career focused on this purpose, including his teaching of creative writing (at the University of Colorado), his encouragement of independent publishing through the Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines, and his founding of the American Book Review in 1977 as an alternative to establishment journalism.

Innovative Fiction / Innovative Criteria

It seems strange to have to talk about innovation in fiction, but the American novel until the end of the sixties was so static that we have not yet fully understood how parochial and narrow the accepted literary norm for fiction had become.

Properly speaking, there is no such thing as “innovative fiction.” The novel is innovation—it is not called the “novel” for nothing. Fiction is the most fluid and changing of literary forms, the one that most immediately reflects the changes in our collective consciousness, and in fact that is one of its great virtues. As soon as fiction gets frozen into one particular model, it loses that responsiveness to our immediate experience that is its hallmark. It becomes literary. It seems to me that this is one of the major factors contributing to the recent decline in the popularity of fiction: people no longer believe in the novel as a medium that gets at the truth of their lives.

The form of fiction that comes down to us through Jane Austen, George Eliot, and Hemingway¹ is no longer adequate to capture our experience. Either the novel will change, or it will die. Today’s money-making novels are those that sell to the movies—in other words, they are essentially written for another medium. No one takes novels seriously until they become movies, which is to say that no one takes novels seriously.

Perhaps I exaggerate slightly, but not much. If we are going to have a wide and serious audience for fiction again we are going to have to re-examine the source of the novel’s power beyond the particular forms of fiction that have become so dull to so many.

And first of all we will have to make a fundamental distinction between fiction and data. The great advantage of fiction over history, journalism, or any other supposedly “factual” kind of writing is that it is an expressive medium. It transmits feeling, energy, excitement. Television can give us the news, but fiction can best express our response to the news. No other medium—especially not film—can so well deal with our strongest and often most intimate responses to the large and small facts of our daily lives. No other medium, in other words, can so well keep track of the reality of our experience. But to do this successfully the novel must continually reinvent itself to remain in touch with the texture of our lives. It must make maximum expressive use of all elements of the printed page, including the relation of print to blank space. It must break through the literary formulas when necessary while at the same time preserving what is essential to fiction: incident, feeling, power, scope, and the sense of consciousness struggling with circumstance.

There is not one new fiction, but many. Novelists today have an unprecedented number of stylistic options, a range of choice involving not so much a struggle of an old form with a new, but an opening out, a broader awareness of the possibilities of the medium. Perhaps the most sensible working definition for what is new in fiction is simply what is not old, what lies outside the literary clichés of the formula of plot, character, and social realism. But this situation also creates problems of judgment: novelty does not guarantee quality, and it becomes crucial to distinguish the superficial from the substantial, regardless of form. To make such distinctions we must go back to the sources of fiction, stripped of inessentials and historical trappings, so that we can recognize the fundamental virtues of the novel though they may appear in odd recombinations and unaccustomed forms. New fiction requires new criteria, but such criteria will be rooted in the essentials of the medium: not plot, but ongoing incident; not characterization, but consciousness struggling with circumstance; not social realism, but a sense of situation; and so on. Innovative fiction, when successful by these criteria, is not “experimental” but represents the progressive struggle of art to rescue the truth of our experience.

1. Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961), American novelist and short-story writer. Jane Austen (1775–1817), English novelist. George Eliot, pen name of Mary Ann Evans (1819–1880), English novelist and essayist.

1974

WILLIAM H. GASS

William H. Gass (b. 1924) earned a Ph.D. in philosophy and taught the subject for his full academic career, beginning at Purdue University and continuing at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri. Yet his major interests have been literary. His early work, the novel Omensetter's Luck (1966) and the story collection In the Heart of the Heart of the Country (1968), identified him as a proponent of serious fiction, but it was his novella, Willie Masters' Lonesome Wife (1968), and his first book of essays, Fiction and the Figures of Life (1970, from which the piece reprinted here is taken), that established his credentials as a radical innovator. The novella is as anti-illusionistic as anything Ronald Sukenick might conceive: printed in several different typefaces on four different colors of paper with various graphic devices coursing through the text, including coffee-cup stains and a cascade of footnotes that at one point chase the narrative off the page, it speaks boldly for a fiction that seeks to be nothing more than its own obvious self. In his one other novel, The Tunnel (1995), Gass examines historical ideas in a similarly self-conscious manner. His most frequent venues, however, have been books of essays, in which he uses philosophical principles as argumentative support for innovative fiction. Gass's essays, like his literary debates with the realist John Gardner, make eloquent arguments for the worth of such fiction, on ethical and aesthetic grounds.

The Medium of Fiction

It seems a country-headed thing to say: that literature is language, that stories and the places and the people in them¹ are merely made of words as chairs are made of smoothed sticks and sometimes of cloth or metal tubes. Still, we cannot be too simple at the start, since the obvious is often the unobserved. Occasionally we should allow the trite to tease us into thought, for such old friends, the clichés in our life, are the only strangers we can know. It seems incredible, the ease with which we sink through books quite out of sight,² pass clamorous pages into soundless dreams. That novels should be made of words, and merely words, is shocking, really. It's as

1. For the people, see “The Concept of Character in Fiction” [Gass's note; this essay appears later in his collection].

2. This, as well as the comparison with mathetics, is returned to in “In Terms of the Toenail: Fiction and the Figures of Life” [Gass's note; this essay appears later in his collection].

though you had discovered that your wife were made of rubber: the bliss of all those years, the fears . . . from sponge.

Like the mathematician, like the philosopher, the novelist makes things out of concepts. Concepts, consequently, must be his critical concern: not the defects of his person, the crimes on his conscience, other men's morals, or their kindness or cruelty. The painter squeezes space through his pigments. Paint stains his fingers. How can he forget the color he has loaded on his brush or that blank canvas audience before him? Yet the novelist frequently behaves as if his work were all heart, character, and story; he professes to hate abstraction, mathematics, and the pure works of mind. Of course, unlike poetry, and despite its distinguished figures, for a long time now the novel has been an amateur's affair, an open field for anybody's running, and it has drawn the idle, sick, and gossipy, the vaguely artistic—prophets, teachers, muckrakers—all the fanatical explainers, those dreamily scientific, and those anally pedantic.

Paint stains the fingers; the sculptor's hair is white with dust; but concepts have no physical properties; they do not permit smell or reflect light; they do not fill space or contain it; they do not age. "Five" is no wider, older, or fatter than "four"; "apple" isn't sweeter than "quince," rounder than "pear," smoother than "peach." To say, then, that literature is language is to say that literature is made of meanings, concepts, ideas, forms (please yourself with the term), and that these are so static and eternal as to shame the stars.

Like the mathematician. For the novelist to be at all, in any way, like a mathematician is shocking. It's worse than discovering your privates are plastic. Because there's no narration among numbers. It is logically impossible. Time's lacking.

When David Hilbert,³ the great logician, heard that a student had given up mathematics to write novels, he is supposed to have said: "It was just as well; he did not have enough imagination to become a first-rate mathematician."

The yammer of thought, the constant one-after-another of sounds, the shapes of words, the terrible specter of spelling, are each due to this fact that meanings are heavenly bodies which, to our senses, must somehow announce themselves. A word is a concept made flesh, if you like—the eternal presented as noise. When I spell, then, let's say, "avoirdupois,"⁴ I am forming our name for that meaning, but it might, just as well, be written down "dozzo," or still more at length, with the same lack of logic, "typary," "snoddle," or "willmullynull." "Avoirdupois." An unreasonable body. Nonetheless lovely. "Avoirdupois."

There is a fundamental contradiction in our medium.⁵ We work with a marble of flaws. My mind is utterly unlike my body,⁶ and unless you're an angel, so, I am certain, is yours. Poor Descartes⁷ really wrote on the problems of poets: word sense and word sound, math and mechanics, the mind and its body, can they touch? And how, pray God, can they resemble? In the

3. Russian-born German mathematician (1862–1943).

4. Weight measure based on sixteen ounces to a pound.

5. See "Gertrude Stein: Her Escape from Protective Language" [Gass's note; this essay appears later in his collection; Stein (1874–1946) was an American poet and novelist active in France].

6. The contrast which is meant here is not that often alleged to exist between thought and feeling, but that between consciousness and things [Gass's note].

7. René Descartes (1596–1650), French philosopher and mathematician best known for the formulation "Cogito ergo sum," Latin for "I think, therefore I am."

act of love, as in all the arts, the soul should be felt by the tongue and the fingers, felt in the skin. So should our sounds come to color up the surface of our stories like a blush. This adventitious music is the only sensory quality our books can have. As Frost⁸ observed, even the empty sentence has a sound, or rather—I should say—is a series of nervous tensions and resolves. No artist dares neglect his own world's body, for nothing else, nothing else about his book is physical.

In the hollow of a jaw, the ear, upon the page, concepts now begin to move: they appear, accelerate, they race, they hesitate a moment, slow, turn, break, join, modify, and it becomes reasonable to speak of the problems of narration for the first time. Truly (that is to say, technically), narration is that part of the art of fiction concerned with the coming on and passing off of words—not the familiar arrangement of words in dry strings like so many shriveled worms, but their formal direction and rapidity. But this is not what's usually meant.

For most people, fiction is history; fiction is history without tables, graphs, dates, imports, edicts, evidence, laws; history without hiatus—intelligible, simple, smooth. Fiction is sociology freed of statistics, politics with no real party in the opposition; it's a world where play money buys you cardboard squares of colored country; a world where everyone is obediently psychological, economic, ethnic, geographical—framed in a keyhole and always nude, each figure fashioned from the latest thing in cello-see-through, so we may observe our hero's guts, too, if we choose: ah, they're blue, and squirming like a tickled river. For truth without effort, thought without rigor, feeling without form, existence without commitment: what will you give? for a wind-up world, a toy life? . . . six bits?⁹ for a book with a thicker skin? . . . six bucks? I am a man, myself, intemperately mild, and though it seems to me as much deserved as it's desired, I have no wish to steeple quires of paper passion up so many sad unelevating rears.

Nay, not seems, it is a stubborn, country-headed thing to say: that there are no events but words in fiction. Words mean things. Thus we use them every day: make love, buy bread, and blow up bridges. But the use of language in fiction only mimics its use in life. A sign like GENTS, for instance, tells me where to pee. It conveys information; it produces feelings of glad relief. I use the sign, but I dare not dawdle under it. It might have read MEN or borne a moustache. This kind of sign passes out of consciousness, is extinguished by its use. In literature, however, the sign remains; it sings; and we return to it again and again.

In contrast, the composer's medium is pure; that is, the tones he uses exist for music, and are made by instruments especially designed. Imagine his feelings, then, if he were forced to employ the meaningful noises of every day: bird calls, sirens, screams, alarm bells, whistles, ticks, and human chatter. He could plead all he liked that his music was pure, but we would know that he'd written down sounds from a play unseen, and we would insist that it told a story. Critics would describe the characters (one wears a goatee) and quarrel over their motives, marriages, or mothers, all their dark genes. Although no one wonders, of a painted peach, whether the tree it grew on was watered properly, we are happily witness, week after week, to further

8. Robert Frost (1874–1963), American poet.

9. Slang for seventy-five cents.

examination of Hamlet or Madame Bovary,¹ quite as if they were real. And they are so serious, so learned, so certain—so laughable—these ladies and gentlemen. Ah well, it's merely energy which might otherwise elucidate the Trinity.²

So the novelist makes his book from boards which say LADIES and GENTS. Every scrap has been worn, every item handled; most of the pieces are dented or split. The writer may choose to be heroic—poets often are—he may strive to purify his diction and achieve an exclusively literary language. He may pretend that every syllable he speaks hasn't been spit, sometimes, in someone else's mouth. Such poets scrub, they clean, they smooth, they polish, until we can scarcely recognize their words on the page. "A star glide, a single frantic sullenness, a single financial grass greediness," wrote Gertrude Stein. "Toute Pensée émet un Coup de Dés," wrote Mallarmé.³ Most novelists, however (it is one of the things that make them one), try to turn the tattering to account—incorporate it cleverly—as the painter does when he pastes up a collage of newspaper, tin foil, and postage stamps. He will recognize, for example, that stories are wonderful devices for controlling the speed of the mind, for resting it after hard climbs; they give a reassuring light to a dark place, and help the reader hold, like handsome handles, heavy luggage on long trips.

A dedicated storyteller, though—a true lie-minded man—will serve his history best, and guarantee its popularity, not by imitating nature, since nature's no source of verisimilitude, but by following as closely as he can our simplest, most direct and unaffected forms of daily talk, for we report real things, things which intrigue and worry us, and such resembling gossip in a book allows us to believe in figures and events we cannot see, shall never touch, with an assurance of safety which sets our passions free. He will avoid recording consciousness since consciousness is private—we do not normally "take it down"—and because no one really believes in any other feelings than his own. However, the moment our writer concentrates on sound, the moment he formalizes his sentences, the moment he puts in a figure of speech or turns a phrase, shifts a tense or alters tone, the moment he carries description, or any account, beyond need, he begins to turn his reader's interest away from the world which lies among his words like a beautiful woman among her slaves, and directs him toward the slaves themselves. This illustrates a basic principle: if I describe my peach too perfectly, it's the poem which will make my mouth water . . . while the real peach spoils.

Sculptures take up space and gather dust. Concepts do not. They take up us. They invade us as we read, and they achieve, as our resistance and their forces vary, every conceivable degree of occupation. Imagine a worry or a pain, an obsessive thought, a jealousy or hate so strong it renders you insensible to all else. Then while it lasts, you are that fear, that ache, for consciousness is always smaller than its opportunities, and can contract around a kernel like a shell. A piece of music can drive you out and take your place. The purpose of a literary work is the capture of consciousness, and the consequent creation, in you, of an imagined sensibility, so that while you read you are that patient pool or cataract of concepts which the author has

1. Protagonists, respectively, of Shakespeare's play (1602) and of the novel (1857) by the French writer Gustave Flaubert (1821–1880).

2. Christian conception of a three-person God

(Father, Son, and Holy Spirit).

3. Every thought is a roll of the dice (French). Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–1898), French poet.

constructed; and though at first it might seem as if the richness of life had been replaced by something less so—senseless noises, abstract meanings, mere shadows of worldly employment—yet the new self with which fine fiction and good poetry should provide you is as wide as the mind is, and musicked deep with feeling. While listening to such symbols sounding, the blind perceive; thought seems to grow a body; and the will is at rest amid that moving like a gull asleep on the sea. Perhaps we'll be forgiven, then, if we fret about our words and continue country-headed. It is not a refusal to please. There's no willfulness, disdain, exile . . . no anger. Because a consciousness electrified by beauty—is that not the aim and emblem and the ending of all finely made love?

Are you afraid?

1970

CHARLES OLSON

Charles Olson (1910–1970) first published “Projective Verse” in a pamphlet, Poetry New York, in 1950. Two years earlier he had joined the faculty of North Carolina’s Black Mountain College, where his colleagues included the choreographer Merce Cunningham (1919–2009), the painter Josef Albers (1888–1976), and the poet Robert Creeley (1926–2005), from whom Olson borrowed the statement “FORM IS NEVER MORE THAN AN EXTENSION OF CONTENT.” By advocating a set of formal principles based on the breath as a unit of measure, Olson described a new form of poetic measure unfolding on the “open field” of the page. His essay became a manifesto for poets reacting against the strictures of traditional forms.

From Projective Verse

(projectile (percussive (prospective vs.

The NON-Projective

* * *

I

First, some simplicities that a man learns, if he works in OPEN, or what can also be called COMPOSITION BY FIELD, as opposed to inherited line, stanza, over-all form, what is the “old” base of the non-projective.

(1) the kinetics of the thing. A poem is energy transferred from where the poet got it (he will have some several causations), by way of the poem itself to, all the way over to, the reader. Okay. Then the poem itself must, at all points, be a high energy-construct and, at all points, an energy-discharge. So: how is the poet to accomplish same energy, how is he, what is the process by which a poet gets in, at all points energy at least the equivalent of the energy which propelled him in the first place, yet an energy which is peculiar to verse alone and which will be, obviously, also different from the energy which the reader, because he is a third term, will take away?

This is the problem which any poet who departs from closed form is specially confronted by. And it involves a whole series of new recognitions. From the moment he ventures into FIELD COMPOSITION—puts himself in the open—he can go by no track other than the one the poem under hand declares, for itself. Thus he has to behave, and be, instant by instant, aware of some several forces just now beginning to be examined. (It is much more, for example, this push, than simply such a one as Pound¹ put, so wisely, to get us started: “the musical phrase,” go by it, boys, rather than by, the metronome.)

(2) is the principle, the law which presides conspicuously over such composition, and, when obeyed, is the reason why a projective poem can come into being. It is this: FORM IS NEVER MORE THAN AN EXTENSION OF CONTENT. (Or so it got phrased by one, R. Creeley, and it makes absolute sense to me, with this possible corollary, that right form, in any given poem, is the only and exclusively possible extension of content under hand.) There it is, brothers, sitting there, for USE.

Now (3) the process of the thing, how the principle can be made so to shape the energies that the form is accomplished. And I think it can be boiled down to one statement (first pounded into my head by Edward Dahlberg):² ONE PERCEPTION MUST IMMEDIATELY AND DIRECTLY LEAD TO A FURTHER PERCEPTION. It means exactly what it says, is a matter of, at all points (even, I should say, of our management of daily reality as of the daily work) get on with it, keep moving, keep in, speed, the nerves, their speed, the perceptions, theirs, the acts, the split second acts, the whole business, keep it moving as fast as you can, citizen. And if you also set up as a poet, USE USE USE the process at all points, in any given poem always, always one perception must must must MOVE, INSTANTER, ON ANOTHER!

So there we are, fast, there's the dogma. And its excuse, its usability, in practice. Which gets us, it ought to get us, inside the machinery, now, 1950, of how projective verse is made.

If I hammer, if I recall in, and keep calling in, the breath, the breathing as distinguished from the hearing, it is for cause, it is to insist upon a part that breath plays in verse which has not (due, I think, to the smothering of the power of the line by too set a concept of foot) has not been sufficiently observed or practiced, but which has to be if verse is to advance to its proper force and place in the day, now, and ahead. I take it that PROJECTIVE VERSE teaches, is, this lesson, that that verse will only do in which a poet manages to register both the acquisitions of his ear and the pressures of his breath.

1950

1. Ezra Pound (1885–1972), American poet and critic, a major figure of the modernist movement in early 20th-century poetry.

2. American novelist and essayist (1900–1977).

FRANK O'HARA

On August 27, 1959, the poet Frank O'Hara (1926–1966) had a lunchtime conversation with the poet and playwright then known as LeRoi Jones, later as Amiri Baraka (1934–2014). (Selections from the work of both these writers appear elsewhere in this anthology.) It was a heady period of multiplying literary “movements,” and the two decided, as a joke, to invent their own movement. A week later O'Hara wrote “Personism,” which presents “a movement I recently founded and which nobody yet knows about,” and sent it as a letter to Donald Allen (1912–2004), who published it in the anthology The New American Poetry 1945–1960 (1960). Allen's anthology, a kind of midcentury avant-garde cultural manifesto, became one of the most influential collections of poetry and poetics published since World War II. O'Hara's contribution retains the original mocking spirit of his lunchtime conversation, but it also offers a lively description of poetry as an address from one person to another. “In all modesty, I confess it may be the death of literature as we know it,” O'Hara jokes, but his effort to loosen poetry from the academic debates about meaning and from an elite idea of “literature,” and to restore it to the immediacy of one person speaking to another, was serious and proved influential.

From Personism: A Manifesto

Everything is in the poems, but at the risk of sounding like the poor wealthy man's Allen Ginsberg¹ I will write to you because I just heard that one of my fellow poets thinks that a poem of mine that can't be got at one reading is because I was confused too. Now, come on. I don't believe in god, so I don't have to make elaborately sounded structures. I hate Vachel Lindsay,² always have, I don't even like rhythm, assonance, all that stuff. You just go on your nerve. If someone's chasing you down the street with a knife you just run, you don't turn around and shout, “Give it up! I was a track star for Mineola Prep.”

That's for the writing poems part. As for their reception, suppose you're in love and someone's mistreating (mal aimé)³ you, you don't say, “Hey, you can't hurt me this way, I care!” you just let all the different bodies fall where they may, and they always do may after a few months. But that's not why you fell in love in the first place, just to hang onto life, so you have to take your chances and try to avoid being logical. Pain always produces logic, which is very bad for you.

I'm not saying that I don't have practically the most lofty ideas of anyone writing today, but what difference does that make? they're just ideas. The only good thing about it is that when I get lofty enough I've stopped thinking and that's when refreshment arrives.

1. American poet (1926–1997) and member of the Beat generation.

2. American poet (1879–1931) famous for his emphatic use of sound and rhythm.

3. Poorly loved (French). La Chanson du mal-aimé (The Song of the Poorly Loved) is a poem by the French Symbolist poet Guillaume Apollinaire (1880–1918).

But how can you really care if anybody gets it, or gets what it means, or if it improves them. Improves them for what? for death? Why hurry them along? Too many poets act like a middle-aged mother trying to get her kids to eat too much cooked meat, and potatoes with drippings (tears). I don't give a damn whether they eat or not. Forced feeding leads to excessive thinness (effete). Nobody should experience anything they don't need to, if they don't need poetry bully for them, I like the movies too. And after all, only Whitman and Crane and Williams,⁴ of the American poets, are better than the movies. As for measure and other technical apparatus, that's just common sense: if you're going to buy a pair of pants you want them to be tight enough so everyone will want to go to bed with you. There's nothing metaphysical about it. Unless, of course, you flatter yourself into thinking that what you're experiencing is "yearning."

Abstraction in poetry, which Allen recently commented on in It is, is intriguing.⁵ I think it appears mostly in the minute particulars where decision is necessary. Abstraction (in poetry, not in painting) involves personal removal by the poet. For instance, the decision involved in the choice between "the nostalgia of the infinite" and "the nostalgia for the infinite" defines an attitude towards degree of abstraction. The nostalgia of the infinite representing the greater degree of abstraction, removal, and negative capability (as in Keats and Mallarmé).⁶ Personism, a movement which I recently founded and which nobody yet knows about, interests me a great deal, being so totally opposed to this kind of abstract removal that it is verging on a true abstraction for the first time, really, in the history of poetry. Personism is to Wallace Stevens what la poésie pure was to Béranger.⁷ Personism has nothing to do with philosophy, it's all art. It does not have to do with personality or intimacy, far from it! But to give you a vague idea, one of its minimal aspects is to address itself to one person (other than the poet himself), thus evoking overtones of love without destroying love's life-giving vulgarity, and sustaining the poet's feelings towards the poem while preventing love from distracting him into feeling about the person. That's part of personism. It was founded by me after lunch with LeRoi Jones on August 27, 1959, a day in which I was in love with someone (not Roi, by the way, a blond). I went back to work and wrote a poem for this person. While I was writing it I was realizing that if I wanted to I could use the telephone instead of writing the poem, and so Personism was born. It's a very exciting movement which will undoubtedly have lots of adherents. It puts the poem squarely between the poet and the person, Lucky Pierre style,⁸ and the poem is correspondingly gratified. The poem is at last between two persons instead of two pages. In all modesty, I confess that it may be the death of literature as we know it. * * *

September 3, 1959

1960

4. Walt Whitman (1819–1892), Hart Crane (1899–1932), and William Carlos Williams (1883–1963).

5. Donald Allen (1912–2004), a poet and the editor of the anthology in which O'Hara's essay appeared, wrote frequently about abstraction in poetry.

6. John Keats (1795–1821), English Romantic poet. Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–1898), French

Symbolist poet and critic.

7. Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), American poet. Pierre-Jean de Béranger (1780–1857), French poet and songwriter who became determined to sing for the people.

8. "Lucky Pierre": slang phrase for either a man in a sexual threesome of two women and one man or the middle man in a threesome of sexually entwined men.

RICHARD FOREMAN

Born in New York on June 10, 1937, the experimental director and playwright Richard Foreman graduated from Brown University with a B.A. in 1959 and received an M.F.A. in playwriting from the Yale School of Drama in 1962. He founded his Ontological-Hysteric Theater in 1968 and became a leading writer, practitioner, and theorist of avant-garde theater. In his essay “Foundations for a Theater” (1993), Foreman wrote, “I try to make plays as hard to remember as a vivid dream which, when awake, you know you’ve lived with intensity, yet try as you might you can’t remember.”

For Foreman, drama is about consciousness, about how we experience the present. Inspired by the early twentieth-century writer Gertrude Stein, he crafted plays that, like hers, lack narrative and plot and do not progress from beginning to middle to end. Rather, they constitute a “continuous present” in which audience members experience their own sensory responses to what appears on the stage. Foreman’s plays typically have flat characters who deliver their lines in a slow, clear, unemotional manner. His goal is to startle the spectator into a fresh awareness of his or her own perceiving mind. This “mental awakening” is foundational to Foreman’s theater, and is similar to the modern playwright Bertolt Brecht’s verfremden-effekt—“distancing effect.” Rather than losing oneself in the experience of theater, one becomes self-consciously aware of what it is like to experience it.

Foreman’s stage is often replete with objects such as skulls, flowers, globes, mirrors, stuffed animals, crutches, and radios. These objects are most often simply there; some seem to have symbolic significance for the play in progress, others are harder to relate to the action. The objects gesture toward the “ontological” aspect of Foreman’s theater—the aspect that relates to being. Like the bodies of the audience and the actors, they are there to be present, and to be experienced, in the shared space and time of the performance. In the brief selection reprinted here, taken from the first part of a three-part manifesto filled with photographs, line drawings, and fragments of text, Foreman sums up his aim for experimental theater. He envisions a new kind of theater that can run without the “fuel” of an audience’s desire, a kind of art that can attain its own unique form of being.

From Ontological-Hysteric Manifesto I

Art is not beauty of description or depth of emotion, it is making a machine, not to do something to audience, but that makes itself run on new fuel. Can this machine run? Most machines (art) run on audience fuel—(Man’s pig-gish desire to be at the center, to be made to feel there is “caringness” built into the world: old art manipulates that, tries to get a response: fuel is DESIRE in that case.

FIND FUEL OTHER THAN DESIRE! Nervous energy? Basic hum of life? vibration?) (Desire kills vibration, gets too crude)

WE MAKE A PERPETUAL MOTION MACHINE¹. (The closer to that ideal the better. Run on less and less fuel . . . that’s the goal of the new art machine.)

1. Machine designed to sustain motion without application of outside force; actual perpetual motion machines have proven impossible to construct.

CHARLES LUDLAM

Charles Ludlam was born April 12, 1943, on Long Island, New York. He studied dramatic literature at Hofstra University, graduating in 1964. Ludlam began to live an openly gay life in college, and his career unfolded in the heart of New York's gay community in the West Village. Ludlam formed his Ridiculous Theatrical Company in Sheridan Square in the West Village in 1967, just a block from the Stonewall Inn—the location of the 1969 “Stonewall riots” that spurred the gay liberation movement. The political fervor of the 1960s and early '70s marks Ludlam's work, though he does not address politics directly in his plays. He preferred to think of his work as “queer theater” rather than an art form representing politicized identities. A prolific writer, Ludlam has been widely published and anthologized. He died of AIDS in 1987, and his obituary was printed on the front page of the New York Times, confirming both his influence and his successful integration of the avant-garde into the mainstream.

Ludlam was one of the few in the American avant-garde theater scene interested both in the dramatic “text” and in the traditional aim of moving the audience emotionally. Speaking of the avant-garde, he declared, “I hate minimal art. I hate conceptual art. I am for execution. I am for maximal art. Minimal art is inflationary art: less for your money. . . . Art is for the body. It has a soul but it also has a body.” Usually performed in drag, his “highly charged shenanigans” came to be associated closely with the “camp” aesthetic. He is most famous for his Camille (1973), in which he starred in the title role, in drag, Galas (1983), inspired by Maria Callas, who is also an inspiration for Frank Bidart's poem “Ellen West,” included in this volume, and The Mystery of Irma Vep (1984), inspired by Victorian melodrama.

Aspiring to the “actor-manager” role usually associated with the nineteenth-century British theater industry, Ludlam wrote, directed, and starred in many of the Ridiculous Theatrical Company's plays. Known for his warmth and larger-than-life personality, Ludlam was beloved among his friends and peers in the avant-garde theater world. He would influence a wide variety of queer performance artists—both male and female—including the playwright Tony Kushner, author and director of Angels in America (1993). In 1999, Kushner provided the introduction for a collection of Ludlam's plays.

“Ridiculous Theatre, Scourge of Human Folly,” a Ludlam manifesto, is reprinted here in full. Written as a series of axioms in numerical order—suggesting straightforward logic—the manifesto is in fact more farcical than logical. The “instructions for use” highlight the performative nature of the manifesto as a genre: manifestos do not just say, they do.

Ridiculous Theatre, Scourge of Human Folly

Aim: To get beyond nihilism¹ by revaluing combat.

Axioms to a theatre for ridicule:

1. Total rejection of prevailing beliefs, usually out of a sense that the world is meaningless.

1. You are a living mockery of your own ideals. If not, you have set your ideals too low.
2. The things one takes seriously are one's weaknesses.
3. Just as many people who claim a belief in God disprove it with their every act, so too there are those whose every deed, though they say there is no God, is an act of faith.
4. Evolution is a conscious process.
5. Bathos is that which is intended to be sorrowful but because of the extremity of its expression becomes comic. Pathos is that which is meant to be comic but because of the extremity of its expression becomes sorrowful. Some things which seem to be opposites are actually different degrees of the same thing.
6. The comic hero thrives by his vices. The tragic hero is destroyed by his virtue. Moral paradox is the crux of the drama.
7. The theatre is a humble materialist enterprise which seeks to produce riches of the imagination, not the other way around. The theatre is an event and not an object. Theatre workers need not blush and conceal their desperate struggle to pay the landlords their rents. Theatre without the stink of art.

Instructions for use:

This is farce not Sunday school. Illustrate hedonistic² calculus. Test out a dangerous idea, a theme that threatens to destroy one's whole value system. Treat the material in a madly farcical manner without losing the seriousness of the theme. Show how paradoxes arrest the mind. Scare yourself a bit along the way.

1975

2. Pleasure-seeking.

A. R. AMMONS

Ammons (1926–2001), represented elsewhere in this anthology by a selection of his poems, delivered “A Poem Is a Walk” as a lecture for teachers at the International Poetry Forum in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in April 1967. It was published in 1968 in Cornell University’s literary journal, Epoch. By 1964 Ammons had joined the English faculty at Cornell (in Ithaca, New York), where he was a much-loved teacher. His concerns as a poet and as a teacher of poetry are evident in this essay, which provides an account of poetry as an “interior seeking,” its shape unfolding through a process of discovery. In the essay Ammons locates the essential rhythms of poetry in the motions of the body as it moves through the world. A peripatetic writer and theorist, Ammons employs this essay’s principles in his poetry. “A Poem Is a Walk” also connects Ammons to the American Transcendentalist tradition. It recalls the famous essay “Walking” (1862), by Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862), in which this activity is figured as inward exploration, and the poems of Robert Frost (1874–1963), many of which are structured as a walk. A similar impulse can be found in such American poets as Robert Creeley, Frank O’Hara, and Jorie Graham.

From A Poem Is a Walk

What justification is there for comparing a poem with a walk rather than with something else? I take the walk to be the externalization of an interior seeking so that the analogy is first of all between the external and the internal. Poets not only do a lot of walking but talk about it in their poems: “I wandered lonely as a cloud,” “Now I out walking,” and “Out walking in the frozen swamp one gray day.”¹ There are countless examples, and many of them suggest that both the real and the fictive walk are externalizations of an inward seeking. The walk magnified is the journey, and probably no figure has been used more often than the journey for both the structure and concern of an interior seeking.

How does a poem resemble a walk? First, each makes use of the whole body, involvement is total, both mind and body. You can’t take a walk without feet and legs, without a circulatory system, a guidance and coordinating system, without eyes, ears, desire, will, need: the total person. This observation is important not only for what it includes but for what it rules out: as with a walk, a poem is not simply a mental activity: it has body, rhythm, feeling, sound, and mind, conscious and subconscious. The pace at which a poet walks (and thinks), his natural breath-length, the line he pursues, whether forthright and straight or weaving and meditative, his whole “air,” whether of aimlessness or purpose—all these things and many more figure into the “physiology” of the poem he writes.

A second resemblance is that every walk is unreproducible, as is every poem. Even if you walk exactly the same route each time—as with a sonnet—the events along the route cannot be imagined to be the same from day to day, as the poet’s health, sight, his anticipations, moods, fears, thoughts cannot be the same. There are no two identical sonnets or villanelles. If there were, we would not know how to keep the extra one: it would have no separate existence. If a poem is each time new, then it is necessarily an act of discovery, a chance taken, a chance that may lead to fulfillment or disaster. The poet exposes himself to the risk. All that has been said about poetry, all that he has learned about poetry, is only a partial assurance.

The third resemblance between a poem and a walk is that each turns, one or more times, and eventually returns. It’s conceivable that a poem could rake out and go through incident after incident without ever returning, merely ending in the poet’s return to dust. But most poems and most walks return. I have already quoted the first line from Frost’s “The Wood-Pile.” Now, here are the first three lines:

Out walking in the frozen swamp one gray day,
I paused and said, ‘I will turn back from here.
No, I will go on farther—and we shall see.’

The poet is moving outward seeking the point from which he will turn back. In “The Wood-Pile” there is no return: return is implied. The poet goes farther and farther into the swamp until he finds by accident the point of illumination with which he closes the poem.

1. Lines from, respectively, “I Wandered, Lonely as a Cloud” by English poet William Wordsworth, and “Away!” and “The Wood-Pile,” both by American poet Robert Frost.

But the turns and returns or implied returns give shape to the walk and to the poem. With the first step, the number of shapes the walk might take is infinite, but then the walk begins to “define” itself as it goes along, though freedom remains total with each step: any tempting side road can be turned into on impulse, or any wild patch of woods can be explored. The pattern of the walk is to come true, is to be recognized, discovered. The pattern, when discovered, may be found to apply to the whole walk, or only a segment of the walk may prove to have contour and therefore suggestion and shape. From previous knowledge of the terrain, inner and outer, the poet may have before the walk an inkling of a possible contour. Taking the walk would then be searching out or confirming, giving actuality to, a previous intuition.

The fourth resemblance has to do with the motion common to poems and walks. The motion may be lumbering, clipped, wavering, tripping, mechanical, dance-like, awkward, staggering, slow, etc. But the motion occurs only in the body of the walker or in the body of the words. It can't be extracted and contemplated. It is nonreproducible and nonlogical. It can't be translated into another body. There is only one way to know it and that is to enter into it.

To summarize, a walk involves the whole person; it is not reproducible: its shape occurs, unfolds: it has a motion characteristic of the walker.

* * *

There is no ideal walk, then, though I haven't taken the time to prove it out completely, except the useless, meaningless walk. Only uselessness is empty enough for the presence of so many uses, and only through uselessness can the ideal walk come into the sum total of its uses. Only uselessness can allow the walk to be totally itself.

I hope you are, now, if you were not before, ready to agree with me that the greatest wrong that can be done a poem is to substitute a known part for an unknown whole and that the choice to be made is the freedom of nothingness: that our experience of poetry is least injured when we accept it as useless, meaningless, and nonrational.

* * * Poetry is a mode of discourse that differs from logical exposition. It is the mode I spoke of earlier, that can reconcile opposites into a “real” world both concrete and universal. Teach that. Teach the distinction.

Second, I would suggest you teach that poetry leads us to the unstructured sources of our beings, to the unknown, and returns us to our rational, structured selves refreshed. Having once experienced the mystery, plenitude, contradiction, and composure of a work of art, we afterward have a built-in resistance to the slogans and propaganda of oversimplification that have often contributed to the destruction of human life. Poetry is a verbal means to a nonverbal source. It is a motion to no-motion, to the still point of contemplation and deep realization. Its knowledges are all negative and, therefore, more positive than any knowledge. Nothing that can be said about it in words is worth saying.

AUDRE LORDE

As a black feminist, lesbian, poet, cancer survivor, and social activist, Audre Lorde (1934–1992) felt compelled to respond to the frequent assertion among activists that writing poetry is a luxury. Her essay “Poetry Is Not a Luxury” originally appeared in Chrysalis: A Magazine of Female Culture in 1977 and was reprinted in her well-known collection of essays, Sister, Outsider (1989). Lorde argued that, rather than being a luxury, poetry is “a vital necessity” because it creates a language in which to express women’s hopes and dreams. The writing process, as she describes it, gives life and voice to what is unnamed and as yet unthought, and thus overcomes the forces in society that silence women’s experiences. In this sense poetry articulates the vision necessary for social change to occur. Lorde’s life and work reflected her belief that poetry is a form of empowerment and a tool for survival. A selection of her poems can be found elsewhere in this anthology.

From Poetry Is Not a Luxury

For women, then, poetry is not a luxury. It is a vital necessity of our existence. It forms the quality of the light within which we predicate our hopes and dreams toward survival and change, first made into language, then into idea, then into more tangible action. Poetry is the way we help give name to the nameless so it can be thought. The farthest external horizons of our hopes and fears are cobbled by our poems, carved from the rock experiences of our daily lives.

As they become known and accepted to ourselves, our feelings, and the honest exploration of them, become sanctuaries and fortresses and spawning grounds for the most radical and daring of ideas, the house of difference so necessary to change and the conceptualization of any meaningful action. Right now, I could name at least ten ideas I would once have found intolerable or incomprehensible and frightening, except as they came after dreams and poems. This is not idle fantasy, but the true meaning of “It feels right to me.” We can train ourselves to respect our feelings and to discipline (transpose) them into a language that catches those feelings so they can be shared. And where that language does not yet exist, it is our poetry which helps to fashion it. Poetry is not only dream or vision, it is the skeleton architecture of our lives.

1977

1978

DENISE LEVERTOV

1923–1997

Denise Levertov once wrote of her predecessor, the poet H. D.: “She showed a way to penetrate mystery; which means, not to flood darkness with light so that darkness is destroyed, but to enter into darkness, mystery, so that it is experienced.” Along with Robert Duncan, Levertov carried out in her own distinctive way H. D.’s tradition of visionary poetry. More grounded than her predecessor in observing the natural world and in appreciating daily life, Levertov connected the concrete to the invisible, as suggested by the image of The Jacob’s Ladder (1961), the title of her fifth book. She desired that a poem be “hard as a floor, sound as a bench” but also that it be “mysterious” (“Illustrious Ancestors”), and in her poems ordinary events open into the unknown. The origins of Levertov’s magical sense of the world are not difficult to trace. She was born in England and wrote of her parents: “My mother was descended from the Welsh tailor and mystic Angel Jones of Mold, my father from the noted Hasid, Schneour Zaiman [d. 1831], the ‘Rav of Northern White Russia.’” In “Illustrious Ancestors” Levertov claimed a connection to her forefathers, both mystical and Hasidic: “some line still taut between me and them.” Hasidism, a sect of Judaism that emphasizes the soul’s communion with God rather than formal religious observance and encourages what Levertov called “a wonder at creation,” was an important influence on her father, Paul Philip Levertoff. He had converted to Christianity as a student and later became an Anglican priest, but he retained his interest in Judaism and told Hasidic legends to Levertov and her older sister, Olga, throughout their childhoods. From her mother, Beatrice Spooner-Jones, Levertov learned to look closely at the world around her, and we might say of her work what she said of her mother: “with how much gazing / her life had paid tribute to the world’s body” (“The 90th Year”).

In 1947 Levertov married an American, Mitchell Goodman (they later divorced), and moved to the United States. She described this move as crucial to her development as a poet; it “necessitated the finding of new rhythms in which to write, in accordance with new rhythms of life and speech.” In this discovery of a new idiom the stylistic influence of William Carlos Williams was especially important to her; without it, she said, “I could not have developed from a British Romantic with an almost Victorian background to an American poet of any vitality.” Levertov embraced Williams’s interest in an organic poetic form, growing out of the poet’s relation to her subject, and like Duncan and Robert Creeley, she actively explored the relations between the line and the unit of breath as they control rhythm, melody, and emphasis. But if Levertov became the poet she was by becoming an American poet, her European heritage also enriched her sense of influence. Although her poem “September 1961” acknowledges her link to “the old great ones” (Ezra Pound, Williams, and H. D.), she was as at home with the German lyric poet Rainer Maria Rilke as with the American Transcendentalist Ralph Waldo Emerson. And in the United States she discovered the work of the Jewish theologian and philosopher Martin Buber, which renewed her interest “in the Hasidic ideas with which I was dimly acquainted as a child.” Her eclecticism let her move easily between plain and richly descriptive language, between a vivid perception of the “thing itself” and the often radiant mystery that, for Levertov, arose from such seeing.

From 1956 to 1959 Levertov lived with her husband and son in Mexico. They were joined there by her mother, who, after her daughter’s departure, remained in Mexico for the final eighteen years of her life (she died in 1977). Several moving poems in Levertov's collection Life in the Forest (1978), among them "The 90th Year" and "Death in Mexico," address her mother's last years. In the late 1960s the political crisis prompted by the Vietnam War turned Levertov's work more directly to public woes, as reflected in her following four books. Not all the poems in these books explicitly concern political issues ("The Sorrow Dance," for example, contains her sequence in memory of her sister, Olga, one of her finest, most powerful poems); nonetheless, many poems originated in a need for public testimony. Her overtly political poems are not often among her best, however; their very explicitness restricted her distinctive strengths as a poet, which included a feeling for the inexplicable, a language lyrical enough to express wish and desire, and a capacity for playfulness. But it is a mistake to separate too rigidly the political concerns in her work from a larger engagement with the world. As she wrote: "If a degree of intimacy is a condition of lyric expression, surely—at times when events make feelings run high—that intimacy between writer and political belief does exist, and is as intense as other emotions."

The power of Levertov's poems depends on her capacity to balance, however precariously, her two-sided vision, to keep alive both terms of what one critic called her "magical realism." At its best her work seems to spring from experience deep within her, stirred into being by a source beyond herself (as "Caedmon" is suddenly "affrighted" by an angel, or the poet at the age of sixteen dreams deeply, "sunk in the well"). Her finest poems render the inexplicable nature of our ordinary lives and their capacity for unexpected beauty. But Levertov's capacity for pleasure in the world never strays too far from the knowledge that the very landscapes that delight us contain places "that can pull you / down" ("Zeroing In"), as our inner landscapes also contain places "that are bruised forever, that time / never assuages, never."

Levertov published several collections of prose, including The Poet in the World (1973), Light Up the Cave (1981), and New and Selected Essays (1992). In 1987 she published her fifteenth book of poems, Breathing the Water. This book contains a long sequence, "The Showings: Lady Julian of Norwich, 1342–1416," which continues the link between Levertov's work and a visionary tradition. She published three subsequent collections: A Door in the Hive (1989), Evening Train (1992), and Tesserae (1995). Levertov taught widely and from 1982 until her death was professor of English at Stanford University, where she was an important teacher for a younger generation of writers.

To the Snake

Green Snake, when I hung you round my neck and stroked your cold, pulsing throat as you hissed to me, glinting arrowy gold scales, and I felt the weight of you on my shoulders, 5 and the whispering silver of your dryness sounded close at my ears—
 Green Snake—I swore to my companions that certainly you were harmless! But truly
 I had no certainty, and no hope, only desiring 10 to hold you, for that joy, which left a long wake of pleasure, as the leaves moved and you faded into the pattern of grass and shadows, and I returned smiling and haunted, to a dark morning. 15

1960

The Jacob's Ladder¹

The stairway is not a thing of gleaming strands a radiant evanescence for angels' feet that only glance in their tread, and need not touch the stone. 5

It is of stone.
 A rosy stone that takes a glowing tone of softness only because behind it the sky is a doubtful, a doubting night gray. 10

A stairway of sharp
 angles, solidly built.
 One sees that the angels must spring down from one step to the next, giving a little lift of the wings: 15

and a man climbing must scrape his knees, and bring the grip of his hands into play. The cut stone consoles his groping feet. Wings brush past him.
 The poem ascends. 20

1961

In Mind

There's in my mind a woman of innocence, unadorned but fair-featured, and smelling of apples or grass. She wears a utopian smock or shift, her hair is light brown and smooth, and she 5

1. Jacob dreamed of "a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it" (Genesis 28.12).

is kind and very clean without ostentation—

but she has no imagination. 10

And there's a turbulent moon-ridden girl or old woman, or both, dressed in opals and rags, feathers and torn taffeta, 15 who knows strange songs—

but she is not kind.

1964

What Were They Like?

- 1) Did the people of Vietnam use lanterns of stone?
- 2) Did they hold ceremonies to reverence the opening of buds?
- 3) Were they inclined to quiet laughter? 5
- 4) Did they use bone and ivory, jade and silver, for ornament?
- 5) Had they an epic poem?
- 6) Did they distinguish between speech and singing?

- 1) Sir, their light hearts turned to stone. 10
It is not remembered whether in gardens stone lanterns illumined pleasant ways.
- 2) Perhaps they gathered once to delight in blossom, but after the children were killed
there were no more buds. 15
- 3) Sir, laughter is bitter to the burned mouth.
- 4) A dream ago, perhaps. Ornament is for joy.
All the bones were charred.
- 5) It is not remembered. Remember, most were peasants; their life 20
was in rice and bamboo.
When peaceful clouds were reflected in the paddies and the water buffalo stepped surely along terraces, maybe fathers told their sons old tales.
When bombs smashed those mirrors
there was time only to scream. 25
- 6) There is an echo yet
of their speech which was like a song.

It was reported their singing resembled the flight of moths in moonlight. 30
 Who can say? It is silent now.

1971

Caedmon¹

All others talked as if talk were a dance.
 Clodhopper I, with clumsy feet would break the gliding ring.
 Early I learned to 5
 hunch myself
 close by the door:
 then when the talk began I'd wipe my mouth and wend 10
 unnoticed back to the barn to be with the warm beasts, dumb among body sounds of the simple ones.
 I'd see by a twist 15
 of lit rush² the motes of gold moving from shadow to shadow slow in the wake of deep untroubled sighs. 20
 The cows munched or stirred or were still. I was at home and lonely, both in good measure. Until the sudden angel affrighted me—light effacing 25
 my feeble beam,
 a forest of torches, feathers of flame, sparks upflying:
 but the cows as before
 were calm, and nothing was burning, nothing but I, as that hand of fire 30 touched my lips and scorched my tongue and pulled my voice into the ring of the dance.

1987

1. "The story comes, of course, from the Venerable Bede's History of the English Church and People, but I first read it as a child in John Richard Green's History of the English People, 1855" [Levertov's note]. Caedmon (fl. 658–680) was, according to the story, an illiterate cowherd employed by a monastery; one night he received a divine call to sing verses in praise of God. He is the earliest known Christian poet in English.

2. The piths of rush plants were used for candlewicks.

JAMES BALDWIN

1924–1987

In the early 1940s, the African American writer James Baldwin was once refused service at a restaurant in New Jersey, and he reacted with anger, finally throwing a water glass at the waitress. He fled, pursued by police. Reflecting later on the experience in his essay “Notes of a Native Son” (1955), Baldwin wrote that he was struck by two facts, “both equally difficult for the imagination to grasp, and one was that I could have been murdered. But the other was that I had been ready to commit murder.” Baldwin’s ability to speak honestly about race in America—in widely read essays as well as in fiction—and to analyze the inner dynamics of race in a way that was both gripping and intellectual made him a key figure in the history of civil rights in America from the 1940s right up to his death in 1987. Though he mainly lived abroad in Paris and other European cities from 1949 onward, his voice was heard back home, distinguished by an emphasis on shared humanity and the possibility of love across racial lines.

Baldwin was brought up in a poor and strictly religious household in Harlem with an authoritarian father—later revealed to be his stepfather—his beloved mother, and eight siblings. His reading began at home, where he read and reread the Bible and Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin. He attended public schools in New York City alongside black Harlem neighbors and Jewish, Irish, and Eastern European immigrants from other parts of the city. A theater teacher at his middle school introduced him to the writings of Charles Dickens and took him to see Shakespeare plays in the city. He then attended DeWitt Clinton High School, which reached a peak enrollment of twelve thousand students in the 1930s and was reputed to be the largest high school in the world; the photographer Richard Avedon was a classmate. At DeWitt Clinton he met remarkable teachers—including the poet Countee Cullen—who further opened the worlds of literature and intellectual life to the young James. Baldwin briefly became a child preacher at the age of fourteen. When he abandoned preaching he also left the church, but the church never left him. Its message of love, suffering, and redemption in a violent world remained rooted in his imagination; its lyrical cadences, found in scripture, oratory, and ecstatic music, recur as both the themes and the models for his prose.

Starting in the late 1940s, Baldwin published essays on topics ranging from art and literature to history to black life in Harlem, Atlanta, and Paris. His fame grew when he found a voice in fiction, publishing the critically acclaimed realist novel Go Tell It on the Mountain in 1953, a story about the teenage son of a black preacher in Harlem that hewed closely to his own biography. Go Tell It on the Mountain was followed by a play, Amen Corner, which was staged once in 1955 by the Howard University Players and was not produced again for over a decade. It was published in full in 1968. A second novel, Giovanni’s Room (1956), departed from the subject of black life in Harlem. Baldwin did not want to be pigeonholed as the new “Negro writer” on the scene. Giovanni’s Room was a tragic love story about a white American named David and his relationship with Giovanni, the beautiful and doomed lover he meets in Paris. Written by a black writer through the first-person perspective of a white gay man, and openly sympathetic to the plight of its central characters, Giovanni’s Room was both a professionally risky and a beautifully crafted novel. But Baldwin would soon become too indispensable a participant in the evolving civil rights movement to be dismissed by readers who found gay subject matter offensive. His essays on the experience of being black in the United States and in postwar Europe had already established him as a serious thinker about race. In his notable 1962 essay “Letter from a Region of my Mind,” he analyzed religion’s relationship to race as well as the fraught psychology of black-white relations in America, using terms that explored the sexualized emotional dependency of white America on black inferiority. The New Yorker featured the essay, cementing Baldwin’s reputation as the writer who seemed best able to explain black and white America to itself.

Baldwin continued to write fiction and essays throughout his life. In novels and short stories, his preoccupations were remarkably consistent: doomed black and white men, strong but tired black women, jazz or church musicians, preachers and hustlers, brothers and mothers and sons, the experience of racial violence and the lives of expatriates. Having lived a bravely open homosexual life since his teens, Baldwin stood out for his humane representations of masculine gay men and for his candid reflections on love between men of different races.

He ultimately published six novels, two plays, and a collection of short stories. The early novels, including Another Country (1962), are regarded as his best. His nonfiction was collected in Notes of a Native Son (1955), The Price of the Ticket (1985), and various other volumes, including Collected Essays (1998) and The Cross of Redemption (2010).

The stories reprinted here represent high points in his literary oeuvre. In “Going to Meet the Man” (1965), Baldwin dares to write from the perspectives of a white deputy sheriff and his young son and thus to fully engage the horror of lynching. Baldwin shocks the reader with racist language and sexualized violence while showing how easily a young boy becomes complicit with a racist culture. “Sonny’s Blues” (1957) is a classic Baldwin story, imagining music as a source of redemption within the black community, despite the realities of poverty, incarceration, and addiction.

Going to Meet the Man

“What’s the matter?” she asked.

“I don’t know,” he said, trying to laugh, “I guess I’m tired.”

“You’ve been working too hard,” she said. “I keep telling you.”

“Well, goddammit, woman,” he said, “it’s not my fault!” He tried again; he wretchedly failed again. Then he just lay there, silent, angry, and helpless. Excitement filled him like a toothache, but it refused to enter his flesh. He stroked her breast. This was his wife. He could not ask her to do just a little thing for him, just to help him out, just for a little while, the way he could ask a nigger girl to do it. He lay there, and he sighed. The image of a black girl caused a distant excitement in him, like a far-away light; but, again, the excitement was more like pain; instead of forcing him to act, it made action impossible.

“Go to sleep,” she said, gently, “you got a hard day tomorrow.”

“Yeah,” he said, and rolled over on his side, facing her, one hand still on one breast. “Goddamn the niggers. The black stinking coons. You’d think they’d learn. Wouldn’t you think they’d learn? I mean, wouldn’t you?”

“They going to be out there tomorrow,” she said, and took his hand away, “get some sleep.”

He lay there, one hand between his legs, staring at the frail sanctuary of his wife. A faint light came from the shutters; the moon was full. Two dogs, far away, were barking at each other, back and forth, insistently, as though they were agreeing to make an appointment. He heard a car coming north on the road and he half sat up, his hand reaching for his holster, which was on a chair near the bed, on top of his pants. The lights hit the shutters and seemed to travel across the room and then went out. The sound of the car slipped away, he heard it hit gravel, then heard it no more. Some liver-lipped students, probably, heading back to that college—but coming from where? His watch said it was two in the morning. They could be coming from anywhere, from out of state most likely, and they would be at the courthouse tomorrow. The niggers were getting ready. Well, they would be ready, too.

He moaned. He wanted to let whatever was in him out; but it wouldn't come out. Goddamn! he said aloud, and turned again, on his side, away from Grace, staring at the shutters. He was a big, healthy man and he had never had any trouble sleeping. And he wasn't old enough yet to have any trouble getting it up—he was only forty-two. And he was a good man, a God-fearing man, he had tried to do his duty all his life, and he had been a deputy sheriff for several years. Nothing had ever bothered him before, certainly not getting it up. Sometimes, sure, like any other man, he knew that he wanted a little more spice than Grace could give him and he would drive over yonder and pick up a black piece or arrest her, it came to the same thing, but he couldn't do that now, no more. There was no telling what might happen once your ass was in the air. And they were low enough to kill a man then, too, every one of them, or the girl herself might do it, right while she was making believe you made her feel so good. The niggers. What had the good Lord Almighty had in mind when he made the niggers? Well. They were pretty good at that, all right. Damn. Damn. Goddamn.

This wasn't helping him to sleep. He turned again, toward Grace again, and moved close to her warm body. He felt something he had never felt before. He felt that he would like to hold her, hold her, hold her, and be buried in her like a child and never have to get up in the morning again and go downtown to face those faces, good Christ, they were ugly! and never have to enter that jailhouse again and smell that smell and hear that singing; never again feel that filthy, kinky, greasy hair under his hand, never again watch those black breasts leap against the leaping cattle prod, never hear those moans again or watch that blood run down or the fat lips split or the sealed eyes struggle open. They were animals, they were no better than animals, what could be done with people like that? Here they had been in a civilized country for years and they still lived like animals. Their houses were dark, with oil cloth or cardboard in the windows, the smell was enough to make you puke your guts out, and there they sat, a whole tribe, pumping out kids, it looked like, every damn five minutes, and laughing and talking and playing music like they didn't have a care in the world, and he reckoned they didn't, neither, and coming to the door, into the sunlight, just standing there, just looking foolish, not thinking of anything but just getting back to what they were doing, saying, Yes suh, Mr. Jesse. I surely will, Mr. Jesse. Fine weather, Mr. Jesse. Why, I thank you, Mr. Jesse. He had worked for a mail-order house for a while and it had been his job to collect the payments for the stuff they bought. They were too dumb to know that they were being cheated blind, but that was no skin off his ass—he was just supposed to do his job. They would be late—they didn't have the sense to put money aside; but it was easy to scare them, and he never really had any trouble. Hell, they all liked him, the kids used to smile when he came to the door. He gave them candy, sometimes, or chewing gum, and rubbed their rough bullet heads—maybe the candy should have been poisoned. Those kids were grown now. He had had trouble with one of them today.

“There was this nigger today,” he said; and stopped; his voice sounded peculiar. He touched Grace. “You awake?” he asked. She mumbled something, impatiently, she was probably telling him to go to sleep. It was all right. He knew that he was not alone.

“What a funny time,” he said, “to be thinking about a thing like that—you listening?” She mumbled something again. He rolled over on his back. “This nigger’s one of the ringleaders. We had trouble with him before. We must have had him out there at the work farm three or four times. Well, Big Jim C. and some of the boys really had to whip that nigger’s ass today.” He looked over at Grace; he could not tell whether she was listening or not; and he was afraid to ask again. “They had this line you know, to register”—he laughed, but she did not—“and they wouldn’t stay where Big Jim C. wanted them, no, they had to start blocking traffic all around the courthouse so couldn’t nothing or nobody get through, and Big Jim C. told them to disperse and they wouldn’t move, they just kept up that singing, and Big Jim C. figured that the others would move if this nigger would move, him being the ringleader, but he wouldn’t move and he wouldn’t let the others move, so they had to beat him and a couple of the others and they threw them in the wagon—but I didn’t see this nigger till I got to the jail. They were still singing and I was supposed to make them stop. Well, I couldn’t make them stop for me but I knew he could make them stop. He was lying on the ground jerking and moaning, they had threw him in a cell by himself, and blood was coming out his ears from where Big Jim C. and his boys had whipped him. Wouldn’t you think they’d learn? I put the prod to him and he jerked some more and he kind of screamed—but he didn’t have much voice left. ‘You make them stop that singing,’ I said to him, ‘you hear me? You make them stop that singing.’ He acted like he didn’t hear me and I put it to him again, under his arms, and he just rolled around on the floor and blood started coming from his mouth. He’d pissed his pants already.” He paused. His mouth felt dry and his throat was as rough as sandpaper; as he talked, he began to hurt all over with that peculiar excitement which refused to be released. “You all are going to stop your singing, I said to him, and you are going to stop coming down to the courthouse and disrupting traffic and molesting the people and keeping us from our duties and keeping doctors from getting to sick white women and getting all them Northerners in this town to give our town a bad name—!” As he said this, he kept prodding the boy, sweat pouring from beneath the helmet he had not yet taken off. The boy rolled around in his own dirt and water and blood and tried to scream again as the prod hit his testicles, but the scream did not come out, only a kind of rattle and a moan. He stopped. He was not supposed to kill the nigger. The cell was filled with a terrible odor. The boy was still. “You hear me?” he called. “You had enough?” The singing went on. “You had enough?” His foot leapt out, he had not known it was going to, and caught the boy flush on the jaw. Jesus, he thought, this ain’t no nigger, this is a goddamn bull, and he screamed again, “You had enough? You going to make them stop that singing now?”

But the boy was out. And now he was shaking worse than the boy had been shaking. He was glad no one could see him. At the same time, he felt very close to a very peculiar, particular joy; something deep in him and deep in his memory was stirred, but whatever was in his memory eluded him. He took off his helmet. He walked to the cell door.

“White man,” said the boy, from the floor, behind him.

He stopped. For some reason, he grabbed his privates.

“You remember Old Julia?”

The boy said, from the floor, with his mouth full of blood, and one eye, barely open, glaring like the eye of a cat in the dark, “My grandmother’s name was Mrs. Julia Blossom. Mrs. Julia Blossom. You going to call our women by their right names yet.—And those kids ain’t going to stop singing. We going to keep on singing until every one of you miserable white mothers go stark raving out of your minds.” Then he closed the one eye; he spat blood; his head fell back against the floor.

He looked down at the boy, whom he had been seeing, off and on, for more than a year, and suddenly remembered him: Old Julia had been one of his mail-order customers, a nice old woman. He had not seen her for years, he supposed that she must be dead.

He had walked into the yard, the boy had been sitting in a swing. He had smiled at the boy, and asked, “Old Julia home?”

The boy looked at him for a long time before he answered. “Don’t no Old Julia live here.”

“This is her house. I know her. She’s lived here for years.”

The boy shook his head. “You might know a Old Julia someplace else, white man. But don’t nobody by that name live here.”

He watched the boy; the boy watched him. The boy certainly wasn’t more than ten. White man. He didn’t have time to be fooling around with some crazy kid. He yelled, “Hey! Old Julia!”

But only silence answered him. The expression on the boy’s face did not change. The sun beat down on them both, still and silent; he had the feeling that he had been caught up in a nightmare, a nightmare dreamed by a child; perhaps one of the nightmares he himself had dreamed as a child. It had that feeling—everything familiar, without undergoing any other change, had been subtly and hideously displaced: the trees, the sun, the patches of grass in the yard, the leaning porch and the weary porch steps and the card-board in the windows and the black hole of the door which looked like the entrance to a cave, and the eyes of the pickaninny, all, all, were charged with malevolence. White man. He looked at the boy. “She’s gone out?”

The boy said nothing.

“Well,” he said, “tell her I passed by and I’ll pass by next week.” He started to go; he stopped. “You want some chewing gum?”

The boy got down from the swing and started for the house. He said, “I don’t want nothing you got, white man.” He walked into the house and closed the door behind him.

Now the boy looked as though he were dead. Jesse wanted to go over to him and pick him up and pistol whip him until the boy’s head burst open like a melon. He began to tremble with what he believed was rage, sweat, both cold and hot, raced down his body, the singing filled him as though it were a weird, uncontrollable, monstrous howling rumbling up from the depths of his own belly, he felt an icy fear rise in him and raise him up, and he shouted, he howled, "You lucky we pump some white blood into you every once in a while—your women! Here's what I got for all the black bitches in the world—!" Then he was, abruptly, almost too weak to stand; to his bewilderment, his horror, beneath his own fingers, he felt himself violently stiffen—with no warning at all; he dropped his hands and he stared at the boy and he left the cell.

"All that singing they do," he said. "All that singing." He could not remember the first time he had heard it; he had been hearing it all his life. It was the sound with which he was most familiar—though it was also the sound of which he had been least conscious—and it had always contained an obscure comfort. They were singing to God. They were singing for mercy and they hoped to go to heaven, and he had even sometimes felt, when looking into the eyes of some of the old women, a few of the very old men, that they were singing for mercy for his soul, too. Of course he had never thought of their heaven or of what God was, or could be, for them; God was the same for everyone, he supposed, and heaven was where good people went—he supposed. He had never thought much about what it meant to be a good person. He tried to be a good person and treat everybody right: it wasn't his fault if the niggers had taken it into their heads to fight against God and go against the rules laid down in the Bible for everyone to read! Any preacher would tell you that. He was only doing his duty: protecting white people from the niggers and the niggers from themselves. And there were still lots of good niggers around—he had to remember that; they weren't all like that boy this afternoon; and the good niggers must be mighty sad to see what was happening to their people. They would thank him when this was over. In that way they had, the best of them, not quite looking him in the eye, in a low voice, with a little smile: We surely thanks you, Mr. Jesse. From the bottom of our hearts, we thanks you. He smiled. They hadn't all gone crazy. This trouble would pass.—He knew that the young people had changed some of the words to the songs. He had scarcely listened to the words before and he did not listen to them now; but he knew that the words were different; he could hear that much. He did not know if the faces were different, he had never, before this trouble began, watched them as they sang, but he certainly did not like what he saw now. They hated him, and this hatred was blacker than their hearts, blacker than their skins, redder than their blood, and harder, by far, than his club. Each day, each night, he felt worn out, aching, with their smell in his nostrils and filling his lungs, as though he were drowning—drowning in niggers; and it was all to be done again when he awoke. It would never end. It would never end. Perhaps this was what the singing had meant all along. They had not been singing black folks into heaven, they had been singing white folks into hell.

Everyone felt this black suspicion in many ways, but no one knew how to express it. Men much older than he, who had been responsible for law and order much longer than he, were now much quieter than they had been, and the tone of their jokes, in a way that he could not quite put his finger on, had changed. These men were his models, they had been friends to his father, and they had taught him what it meant to be a man. He looked to them for courage now. It wasn't that he didn't know that what he was doing was right—he knew that, nobody had to tell him that; it was only that he missed the ease of former years. But they didn't have much time to hang out with each other these days. They tended to stay close to their families every free minute because nobody knew what might happen next. Explosions rocked the night of their tranquil town. Each time each man wondered silently if perhaps this time the dynamite had not fallen into the wrong hands. They thought that they knew where all the guns were; but they could not possibly know every move that was made in that secret place where the darkies lived. From time to time it was suggested that they form a posse and search the home of every nigger, but they hadn't done it yet. For one thing, this might have brought the bastards from the North down on their backs; for another, although the niggers were scattered throughout the town—down in the hollow near the railroad tracks, way west near the mills, up on the hill, the well-off ones, and some out near the college—nothing seemed to happen in one part of town without the niggers immediately knowing it in the other. This meant that they could not take them by surprise. They rarely mentioned it, but they knew that some of the niggers had guns. It stood to reason, as they said, since, after all, some of them had been in the Army. There were niggers in the Army right now and God knows they wouldn't have had any trouble stealing this half-assed government blind—the whole world was doing it, look at the European countries and all those countries in Africa. They made jokes about it—bitter jokes; and they cursed the government in Washington, which had betrayed them; but they had not yet formed a posse. Now, if their town had been laid out like some towns in the North, where all the niggers lived together in one locality, they could have gone down and set fire to the houses and brought about peace that way. If the niggers had all lived in one place, they could have kept the fire in one place. But the way this town was laid out, the fire could hardly be controlled. It would spread all over town—and the niggers would probably be helping it to spread. Still, from time to time, they spoke of doing it, anyway; so that now there was a real fear among them that somebody might go crazy and light the match.

They rarely mentioned anything not directly related to the war that they were fighting, but this had failed to establish between them the unspoken communication of soldiers during a war. Each man, in the thrilling silence which sped outward from their exchanges, their laughter, and their anecdotes, seemed wrestling, in various degrees of darkness, with a secret which he could not articulate to himself, and which, however directly it related to the war, related yet more surely to his privacy and his past. They could no longer be sure, after all, that they had all done the same things. They had never dreamed that their privacy could contain any element of terror, could threaten, that is, to reveal itself, to the scrutiny of a judgment day, while remaining unreadable and inaccessible to themselves; nor had they dreamed that the past, while certainly refusing to be forgotten, could yet so stubbornly refuse to be remembered. They felt themselves mysteriously set at naught, as no longer entering into the real concerns of other people—while here they were, out-numbered, fighting to save the civilized world. They had thought that people would care—people didn't care; not enough, anyway, to help them. It would have been a help, really, or at least a relief, even to have been forced to surrender. Thus they had lost, probably forever, their old and easy connection with each other. They were forced to depend on each other more and, at the same time, to trust each other less. Who could tell when one of them might not betray them all, for money, or for the ease of confession? But no one dared imagine what there might be to confess. They were soldiers fighting a war, but their relationship to each other was that of accomplices in a crime. They all had to keep their mouths shut.

I stepped in the river at Jordan.

Out of the darkness of the room, out of nowhere, the line came flying up at him, with the melody and the beat. He turned wordlessly toward his sleeping wife. I stepped in the river at Jordan. Where had he heard that song?

“Grace,” he whispered. “You awake?”

She did not answer. If she was awake, she wanted him to sleep. Her breathing was slow and easy, her body slowly rose and fell.

I stepped in the river at Jordan.

The water came to my knees.

He began to sweat. He felt an overwhelming fear, which yet contained a curious and dreadful pleasure.

I stepped in the river at Jordan.

The water came to my waist.

It had been night, as it was now, he was in the car between his mother and his father, sleepy, his head in his mother’s lap, sleepy, and yet full of excitement. The singing came from far away, across the dark fields. There were no lights anywhere. They had said good-bye to all the others and turned off on this dark dirt road. They were almost home.

I stepped in the river at Jordan,

The water came over my head,

I looked way over to the other side,

He was making up my dying bed!

“I guess they singing for him,” his father said, seeming very weary and subdued now. “Even when they’re sad, they sound like they just about to go and tear off a piece.” He yawned and leaned across the boy and slapped his wife lightly on the shoulder, allowing his hand to rest there for a moment. “Don’t they?”

“Don’t talk that way,” she said.

“Well, that’s what we going to do,” he said, “you can make up your mind to that.” He started whistling. “You see? When I begin to feel it, I gets kind of musical, too.”

Oh, Lord! Come on and ease my troubling mind!

He had a black friend, his age, eight, who lived nearby. His name was Otis. They wrestled together in the dirt. Now the thought of Otis made him sick. He began to shiver. His mother put her arm around him.

“He’s tired,” she said.

“We’ll be home soon,” said his father. He began to whistle again.

“We didn’t see Otis this morning,” Jesse said. He did not know why he said this. His voice, in the darkness of the car, sounded small and accusing.

“You haven’t seen Otis for a couple of mornings,” his mother said.

That was true. But he was only concerned about this morning.

“No,” said his father, “I reckon Otis’s folks was afraid to let him show himself this morning.”

“But Otis didn’t do nothing!” Now his voice sounded questioning.

"Otis can't do nothing," said his father, "he's too little." The car lights picked up their wooden house, which now solemnly approached them, the lights falling around it like yellow dust. Their dog, chained to a tree, began to bark.

"We just want to make sure Otis don't do nothing," said his father, and stopped the car. He looked down at Jesse. "And you tell him what your Daddy said, you hear?"

"Yes sir," he said.

His father switched off the lights. The dog moaned and pranced, but they ignored him and went inside. He could not sleep. He lay awake, hearing the night sounds, the dog yawning and moaning outside, the sawing of the crickets, the cry of the owl, dogs barking far away, then no sounds at all, just the heavy, endless buzzing of the night. The darkness pressed on his eyelids like a scratchy blanket. He turned, he turned again. He wanted to call his mother, but he knew his father would not like this. He was terribly afraid. Then he heard his father's voice in the other room, low, with a joke in it; but this did not help him, it frightened him more, he knew what was going to happen. He put his head under the blanket, then pushed his head out again, for fear, staring at the dark window. He heard his mother's moan, his father's sigh; he gritted his teeth. Then their bed began to rock. His father's breathing seemed to fill the world.

That morning, before the sun had gathered all its strength, men and women, some flushed and some pale with excitement, came with news. Jesse's father seemed to know what the news was before the first jalopy stopped in the yard, and he ran out, crying, "They got him, then? They got him?"

The first jalopy held eight people, three men and two women and three children. The children were sitting on the laps of the grown-ups. Jesse knew two of them, the two boys; they shyly and uncomfortably greeted each other. He did not know the girl.

"Yes, they got him," said one of the women, the older one, who wore a wide hat and a fancy, faded blue dress. "They found him early this morning."

"How far had he got?" Jesse's father asked.

"He hadn't got no further than Harkness," one of the men said. "Look like he got lost up there in all them trees—or maybe he just got so scared he couldn't move." They all laughed.

"Yes, and you know it's near a graveyard, too," said the younger woman, and they laughed again.

"Is that where they got him now?" asked Jesse's father.

By this time there were three cars piled behind the first one, with everyone looking excited and shining, and Jesse noticed that they were carrying food. It was like a Fourth of July picnic.

"Yeah, that's where he is," said one of the men, "declare, Jesse, you going to keep us here all day long, answering your damn fool questions. Come on, we ain't got no time to waste."

"Don't bother putting up no food," cried a woman from one of the other cars, "we got enough. Just come on."

"Why, thank you," said Jesse's father, "we be right along, then."

"I better get a sweater for the boy," said his mother, "in case it turns cold."

Jesse watched his mother's thin legs cross the yard. He knew that she also wanted to comb her hair a little and maybe put on a better dress, the dress she wore to church. His father guessed this, too, for he yelled behind her, "Now don't you go trying to turn yourself into no movie star. You just come on." But he laughed as he said this, and winked at the men; his wife was younger and prettier than most of the other women. He clapped Jesse on the head and started pulling him toward the car. "You all go on," he said, "I'll be right behind you. Jesse, you go tie up that there dog while I get this car started."

The cars sputtered and coughed and shook; the caravan began to move; bright dust filled the air. As soon as he was tied up, the dog began to bark. Jesse's mother came out of the house, carrying a jacket for his father and a sweater for Jesse. She had put a ribbon in her hair and had an old shawl around her shoulders.

"Put these in the car, son," she said, and handed everything to him. She bent down and stroked the dog, looked to see if there was water in his bowl, then went back up the three porch steps and closed the door.

"Come on," said his father, "ain't nothing in there for nobody to steal." He was sitting in the car, which trembled and belched. The last car of the caravan had disappeared but the sound of singing floated behind them.

Jesse got into the car, sitting close to his father, loving the smell of the car, and the trembling, and the bright day, and the sense of going on a great and unexpected journey. His mother got in and closed the door and the car began to move. Not until then did he ask, "Where are we going? Are we going on a picnic?"

He had a feeling that he knew where they were going, but he was not sure.

"That's right," his father said, "we're going on a picnic. You won't ever forget this picnic—!"

"Are we," he asked, after a moment, "going to see the bad nigger—the one that knocked down old Miss Standish?"

"Well, I reckon," said his mother, "that we might see him."

He started to ask, Will a lot of niggers be there? Will Otis be there?—but he did not ask his question, to which, in a strange and uncomfortable way, he already knew the answer. Their friends, in the other cars, stretched up the road as far as he could see; other cars had joined them; there were cars behind them. They were singing. The sun seemed suddenly very hot, and he was at once very happy and a little afraid. He did not quite understand what was happening, and he did not know what to ask—he had no one to ask. He had grown accustomed, for the solution of such mysteries, to go to Otis. He felt that Otis knew everything. But he could not ask Otis about this. Anyway, he had not seen Otis for two days; he had not seen a black face anywhere for more than two days; and he now realized, as they began chugging up the long hill which eventually led to Harkness, that there were no black faces on the road this morning, no black people anywhere. From the houses in which they lived, all along the road, no smoke curled, no life stirred—maybe one or two chickens were to be seen, that was all. There was no one at the windows, no one in the yard, no one sitting on the porches, and the doors were closed. He had come this road many a time and seen women washing in the yard (there were no clothes on the clotheslines), men working in the fields, children playing in the dust; black men passed them on the road other mornings, other days, on foot, or in wagons, sometimes in cars, tipping their hats, smiling, joking, their teeth a solid white against their skin, their eyes as warm as the sun, the blackness of their skin like dull fire against the white or the blue or the grey of their torn clothes. They passed the nigger church—dead-white, desolate, locked up; and the graveyard, where no one knelt or walked, and he saw no flowers. He wanted to ask, Where are they? Where are they all? But he did not dare. As the hill grew steeper, the sun grew colder. He looked at his mother and his father. They looked straight ahead, seeming to be listening to the singing which echoed and echoed in this graveyard silence. They were strangers to him now. They were looking at something he could not see. His father's lips had a strange, cruel curve, he wet his lips from time to time, and swallowed. He was terribly aware of his father's tongue, it was as though he had never seen it before. And his father's body suddenly seemed immense, bigger than a mountain. His eyes, which were grey-green, looked yellow in the sunlight; or at least there was a light in them which he had never seen before. His mother patted her hair and adjusted the ribbon, leaning forward to look into the car mirror. "You look all right," said his father, and laughed. "When that nigger looks at you, he's going to swear he threw his life away for nothing. Wouldn't be surprised if he don't come back to haunt you." And he laughed again.

