Acknowledgments

This book is dedicated to everyone who has reached out to me with their stories. Without their sincerity, this book would not have been possible.

So many wonderful individuals have helped me with this book, yet some have asked for anonymity. These are difficult issues, so I understand why anyone would want to remain unknown. A number of accounts are told using a pseudonym, or just their first name. There are a very few places where unimportant details were purposely changed to better hide the identity of the witness. This book is very much a product of the digital age, and a lot of the quoted correspondence is cited from email. There are points throughout where these passages are revised very slightly for clarity and grammar.

I owe a debt of gratitude to all these comrades and so many more: Aaron, Colin Andrews, Annalie, Kim Arnold, Ashlee, Tracie Austin, Kenneth Bakerman, Brigitte Barclay, Kevin Bartell, Anthony and Rachel Beckett, Ben, David Biedny, Joan Bird, Christopher Bledsoe Sr., Håkan Blomqvist, Brendan, Anya Briggs, Charis Melina Brown, Will Bueche, Grant Cameron, Kristen Lee Cardinal, Kim Carlsberg, James Carman, John Carpenter, Alan Caviness, Suzanne Chancellor, Will Christie, Carol Cleveland, Heather Clewett-Jachowski, Joseph-Mark Cohen, Steve Colbern, Janet Elizabeth Colli, Peter Collori, Lorin Cutts, Cynthia, Megan Dafoe, Miriam Delicado, Derek, Richard Dolan, Shelly Dove, Adrienne Dumas, Stephen and Lisa Dyer, Erika Earles, Peter Faust, Tom Fieger, Lorraine Flaherty, Marla Frees, Lonn Friend, Jill G., Robbie Graham, Alan Green, Alan Green, Kim Greenfield, Melanie Griffin, Rosemary Ellen Guiley, Gypsy Woman, Cam Hale, Micah Hanks, Lucretia Heart, Lauren Heeren, Sesh Heri, Rey Hernandez, Race Hobbs, Chris Holly, Cathy Hohmeyer, Budd Hopkins, Michael M. Foreword

by Richard M. Dolan

You are about to read one of the most original books ever written on UFOs, one that will make any thoughtful person ask fundamental questions about the nature of reality itself. More than any work in recent memory, it successfully ties the UFO phenomenon not simply to possible extraterrestrial intelligences, but to synchronicities, ancient archetypes, dreams, shamanistic experiences, magic, personal transformation, and death.

And owls. Because Mike Clelland has gathered together compelling and persuasive accounts from innumerable people who have had UFO sightings and apparent abduction experiences in conjunction with absolutely bizarre experiences with owls. Yes, real owls, not owls as screen memories (although as anyone familiar with abduction research knows, this has often been reported).

The accounts of these people—including those of Mike himself—suggest undeniable synchronicities at work. That is, coincidences that are highly meaningful to the persons involved. So meaningful in some cases that they seem staged for that person, and usually in a manner that only that person could decipher.

This is heady stuff for those of us raised in the standard western-based materialistic rendition of reality, one with a comprehensible cause and effect, and one in which there are no unseen intelligences playing us like characters in a video game. And yet, as one goes through account after account of meticulously documented experiences, it becomes hard to avoid thinking along these lines.

Some of the synchronicities in this book defy common sense. Mike writes about two women living only 43 miles apart from each other in Massachusetts with experiences so parallel, with such similarity in detail, that they seem like bookends. Both had a kind of mystical experience after a focused intention that had a profound effect on their lives. Both of them had this experience while lying on their outdoor hammock. For both of them, their event started while they were alone, and both were soon joined by their child and husband. They were even friends on Facebook, although unaware of each other's hammock experience. They even look remarkably alike. For one of the women, the mystical encounter involved two owls; for the other, it was the sighting of a UFO. As Mike wrote, "it feels like the owl and UFO are, in many ways, playing the same metaphysical role in each story." Even stranger perhaps, Mike happened to interview these two women one day apart from each other.

Other stories included here suggest that owls play a role in a number of alien or UFO encounters. One witness stated that his contact experiences "were often preceded or followed by the sound of owls on top of my house hooting." Others seem to have been directed to see UFOs because of actions by owls. In one case, a husband and wife were relaxing together on a dock when the hooting of an owl led directly to the couple seeing an inexplicable UFO high in the sky.

Mike Clelland has made several contributions toward understanding UFOs and the phenomenon of encounters with apparent alien beings. One of these is his notion of "the maybe people." The idea of UFO abduction is fraught with preconceptions and baggage, and a very specific idea has emerged of what it is supposed to involve. There are certainly accounts that play out with all the harrowing details of getting plucked from a lonely road or a bedroom at night. But there is a more subtle gray zone, where large numbers of people have described many of the strange aspects relating to this mystery, yet without any UFO contact. Mike's concept of "the maybe people" underscores the complexity of this phenomenon.

But this is more than a UFO book. In these accounts, the presence of owls signify important personal and transformative events in a person's life. Certainly, this can include a UFO encounter, but these owls are also serving as harbingers of other forms of spiritual awakening. And they are connected to death—the ultimate transformation. What's interesting is that this is precisely how ancient people understood owls. It is in fact a restatement of their ancient archetype: the ability to peer into the darkness representing an ability to penetrate the dark mysteries of existence.

One of these stories concerns a woman who saw a large white owl outside her window as she was jolted out of a sound sleep. It sat on a bare branch, positioned perfectly for her to see it. The next morning, she again woke with a start. Just as she sat up in bed, the phone rang, informing her of the death of a family member. This woman also had multiple UFO sightings, a near-death experience, possessed psychic abilities, and had other strange events occur in her life. As Mike wrote, "it's as if her lifetime of unusual experiences created an opening that morning for an owl to land on that bare branch. It could be that this owl was delivering a message, sad though it may have been, to someone with the life experiences that would allow her to receive it."

Another account described here concerns a man who was literally touched on the forehead by the wing of an owl that flew alongside his car as he drove. The owl and the man locked eyes in "some sort of hypnotic trance" before it glided off. Of course, this itself is practically unheard of, but several other elements make this event mysterious and profound. As Mike takes us into its progressively deeper layers, we see it intimately connecting to the man's medical history, his psychic flashes, a close up UFO sighting from his front door, his long lost sibling, and much more. We discern the pattern of a transcendent intelligence.

Among the most poignant stories in this book concerns a woman who's suicide surely seems to have been prevented by the appearance of an owl at exactly the right moment. The manner in which this happened is, like so many stories in this book, uncanny. The encounter with the owl stunned her, and it triggered a deep realization to face her fears and recognize that life would get better. In this story, like all the others in this book, there are layers of meaning that are made clear as we go deeper into the experience.

Something very odd is going on in our world. It is not simply the manifestation into our physical reality of things that western culture merely considers symbolic or archetypal. It is also that these manifestations appear in a bizarrely synchronistic manner. It is as if someone or some intelligence is pulling the strings of our reality, and doing so in order to tell us something. To teach us.

So, what are these owls doing? Mike believes they are best seen as messengers, hence the title of this book. And what is the message? Somehow, it has to do with transformation, and the need to wake up and pay attention. Pay attention to what is going on in your life, and to the true nature of reality. As he puts it, “when someone is deeply asleep, whispering won’t wake them. Sometimes you have to really shake them. If that doesn’t work, send in the owls.”

Although this book includes intriguing stories from so many people, the main journey here is that of the author himself. Mike Clelland has examined his life with a rare commitment to the truth. It isn’t that he planned to undertake this project. Rather, as he said, something triggered it. That something, as strange as it would seem, was owls. When he began exploring his own past with bravery and honesty, he found much more than he had ever imagined. During this process, he went through moments of great duress and even questioned his own sanity. He has now come to terms with his own alien encounters, which he describes here with great detail and power. Indeed, the event he aptly calls his “confirmation event,” is nothing short of mind-blowing. It’s refreshing, too, that he writes about all this not as a victim, nor as some sort of new age prophet. In telling his story, Mike simply strips away all pretense and dedicates himself to exposing the truth as best he can. As a result, his deeply personal journey is one that we can all relate to.

His research itself was filled with oddities. During the writing of this book, he related to me how the stories themselves would arrive to his email in a synchronistic flurry. And while it is obvious that he has done a great deal of research in creating this wonderful book, he strongly believes that the core of it happened “magically.” One might well wonder if a guiding intelligence has simply used him as the conduit for making it happen. Mike seems to feel that way.

Like all works of great originality, The Messengers can be hard to describe because there are no clean and neat categories within which to place it. Perhaps the book that feels the most like this one is Whitley Strieber’s classic, Communion, another profound and personal journey that explores the high strangeness of alien encounters. Even so, The Messengers is something new.

I believe Mike Clelland is taking the study of UFOs and what we loosely call the paranormal into a new and fresh direction. It is as if he has opened up a new vision of exploring our reality, a new vein in which to explore and dig further. Answers will be hard to come by. But the questions make it all worthwhile.

Introduction

Owls, whether real or symbolic, are somehow intertwined with the UFO abduction phenomenon. I am firmly convinced of this connection. Why they are connected and what it might mean is another matter.

Seeing an owl in the wild can feel unnerving, they project something intense, almost sinister. Their mere presence has a power. People are in awe of owls, and it's very common for folks to describe an owl sighting as an honor or a blessing. Throughout the ages the owl has held a place as both wise and evil, and when seeing an owl yourself, it's easy to understand how that mythology has emerged. Those big eyes seem to have the power to pierce the soul.

Owls can navigate the darkness, and this is a metaphor for passing beyond the veil and into the unknown. Ancient sages saw the role of the owl as traveling to and from the hidden places we can't perceive, bringing back messages from the great beyond.

The owl isn't just a bird with big eyes. It is a symbol.

It's easy to project supernatural characteristics onto the owl, something I do more than I should. The owl is an expression of all things mysterious, so when we confront an owl we are confronting a mystery, perhaps the ultimate mystery. The same can be said for confronting a UFO.

I love stories. At this point I have read or heard thousands of amazing owl stories, and I continue to be swept away by the power of what I am hearing. The sheer volume of what I've found, or what has found me, has changed the simplistic way I once looked at the world. There is a sense—a knowing—that a troupe of arcane forces, both physical and mystical, has intersected with our reality.

On one level this book is merely a set of stories about owls, UFOs and all the emotions that come along with these two overlapping subjects. What is emerging is that real owls are showing up for real people. These mythic birds are still performing their ancient role, messages are still being delivered.

Beyond just a collection of stories, this book is a personal odyssey, an account of my own journey. Both owls and UFOs have somehow invaded my life. I have been confronted with a mystery that is both seductive and scary, and the challenge has been not to shy away from the paranoia and uncertainty that comes with looking inward. My task as an author has been to find meaning in a set of ideas that are, on some level, unknowable.

I haven't given anyone a lie detector test, or performed background checks on the people who have brought me their stories. I am not an academic, and I have no training in investigative techniques. There are only a few stories with multiple witnesses, and in those cases I've made an effort to talk with each person involved. What I want to see is some grand pattern in all these experiences, but what I'm finding won't fit into a clean spreadsheet of data. Instead, it's much more of a mood, or a vibe. Even though each narrative is different, they all evoke a similar feeling, and I am trusting that. It is this ethereal mood I hope to convey, much more than any attempts at conclusions. There are no one-offs in this book, any story here is part of a bigger pattern. What you are reading is small part of a bigger pool of similar reports.

Some of these stories have the quality of an ancient fable shared around the campfire. My concern is that overly scrutinizing each account might sabotage their deeper meaning. Yes, examining the details and the patterns is required, but I try to keep it to a minimum. I feel these stories should be felt at a heart level, where their true power emerges. One woman described what I am doing as creating a sacred space where these ideas are allowed. I took her comment very seriously.

There is a heartfelt depth and power in these owl and UFO accounts, and that includes the ones you aren't hearing. It feels terrible that I can't share more of these remarkable stories here, but this book would have been far too long to include all of them. Just know, that behind each and every anecdote you are about to read is a grand novel that has yet to be written.

I feel a bond and a closeness to the people who have shared so much with me. Their life events are emotional, challenging and complex—each with their own deeper message. Every person who has shared their experiences with me deserves their own long chapter, if not their own entire biography. Because of that, there is a set of these longer stories in a companion book titled Stories from The Messengers.

I am deeply indebted and grateful to every single person who has helped me with this very personal obsession. I appreciate you, from my heart, more than I can ever say.

—Mike Clelland, 2015

PART I PERCEIVING OWLS

Chapter 1: Owls at Sunset

Any path is only a path, and there is no affront, to oneself or to others, in dropping it if that is what your heart tells you to do... Look at every path closely and deliberately... Then ask yourself, and yourself alone, one question... Does this path have a heart? If it does, the path is good; if it doesn't, it is of no use.

—Carlos Castaneda, The Teachings of Don Juan

Owls started manifesting in my life with a flurry of weirdness in the autumn of 2006. It happened while camping with a young woman that I hardly knew. Her name is Kristen and we went out for one night in the mountains near my home.

We had hiked several miles to a beautiful spot and we were sitting together on a big flat rock in the middle of an open meadow. The sun was setting and it was warm and calm. We talked as I prepared dinner on a small camp stove. It was that magic twilight time and the moon was rising. Our conversation reached a point where we were opening up about our spiritual beliefs and insights. As I listened to Kristen, there was a moment when I recognized something truly impressive about her. There came a point in our conversation when I felt a really strong and delightful connection. It was hugely life affirming.

Right at that moment an owl swooped over us, literally just a few feet above our heads. This was a beautiful sighting and we were both delighted. Then there was another owl. And then a third.

All three were circling and swooping silently above us. It lasted for over an hour. During this time, we set out our sleeping bags to sleep under the stars. As we lay there looking up at the night sky, the owls would swoop right above our faces, blotting out the stars for a brief instant. Owls have specialized feathers so they are amazingly quiet, this eerie silence made the entire experience all the more strange.

It was absolutely magical.

It was almost three years later when I recognized the synchronistic intensity of the arrival of those owls. I called Kristen on the phone to ask if she remembered what we were talking about when that first owl swooped above us. This was the point when I realized we were both on exactly the same spiritual wavelength.

Without hesitating she said, “Oh yeah, I remember exactly what I was saying. I was trying to articulate my deepest beliefs about God. It was right at that moment that the owls appeared.”

I was shocked at the magnitude of what she said. Whatever was going on, that one detail adds a depth to the overall experience that tips it into the realm of the transcendent.

The morning after Kristen and I saw the owls dawned calm and clear. We hiked along a series of beautiful trails taking a different route back to the car. We talked excitedly, marveling about the owls from the night before. In the final mile of the hike we met an old girlfriend of mine on the trail. I’ll call her Carol (a pseudonym), she was now married and she was walking with her young daughter and son. Ever since we split up there had been an awkward tension between us, especially because we both live in the same small town.

I picked up her little boy and carried him while Kristen walked a little bit ahead of us on the trail with her daughter, both of them holding hands. Carol and I had the conversation I had been waiting to have for over five years. It was calm and hugely reassuring. A short time later Kristen and I said goodbye to Carol and her kids in the dusty parking lot. After we parted, Kristen excitedly told me that talking with that little girl was the most important thing that has ever happened in her life. I couldn't quite grasp what she was saying but there was something about the little girl that reminded Kristen of herself when she was that age.

I should add that four years later, in 2010, I had another chance meeting with Carol, her kids, and a closeup sighting of a great horned owl in full daylight. This shared experience, told later in the book, plays out within a web of heartwarming synchronicities.

Less than a week later, Kristen and I went out camping again. We were in a completely different area of the mountains. Once again, it was just a single night of camping. In the evening, just as the sun was setting, we both felt a little bit cold. I suggested we walk up to a nearby hilltop to see the view. This would warm us up a little before going to sleep.

We did the short hike, maybe ten minutes, up to the gentle rounded hill. Within seconds of getting to the top, we had the exact same experience. Three owls appeared and flew around us! They swooped in close and perched on nearby branches. They eventually landed on the ground within a few yards of where we stood and stared at us—this is very unusual behavior, owls standing so close to us. The whole thing lasted about half an hour. Kristen and I just stood there the whole time in a tingly state of astonishment. I think these were short eared owls, a common species in these mountains. Now this may seem funny, but I'm pretty sure it was the same three owls from earlier in the week.

Just like before, the experience was absolutely magical!

After all my years of compulsively reading UFO literature, I was very familiar with the recurrence of owls as a screen memory within the experiences reported by abductees. I was keenly aware that this might be a possibility. Right in the moment, I was super focused on these three owls as they swooped low over us, watched us from trees and landed on the ground right up close to us. I feel confident in declaring those were, in fact, real owls.

Seeing three owls once was pretty neat, but having the same experience just a few days later was positively bizarre.

In the time after this second event, both Kristen and I were searching the internet for anything on spirit animals and mystical insights surrounding owls. The results were curious. One thing kept coming up, that this is a sign to face your fears, and Kristen felt strongly that was an important message for her.

For me, the intensity of our owl experiences created a weird emotional urgency. I saw the whole thing as terribly important, but couldn't figure out any meaning. I was getting swallowed up in a kind of fanatical madness, and that made everything between Kristen and me really awkward. I'm 18 years older, and this age difference created a lot of weirdness, but at the same time we were seeing each other almost every day. We were constantly emailing and phoning, much of this in an attempt to decipher any deeper meaning to those owls. Despite the tensions, there was a real connection between us, and our time together was a swirling cloud of cryptic synchronicities. Kristen calls me a "kindred spirit," and that feels like an understatement. She left town about a month after we saw those owls, moving back to her hometown in Michigan.

I posted this story about Kristen and the owls on my blog on March 4, 2009, and this was only the second day of the blog's incarnation. The very first comment came from none other than Whitley Strieber. He authored what is probably the single most important book on the alien contact experience, Communion (1987). I suspect he read the essay and just zipped out a rapid fire reply. That said, I'm impressed at the outright divinity of his comment.

The grays come in threes. They often appear as owls. Contrary to popular belief, they are profoundly surrendered to God. We find this frightening, because we are not. An experience like that is mostly outside of space and time. You need not look back on it. It is always happening for you both and all who know of it, forever. So, thank you!

I was shocked to see his comment at a point when pretty much nobody could have known about my blog. I found out later that my friend Mac Tonnies had sent him a Twitter link to the story. His references to God came before I realized that Kristen had been talking about God at the exact moment of our initial sighting.

I asked Kristen about her feelings on what our shared owl experience meant to her. Below is an excerpt from an email. In it she is responding to my question as well as Strieber's comment. Here's her thoughtful reply:

I am all about the divine aspect of this whole thing. Obviously. I like that he [Strieber] said that, about being connected to God. Because that night I saw the owls and whenever I dream of them, that is the benevolent sort of “spirit guide” feeling I get. Not that they are otherworldly, but that they are in-worldly.

Because there’s no way that I could explain any of this outside of the context of God. And, you know, not “God” in the “because the Bible tells me so” sense, but God in the real, eternal, “I know this much is true” sense. And by God I mean the all-that-is.

That’s what I felt and that’s what I feel...that if anything happened that night, it was definitely some sort of communion with the all-that-is. (As I was just writing that sentence, I remembered that Whitley Strieber’s book was called Communion, right?)

Kristen pretty much sums up what I feel in my gut. Owls and UFOs are some sort of communion with the all-that-is. I am attempting to explore one tiny fragment of the UFO phenomenon, that being the presence of owls. But on a purely intuitive level they are reflecting back the all-that-is.

Memories that haunted me

I have a set of memories from my youth that paint a disturbing picture—three events that had always haunted me. In 1974, as a 12-year old boy, I had a very clear UFO sighting at night. I was with a friend and we both watched a coffee-can-shaped craft out his bedroom window. It was slowly descending and rotating in an eerily smooth motion. It’s hard to say how big it was, but it seemed about the size of a van, and it felt close to his home. We watched it gliding downward for maybe less than a minute and then it simply disappeared.

Northville Michigan, 1974

A few months later while walking home from a high school football game on a Friday night with a friend, we both saw an odd orange flash in the sky. This happened just a block away from my house. Right in the moment we both commented that it was jarring. When I got home my parents were angry at me for being out so late. It should have been about 9:30, but it was nearly 11:30. It seems that I had about two-hours of missing of time. The next Monday at school he told me he saw, “A UFO with lights and everything.”

I was 30 years old in the winter of 1993 and living alone in a small house in Maine. I woke up in the middle of the night because a bright light was shining into the room. I sat up in bed, looked out my bedroom window, and saw five spindly aliens walking towards the house. These were the typical gray beings that get reported, they had oversized bald heads and huge black eyes. This should have been terrifying, but I felt absolutely nothing. I was oddly sucked dry of any emotion. After a few moments of looking at these beings, I heard a voice in my head say: “Oh yes, they’re here. Now is the time to put your head on the pillow and black out.” And that’s exactly what I did. The next morning I dismissed the entire thing as just a wildly vivid dream and I never even bothered to look for footprints in the snow (this event is revisited later in this chapter).

These three events define my more overt experiences. I've also had plenty of less overt episodes like psychic impressions, hyper-vivid predictive dreams, an obsession with UFOs and profound synchronicities. Yet, I had spent my life actively denying that there was anything unusual about these heavy-handed memories. But at the same time there was a building pressure. I recognized what it all pointed to, but I was working hard to ignore the implications. The time was rapidly approaching when I would need to look into what I suspected might be at play in my life.

The owl sightings with Kristen came in September of 2006, when I was 44 years old. This was exactly the point in my life when all those confusing experiences and their UFO implications were refusing to stay buried.

These memories were in the forefront of my mind during both those weird owl episodes in the mountains with Kristen. Right in the moment, as I was looking at those owls, there was an alarm in my head blaring, "This is real! This has something to do with the UFOs!" I was seeing owls, but my mind was screaming UFOs. The message I heard was clear—You are a UFO abductee! This connection might seem illogical, but all I can say is right then I felt a strong sense of knowing. It took great strength to put the lid on that voice in my head and hide it away. The problem was that the owl sightings continued and the pressure kept building.

It was easy to ignore all my UFO experiences, I mean, those just seemed absurd. But I couldn't ignore what was happening with all the owls. When someone is deeply asleep, whispering won't wake them. Sometimes you have to really shake them. If that doesn't work, send in the owls.

The owls came in tandem with a set of insanely powerful synchronicities, so much so that they seem like one thing. Synchronicity is the term for a powerful coincidence that is meaningful to the person experiencing it, so much so that it can feel magical. These experiences are so vital that the word synchronicity is in the title of this book. From my direct experience there is a blurry line between synchronicity and owls. I don't think a mere mortal could untangle these arcane threads, so I won't even try. I was stuck and the owls changed me. The person I once was is gone and it was the owls that pushed me over that cliff.

Seeing those owls with Kristen was the initial awakening event for me. I will refer back to those two evenings throughout this book. That experience stands as a sort of baseline, and everything to come will get piled onto that foundation.

Owl in the desert

What follows is a good example of an owl showing up in relation to a UFO sighting; it was told to me by a guy named Derek. There is a lot to the story, implying a depth that goes beyond just the initial event. Derek was camping in the Arizona desert in the summer of 1995 with three friends. Here's what he wrote (italics my own):

We had set up our tents in a long canyon with steep walls on either side of us. Two of my friends had gone into a tent to retire early and I stayed up to talk and star gaze with the other guy. The night sky was incredible and we were lying on the desert floor in line with the canyon.

In mid conversation, I noticed an extremely large owl sitting on top of a cactus maybe 20 feet from where we were lying. I could see it really clearly and I had not seen it land there nor did I know how long it had been sitting there, but it was staring directly at us. I clearly remember not only feeling really excited at spotting it but also a little uneasy at how intently it seemed to be watching us. I felt very exposed. I think the scale and openness of the desert kind of struck me in that moment. As soon as I pointed it out to my friend, it took off in flight.

We resumed our conversation and a bit more time passed, maybe 15 minutes or so. As we are talking, I see a large black triangular craft flying from behind us along the top canyon wall to our left. It was wedge shaped, a very dark matte black and had a row of red lights with smaller white lights between each red light along its side. It flew silently, extremely quickly and completely mirrored (or hugged) the topography of the top of the canyon wall as it flew. It went from entering my peripheral vision towards the horizon in the direction of our feet and out of view in approximately five-seconds. That said, I feel like I got a pretty clear look at it. It was really close, maybe 75 yards away. It was large, about two-thirds the size of a commercial airliner. It was completely silent. It was really fast.

We both immediately sat up and I turned to my friend and asked him, "Did you see that?" To which he responded, "Yes." I asked, "What did you see?" His response matched exactly what I described above. I asked him if he thought it could have been an airplane. He didn't think so.

A few days later, Derek saw another unidentified flying object with one of his fellow campers who had been sleeping through this first sighting. They were driving together in Scottsdale, Arizona at about 11 p.m.

My car at the time had a sunroof and we were driving on a long, perfectly straight road that reached to the horizon. As we were chatting, we saw a very brightly lit sphere come over the sunroof and proceed to the horizon centered directly above the road. It was fast, significantly faster than any plane I have ever witnessed, but it stayed visible in the sky far too long to be a meteor. I have no idea of knowing the altitude of the object but it appeared slightly smaller than a golf ball held at arms' length.

This witness describes two strange UFO sightings that were preceded by an owl sighting. The owl was looking directly at him and his friend. He states that he felt uneasy under the intense gaze of the owl. From all that I've heard in this research, the details of his story are curiously normal, this includes the owl right before the sighting.

In a followup email, Derek shared some more experiences from his youth, including this memory from when he was about seven years old.

One evening I was playing a replica of the arcade version of pac-man. I was alone in a room in our house with all the lights off. That's a little unusual because I have been scared of the dark for most of my life and was especially so as a child. I remember as I was playing the game something very unusual happened. In an instant I felt like time slowed to a crawl and then I snapped out of that sensation almost immediately to find my nose absolutely flowing with blood. This was not a typical nosebleed, it was really running. I calmly walked into another room to tell my mother and she was beside herself at the sight of my bloody face.

For anyone with even a little bit of awareness of the abduction lore, this experience should cause some alarms to go off. There are no UFOs involved, but the slowing of time and the bloody nose are both commonly reported by abductees. These clues aren't enough to declare that Derek has had some sort of direct contact, but they certainly imply something is going on, and that it's very strange. He also admitted that from around this time in his youth he had an obsession with UFOs, something that has continued to this day.

Derek also wrote to me about something that happened recently. His girlfriend, who has zero interest in the UFO subject, saw "an alien" in their bedroom. She is quite certain that she was awake and it wasn't a dream. She described it as somehow shape-shifting, she was panicked and she squeezed her eyes shut. She resisted trying to wake him because she thought by waking him in its presence that maybe, "they wouldn't be able to return him to his body" (her words). That's quite a striking statement from someone without any interest in UFOs.

His memories continue, this time in the form of what might have been a dream. He writes:

I have had some very "real" feeling dreams that are not at all vague. One included being levitated out of my bed by six beings, three on each side of me. I was floating at their shoulder height and I left my apartment building through the wall. I was very scared. I cannot recall what happened outside of my home but I do recall being returned to my bed and placed on my stomach.

The implications of that dream are transparent. In the same email Derek talked about his personal evolution. He described what has been unfolding presently in his life.

In the last few years something very interesting, unexpected and wonderful has happened to me. I've found myself opening up, learning, knowing and growing in ways I never would have considered just a few years back. It feels very much like what one would describe as a spiritual awakening. I spend little to no time thinking about the nuts and bolts type speculation in the UFO community. I have become much more interested in issues like consciousness, enlightenment, purpose, knowing, and growing. I've slowly started to meditate. I find myself open to things I would have scoffed at in the past, they almost make very clear sense to me now!

His spiritual awakening seems intertwined with his UFO experiences. I can't help but recognize myself in this part of his personal account. Like me, Derek is someone with multiple UFO sightings, odd childhood memories, an expanded consciousness—and, for some reason, an owl shows up as a pivotal player in the overall narrative. Also, he is cautious and unsure of the source of the experience. I can't help but think that the owl is playing the role of an alarm clock, trying to wake up the experiencer. Something is happening and it implies that there is a lot more to reality than what we have been taught.

Birth of the blog

In March of 2009, I started an online blog called Hidden Experience. I felt a need, or perhaps a compulsion, to document my own life events in this very public forum. The initial posts were about my own personal synchronicities and my own owl sightings, and there have been a lot of both of these. I have also been writing about my own struggles with the UFO abduction phenomenon, and how it seems somehow connected to my life—and also connected to owls.

I've also been hosting a series of podcasts, and at this point I probably have well over 200 hours of audio interviews posted on my site. The focus of most of these interviews is UFO abduction, I'm either talking to researchers or people who have had the direct experience. I should say that these audio interviews, like the blog itself, is a form of personal therapy.

In both my research and personal experiences, I've been seeing a parallel between the alien abduction lore and people seeing owls. I am fascinated by any story that reveals this improbable relationship. There is an almost mystical knowing inside me that sees a connection between these two arcane elements—owls and UFOs.

I've written a lot on this owl stuff over the years, and in July of 2013 I posted a long format essay titled Owls and the UFO Abductee. That essay is the foundation for this book you are reading now.

I'm the owl guy

If you Google UFOs and owls, my name is the first thing that comes up. So, if someone out there has had an experience that involves both UFOs and owls, and they want to research it, they're going to find me. At this point there are also a handful of presentations that I've given at conferences and some are posted on Youtube. These videos are me at a podium talking about my owl research.

Because of all this, I'm now known as the owl guy. I've used the blog to put out a request for folks to contact me and share their own owl experiences. What's happened is that I'm getting a steady flow of really amazing owl stories from people who need to share their experiences.

The way all this owl stuff emerged traces back to my own experiences with owls. I've simply made it a point that anyone I talk to, whether it's a researcher or an experiencer, I will ask this one question: have you ever had any odd owl experiences? It's not one hundred percent of the people, but a surprising number will have an odd story to tell. I've been publicly asking that same question on my site, during my interviews and at conferences.

A lot of amazing owl stories have been arriving in my email inbox. Presently, it is about one a day. I have made the effort to get back to each one of these people, but sometimes it can be hard to keep up. Before I can reply in any meaningful way, there are new owl stories accumulating. These are from sincere people who are confused and uneasy about what has happened to them. So I've been collecting, documenting and archiving these owl events in relation to UFOs. I feel less like a researcher, and more like a folklorist. I deeply appreciate that people are reaching out to me with their stories, and I take this responsibility seriously.

I didn't choose to study owls. They chose me. When I turned my attention to this research I figured I would collect some interesting anecdotes, type up an article and be done with it. That was the genesis of the essay posted online in the summer of 2013. I had no idea that for the next few years my life would be consumed by this focused avenue of inquiry.

Friedrich Nietzsche said, "When you look into an abyss, the abyss also looks into you."

Owls are an almost insignificant part of the UFO enigma, but within that tiny fractal is an allegory for the overall phenomenon. I am staggered by the volume of fascinating stories I've heard involving owls. It is far beyond anything I expected. What is presenting itself to me is so powerful that I can't help but wonder if I was somehow chosen to archive these reports and turn them into a book. Yes, that sounds presumptuous, but that's how it feels.

The maybe people

Researching this stuff means I talk with a lot of people who've had UFO experiences. On one end of the continuum are people who absolutely know they've had face to face contact with the UFO occupants. On the other end are people who will deny any kind of direct involvement UFOs or aliens, but they still have odd stories to tell. When digging just a little deeper into their experiences I'll often hear things that send up the red flags. They'll list off odd experiences that they'll dismiss as nothing, but that fit a pattern of what abductees will report.

People will tell odd stories of having had unaccountable blocks of time, from minutes to hours, and sometimes days. These missing time accounts are a primary clue in what might be a hidden experience. We are dealing with something that can erase memories and alter perceptions, so it becomes terribly difficult to truly know the extent of someone's experiences. Someone might have had nothing more than a chance sighting of a strange craft in the sky. Or, that may be just the tip of the iceberg, the totality of their experiences could be buried in their subconscious making any firm conclusion impossible.

Some folks tell of dramatic UFO sightings, but reject the notion that they might have been abducted. Often, these same people will tell of psychic experiences, vivid dreams, intense synchronicities, healing abilities, spiritual awakenings and a laundry list of other paranormal oddities.

The folks with clear memories of having direct interactions with the aliens while onboard a craft are, fairly or unfairly, easy to categorize. But a lot end up in a more elusive category. These are people who might be abductees, very little is definite, all they are left with is a fuzzy maybe.

These, to me, are the maybe people, the folks who've maybe been abducted by aliens. Curiously, it's these maybe people who seem to be seeing a lot of owls.

Doing the kind of research I do, I receive a lot of interesting UFO accounts as well as odd owl stories, mostly through email. I try to check in with all these folks and when I do, I make sure to ask each of them the big question:

Do you think you are a UFO abductee? When I asked Derek that question, even though he's had a lot of weird experiences, he answered with a very firm no. I understood his response, recognizing how deeply challenging this material can be. I feel a kinship with these folks, these maybe people, because in a lot of ways—they are me—or more correctly, the person I was.

Digging into these stories, I am less interested in what we would call UFO Abductee and more interested in the blurry nether world of the maybe experience. I sense there is an unsettlingly large portion of our population—and there is no way to know what that percentage might be—that fit this category. Even without the overt memories of abduction, these maybe people have had a subtle intrusion into their psyche. On the simplest level, it is as if these folks are granted a kind of insight into reality; they know that there is more going on than what we are taught in high school physics class.

Terminology

Imperfect though it might be, I'll be using the term maybe people throughout this book. I'm also using a few other imperfect terms: abductee, experiencer, and contactee. Each of these words might seem interchangeable, but they all imply something different, and each has its own conflicting baggage. Abductee would imply something negative—individuals being taken against their will by the UFO occupants. Contactee would imply something positive. Such people might see themselves as asked to take part in a grand cosmic fellowship. Experiencer, in the middle, is a little more neutral.

The word alien is used throughout this book, and some object to this because it implies a being from another planet. Others prefer visitors, ETs, UFO Occupants, or star beings. I know one woman who refers to them only as creatures. The dictionary has several definitions for alien, one of them is: "differing in nature or character typically to the point of incompatibility." This seems entirely acceptable

All these words fall short because none of this is straightforward. I sense a lot of overlap and blurring, a disparate gray zone where easy answers seem impossible.

I struggle because this stuff can be terribly complex, there's no simple way to sum up the conflicting experiences that get reported by real people. Some will tell hellish nightmare stories at the hands of their alien kidnappers. Others will tell blissful stories, as if they are communing with angels. I try my best not to weight one side more than the other, because I feel both of these experiences are very real.

There is both deep trauma and mystical transcendence woven into this phenomenon, and these opposite extremes need to be acknowledged. Ignoring one divergent aspect means willfully denying part of the mystery. I am now at the point where I feel that something far more bizarre and far more complex is going on than simply metal spaceships filled with little scientists. This is an assumption, and I am convinced it is far too simplistic.

Kim's unease

I've spoken on the phone with a woman named Kim. Like so many others, she told of some odd experiences, like weird synchronicities and seeing odd lights in the sky. She was cautious to admit it, but she was very worried that she might have had some sort of alien contact events in her life. During our very first phone conversation I asked, "Have you ever had any odd experiences with owls?"

I could tell she didn't quite get my question and she replied hesitantly, "Do you mean, like, lots of owl dreams, seeing owls at weird times and having them answer when I hoot?"

I laughed and told her yes, that's exactly what I meant. Kim described a dream of opening her closet and seeing a bunch of owls all lined up on a shelf. "I knew how tall they were because they all fit so well in that shelf." As we talked further and she told me more, I realized that she was one more of these maybe people. She'd had plenty of experiences that certainly pointed to UFO abduction, but connecting those dots was a bigger leap than she was prepared to take.

It isn't my place to call someone a UFO abductee if they aren't saying it themselves. I know all too well because other people have said as much to me and it's damned unsettling.

This research into owls and UFOs is essentially my own therapy. There are people with these experiences that I first spoke with in early stages of my own struggles, and over the years we've become friends and talk often. Some of these would be maybe people, or at least they started off that way. I've watched as they wrestle with their own memories, and more than a few have come to a point where they realize that they've had abduction experiences. This conversion comes very grudgingly. I fully understand that I've played a role in their own self-awareness, and I take that responsibility very seriously. I clearly see myself, my own transition, in their metamorphosis from maybe to certainty.

Kim and I had our first conversation when she was initially struggling with these challenging issues. In the interim years, I've followed her evolution, and I recently asked Kim the big question, "What is your sense of your own involvement with this weirdness?" And by this weirdness, I meant the UFO contact experience.

Her reply was that if the weirdness in her life is actually true then it explains what has happened. She told me, "In other words, it takes it all out of the speculation box and puts it in the oh shit category."

Like myself, Kim was born in 1962, and also like myself she started looking into her own experiences in 2006. Although we've never met, we grew up just a few miles from each other in the suburbs of Detroit. I am not sure what to make of these kinds of coincidences, all I can do is take note and pay attention.

It would be wrong to just assume that all these maybe people are in fact abductees, but it's my sense that a great many of them have had hidden experiences at the hands of the UFO occupants.

What I am also finding is that there is a wider range of experiences than just people being plucked from their bedrooms or along lonely roads at night by little aliens that erase their memories. That certainly plays a part in what gets reported, but there is a more elusive aspect. Some experiences are much more mystical, as if they are interacting with spirit entities or energy beings. These might not be beings in the way we imagine them to be, but a form of arcane consciousness that interacts at the level of the soul. Even though the contact event doesn't fit the UFO abduction model, the life changes do. These people tell of the same kind of spiritual awakening, emotional challenges—and lots more—that the abductees have endured in their lives.

Chapter 2: Owls as Screen Memory

An owl with boots

I sat in on an abductee support group while at a UFO conference in Laughlin, Nevada. This was like any other support meeting, like Alcoholics Anonymous, where people talk about their issues. There were about twenty of us in the room, all sitting in a circle. There was one guy who sat silently for almost the entire two-hour session, but near the end he raised his hand and cautiously asked: “Has anyone here had any experiences with owls?” He nearly jolted out of his chair when pretty much everybody in the room, including me, raised their hand.

After he got his wits back, he told a story of being alone in his car and driving down a dark country road at night. Along the edge of the pavement was a giant owl, standing about four feet tall. He slowed the car, rolled the window down and stopped directly next to the owl. It didn’t fly away. It just stood there. He said he got a very weird vibe, like the owl was angry and wanted him to leave. He drove off feeling confused and frightened.

This guy was a professional photographer, and not long after this event he went to take pictures of an owl nest in a wooded area near his home. When he saw the real owls in their nest, he immediately thought, “I don’t think that was an owl I saw that night.” He eventually used hypnosis to try to retrieve a more detailed memory but all he came up with was that the giant owl on the side of the road was wearing boots!

The implication is what he saw wasn’t an owl. Instead, it was an illusory projection that was somehow beamed into his mind, making him think that what he saw on the side of the road was an owl. Within the small pool of abduction researchers, this kind of deception is called a screen memory. Instead of what it appeared to be, most researchers would conclude it was a small gray alien with oversized black eyes. It’s these penetrating eyes that seem to mimic the giant eyes of an owl, making it a stand-in that wouldn’t frighten the observer the way an alien entity might. A four foot tall owl wearing boots is a tidy example of a screen memory.

This guy’s story is part of a commonly reported pattern within the UFO abduction literature. Beyond owls, these deceptive memories can take the form of deer, cats, raccoons, dead relatives, clowns and even Jesus. These and more are all commonly reported. Whatever might be going on, some sort of powerful mind control seems to be influencing the consciousness of the witness.

Sigmund Freud first used the term screen memory in a paper written in 1899. He described it as a psychological reaction, when an earlier memory is later used to screen a later event. So, in Freud’s explanation the screen is something generated internally. In the present day UFO literature, the term screen memory implies something generated externally. It is a form of hypnotic or telepathic projection coming from the mind (or technologies) of the UFO occupants.

Dolores Cannon's story

The late author, hypnotherapist and researcher Dolores Cannon wrote about an unusual owl sighting in her 1999 book The Custodians. She was driving home from a meeting of colleagues where they had been discussing metaphysical matters, including UFO abductions. This would have been well after midnight in the winter of 1988. She was a little over a mile away from her home in an isolated part of the Ozark Mountains of Arkansas when she saw a huge owl standing in the middle of the road. She writes:

I drove right up to it and it wouldn't move. It just kept standing there, apparently mesmerized by my headlights. Its head was even with the top of the fender, so I could see its huge unblinking eyes quite clearly. I honked and came closer to it. I didn't want to hurt it, just to make it move out of the road. It then turned and flew very low to the ground with a large wingspan, and alighted just out of the range of my headlights. Once again I approached it and it wouldn't move until I got right up to it. Then it would fly a short distance again, alight and turn to face the car.

This continued all the way to my gate. It would stop at various places in front of my car, and just stare unblinking at me. Each time it took several seconds to make it move. I laughed because it seemed very peculiar... Finally the last time it flew to the other side of the entrance to my driveway and just stood there while I turned in.

When she got home she thought it was odd to see such a large owl. She even wondered if this could have been some sort of screen memory, enough that she checked the clocks that night, but there didn't seem to be any missing time.

Years later, in 1996, the strangeness of this event came rushing back with a tinge of apprehension. Ms. Cannon went to the Natural History Museum in London while on lecture tour in England. She entered a room where all kinds of birds were presented in glass cases, and she was caught off guard by what she saw.

In one case, all the species of owls were displayed. What shocked me and sent chills down my spine, was that none of them were as large as the one I saw on the deserted road years before. None of these could have been seen over the fender of my car.

As I stared at them in wonder and perplexity questions flooded into my mind. What did I really see that night in the road? Did I have a similar experience to the ones I was investigating? Did something else happen that night?...if something did occur it was a gentle and easy preparation for the work I do, and it was definitely not to be feared. I am not saying this was an example of contact with alien beings. I am just saying that it bears an uncanny resemblance to the cases I have since investigated. [\[1\]](#)

This story involves a hypnotherapist who was actively involved in psychic investigations. It was shortly after the event on the lonely road with the huge owl that she began to dig deeper and meet with witnesses who had experienced UFO contact. This eventually resulted in a form of channeled communication with alien beings through her use of hypnosis to explore the deepest parts of the subconscious. She is keenly aware that her 1988 owl sighting plays out as preparation for her work as an abduction researcher.

How big is a big owl?

Ms. Cannon's description of the owl being tall enough to literally look over the hood of her car is impossible, but giant owls are an extremely common as part of a UFO abduction report. Usually they are described at around four-foot tall (122 cm). This is problematic because the tallest owl in the world, with a maximum height of 33 inches (84 cm) is the great gray (yes, a gray!). This bird is found in northern latitudes in a wide stripe around the globe. It inhabits the North American west from Alaska to Canada, dipping down into the big mountain regions of the Northern Rockies and the Pacific Coastal ranges. The great gray also ranges across Northern Europe through Russia and Mongolia.

The eurasian eagle owl is considered the largest owl by overall size, with a wingspan of up to 74 inches (188 cm). The largest owl by weight is the Blakiston's fish owl, tipping the scales at a little over 10 pounds (4.6Kg). This owl is only found in the old growth forests of Siberia and the Far-East. Although impressively large, none of these owls come close to the four feet tall height consistently reported by abductees. What is worth noting is that the spindly gray aliens reported by abductees are usually described as being about four feet tall.

Aaron's story

The report below is from a man named Aaron (a pseudonym). He's had a lot of extremely strange experiences, but none of his memories actually involve UFOs. What follows is what I can only conclude to be a screen memory, again, involving an owl [italics my own].

I made plans for Saturday night with my best friend. I was going to meet him at his house and then we would go downtown. I spoke with him at about 8:00 p.m., and told him that I was walking out the door and would be at his place in about 20 minutes. He told me to make it quick, because he was ready to leave.

I remember leaving the house and pulling out of the driveway. It was just starting to get a little dark outside. I drove about a half a mile down the road before I saw a huge whitish-gray owl standing in the middle of the road. It was about three feet tall. I don't remember hitting it or anything like that—just seeing it standing there in front of the car.

The next thing I remember was pulling into the drive of my friend's house. It was dark out, and when I went in, my friend was furious. He said, "Where in the f—k have you been? You said you were leaving right away!"

I told him that I did leave right away. To which he replied, "It's after 10!"

I started to tell him what happened, but as soon as the words three foot owl came out, I felt like an idiot. I ended up apologizing for being late and we left. I was sober up until that point, then I drank to get rid of the uneasy feeling I had in the pit of my stomach.

Years later I read a book that talked about UFOs and missing time. When I saw that it said that seeing owls, rabbit, and deer was normal, I almost threw up.

Aaron's story is a good example of the standard screen memory account. Seeing a huge owl in the middle of the road and then realizing there was missing time is all too common. I have heard this story, in one form or another, so many times that it now seems almost mundane. He tells of seeing a three foot tall owl, although still huge, it is slightly smaller than the four foot height that seems more commonly reported.

During an email exchange with Aaron, he told me that around the time of this event, his life had become a descending spiral of alcohol, drugs, and depression. He was clear that his self-destructive behavior nearly killed him. It's hard not to wonder if some hidden event from that missing time might be the source of his tortured anguish. If there were some kind of dark trauma buried in his subconscious, it might explain his conduct.

He is now a born again Christian, and he shared a video of himself playing guitar and singing a soulful gospel song. I was moved by the heartfelt depth of his performance. I liked him immediately and I was relieved to hear that his life is presently much more stable.

The first reference of an owl as a screen memory

Alien abduction burst onto the public awareness in 1987 with the book Communion (subtitled A True Story), written by Whitley Strieber. There had been other abduction accounts leading up to this, but none can compare to the phenomenal impact of this bestselling book. It ushered in an explosion of people coming forward and discussing their own contact experiences. It also introduced the idea that the owl was somehow a part of the overall mystery.

The central event in Strieber's book is a harrowing first person account of an abduction that took place in his rural cabin on the winter's night of December 26, 1985. This is not a simple story. It is challenging in almost every aspect. Strieber begins his tale with a nighttime intrusion into his bedroom, and from there the narrative spirals to the point where the very fabric of reality comes into question.

His initial impression after that transcendent night was of seeing an owl:

I awoke the morning of the twenty-seventh very much as usual, but grappling with a distinct sense of unease and a very improbable but intense memory of seeing a barn owl staring at me through the window sometime during the night.

I remember how I felt in the gathering evening of the twenty-seventh, when I looked out onto the roof and saw that there were no owl tracks in the snow. I knew I had not seen an owl. I shuddered, suddenly cold, and drew back from the window, withdrawing from the night that was falling so swiftly in the woods beyond.

But I wanted desperately to believe in that owl. I told my wife about it. She was polite, but commented about the absence of tracks. I really very much wanted to convince her of it, though. Even more, I wanted to convince myself.

If it wasn't an owl, then it was something else entirely. Later in the book, Strieber describes an event from the early 1960s involving his sister and an owl. She was driving alone on the highways of rural Texas, and shortly after midnight, "...she was terrified to see a huge light sail down and cross the road ahead of her. A few minutes later an owl flew in front of the car. I have to wonder if that is not a screen memory, but my sister has no sense of it."[\[2\]](#)

I contacted Strieber to ask about owls and their role within this mystery, he replied with memories of his own childhood.

There was a white owl that stood in our back yard and watched the windows of my bedroom when I was a child. It made my folks very nervous. This was during the time that they nailed the screens shut.

That he would have seen a white owl in his yard came as no surprise. I then asked if this owl from his youth could have been some sort of screen memory.

I don't have any way to tell if it was a screen memory. I remember an owl, and certainly nobody said that it was anything different. My parents never said why they nailed the screens shut, but I assume that it was either because they feared that somebody might be coming in, or I might be going out at night.

It could be my own mind grasping at nothing, but I can't help but see window screens being nailed shut out of fear as a metaphor. The word screen is just too perfect, and the term window is sometimes used by researchers to describe the gateway that UFOs might use to enter into our reality.[\[3\]](#)

Owls look like aliens

Researchers of the alien abduction phenomenon will point out that owls have an eerie likeness to the commonly reported gray alien. Both have penetrating oversized eyes, and some have suggested this is why UFO occupants are choosing the owl as one of their screen memories. The implication is that these aliens are using a psychic projection that is similar to themselves, an owl image that overlays their own presence.

Abduction researcher John Carpenter talked about what he had found with his work using hypnosis to explore what might be hidden behind the images of common animals like owls and squirrels. He discussed why the aliens are using screen memories, saying: “I think the aliens do that to make it easier for us. We would much rather look at an owl or a squirrel than an alien. I actually think they do that on purpose so we aren’t so freaked out and are more cooperative.”

Carpenter has a few cases where the small gray aliens telepathically told the abductee that: You will remember us as an owl.

These memories were retrieved using hypnosis, a controversial tool for these kinds of investigations, so it’s difficult to know for certain what may have taken place during these contact experiences. Nonetheless, it implies that these aliens are standing right in front of the person, and informing them that they were putting the memory of an owl into their mind. This communication often takes place while these gray beings are staring directly into the eyes of their abductees, further implying a psychic influence.[\[4\]](#)

Lucretia Heart’s story

What is so amazing is that so many of these screen memories play out as perfectly seamless, leaving the experiencer convinced they are seeing a real owl, even if the size or context is absurd. At other times, the events are so weird that the abductee will recognize the utter strangeness. And sometimes the aliens screw up.

Blogger and abductee Lucretia Heart (her pen name) confronted the screen memory of an owl when she was 19 years old. It happened when she was working at a summer camp for girls in the Pacific northwest. What follows is her (slightly edited) memory of what happened. She describes walking alone on a path through the forest:

It was a beautiful, sunny day and I could hear the girls laughing and playing in the camp area behind me as I walked. As I rounded the final corner... something to my right caught my attention.

There was a big white thing there. I kept walking as I turned my head to look and I just could not believe what I saw... It was an alien gray only it was almost perfectly stark white. Its head was as big as a football helmet and it had those wrap-around eyes. It was standing still [and it] didn't see me quietly padding up the pathway. This being was solid and physical. The sun shining on his head made it stand out like crazy. I was in such shock I didn't ever stop walking because my mind was still trying to process the moment.

My mind insisted that they weren't supposed to exist during the day! Of course, in an isolated area with plenty of cover, that's nonsense, but since I almost only ever saw them at night, I apparently developed a sort of belief system about it. All my panic attacks came at night. And now here I was seeing this thing out during the day, as plain as you please!

Another moment and I saw him turn his head to look in my direction and I caught the, "OH SHIT!" sort of thought-wave (without the words, but you get the point) before he turned to run away.

It was in the very next instant that something very interesting happened. It was an important moment, because I was wide awake and paying very close attention, despite my shock. At the same time the gray scrambled to run away, dashing through the underbrush—a very powerful image of a big white owl came to my mind. Of course, I had just seen an alien gray. Not to mention there are no owls that stand 4 feet tall and lack feathers! So I wasn't fooled, but I wondered at the power of the image and idea that what I had actually seen had been a huge owl. Because it wasn't just that I suddenly had an image in my mind of a big owl, I also had the idea planted firmly there as well. A suggestion if you will...

I kept walking right by where the being had stood, and I could hear loud, clumsy crashing sounds as the being made its way through the foliage in an utter panic. I really felt the panic coming off of it, and owls don't project thought-waves![\[5\]](#)

So here we have a vivid description of an abductee actually witnessing the change from alien gray to owl. Instead of seeing a flawless screen memory she saw something frantic and sloppy. Integral to her description is the feeling of thought-waves being projected into her mind.

Some people think that the aliens are physically shape shifting in a way where they physically become an owl. This might be how a Native American would frame their spirit guides, but this isn't the way the evidence plays out concerning screen memories and abductions. Often, under regressive hypnosis the experiencer might be able to untangle their owl memories. The hypnotist will take the relaxed subject to the event with the owl, and then ask the subject to describe what he's seeing. What might unfold is a description of something with a big bald head, a skinny body and huge black eyes. Lucretia's story is an oddly comic example remembered without hypnosis.

These beings seem to be able to influence the consciousness and perceptions of the abductee.

I heard a similar story from researcher Alan Caviness. He told me about a woman who was woken up in the middle of the night by a bright flash of light. She got out of bed to investigate. She stepped out her front door where she surprised three gray aliens standing right next to her, just off the porch. They stared at each other for about five seconds, then she watched these skinny beings morph into three deer and ease backwards, huddled awkwardly together, retreating into the darkness away from the house. This example was deer, not owls, but both these women saw the morphing from alien to animal.

Corina Saebels' story

Corina Saebels is an abductee from the Okanagan Valley of western Canada, and she recounts an odd owl event in her book The Collectors. She had been star gazing at night with her children and a friend named Rob. They were all at a lake together enjoying the nighttime sky. There came a point when they all noticed an unusual stillness. The air was suddenly cooler, and there was an odd smell. Right at that moment the kids said they were feeling tired and wanted to sit in the car, so they all went to the car together to rest. Then everybody fell asleep.

They all woke up about two hours later, feeling disoriented and nauseous. Two people had headaches and one of the kids had a bloody nose. Everyone felt awful and they all agreed just to head home. Corina was driving slowly, and at the first sharp bend, right in the beam of the headlights, they all saw what she can only describe as a typical gray alien standing on the side of the road.

I slammed on the breaks in the middle of the road and screamed. The children and I began to shake uncontrollably, but oddly enough, Rob just calmly turned to me and said, "What are you guys so worried about? It's only a big owl!"

"Are you kidding?" I screamed, "Have you lost your mind? Since when do we have four-foot-tall owls in the Okanagan Valley or anywhere for that matter?"

Multiple people in her car see a gray alien, but one person sees an owl.[\[6\]](#)

Holding a tiny owl

There can be a fuzzy blurring between what might be a screen memory and what might be a real experience with an owl. A woman name Cynthia shared a story with me that happened years before she was consciously aware of her lifelong contacts with the UFO occupants.

She remembers driving at night with her husband and her two children, who were about 9 and 12 years old. Her husband was driving on a quiet twisting rural road near their home. They turned a corner and there before them, in the middle of the road, was a tiny owl. They stopped the car and without knowing exactly why, the woman got out and ran up to the little owl. She assumed it was injured and she reached down and picked it up in her hands. She noted an eerie silence while she was outside of the car.

Cynthia carried the owl back to the car and the family drove home. As they drove, she marveled that this little owl, maybe 6 inches tall, sat so quietly in her cupped hands.

When they arrived home, everybody got out of the car and stood in the driveway. She raised her hands, opened them, and the small owl spread its wings and with what seemed like a single flap rose up and silently disappeared into the night. She stated that the wingspan seemed far too large for such a tiny little bird.

I remember the owl's dark silhouette against the unusually dark night. It was uncommonly dark for the entire event and I could only see him as his wings flapped down, then he was gone. Totally Silent. He vanished. This was a profound experience that affected me for years after. I knew it was an unusual event and I felt fortunate to hold the beautiful owl. Even today, I remember how amazing I felt.

Cynthia also noted the same odd silence was there in the driveway, just as it had been when she picked up the owl. This strange vacuum-like silence is a common detail in UFO sightings, it is sometimes referred to as the Oz Factor. She has recently asked her children if they remember that night, and both said no. This seems unusual, as one would think that driving around with a live owl in a car would be hard to forget.

Here we have a strange owl experience by an abductee at a time when she was unaware of her history of contact. There are odd details to the story that don't seem to follow the pattern of a typical screen memory, nor that of a concealed abduction. I have spoken to her at length and she will describe the event as something that definitely involved a real owl, but she can quickly flip-flop and recognize the implication of the out-and-out strangeness. That tiny owl certainly isn't the four foot tall owl of other reports on lonely roads at night, but the story has the flavor of a screen memory.

Drawing an owl

I heard from a young man who has been doing paranormal research as well as collecting Bigfoot reports. He told me his mother has had a lifelong fascination with owls—she has owl paintings, knickknacks, and figurines all over the house. This is curiously consistent. Many people in these reports will have amassed a large collection of owl trinkets. It's also common that people will tell that their mother collects owls.

She told her son about seeing a big owl in the driveway. The sighting began when her dog was barking at something outside, she stepped out the door and saw something in the darkness at the end of their long gravel driveway. She walked towards the figure and stopped when she realized she was looking at a huge owl.

Her son asked how big it was, and she said it was just about her own height, perhaps a bit smaller. His mother isn't very tall, so that puts the estimated size of this owl at around four and a half to five feet tall. Again, this is impossibly large for any known owl.

He asked if she could draw it, so his mother sketched a typical owl figure with big eyes. The son sensed an unease and asked her, is this really what it looked like? She thought for a moment and said, not really. She then re-drew the face on the same paper, trying to capture her memory. This time she drew what clearly looked like the face of a gray alien. With his interest in UFOs and the paranormal, the implication was immediately obvious to her son. He asked if she remembers anything unusual that night, any sense of missing time?

She asked why he wanted to know, and he told her that sometimes oversized owls get reported in connection with UFO abductions. Hearing that, all the color drained from her face. He could never follow up on what might have happened because she refused to talk about it.

The trigger memory

Joe Montaldo is both a contactee and abduction researcher; this is a rather common combination. He runs an organization called ICAR (International Community for Alien Research), with a focus on the abduction phenomenon. I asked him if any unusual owl reports are showing up in his research. He said "Absolutely, we regularly get reports of people seeing owls standing on the side of the road, usually about a four-foot tall owl."

He is describing exactly what I'm finding, and I am certain any other researcher looking into the abduction mystery is finding the same thing, or something very similar.

Joe doesn't use the term screen memory, instead he calls them trigger memories. He feels these memories aren't there to hide anything, they are there as a trigger so you know that something happened. This means that if an abductee remembers seeing a four foot tall owl in the middle of the road, they will always know that something wasn't quite right, and someday they will choose to look into these memories. It is a marker for an event.

He goes further, saying that almost all UFO sightings are meant to be trigger memories. They are designed to let you know something happened.

Joe declared, "ET never has to show himself to anybody." He is implying that their technology is so advanced that making their craft invisible is effortless, so if anyone sees something it is because they want to be seen for a reason.

Joe told me a story of a man, living in Louisiana, who was sitting out on his porch at night. He noticed something big and white flittering around up in the trees at the edge of his yard. When he walked out to investigate, he saw 15 to 20 big owls flying around, all flocked together in the tree tops.

This man drew a picture of the owl, and Joe tried to research it, even going to the local game warden to ask what kind of owls he might have seen. The warden laughed, saying that there were no owls as big as what he was describing. This was in the Deep South and what he remembered was so big it could only match a flock of oversized great gray owls, and that would have been impossible given his latitude. Later, under hypnotic regression, when he was trying to describe looking at these owls, he suddenly blurted out, "Oh fuck!" Joe asked him what he was seeing, and he nervously described standing in the dark being surrounded by three gray aliens.

Blur of screen memory stories

I have heard so many owl stories that play out as screen memories that I can barely keep them all straight in my head. These are told to me by real people who are shaky with emotion as they try to convey the utter strangeness of what they've seen.

The story of seeing an impossibly large owl, or multiple owls, standing on lonely road is the most common. But they are also reported in backyards and front yards, standing in doorways, looking in windows and looking down from roofs. I've had two people who were both in the same room describe seeing a large owl sitting on a windowsill looking in at them with its face against the glass. Later they realized that there was no sill, the window was flush against the outside wall, so there was no place for the owl to stand. I've heard accounts where giant owls enter the bedroom by floating down through the ceiling. I've heard of skinny alien beings entering bedrooms at night, but with big owl heads. I've also had people describe waking up with a group of giant four-foot-tall owls standing around their beds. Parents will explain that their children are telling them about big owls that come into their bedrooms at night. Most of these giant owl stories are part of a larger narrative, one that includes UFO sightings or an outright abduction.

There are also stories of what seem to be real owls, but the context is so strange that it is hard to truly know. I heard a story from a woman who had a nighttime of strange experiences, including a compulsion to walk through her neighborhood in the middle of the night only to meet a strange man with a Scottish accent. This whole night plays out with distorted time and irrational fears. The next morning she woke to a huge owl sitting on a branch outside the big sliding glass doors of her kitchen. She described the size as enormous, and the branch it was on was dipping down low from the weight of this bird. It stayed there most of the day, staring in at her. I asked if she thought this was a real owl, or some sort of screen projection. She answered in a shaky way, as if she wasn't sure, but she remembered it as a real owl.

Peter Maxwell Slattery's story

Peter Maxwell Slattery is a young outspoken contactee from Australia. He's had a lifetime of powerful experiences, including UFO sightings, profound synchronicities and odd owl sightings.

The first owl experience happened when Peter was working as a security guard, his job involved driving a route at night with a partner and checking on a set of businesses. This was at a time before his more intense UFO experiences had started. They were driving slowly through a dark industrial area. Suddenly a big white owl appeared out of nowhere—but it wasn't flying—instead it was moving toward the windshield in a weird static pose. He hit the brakes and came to a complete stop.

Just as suddenly, it was gone and they both exclaimed, "What the hell just happened?"

The owl weirdness continued a few years later. Peter was at home on the night of June 9, 2012. A little after 10 p.m., a thought popped into his head. He felt an unusual urge to leave the house and go to a nearby area with hiking trails.

While driving there, Peter fully realized that something wasn't right, yet nothing was going to stop him. When he arrived at the parking lot he kept asking himself, what am I doing up here? Even though he was plagued by an ominous feeling, he started hiking uphill into the darkness.

After about two kilometers, something told him to stop. He turned off his flashlight and looked up into the sky. He saw a white light like a big star that stopped directly above him. As he watched, the light shot off at an unbelievable speed and disappeared. He writes about this in his fourth book titled Operation Starseed. What follows is a short excerpt from the chapter, "The Two Owls":

While taking in what happened and that I was basically in the middle of nowhere, I got a sudden feeling of not being alone (the air around me felt like static electricity).

I turned around and what I saw shocked me. I saw two owls right in front of me, about three meters away. They were about three to four feet tall and about a foot wide.

At this time I freaked out, turned the other direction and went to run out of shock, but as soon as I turned around, I couldn't run, I just froze, my heart was beating so fast, it caught me off guard, it was unexpected.

Next the owls appeared overhead, like as if they jumped over me. At that moment I closed my eyes. A few seconds later I could feel the static feeling in the air around me disappear, then I opened my eyes, nothing was there. At this time I could move again.

Straight away I turned my torch on and headed back to the car. On the way down the hill I was just thinking, "I didn't know that owls could get that big."

It was over a month later when Peter described what he had seen to his brother, who laughed and told him owls aren't that big. From this point on, Peter was aware that he was probably at the receiving end of some sort of psychic deception.

Peter had a third unusual owl sighting. On this night, he was out sky watching with two other women. One is his neighbor, who has seen craft hovering above their neighborhood. The other is Carol, and Peter feels that he's fathered hybrid children with her. Yes, that's an odd detail, and he shared it with me in a nonchalant way. In doing this research I've heard these kinds of claims so many times that at this point it seems perfectly ordinary.

Peter, Carol and his neighbor all drove a short distance to an isolated area with an amazing view of the nighttime sky. They meditated for a while and even saw a few odd lights in the sky. When they drove home, Peter was behind the wheel, driving slowly on the bumpy rural road.

At one point Peter was struck with an anxious feeling and right at that moment Carol said, “Something is about to happen.”

Seconds later they came around a corner, and a huge owl was suddenly in front of the car at windshield height. It had a white belly and grayish wings. Peter was very clear that it didn’t simply fly into his line of sight, but that it literally manifested out of nothing. Right before impact, it veered off—vanishing into nothingness.

Peter stopped the car saying, “I don’t feel right.” The other two women felt the same, each of them describing an odd sensation. They could all feel a weird energy. The woman in the back seat said that from her view, the owl seemed giant, filling the entire windshield.[\[7\]](#)

Joe’s flying owls story

A young man named Joe saw both a UFO and owls within minutes of each other, this happened in 2012 when he was 20 years old. These sightings took place at about three in the morning while he was driving with four friends in his car. Joe and his close friend Dave were in the front seats when they both saw a brilliant blue light descending in the sky.

Joe said, “It was bright as hell so I couldn’t make out the shape of the craft, but it was high enough to pass through the clouds.” Both Joe and Dave were speechless until after they had lost sight of it beyond the tree line.

After the shock wore off, they told the three people in the back seats what they had just seen. They dropped off one of the passengers, and began the drive back to their friend’s house. They were traveling about 55 miles per hour when a white owl flew right up alongside their car with its head turned, staring directly at the passengers.

This owl was flying right next to the passenger window, close enough that Dave could have reached out and touched it. Even though they were moving fast, the owl “hovered” there for about five seconds and then flew off. Then, less than a mile down the road, another white owl did the exact same thing—again staring sideways while flying right up next to the car and staring in Dave’s window. Suddenly everyone in the car began screaming, as if they were all feeling the same primal fear. Joe doesn’t understand why, but he slammed on the brakes and everyone yelled at him to keep driving.

Afterwards, no one could explain why they were all screaming. The strange way the owl was flying right up next to the car triggered a feeling none of the passengers had ever felt before. Joe said, “The owls were almost sideways while staring directly into the window. It didn’t make sense how they were doing it. It’s hard to explain. The physics didn’t add up.”

Later, when he tried to bring it up to the other passengers, they all seemed to want to bury the memory. Joe said, “They acted as though they would be punished if they talked about it.”[\[8\]](#)

Joe saw another white owl while driving at night. This was about a week after his initial sighting of the bright blue light descending in the sky. Curiously, he was again with Dave for this follow-up owl sighting. Joe had been living in that area for about ten years and, until that week, he had never once seen an owl. Joe has since seen the same bright blue light several more times, one time with Dave.

The odd behavior of these owls, and the unsettling description of them flying sideways seems more like some sort of hologram than any real bird in flight. The typical screen memory implies a gray alien that is cloaking itself with the image of an owl by projecting this idea into the mind of the observer. Usually these owls are standing still in the middle of a road, making this kind of deception easy to comprehend. But what of an owl flying at 55 miles per hour? It seems doubtful that a gray alien could be zooming in the air alongside a speeding car. So what did this car full of people actually see?

Joe’s account of a car full of people screaming in primal fear parallels my own experience from 2010 with my friend Natascha, where we both awoke while camped in a tent screaming without knowing why. This is described later in the book.

The paradox syndrome

Anne Strieber, the late wife of author Whitley Strieber, had a simple way of evaluating the truth of a UFO report. She said, if it’s not weird, I don’t trust it.

Within some of these stories is a confusing collision of overlapping experiences—all of them weird. Things feel mixed up with threads running off everywhere in a tangled knot of implausibility. Synchronicity spills over the edges like an unattended sink. For me, this kind of chaos is a sign to trust the event as legitimate. The more complicated the interwoven details, the more valid it seems. This all becomes a shaky form of proof that something truly paranormal is unfolding.

Within these pages, I’ll be referring to this frenetic pattern as the paradox syndrome. A paradox is an attempt at sound reasoning, but the conclusion appears unacceptable. A syndrome is a group of related or coinciding things, events, and actions. I don't understand why it works this way, but all the messy threads must tie into some core event, and the challenge is not to get lost in the mayhem. And when there is an owl tied to one of these threads, I pay very close attention.

This next story is an example of the paradox syndrome, a mess of twists and turns that confront the people who experience these baffling life events.

The Alan Caviness report

Alan Caviness is both a UFO investigator and experiencer (again, that combination) and was at the center of a complex web of interconnected experiences. The initial event in a long string of weirdness took place along a quiet rural road in central North Carolina. Alan was driving near his home in the evening when he saw an owl in the beam of his headlights. It was standing perfectly still, along the shoulder of the two-lane road. The owl was squarely facing Alan's car, and its penetrating black glossy eyes seemed to be looking straight at him. He slowed down to just a few miles per hour and the owl didn't even flinch as he passed.

He brought the car to a stop about 100 feet past the owl at the very bottom of the hill. Looking back, he saw the owl standing, still frozen like a statue. A few seconds later, he watched it eerily pivot around like a penguin and then waddle into the woods at the edge of the road.

Alan immediately realized that seeing such an unusual owl might imply an abduction event, but if this was an illusion it would have fooled anyone on earth. He felt the owl was postured on the side of the road as if it had been waiting for his car. He had lived in the immediate area for over 50 years and had never once seen an owl anywhere in the region. This bird seemed big, but not unusually large.

Alan parked at the exact same spot the next night at about the same time, but something didn't make sense. Without any streetlights, it would be impossible for him to have looked back and see the owl from the rear window of his car. There was a problem—he clearly saw the owl from this location, yet it was far too dark for the memory to be real.

This is only the beginning of the story. A few days later, Alan was called on to play his role of UFO investigator in his small town. What followed over the next few days and weeks is an overlapping collision of stories that all took place on that same night, within a few hours of Alan's owl sighting, and none of it is simple.

One of the events of that night involved a creepy deer that ran right next to a woman's car as she drove along a rural road. She was going 55 miles per hour and all the while this deer kept staring at her from the shoulder of the road.

This deer sounds eerily similar to the owl from Joe's report. Both the owl and deer traveled alongside a car at about 55 miles per hour, and both were staring sideways, leaving the drivers astonished.

Another woman saw dancing lights above her driveway. This woman and the other woman who encountered the "deer" worked in the same building, but didn't know each other. Both events took place within minutes of each other, and when plotted out on a map, all the events were within four miles of each other. The synchronicities and clues continued to pile up, with other women reporting unusual large owl sightings all in the same area.

This small town in North Carolina was subjected to a cluster of extremely unusual events, including a set of probable screen memories of an owl and a deer. What is remarkable is that Alan was first a witness and then the investigator of this weird flap. It's his impression (and my own) that these sightings, synchronicities, and screen memories were all carefully orchestrated, with all the small details being part of one larger unknown event, all of it to affect him directly. The why of it is anyone's guess, but the knot of clues are simply tied too tightly to ignore.[\[9\]](#)

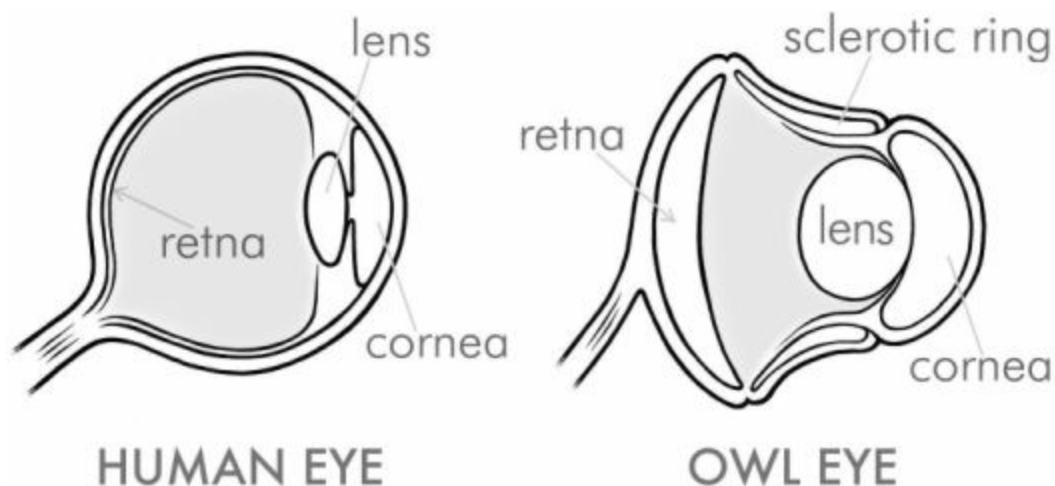

The screen memory aspect of the phenomenon can make it nearly impossible to truly know if someone is reporting a real owl or some form of telepathic projection. At the heart of this mystery is an influence so powerful that it can invade the consciousness of the witness and convince them they are seeing something that isn't there. All of this leaves the experiencer, as well as the researcher, trying to make sense of a picture using puzzle pieces that don't fit together. Owl imagery keeps reoccurring as part of the witness accounts, from simple stories of seeing a little light way up in the night sky to more dramatic events like beings walking through bedroom walls. I don't understand why, but the owl, both literal and symbolic, is playing some role in the larger drama.

Chapter 3: Real Owls

Owls as input receiver

Owls are remarkable not only for their place in lore of both mythology and UFO accounts, but for what they are—creatures of astounding abilities.

When a cartoonist draws an owl, something I know a little bit about, they'll depict them with enormous eyes. This caricature is quite accurate; an owl's eyes outweigh its brain. Unlike our round eyeballs, theirs are elongated tubes—a shape better suited for gathering light, even in near-complete darkness. This cylinder is locked in their skull, so owls can't roll their eyes like we do, they can only look straight ahead. This creates that eerie owl stare.

Their tubular eyes allow for a larger cornea, enabling the lens to collect more available light. This cylinder shape has a sort of mushroom shaped bulge on the backside, boosting the surface of the retina. This interior surface is packed with an abundance of photoreceptor rod shaped cells, yet very few cone-shaped cells. This means heightened night vision and a very limited ability to see color. Tawny owls have the most developed night vision eyes of all the owls, and of all vertebrates. Their eyes are about 100 times more sensitive in low light than our own.

The owl's cylinder-shaped eye is locked in place by bony structures in the skull known as sclerotic rings. It's because of this fixed ring that owls are unable to roll or move their eyes like we do, and instead can only look straight ahead. It's this inability to move its eyes that gives an owl that eerie stare.

To compensate for their unmoving eyes, owls direct their sight by moving their heads with a highly flexible neck. We can only rotate our heads about 80 degrees, but owls can rotate theirs up to 270 degrees. (Although, despite the folklore, owls cannot turn their heads all the way around.) This robotic flexibility also allows their eyes and ears to stay precisely fixed on their prey—even while in flight. Owls rotate their heads with a weirdly smooth proficiency, unlike the nervous twitchiness of most other birds. That calm demeanor creates the illusion of an owl's perceived wisdom.[\[10\]](#)

A set of experiments was conducted in the early 1970s to increase our understanding of how owls catch their prey in almost total darkness. These were done with common barn owls in a large soundproof and lightproof room. When mice were released in the room with just a minimal amount of light, the owls would swoop down from their perch above and seize them with pretty much 100% consistency, even if the mouse was moving. When the same thing was attempted in absolute darkness, the owls' ability to catch a mouse on the first strike was still close to 100%, but only if the mouse was stationary. If the mouse was moving, the owls' accuracy dropped to around 79%. This is still remarkable, given the total darkness of the room.

Radar dish shaped depressions
in an owl's face focus sound to the ears

This is because owls also have exceptional hearing. Initial tests were done with a thin layer of dried leaves and twigs on the floor, mimicking a forest environment. The scientists realized that owls were focusing on the faint rustling noises created by the mouse and using that audio signature to locate their prey in a three dimensional space of total darkness.

A grid was created on the floor of the test room and tiny speakers were used to project very subtle noises in very specific frequencies and ranges, each speaker positioned at defined points within the grid. The owls were rewarded if they struck the grid point at the source of the emanating sound. What the scientists learned was that the owls only needed a very minute portion of the overall frequency spectrum to hit their mark. This nano-sound is well beyond anything humans can perceive.

When we think of animals with good hearing, we picture rabbits or deer, both with oversized scoop-like ears. Owls don't have any external ears. Instead, they collect sound with the actual shape of their face. Most owl species have very pronounced facial discs around each eye. These defined cup-shaped depressions act like a radar dish, reflecting sounds into the ear openings. The shape of the disc itself can be adjusted by facial muscles, sculpting the positioning of the specialized feathers, further focusing minute sound waves. Even the owl's bill is shaped to reflect sound towards the ears.

An owl's ear openings are set close to the outside edges of their eyes. In many owls, if you gently part the feathers and look into the rather large opening of its ear, you can clearly see the backside of its eye!

Some owls have asymmetrically set ear openings; with one ear positioned slightly higher on their skull than the other. They can discern the minute time difference between their ears with more exactness than if these were evenly positioned on their skull, allowing them to pinpoint the exact source of even the slightest noise. Owls can detect a left/right time difference of 30 millionths of a second!

The tiny saw whet owl, when proportioned to the size of its skull, has what might be the largest ears in the animal kingdom. A great gray owl can hear a beetle moving along the forest floor 100 feet away, and a mouse squeaking at a distance of a half a mile.

Owls have a distinctive thickset look, with their large heads and seeming absence of any neck, but this appearance is an illusion. Their bodies are deceptively small under their dense coating of feathers. Anyone who has held an owl will at once realize that they are much lighter than they appear.

an owl's body under its thick coating of feathers

It's these thick specialized feathers that produce the finest stealth technology of the avian kingdom. This near-silence also lets an owl use its locational hearing to stay focused on a mouse in motion while in flight. Owl feathers have a tattered fuzzy edge along one side. With any other bird in flight you'll hear a pronounced fluttering noise, but an owl's specialized feathers will dampen down any turbulence, producing an eerily silent flight.

Owls have big wings for their size. It's common for someone to retell an owl sighting with dramatic adjectives like enormous and gigantic when excitedly describing those big wings. The Eurasian eagle-owl, one of the world's largest owls, has wingspan that can reach 79 inches (200 cm)—that's six and a half feet wide, well over twice its height. These big wings create a slow-motion buoyant look when it flies. An owl doesn't need to do much flapping to stay aloft. It can glide smooth and slow for long stretches. The slower the flight, the less noise created.

A falcon hunts using speed; its smaller wings are designed with a knife-like shape. Falcons zoom in fast before their prey has a chance to run. Owls, by contrast, float in slowly, then strike without their prey hearing them.

An owl can still hunt even if its prey is hidden under a blanket of snow, an excellent insulator of sound. There may be nothing at all to see on a cold winter's night, but from its perch high in a tree an owl can still accurately pinpoint the faint noises made by a mouse under the snow. The owl uses its off-set ears in unison with those big night vision eyes creating a mental image of this dark three dimensional space. The owl targets the exact location of the sound and locks onto it with its eyes, even from incredible distances. Against all this unified "technology," a little mouse doesn't have much of a chance.

Once it determines the precise spot in a blank field of snow, the owl's head will remain locked until it strikes. It smoothly drops off its perch and slowly flies toward the sound, keeping its eyes zeroed in on the source of the almost imperceptible noise. The owl can fly low and slow, hugging the terrain and maneuvering around trees—all without flapping its wings.

If the prey moves beneath the snow, the owl will make in-flight targeting corrections. When it reaches to within two feet of its prey, it will widen its wings and slow down. At the same moment it will bring its feet forward in a direct line between its eyes and the unseen mouse, its face never wavering from the sound under the snow. The talons strike, and the owl has food, all in near total darkness.

This is a book about owls, and their magnificent physical abilities are paralleled by their equally magnificent place in our folklore. We share the world with an amazing creature, highly adapted to travel in the shadow realm. Yet we rarely ever see an owl. This beautiful bird calmly performs its hunting rites in the darkness, night after night, beyond the watchful eyes of man. When you connect the UFO mystery to owls a question arises: is there more to this masterful animal that we don't understand?

Fact checker and a mournful call

The writing for the previous bit on owl physiology was completed late on a Sunday afternoon in October. There was still some sunlight so I figured I could ride my bike to the little health food store on the main street. I usually listen to music on this three-mile ride from my house to town, and I was frustrated when I couldn't find my iPod.

I was feeling insecure as I peddled along the rural bike trail. It was a dreary evening, and was unsure if my writing captured the owls' essence accurately. I labored over that first draft; it was way too long and read like a biology textbook. At one point I heard a mournful harsh squawking. The calls were ringing out from a cluster of cotton woods off in a horse pasture.

I got off my bike and saw the outline of an owl up in the branches. I shimmied under a barbed wire fence and walked towards the trees to get a better look. The previous few days were spent obsessively writing about owls and their heightened ability to see and hear, so I knew there was no way I could sneak up on it. I got close enough in the steely twilight to see a handsome great horned owl.

I stood in silence for a minute, then watched the owl calmly drop from her perch. She opened impossibly large wings given that she only looked to be about a foot tall in the tree. I watched her silently coast away, gliding slowly just above the sagebrush. I lost sight of her as she dipped low, but she reappeared to alight on a haybarn about a quarter of a mile from where I stood.

What I recognized right then was that this owl was playing the role of fact checker, acting out some of the very things I had been writing about. Dropping from a tree branch, flying oddly slow, the silent flight, the oversized wings and hugging the ground in flight were right out of the text I had finalized less than an hour before.

When I got home I found my iPod sitting in the middle of my desk, right where I should have seen it before riding to town. If I had been listening to music, I never would have heard those mournful squawks and never would have had the confirmation that my writing was pretty accurate.

Incidentally, I found an on-line audio excerpt titled great gray owl, female squawk. This was an exact match, which is why I referred to this owl as a she.

Heightened senses in other animals

Homing pigeons will instinctively fly to their home nest, even if they are taken and released over 1,000 miles away. This remarkable ability was used to deliver the news of the Olympics in ancient Greece, over 3,000 years ago. A small message can be attached to their foot, so they are sometimes called messenger or carrier pigeons. Evidence strongly suggests that homing pigeons can see the lines of the Earth's magnetic field and they use this ability to perform their namesake: homing in to an exact location. But what are they actually seeing?

Fox hunt mice that are hidden under a deep blanket of snow. They wait and listen with their big ears, then they'll pounce nose first into the snow. A fox needs an exact calculation of distance, depth, and alignment to accurately catch a mouse, even under a meter of snow. Their success rate is low, that is, unless they are lined up and jumping 20 degrees east from magnetic north, then it vaults up to nearly 75% success. Researchers think that foxes align their pounces to the Earth's magnetic field, using it to calculate their trajectory and to target the position of the mouse under the snow.

Other animals—sharks, turtles, ants, lobsters, beetles, bats, deer, cows and mole rats—have the same ability to sense and use the Earth's magnetism. How they do this is not yet understood by science.

Bees see ultraviolet light. Hummingbirds see near ultraviolet light. Dogs hear ultra-high frequency sounds. Bats and dolphins navigate using ultrasounds and echolocation. A bear can smell carrion up to 20 miles away. My point here is that plenty of animals have extremely subtle and seemingly impossible sensory abilities.

The owl, however, might well be the most gifted input receiver in the animal kingdom, so they might actually be sensing a UFO with that heightened aptitude. UFOs create some very weird effects, and owls might be able to detect their presence in ways we can barely comprehend, let alone test scientifically. The question is, are owls attracted to the site of UFO activity with enough consistency that it gets noticed by the abductees?

My cat Spazzy gets super focused when a piece of string is dragged across the floor. I'll skitter it along in front of her, trying to mimic the motions of a mouse. Doing this, her pupils dilate, turning almost entirely black, and her body conforms into that eager spring-loaded pre-pounce pose. Her reactions are purely instinct, she simply can't help it, even though all she is seeing is a wiggly piece of string. Is it some unknowable instinct that attracts owls to UFOs?

My cat is also attracted to the heater in my living room. This is a piece of technology that produces a measurable effect, warm air comes out of a vent.

When it's turned on, she'll position herself in close proximity. There is no mystery here, the cat senses something and moves toward it. Are the owls simply sensing something and moving toward it? Maybe there is nothing more than curiosity that draws them to UFOs.

What are owls sensing?

What is that attraction to UFOs? Owls are noted, in both mythology and firsthand accounts, to show up around highly charged locations and environments. Powerful emotions, synchronistic energies, sacred sites and paranormal happenings like ghosts and hauntings; these are all environs where an owl might make an appearance. Maybe little kids draw owls next to a haunted house for a reason. This kind of speculation is pretty slippery, but it seems to fit in a way that addresses some of the UFO reports.

What about abductees who tell about owls just hanging around their houses? Do UFO abductees give off some sort of glow that the owls can see? It might be something as simple as an aura around them that is slightly different than non-abductees. Perhaps people who have contact experiences are now tagged with some ethereal vibration that can be seen by owls. Perhaps they've undergone some change not so much on a physical level, but there might be something heightened within their emotions, or their subconscious—or it might be happening at the level of their soul. I don't know what it might be, I'm just speculating that there could be something non-physical that an owl can see, and that attracts them. This distinct individuating vibe may fluctuate in relation to contact events, increasing or decreasing before or after an abduction.

I ask people who might have had abduction experiences if they can wear a watch. Curiously, many say they can't. They'll say that it will simply stop or the batteries will drain. The implication is that there is something about them that interferes with the electronics of a watch (just so you know, I can wear a watch without any problems). Abductees will also report that streetlights will turn off above them when they are driving at night or walking under them—this has happened to me at very prescient moments. What is happening? It seems that abductees are influencing the reality around them in some very bizarre ways.

Will someone someday invent a highly sensitive camera that can pick up the subtle psychogenic emanations from a person in a way that might differentiate the abductees from the general population? This might not be all that far-fetched, I say that simply because there is evidence, albeit fleeting, that owls are seeing something in the abductee.

A gifted psychic might walk into a room and instantly pick someone out as being different. They might say they can see a white light around them, or they might just get a deep instinctual knowing. I have spoken to more than one psychic who has looked to the empty spot right next to where I was standing and they've told me they can see little aliens.

Do cats see invisible things? Any cat owner will tell you that their pet will sometimes look at nothing as if there were something there.

My cat acts scared

There was a night a few years ago where I was alone in my cabin sitting on the couch watching a DVD, and as always my cat Spazzy was sitting by my side. The whole scene was completely ordinary, but she was suddenly acting really scared. She got into a scrunched-up defensive pose and her tail poofed up huge. The hair along her back was sticking straight up. I tried to pet her to calm her down, but she didn't respond at all. I could feel her back was rigid and tight with tension, something I've never felt before or since. I leaned over and looked at her face and her eyes had entirely dilated black. She wasn't moving, and she was entirely focused on an empty spot in the center of the room just a few yards in front of the couch. I saw nothing, but my cat's overt display obviously meant something.

I got up and stood in the living room in front of the couch. I could see right where she was focused. She stayed frozen in that anxious pose with her dilated eyes fixed on an empty spot right in the center of the living room rug. At that point, my cat's intensity was so acute that I absolutely knew something must be in the room.

I stood in the middle of the room, and confronted the empty spot where my cat was focused. I said out loud, "If you have anything to say to me, I respond well when I receive messages in my dreams, so please communicate that way." That said, nothing happened in my dreams that night. This speaks to where I was at with all the weird stuff in my life, it felt absolutely normal to speak to an empty spot on the rug in my living room.

This went on for about ten minutes, and I was getting really paranoid. Eventually, Spazzy changed her posture, and jumped down from the couch and sat under the coffee table, still focusing on that empty spot. I watched as she slowly eased her way closer to the center of the room, and then cautiously sniffed around that empty spot on the rug.

This whole event was decidedly unusual. I should add that earlier in the day I had a 90-minute psychic session with a gifted clairvoyant, Anya Briggs. I was at a point in my life when a lot was happening, and I needed some answers. She wrote me an email when she heard about my cat and her intense reaction. Here's what she said:

I don't want to freak you out, but sometimes, beings open portals to check things out. That is all they come to do. I think that's what happened - actually, hold on - the beings are saying that's exactly what happened. I think I should explain because I am not surprised this happened at all and cats are naturally psychic...

What was Spazzy reacting to? Was there an open portal to another dimension in my living room? Or an alien specter peering into my reality? I don't have any good answer, all I know is that my cat was absolutely focused on something I couldn't see. What if an owl was in my living room that night, would it have stared at the same empty spot?

As a curious aside, the movie on the DVD was The Hustler (1961) starring Paul Newman and Jackie Gleason. It was well known that Gleason was quite the aficionado on the UFO subject, and there is a wonderful story that late one night he got a knock on his front door from his golfing pal Richard Nixon. This would have been during Nixon's presidency, and he drove Gleason, just the two of them alone in the car without any security, to nearby Homestead Air Force Base. As the story goes, they entered a tightly guarded building to view little alien bodies, supposedly from the Roswell, New Mexico UFO crash of 1947.

Odd silence or the oz factor

I sent an email to UFO researcher Dr. Jacques Vallee asking if he had come across any unusual owl reports in his research. He replied with a story where an owl plopped out of the sky just because a UFO was nearby, or at least that's the way it seemed. Two people were driving together at night, and they were forced to slow down because an owl made an awkward landing on the road in front of them. It was completely disoriented and unable to take off. Right at that moment, the people in the car had their attention diverted from the owl to an unknown craft above them in the sky. This helpless owl was flopping around on the pavement at the very same time that a close encounter was in progress. Was this owl affected by some unusual influences created by the UFO?

Owls are, if nothing else, extremely sensitive input receivers, the entirety of their physiology is a combination of very acute hearing and extremely good night vision. Could these finely tuned senses have been disrupted by the proximity of a UFO?

One of the questions an investigator will ask a UFO witness is if they noticed any odd animal reactions during their sighting event. Dogs might whine, cats might hide, horses might act jittery—this kind of odd behavior is commonly reported. What exactly are these animals reacting to? The witnesses, the human kind, might have a hard time explaining their own reactions. Hair rising on their heads or on arms gets reported; this might mean there is a source of static electricity nearby. Car radio disturbances, electrical malfunctions, and streetlights shutting off are all repeated throughout the literature. Accounts of irrational fear, or irrational calm both get reported. Some witnesses will describe a feeling of moving in slow motion, as if time itself is being distorted. What is creating these reactions?

If a craft has landed there might be physical marks on the ground. The dirt and plants can show signs of high heat. Some soil samples from landing sites are incapable of absorbing water and the affected area will remain chalky and dry for decades. On the opposite spectrum, sometimes the soil becomes more productive and the plants within the landing zone will grow unusually large and healthy. We don't know what energies might be creating these effects, but from so much witness testimony it seems safe to say that something very unusual is happening.

How we might feel the strange physical effects of a close up UFO is hard to know, and trying to guess how an owl might actually feel or react is speculation at its flimsiest. Earlier in this chapter I cataloged a long list of ways that the owl is a very specialized animal designed for perceiving extremely subtle input. Could it be that UFOs are emanating some sound or vibration within a narrow band of specific sound waves, and these vibrations are unheard by humans, yet line up with an owl's hyper-attuned ability to hear? Basically, a UFO could be the equivalent of a giant dog whistle that can attract owls.

Owls and UFOs are both described as flying with an eerie silence. There are some odd consistencies in close-up UFO reports, the most commonly noted effect is this unusual silence. It's not just that the unknown object flies silently, it seems to turn off all the sound in an area near the object. No bird noises, no crickets, no rustling of leaves, nothing. If there is any sound from a UFO it gets reported in odd ways. There might be a buzzing noise like a hive of bees, or the witness might describe an ultra-low bass noise that is felt in the chest, like standing too close to the thumping amps at a rock concert; this might not be heard as a sound at all, just a sensation within the body. Sometimes UFOs can sound like owls (reported later in this book). This is just part of a long list of bizarre stuff that gets reported by close encounter witnesses.

Beyond the eerie silence, close encounter experiencers will often report a bizarre warping of reality, as if their own consciousness was being altered or distorted.

The term Oz Factor was coined in 1983 by British UFO researcher Jenny Randles. She was trying to describe this strange, but commonly reported, effect that emerged in close proximity to these unknown craft. She noted that the witnesses consistently described a strange calmness which was in contrast to the highly bizarre circumstances they were confronting. The Oz Factor was a way to describe “the sensation of being isolated, or transported from the real world into a different environmental framework... where reality is but slightly different.” She went on to state that, “The Oz Factor certainly points to consciousness as the focal point of the UFO encounter.” This is a bold statement given the nuts and bolts mindset of the research community at that time.

Randles wrote about these highly unusual sensations and how they are described by UFO witnesses:

If someone saw a light in the sky or even had a mundane UFO encounter with a strange looking craft, then these things would rarely appear. But if they had a close encounter, then these symptoms were there more often than not.

Witnesses would tell me that they felt a strange sensation prior to the encounter—a sort of mental tingling as if they were aware that something was about to happen. They would even tell me that they just had to look up and see what was there—as if it had called to them silently.

Then I would be told that during the experience time seemed to disappear and lose all meaning. It was as if the encounter were happening in a timeless, magical void. Further clues kept popping up the more that I tabulated these cases. For instance, there were claims that at the onset of the episode all ambient sounds faded away—bird song, the wind in the trees, distant train noises, etc.

All these clues pointed towards an isolation factor at work, as if the witness were being singled out and put into a cocoon... this sense of isolation became very obvious.

The Oz Factor implies that the UFO close encounter has a visionary component. You might interpret that as meaning it is all in the imagination, but it really means that there is a direct feed, if you like, from the source of the encounter to the consciousness of the witness.

Randles paints a vivid picture of an elusive sensation, as if some weird effect is emanating from the UFO and distorting our ability to perceive reality. Could this be what attracts the owls? Could they see it, or sense it, in ways we simply don't understand? Maybe an owl can receive input in ways that stretch well beyond the boundaries of the physical. Can it see our emotions, our auras or maybe even our souls?[\[11\]](#)

Altered states described by abductees

When an abductee describes their contact experience they'll almost always paint the event with an odd dreamlike vibe. They'll struggle to articulate their memories because everything seems so weirdly distorted. People will say things like I had a dream that wasn't a dream. Another thing that gets repeated is that the experience was more real than real. They perceive reality with a heightened clarity, a hyper-vividness and an eerie silence.

Even under hypnotic regression this dreamlike quality might be ever-present, making it difficult for the hypnotized experiencer to truly trust what is emerging. Any abduction researcher will be familiar with these bizarre descriptions. They'll state that direct contact with the aliens seems to take place in some altered reality. But what does that really mean?

One thought is that simply being in the presence of the alien entities is so traumatic to the experiencer that their sanity would be in jeopardy. So, this altered state might be imposed as a protection for their benefit. I have talked to a few people who have seen aliens in what would be their normal waking consciousness. What they'll describe is a sledgehammer blow to the very fabric of reality, as if their soul might be shattered from the shock. It goes way beyond simply seeing something scary, it's as if the actual proximity to these aliens is incompatible with the essence of existence itself. Some abductees will say the aliens vibrate in a different way and we just can't handle it.

Some contact experiences take place in an out of body experience (OBE) where the abductees can look down and see themselves as they are floated away by the aliens. These altered experiences with reality might be tied into the Oz Factor, there are certain similarities that are described by witnesses. It's these heightened or altered states that might be perceived by the owls.

My personal oz-factor experience

I've had my own experiences with these subtle realms, and they've played out with a palpable exactness. The sensations have been unmistakable and distinct each time they have happened. This distorted feeling has permeated everything, and each time it has had an apparent connection to a UFO event.

I've experienced this sensation, or something similar, four separate times. The first was in January or February of 1993, which I previously discussed. I awoke from a sound sleep because a bright light was flooding my bedroom. I sat up in bed and looked out the window to see five spindly gray aliens walking towards my house.

They were on the lawn, very close to my bedroom window. They were back-lit by a singular round bright shape, and this light seemed oddly small. My response to this frightening image was to think to myself, "Oh yes, they're here. Now is the time to put your head on the pillow and black out." After that, I nonchalantly lay my head down on the pillow and promptly fell back asleep.

Winter of 1993, near Standish Maine

Shouldn't I have jumped out of bed screaming in terror? Instead, I felt absolutely empty of emotion. It felt as if my reaction was somehow controlled. This whole event probably lasted less than 30 seconds. The next morning I dismissed it as a dream and, as I noted earlier, I never even bothered to check for footprints in the snow.

This happened over twenty years ago. Since then, I've written about this, drawn pictures, and wrestled with the implications. I did a long post on my blog where I tried honestly to express the utter strangeness of this memory. At the core of this experience was a definite change in normal perceptions, a kind of distorted consciousness.

It felt dreamlike, but unlike any other dream I've ever had. I don't dream of myself being in bed, as I actually was at the moment. Here is an excerpt of what I initially wrote to describe this sensation:

This memory is strangely vivid in a way that seems entirely different from a normal state of mind... weirdly quiet—sort of a pressurized fish bowl—the deepest part of my psyche is displaced and moved to the forefront—the normal thought chatter in my head is turned off—maybe—kinda—sorta... A distinct warping of my psyche, whatever that means... because this strangely vivid state of mind was so weird, I do not fully trust this memory.[\[12\]](#)

In the years since writing that, I've had three other experiences with that same distinct sensation. It is unmistakable, feeling exactly the same each time. The power of these follow-up experiences are enough to confirm to me that what happened on that winter's night in 1993 wasn't a dream.

Attempting to describe this distorted feeling in words would only hint at the sensations. All I can say is that what I felt was completely unique. I have made a concerted effort to ask other UFO abductees if they have ever experienced this altered state of consciousness.

Brigitte Barclay is an English abductee who has had a lifetime of UFO experiences, and even a few odd owl events. I spoke with her in person in the summer of 2014 and she tried to articulate what it felt like to be in the presence of this unknown force. She held up both hands with her palms facing each other, and slowly moved them closer together, and then just as slowly backed off.

She described the sensation of holding two powerful magnets so they repel each other, "You know that weird warping energy, that's what it feels like, it's like my whole body is in between those magnets in that distorted zone."

When she said that, I absolutely knew we had both experienced the same thing, her description was exactly what I had felt. She was describing something definitely physical, the energies produced by two magnets. A junior high school student can see these waves of energy on a smooth surface using a magnet and iron shavings. A homing pigeon can see similar waves in the sky. Could it be that an owl can see these energies with its highly attuned vision?

Marc Davenport

In his 1992 book, Visitors from Time, the late Marc Davenport proposed that it might be a distortion of time itself that is creating the sensation of silence and altered consciousness. He speculates that the actual propulsion of the UFO might be some form of time disruption. Some close encounter witnesses will tell of feeling as if they are moving in slow motion, or as if they are in some other time dimension. I read one report where an abductee told of being taken from a crowded swimming pool in the summertime. She described time stopping. The UFO occupants stepped in, escorted her from the scene, and later returned her back to the same moment. Time around her had stopped so completely that she could see water being splashed by children in the pool and the droplets stood frozen in mid-air.

Marc Davenport died in 2008 after a long battle with cancer. It was well known within the small community of UFO researchers that he was an abductee. What I find so fascinating is that someone with direct contact experiences would write a book with such a compelling set of ideas. He made a strong argument that altering time could be both a form of propulsion and the source of the anomalous effects that get reported in proximity to a UFO. This is bold stuff that almost nobody else has touched in this field.

It is not uncommon to hear abductees say that they knew an abduction would be taking place soon, and then it happens. For people with a history of UFO abductions, these impressions might come as a psychic premonition or as a tangible physical feeling. They'll describe a vibration or a literal buzzing sensation in their body. They can feel it within their gut or chest. Sometime it's just a sense of knowing. What are they feeling? Are they psychically predicting the future, tapping into something further along the timeline? Or is there some palpable energy that precedes an event like a UFO abduction? I've been told directly that there is an unmistakable vibration that can be recognized from previous abduction accounts. Does the craft itself send out some barely perceivable emanation that people can pick up on? Does reality itself somehow vibrate in advance of a cosmic doorway before it opens into another dimension?

One young man told me of lying in bed listening to the loud hooting of an owl right outside his window. In the next moment there was a group of skinny gray aliens surrounding his bed. I have collected quite a few reports where people will hear an owl hooting right before an abduction occurs. These folks don't need to feel a psychic vibration. It seems the owl is announcing the arrival of the UFO occupants. Or, this eerie call could be another form of screen memory.

There are countless stories of mysterious unmarked vans parked in front of the homes of abductees. After hearing these accounts over and over, a kind of paranoid narrative emerges. If these vans are there for some reason, are they hiding shadowy government technicians who are busily gathering information? They seem to be positioning themselves within close proximity to the abductees. Are these vans filled with advanced instrumentation that can monitor for subtle changes in things as simple as heat, high-pitched noises, or radiation? Or, are they trying to monitor something more exotic like gamma ray bursts or maybe shifts in time itself? I am only guessing what might be at play, but the accounts of these cloak-and-dagger vans are so consistent that they must be there for a reason.

Something as profoundly strange as UFO contact would probably produce some equally profoundly strange effects. There must be something happening that can be sensed or even measured. It might be that owls can sense this unknown something.

Oscar the hospice cat

There is a rather famous cat named Oscar that lives in a nursing home in Providence, Rhode Island. This cat seems to have the mysterious ability to know when a patient is close to death. Most of the time he is aloof, shunning attention from the staff and patients, but he has a sense of knowing that has proven eerily accurate. Oscar spends his days pacing from room to room. He sniffs and looks at the patients but rarely spends much time with anyone, except when they have just hours to live. He's accurate enough that the staff understands that it's time to call family members when Oscar curls up beside their patients, most of who are too ill to notice his presence. If he's kept outside the room of a dying patient, he'll scratch at the door trying to get in.

What is Oscar sensing? Is he simply attuned to some extremely subtle metabolic stresses that are part of the death process? Is he tapping into the subconscious emotional awareness of the patient? Or, is he somehow seeing the astral presence of long dead loved ones who have come from beyond the veil to hold vigil at the bedside of their dying friend, waiting to usher them to the other side? Is he seeing into the future, somehow predicting the death? Is he sensing an aura, a vibration, a life force or the presence of angels? I don't know, but he certainly seems to be sensing something that we cannot.

It appears possible to sense death approaching. Could it be that predators, like cats and owls, have developed some ability to detect the parting of the veil? Oscar might sense the door to the other side gently opening, welcoming a soul to the afterlife. If owls share this ability, this might be the source of the ever-present folklore that they are somehow connected to death.

Seeing through the eyes of the owls

The UFO abduction literature is awash in stories where the abductee is influenced to do things that are completely beyond their normal behavior. A recurring example would be a person waking in the middle of the night and feeling compelled to drive alone to some remote location. It might be a place they've never been to before, but they drive there as if they know the route by heart. They'll do all this without ever questioning that it's in any way unusual. They will arrive at some secluded field at the end of a dirt road to find a UFO waiting for them. What follows would be an all-too-familiar abduction event. When it's all done, they'll calmly drive home without any sense of just having done anything out of the ordinary.

This kind of mind control, in one form or another, is constantly reported. Abductees are being controlled with absolute mastery by unknown entities from an unknown place. The UFO occupants might be controlling owls in a similar way.

Whitley Strieber has speculated that the gray aliens, using some sort of telepathy, might be able literally to see through the eyes of owls. The ability both to see and fly in almost total darkness would make owls an excellent choice for the role of alien surveillance camera. The implication is that these alien entities were looking at both me and Kristen, through those great big eyes, on those two separate nights in the mountains.

Using owls as a kind of flying camera seems quite practical, although pretty far-fetched. That said, the entirety of the UFO phenomena is pretty far-fetched, but the consistency of what gets reported is impossible to ignore. Whatever the source of the contact experience, there are reliable reports of extremely powerful psychic and telepathic powers on the part of these unknown entities.

I spoke at length to a woman who had what seems to have been an obvious UFO abduction experience, which involved a stretch of missing time while in her car. Soon after this event she began to experience clear telepathic messages. She says that this communication was from her ancient ancestors, all of them shamans, and they said they could see through her eyes. Among other requests, they pleaded with her to go to the tea aisle in the grocery store. They told her to carefully inspect each and every box to indulge their curiosity. She described them as positively giddy when she obliged, carefully reading the ingredients on the back of each little box. This story paints a picture of tea drinkers from long ago who are now in some other realm where doing something so three-dimensional, like drinking tea, is impossible.

The late Ida Kannenberg was an author, abductee, and psychic channel. She wrote that her alien guides were totally thrilled on the day she went to Sea World. They were super excited to be able to watch the dolphins through her eyes. She also said these guides would get frustrated and scold her for skimming through books and not reading every word on every page. It seems that they were looking through her eyes and reading along with her.

Using the eyes of birds as a kind of avian-reconnaissance is part of Norse mythology. Odin created two Ravens, Huginn and Muninn, or thought and memory. They would fly around Midgard (Earth) each day and then return to Odin, transferring all they had perceived to him. Odin, the father of Thor, is a principal member the Norse pantheon of gods and is associated with death, wisdom, shamanism, magic, and prophecy.

Seeing through the eyes of an animal could be part of the shamanic mission. I have the image of the village elder dragged into the spirit realm after ceremonially drinking a brew of sacred psychedelic plants, and then racing through the jungle as if merged with his totem animal, like a puma, deer, or owl.

Heather Clewett-Jachowski is a shaman and researcher of ancient sacred sites. She has a powerful story from a summer's night in the crop circle country of southern England. She describes an electric feel in the air as she approached a white owl perched on a fence post. It watched her and then spread its wings and flew off into the darkness. At that point, Heather experienced some odd visual sensations. She saw the ground zipping below her, getting closer, and then farther away. It took a moment to realize what she was experiencing—she was seeing through the eyes of the owl as it flew over the undulating ground.[\[13\]](#)

From stories like these, seeing through the big night vision eyes of an owl should be no big deal for the UFO occupants. I talked about these ideas with another abductee at a UFO conference, and he thought using an owl as an alien surveillance camera was perfectly pragmatic. There is really no better animal in the world to play this role than the stealthy owl.

We speculated that the owls could be employed as an advance scout before any actual abduction. They are equipped with excellent onboard night-vision, and this could be used to send back real-time images of their intended landing spot and the exact location of an unsuspecting abductee. Owls could sit on window sills and eavesdrop on conversations with their powerful ears. They could patiently watch from trees so the monitoring aliens would know when an abductee had arrived at home. Plus, the owls could fly around in near-complete silence to make sure there weren't any other people nearby who might witness the alien's impending covert operations. The owls could also be on the lookout for any sneaky government intelligence agents spying on the abductee from a parked van or the neighbors' bushes. This transfer of sound and visuals could all be done with purely psychic means, a direct mind-to-mind connection between the owl and the UFO occupant.

It is also possible that this form of spying might require a physical device within the owl's body. I've had more than one abductee tell me that they have tiny implants in their body and that the aliens use these to see what we see and hear what we hear. This kind of implanted technology is occasionally removed from these abductees by surgeons. What is then studied is usually very small, but with some extremely strange properties. These objects have been scrutinized in advanced laboratory settings, and they've found isotopic ratios incompatible with anything here on earth, better likened to meteorite samples. If these tiny implants can be put into people, they could certainly be put into owls. There is no good answer what these implants do. They might be a little technological gizmo that allows the aliens to watch the owl-cam using a big view screen and joy-stick while onboard their flying saucer, but that notion is probably far too simplistic.

I have no idea if any of this is true, but it seems reasonable. All I can say is that there is a tidy practicality to using the owl to play such a sneaky covert role.

Researchers who have really studied the perceived abilities of these aliens might scoff at any need for an owl to act as camera, concluding that they are so immeasurably advanced that they simply use their psychic skills to read every thought, and know the location, of anyone of interest.

It is impossible to know precisely what is going on with the owls and their connection to the UFO lore. The screen memory aspect of owls requires we accept the psychic (or technological) powers of the aliens to influence the mind of the observer. Once we go down that path, it all gets thorny—the entirety of the phenomenon might be some form of grand screen memory.

Real owls possess their own kind of magic. Even if you completely dismiss the paranormal aspects reported by abductees, owls are amazing creatures with near mystical abilities. Their presence alongside UFO reports could be something purely physical—they could be using their heightened senses and noticing something we simply can't perceive. There may come a day when our technology allows for an answer. We might invent something that can sense the presence of a flying saucer. Or it might be something metaphysical; the owls could be tapping into the synchronistic ether like a winged mystic. These are muddy waters without easy answers, and it might be a blurry combination of multiple ideas.

PART II

EXPERIENCING OWLS

Instead of looking at the screen, what I want to do is to turn around and look the other way. When we look the other way what we see is a little hole at the top of the wall with some light coming out. That's where I want to go. I want to steal the key to the projectionist's booth, and then, when everybody has gone home, I want to break in.

—Jacques Vallee

Chapter 4: Owls and the UFO Abductee

Real owls?

If you ask a UFO abduction researcher, “Have you had any odd experiences with owls show up in your reports?” They’ll say yes, then they will rattle off some screen memory accounts with owls, much of it will sound just like the stuff you’ve just read.

If you follow up by asking, “Beyond screen memories, do you have any unusual reports in your files involving real owls?” They will probably answer, no they haven’t.

I’ve asked these questions of some of the elder statesmen in the field of UFO abduction research, people like Budd Hopkins, Dr. David Jacobs, Dr. Leo Sprinkle, Jerome Clark, Barbara Lamb, Joe Montaldo, John Carpenter, Yvonne Smith and Mary Rodwell. These researchers must have a century of research among them. Collectively, they have talked with what I can only assume are tens of thousands of people who have had direct UFO contact. But when I ask about real owls, I am continually surprised that there is almost nothing they can tell me.[\[14\]](#)

I searched through books and reports by the late Dr. John Mack wondering if I would find any reference to owls beyond just the screen memory aspect, but never found anything. I then contacted someone at the Mack estate who ran a database search of his transcripts. I was allowed to review some redacted excerpts from a group meeting of experiencers facilitated by Dr. Mack. Within these accounts were participants talking about odd experiences with what seemed to be real owls.

Dr. Mack commented on one of these stories. He said his initial thought was that the owl was some sort of screen memory, although what was described seemed more like a real owl. Dr Mack said: “I think there’s some way in which it may be more symbolic.” This clearly implies he was aware of something beyond just the screen memory when owls and other imagery are seen by experiencers.

Dr. Mack used the term reified metaphor to express that these experiences may be both literal and a metaphorical. Reify means to make an abstract idea real. This idea of a reified metaphor presents itself as a paradox. Dr. Mack was very clear that, on one hand, these experiences can be vividly and undeniably real “while at the same time it is deeply metaphoric or archetypal, including representations of death, birth, rebirth, transcendence and enlightenment.”[\[15\]](#)

Many experiencers are telling me extremely bizarre accounts of real owls showing in connection to their UFO encounters. It’s certainly not one hundred percent of the abductees that will tell these stories, but it happens enough that I recognize a pattern. Something is going on.

Why are the researchers so unaware of the strange way that real owls are playing out a role in the lives of some abductees? One thought is that I am simply asking a question that the UFO abduction researchers aren't, and that's why I am getting the answers. The other thought is that I am somehow manifesting these answers by the subjective way I have been doing my research.

During this research, I've had owl stories arrive in my lap in wildly synchronistic ways. Obviously, I am asking for these kinds of owl experiences on my website, so that must be a big part of what I'm receiving. But, I can't help but wonder if there are some magical forces at work that are making sure that any relevant story involving owls and UFOs somehow ends up in my files. It feels like I haven't done all that much research—all I do is check my email each morning to find amazing stories. It feels like a weird aspect of synchronicity is somehow generating exactly what's needed for this book project. It has been absolutely bizarre how the perfect owl story will arrive at the perfect moment, as if influences outside myself are creating this book project for me.

The UFO abduction researchers will point out that owls have great big eyes, and this is similar to the great big eyes of the aliens. As noted earlier, it's as if the UFO occupants are choosing the owl as a screen memory simply because they look like them. This explanation has been repeated so many times that it's considered to be a truth. It is instead an assumption, there is no answer as to why they are choosing the owl as one of their screen memory costumes.

The screen memory aspect of the contact experience is fascinating, and the mind control implications are staggering. But of more interest to me is the abductee seeing real owls in connection with these sightings and experiences. The focus of this research has been people who tell of seeing real owls, and this traces back to my own experiences with seeing owls, very often at highly charged or synchronistic moments. I feel strongly that the owls I've seen are real owls. They appeared normal in every way, in size, and behavior.

The question arises, why are real owls showing up in connection to UFOs?

I have amassed a wealth of reports where real owls show up in the presence of the witness right around the time of a UFO sighting. When looking at these cases, I'm forced to ask two questions: Is the witness actually an abductee?

And the follow-up, is the sighting actually a hidden abduction experience? Neither are easy to answer. The initial problem is that sometimes it's hard to know if the witness is seeing a real owl or some sort of psychic projection.

Stranger still, sometimes when I ask an abductee (or someone I suspect has had abduction experiences) the question: "Have you ever had any odd experiences with owls?," every so often I'll get a reply like: Oh yes, I had an experience with an owl that totally changed my life! It's as if the owl triggered a spiritual awakening. These are rare, but I've heard enough of these transcendent stories that it forces me to look at the overall mystery in a much deeper way. It is my sense—and this is impossible to know for sure—that most of the people coming to me with unusual owl stories have had direct contact with the UFO phenomenon, and by this I mean abduction.

I've seen a lot of owls and I feel strongly that none of these sightings have been screen memories. These owls were normal sized, flying around, and doing things that real owls would do. But some of these sightings are clustered around such powerful moments in my life that they just feel important—as if owls are manifesting for some deeper purpose. I've been trying to come to terms with how the UFO reality has collided with my life and these owls have been signposts along this path.

I heard a nice little analogy from a guy who has had an overwhelming amount of odd activity in his life, both with UFOs and owls. He said: "Owls are like firemen. If you see a building on fire you might see a bunch guys running around with funny helmets, long rubber jackets, and hoses. They didn't start the fire but they just seem to show up." He is just as mystified as I am about what role the owls might play, but like myself, he's convinced they are somehow connected.

Ashlee's story

What follows is a short excerpt from an account written in October 2010 by a young woman named Ashlee. She begins by describing something unusual in the night sky, and in the wake of her sighting weird things began to occur. She wrote:

I had to pull over onto the side of the road. There was a large flying object hovering in the sky above me. It was making no sound whatsoever, and was flying very low (about a house and a half high) There weren't any flashing lights on it, only a red dangling string that was lit up. There were three cars pulled over behind me, and the guy from the first car was taking pictures. The pictures were unclear, you could only make out the red light.

After seeing this UFO I started noticing some weird things... I started having encounters with owls. Why owls? I have no idea.

Ashlee asked the same question that has been plaguing me—why owls? She was seeing and hearing them with a heightened frequency that scared her. From what she described, these seem to be real owls and not screen memories. She also started having strange dreams with both owls and UFOs together. Along with all that, she wrote about an odd experience with her mobile phone.

Two weeks ago I woke up to a text from my boyfriend that said “What the hell are you talking about?” When I checked my outbox I noticed four strange texts that I don’t remember sending. I saved them in my phone.

Text message one: “It will identify all planes in the sky. Will detect unauthorized flying objects and will warn them of aliens near by.”

Text message two: “Yes, destroy it. We must hold our ground.”

Text message three: “You will remain undetected”

Text message four: “They threaten us but they are weak, report back to me.”

I don’t know what these mean, they don’t make very much sense. I know it’s possible to sleep walk and sleep talk, but sleep text?[\[16\]](#)

Ashlee ended her written account by asking: “If anyone has had any similar experiences, please let me know.” So, she did exactly what I’ve been doing.

I have spoken to Ashlee and she shared enough that I see her as one more of the maybe people. She is a sensitive young woman dedicated to meditation and shamanistic practices with the goal of someday being a spiritual counselor. This kind of divine commitment has been a very clear pattern within this research. The people seeing UFOs and owls are—for the most part—seekers.

Bonnie Jean Mitchell’s stories

Bonnie Jean Mitchell is very clear that she is a life-long contactee. She has written about her extensive experiences with the star people (her term for who she’s been in contact with) in her 2011 book Invitation To The Self. She’s also had experiences with owls, both as screen memories and with real owls. She sees owls as messengers, and as spiritual beings with a direct link to the star people.

During a time of heavy contact in her 20s, if Bonnie heard or saw an owl in the evening, she knew the star people would show up that night. Her descriptions and experiences match what a lot of others have hinted at, but she states it with a refreshing directness. She describes these owl sightings in her book:

Owls have made a huge impact on my life, not just by appearing in screen memories, but by entering my waking world as well. I have come to find that when I hear an owl in the evening, there is a good probability I will have a visitation. I do not know what the connection is, but it is there. On more occasions than I can count, owls have “alerted” me to the possibility of visitation. In many ways, I consider the owl to be a helpful guide. Sometimes, however, I am not pleased when all I remember from a night’s experience is the vision of an owl... but this also alerts me and tells me to look deeper for hidden memories.

For example, one evening I heard two owls hooting outside my bedroom window, somewhere very close by. I thought that I might look out the window to see the owls, but then I thought better of it, not wanting to “bring on” a visitation; some nights I longed for regular sleep. So, I didn’t look, but that did not prevent the event from occurring. The next morning, my left arm felt sore, like I had a bruise. I checked it out and found a brand new scar. I had no recollection of any dreams that night, which was quite abnormal for me. I realized there must have been something going on, but I never did figure it out. That was not always the case.

Bonnie went on to explain about waking up on another morning without any memory of dreams. Then she recalled something strange from that night, she woke to the hooting of an owl. She wrote: “I looked out the window and saw a huge owl staring back at me. I am talking BIG, like 3-foot tall!” After that, she could remember nothing else. She was aware that this was a deceptive screen memory, and she was angry, feeling like she was being lied to by these visiting beings.[\[17\]](#)

Nadine Lalich’s story

Nadine Lalich has had a lifetime of ongoing UFO experiences. After decades of keeping these memories to herself, she came forward and openly shared her history of contact. She co-wrote a book with abduction researcher Barbara Lamb where she documents her own experiences. The book, Alien Experiences, was published in 2008. I spoke with Nadine in a recorded interview in 2012, and asked if she had any odd experiences with owls.

In her very clear way she replied yes. She then went on to say:

2005 or 2006 was right at the point when I was making this turn, when I was stepping out and speaking my truth about this reality.

It was at this time that owls started appearing around my apartment, great big owls. These weren’t just owls that I would see in a dream, these were actually owls around my apartment, big owls. I would come home at night and there would be one on a branch near my door, or something similar.

This was the first time I ever recall seeing owls in my life. It was strange that they would show up at that time in my life.

She told of several strange abduction related events that happened in that apartment. Here is a woman who was well past the “maybe” point in her own acceptance that this was a reality in her life and these owls manifested right when she was coming forward and speaking her truth.

Ron Johnson’s stories

I have become friends with a soft-spoken man named Ron. I’ve met him over the years at a series of annual UFO conferences. His experiences are rich, detailed, and ongoing. In many ways, he reminds me a lot of myself. He has always been very cautious to avoid coming to any conclusions. All he will do is tell of his own direct experiences.

Ron is featured in an entire chapter in the book Alien Encounters in the Western United States by researcher Tracie Austin. She writes:

Ron repeatedly witnessed numerous UFO sightings and encountered alien visitations at his home. He would also experience visitations from animals, an owl in particular, that would sit on the front porch of his mother’s house, and remain there constantly day and night for over a week. Every morning, the owl would watch him walk down the steps to get into his truck to go to work, and then when Ron returned home, the owl would still be perched in the same spot, watching him get out of his truck, walk up the steps, and go into the house. Every day was the same.[\[18\]](#)

This sounds very much like a real owl showing up in an overt way in the life of an abductee. One more story of an owl (or owls) that are “staking out” the home during a time of heightened activity.

Ron also experienced something that sounds very much like a screen memory. I visited his home in May of 2013, and sat with him as he shared stories. He told me about waking up in the middle of the night and feeling a need to go outside. He walked out onto his front porch and saw a giant four foot owl standing on his driveway. He described how they both stood there and stared at each other.

There was something about the way he described this experience that seemed so weird and I asked him if this was a dream. He replied, “I’m pretty sure this was no dream. I remember feeling the cold porch under my bare feet. I think I was really out there.”

There was an odd tone in the way he described standing on the porch and seeing that huge owl. There is a dreamlike quality that surrounds some of these experiences, and I sensed that he was articulating this odd distorted reality. This, to me, might imply the close proximity of the UFO occupants.

This ethereal sensation seems a tidy match for the Oz Factor.

I received this note shortly after my time at his home, “After you left my house there was an owl perched again in my garage watching the window into my living room.”

Ron has sent me photos of owls taken from his yard, something other folks have done, too. Over the years, I’ve collected quite a few of these pictures, and some will be remarkably close up. I have a beautiful flash photo of a barred owl taken by a woman from her back porch. This image is captioned, “Took this from less than six feet away.” She, like Ron, has sent me a lot of owl photos and she is also an abductee.

Owl accounts from Sweden

In the summer of 1966 two young men were traveling by moped to Sörbo in the Swedish province Dalarna. The event took place when they took a short break in the rural countryside to pee. This would have been around ten in the evening, still dusk at that northern latitude. While off their bikes, they noticed an owl sitting on a post beside the road.

Right after this, they noticed something else. A large silvery craft hanging in the sky about 150 meters above the ground. The craft then moved slowly across the nearby fields as it emitted flashes of light. The boys hopped back on their mopeds and followed, watching it land in a nearby field. Once on the ground, it seemed to be surrounded by an unusual fog, and they noticed movement of what appeared to be humanoid figures. When the boys tried to get a closer look, the craft left the ground and accelerated away at a very high speed.

This 50-year-old case has witnesses seeing an owl right before seeing a UFO. This is a pattern found in a long list of other cases. There is no way to know if there is a buried abduction event connected to this sighting, but the details certainly send up a red flag. An owl sitting on a post sounds more like a real owl, and less like a screen memory.

This story came from the archives of Håkan Blomqvist, a UFO researcher from Sweden. He sought me out after learning of my investigation into owls and UFOs. What is even more curious (at least to me) is that Blomqvist, who has been actively researching UFOs for the last 40 years, also collects owls! Here’s what he wrote in his blog:

For many years I have been collecting owl figurines of various types and material. I became fascinated by these unusual birds symbolizing both wisdom, magic and mysticism and my collection now comprises something like 60 plus owls. But it was not until the last couple of years that I became aware of the connection between UFO sightings and owls.

Blomqvist has written three books on the paranormal (all in Swedish) with a focus on the relation between esoteric traditions and the UFO phenomenon. He's never had a UFO or contact experience, but he's had several mysterious experiences including distant healing, precognition, and telepathy. So, a dedicated UFO researcher who has had psychic experiences is also collecting owls.[\[19\]](#)

Blomqvist also shared another account, this one August 8, 1987 from the Swedish Daily Post, with the spectacular headline "I Saw The Devil." This event happened in the summer of 1980. No UFO in this account, but a weird owl apparition seems to proceed an even more bizarre monster sighting.

The article tells of Swedish-American Ingvar Oskar Johansson, who was traveling by car on a beautiful moonlit night from the Eastern coast to Åseda. His eleven-year-old son was sleeping in the back seat. Not far from the town of Blomstermåla, the sky suddenly lit up with a blue light, and a large owl appeared in front of the car. He stopped the car and the owl landed on the windscreen. Ingvar could hear its cries. The owl's face appeared human, which frightened Ingvar—he felt as though the owl was looking right at him. After a few moments, it lifted and disappeared.

After traveling a few more miles, Ingvar had his next experience with the unknown. While driving, he noticed what he first believed was an animal coming up from the side of the road. The next thing he realized was that this creature was floating up in the air in front of the car. Ingvar could not see its face, but it was covered with brown hair, had two legs, a tail, two horns and long ears. The creature floated just above the car. Ingvar's initial reaction was fear that it was an animal that had been hit by a car. He stopped, got out, and looked around, but found no trace of anything unusual. The rest of his journey was quiet.

Aimee Sparrow's stories

Seeing a UFO can happen simultaneously with seeing an owl. This bizarre overlapping of two seemingly unrelated events is at the core of this book. The vast majority of the people who tell me these experiences are either out-and-out UFO abductees, or the maybe people that can't be so easily categorized.

I've bumped into a woman named Aimee Sparrow a few times over the years at conferences. I first saw her in the closed confines of a UFO support group, probably in 2008. I was rapt as she spoke with a curious confidence about her ongoing lifelong contact experiences. After that meeting I went up to her and asked if she'd ever had any synchronicities. She responded without words, simply rolling her eyes in an expression of exasperation. It was the same pantomimed response you might get from a resident of Winnipeg if you ask them if it gets cold in the winter.

Some years later she hinted to me that she's had a few owl experiences. I contacted her by phone to ask about it, and we spoke late into the night, both of us shared a long list of strange owl happenings. She's had a lifelong fascination with owls, and this seemed to play out alongside her abduction experiences. They've been showing up around her all throughout her life, but it's only recently that she sensed they were somehow connected.

She had a really powerful experience in the summer of 2010 at the ECETI ranch (Enlightened Contact with ET Extraterrestrial Intelligence) near Mount Adams in Washington State. This is a gathering point for UFO watchers and new-age believers run by a fellow with his own contact experiences, James Gilliland. This place is an easy target for skeptics because of an almost cult-like lore, but pretty much everyone I've ever spoken with who has been there tells of having their own strange experiences.

Aimee describes standing in a field at night with a group of over 200 people. They were all collectively putting out the intention to see something in the sky. Suddenly they all saw some sort of orange glowing plasma pass over the entire group. Aimee was at a loss to describe what she saw and felt. It was as if time had stopped, the bright light was morphing in and out of reality—and she was awash in a feeling of unconditional love. It felt like she was being downloaded with highly charged emotions, these were penetrating directly into her consciousness.

Aimee had a second UFO sighting the next night at the ranch. She was watching the sky along with at least 75 other witnesses when she saw a red rainbow-colored UFO morph into existence. This happened right after James did a “star gate opening” ceremony, and she had the same profound feeling of unconditional love.

When she got back home to California, she sat with her two kids and started telling them what she had seen and felt that night at the ECETI ranch. It was dark outside as they all sat together as she started describing the event. Then she suddenly blurted out, “I gotta go upstairs!”

Without knowing why, she ran up to the second floor balcony off her bedroom. As soon as she stepped outside, a large white owl swooped in slow motion very close to her with its wings wide open. She was instantly flooded by the same emotional timelessness and love that she experienced in the presence of the orange light in that field in Washington.

Years later, Aimee woke up in the middle of the night with the strange feeling of being called to go outside. She acted on this intuitive urging, and stepped out onto that same balcony off her bedroom; she clearly remembers it was 4:44 in the morning.

For reasons she doesn't understand, she thought to herself, "I'd like to see a space ship, but I'd settle for a white barn owl." At that moment she heard a loud screech and then saw a beautiful white owl in flight. It was huge and silent. Once again, she felt that same timeless sensation of unconditional love.

There was another event, where she was with a handful of close friends. They were all out together at night in the Angeles National Forest. She and her companions saw a huge owl perched above them in a tree. They watched it for a little while, and right after it flew off a giant triangular craft moved across the sky above them. This wasn't anything that could be described as metal, or even physical. Instead they could see right through it, as if it was somehow beyond 3-D, almost crystalline. It seemed as if its form was reflecting and distorting reality itself. This seems curiously similar to Derek's owl and UFO sighting, described earlier in this book. Although both crafts were triangular, their actual physicality comes across as decidedly different.

The next morning after seeing that triangular crystalline ship, Aimee saw a wobbly Billy Meier type of flying saucer floating along near her home. This happened in full daylight, and her house was high on a hillside, giving her an excellent vantage. She watched from above as this somewhat cartoonish craft slowly floated above a busy freeway in the canyon below her. She was shocked that none of the cars reacted. Her immediate impression was that the traffic should have come to a screeching halt in the presence of something so absolutely bizarre. The implication is that only Aimee could see this craft, as if it were some sort of theatrical projection just for her.[\[20\]](#)

Aimee's has had other equally strange owl experiences that leave me absolutely perplexed as to their purpose and source. The vibe of these owl events seems to match the overall weirdness of UFO sightings, even without any weird craft in the sky.

An owl looks at a flying orb

I received a long set of reports from a young man with the initials of JB who had been documenting his many UFO sightings. When printed out, it was nine pages long, and each sighting was detailed and concise. He has been seeing many unusual objects in the sky. Most of these are orbs that seem to have a circular glow around them appearing as orange, red, blue, and violet.

JB describes many of the orbs as silent and solid, flying beautifully smooth and fluid, as though they don't conform to our reality. Many will materialize out of nothing and then disappear. He's also seen a bright metallic silvery orb or ball that levitated in a stationary position, as well as a long silver cigar-shaped object. Some of the sightings play out as if these craft are conscious of his thoughts, and many of these are seen (and confirmed) by other witnesses.

That one individual could see so many UFOs, and often photograph or videorecord these sightings, is rather common in this subject. It seems to play out as if these craft are manifesting specifically to be seen by these people.

One set of sightings was particularly interesting to me:

I saw something tonight... It was an orange/white orb coming from the south. It was quite small, and it seemed to be at a reasonable altitude. It moved rapidly and definitely faster and smoother than a plane. I do not think, feel, or believe this was a satellite, of any kind...

What are the chances of seeing one whenever I go outside at night or think about them? This has happened nearly every night for the past few weeks. These aren't lies, nor do I think they are psychic fabrications... [This orange/white orb] was sighted at around 9:58 p.m. It was 10:05 p.m. as I finished writing this passage.

JB went inside to document what he had seen within minutes of his sighting. Most of his reporting was written in a very dry 'just-the-facts' way. But that night he laments about the why of it, and how what has been happening to him goes beyond mere chance. What happens next, following his questioning, shouldn't surprise anyone who has gotten this far in the book.

I went back outside, scanned the sky, saw a huge orange comet (?) that made a sizzling noise, and eventually saw another orb flying in the sky. It was possibly the same one as mentioned above, but this time it was coming down from the north.

I kept hearing noises, and I started getting a little anxious. I turned my head to my right and I saw an owl on a power-line next to my house, it was staring at me and making these noises. I was juggling between looking at the sky, the orb, and the owl in amazement. The owl was facing its head at me, and then redirecting its head towards the sky and moving its head around in a circular motion, or, circular like fashion. I kept going between the sky, and owl, searching for the orb again. The owl kept repeating this noise and because of this I ended up losing the orb in the sky. The owl had flown away right before I could see the orb again.[\[21\]](#)

I asked him if the owl actually looked at the orb, and he replied yes, that the owl saw it too. I'm not sure if this qualifies as a multiple witness report, but this is the only account I have where an owl looks up at a UFO. It is also one of the very few accounts I have of an owl being seen right in the same moment with a UFO. In this case, both owl and UFO flew off simultaneously. What is interesting is that it shows up right at the point that JB questions his numerous sightings.

Summary

Not every UFO encounter is connected with owls, but there are enough accounts to leave me totally overwhelmed. These owl experiences are so tightly intertwined with the UFO contact experience that, to me, it has become merged into one thing. I have collected such a wealth of these stories, and the similarities in tone are impossible to ignore. People are seeing or hearing owls before, during, and after seeing UFOs, as well as before, during, and after abduction events. I spoke with one abductee about how he heard owls hooting out his window, waking him in the night, and then suddenly there were spindly gray aliens surrounding his bed. After that he blacked out.

I spoke with two women who were together when they saw an owl sitting on the windowsill, staring in at them. What they described wasn't just seeing a bird out a window, it was emotional and dreamlike. Later they realized that the outside edge of the sill was far too small to allow a big bird like an owl to stand there and stare in at them. From my separate conversations with them, I feel strongly that both these women are abductees.

Whatever is at play, it is real enough to see the patterns, yet elusive enough to remain a mystery. There is a mood to these stories, a gut feeling that goes far beyond just the nuts and bolt data collected by most UFO investigators. These are hunches that lead nowhere, except perhaps within.

Chapter 5: Owls and Windshields

We don't want to startle you

A woman named Jan contacted me with an interesting owl experience. She lives in Australia and had recently become a member of a local UFO research group. She had no personal connection with any UFO events, but she has had a rich set of paranormal experiences with a form of intense spirit possession. For a time, she claimed to be sharing the consciousness with the spirit of William the Marshal, an English knight who died in the year 1219. This manifestation was so fierce that her home erupted in poltergeist activity and electronic equipment either stopped working or outright exploded.

Jan recognized that these divergent phenomena, both UFOs and past lives, seem to have some sort of relationship. She also feels she has psychic abilities and has prophetic dreams. As part of her personal exploration of these subjects, she took part in a series of meditative initiative programs with the intention of drawing in UFOs. This was done through protocols created by Dr. Steven Greer.

A curious event took place in the follow up to her involvement with this UFO group. She was driving at night with her husband through a heavily forested area and she was drifting off towards sleep. While in this half-awake state, she put out the mental thought to the UFO occupants, "Are you real? I've spent years researching you and I haven't personally witnessed anything to suggest that you are real."

She immediately received an answer. It came as a very clear voice in her mind: "We don't want to startle you."

Having been at the receiving end of so much paranormal stuff, she laughed, "Startle me? As if anything could actually startle me!"

Right at that instant, she saw an enormous owl take flight from the side of the road and smash straight into her windshield. Both Jan and her husband were extremely alarmed and they stopped the car. They got out and looked around. There was no evidence of an injured owl, not even a feather on the road.

She described watching the owl lifting off from a low barrier between the forest and the road. She said it seemed to be flying in slow motion. Even though her husband tried to put on the brakes, the owl impacted the glass hard.

I am struck by the symbology embedded in this story. She described the owl as perched on "a low barrier between the forest and the road." The road is symbolic of the path, or life journey. The forest represents the darkness that must be entered, a place of testing before reaching spiritual goals. The owl sat on the barrier between these two. This is a mythic role of the owl—the gatekeeper between the realms—and in this story it smashes violently against another barrier, the windshield, jolting her awake. The owl as alarm clock is another meaning, and it certainly played that role too.

Jan also pointed out that the road they were on winds its way through a beautiful area with a deep connection to the indigenous people of Australia and their dreamtime mythologies.

I've collected a lot of stories where owls swoop in front of cars at night, but only a few where they actually hit the windshield. All these stories imply that the owl hit incredibly hard. These people describe being shocked, stopping their car, and looking around for the wounded (or more probably dead) owl, but finding nothing. No feathers or blood on the windshield, nothing on the road or nearby.

If an owl does fly into a window, it can leave distinct markings on the glass. In 2011, a woman returned to her home in Kendal, U.K. to find a nearly perfect imprint of an owl on a window. An owl apparently crashed into the glass, leaving a ghostly white image, complete with eyes, beak, tail, and fully outstretched wings. Owls produce a talc-like substance called powder down. This is layered close to their skin and protects their growing down feathers. The powder created the haunting silhouette on the glass.[\[22\]](#)

It is rather common to see an owl zip across a car windshield at night. It has happened to me a few times and most of the time there is nothing paranormal about it. What might be of significance is what was happening in the moments leading up to this sighting. I have said this repeatedly throughout this book, but when I hear people tell me about owls, I'll ask what they were thinking or saying right before the owl appeared.

Ben tells his stories

I am friends with a man who has only recently come to a place where he can admit openly the anomalous events in his life. I understand this tension all too well, the need to share your own defining experiences and knowing full well that the rest of the world doesn't want to hear it. His name is Ben, and we have a lot of odd similarities with both our lives and our experiences, enough that it seems way beyond mere coincidence. There are a few folks that I feel a special bond with, and he is one of them. He told me a very interesting owl and windshield story.

He was driving an SUV full of children home from his daughter's birthday party at a skating rink. During the drive the kids pleaded with Ben to tell them some stories. So, for the first time ever, he spoke about some of the strange things that had happened in his life, events that imply some sort of ongoing contact experiences. He was worried about scaring them so he told his stories in a sort of "campfire" way. He shared with me:

It was very emotional for me to tell these stories because I had never even hinted to my kids prior to that moment that I have had these experiences since childhood. I told them a ton of stories, with my missing time event as the finale. The stories were well received by all of the kids and I was feeling relief that I had crossed a milestone. I felt like I finally sort of came out to my kids, like I had left the door open for them to take away what they wanted from the stories. I was glad I had framed it in a way that I didn't overwhelm them.

Right as he finished speaking, an owl swooped in front of his windshield. It came down over the top of the car and flew in the headlight beams. All the kids let out a collective whoa! Ben said it was obnoxiously close, and after a moment of gliding out in front of the vehicle it flew off to the right and disappeared into the woods.

Ben was no stranger to synchronicities, so his immediate playful thought was, "Oh come on, an owl? How cliché! Couldn't you have sent something more original like a bear?" Right then a huge black dog ran across the road, and one of the kids shouted, "Look a bear!"

There wasn't any lag time, it all happened within seconds—finishing his paranormal stories, the owl, the dog, and the bear comment.

Reflecting on this account, Ben felt that telling his stories was something hugely important. Admitting to others what he's experienced has been terribly difficult for him, to the point where he feels it is a weakness. It has been, and he suspects always will be, a part of who he is. He took a small step forward while driving that night and it felt like he received a knowing nod from the other world. The way Ben tells it, this owl was a synchronistic trail marker, acknowledging his effort to admit his own truth to others, especially his own children.

Ben has another significant story, it began when he took his kids out hiking on some nearby trails. While wandering through the forest, an owl appeared and followed them as they walked. It accompanied them for miles, swooping in and out of the trees, and perching above them, watching as they hiked by. His children were excited by its presence, but there was something very mysterious about it.

Later that night, as he tucked his children in for the night, Ben read them a book. They had picked it out at random prior to him coming up the stairs. The book, titled Say Boo!, was about a ghost named Ben who could not remember how to say “Boo!” In the story Halloween was nearing, and Ben the ghost was desperate to find his voice.

Ben was reading from the book and said, “Ben looked up and saw a large owl sitting on a branch.” Just as he read those words aloud, his dog started to bark frantically at the back door. He put the book down and went downstairs to let the dog out. When he opened the door he had the uneasy sense he was being watched.

He looked up and immediately found the source of the feeling. There was an owl looking down at him from a large pine tree, and Ben feels certain it was the same owl that had been following him and his children all day. The words “Ben looked up and saw a large owl sitting on a branch,” had been the last thing he had said right before opening the door and seeing this owl.

In the writing process for this book, I’ve worked hard to be faithful to the witnesses and their stories. Ben and I did a lot of back and forth emailing to make sure the details of these two accounts are accurate. It was during this process that Ben had a realization and exclaimed, “Now that these two stories are written down and next to each other, they have the same lesson!”

Speaking one’s truth gets acknowledged by the universe. When Ben the father found his voice and finally told his stories in the car full of children, an owl appeared. When Ben the ghost from the children’s book was finding his voice to say Boo, an owl also appeared.[\[23\]](#)

Owl on an LA freeway

I was contacted by a friend named Cynthia the morning after an odd owl event. She and I both felt like this owl sighting was somehow related to my writing about owls. She is the same woman who picked up a tiny owl from the middle of a road, described earlier in this book. Unlike that story from years earlier, she is now well aware of the UFO connections in her life.

Cynthia was on her way home from a meetup of other experiencers organized by abduction researcher Barbara Lamb. She was together with a friend, both of whom have had ongoing experiences that clearly imply UFO abduction, and both have had odd owl experiences. They were driving at night on a freeway in Los Angeles. There came a point in the conversation when they started talking about God, and right then they both watched an owl swoop low across their field of view, frighteningly close to their windshield. She looked at the clock and it read 11:11. Don't ask me why, but this number has a curious way of showing up connected to these odd events.

This account mirrors my experience with Kristen in the opening story, a conversation about God seeming to manifest an owl sighting. Her story also parallels an account later in this book of a woman who saw a big white owl while in a car full of experiencers after leaving Dr. John Mack's first support group meeting.

Incidentally, the number 11:11 is often noted with a frequency that defies mere coincidence. The number might show up on digital clocks, on license plates or on receipts from the grocery store. Obviously there is nothing unusual about the number, but it is a fact that some people will observe it with a prevalence that seems highly unusual. It might be that the observer has a heightened awareness, and is unconsciously drawn to the normal occurrence of this number. It is happening all the time, it is just that people are noticing it with a increased frequency.

Other number sequences are also reported. 3:33 and 12:34 are often noted. This phenomenon is common among UFO experiencers (and the maybe people), though plenty of others will notice a similar ongoing pattern.

There are no answers as to why people are seeing these repeating numbers so frequently. This might fall under the subject of synchronicity, this being a paranormal happening in its own right.

Edgar Cayce mentioned 1111 only one time in his psychic readings. He spoke these words in 1929:

The first lesson for six months should be One-One-One-One; Oneness of God, oneness of man's relation, oneness of force, oneness of time, oneness of purpose, Oneness in every effort—Oneness—Oneness!

Edgar Cayce (1877–1945) was an American mystic who allegedly possessed the ability to answer questions while in a trance on subjects as varied as reincarnation and Atlantis. He was known as the sleeping prophet, and what he did would be now be referred to as channeling. Much of the modern new age movement traces back to the impact of Cayce. His spoken words were transcribed by his secretary, who possibly wrote down the literal “one, one, one, one” instead of the actual number 11:11, as we would see it on a digital clock in present times.[\[24\]](#)

UFO experiencers will also report waking up to see the number 3:33 on their digital clock. Why that time shows up so often is an unknown. One thought is that this happens in conjunction with an abduction event.

Brigitte Barclay's story

Brigitte Barclay, a well-known UFO experiencer from England, has a powerful owl story that is part of a larger series of perplexing events. She had just experienced a distressing synchronicity in the parking lot of an office supply store, and her mind was reeling while driving home along a rural road. She was trying to make sense of the extremely bizarre event in the parking lot. As she approached a corner in the road, she heard a voice in her head saying: “I see you.”[\[25\]](#)

At that moment, a big owl appeared in front of her and then hit the windshield with a mighty boom. The bird bounced off and disappeared to the side of the car. Brigitte's heart was pounding as she stopped at the corner. She felt a need to find the owl. Since there was no traffic, she backed up. She never left the car as she slowly drove along, looking for any sign of the owl in the tall grass alongside the road. There was nothing she could see.

This same corner was the site of a UFO sighting years earlier, where Brigitte saw a large glowing white orb floating above the tree line. She got out of her car and walked towards it, getting within about 10 meters of the object. It moved down from the trees and floated silently above the farmer's field.

Brigitte's account plays out as an example of the paradox syndrome, where the owl event is but one small part at the center of a swirling muddle of synchro-weirdness. Here is one example of these outlying threads. Two of Brigitte's friends—both of them experiencers—began an online conversation where one had typed the letters “I C U” into the Skype chat box at the beginning of their conversation. It was well after the event when one of the friends looked back at the date and time count of the comment. This lined up, as best as anyone can tell, precisely when Brigitte heard the words “I see you” in her head, and when—the next second—the owl hit her windshield.

There is a lot more to this story, including other UFO sightings, psychic happenings, heightened emotions, prescient number sequences, and other unusual owl sightings.

Owl wings are wider than a car

As noted in the chapter on screen memories, there are plenty of stories of impossibly large owls, the four foot tall kind, standing in the middle of a lonely road at night, forcing the driver to stop. Sometimes these owls will fly away, and the witness will describe a huge wingspan that might be as wide as an entire lane on the highway. In these reports, the bird rarely flies off to the side, but instead leads the driver further down the road, or flies up and directly over the car itself.

One person, who had very recently seen a UFO, stopped his car for one of these four foot tall owls. This was at night quite close to his home. As he approached it, the owl took off and flew right over his car. He described an enormous wing span that could be seen out both side windows from his position in the driver's seat. I can't help but be puzzled over this account, and how difficult it would be to actually see out both side windows at once when a bird's wings in flight might only be seen in that position for a micro-second. His UFO account from just a few weeks earlier is quite frightening, with both he and his wife both experiencing missing time and a feeling of panic.

This chapter is titled Owls and the UFO Abductee, and within these stories is the core mystery of the book. That people are actually having experiences that imply contact with some sort of non-human intelligence is strange enough, but adding owls into the mix makes it all the more bizarre. Like a performance on a stage, the owl is playing a small role in the grand drama. The part it plays is a riddle begging to be solved.

Chapter 6: Owls and Synchronicity

Synchronicity is essentially a shiny new word for what we would have earlier called magic.
—Jeffrey Kripal, author of Mutants and Mystics[\[26\]](#)

Synchronicity as a spiritual path

Carl Jung coined the term synchronicity to describe the meaningful coincidences in his life and work. This is his definition:

Synchronicity is the coming together of inner and outer events in a way that cannot be explained by cause and effect and that is meaningful to the observer.

Anyone who has had direct contact with the UFO phenomenon will very often report a long list of unusual repercussions, things that imply an overall depth well beyond what you would expect from a metal spaceship filled with little scientists. One side effect that gets repeated by abductees with an almost absolute consistency is an increase in synchronicities. I've been well aware of this pattern for years because of the intensity that it has brought to my own life. I spoke about this to a close friend, rather pompously declaring that UFO abductees attract far more synchronicities than the rest of the population.

She rolled her eyes and wisely replied: "But that's true of anyone on a spiritual path."

I instantly realized she was right, and I saw my own narrow-minded focus. Her astute reply forced me to look at the bigger picture. Following that line of thought, I concluded that UFO abduction is a spiritual path. I realize how high and mighty that sounds, but looking at the lives of some experiencers, I can't help seeing this as true.

So many elements of the UFO abduction phenomenon correspond in a tidy way to the allegorical journey of the student seeking enlightenment. There is a similar check-list of points that get reported over and over and over, starting with the upheaval and confusion of being chosen. What then follows is an initiation, deep introspection, the dark night of the soul, being tested, a transformation, and a profound sense of mission. Eventually, there is a crack in the cosmic egg, as if the cement that held an old reality together crumbles, and this gets replaced by an expanded consciousness with deeper insights. These same elements are at the core of a long list of spiritual and shamanic traditions. The magic of synchronicity is part of this long list.

I feel that synchronicity can be used like a compass on the open ocean on a foggy morning. Synchronicity can be a way to orient yourself and recalibrate your direction of travel. If you are in the flow, following one synchronicity should lead you to another synchronicity. I had a beautiful conversation with one woman, an abductee, and she described her own long line of synchronicities as if they were all strung together. She pantomimed pulling on that golden thread, tugging and reeling it in. She told me, "At the end of this thread is your destiny."

If UFO abduction is a spiritual path, then you should expect messengers, symbols, archetypes, and totems showing up along that path. In my direct experience, that means owls.

Powerful synchronicities have happened all throughout my life, but they took on a heightened fury after seeing all those owls with Kristen in 2006. I point to that set of events as the start of my looking into my own experiences.

Leading up to seeing those owls with Kristin, I was very much in a place of questioning and yearning. This was a terribly anxious time because I knew I needed to look into the UFO stuff that had been going on in my life. I was pushing it away, I was actively denying it, and seeing those owls was the first crack in the dam.

Afterwards, there was a change. I was confronted with something that was plainly impossible, but it happened none the less. It was only then that I started to examine my own baffling UFO memories. I had changed.

Looking into this stuff opened the floodgates, and in the next few years I was hit with so many synchronicities and so many owl sightings that it felt like madness. A trap door had opened up under me, and I had fallen into the unknown. 2009 was a particularly difficult year, where the synchronicities were all piling up one after another to the point where I was drowning. I feared for my sanity in that frenetic chapter of my life. I am much more at peace as I write this, but in the aftermath I no longer see reality as I once did.

What I've just described is a pattern that I've been finding over and over again. It starts with the individual being in a place of questioning and yearning, struggling with some sort of anxiety in their lives. And then, an event happens. For me, it was the synchronistic power of seeing all those owls with Kristen, and after that, there was a change. The individual has changed; they are different.

Gibbs Williams

This pattern isn't anything I uncovered on my own. It comes from an author named Gibbs Williams, who wrote a great big book on synchronicity titled Demystifying Meaningful Coincidences. Gibbs has been a psychoanalyst for over forty years, and he had his patients keep detailed diaries and he studied the role of the synchronicities in their lives. He found a clear pattern. There was a yearning, a questioning, a longing. Then there was an event—a synchronicity—and because of it, those people changed.

Symphonic music has a similar tipping point. There is a change in the music and something totally new emerges. The tempo builds to a point of instability and then a crescendo happens (imagine crashing cymbals). Afterwards, the music flows with a new equilibrium and harmony. It would be nice if the human experience could match the well-ordered flow of an orchestra, but it rarely works that way. This change obviously doesn't happen to everyone. When it does, however, it can be sloppy and frantic, but nonetheless real.

This exactly matches my experience in 2006 of seeing the owls in the mountains with Kristen. Leading up to that first night under the stars there was a building realization that I needed to look into the many odd UFO events throughout my life, but I just couldn't allow myself to go there. This was a time of restlessness and anxiety, there was a pressure building, and I knew there was going to come a point where I could no longer deny the implications of those stories. Then the owl event happened with Kristen, and after that, my life had changed. There was now a palpable sense of knowing that reality was far more mysterious than I had ever dared imagine. In the aftermath of those owls, Kristen and I were both on an emotional roller coaster. I feel like I was more deeply affected than she was by what had happened. She moved out of my little valley in the autumn of 2006 to spend the winter back in her home town.

During the time we spent together, Kristen had never once heard me mention any of my odd life experiences, especially the ones that might imply some sort of UFO contact. I called her late one night in the winter of 2006, and she was on a train when she answered my call. I was feeling incredibly tense at that moment, and I just sort of blurted out what I had been trying to deal with, this fear of looking into my own experiences, knowing full well that I would be opening Pandora's Box. I told her about seeing UFOs, my missing time event, and waking to see five gray aliens in my yard.

She listened to me as I nervously babbled about the blatant implications of UFO abduction, and it must have been obvious that I desperately wanted to cling to the thick layers of denial. She was, as is her way, quite direct with me. She said, "Quit your goddamn whining and do something."

This was exactly what I needed to hear in that moment, and perhaps this one piece of advice is the reason why I met Kristen. I did do something, and this book is the outcome of that doing.

Like the journals of Gibbs Williams' patients, the owls seen with Kristen played the role of a powerful synchronicity. The pattern is clear to me. I was in a place of deep yearning leading up to seeing the owls with Kristen, and afterwards something changed.

This is not science

I had a friend call me out on this pattern. I had written and spoken about it on my blog and it frustrated him. His point was that everyone is in a place of yearning all the time. He said I wasn't being scientific. My response was what do I care, I'm not a scientist. I'm not trying to approach this muddle of divergent experiences with science as a tool. Instead, I see my role as more of a folklorist. There are stories being told to me by real people, and I sense an even deeper story taking place below the water line.

I took his feedback seriously and realized there were more than a few examples where I was too eager to connect the dots. From that point forward, any place I point out the yearning followed by a change, the events must very plainly fit that pattern. I am trying to be clear in the way these ideas are explored, but also clear that this is a personal journey. This is not science, and I don't pretend that it is.

The scientific community has either ignored or denounced the UFO phenomenon for close to 70 years. With very few exceptions, the people who try to wrestle with this stuff using any kind of scientific rigor end up framing it merely as metal spaceships from another planet. They want to measure burn marks in a farmer's field. They don't want to cloud their tidy documentation with the strange invasion of consciousness that gets reported when you listen carefully to what experiencers have to say.

This stuff is a swirling mess that will challenge any thinking person's rigid perceptions. It's a boiling soup of contradictory ingredients like UFO abduction, synchronicity, archetypes, shamanic initiation, totem animals, altered reality, psychic visions, powerful mind control—and owls.

I ask the same questions to anyone who has seen a UFO, an owl, or who has experienced a profound synchronicity. What was happening in your life leading up to the event, or what were you thinking leading up to the event? The follow-up would be, how did your life change after the event? Some of the answers to these questions can be eerily consistent.

I spoke to one woman who told of driving late at night to see her mother. She was crying as she drove, feeling overwhelmed by the world and all its challenges. She sobbed out, "There must be more than just this, there must be!" When she got out of her car at her mother's home, she saw a beautifully radiant craft gliding silently just above the tree tops. Again, the witness was in a place of questioning and yearning right before the event. It would be incorrect to call this example a synchronicity. It seems more a manifestation.

Marriage proposal and ghostly owls

Another woman shared a story of driving at night with her boyfriend. They were on a lonely dirt road when they saw something in the headlights.

Her first remark was “What are those children doing out so late? Why are they dressed like ghosts?”

Her boyfriend said, “Those are owls.”

She described them as about four feet tall and their movements were kind of flowing. Then the pair just drove on their way and didn’t discuss what happened for several years. He remembered the owls being lit from above from a bright streetlight, but she thinks that would be ridiculous, given they were on a remote dirt road.

There is something suspicious about two witnesses that are mixed up over whether they saw children dressed as ghosts or owls. What they remember is playing out like a screen memory. Add to that the woman saw a football field-sized UFO glide right over her during the Hudson Valley flap of the 1980s. She also shared a handful of other suspiciously odd owl stories.

The date of her “ghost children” event is clearly remembered by her boyfriend—now her husband—because that was the night he proposed to her. Curiously, she isn’t quite sure. Though I haven’t heard exactly this same detail before, the marriage proposal part, this certainly seems to match the tenor of other accounts. There is certainly evidence that these events can manifest at emotionally charged moments.

Here is another odd pattern. When I ask UFO witnesses what they were thinking in the moments before their sighting, it’s quite normal to get the reply, “You know, I was thinking that I wanted to see a UFO.”

Another consistency is that after seeing a UFO, people’s lives will change. Some people will start acting more altruistic, they’ll become vegetarians, stop swatting bugs, or volunteer at the local animal adoption center. Witnesses will commonly report a deeper sense of spirituality, a feeling of profound knowing and a sense of mission—though they may have no idea what that mission might be. More often than not, they’ll also describe the onset of outright psychic powers.

Owls, synchronicities, and UFOs all seem to be playing a similar role: they have the potential to change people. This is obviously a bold statement, and it certainly doesn't play itself out with 100% consistency, but there is enough of a pattern that I have come to see these curious elements as the same thing.

My iPad

As I proceed forward, I'm getting all kinds of synchronicities that seem to be intertwined with the investigation itself. Part of doing the research means digging through books. I'm indebted to this new chapter of technology because I can simply order an eBook and within minutes it's on my iPad.

I like this because the electronic application has a really great search option, so I can easily search out specific words. The word I'm searching out is owl, and when looking for it, a lot of other words show up too. The word knowledge comes up, the reason being that it has "owl" within its letters.

But I'm not interested in knowledge, so I just skip past that. I use my fingertip to swipe past knowledge. This is a word that gets used a lot in the kinds of books I'm collecting, so I need to do a lot of swiping to move beyond knowledge. It was while I was persistently trying to get beyond knowledge that I recognized that this is a metaphor for how I am proceeding with this research. To get to anything of any real depth, I have to move beyond my logical mind. I have to trust my gut. I am working to follow my intuition, because if I depended on my logical mind, I would look at this stuff and say, "Owls and UFOs? This is stupid. UFO abductions? This is crazy. This might involve me? No way—I can't go there—This cannot be true."

But I have been going there, proceeding forward and trying to trust my heart.

Chapter 7: Dr. Kirby Surprise

As I type this there is a book on my desk with the very straightforward title of Synchronicity. The author, Dr. Kirby Surprise (yes, that's his real name) puts forth a bold premise on what might be at the source of this enigmatic phenomenon. He proposes that a synchronicity is produced by the individual, that it's one's own intention that actually makes these events emerge into being.

I sought out Dr. Surprise after hearing him promote his book on a series of online radio programs. I initially wanted to interview him for my own podcast series. In my first email to him I said that, from my research, the people who claim the UFO abduction phenomenon seem to be having more synchronicities than the rest of the population. His reply got my attention, here is part of his first email to me:

Thing is, getting across the idea of Synchronistic Experience (SE) as self created is why I do this... Overall, my personal myths and experiences with UFOs and SE would sound considerably stranger and more complex than the usual UFO abduction and conspiracy fare.

What? I was flabbergasted. The guy who writes a book on synchronicity says he's had his own personal experiences with UFOs. He seemed to be proving my point that UFOs and synchronicities are somehow connected. I got his book and a quick look at the index showed that the term UFO is never mentioned. But on page 255 he writes, "I like to make owls."

He was describing how to create your own Synchronistic Experience of a self-generated owl sighting. He treats the SE as something that can be playfully engaged through intention by anyone reading his book. Manifesting owls, his example, is presented as a game where SEs are created by the observer.

In this game you create the pattern of SEs yourself. This game has a simple but wide frame of reference. You look for SEs happening in any and every place where you turn your attention. There are no "others" in this game. Just you and the effect you have on the SEs around you.[\[27\]](#)

Even without his personal example of owls, this resonated strongly with my own direct experiences. Have I been unknowingly playing this game? Are there no "others" at all and is this all just me? It just seemed odd that a book titled Synchronicity gives instructions on how to manifest owls, and the author has his own UFO experiences. I began to wonder, had I somehow manifested Dr. Kirby Surprise as my own spirit-totem to match my research?

There have been ongoing and carefully controlled scientific studies that show that the consciousness of the experimenter can directly and measurably influence the results of their experiment. This is well known but little understood.

An example would be a simple study involving a subject performing a set number of coin tosses, with the intention of getting heads more often than tails, and then tabulating the results. Logic would dictate that the results should be perfectly random, but that's not what happens. Instead there is a consistent and measurable outcome of the coin landing with heads more than tails. Something is going on; it seems evident that the mind of the coin tosser is influencing physical reality in a way we don't understand. The effects of focus and intention are clear, but how it works is still unknown.

This means that the person on the receiving end of the synchronicity is making it happen. A gambler can have a lucky streak, a paranoid will truly find evidence of conspiracies, and someone struggling with the unknown will literally see owls.

Dr. Surprise writes:

Seeing your reflection in the SE of a series of coin tosses or dice throws in a laboratory is hard because of the simplicity of the experiment. Only the real world offers the depth and variation of events needed for true work with SE. The meaning of these events is particular to the observer. SE can be very seductive. They tell you exactly what you most want to hear.[\[28\]](#)

This is my direct experience. I've been researching the connection between owls and UFOs, and most of the stories to back up my inquiry have been arriving in my lap with a weird synchronistic flurry. I've spoken at length with Dr. Surprise for this book. He has a doctorate in counseling psychology and he has worked in advanced outpatient programs where he assesses, diagnoses, and treats psychotic and delusional disorders. Seeing as I'm someone who feels strongly that I've been repeatedly abducted by aliens, his credentials seemed a nice fit for me and my seemingly delusional experiences. He patiently heard me out as I explained my mixed up involvement with owls, synchronicities, and UFOs. His response was less of a clinician and much more of a mystic.

He was very aware of the mythic role of the owl in our collective psyche; as spirit animals they reflect magic, the unconscious and spirit messengers. He was also aware that the UFO phenomenon plays a similar role. It was no surprise to him that by my tangling these two iconic memes I am getting a lot of powerful experiences projected back at me.

He speculated on my intense interest in UFOs and owls. If I have been creating an intention and a focus (and I certainly have been) this was going to create an opening for something to fill; my emotional and obsessive energy has been driving these experiences. He said that we're in a Holodeck created by our own brains. We need to be aware that the same part of the brain that controls dreaming also controls our everyday processing.

I explained that what's been happening to me hasn't been just a monotone static of odd events. Instead, it all seems directed to achieve some set result. It feels like orchestrated magic. Both owls and synchronicities have led me toward clues to the reality of my own direct UFO experiences.

I spoke with Dr. Surprise on the most owl-rific night of the year, Halloween. This conversation didn't feel like therapist and patient. It felt like shaman and initiate. He agreed that these SEs can have a deeply personal power. The owls are a metaphor of an underlying pattern. There is no fine line between the inner and external world. The owls and the UFO resonate to us because they are us! During our conversation he casually pointed out that owls and UFOs are naturally paired together on a cultural or ancient level. The symbol of the owl is exactly what the UFOs are to us. Here is an excerpt from our phone interview:

Owls are also the classic symbol for the unconscious. Owls are the things that live in the dark shadowy areas. They pass through the night. They're wise. They're slightly dangerous and creepy. They are messengers. They convey things. They've always been seen as omens and portents, they've always been held as these messengers between the known and the unknown. They are in exactly the same psychological and emotional position in the past for our ancestors, as the UFOs are to us today. They are these mysterious magical things that we don't quite understand that live in the darkness. They are both generally seen more at night, but when they manifest in the day, it's a big frickin' deal. And they mean something, they are always taken as: wow, that's really something amazing! And, symbolically in every culture, owls are the messengers from the unconscious.

Dr. Surprise went on to describe his own ideas on how he can manifest synchronicities in the form of owls, his thoughts and intentions having an effect on reality itself. In his book, he treats this as a playful game. Here, he describes owls from the point of view of his shamanic work.

I make them. They're thought-forms. You build them out of matter and energy, out of emotional energy and mental pattern. You can play with them. They are familiars. They are exactly what every tradition does with spirit animals. You are taking matter and energy from these other planes that is, in some reflective way, your emotion and thoughts, and creating a technology with it. And then using this technology to change the randomness of events in the environment. And this is a process that is not some big magical Hogwarts thing that you need to learn. This is something that the organism itself does normally. All thought, all emotion produces these forms. All of it produces effects on these planes, and all of it changes the underlying structure of physical reality from the brain. And I think that the extreme manifestations of it, you may occasionally get something physical. You know, lights in the skies.

Dr. Surprise had his own run-ins with UFOs when he was around 20 years old. He described some things that seem consistent with what a lot of other contactees and abductees have said, but his point of view implies a personal responsibility as to the source of the mystery. He feels strongly that he was manifesting these experiences. The UFOs he saw were lights in the nighttime sky, just little dots that would zig-zag and move in wiggling motions that defied any logical explanation. He would take his friends out into a field at night and say, “Okay, look over there, there’s going to be some lights showing up.” And they did show up as if on his command, terrifying his friends.

He had been meditating from the age of nine, and he seems to have unknowingly tapped into some playful side of his own unconscious. I asked what he thought was happening.

Well, it was actually quite a bit more psychotic sounding than just seeing UFOs. In fact, in psychiatry, there’s a term called thoughts of reference, or ideas of reference, and basically that’s the psychiatric version of synchronistic events.

Now, that happens with me, to this day in fact, to the point where whatever I’m thinking is sort of reflected in the environment. It seemed insane to me at the time that I could talk to whatever these beings were, through coincidences in the environment. I was presented with this originally as mythology; it came at the point where I had this meditative breakthrough. I could give you the technical sort of explanation of what happened to me, but it might be over the reader’s head, unless they were hardcore shamans and theosophists. Basically I hit a space where I started broadcasting and getting reflective events out of the environment, and not knowing I was doing this. When I hit into this, this trail of events got to the point where it could become conversational with the environment.

Obviously something was reading my mind and playing with me, and it’s friendly, it’s funny, it’s a lot smarter and much more well-informed than I am. How is this possible? How could you manipulate time, space, events, coincidence, and then put them together with matching patterns of thought?

He eventually formed a mythology in his mind that some sort of extraterrestrial intelligence was using a technology that was not limited to mere matter and energy. This would be what people have mistaken for angels or spirits for thousands of years. These were the spirit realms that shamans and mystics would try to describe. At that chapter in his life, he felt he these higher beings were talking to him.

The coincidences follow whatever mythology you create, so I literally created this UFO mythology. In the beginning my idea was that there was actually something or someone out there. They must be out there with whatever kind of spaceships or craft they have; and I could walk out in a field at night and look up in the sky and lights would fly by, and I could do this very consistently. I got into this sort of wishful thinking mythology of, “Gee, if you could just figure enough of this out, maybe they’ll come and meet you and do the whole ET routine with them.” Which of course never happened.

As I tried to piece this together over time, over months and months and months, and nothing physical appeared; the messages and coincidences and talking to the environment continued, but the messages changed, because my internal concept of what was going on was changing. I was still the parakeet in its cage pecking at the mirror, thinking it’s another bird.

Eventually this internal mythology changed from ETs communicating from their UFOs to his present much more nuanced ideas about synchronicity.

It still seems, if I want to personify it, that I’m being instructed, guided, talked to, joked with, teased, and cajoled by things that are vastly more intelligent than I am. But now I understand that what I’m actually seeing is the larger and vaster workings of my own unconscious in my own mind, in a sort of cooperative playful way.

The ideas that Dr. Surprise presented in his book and personal conversations might seem pretty far out, but it all just fits so cleanly with my own personal experiences. I have to grit my teeth to grok his model of reality, where consciousness is directly influencing physical existence. I can’t help but see my own collision of owls and UFOs conforming to the intention I give them. I see owls, synchronicities, and UFOs as pretty much the same thing, they each play the same role in my life.

Dr. Surprise and I talked about the odd motion of these unknown lights in the sky. I have had my own experience of seeing something that exactly matches what he was manifesting as a 20 year old. We were finishing each other’s sentences as we described what we had seen. Little dots sliding across the sky in an oddly smooth way that obviously wasn’t an airplane, helicopter, or satellite.

Seeing a little orange light

Here’s my own example of seeing odd little lights in the nighttime sky. I was at the home of Christopher Bledsoe Sr. in North Carolina, having spent the day with him and two other UFO researchers, both women. He has had experiences of such bizarre intensity than I can barely wrap my mind around the enormity of what he has endured.

After the sun went down, we were all sitting around in the backyard of Bledsoe’s home. His wife and kids were there too, and we were all talking about UFOs. At around 11 p.m., Chris calmly pointed at an orange light in the western sky and hinted that this might be something odd. The light looked like nothing more than a normal aircraft, it was just a small blinking light moving slowly to the north.

One of the researchers and I walked across the dark yard to get a better view through an opening in some trees. At first glance, the dot of light seemed to be just an aircraft with a slight blinking quality. But after just a few seconds of looking at it, we were both aware that the light was moving in a weirdly halting way, moving forward and then quickly backing up.

She was saying, “Ooh, look at that. This is giving me the chills!” It was skimming across the sky in a smooth liquid gliding motion, stopping and backing up a half step, and then easing across the sky again. It had the quality of a one of those little water bugs skimming across a pond rather than any normal aircraft in flight. We probably watched it for less than a minute and it eventually moved off to the north and out of our view.

This sighting happened among a crew of UFO researchers and abductees, all of us having spent the day completely focused on the phenomenon. Later that night, we saw this odd little light in the sky. Could we have manifested that herky-jerky orange dot above us? Or, was the source of the phenomenon (whatever that might be) simply allowing us to get a glimpse of something as a way to reassure us that this stuff is really happening?

I had the chance to ask abduction researcher Budd Hopkins how he dealt with the really strange outlying weirdness. He rolled his eyes and said that the threads run off everywhere, and then he made a wide hand gesture like water splashing outwards. He said it was his job to rein them in in order to make sense of the bigger picture, with that he gestured again, as if he was pulling everything back into his cupped hands.

I see it as my job to examine all those threads running off everywhere and follow where they lead. When confronting these clustered events, it seems as if some synchro-gong has been struck, and the reverberations rattle every connection along every thread in the web. This all must somehow tie back into an unknown focal point, the same way an entire orchestra is connected to the conductor, following their lead for every nuance in the grand performance.

Chapter 8: Owls=UFOs=Synchronicity

After wallowing in all this overlapping weirdness, a question arises: Are owls, UFOs and synchronicity all the same thing? The pragmatic answer is obviously they are not, but on an intuitive level, I can't be so sure. There is a blurring of these divergent elements, and each has a similar power. For this research, I have been treating all of these as if they are the same thing. This is a thought experiment, just to see if this avenue of inquiry will bear fruit. What I'm finding is this stuff is all tangled up and intertwined in ways that leave me confounded. Owls, UFOs, and synchronicity all have the power to change a person, all functioning in the same way, to redirect the lives of the people experiencing their power.

Where does an account of seeing a UFO end and an owl sighting begin? Author Nick Redfern has lamented over the complexities of doing UFO research. He says it's not just that it's weird, it's too weird. The things that get reported go way beyond the motives of a little scientist in a flying saucer. Nick has also said he feels like he's really onto something in his research when synchronicities begin to invade his life.

Time is art

I connected with a husband and wife team who are producing a documentary with the working title of Time is Art: Synchronicity & the Collective Dream. The film project is evolving as a highly artistic endeavor, and I am convinced that the creative process is somehow tied into both synchronicities as well as UFO contact. The wife, Katy Walker, told me about shooting footage in the mission district of San Francisco, a neighborhood well known for its murals. Their story begins while they were getting video footage of these artistic murals. This street art was passionate and weird, and they were both really impressed.

One mural was a montage of Native Americans ceremonies, a tiny white owl, a UFO, and even a skinny gray alien. Another was a colorful set of huge stylized owls. It was in the minutes after shooting these artistic renderings, both UFOs and owls, that they set the camera down without realizing that it was still running. Later, to their surprise, they found something unusual. The camera had caught a structured craft that was descending smoothly behind a tree. This high definition footage was brightly lit in full daylight. And even though it's only seen for a few seconds, it is clearly not a helicopter or airplane. They had no idea at the time that they had captured this image, only noticing it well after shooting that day.

I can't speak to the authenticity of this footage. I will say they are quite convinced that it's genuine and they had no idea that they had recorded anything unusual. They hadn't used this footage for any kind of self-promotion.

Both Katy and her husband have had some odd life events, enough that I am putting them in the maybe category. Katy tells of hiding in an attic of a cottage for three hours in a mental standoff with skinny beings. She struggled to push them out of her consciousness, refusing to go with them. This terrifying incident happened in eastern Germany in 1998, and it was preceded by a blinding light through a window right after her friend, Oliver, left the cottage to investigate some odd noises outside.

She wonders if her and Oliver's memories were somehow erased, because they never spoke about the incident. "I don't know what happened when he came back. I just know it was a very long time and I was angry he didn't have an explanation for why he was gone so long."[\[29\]](#)

Katy's extremely frightening experiences were featured in a book titled The Synchronicity Highway: Exploring Coincidence, the Paranormal and Alien Contact by the husband and wife team Rob and Trish McGregor, a book about synchronicity with "alien contact" right in the title.

So we have two maybe people, creating a documentary on synchronicity, shooting images of UFOs, aliens and owls; and then unknowingly video-taping a UFO in flight. This is a perfect example of what I've been finding (or more correctly, what has been finding me), a collision of all these conflicting elements.

The name Chris

Chris Knowles and Chris Knowles are both researchers from Boston, and both of them are looking into the UFO mystery. These overlapping names make me pay attention.

Christina Knowles is an abduction researcher who has also had her own direct contact experience. This combination is very common, and these life events consistently brings about a powerful sense of mission in the experiencer. She is one of the very few abduction researchers that when I ask, "Do you have any reports of real owls interacting with abductees?" She answers "Yes." Now, that doesn't happen very often, the researchers will almost always say no. She has been seeing a pattern, where abductees she has been working with are seeing real owls and they lock eyes and then they'll describe receiving a psychic download from the owls. The nature of some of these messages is that we humans needs to be better stewards of our planet. This is exactly the same communication that abductees report receiving from the aliens while onboard ships, but it's more than a little bit interesting to me that the source is an owl.

Christopher Knowles, also from Boston, is an author, artist, blogger, and researcher who is hard to categorize. He is exploring how ancient mythology is emerging in the form of our present day movies and comic books. This guy has some of the most far-reaching and perceptive insights into the overall UFO phenomena of anyone out there. His mother would collect owl figurines, hardly proof of anything paranormal, but this detail shows up sometimes. He's also had a lot of very strange life experiences, some involving UFOs. Unlike Christina, who is very much an abductee, I am cautiously putting Christopher in the maybe category.

Also, the name Knowles has 'owl' embedded right in it.

My research doesn't have a big pool of data. I feel like I have collected a lot, but I don't have 10,000 owl stories told to me by abductees. But of this limited pool, there is a very weird disproportion, way more than what could be just random, of people either named Christopher, Christian, Christina, Kristin, or Chris. There may be no other word in Western culture that is more heavily loaded with mythic resonance than the first five letters of these names.

The English name Christopher has its roots in the Greek name Christóforos, meaning Christ-bearer. Throughout this book anytime any one with some variation of the name Chris shows up, it will get noted as part of this pattern.

Christopher Bledsoe Sr.

Christopher Bledsoe Sr. (one of the many named Chris), mentioned at the end of the last chapter, is a UFO abductee with an incredible set of experiences. Both he and his son, Christopher Jr., had concurrent missing time experiences, as well as of seeing small glowing humanoid beings on the night of January 8, 2007. This happened while fishing along the Cape Fear River in North Carolina with three other witnesses. The entire crew saw multiple UFOs at close range.

This is an extremely well documented case, and there is such an abundance of weirdness stemming from that night that it seems almost impossible to summarize in just a few paragraphs. It is, however, extremely disturbing, causing Chris to become very withdrawn and spending almost all his time in the back corner room of his house, hiding away there for almost a year.

I visited Christopher at his home in 2013 and sat in that back room with him. He shared his feelings of terrible isolation and hopelessness. Then he said, "See that bush right there." And he pointed to the window where there was a bush pressed up right next to the window. He told me, "You know, right after that thing happened, there were two owls living in that hickory bush. I would see them all the time, and I would hear them all the time. They were right there in that bush."

At this point, he did not know that I was the owl guy, and all I could do was listen to his story. He said that he would often hear a third owl off in the forest nearby. He described these as big brown owls that would make strong hooting calls. Chris was born and raised in the house right next door and he stated that he had never, in all his life, seen owls in this area.

I find it absolutely fascinating that this soft spoken man had a pair of owls take up residence right outside the room where he sought solace right after a profound UFO contact event. This small detail, owls showing up at a time of UFO contact, is what I've been finding over and over again. I struggle to understand what role the owls were playing in these elusive story-lines.

During those reclusive months, Christopher had a terrible time relating to his family and ended up seeking support with a citizen band radio. He used this radio as a way to communicate to people in the outside world. He even built a 131-foot tall metal-framed tower with an antenna to boost the receiving power of this radio system. There was a thick cable connecting the tower to the CB equipment in that lonely back room.

After he finished the tower, one lone owl was repeatedly seen in full daylight sitting in the metal framework. He said the owl had an eerie presence and seemed to be continually staring at him. He's not sure if this was one of the pair of owls outside the window in the hickory tree.

On June 25, 2011, the day of his 28th wedding anniversary, just as Chris stepped out of that back room, lightning struck the antenna. The current followed the cable and that back corner of the house was blown away, exploding into flames. All the CB equipment was destroyed as well as a lot of paper documentation from his abduction case. Chris told me that if he had been in that room, as he usually was, he would have been killed instantly. After the lightning strike, he never saw owls around the house again. Chris feels that they were some sort of warning.

Chris also had another curious owl experience in 1968, as a seven year old boy. He was at a summer camp run at a local church and he was waiting for his mother near a tree next to the parking lot. As he was leaning against the trunk of this tree, he looked up and saw a huge owl on a branch within reach of where he stood. He didn't hear it land and it hadn't been there when he first leaned against the tree. It was close to his face, and they locked eyes and stared at each other. Chris told me this story in a face to face conversation, he said the memory was seared into his soul. It was obvious listening to him that this strange event had a strong emotional resonance even after 45 years.

This 1968 owl event at the church happened along the same rural road, just a little bit over one and a half miles from his 2007 abduction experience.

Chris, along with his entire family, saw a white owl at his father's funeral. This matches the lore of death that is also part of the owl's mythology. More on that story later in the book.

Chris Holly and a lifetime of owls

After I posted the initial essay about owls on my site in the summer of 2013, someone pointed me to a blog posting from researcher and abductee, Chris Holly (another Chris). It turns out that my essay was a trigger for her to write about her own owl experiences.[\[30\]](#)

...something else that I never connected with my experiences with the unknown until I read about it on the internet by others who shared the same experience... Owls, I always saw and heard owls, mainly white owls, wherever I lived.

She has been blogging about her research at a site called Chris Holly's Paranormal World. She's had a lifetime of odd events, including an initial experience that has involved a close up UFO sighting with multiple witnesses, missing time and physical after effects. This distressing event happened while she was a teenager growing up on Long Island.

In her posting, she wrote that during her childhood it was common to see an owl outside at night, "I would look out my window where I would see a beautiful white owl perched on a big old oak tree that stood outside my bedroom window." As a little girl Chris repeatedly told her parents about this owl. As an adult, she questioned her mother, now in her 80s, about her seeing the owl all those years ago.

When my mother realized I was actually seeing a white owl all those times as a child she looked at me sort of shocked and admitted she never really believed that it was true.

As a researcher looking into these experiences, this is something I hear over and over and over, children will try to report something extremely odd and their parents will casually dismiss the whole thing. Sadly, what gets reinforced is that it's better just to shut up and not say anything. My advice to anyone who hears a child sharing an unusual story is to listen and to take that young person very seriously. There may be a completely mundane explanation, but anyone, either a child or an adult, knows full well that they are stepping out of the boundaries of what is acceptable by bringing up something that seems impossible. I encourage you to listen, and listen closely to what they are sharing with you.

Chris had another odd owl experience, this one witnessed by a group of friends. She was in her 30s and living in East Islip, New York. This was close to where she had lived as a child. She was hosting a Christmas party (there is that “Chris” again) in her home. There was a large window on the side of her living room facing the driveway which was lined with trees.

One of my friends walked over to the window as it had started to lightly snow when she yelled: “Oh my God look at this giant white owl!” The people attending my party all ran over to look out the window and there on a branch close to the window sat an absolutely beautiful large white owl. It sat there on the gray tree limb with snow falling gently around it looking more like an oil painting than a real creature. My guests were fascinated by the owl as it was the first white owl they had ever seen up close and could not get over how it simply sat there staring back through the window at us. My group of friends stood looking at this owl in silence until one of them broke the silence by asking if the owl was “creeping anyone else out?” A few of my friends admitted they had an uncomfortable feeling as the owl peered through the window at them.

I thought it was strange they had never seen a white owl before and equally strange they thought it was creepy. I had seen them literally all my life including a few times at the house I was in when this event at the party happened. I thought everyone on Long Island saw white owls all the time. It was at that party that I realized it was not a frequent event for other people.

Chris had another owl experience while living in Schweinfurt, Germany. This would have been in the 1970s, and it happened in the early evening just before nightfall, when everything was still and gray. She was walking home from the grocery store when she heard the familiar hoot of an owl.

I looked up and there in a tree next to where I was walking sat a large owl. He was not as white as the owls I usually saw but he was big and did have many white feathers. He looked at me and I looked at him and I kept on walking... I did think at the time that seeing this owl was a bit strange but I did not know what to do about it. About three weeks or so after seeing that owl I had a very strange event occur with another lost time event along with a run-in in my apartment building with extremely strange beings. Now years later I finally understand that all of these things may be connected.

Chris went on to explain her concerns over how seeing an owl might be a harbinger for an impending dark contact experience.

I have read many things concerning seeing owls from it being a warnings or type of message as well as being connected to alien abduction. The fact I have suffered from many lost time events in my life and have seen unidentified crafts in my past does give me pause when I think about how I have seen white owls my entire life too... and trust me I will do all I can to prevent another strange encounter.

Chris is very much a UFO abductee. Her experiences have been deeply challenging and she certainly doesn't frame this phenomenon in love and light. She writes about her experiences and her research on her website, she also hosts a podcast series where she interviews other UFO abductees. All this and a lifetime of owl sightings. In a lot of ways, she reminds me of myself.

Stacey, owls and a psychic medium

These experiences can manifest in a frenetic swarm of weirdness, and there is one story that defines my own collision with this owl stuff. October of 2009 stands alone as the absolute height of my own synchro-mania. At that point in my life, I was totally freaked out, it felt like the world was coming unraveled around me.

This strange set of events began in the summer of 2009. I had been trying to set up an appointment with a psychic medium named Marla Frees. I felt drawn to contact Marla after listening to her doing interviews for Whitley Strieber on his website. We had played phone tag for over a month and due to our conflicting schedules the first available time slot was on Sunday October 4. We were all set up for a one-hour psychic session and I was hopeful that she might offer some clues to the oppressive weirdness that had invaded my life.

The opening salvo happened on the morning of Saturday October 3, when I read a post about owls on a website called, simply enough, Synchronicity. I scrolled down and saw comment from a woman named Stacey, who said: "... a couple years ago I had the privilege to spend time in a giant owls 'nest' for lack of a better word, with over thirty barn and horned owls watching me ... it was one of the most profound moments of my life!"

This got my attention, and I contacted her through email to hear her story. She described walking through a meadow surrounded by trees and there were owls seemingly on every branch looking down on her. She wrote: "There were too many to count. I had stumbled upon a holy shrine and I was the initiate."

Needless to say, I was impressed. She was with a man named Christian and he saw the owls too. Our back and forth emailing got sort of frenzied, and at one point she said on the same night she had seen the owls, both she and Christian also saw a UFO.

I was flabbergasted because I hadn't once mentioned UFOs in our conversation, it was Stacey who brought it up. I told her this was especially strange because I had a blog focused on UFOs, owls, and synchronicity.

With that Stacey replied: "My friend Marla (who interviews for Whitley Strieber's website) has great stories to tell... she's tapped in." Hearing this felt like the trap door had opened up below me. Stacey had no way of knowing that I had a psychic appointment in less than 24 hours with her close friend Marla.

The following day my head was still ringing like a gong. I have very few memories of that hour on the phone with Marla, I do know that at one point she was suddenly crying. She explained that something was wrong, and I needed to take these experiences very seriously. I wish I had recorded this psychic reading, all I can clearly remember was that the intensity of it was overwhelming. I have a single piece of paper with notes from that hour long session, and the one thing that stands out on that page was something Marla said to me: “You are here for profound reasons.”

This cluster of events begins with an owl story on a website called Synchronicity, and after that it felt like I was the shiny metal ball bouncing around the pinball machine of owls, UFOs, a guy named Christian, and a premonition of meeting a psychic medium.[\[31\]](#)

Struggling with the mystery

The UFO riddle holds a sort of power within it, something that forces any thinking person to contemplate life’s grand mysteries, the same questions that have followed us through the ages. If you start out talking about little lights in the sky, you’ll very quickly start talking about God. You’ll end up wrestling with the really big questions. Who are we? Why are we here? What does it all mean?

I have a friend who meditates, goes to spiritual retreats, has a guru and all that stuff. When we talk we both really get into it. We’ll push each other, struggling to articulate elusive metaphysical concepts, and the conversation ends up getting deeper and deeper. We fall into a kind of spiritual one-upmanship, and at some point he’ll get all frustrated and tell me, “I can’t believe you don’t meditate!” And I’ll snap back, “I can’t believe you don’t read UFO books!”

The word “real”

People will ask me, “Do you think this UFO stuff is real?” The easy answer is, “Yes, it’s real.” I can say that with conviction because of my own sightings and the overwhelming glut of evidence. Again, yes, this stuff is real, but I’m at a point where I struggle with what the word real actually means. To me, what might be real has become just as slippery as the overall mystery itself. So much of what I’m looking at plays out as theatrical, or absurd, or beyond the edge of comprehension. What might be real becomes so abstract that it leaves me questioning the source of all existence. The word real is the first for letters of reality, and my definition of that crumbled ages ago.

The problem is, how does anyone keep their brain focused on the enormity of this mystery? All I can do is examine the little details, and sometimes I can barely grasp those. There comes a point when the trapdoor opens up, and I'm falling. I can only truly wrap my mind around this mystery for a few fleeting seconds. In those moments of clarity, I can't understand why I'm not running down the street screaming, "They're here!"

We're staring at a Rorschach inkblot. You'll see whatever baggage you bring to it. It's going to mirror back your own very specific avenue of research. The one thing I know for sure is that everyone's got a different take on this phenomenon and nobody agrees on everything. So when you enter this community—and I'm picturing all the contradictory characters milling around at a UFO conference—nobody is going to have the same conclusions. Everyone is telling a different story, but I feel strongly that at the core there is a real experience taking place. That's the only thing I can say for sure, that something real is happening. Beyond that, it's all speculation.

A rational scientist would look at all this UFO and owl weirdness and fight to squeeze it into the tidy box of logic. In doing so they would leave out all the really weird stuff. A poet might be better suited to play with all the elusive strangeness. This might make some pragmatic readers cringe, but sometimes great truths can only be fully revealed through poetry, mythology, or metaphor.

There is some unknowable facet of reality that creates synchronicity, and I am impelled to follow this magic compass. I am being given clues and they are telling me to step off the well-worn path and into the darkest part of the forest. This research, and all its associated weirdness, has been a deeply personal inward exploration.

Chapter 9: Back to Back Reports

Digging into the weird connections between owls and UFOs has unleashed all kinds of synchronicities, and these seem to be intertwined with the research itself. These synchronicities force me to recognize that something important is happening.

I've received a set of stories that echo each other with a remarkable similarity in ways that are impossible to ignore. I didn't really do much to search these stories, they just fell into my lap, sometimes less than 24 hours apart. This chapter features three different back-to-back stories, and each plainly mirrors the other in details and mood. There is a weird power to this pattern of parallel reports, so much so that they seem to define a grander truth than just the stories themselves.

Two white owl stories

I know a man who's had a curious set of life events that oddly parallel my own, including lots of owl sightings. He reached me by phone and told me I needed to talk to someone who had the mother of all owl stories. That got my attention. He gave me the contact info for a woman named Leslie (a pseudonym) and he told me she would be open to sharing some of her odd experiences. Leslie and I exchanged hellos on the Facebook chat-box, and during this initial back and forth I sent her a link to my timeline. This is a page on my blog where I list some of my own life events. I sent this at 6:04 p.m. on May 13, 2013. She replied back 29 minutes later with this:

... I read the timeline on your blog, went outside onto my porch to get a little air and got swooped by a white owl! Well then, what do you think of that?!

I got back to her saying that, at this point I thought it was freakin' normal! She has a large white owl fly over her within minutes of our first hello, she's spent years on that porch and nothing like that has ever happened before. The synchro-weirdness connecting me to owls had been manifesting with such a flurry that this felt completely ordinary.

Leslie is a certified clinical hypnotherapist and works helping patients with issues like quitting smoking, weight loss, and stress management. But most of her clients are coming to her seeking help in dealing with memories and interactions with the UFO contact experience.

Leslie has strong psychic skills and she uses them in her therapeutic practice. She was mentored by her adoptive father who taught her to develop these skills through simple little games, like find the pebble under the shell and guess the card. She began doing this with her own son, hoping to encourage his own psychic intuition. Her son had started meditating the year before, at the young age of five. This parallels the experiences of Dr. Kirby Surprise who started meditating at age nine, and then went on to have his own odd UFO experiences.

The very first time Leslie sat with her son and played these psychic games, he was just six years old. They were sitting together in their backyard and he was picking it up quite fast. At some point, a big white owl flew down and perched on a nearby branch, watching them. This same owl stayed with Leslie and her son for the next three years. When she would drive to the grocery store, she could watch the owl following in her rear view mirror. While at the store, the owl would wait on a lamp post in the parking lot, and then follow her car home again. It lived in a tree in their yard and was always around, seemingly paying close attention to whatever they were doing.

This was a magical time for her family. That white owl would follow her everywhere, sometimes getting as close as just a few feet away from her and her son. During this time, Leslie was also doing field work where she would go out at night with the intention of seeing UFOs. This was done in rural locations with a small team of comrades. They would set up equipment in the day so they could get a fix on the horizon and nearby vantage points, then return at night hoping to see something unusual. The white owl would show up at these sky watching gatherings, too.

There came a point when Leslie and her family left that home. She moved out of state to study advanced hypnotherapy. A few days after leaving, her old next door neighbor contacted her, telling her that the owl was dead. They found it in her backyard lying on its back with its wings spread wide. Both Leslie and her son were heartbroken. As she reflects back after many years, she feels that the owl was performing some task, its job had been completed, and at that point it died.

Leslie had another recent owl experience. She lives in a fairly big city, and she was walking her dog one morning down a sidewalk in a busy residential part of town. She sensed something behind her and turned around to see an owl standing on the sidewalk. She thought it must have fallen out of a tree, but she also felt worried for the owl. After a moment she turned and continued along on her walk. Then the owl flew right over the top of her, landing directly in front of her in the center of the sidewalk, blocking her way.

She walked up close, near enough to touch it. She sensed that there was something wrong, that the owl was sick. It was a little over a foot tall, but its height was hard to gauge because it was sort of drooped over in a despondent pose. Curiously, her dog showed no reaction at all, and this was unusual because she was quite high-strung and eager to chase anything in her path.

Leslie stopped a complete stranger on the street and asked if she could use his cell phone. She wasn't carrying hers, and she was surprised at her own assertiveness. He handed her his phone and she searched out an animal rescue service to come deal with this owl. As she was using this man's phone, he lit up a cigarette. She found a number to call, explained about the owl and they said wait right there. With a weird swiftness a van pulled up and two guys from animal control hopped out and approached the owl. This all happened before the man had finished his cigarette!

These two guys efficiently slipped a bag over the owl and carried him to the van. They explain that they were connected to both veterinary services and a nearby wildlife sanctuary, and just as suddenly they were gone. Leslie feels strongly that this owl had purposely plopped itself in her path, choosing her because it needed help.

Like so many other people who've had these weird owl experiences, Leslie has had a lifetime full of direct UFO contact and profound synchronicities. And like almost all experiencers I've spoken with, she also has a profound sense of mission that is tied into her contact events.

Leslie's experiences can be traced back to before she was born. When her mother was nine months pregnant with Leslie, she saw something in the sky. Even though she was frightened, she felt compelled to go outside in the middle of the night. She was suddenly in the presence of two small gray aliens, who escorted her out into the apple orchard behind her house. These beings brought her to a landed flying saucer that was in a clearing. There was a jumble of memories of being onboard the craft and feeling the cold floor under her bare feet. The next thing her mother remembers was collapsing in her front yard screaming for help. Her neighbors, who had seen the UFO, found her on the grass as she was going into labor. She was rushed to the hospital and Leslie was born that night.

Leslie's mother was deeply traumatized over the events of that night, as well as ongoing contact throughout the entirety of her pregnancy. She couldn't come to terms with what had happened and she was unable to bond with her newborn daughter. Several years later Leslie's mother dropped her and her sisters off at the doorstep of an adoption services office and disappeared.

I cautiously asked Leslie what this was like, and I marveled at her answer. She said she was never angry at her mother and that she understood that it was impossible for her to cope. This would have been in the early 1960's and at that time there was absolutely no outlet for anyone with these experiences. She explained that she sought out and eventually met her mother when she was a young adult. It was during these meetings when she heard about the trauma surrounding Leslie's birth.

My initial meeting with Leslie was in the early evening on Monday, May 13, 2013. The following day at 2:29 in the afternoon I got an email from a woman named Shonagh Home, who wrote:

I went on your website and was thunderstruck to see all the articles about owls. If you read my book, the entire thing is a series of synchronicities with the owl.

It was only minutes after getting this email that Shonagh and I were talking on the phone. Shonagh is a shaman and author and her autobiographical book is titled Love and Spirit Medicine. It is about her visionary journeys using sacred mushrooms to access the spirit world. Her mentor in these psychedelic realms is a giant white owl. Her story is extremely strange, but what really amazed me was how closely her experience paralleled Leslie's, who I had met less than 24 hours earlier.

Shonagh spent half of her life in New York City, seduced by all the powerful external forces that have come to define our culture of consumerism. She was married with two daughters and enjoyed the quintessential Manhattan lifestyle. In 2001 her husband moved the family to Seattle and things began to crumble. She was cut off from the life she loved and her marriage soon dissolved. She sank into her own dark night of the soul, and the years that followed were a powerful catalyst for self-reflection.

These life events set Shonagh on a spiritual journey inward. She started to meditate, and sought out books and teachers to help her better understand her deeper self. This eventually led her to shamanism as a life path. Shonagh studied with a shaman teacher in the Yucatan. He took her to meet with a Mayan shaman for a blessing ceremony. After it was over, Shonagh thanked him and he gave her a necklace that held an owl pendant. She politely accepted the gift, but she couldn't help but wonder, why an owl?

Shamanic practice involves accessing altered states of consciousness to connect with the spirits. Shonagh briefly explored Ayahuasca then turned her attention to the sacred use of psilocybin mushrooms. She was so moved by her first experience that she began a monthly ritual with this medicine. She called it, "Going through the portal to sit on God's lap and talk to the spirits." Over the course of Shonagh's explorations, she experienced the presence of the owl around her and began to think of it as a guardian of sorts. During some of these medicine journeys, she could hear owls hooting in the near vicinity.

Shonagh was beginning to see owls, hear owls, and have odd owl synchronicities everywhere she looked. It felt as though she had reached a place where the veils between the worlds were lifting. The owl can be a powerful ally for any shaman who performs their work at a soul level. It's the owl's ability to see in the dark that can guide the shaman as they traverse the realms of spirit. Shonagh was familiar with spirit allies, but it wasn't until she began working with the mushroom medicine that she developed a relationship with the owl. The mushroom journeys were about engaging the realms of spirit, and the owl was taking on the role of a wise protector and guide.

As Shonagh got deeper into her practices she realized that everything society had taught her was being stripped away. She was seeking, and getting closer to her true self. Using the mushrooms in sacred ceremonies had been deeply transformative, yet she continued to go even further. Up until that point, all her mushroom journeys had been taken in the company of a partner, or under the watchful eye of a shaman mentor. She came to a critical juncture in her explorations when her medicine partner, who had become her lover, pulled away. In a state of grief, she made a life-changing decision to take the medicine alone. This was to be a powerful initiation of walking a pathway to her deepest depths, without the assuring presence of another.

She took that leap on a snowy evening in January. That day she had received a package from a Native American friend and artisan, who had gifted her with the tail of a snowy white owl a couple of months earlier. Her friend had used the feathers to create a ceremonial fan with a beaded handle for it, and she received the finished piece that afternoon. She lit a small bundle of sage and smudged her bedroom with the smoke, then smudged herself and cleared the room with her white owl fan. She was nervous about going it completely alone but she knew she had to go all the way this time.

She asked the white owl spirit to protect her, and then sat down and ate five grams of mushrooms. This is considered a heroic dose.

Shonagh writes:

A half-hour or so later I felt the medicine begin to kick in. I said to the mushrooms, "Please hear me. I come to you with no skin left, just my wounded heart... I come to you for your council and your teaching."

... Almost immediately, I saw a white sphere in the distance making its way to me. As it neared I saw it had wings and then I realized it was the white owl. She stood before me and became a beautiful woman clothed in white owl feathers with long, flowing white hair. She radiated warmth and kindness, and said, "I am White Owl. I am your medicine and I will work with you, Daughter Who Longs."

My heart opened to her and I radiated my gratitude. I opened my eyes in that moment and my entire bedroom was encased in luminous white owl feathers. It was such a beautiful sight to behold. I was completely contained and protected. She was to be my guardian throughout the entire journey and her love for me was beyond anything I could possibly describe in words.

Shonagh let herself cry and felt a huge soft wing folding her into her white owl guide's breast like a mother owl would protect a fledgling. The White Owl took Shonagh to the top of a tree that held the yellow leaves of autumn, then deeper down the trunk and into the luminous green earth. Mother Earth gently spoke to Shonagh, telling her, "You are dying, Daughter Who Longs."

This startled me and I looked at her and she said, "Yes, daughter. You must know. The girl in you must die." I began to cry. I understood then why the tree had yellow leaves. It was a time of shedding, of passing from one phase into another...

"You will be birthed tonight," White Owl said. "You will be birthed from Daughter Who Longs to Daughter Who Knows. I will help you." At that she took me to a place where we were standing in a landscape of crystalline white snow.

She stood before me and said, "I am removing the veil, goddess." She removed two veils from me. I was incredulous that she called me "goddess" and she laughed and said, "Yes! You are a goddess! You are my sister. I will work with you not as something greater than yourself. I will work with you as your sister."

I felt myself radiating luminous blue light when the veils came off. Then I was catapulted into what I can only describe as the Cosmos, the Universe, the All."

This symbolic psychedelic journey took Shonagh to the third phase of womanhood. She was leaving the maiden and the mother behind, removing those two veils, and she was entering the phase of the crone. From fledgling to autumn to the snows of winter, from life to death to rebirth, she was guided down this eternal path by an owl, who now called her "goddess."

Like many UFO abductees, there is a deep transformative after-effect from Shonagh's White Owl event. The experiencer is in a place of questioning or longing, an event happens and then a change. This plays out exactly with Shonagh—she is literally transfigured by the giant owl, rebirthed into something new. The message couldn't be more plain. She goes from Daughter Who Longs to Daughter Who Knows, with the help of an owl.

Shonagh's whole transformative event plays out with an eerie similarity to a UFO abduction. It began with a white sphere seen in the distance making its way toward Shonagh, and then she found herself in an unusual white room. Like almost all accounts of alien contact, the communication with the white owl was entirely telepathic.

I asked Shonagh if she has ever seen a UFO and I wasn't at all surprised when she described seeing one the previous summer. She had just finished working with a client was now lying down on her back, gazing up to the stars. She noticed a triangle of stars and in the center, which was just blank sky, then a flash of light like an explosion occurred. In that moment, she knew she was receiving a communication. She couldn't say what it was but she was in a state of pure calm and trust. Then it exploded again twice more. In that moment she thought, "Holy shit. I just saw a real space ship!"

I've also asked Shonagh if she's ever had any UFO abduction experiences, and she's quick to say no. What is curious is that the story arc of her life plays out like what so many abductees have lived. The journey from the dark night of the soul to a spiritual transformation is something I have heard over and over in my UFO abduction research. The white being in another realm that radiates unconditional love, being catapulted into The All, and especially seeing a UFO; these are all right out of the pages of most any abductee's autobiography. I fully recognize that these glowing examples don't represent the darker experiences of many (or even most) UFO abductees. The shaman and the abductee are being led along a terribly challenging path, and if both are being confronted with initiation rights, the question arises: What is the role of the initiate?

I have a hard time separating Leslie's story with her white owl from Shonagh's story and her white owl. Leslie is very much an abductee, but I don't think Shonagh is. She's much more in the maybe category.

I talked to Leslie on a Monday. Then, on Tuesday, I talked to Shonagh. I connected with both women in less than twenty-four hours. Now, here's where things get really interesting: both of them were born in the same year and in the same place, 1963 in Ontario. Both of them are working psychics and they are using these skills to help people. Both have had a lot of powerful synchronicities. Both have seen UFOs and both have seen owls. They were both adopted and they've both had profound transformative experiences with a large white owl. I'll also add that both women have extremely striking blue eyes.

It is these kinds of clustered synchronicities that keep me on this path. To me, they are proof of something at play and that reality itself is much more dynamic than I once believed.[\[32\]](#)

The two hammocks

I spoke to a woman named Susan Kornacki after she hinted to me on Facebook that she'd had a profound owl experience. We had communicated off and on over the last few years, and I followed up with a set of phone calls. Susan has had a lifetime of UFO contact experiences, and like so many with these ongoing events, she is profoundly dedicated to serving and helping mankind. Her sense of mission is palpable in almost her every word. When we spoke she said she had three owl experiences that were important to her.

The first wasn't her own, but one that had been ingrained into her family lore. Her grandfather wasn't much of a talker, but he did have one story that he would tell over and over. He had over twenty grandchildren and all of them were captivated by this story. He was always out in nature, all of his life, and it defined his very being. There was a day while, alone in the woods, he had spent the afternoon fishing, and something odd happened. He felt a distinct presence, as if something was right there with him. He looked around and there was nothing, but he swore there was something else out there.

While driving home that same day, he heard a voice saying, "You need to take a left." That didn't make sense because that wasn't the way home. He looked to his side and there was an owl sitting in the passenger seat. The shock of a talking owl in his car, right next to him, caused him to turn right and he got into an accident. In the seconds after the accident the owl was gone, and he never knew if it somehow flew out of the car or disappeared. He was convinced that the owl was trying to help him avoid an accident, but he was too startled to follow its directions.

Because of her grandfather's often repeated story, owls have always had a magical place in Susan's heart. This magic played out on Easter Sunday in 2010. Susan was at big a family gathering not too far from her home. Her daughter and her ex-husband David were there too. Over the previous couple of days, Susan had been feeling a weird sensation intensifying in her back, and while at this party she suddenly felt a tremendous rush of powerful energy running up through her spine. She described it as, “a Tesla coil going off!” Immediately, she told everyone she had to leave. She left alone without her daughter, David agreeing to drop her off at Susan’s home later in the afternoon.

Susan arrived back to her house in a state of confusion at about 4 p.m. She was overwhelmed by the frenetic sense of energy in her spine, and had no idea what was happening. She went out to her backyard and got into a hammock, which was set-up between two trees. Immediately as she laid down, she watched an owl fly above her into one of the trees connected to the hammock. Then another owl landed in the other tree that held the other side of the hammock, and those owls began a back and forth chorus of calls with her lying between them. Susan explained:

I just kind of surrendered. I laid back into the hammock, and I knew what was going on. I knew that they are taking this energy and calibrating it, they’re helping me to ground it, to have it be more complete. The sound of the owls, and the energy was moving back and forth, and I was right in the middle.

I can’t help but see Susan as some sort of energy storing component, like a battery on a circuit board between two electrically charged owls. This went on for over a half hour, and David arrived home with their daughter. When they walked into the backyard, Susan thought for sure the owls would fly away, but they didn’t. David walked up to Susan in the hammock, concerned that she’d left the party so abruptly. He asked if she was alright. She replied, “I am now.”

Then she asked what was above them. He said he heard two owls. She explained that they arrived at the exact moment when she’d lain down in the hammock, and then she explained how she was feeling. When she asked David what he thought they were doing, he said it sounds like they’re helping.

I’ve never had anything like that happen before, animals coming to—I don’t want to say heal me—it was more than that, these weren’t just balancing the energy but they were also part of the information that was moving in my body. They were a part of it. It was amazing. This energy was overwhelming. I had no frame of reference for what to do with it.

Susan didn’t understand what she was feeling, but thought that these intense sensations might match some sort of Kundalini rush, but she couldn’t say for sure.

Leading up to this owl event, Susan had just started to dabble in doing energy healing work. This traced back to one of her UFO contact experiences. She clearly remembers the aliens showing her that she could move this psychic energy through her hands. Susan was in a place of yearning and felt she needed to follow this path, to try to see if she could actually make this therapeutic work happen as a career.

Susan, with the help of the owls, seems to be an energy healer who is coming into her own. The explosion of energy in her spine certainly plays out like a Kundalini awakening, and this might be an energetic blockage being removed, something clearing away, allowing a freer more dynamic flow of energy. She opened up, and those two owls were playing some role. Either they were part of some activation process, transmuting something within Susan, or they were attracted to something radiating out of her in the exact moment she put herself onto that hammock.

It was after the event with the owls that people started coming to see her. She wasn't advertising or anything, they seemed to find her out of the blue. She just went with it, because now she could feel these energies a lot more clearly and cleanly, even though she'd never had any kind of formal training. It was simply an internal knowing about what to do to help people.

Susan described the first odd sensations in her spine beginning on the Friday before the owl event. The feelings were painful and she even made a joke, "What is this, a crucifixion?" That happened on Good Friday and the owl event happened on Easter Sunday. When I pointed out this glaring metaphor to Susan, she seemed genuinely surprised. She's never been at all religious in any way, so it never even occurred to her. There is no day in the Western world with more overt death and rebirth symbolism than Easter Sunday.

Susan has a more recent owl experience. On January 1, 2012, she was at her home alone all swallowed up in a mood of uneasiness. She didn't understand what she was feeling or what was happening, it just felt like something was draining out of her. She was on the second floor, and when she casually glanced out a window she was surprised to make direct eye contact with an owl in a tree just outside the window; it was looking right at her. Susan explained that they both stared at each other for the next 15 minutes. She actually said they engaged one another, and there was an information transfer.

In the moments after seeing that owl, she started to feel better. She somehow knew the owl was picking up what she had been feeling, and that there had been a transfer of information. Susan felt strongly that the owl was connecting to the trees and also connecting with all the various beings out there. She was in her house, and the message directed at her from the owl was to come out, leave the confines of her safe home—a call to pull out to nature.

Leading up to seeing that owl, Susan had been feeling a deep pull to change her life and follow a new path. Right after seeing that owl, things began to shift. Very soon after she acted on that pull and moved to Hawaii. This had been a long suppressed dream, stretching back to her childhood.

I spoke to Susan on a Wednesday. On Thursday, my friend Suzanne connected me to someone else who had a story she thought I would find interesting, hinting this woman had a lot of unusual life events. I didn't hesitate, and within minutes I was chatting on Facebook with a woman from Massachusetts named Kelly. I need to add that each of the people linked here—myself, Susan, Suzanne and Kelly—have all had UFO contact experiences.

My interest peaked when I realized that Kelly had her own profound experience involving a hammock. Her story took place on a gorgeous Saturday afternoon in September 2008. She was lying in this hammock in her backyard, gazing at the crystal blue sky, hoping to catch a glimpse of something out of the ordinary above her. Something she could honestly declare as special, a sighting that would confirm her past experiences.

Kelly looked up from the hammock in contemplation for a good half hour to no avail, then thought to herself that she should simply ask to be shown something she could say for sure was extraordinary. She spoke a simple request: “Please show me something out of this world. Something I will know for certain is special right away, without question. I will close my eyes, count down from ten to one, and when I open my eyes, there it'll be, right there for me to see.” She had made similar pleas at other uncertain times in her life, each time asking from a place of pure intent. She'd had good results from these heartfelt appeals. The answers came in the form of unexplained, paranormal-type phenomena, and she hoped to get a similar reply on that sunny afternoon. Alas, nothing happened. She made the same appeal for a sign in the heavens a total of three times, but nothing presented itself. She calmly thought to herself, “I guess this isn't going to work for me this time.”

Right at that moment, her eight year old son walked up and plopped himself down right next to her in the hammock. He asked, “What're you doing, Mom

“Well, I’m trying to ask to see something really special. Something extraordinary. Maybe you can help me?”

As they lay there, side by side, Kelly gently explained what she was doing. They both closed their eyes and she described how it worked, making the same wish and started the countdown. When she got to three, her son interrupted her. “Wait mom, I didn’t do it right. It didn’t work.” Then without hesitation, he took the lead and they both closed their eyes as he spoke with a sincere intention, “Dear God, please show us a UFO.” Kelly hadn’t addressed her request to anyone or anything, not to God, and she never said the word UFO, either. Then he exclaimed aloud, “5-4-3-2-1!”

When they opened their eyes, directly in front of them was something shiny, just sitting low in the sky, like it was there for them to see. They were both ecstatic, excitedly pointing at it together. What they saw was a motionless, noiseless, brilliant white light. It was like an intensely bright star, but this was the middle of the day.

She asked her son to run and get the binoculars from the house. She repeated “thank you” over and over as he raced away. Seemingly within seconds he was back, and looking through the binoculars she saw something beautiful and surreal. She described it as a highly reflective, cone-shaped object, shining like a diamond with a million facets. Like a prism reflecting every color imaginable, and even colors beyond imagination. It stayed there totally stationary.

When her son looked through the binoculars he let out a breathless “Whoa!”

She called to her husband to come outside. When he stepped out of the house and onto the deck, the light started moving. They both beckoned him to the hammock. They handed him the binoculars and he watched for a long time, eventually moving up to the deck for a better vantage point. He focused on the slowly moving bright object until it was no longer visible through the trees. Her husband, ever the skeptic, had no explanation for what it could have been.

Kelly wasn’t just seeing something, she was feeling something too. The event left her with feelings of wonder, awe, curiosity and gratitude. The whole thing impacted her greatly. It changed her, she asked for confirmation, and received precisely what she needed.

I spoke with two women, one day apart, both with hammock stories and both with UFO contact experiences. Both events happened in Massachusetts, less than 43 miles apart. Each event started with them being alone and then their child and husband arrived (In Susan's case, her ex-husband). Both experiences were profoundly emotional. These two women had even met on Facebook, become friends and chatted, all without either one knowing the other's hammock experiences. Curiously, if you look at side by side pictures of Susan and Kelly, they look like sisters, almost like twins.

But for me the most resonant thing is that despite all the similarities in their experiences, one woman saw owls and the other saw a UFO, both while lying in a hammock. It feels like the owl and UFO are, in many ways, playing the same metaphysical role in each story.

I woke up with a jolt during the night, right after writing this back-to-back hammock story. My heart was pounding, I was wide awake and I had this total knowing that this was the most important owl story I had collected. Now, this feeling tapered off with the cold light of dawn so I can't say that it's true, but that was my thought in the moment.

The two balconies

I spoke with a woman named Tori (a pseudonym) about an experience while she was staying by herself in a vacation home near a ski resort. The event took place over the last weekend in September 2014, and this set of events was preceded by a sense of foreboding. She felt nervous because she was going to be there all alone, and this was unlike her.

Tori's dog woke her by barking hysterically at around three o'clock on Monday morning. This was unusual behavior, and she spent a long time calming the dog down before she could go back to sleep. An hour later she woke again, this time to the dog growling. It was then that she saw a glow coming from the hall. She thought she must have left a light on downstairs, but she hadn't noticed anything before.

Then something caught her eye out the big wall of windows next to her bed. There was a dot of light in the sky, and it was moving around in odd motions. This was still before sunrise, and she watched this bright shiny object darting around in the dark sky while lying in her bed. It would move close and appear as a silvery metallic craft, and it would zip further away until it was only a bright dot of light. The entire wall on one side of the bedroom was made up of tall windows, this included a big glass door that opened onto a deck, so she had a wide view of the sky. She watched it for about 45 minutes, and then it disappeared. At that point, she promptly fell asleep.

Tori woke up again at 7:30, now it was fully daylight, and she watched an enormous gray owl flying in circles, over and over, above the golf course next to the house. The position of her bed and huge windows framed the whole scene in a way that she could clearly watch the flight of this slow circling owl. She was lying there in bed, with the feeling that it was looking at her.

Eventually she spoke aloud, "Go away, you're scaring me." At that point the owl flew towards her and landed right on the deck outside her window. It was standing with its back to her. Tori was just about to get up and out of bed, she wanted to open the door and shoo it away, when it began hopping backwards, still facing away from her. She had the distinct feeling it was trying to hide its face. It waddled right up close to the window, turned its head and her instantaneous thought was, "It's a woman!"

This owl stayed like that for a long while, staring in at her. She was clear that it wasn't simply a female bird looking in at her, it was a woman, a person. She was frightened, and was moving around in bed, at one point her eyes were averted, and when she looked back this owl was gone.

Tori described the owl as mostly gray and about two feet tall. This matches a great gray owl, a common enough bird given her location. Parts of this story suggest she was seeing a real bird, but some of it seems like a screen memory. The days leading up to this odd set of events included a flurry of psychic weirdness. She told of guessing someone's birthday, she doesn't know why, she was just suddenly prompted to do so. This same psychic birthday knowing has happened to me, and both of us were correct.

Tori called me just two days after seeing the owl walk backwards on her balcony. We spoke on the phone for over an hour, and during that time my computer would ping with each incoming email. I checked these messages while we were talking, and I had four separate messages, each were accounts of owls and UFOs that were somehow experienced together. Now, I get a lot of personal reports like this, but four in one hour is sort of over the top. All while immersed in conversation about exactly the same subject.

Tori got back to me the day after we spoke. She described seeing unusual twinkling lights from the balcony of her high-rise apartment the night before, the very same day we spoke. They appeared just as she was telling her mother and grandmother about her UFO sighting and the strange owl landing on her balcony.

I noticed something in my conversations with Tori. She was telling a scary story, but there was a sense of wonder in how she shared it. This shows up in other witnesses too, this tone of amazement. It was obvious to me that she had experienced something both frightening and awe inspiring.

A little over a week after talking with Tori, I received an email from a woman in Brazil named Suzana where she described a series of events from early in 2014. She lives on the top floor of a large apartment complex, and the view from her balcony was of two towers, one at each end of the building. She stepped out onto her balcony at night and saw V-shaped object appear between the two towers, right at that moment she was overcome with an enormous feeling of joy and peace.

The object didn't fly from one tower to the other. It appeared in the center of the space. It had yellow round lights, one on the front and two or three on the wings. She watched as it moved until it was hidden behind one of the towers. She ran to the edge of the terrace in the hopes of seeing it again, but it had disappeared. It was a clear night with no clouds, and she had no idea where it could have gone to. Then, silently to herself, she asked, "Gosh, where are you guys?" In that moment two enormous white owls appeared, they flew right in front of the terrace.

Suzana had been living in that apartment for more than a year and had never seen any owls. As they flew past, they made a strong whistling sound. She remembered hearing this same noise earlier, but never at the same time as seeing an owl. That whistling noise would be their calling for her in the upcoming weeks.

In her letter to me, Suzana wrote:

After seeing the UFO and the owls, a feeling of connection of both UFO and owls was something which filled my heart and mind. Could these birds be a materialization of the being inside the object I saw? There must be a strong connection to both!

I went to sleep with a wonderful feeling of peace and joy which was with me for many days. Every time I'd remember the sight the same feeling would fill my heart and mind. But I wanted answers! Why did my "friends" appear? What do they want me to know? Was it just a confirmation that they are around in these chaotic moments we are living? Why the white owls?

After this night, the owls would come back, sit on an extension of the building wall and just stare at me while I watched with amazement and I tried to show my feelings of peace and joy.

These two owls were close enough that Suzana could scare them with her movements, so she was careful not to startle them. She didn't want them to leave. She wrote something interesting:

I would do my best to keep my vibration in joy and peace because I had the feeling that they were there because of my vibration.

Earlier in this book I speculated that perhaps owls sensed some heightened vibe in the experiencer, and they were attracted to it. This may account for why abductees are seeing so many owls. Suzana is describing exactly what I had wondered about, they were there because of her vibration.

On one of the nights, one of the owls flew onto her porch holding a rat in its beak. She mentally said, "I'm not going to watch you eat that rat, so you better fly to another place." And it did, it flew to the building next to hers!

Suzana always knew when they were around because of their distinctive whistling. On one of the nights, one of the owls almost flew in her window. They were there for a long time and she was glad that she was having such sweet friendly visits every night. One night she saw a cockroach on her terrace. She hates cockroaches, so for the next few weeks she didn't go out onto the terrace and she lost her friends. She didn't even hear their whistling sound anymore.

Suzana wrote to me about how she came to contact me:

They want us to speak up and tell our stories in relation to our experiences with them... That's what they WANT! ... Maybe the owl and UFO experience I went through was just a way of reaching your blog... I feel you are a catalyst.

She went on to compliment the work I have been doing, thanking me for speaking out. I was honored, and at the same time I recognize that the blog, my written work, and the audio interviews all seem to be influenced by some outside force. I am cautious about saying this, but I feel strangely compelled to do this work, and this book you hold in your hand is a direct result of this odd urge. Suzana went on:

You are making me think about being so reluctant as to writing about what I know and receive from them, to have more courage and not hide under the carpet, to loose fear of being pointed as crazy!... I have to work on my fear of speaking my truth... Don't you think they have good reasons in asking me to contact you?[\[33\]](#)

Both of these balcony sightings, with Tori and Suzana, involve seeing owls right after seeing a UFO. This is a bit out of the ordinary, because most of the reports of this type involve the witness seeing the owl first, and then the UFO.

These back-to-back stories have an amplified power. The way they arrived was so thick with synchro-intensity that it feels like it was orchestrated for my benefit. I realize how presumptuous that sounds, but they each delivered a mighty wallop, and I was left astonished.

All three of these back-to-back stories happened to women. The white owls with Leslie and Shonagh, the hammock experiences with Susan and Kelly, and the balcony events with Tori and Suzana. This pattern plays out with the entirety of this research, more women than men are telling me their owl experiences, and I am not sure why. One thought is that women are just better at communicating than men, and they will reach out to share their experiences. Men might be having just as many weird owl events, but perhaps they keep it to themselves. Or, it could be that the mythic power of the owl is truly connected to the feminine.

Maybe our ancestors saw this same pattern of owls favoring women, and this lore manifested in our ancient goddesses, like Lilith, Athena, Minerva, and Lakshmi—each with an owl companion. Whatever the reason, the women certainly outnumber the men in this owl research. Of those women, there are a curious number with bird names, like Dove, Sparrow, Cardinal, and even Bird itself!

Chapter 10: Owls in the Sacred Sites of England

Maria and Bert back to back

Maria Wheatley comes from a long family lineage of dowzers, all living in among the ancient sacred sites of southern England's Wiltshire County. Her research has been centered around the ley lines and energy patterns in hallowed prehistoric places like Avebury and Stonehenge. She has also researched crop circles. I heard her describing her fieldwork on a podcast, and as I listened, I thought to myself, "Oh this woman simply must have an owl story!"

I found her online contact info and I sent an email. I explained I was researching UFOs and owls, and I asked if she had any personal experiences that might fit this inquiry. Within a few minutes she replied:

I have seen a large expanding UFO that involved an owl! So I was amazed as I read your email.

It was 1991 or 1992, it was midsummer's eve around sunset and a friend and I decided to visit Oliver's Castle near Devizes in Wiltshire. Nearby is a wooded area with trails, we were about to enter the woods when suddenly a majestic barn owl swooped in front of us, crossing the path and then went up into a nearby tree. We both sensed it was blocking our path, as if denying us entry.

We took the unspoken advice and instead went to the nearby hilltop [known as Oliver's Castle] which offers outstanding views due to its high elevation. We were admiring the view when we noted an amber light heading north. After a short while, the light became stationary and then expanded and expanded and expanded until it was very large. There seemed to be swirling light at the bottom and looked like a cigar shape.

Then in a split second it returned to its former size and sped off! My friend was spooked, so we hurried off the hill and sped off in the car. Had it not been for the owl blocking the path, we would have missed an extraordinary event!

This is a wonderful example of a combined owl and UFO event. Like many sightings of this kind, it had a sense of psychic knowing, they both felt the owl was sending a message, that it was denying their entry into the forest.

In the aftermath of this event, Maria was able to do tarot readings with an increased ease and effectiveness. The fellow she was with that evening claimed to have developed greater psychic knowing. It was as if some knob in his brain had been turned way up and, for a few weeks, he was literally reading people's minds. This scared him and he didn't like it. Eventually both Maria and her friend's psychic abilities eased off from their intense high, but Maria feels she's gained heightened clairvoyant capabilities and insights from that owl and UFO event. Maria's story plays out as a mirrored counterpoint to another white owl event in the sacred areas of southern England.

In 1997, Bert Janssen had been actively researching the crop circles of Wiltshire for three summers in a row. He was at a point where he felt he had come to a dead end in his ability to follow the mystery any further. Then something changed all that. Here are Bert's own words explaining what happened:

This was my third year, and I thought this is my last year, I've done it all now, I've seen it, three years of [researching] crop circles, it's enough. Then... something happens that will draw you back the next year.

What happened to me, I saw for the first time in my life, in Wiltshire, an orb, a ball of light. And not just flashing by, this was amber and it was floating over a field in the near dark of the evening.

Bert watched in amazement as this floating orb cruised around above the fields. It would slow down and then accelerate. Very similar to what Maria saw, the orb was amber and growing larger as he watched. It would grow to the size of a huge balloon, and then shrink back down to the size of a grapefruit.

I watched it for minutes, floating over the field, then it moved along and disappeared behind a shed. I was sure it would reappear again, because the shed should have blocked the view for a just a few seconds, but it never reappeared. And I thought, ‘That’s really strange, why did it disappear at that shed?’

He went to the shed and tried to get in, but the only door was locked. He put his ear to the door and heard an eerie hissing noise. He was alone and it was getting dark, and he left with plans to come back in the daylight.

He returned the next day and walked around to the back side of the shed. There he saw a small window without any glass. This was up high, the same height the orb had traveled as it passed behind the shed. He thought, “can it be that the ball of light could have gone through that window into the shed?” The window opening was up on the second floor, and Bert desperately needed to know what was inside. He had to break into the shed through the front door, and once inside, he again heard the same eerie hissing noise. He climbed a ladder that accessed a loft to get up to the level of that open window, and discovered the source of the hissing.

... to my great surprise and shock, I found a nest of white owls! I thought, this cannot be true. So the ball of light is totally connected to these white owls. So for me the white owl and the balls of light that are seen in Wiltshire, they are somehow interchangeable. That’s why I am paying so much attention when I do see a white owl, because I’m not always sure it’s a white owl. Could it be that I am actually looking at something else, it only presents itself as a white owl to me.[\[34\]](#)

This, to me, is a perfect example of what is at the core of all my research. I can’t help but see the window as a metaphor. UFO researchers are forever struggling with the source of these craft, and one idea (that I like) that gets batted around is that these craft enter our dimensional reality through some kind of cosmic window. In almost all the worlds mythologies, owls can be seen, like the shaman, as a being that can pass in and out of the beyond, crossing some veil, or through a window. The owl, the UFO, and the shaman all have this metaphoric (or literal) ability. I very much see both Maria and Bert in the role of the modern day shaman.

Bert, together with his wife Heather, herself a shaman, had another powerful white owl experience in crop circle country in 2011. They followed an owl while driving at night. It led them on a journey through the rolling hills and narrow roads. At one point, Heather experienced a vision of the ground zipping below her, getting closer and then further away. It took a moment to realize what she was experiencing—she was seeing through the eyes of the owl as it flew over the undulating fields. That same night she saw what she can only describe as a hell hound, a mythic beast of ancient Briton. This unleashed a cluster of intense synchronicities that culminated in a beautiful crop circle appearing near the fields where they had chased the white owl.

This is yet another example of the paradox syndrome. So many strange things were happening around Bert and Heather that it took on a form of confirmation, that something profound had arisen out of all the frenetic events.[\[35\]](#)

Another powerful detail from Bert's 1997 white owl experience: it happened at a point of questioning and personal disillusionment over the crop circle mystery. He was ready to walk away from the whole messy subject, but both the owl and a UFO (in the form of an orange orb) changed him. He describes the night in 2011 with his wife, where they saw the white owl and hell hound, as a sort of epiphany. Something was interacting directly with him and his wife, leading them into the darkness in a way that reframed their role in the overall mystery.

Now, 18 years later, Bert is still active in this subject, less as pragmatic researcher, but more as a mentor to people seeking their own spiritual answers. His story is a delightful counterpoint to Maria Wheatley's experience. Bert had an orange orb lead him to seeing white owls, and Maria had a white owl lead her to seeing an orange orb!

Crop circles and owls are rare

I've asked many crop circle researchers the same question I ask everyone else—if they have had any odd owl experiences. Very few have any stories to tell. I asked this question of pioneering crop circle researcher Colin Andrews, and I was disappointed when he told me no, he'd never had any unusual owl experiences, nor did he recall any from his research. This surprised me, because I see the landscape of Wiltshire, the focal point of so many powerful crop circles, as being outright magical. I wrongly assumed that this place should be flooded with curious owl events. He did say that he has had a lot of hummingbird experiences (another mythic bird), and that is interesting to me. But what is much more interesting is that Colin has had abduction experiences, something that he first shared publicly in 2011. The fact that the man who coined the term crop circle has also had life-long interactions with elusive non-human entities didn't surprise me in the least.

I have come across a few owl stories in crop circle country, just fewer than I expected. The story of Maria on the hilltop near Oliver's castle is a perfect example, as are the stories shared by Bert and his wife Heather.

There is a presumption by the uninformed that these circles are created by UFOs, even assuming that they are pressed into the crop by landed flying saucers. This simply doesn't show up in the research, although floating balls of translucent light are quite commonly reported. UFO accounts connected to the crop circles of Wiltshire are decidedly rare. There are some, but like the owl reports, fewer than I would have expected.

Robbert van den Broeke and owls

Robbert van den Broeke is a young Dutch experimenter who has lived a life of bizarre involvement with the unknown. His case has been documented by multiple researchers, but the utter strangeness of what is taking place around him has left him open to criticism by skeptics. He seems to have the ability to predict the arrival of crop circles. These formations usually appear close to his home in Holland. Foreseeing these circles is often accompanied by depression, and he will suffer for several days prior to the arrival of a new formation. This was the case on the night of September 10 when Robbert suddenly knew he should drive to a nearby field, at the time he was with researcher Roy Boschman.

Dutch parapsychologist Richard Krebber was called and accompanied them that night and was there when they found the newly formed circle. Krebber had purposefully brought along his fully-charged iPhone and witnessed its battery draining within the circle, experiencing first-hand the commonly reported failure of electronic devices within new crop formations.

The moon was nearly full as these men stood together inside the flattened series of circles in the mustard-seed field. Robbert felt something mystical watching them, and seconds later they all saw a large owl swooping down very low over the formation, circling it three times—counter-clockwise, which was the same direction as the flattened plants.

Robbert had the distinct feeling that this owl's consciousness contained a bigger consciousness which was both observing the men and energizing the new formation. At that point all three men felt a distinct warmth in their legs. Krebber also reported feeling a tingling in his arms and especially his hand, accompanied by an unusual, but pleasant, sensation of something stretching his body upwards.

Twenty-two days later, Robbert sensed there was going to be another crop circle, feeling it would show up on the night of October 2. Again, he went searching with Boschman. Robbert saw a field of flowers and three circles in his mind's eye, then he both heard and saw the name Zwarteberg (Black Hill). Robbert knew of a Black Hill Road, but only knew the direction they should drive. As the men drove toward the spot, Robbert said that he hoped they would see another owl.

Even though it was dark, they eventually found a place that matched Robbert's vision. They stopped on a road along one side of a field of mustard-seed. Boschman saw an owl flying across the field, which seemed to be showing them the location of a circle. They walked to where the owl was last seen, and found a flattened circle closely matching what Robbert had seen in his vision.[\[36\]](#)

Four owls on four posts

I had my own brush with the owls in Wiltshire, albeit indirectly in the summer of 2014. While traveling through the countryside of England that summer, I stayed in traditional little inns. Dinner was served daily at these adorable establishments, but there was one evening I was busy until late. I arrived back just after the kitchen had closed, but still in time for dessert and a pint of stout. I was the only one in the small dining area, and the waitress sort of stared at me and eventually asked, "Are you one of those crop circle people?"

I replied, "Well, sort of."

She explained that each summer the inn gets a lot of croppies (the self-adopted name for the crop circle enthusiasts), and she was more than a little mystified by them. I've met plenty of croppies, and many would qualify as eccentric. I explained that I had just spent the day at a crop circle conference on the campus of Marlborough College, three miles from the inn.

Then I told her I was working on a book about owls. She thought that was odd because just the other evening when she was pulling into her driveway she saw a set of owls. She lives on a nearby farm, and there are four posts alongside her driveway, and there was a big owl on each of the posts, so there were four of them all lined up. They didn't fly away as she pulled in. Instead, they just sat there as she lit them up, one by one, with her headlights.

I asked when that was, and she said two nights ago. I realized right away that was the same day I had arrived at the inn.

At that point I mumbled, "Oh, that was me."

She looked at me quizzically, and said, "What? Do you think you somehow manifested those owls?"

"Well, maybe."

It was obvious she was doubtful of what I had just said, and I asked if she sees a lot of owls. She said not very often, but they are around. I asked if she had ever seen four in a row like that, she said, "No, never."

I then went on to explain some of the weirdness of my research, and how owls seem to show up in all kinds of strange ways, sometimes seeming to be in direct connection to me. We talked together as I ate my dessert and drank my stout, and we kept talking for a good while after I finished both. I guess I made my point because by the time I was leaving the dining room, she seemed to take me seriously and said that, "Maybe you did manifest those owls."

She told about growing up in Wiltshire and how the area is rich in ancient folklore. She was skeptical about most of these tales, but it was just part of living here. She told me a story about a friend who was hunting rabbits, and was about to shoot towards a hedge row when a small orange orb appeared, floating near where he was pointing his gun. Seeing something so strange caused him to pause. At that point, a fellow walked out from behind the bushes along a foot path. If he would have fired his rifle, he quite probably would have shot that man, so the little glowing orb might have saved a life.

August 10th and three crop circle events

I've had some odd crop circle experiences, and there is one date that shows up repeatedly. It started in the summer of 2002 while I was working at my desk. A curious thought burst into my mind, which I have come to call a psychic flash. The thought, we need a crop circle here! suddenly appeared in my head. I didn't know where it came from, but the notion felt playful. The next morning, August 10th, 2002, a crop circle was found in a field of wheat near the small town of Teton, Idaho. This was 31 miles from my home, and by western standards, this is quite close to me.

I visited the site that afternoon, and there were 16 circles in a simple cross pattern. I met a researcher there who told of seeing a grapefruit-sized metallic sphere hovering above the site. She also spoke to the neighbors and heard from multiple witnesses that a bright orange light appeared in the area of the formation at around three in the morning. Alas, no owls that I know of in this event.

On August 10th, 2009, a crop circle appeared in Wiltshire, UK with the stylized face of an owl centered in the design. This was called the Woodborough Hill formation, and it happened in the heart of crop circle country. This was a rare circle because it reappeared the next year, the same design could be seen from above in the crop the following summer. Whatever had effected the crop had produced a visual echo of sorts. Beyond the owl in the design, there was no connection to me with this event.

On August 10th 2013, a crop circle, known as the Chute Causeway Formation, appeared in Wiltshire County. This rather complex set of events involves a crop circle, a friend, myself and an owl. My friend, Cynthia, is a self-proclaimed croppie who has gone to the UK for several summers in a row to chase the phenomenon. She was staying at a traditional English inn with a crew of like-minded croppies, and on the night of August 9th, they all meditated for the appearance of a crop circle. They were asking for a circle with the theme of peace. She woke up at four in the morning (on August 10th) and, while lying in bed, she formally asked out loud to be taken to see the creation of a crop circle.

She then felt a weird rotating sensation and what she feels to be the onset of an out of body experience. Then she blacked out. Later that morning, Cynthia awoke with a start. She had the sensation of being dropped back into her bed. She consciously recalled being on board a craft accompanied by a palpable feeling of tilting in a circular motion.

Later that day, Cynthia and her comrades heard the news of a new circle that had formed the night before. The whole crew went together to the site, and she describes standing in that circle as a one of the most profoundly mystical experiences of her life.

Chute Causeway formation
August 10th 2013

I had a parallel experience back in Idaho on the other side of the ocean. At about nine in the evening of Aug 9th, I was standing in my next-door neighbor's yard when I saw a great horned owl land on a tree. Two friends and I watched the owl for a few minutes and then it flew off. It was a lovely sighting. The bird was silhouetted against the twilight sky at the very top of a spruce tree, very close to where we stood.

I am pretty quick to give a deeper meaning to any owl I might see, but at that moment I couldn't figure out any kind of significance to that sighting, so I just dismissed it as nothing more than a pleasant chance to see an owl. It was only later, after talking with Cynthia at length about her experience in England with what was called the Chute Causeway circle, that I realized this might have a connection to the owl sighting in my neighbor's yard.

Allowing for the time difference, 9 p.m. Mountain Time (Aug. 9th) lines up precisely with 4 a.m. GMT (Aug. 10th). That means I had a close up owl sighting that happened at precisely the same time my friend described having an out of body experience eight time zones away.

Also of note, a Dutch researcher, known as R71, made a technical drawing of the Chute Causeway circle. He worked from aerial photos and posted his image on-line on the same day circle appeared. What turned up in the diagram were six little peace signs. These weren't in the field. They only emerged after he used a computer to connect points within the design. So, a group of people meditated with the intention of manifesting a crop circle with the theme of peace, and that night a circle appeared nearby with peace signs hidden within the design.

Chute Causeway diagram with peace signs

This little cluster of crop circle events begins with a psychic flash, followed by a formation appearing in Teton Idaho on August 10th, 2002. Seven years later to the day, a giant owl crop circle appears in the UK on August 10th, 2009. Four years later to the day, a circle with hidden peace signs appears on August 10th, 2013, and it coincided with a beautiful owl sighting in my neighbor's yard.

Summary of Part II

If we follow the model presented by Dr. Kirby Surprise, synchronicities are somehow generated by the observer. They are effecting reality in some unknown way that produces these eerie effects. Could it be that some deep part of ourselves is calling an owl to make itself known on a conspicuous branch outside our window. We need a message, so we bring it to ourselves.

Synchronicities are every bit as mysterious as UFOs or crop circles, but are these other events also being self-generated by the individual? The collective unconscious might be the source, or maybe it is some connection between the individual and our ancient past. There might be a well of mythological archetypes, and the seeker is tapping into this without realizing their own power. It is as if there is a cosmic turbine chugging away in some realm that we cannot perceive, but our intention can occasionally influence this machine and it will spit out sparks, and we see those flashes in the guise of the paranormal.

PART III RECOGNIZING OWLS

Chapter 11: Owl Mythology

Myth is the secret opening through which the inexhaustible energies of the cosmos pour into human manifestation.

—Joseph Campbell (1904-1987) Hero with a Thousand Faces

The power of myth

When asked to define mythology in one sentence, comparative mythologist Joseph Campbell said that would be like trying to define life in a single sentence. He then went on to say that his simplest on-the-street definition of myth would be a story told almost exclusively in symbolic terms.

Mythology as a word has two parts, the prefix myth, which by most definitions equates to something that isn't true. All too often, the word myth implies a purely fictitious narrative, a fable that has been told and re-told throughout ancient cultures. When using the term myth, most people will hear it as something without any meaningful value. The suffix ology means “the study of,” so mythology means the study of myths.

Joseph Campbell spoke of two schools of thought on the study of myth. The objectivist would view myth as nothing more than primitive fairy tales, something obsolete. A dusty book on a shelf, full of old fables that can be scrutinized by the rational academic. The second school, the subjectivists, would see myths as something much more vital, timeless reflections of universal truths, values, and archetypes. Myths carry a significance in our lives, playing an important role. As I proceed forward, I will be weighting the subjectivist side of the scale with a disproportionate zeal. If the ideas in this book seem biased towards the mystical, that’s because they are. Campbell also said, “Myths are clues to the spiritual potentialities of the human life.”[\[37\]](#)

The owl has two major symbolic meanings. One is wisdom, the other is death. These divergent ideas probably stem from the owl itself. With their huge eyes and intense gaze, they have an aura of intelligence and regal serenity. A biologist would see those eyes as well-evolved tools for hunting in the dark. The poet would see those same eyes as being able to penetrate into your soul. Owls don’t simply appear as wise, they seem too wise. So much so that they come across as mystical.

The owl can see into the darkness, and this is the overriding metaphor for its spiritual powers. It can see into the other world, the underworld, the realm of the dead, or the dark world. Like the shaman, the owl can travel to these other realms and then come back with its message. The owl as messenger is interwoven into much of this lore, whether delivering wisdom or a portent of death.

The ancient owl motif is connected to the feminine. The day is masculine and the night is feminine, with the sun and moon as counterparts. The 28-day lunar cycle equates to a woman’s cycle. Owls tend to gravitate towards goddesses and fertility icons. In ancient Babylon, the hooting of an owl at night was thought to mean the cries of a woman who had died in childbirth, now searching for her lost baby. This is a grim insight into an era where giving birth was dangerous, often the cause of a young woman’s death.

Owl as night omen

The owl, as a symbol, can be a total downer. This role is paralleled across the ages and across almost every mythic tradition: the owl is seen as an evil omen. Nighttime must have had an entirely different meaning before the electric lightbulb, and all sorts of folklore evolved that painted the darkness as something ominous and sinister. The owl represents the night, and thus it became the totem for all the menacing things hidden in the dark. That includes the internal darkness of the mind and the subconscious.

Goya, no stranger to metaphoric symbolism, used owls (along with bats and cats) in a depiction of a nightmare. In his 1799 etching, The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters, a group of sinister owls hovers over the tortured sleeper.

Owls and death

Darkness, the domain of the owl, is equated with death. This connection is easy to understand, and the owl is an animal of the night, rarely seen in the daylight. Death, darkness, and owls can all be seen as sinister. Even today, seeing an owl can be unsettling, there is something about them that projects a menacing intensity.

For most of the world's cultures, the owl is an ominous sign. Many traditions believed that merely hearing its screech in the night was a harbinger of death. In China, the owl is called the bird who snatches away souls. In Hungary, the owl is called the bird of death. This storyline continues right now in real stories from real people. I have collected a wealth of reports of owls showing up in conjunction with the death of a loved one. So many that they get their own chapter in this book.

Egypt

The ancient Egyptians believed that owls were guardians and protectors of the dead. This same tradition reappears across the Atlantic with the Aztecs (curiously, both cultures are pyramid builders). Many Egyptians also believed that when a person sees an owl, they will receive a message—the ever present meme of the owl as messenger.

Ancient Egyptian hieroglyph for night

The hieroglyph of an owl represented night, cold, and a state of passivity. The owl was used as the written mark for the sun after it had set, a time when the world was crossing through darkness. The hieroglyph representing an owl is unique because it shows the front of the owl's face. You can see both the eyes of the owl, while all other bird hieroglyphs are seen in profile, with only one eye showing. Owl mummies have been found throughout Egypt, often with their heads cut off, for reasons unknown.

Lakshmi

The Hindu religion has its own traditional owl symbolism, and unlike most of the world's dark mythologies, it is positive and good-natured. A white owl is the vahana, or mount, ridden by Lakshmi, the Hindu Goddess of wealth, fortune, and prosperity (both material and spiritual). She is wife of Vishnu and the embodiment of beauty. She brings good luck and protects her devotees from all kinds of misery and money-related sorrows. When depicted in art, her expression is always calm and loving. By keeping the white owl as her sacred vehicle, she teaches us to open our eyes to the light of the wisdom residing within us.

Athena and Minerva

In the West, we can trace the wise owl meme to Athena, the Greek goddess of wisdom. Her companion was the little owl, and that is the actual genus and species—the little owl, athene noctua. In latin, noctua means owl, so the literal translation for the little owl is the owl of Athena. This virgin goddess symbolized and embodied wisdom, so her little owl sidekick has taken on that quality too, even today. Athena is the companion of heroes and is the goddess of heroic endeavor. Beyond just wisdom, she also represents courage, inspiration, civilization, mathematics, and the arts.

The Roman goddess Minerva takes on Athena's role as the symbol of wisdom. Minerva is also depicted with an owl as her sacred companion, usually perched on her hand. Minerva is also a virgin goddess and is said to have the power to transform into an owl.

Lakshmi can be seen as a parallel goddess to Athena and Minerva. They all have owls and they also have a kind of buoyant optimism about them and their lore. These are three rare examples of the mythic owl being seen in a positive light.

The Parthenon, the ancient Temple of Athena, still stands in Athens, her namesake city (though it is not known which was named first, the city or the goddess). It sets proud on a hilltop known as the Acropolis. The structure, now almost 2,500 years old, was thought to have had families of little owls nesting within its roof lines. The owl's connection to Athena might be because these birds made her temple their home. Saying someone is "Bringing owls to Athens" is an old expression in Greece, a sarcastic way of saying they are doing something totally unnecessary.

The Parthenon itself was built atop the ruins of an older temple, which historians call the Pre-Parthenon or Older Parthenon. This earlier temple was destroyed in the Persian invasion of 480 BCE. The rebuilt temple is aligned to the star cluster Hyades. In Greek mythology, the Hyades were the five daughters of Atlas and half-sisters to the Pleiades. In the 5th century AD, the Parthenon was converted into a Christian church and dedicated to Christ's mother Mary, another virgin goddess.

The owl was a symbolic protector in ancient Greece. If an owl flew over Greek soldiers before a battle, they took it as a sign of victory. This good omen was seized upon by the Greek army, which began to keep a collection of owls hidden away, to be released over the soldiers in the hours before combat as a way to influence their superstitions.

David's The Death of Socrates

The Death of Socrates (1787) is a classical oil painting by Jacques Louis David. I have stood before this enormous canvas many times. It takes up an entire wall in the French Neoclassicism gallery at the Metropolitan Museum in New York City. This grand image depicts Socrates surrounded by his pupils in a gloomy dungeon at the moment before his death. He is reaching for a chalice of hemlock while giving his final lesson on the immortal soul.

Plato, who first used the term archetype, is also in the painting, hunched over in a mournful pose at the foot of his teacher Socrates. There is a student, Citro, seated on a simple bench next to Socrates with his hand on his thigh. Chiseled into this stone bench is an owl, with text that reads (in Greek) Athenaion, meaning "of Athens." Below this, David's signature. The artist was well versed in symbology, and this grand painting is all about wisdom and its convergence with death. So the owl, the symbol for Athens, is threefold appropriate.

Owl coin

The first widely minted coin in human history was known as the owl. It featured the profile of Athena on one side and a little owl on the other. This is where we get the term heads or tails—Athena's head on one side and the owl, with its tail prominently shown, on the other. The coin toss was used, then as now, as a way to randomly solve simple issues. This thick heavy silver coin, the four drachma, was the primary form of international trade for over 300 years, from 430 to 99 BCE. The present day Greek one-euro coin features the very same ancient Athenian owl on the tail's side.

Athenian coin from the fifth century BCE

The owl image on the tail's side also features the Greek letters AOE (alpha, theta, epsilon) which means Of the Athenians, or more simply, Athens. There is a sprig of olive leaves above and to the left of the owl's head, probably placed there to commemorate success in battle. There is also a crescent moon, depicting the owl's connection to the night. The crescent moon might also symbolize clairvoyance, knowing without thinking, and the feminine.

Are these ancient memes still at play today? Presently, the US dollar bill seems to hold the honor of the most widely traded form of currency in our civilization, so it plays the same role of the owl coin from ancient times. Looking closely at the front side of a paper one dollar bill, tucked in close to the numeral one in the upper right corner is a tiny speck of an owl—at least that's what it appears to be. All that can be seen is just a little owl-like head peaking above a crescent-shaped flourish that frames the numeral one. This tiny owl head might be nothing more than part of decorative motif in the background. A similar shape is seen repeating at other places on the bill. It is worth noting that, like the Athenian coin, the dollar bill has olive leaves above and left of the owl's head, and also a crescent.

President Theodore Roosevelt, ever the naturalist, stuffed, and mounted a snowy owl while still in his teens. It's rumored that he carried an Athenian owl coin in his pocket all throughout his Presidency. It was during the early years of the 20th century that the U.S. coins were redesigned, with a nod to the classical Greek design elements. From 1917 to 1930, the US quarter featured Lady Liberty, an obvious representation of Athena. She is standing in the same pose as a marble sculpture of Athena from the Parthenon. Both coins, the ancient Greek owl and this modern US quarter, feature the goddess Athena on the heads side. The tail side of the American quarter also has a bird, albeit an eagle. While this is a more masculine image than the owl, it also happens to be the symbol of Athena's father, Zeus.

Ancient Rome

Even though Minerva and her companion owl represented wisdom, ancient Roman superstitions also portrayed owls as harbingers of doom. For example, to hear the hoot of an owl foretold imminent death; this is typical of so much ancient folklore about owls. Romans saw owls as having magical powers, and by placing one of their feathers near someone as they slept, they would be prompted to reveal their secrets. And, nailing a dead owl to the door of a house would ward off evil.

The deaths of Julius Caesar, Augustus, Commodus Aurelius, and Agrippa were all said to have been predicted by an owl. "Yesterday, the bird of night did sit. Even at noonday, upon the market place, Hooting and shrieking." This quote from Shakespeare's Julius Caesar came as the conspirators plotted the death of their leader. This omen may be bit of old English folklore transposed onto a story of ancient Rome.

Owls as dark mythology

Strix was the ancient Roman word for owl or witch. The legend was that these evil women could turn into an owl, fly at night, and suck the blood of babies. Strixes are not vampires in the popular sense, meaning they've risen from the grave; instead they are demons that can transform into an owl-like creature, and they are most often women. This is a good example of the sinister aspects to the ancient owl lore. Strix is also a genus of owls, this includes the largest owl on earth, the great gray owl. The Latin definition for Strix is a screech owl, an evil spirit, or witch. The ancient Greek word Strix means screecher or shrieking night-bird.

In some ancient Hebrew literature, Lilith was the first wife of Adam. She took on this role after he and Eve were evicted from The Garden. In old Jewish folklore, Lilith was symbolized by an owl, and her name in Hebrew means Night Monster. She was portrayed as an evil spirit who would steal children in the night. Lilith bore the children of Adam, all of them demons. The name Lilith is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls, among a long list of monsters and evil spirits.

Stealing babies is part of traditional Celtic fairy folklore as well as the modern UFO report. I have heard repeated accounts of parents panicking when their child is somehow missing from their crib. The police are called, a search takes place, and a few hours later the child is mysteriously found back in its crib. These nightmare events happen in the homes of abductees, sometimes in conjunction with UFO sightings.

Owls in the Bible

Owls get mentioned in the Bible around a dozen times, sometimes fewer, depending on how the text is translated. It is hard to find any significance to the treatment the owl in the Bible, and it seems to be used as nothing more than a spooky adjective. There are some poetic passages where the author is trying to describe something as gloomy, and the owl gets plugged in as a kind of dismal set piece.

Owls show up as something awful in the book of Job 30:29 (KJV): “I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls.” (Although some translations will say: “I am a brother of jackals and a companion of ostriches.”) This line is in among a long litany of passages that are about as depressing and miserable as anything ever written. It is prefaced by lines like: “When I looked for good, then evil came unto me: and when I waited for light, there came darkness.” (Job 30:26) Owls are part of Job’s dark night of the soul. These morbid passages, according to many scholars, are signs of clinical depression on the part of the author.

Owls get used again in the Book of Isaiah for similarly dreary descriptions. Isaiah 34:8 (NIV) begins: “For the Lord has a day of vengeance, a year of retribution...” and a bunch of really grim stuff follows, including: “The desert owl and screech owl will possess it; the great owl and the raven will nest there. God will stretch out over Edom the measuring line of chaos and the plumb line of desolation.” (34:11) “And thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof: and it shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls.” (34:13 KJV) Owls in the Bible are repeatedly equated to gloom and doom, and this mythos continues to this day.

The Bible also says not to eat owls. The Lord told Moses and Aaron what animals are okay to eat and what are unclean, or detestable. The reason Kosher Jews don't eat pork is because of these passages in the Old Testament. But, if you read further, God also says not to eat owls, and he's pretty specific about this. The book of Leviticus 11:13 (ESV) says: “And these you shall detest among the birds; they shall not be eaten; they are detestable: ... the little owl, ...the short-eared owl, (17) the barn owl, the tawny owl...” (18)

According to these passages God says you shouldn't eat a big long list of detestables. Beyond just pigs and owls; these include other birds, bats, animals, and insects.

Owls in fairy tales

Grimm's Fairy Tales was first published in 1812 by the German brothers, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm. The brothers traveled Europe, transcribing folklore and fairy tales from common villagers. These included Little Red Riding Hood, Hansel and Gretel, Cinderella, and Snow White.

In the first edition of their book, there is a strange little story simply titled The Owl. This tale is barely two pages long, and exceedingly simple. A great horned owl flies into a barn, and all the townsfolk believe it is a monster. Anyone who enters the barn and sees it runs away in terror. The bravest men in the village don't have the courage even to approach the bird. After they all failed, the locals all contemplate their doom.

And now there was no one left who dared to put himself in such danger. “The monster,” said they, “has poisoned and mortally wounded the very strongest man among us, by snapping at him and just breathing on him! Are we, too, to risk our lives?” They took counsel as to what they ought to do to prevent the whole town being destroyed... So they set fire to the barn at all four corners, and with it the owl was miserably burnt.[\[38\]](#)

This is a simplistic example of the owl as something horrible in folklore. Curiously, I found this account on page 123 in the version used as reference. 123 has been a highly synchronistic number in this research and in my life.

Old English owl myths

In England up until the nineteenth century or so, many people believed that the screech of an owl heard out the window of a sick person meant imminent death. Like ancient Rome, the English also had a custom of nailing an owl to a door to ward off evil.

Just before the murder of Duncan in Shakespeare's Macbeth, Lady Macbeth says, "It was the owl that shrieked, the fatal bellman, Which gives the stern'st good-night."

In modern times, the owl still makes a symbolic appearance at weddings in Scotland. A live owl is sometimes required to be present at the ceremony, where its role is to deliver the wedding rings to the best man. At the start of the service, the owl sits on its perch at the back of the church, alongside its trainer. When the best man is asked for the rings, he turns, and the owl is released and silently flies the length of the church to settle on his arm. On one of the bird's legs there is a leather strap carrying the two rings for the bride and groom. These are untied and handed to the officiating priest. In this way, when the young couple put on the rings, they are being blessed with the wisdom of the owl.[\[39\]](#)

The Americas

Throughout the Americas, the native cultures saw the owl as equated with sorcery, evil, and death. To an Apache, dreaming of an owl meant that death was approaching. In the Cherokee traditions, it is said that if you are outside in the daylight and an owl flies over your head, a family member or loved one would die within days. Cherokee shamans saw screech owls as able to bring sickness as punishment. The Hopis see the burrowing owl as their god of the dead, the guardian of fires and tender of all underground things, including seed germination. Their name for the burrowing owl is Ko'ko, which means watcher of the dark.

The northwest coast Kwagulth people believe that owls represent both a deceased person and their newly-released soul. The Kwakiutl Indians were convinced that owls were the souls of people and should therefore not be harmed, for when an owl was killed, the person to whom the soul belonged would also die. California Newuks believe that after death, the brave and virtuous became great horned owls. The wicked, however, were doomed to become barn owls. In the Sierras, native peoples believed the great horned owl captured the souls of the dead and carried them to the underworld. The Hocak people will tell misbehaving children, the owls will get you. There is an old saying in Mexico that is still in use today, When the owl cries, the Indian dies.

Not all of these Native American owl traditions are linked to death. Many mythologies are rich with themes of bravery, confidence, and warrior rituals. Owls can be seen as both guardians and messengers. In Arizona, Zuni mothers will place an owl feather next to their baby to help it sleep, again a symbol of the night. In Hawaiian mythology, Puapueo was a benevolent deity who organized the owls on the island of Kauai to chase the mischievous Menehune, tiny leprechaun-like creatures, back into the caves and forest.

In South America, the Mayans saw owls as the symbol of death. The Mayan underworld had nine levels, the lowest ruled by Ah Puch, the God of Death. Ah Puch was symbolized by three animals, the moan bird, the dog, and the owl. The Aztecs also saw the owl as a ruler of the underworld, and holding godly powers as messengers of the Place of Fright. The Aztec god of death, Mictlantecuhtli, was often depicted with owls. The Gran Chaco is a native culture in South America which held that the voice of an owl brings the message, Beware! I am bringing harm to you![\[40\]](#)

Navajo ranger and an owl t-shirt

I had the chance to speak with retired police officer Jonathan Redbird Dover. He worked for over a decade on the Navajo reservation, and his beat was the four-corners area of the desert southwest. He spoke at a UFO conference, along with his partner, about how the tribal police have traditionally been quite open to paranormal reports on the reservation. They investigated claims of UFOs, mysterious entities, and Bigfoot just like they would any other crime scene.

We stood together in an open courtyard and I asked him about the belief system surrounding the owl in his culture. Much of what he shared matched what I had already found in my research. He said owls are seen as something dark and foreboding, as omens of death, and are considered wicked. I told him about my owl research, and that I was finding something much more playful and mystical. As I said that, an attractive young woman walked by with a huge owl graphic filling the entire front of her t-shirt.

I looked at the officer and said, “See what my life is like.” We both recognized the humor in that moment, this tidy little synchronicity making its point for me.

Shadowed by an owl

It was at this same week long UFO conference in Arizona in 2013 that I asked pretty much every person I met if they'd ever had any odd experiences with owls. Early on at the event, I had asked that question of author and researcher Rosemary Ellen Guiley. She shared some interesting owl experiences while researching sacred sites in New York State. The next day, she ran up to me and said she had overheard someone talking about owls and I simply had to find him. She described him as a big, young Native American who was covered in tattoos. This did not match the typical appearance of the attendees at this conference, who were mostly blue-haired senior citizens, so I figured this guy should be easy to spot.

A few days later, well after the daily conference events had ended, probably nearing midnight, I saw him. He was sitting quietly in a chair, all alone at the end of a long empty hallway. I walked up and introduced myself. I asked what brought him to a UFO event like this. He told me he wasn't attending the conference, only that he was using the internet on his phone. He was a member of the Yavapai nation, and the conference center was on the reservation and open at all times to the tribal members.

I sat in the chair next to him and told him that I was trying to research unusual owl experiences, I said that someone had overheard him talking about owls, and I was curious. Little by little, he told me his story. A few years earlier, he had the unsettling experience of an owl that would follow him wherever he went. He calmly explained that it hung around his house and it would always be there, and always looking down at him. If he was at a friend's house, a store, or at a gas station, the owl would follow him, as if it were keeping watch. It would just be perched there, staring at him—and this wasn't out in the countryside, this was in urban Phoenix.

He got so frustrated with the owl that he would throw rocks at it, trying to scare it off. When he told this to his mother, she was filled with dread. She warned him not to mess with any owls, they were powerful medicine and it could mean something terrible was about to happen. The owl holds an ominous place among the totem animals of his native lore.

I asked him what he was doing during this time of his life. He calmly told me he had been involved with a dark element in the urban gangs of Phoenix. He was swallowed up in the drug culture, dealing and selling among a dangerous set of players. I asked him about his mindset at that time, and he explained that he was young and wild, and would never back down from any kind of fight. He didn't care if he lived or died, and he was amazed he survived those years.

It was during this time of his heaviest gang activity that ominous owl was following him the closest. Eventually, he got arrested and while in prison he met a mentor of sorts who helped him see the value of his own life. He was clean when he got out of prison and the owl hasn't shown up since.

Aleister Crowley, aliens and owls

The community of UFO enthusiasts is quite small, and their interests tend to wander all over the map, intersecting with a wide range of other esoteric seekers. Within this tiny group, few people have attained the legendary status than that of British occultist Aleister Crowley (1875-1947). Separating the myth from this bigger than life character is nearly impossible, especially when using the internet as a research tool. Crowley was responsible for founding the religion and philosophy of Thelema. This led to his establishing the Ordo Templi Orientis, an initiatory fraternity that used magical rituals and ceremonies to impart spiritual teachings.

He was infamous for the use of ritual sex magic and hallucinogens to achieve states of altered consciousness. Beyond just an occultist, he was (among a lot of other things) a poet, painter, playwright, novelist, mountaineer, world traveler, Freemason, yoga master, ritual magician, openly bisexual, spy for the British Empire, and heroin addict. His mother used the term beast to describe her unruly son. Crowley later referred to himself (with much glee) as the Great Beast.

At some point around 1919, Crowley drew a little pencil sketch of a big headed entity that has come to be known as Lam. This drawing has been a point of contention for researchers because very little is known of its source. It emerged during a period when Crowley was living in America, specifically when he engaged in a six-month long magical episode known as The Amalantrah Working. This involved a combination of occult rituals, sex, and drugs to induce a visionary experience, and this drawing is said to depict a being summoned during these arcane rites.

This image was featured as the frontispiece for an edition of Helena Blavatsky's The Voice of the Silence with commentary from Crowley on the same page. This eerie sketch seems to be titled The Way, with text below as an explanation: 'LAM is the Tibetan word for Way or Path...' It was later stated that the figure was Crowley's 'guru' and 'painted from life.'[\[41\]](#)

The similarity of Lam to the prototypical gray alien is pretty obvious, and the subject of endless speculation among the more conspiratorial UFO enthusiasts. Although tenuous, it has become a sort of internet "truism" that Crowley literally manifested a gray alien during an occult sex ritual. Blogger and researcher Regan Lee (one of those maybe people) pointed out something unusual about this sketch. If you look just above Lam's brow, you can see the shape of the eyes of a gray alien in the shaded texture on the forehead. Once you notice that, it's hard to see the smaller eyes any more. Things get weirder. When the image is reversed, a stylized image of a horned owl emerges. This insight came from author and researcher Christopher Knowles (another one of those maybe people). Granted, at this point, I'm seeing owls everywhere, but let me add that the name Crowley has OWL embedded right in it, as does Knowles.

The Shroud of Turin

An owl emerges, well two owls really, in another mythic image, the Shroud of Turin. Like seeing the owl in Lam's head, the power of this image requires a photographic reversal to bring out the details. This image is said to be none other than Jesus himself, supposedly imprinted onto the cloth that covered his lifeless body after the Crucifixion.

These two owls (one much clearer than the other) are seen on the Shroud, flanking Jesus on his right and left, seemingly perched on his elbows. Unlike the representation of Jesus which emerges in the negative, the owls are seen more clearly in the actual cloth, without the photographic reversal.

The shape of these owls are found within the symmetrical triangular stains on the shroud. These were created by fire damage when the church, Sainte Chapelle in Chambéry France, burned in 1532, the whispered lore being that the fire was started by Satan himself. The shroud was held in a box on the altar and some silver fittings melted and damaged a corner of the shroud. The shroud was folded when it happened, creating the stained pattern. The patches, the rounded white triangles, were sewn in place by nuns to repair the shroud. These created the sides of the owls.

The Shroud of Turin

I can't help but see the resemblance between the Shroud of Turin and the Burney Relief, the latter being an ancient clay tablet showing a curvy female Babylonian demon, also flanked by two sentinel owls.

Queen of the night

If you google the words owl and goddess, the Burney Relief will come up at the top of the list. I know because I've been obsessed with these words and any clues to how they might connect. I was in London in 2014, and my hotel was just a few blocks away from the British Museum, home to the Burney Relief. Curiously, I was staying at the Hotel Athens—Athens named after Athena, the Greek goddess with a little owl. Anyway, I walked to the museum, and found the clay tablet within minutes. Given all that has been written about it, I was surprised that it's rather small.

The Burney Relief

What I saw behind the glass was a Mesopotamian terra-cotta plaque depicting a nude woman with wings and talons for feet. She is perched upon two reclining lions, and flanked by two owls. The relief, also known as The Queen of the Night, has been dated at between 1800 and 1750 BCE. It originates from somewhere in southern Iraq, but the exact site where it was found is unknown. There is much debate if she is a goddess or a demon. Scholars wonder if the winged-woman represents Lilith, Lilitu, or Inanna. Or, it might be Ishtar, goddess of sexual love and war, or perhaps her sister and rival, the goddess Ereshkigal, who ruled the underworld.

Beyond her creepy owl feet, there isn't much that makes this image all that ominous, let alone demonic. There are ancient tales of shape shifting owl ladies flying around at night, drinking the blood of babies, and that is indeed sinister. If this woman with owl talons for feet really does represent Lilith, then this is a good example of the same dark mythos being very much alive nearly 4,000 years later. Owls as a symbol for something ominous are still showing up today in spooky Hollywood movies and children's Halloween decorations.

The hybrid bird goddess is one of the earliest symbols of any kind. Figurines with characteristics similar to Ishtar and Athena have been cataloged and dated to well before recorded history, tracing back as far as 7,000 BCE. The true origins of these myths are unknown but open to endless speculation, making this kind of research a bottomless pit of wishy-washiness.

I recognize the temptation to cherry pick the deep pool of diverse owl mythology, then eagerly latch onto any conclusion that matches my own avenue of thought. It would be all too easy to make the map fit the territory. Still, there are a wealth of clues, and with them the challenge of finding the deeper meaning.

Owls are like puffy clouds on a summer afternoon. You can look up and see whatever you want. There is just so much mythology, folklore, and mysticism connected to the owl that anyone could come up with any conclusion that fits their mood. I know myself well enough to declare that I am not unbiased or neutral, and pretending that I am won't make it so. This has been a deeply personal exploration into the unknown.

I asked author Brad Steiger about the mythic lore of the owls. He replied:

The symbolism of the owl is so multifaceted and layered with the residue of so many cultures that any one interpretation is impossible. Even as a totem, the owl has different meanings depending upon the vision obtained during the Vision Quest. Using any animal as a universal symbol is nearly impossible. The lamb represents Jesus Christ to one individual and lamb chops to a hungry meat eater.

Chapter 12: Owls as Archetype

We've used archetypal forms, from the dawn of man right through to today. There are ancient books ornamented with symbols and prehistoric cave walls are painted with symbols. Egyptian hieroglyphs are more than just a phonetic way to describe a spoken word, these are all symbols and they all mean something. Certain things have meant the same thing in the human psyche for all of eternity... it creates a thought form, which can be imbued with energy, and which can interact with your subconscious in the same way that a key can interact with a lock. Seeing an owl is seeing a symbol, and perhaps it can unlock something inside you. This archetypal symbol carries information and meaning much beyond simply a bird with big eyes.

—Jeff Harvey[\[42\]](#)

Pretty much all the research for this book involves asking this one question, “Have you ever had any odd owl experiences?” If you ask an abduction researcher that question, they'll say yes, and then they'll go on to describe typical screen memory events with owls showing up throughout their reports.

If you ask someone who's had the direct contact experience that same question, you might end up hearing some bizarre stories, weird stuff that goes way beyond the four-foot tall owl in the road at night. It's certainly not every abductee that will have these kinds of owl experiences, but it's enough that there is a pattern of what seems to be, as far as I can tell, real owls interacting with the abductees.

Dr. John Mack's 1994 book on UFO contact, Abduction, featured the extremely intense accounts of a man named Peter Faust (how's that for an archetypal name). I've talked on the phone with him only once, and we've shared a handful of emails over the years. Initially, I reached out to him during some of my darkest times as I tried to come to terms with my own memories. He's been wonderfully supportive and insightful, and I deeply appreciate his help.

An owl at Peter's door

As part of this book project I sent Peter an email asking him the same question I've been asking everyone—have you ever had any odd owl experiences? He replied:

That is what got me in the door, so to say, to begin looking at this in my life. When I lived in Hawaii, there was a big old owl (that's what I thought at the time) that would come to the sliding glass door off my bedroom at night. Of course under regression when I looked at the owl it was a whole other creature. So yeah, me and owls and ETs have a connection.

The owl described by Peter fits cleanly into the screen memory category, an image projected into his mind, presumably so he wouldn't be terrified of seeing a creepy gray alien. How this is done is a mystery, and why is an equally difficult question. Also of note is that it was an owl (or the image of an owl) that played the role of catalyst for Peter to begin looking at his bizarre life experiences. This matches the role of the owl in my own odyssey of awakening.

The question is, why owls? As noted earlier, the presentation of an owl could be nothing more than a convenient disguise. It's a common enough animal, especially at night. What a UFO researcher will say is that owls have great big eyes, similar to the big penetrating eyes of the aliens. They're choosing the owl as a sort of costume, because an owl matches the look of a gray alien. This has been repeated so many times that it has become a sort of dogma, a sort of truth. I question that we don't truly know why they are choosing the owl. The similarity to the big-eyed alien might be the reason for the screen image of the owl, but this just feels too simple.

I suspect that this contact experience has been ongoing throughout the entirety of human history, and the reverence for the owl in folklore and mythology can be traced back to experiences like what Peter described. The shamans and sages throughout time might have confronted similar owls, staring at them from their own doorways.

Perhaps the owl isn't chosen for its likeness to the gray alien, but because of its archetypal power. It's there so the experiencer can drink in some evocative essence. Does the owl imbue a deeper meaning beyond just a bird with big eyes? The symbolic power of the owl might have been implanted within our psyche at the dawn of human existence.

The idea of the owl as archetype jumped out at me while listening to UFO experiencer Jacquelin Smith channeling the spirit of an owl. The concept of the archetype seemed like a message specifically meant for me. Dipping into the symbolic lore of the owl has provided some of the juiciest clues along my path. Jacquelin, speaking as an owl, said of the aliens:

They are using the owl symbolically, but the owl is still the owl frequency, to mirror to us in an archetypal sense, because humans think of owls in a certain way, right? There is an archetypal image that is mirrored to the humans, this goes on at a subconscious level and connects with the human's genetic memory bank. Because humans think with symbols, they are touching us on that level, and that goes back to the beginning of human kind, and how we see owls.

Plato and Jung

Archetype is an elusive concept. There are ideas and themes that have resonated within the core of humanity throughout time, and they continually bubble up to the surface. In ancient Greece, Plato introduced the term archetype to define a philosophical idea, referring to pure forms which embody the fundamental characteristics of a thing. These pure forms are invisible to the eye, but they exist in the realm of their idealized states. If our souls have existed eternally, we would then retain a memory to recognize them. Plato contends that all the feelings that accompany our existence are but recollections of what our souls already know.

Carl Jung later built upon Plato's ideas about the archetype. He saw the archetype as psychological, framing it as a collectively inherited unconscious idea or image. The archetype is universally present in both our individual and collective psyches.

The collective unconscious is a unique component to Jung's ideas about the mind, it serves as a form of psychological inheritance. It contains all of the knowledge and experiences we share as a species. He proposed that archetypes exist within the collective unconscious. According to Jung, archetypes are unlearned, innate, universal, and hereditary. These function as a way to organize how we translate into visible reality the world within us and the world around us.

The owl has been scratched into ancient cave walls and it also sits on the shoulder of young Harry Potter. It is an archetype that we hold within us and has the mythic power of the ages.

Across all the world's traditions, owls are seen as messengers from another realm. Their ability to see into the darkness is a metaphor for their roles as this gatekeeper or interloper. The message they deliver might be to confirm the reality of these other realms. Owls are wise and foreboding, and these same attributes could also be said of the alien too. Are these elusive visitors using the image of the owl because we can tap into this grand lineage of arcane meaning?

I can't help but imagine the image of an owl standing before the ancient shaman at the entrance to his cave, just as it stood before Peter's big sliding glass door. Trying to unravel the source of an archetype is like trying to know the source of a dream. All one can say is that there is a source out there. To say any more would be folly.

If the abduction experience is something that has been with humanity from its inception, could it be that the mythic power of the owl grew out of the screen memories of the ancients? If people have always had this experience, then they've been sharing it around the fire with their fellow villagers across the ages. Looking at it this way, the owl archetype might very well have been generated by the aliens. Whitley Strieber's owl vision on the snowy window sill could be just another ancient campfire story meant to embed itself into the psyches of anyone listening.

A question arises—is the image of the owl something the aliens use as a sort of “default” setting for deceiving the abductee? Is there a reason the owl is used sometimes and deer is used at other times? Is there an archetypal reason one image might be chosen over another? Is it the abductee that's generating the owl as a screen memory, as if their own psyche needs one image more than another?

Could it be that the human psyche reacts instantly to the presence of the alien, and a sort of defense mechanism takes over, plucking the owl image out of hidden corners of the human psyche? Is the owl image generated to protect the observer? This makes some sense, because one's sanity might be in jeopardy just by looking at an alien in their proximity. I have spoken to more than a few people who have seen an alien in what would be ordinary waking consciousness, and what they describe is something so distressing that it produces a sort of existential agony.

If it's the abductee who creates the costume, is it being released from the ether an archetypal pure form in the way Plato would describe it? There are no easy answers to any of these questions, but I suspect it's more a blurring of multiple points rather than one simplistic explanation. For instance, when an owl spirit stands at the door of the shaman's hut, is this shaman about to be abducted and taken aboard a flying craft? And when the abductee sees a giant owl standing outside his window, is he about to be initiated into some deeper form of psychic knowing? I am unable to answer either question, but I recognize the overlapping of these two mythic apparitions.

Jim Sparks sees an owl as a symbol

Jim Sparks (a pen name) is an author and abductee with a seemingly endless inventory of experiences, all remembered consciously. He is a somewhat controversial figure in this field because he simply seems to have too many memories. When asked about the communication with symbols, Jim replied:

They create holograms or images that literally hang in the air. For lack of a better explanation, I call it a hologram. Sometimes before an abduction, not always, I would get the courtesy of a symbol just before being pulled—I like calling it being pulled [as opposed to] abducted—to let me know what kind of abduction it would be. An example, a hologram of an owl would appear. When I would see something like that, that would tell me it's time for school.

In its simplest form, the owl is a symbol for education. The image of a cartoon owl with a little graduation cap is commonplace in elementary school classrooms at the end of each year; the wise owl as an allegory for education. This all goes back to the wisdom goddess Athena and her owl.[\[43\]](#)

Owl as spirit animal

If an abduction researcher is hearing repeated stories of four-foot tall owls showing up in the presence of contact events, the assumption is that these are screen memories. If the same researcher hears repeated stories of seemingly normal owls (in size and behavior) in the presence of an abductee, they might conclude that it's merely a coincidence.

On the other hand, if the village shaman was asked to help comfort a young tribal member who was seeing giant owls at the door of his teepee, he would look at these issues differently than the modern abduction researcher. The owl might be something much more enigmatic than just a convenient disguise. The owl could be seen in its role as a mythic totem, a manifestation of something symbolic or emblematic.

Like the archetype, looking at the owl as a totem forces the observer to look within for clues. The owl as a spirit guide is powerful medicine throughout all the world's sacred traditions. Beyond its physical presence, the owl represents an idea: wisdom, shape-shifting, and second sight. Owls are symbolic of seeing into the darkness, the unknown, or the unconscious. They are guides that stand at the gateway to hidden realms. They represent a life in transition, messengers of change and a call to explore the unknown. All of this might ring true for both the UFO abductee or the shamanic initiate.

Seeing an owl on a dark lonely road or peering in through a window at night might be unusual, but not impossible. The whole event could be easily dismissed by the abductee. Deer, raccoons, and cats are also commonly reported, and these all have big nocturnal eyes and each could be shrugged off as something normal. It gets more bizarre—clowns and Jesus show up as screen memories too, and each has a spirit lore and an archetypal presence that might serve as a clue to the abductee on their journey into these unknown realms. This journey might be on board a flying saucer, to an alternate reality, or to a deeper part within the initiate's own psyche.

Seeing a deer has a feminine mythic power. As a totem it implies gentleness, moving through life's obstacles with grace and gratitude. Deer is a symbol of balance and a return to the forest. The Roman goddess Diana, and her Greek counterpart Artemis, are both virgins and both are depicted with a fawn. Diana was the woodland goddess, having the power to talk to and control animals. She also represents the moon and birthing, and is often portrayed with a moon crown, symbol of the night and a woman's monthly cycle. She didn't much like men, and lived in the forest with her water nymphs, all of whom, like Diana, had taken a vow of chastity. Anytime I come across someone named Diana in this research I look for any hint that she's playing the role of a woodland goddess. (In this book, there is a story of a wounded owl rescued by a woman named Diana.)

Raccoons wear a mask, and as a spirit guide they represent the disguise. The bandit is bold and confident. They are telling the observer to seek guidance, to be curious and to question without fear.

Cats, like owls, are strongly symbolic of what hides in the darkness—or the unknown. I've heard more than one person say that their cat can see into other dimensions. Cats explore in the night, they are watchful, independent, and psychic. They are associated with mystery and occult magic.

Clowns are the personification of the Trickster. Jesus is about as heavily laden with symbolic power as anything in the western world. I have read accounts of a naked man wearing a giant oversized cowboy hat showing up as a screen memory. I'm not quite sure how to interpret such an overtly masculine image except maybe as the flip-side to the divine feminine of the deer. Each of these screen memories hold a symbolic power that might be meant specifically for the observer. Or, I might be reading way too much into this, and trying to untangle a hodge-podge of clues that lead nowhere.

Mary Midgley and the owl

In her memoir, Owl of Minerva, British author and philosopher Mary Midgley wrote:

I have borrowed the owl for my title from Hegel, who is well known to have remarked that, 'the owl of Minerva spreads its wings only with the falling of the dusk.' This is a potent and mysterious symbol that might have various meanings. But the thought for which I want to use it as that of wisdom, and therefore philosophy, comes into its own when things become dark and difficult rather than clear and straightforward. That—it seems to me—is why it is so important.

Midgley goes on to lament that too many thinkers only want to attend to what is clear, and they turn their backs on things that are dark and doubtful. She is eager to look beyond the brightly lit successes of science, and instead explore the dark landscapes of meaning and thought.[\[44\]](#)

It seems to me that we have here the old story of the man who keeps looking for his car keys under the same lamp-post. Someone asks him, 'Is that where you dropped them?' 'No,' he replies, 'but it's a much easier place to look.' That analogy plays out in the realm of UFO research too, with the pragmatic investigator staying only under the brightly lit lamp-post, while the core of the mystery is somewhere off in the darkness.

Midgley looks to the owl as guide into this shadow realm. Owls, being associated with the night, are used in many cultures as symbols for two things—first for death, and second, rather differently, for wisdom. Going into the dark brings danger. But, if you have to go out, then surely it is wise to have with you a creature that can penetrate the darkness.

The owl, by this interpretation, is a companion for any traveler stepping off the path and entering the darkest part of the forest. One should expect the owl to show up, either symbolically or literally, whenever a seeker digs into the deepest mysteries. If this plays out to its fullest, the screen memory of a four-foot tall owl might mean the observer is being told that their journey is difficult rather than clear and straightforward.

Animal symbols will show up at certain times, almost like reality is a dream and animals can be placed into the dream when needed.

This short little statement rings true. It came in an email from a man named David who was describing the role of the owl shortly after the death of his father-in-law. I sense that the scriptwriters of reality can easily pencil in symbolic imagery right into the storyline of our lives. If they need to punctuate something within the narrative, they'll just add whatever is required for the desired effect. What I also see in that statement is simply changing the word animal to either UFO or synchronicity, and the message would ring just as true.

From some shamanic perspectives, if a person is experiencing hellishly terrifying abductions, then owls popping up should be no surprise. The ominous totem matches the menacing experience. This owl medicine could be seen part of a transformative experience, using the trauma to prod the abductee (or initiate) to become a wise elder, shaman, or a teacher of sacred traditions. If someone is fully engaged and grappling with something as elusive as UFO abductions, the owl should be all over it in every way.

The somewhat nebulous ideas of archetypes and totems might be intellectually stimulating, but a real owl is something very concrete. The experience of seeing an owl along with a UFO (or something equally mystical) gives a spiritual authority to a mere critter. Sometimes the arrival of a sacred animal has implications that can seem elusive, and other times it can be quite obvious.

Orcas in Puget Sound

Something very unusual happened on Tuesday October 29, 2013: approximately three dozen orcas surrounded a commuter ferry as it crossed Puget Sound, from Seattle to Bainbridge Island. This ferry was carrying sacred tribal artifacts, returning them to the ancestral home of Chief Sealth, also known as Chief Seattle. These items had been dug up nearly 60 years earlier from the winter village for the Suquamish tribe and home of Chief Seattle. Since that time they had been on display in a Seattle museum.

Suquamish Tribal Chairman Leonard Forsman just happened to be onboard the ferry that day, he was returning home to the island after an unrelated event. He spoke about watching the pod of killer whales, "They were pretty happily splashing around, flipping their tails in the water," he said. "We believe they were welcoming the artifacts home."

Here we have an event that made the national news involving a sacred animal, and none of the headlines shied away from the outright mystical implications. Even the usually dry prose of the Associated Press hinted that this was something magical.

The orcas, like the owls, are animals considered devoid of any higher consciousness by the watchdogs of our consensus reality. But nonetheless they are showing up as totems at an important moment, they are presenting themselves as a beautiful example of this attuned symbolic power. This wasn't a dream vision of orcas, they were physically there, playing the role of escort for something sacred on its journey home.[\[45\]](#)

Archetype summary

The overall UFO mystery has such a sweeping strangeness that overlaps with so many other arcane subjects that it feels impossible to leave anything out of this big bucket of weirdness. The enigma is complicated and bottomless, forcing me to examine anything with even a hint of relevance. Looking into the owl's symbolic and archetypal lore has offered up some of the most engaging insights of this journey.

During this investigation, I have repeatedly asked myself, why owls? I may have gotten an answer. The owl as archetype seems to be the cleanest overall solution to this puzzle. When looking at it this way, everything seems to click into place. What is so striking is that the idea of the archetype was given to me through a soft-spoken woman who channeled the higher spirit of the owl itself.

Chapter 13: Owls in Pop Culture

The artist's task is to save the soul of mankind; and anything less is a dithering while Rome burns.... It is the artists, who are self-selected for being able to journey into The Other, and if the artists cannot find the way, then the way cannot be found.

—Terence McKenna

Our new mythology

When you look up myth in the dictionary one of the meanings is, “a widely held but false belief or idea.” The rest of the definitions are similarly dismissive. The conventional idea of myth is that it's a fallacy, an old fairy-tale in a book on a shelf. Joseph Campbell argued that myth is instead something alive and vital. He said, “Mythology is not a lie, mythology is poetry, it is metaphorical.”[\[46\]](#)

There is an assumption that we are adrift in an age without myth, but I see exactly the opposite. We are instead awash in myth, it's emerging out of movies, television, and comic books. Our pop culture entertainment, crass as it might be, is dripping with mythic power.

Academics might sit together in a symposium and ponder the source and evolution of ancient folklore, asking such questions as how stories traveled from Egypt to Greece and then to Rome. But why aren't they looking at what is happening now? Hollywood is churning out a new mythology by mining our prehistoric past as well as our tabloid headlines. There is a feverish power in our pop culture, and this is a reflection of ourselves. Our new mythology includes UFOs in the same way our ancient lore includes owls.

The first instance in our popular culture which the owl was directly connected with the UFO abduction phenomenon was in the 1987 best-selling book, Communion, written by Whitley Strieber. It is impossible to overstate the cultural impact of this popular book. In the following quarter of a century, the idea of the owl being some sort of stand-in for the prototypical big-eyed gray alien has subtly seeped its way into our present day folklore. This is in sharp contrast to the actual cover of that book, which was anything but subtle—the image of that iconic gray alien is forever seared into the consciousness of our pop culture, as instantly recognized as Ronald McDonald or Santa Claus.

Strieber had the elusive memory of an owl looking in at him from his bedroom window. When he and his wife checked the spot where the owl should have been standing, there was undisturbed snow, making the physical reality of that owl impossible. Nonetheless, the mythic reality was there. Strieber seems to have had the same owl experience that the sages and mystics have had throughout time. He was tapping into something universal, and it seems that Hollywood has been tapping into his first-person story.

The Fourth Kind

In 2011, I received an extremely well-written personal report from a young man named Kevin. In it he describes several odd experiences, including a disturbing missing time event shared by him and a close friend while driving across the desert. There are no UFOs in his experiences, but what he described clearly matches what gets reported by abductees.

We started an email correspondence and there is something that happened in this exchange. Kevin began to confide with me in a way that I have come to recognize. People will share things with me that they may never have told anyone else. I end up playing a sympathetic role in the lives of some people, and I take this role seriously. I'm not a psychiatrist or any kind of trained professional, so it feels like all I can do is listen carefully.

It was during this email exchange that I asked Kevin the same question I ask everybody else: had he ever had any odd experiences with owls. Here was his reply: "When that movie, The Fourth Kind, came out, and I saw the trailer for it, I nearly lost my mind."

The Fourth Kind is a 2009 horror film about UFO abductions. It used a lot of creepy owl imagery as part of its plot, clearly portraying the owl as a screen memory implanted by sinister aliens. Here is more of what Kevin wrote:

All my life I've had weird experiences with owls. Especially great snowy owls. All over. Places they shouldn't have been. And a lot of them when I was driving by myself. Many of those times when I could have lost time and never noticed it. White owls have sat outside my window. They've been in my room. They've flown right in front of my car several times, a few times looking impossibly huge. I used to tell people about the owls.

One thing was that people didn't believe that I saw so many white owls and that I saw them in such weird places. Another thing was that I was always alone when I saw them. They both excited me and made me very, VERY afraid.

When I saw the trailer for that movie, I became very frightened. But I was intrigued. I downloaded the movie and watched it by myself one night. That was a huge mistake. I didn't sleep that night. I didn't sleep the next night, either. And by the third night, I was dreaming about owls and aliens. I was a wreck for a couple of weeks after that. I was afraid.

...I've seen all sorts of abduction stuff, read lots of books, studied up on that sort of thing for many, many years. But I've never reacted like that.

Kevin is reporting what I have heard over and over again, that he's been seeing owls with a regularity that goes way beyond mere chance. He describes a confusing mix of what are probably real owls (flying in front of his car) and what might well be screen memories (seeing them in his room). That movie obviously had a triggering effect, but it's probably impossible to untangle the elements and truly know what might be hidden.

The plot of The Fourth Kind is centered around a therapist and her clients, many who have apparently suffered UFO abductions. When the movie was released, there was a promotional flurry claiming that this was a true story. The film begins with the title card "supported by actual case material" and that it contained "actual footage" from case histories. Sadly, this was a publicity stunt—the film was a work of fiction. It was dismissed with contempt by the UFO research community, and most everybody saw it as exploitative and inaccurate.

Still, I have to assume that the script writers flipped through a few UFO books for inspiration and found some owl references from abduction reports. Whitley Strieber's Communion, with his account of an owl out his window on the night of his initial abduction memories, was most probably one of these books, and these spooky owls became a central motif in the plot. I see this as a clear example of UFO literature influencing Hollywood. What seems more interesting is the emotional reaction Kevin had to the owl imagery in this movie.

Not of This Earth

An owl plays its standard movie role as the harbinger of doom in Roger Corman's 1957 low-budget thriller, Not of This Earth. The film begins with a young woman walking on a darkened street. She hears a hooting owl, we see stock footage of an owl, and a few seconds later she is confronted by a human-seeming alien. He takes off his dark glasses and zaps her with his eyes. She passes out and this alien takes her blood.

So, we have an owl showing up in the moments leading up to an alien contact, perfectly personifying the UFO/owl mythos from my research. I see no conspiracy. This B-movie simply uses the owl as a bit of spooky foreshadowing, and that's that. Owls are no stranger to creepy movies; they are as iconic as cobwebs and creaky doors. Much like this film, the 1935 classic The Bride of Frankenstein has an owl cameo early in the story, a wonderful vignette of classic horror.

But on a deeper level, this plays out in what gets reported by real people. Some experiencers will see an owl in the moments leading up to a UFO sighting, or they'll hear an owl out their window, and the next moment they have little gray aliens in their bedroom and these may zap them with their eyes. These reports are eerily consistent, and they point to a much stranger aspect within the overall mystery.

The alien in the film is played as the quintessential Man in Black. He wears a black suit and strange dark sunglasses. He speaks in a halting cadence and drives a big black car. In the first few minutes of the film there is mind-control, penetrating eyes, and even telepathic communication. This alien is here on Earth, doing creepy medical procedures to unwitting humans in an effort to save his dying race back on his devastated home planet. All these elements are part of the modern UFO lore, but were virtually unknown to the general public in 1957.

Twin Peaks

The owls are not what they seem.

This line was spoken by a mysterious giant to FBI special agent Dale Cooper, played by Kyle MacLachlan, as he lays bleeding on the floor in episode 8 of Twin Peaks. This episode was directed by the series creator, David Lynch, and aired on September 30, 1990.

This show was purposely meant to be eerie and open-ended, littered with clues that seemingly lead nowhere. This line about the owls is an elusive tidbit within the overall narrative, but where did it come from? Lynch is notoriously tight-lipped about his inspirations and the hidden meanings within his works. The show got progressively weirder as it went on, with hints of UFOs and government conspiracies.

Like The Fourth Kind, the references to owls and UFOs in Twin Peaks can most probably be traced back to Strieber's Communion. The scriptwriters for Twin Peaks must have been aware of the eerie mood created by Strieber in his first-person re-telling of UFO contact experiences. Communion came out three years before the pilot episode of Twin Peaks, allowing one to inspire the other. Both the TV series and Strieber's book are curiously similar in their elusive mood, both generate lots of questions but very few answers.

The character of Major Briggs (played by Don S. Davis) shows up in Twin Peaks on a classified investigation for the Air Force. He even says he was involved in Project Blue Book, a real life Air Force report on UFOs that publicly concluded: “There was no evidence indicating that sightings categorized as ‘unidentified’ were extraterrestrial vehicles.” Most researchers dismiss Blue Book as an orchestrated effort by the government to deny the UFO reality. According to Major Briggs, a signal was picked up by deep space monitoring equipment, but it wasn’t coming from outer space. Instead, it was emanating from the forest surrounding the little town of Twin Peaks. So we have an overt UFO thread woven into the series. Major Briggs gets abducted in the second season, though not by aliens, and is interrogated about the meaning of the owl cave.

Owls are seen as a harbinger of death in most Native American traditions, and this lore was interwoven throughout Twin Peaks. There is an evil character in the series known as Killer BOB (played by Frank Silva); he’s a demon that possesses people and commits murder. The name is capitalized because it’s an acronym, it means Beware Of Bob. Like so many tales from the Native Americans, BOB can shape-shift into an owl.

What is of note is that David Lynch is an ardent meditator, and he’s more than hinted that he gets inspiration from this non-ordinary state of consciousness. If these symbolic owls emerged from his travels inward, he’s not saying. The series is meant to be obscure, so it’s hard to see any literal meaning to the line The owls are not what they seem. Any meaning might be metaphoric.

Fire in the Sky

Niara Terela Isley has had lifelong abduction experiences. She’s also had the added trauma of the MILABs (Military Abductions), along with a horrifying set of experiences while serving in the Air Force. She authored a book, Facing the Shadow, Embracing the Light (2013) where she shares both the harrowing events and her spiritual path as she moves beyond the suffering.

When I asked Niara about any odd owl experiences, she told me a story of when she was about nine years old. She woke up one morning with pain behind her right ear. She touched it and felt a defined little bump. She was scared, wondering if she had cancer and was going to die. Then she suddenly forgot all about it, and later thought the bump was just a natural part of her skull.

This memory came screaming back when she saw the film Fire in the Sky (1993), a depiction of the Travis Walton abduction event from 1975. She was sitting in the dark theater and had a emotional reaction to one scene early in the movie, when the camera briefly passes a stuffed owl. It is only seen for a few seconds in the interior of a bar in a quiet western town.

She told me, “I just remember sitting in my seat in the dark theater, seeing an owl flash on the screen, and then feeling pushed back in my seat with all the breath squeezed out of my body. That real memory of how the bump [in my ear] appeared suddenly popped into my mind out of nowhere. It was a shock!”[\[47\]](#)

The fleeting close-up of a stuffed barn owl appears at the 4:09 time count. The only dialog until that point was spoken by a dusty cigar smoking local in on the porch of the bar as he watches a truck screech to a halt on the quiet main street. The man says, “What the hell was that all about.” Then he watches as a set of UFO witnesses, one by one, get out of their truck and walk awkwardly into the bar.

The man recognizes something is wrong and says, “Hey Mike, in a hurry?” Seconds later, the owl appears.

When I watched this scene as research, I had been terribly stressed that this book (the one you are reading) had turned into something overwhelming. It had swallowed me up and there was no end in sight. That line, directed at “Mike” really hit home. Was that a message for me and my own impatience?

Tracey Torme (son of crooner Mel Torme) adapted Walton’s 1978 book, The Walton Experience, for the big screen. Torme also wrote the script for the 1992 television mini-series, Intruders, which was another adaptation of a book about alien abduction. The main character in the teleplay is a psychiatrist, played by Richard Crenna, who is confronted with patients dealing with the trauma of UFO abduction. His character is a composite of Budd Hopkins and Dr. John Mack. Curiously, Intruders has the eerie hooting of a great horned owl in the lead up to two separate abduction events.

Torme was asked about the owls in both these movies, and he said there was nothing to it, at least not consciously. This seems perfectly reasonable given that owls are standard fare in scary movies.

There are two ways to look at the emergence of owls in movies about alien abduction. They could be a completely practical decision on the part of the script writer and production team to add some depth to the storyline. They could be taking a cue from sources like Strieber's Communion and simply sneaking it into the plot. Twin Peaks and The Fourth Kind both seem to fit this model. Or, it could be that owls arrived in the storyline completely unconsciously. A set decorator just hung an owl picture on a wall, or the sound editor spliced in a hooting owl to help create a spooky mood. I have a strong preference for the unconscious option. It's just more fun.

Author Robbie Graham

In the book, Silver Screen Saucers, author Robbie Graham addresses the main issue used by debunkers, that gullible UFO witnesses are merely parroting things they have seen on TV or in a darkened theater. The subtitle of the book is: Sorting Fact from Fantasy in Hollywood's UFO Movies. Robbie argues that cinema, more so than any other medium, has shaped our expectations of how we think about alien life and visitation; and UFO movies are influenced by real factors, some cultural and some conspiratorial. His research has led to the conclusion that the UFO witnesses and experiencers are not influenced by pop culture. Instead, it is the other way around. Robbie writes:

It is my observation that UFOlogy informs Hollywood more than Hollywood informs UFOlogy, which is to say that Hollywood engages with UFO lore in a parasitic fashion, feeding on the rich veins of a seventy year old subculture... This perspective contrasts with the popular assumption that the UFO subculture feeds on—and thrives as a result of—images projected by the entertainment industry. This is not quite the case.[\[48\]](#)

In Hollywood's UFO movies, broadly speaking, art imitates life.

Contact

In the 1997 movie Contact, there is a scene early on where the young Ellie Arroway (played by Jena Malone) talks to her father (played by David Morse). She is lying in bed and asks her father this question, "Hey dad, do you think there are people on other planets?" Right at this moment, the father leans forward and behind his head is a small picture of an owl thumb tacked to the wall.

Later as an adult, Ellie (played by Jodie Foster) is a scientist obsessively searching for extraterrestrial life, very much something an abductee might do. The film culminates with her entering a giant alien-designed machine and being transported (abducted?) to another dimension. In this psychedelic realm of distorted time, she meets an alien, appearing before her in the form of her deceased father. So, the person who resonated an archetypal owl image in her childhood later shows up, from beyond death, as a screen image conjured by the aliens.

If that owl picture was placed on the bedroom wall on purpose, it is a perfect use of foreshadowing on the part of the film makers, exactly matching the owl/alien connection I am trying to explore in this book. If it emerged by accident, all the better—the owl as a symbol welling up from the ether is much more intriguing!

Disney's Pinocchio

An owl shows up right before the arrival of a star-being in Disney's Pinocchio (1940). Jiminy Cricket sings the yearning lyrics of When You Wish Upon a Star, and then stares up at a big-eyed owl clock on the wall of Geppetto's workshop. Within seconds, he sees a curiously bright star in the sky out the window. This twinkling light descends from the heavens, enters the room and manifests as a shimmering orb, and then transforms into the Blue Fairy.

This scene plays out as an alien bedroom visitation, where in some sense, the DNA of the inanimate Pinocchio is upgraded into some in-between state, no longer a puppet, but not yet a real human. This mirrors a lot of the ancient alien lore, with implications that beings from the stars have tampered with genetics to create modern humans. Jesus was also ushered in at birth by a star from the heavens, and like Jesus, the finale of the Pinocchio involves death and resurrection.

The owl, a symbol for alien contact, punctuates the arrival of the Blue Fairy. Tall and blond and beautiful, she personifies the Pleiadian Nordic, a race of aliens known for their loving benevolence. The work of Jacques Vallee is required reading for a comparison of the modern UFO abduction stories and ancient faerie mythologies.[\[49\]](#)

Steven Spielberg's 2001 film, A.I. Artificial Intelligence, is a modern reworking of the Pinocchio story. The initial script used by Spielberg came from Mr. 2001 himself, Stanley Kubrick. The alien/blue fairy connection is hammered home in the culmination of this film, where spindly aliens with big heads look on as a virtual reality blue fairy resurrects a real boy. These fairytale movies aren't meant to imply some grand conspiracy. It's more that the same curious elements that make up the modern UFO abduction lore have been part of our mythology and consciousness throughout the ages.

Artists tapping into the unconscious

I've talked with lots of people who've had the direct UFO contact experience. Beyond the owl question, I'll also ask them if they are a creative type. With very few exceptions, they will almost always reply yes. They'll be painters, writers, poets, illustrators, or musicians. A lot of abductees seem to be artists, and this seems to play out in the larger mystery.

We should expect artists to be more sensitive and more open to abstract thoughts and ideas. If they are more open, they should be capable of tapping into the mystical static that is bouncing around the collective ether. True inspiration is a mystery, and any artist can describe how getting lost in this zone can create a sort of timeless trance where things just flow magically. An artist's best work comes from a mindless place, unhindered by logic and intellect. This could be the concert violinist standing on stage, or the illustrator hunched over in the corner with a sketchbook.

Although it almost always falls short, the Hollywood machine is continually trying to come up with the next UFO-themed product. But where do these ideas come from?

There are three avenues of thought. One says the script writer simply digs through some UFO books and uses those ideas to create a story. There's plenty of evidence for this. The creative team for the X-Files had a room at the production offices filled with UFO books. The writers would mine these shelves for inspiration, and anyone familiar with this literature can pick out the many references that were inserted into the show.

The second is that UFO movies are a deliberate part of a deep conspiracy to seed the public with carefully crafted ideas and themes. Script writers submit to whispered directions from government secret keepers from on high. There seems to be some evidence that this happens, but my sense is that it's rare.

The third, and most interesting option, is that the real magic of storytelling flows from that unknowable place. The artistic script writer is tapping into some grand reservoir of archetypal themes, and this might include UFOs and owls.

I sought out blogger and author Christopher Knowles when I was trying to formulate some ideas about a graphic novel project. A few years ago, I was planning to write and illustrate a comic book involving both UFOs and owls.

I also wanted to include some mythic elements, and I realized I was forcing these themes into the story. I called Chris and explained my frustrations. He replied that I shouldn't try to insert any kind of mythology, instead, I should write from my heart. His advice was forceful, just let the ideas flow out of you, if you truly let go, those mythic elements will emerge.

Occult researcher Paul Weston addressed this same mystery: "Where do artists get their inspiration? Certain ideas appear to be hanging in the air waiting to interface with human consciousness."[\[50\]](#)

The Owl Service

Sometimes owl imagery in popular culture is connected to the modern UFO lore, and other times its roots can be traced back to the legends of our ancestors. One beautiful example of this entwining of folklore and contemporary storytelling is The Owl Service. This was a popular fantasy novel for young adults from 1967, written by British author and mythologist Alan Garner. It's an adaptation of an ancient Welsh myth, but updated to modern day Wales. Garner has been very clear that the book was meant as an "expression of the myth."

Author and researcher Nick Redfern remembered this book from his youth in England. He told me, "Alan Garner was really popular in that time, he was like a weirder version of J.K. Rowling." A dominating theme of Garner's work is that time does not flow like a river, from past to future, but that one emotionally-loaded experience can repeat itself throughout history in different guises, each person interpreting the original event from their contemporary perspective.

The story revolves around the emotional tensions of three kids, two boys and a girl, in a rural manor house in Wales. They find a set of dinner plates hidden in the attic and these are decorated with a cryptic owl pattern; thus the title of the story, The Owl Service. Once they find these plates, they unwittingly begin to re-enact an ancient Welsh myth in which a woman made of flowers is caught in a love triangle and is later turned into an owl. The children seem to awaken the legend by finding these mysterious plates. They each live out the roles of an almost forgotten owl mythology, and they are eventually overtaken by obsession and madness.

The story was based on a real life experience of Garner's. He found an old set of Welsh plates with an owl design, and from this spun the entire book. The design on the plates found by Garner partially resembles a bunch of flowers, and—if viewed another way—a set of evil owls. This appearance seemed intentional on the part of whoever designed the plates, and one must assume the artisan was depicting elements of very same legend which Garner had modernized in his novel. Even though the story was inspired by a real event, it feels as if it emerged from a dream.

The beautiful maiden Blodeuwedd is the centerpiece of this medieval Welsh myth. She was created from flowers to be the wife of warrior and magician Llew. What follows is a story of adultery, mad passions, magic, murder, and resurrection. Llew is killed by his wife, but doesn't die, instead turning into an eagle (the masculine symbol of the day). Blodeuwedd is punished for plotting the death of Llew, and she is turned into an owl (the feminine symbol of the night). To this day, the name Blodeuwedd means owl in Welsh.

The Owl Service was made into an eerie eight-part television series for the BBC, shown over the winter of 1969-1970. Garner wrote the teleplay, and the production is drenched in a moody mythic atmosphere. The themes are quite arresting, and it seems remarkable that this production was targeted at young adults, because the whole thing is just so bizarre. The series was all shot on location using film, something rather unusual for British television at a time when most of its production involved videotape and indoor sets. The mood is decidedly gloomy and claustrophobic.

Watching this series, I was astonished at its power. It was like peering into a shadow-box of some lost haunted realm. On one level, it's a beautiful piece of film-making, on another it's a depiction of the soul.

Jenny Randles writes about how synchronicities invaded this BBC production:

The making of the serial for TV was littered with owl situations. Every time fate took the crew to a particular location, something involving an owl would turn up there, a hidden door-knocker, an ornament banging shutters at midnight, or a live owl rescued from a bird attack which had taken up refuge in the room they were then using as the focal point of the programme! Such amazing things merely scratch the surface of the mysteries surrounding the series. The book, film serial, legend and real life all seemed to fuse in some incredible sense, just as Alan Garner's theories and writings suggest that they might.[\[51\]](#)

The key cast members would later comment on the lasting impact the serial had on them. Michael Holden (who played the Welsh boy Gwyn) said that it felt like “we were personally living the whole thing.” Gillian Hills (who played the girl Alison) said that, “It was all so real, it was frightening.”

Garner was on the set during the entire production, and Wells said of his presence, “He was enthusiastic, he sort of shone from inside and had intense blue eyes. He willed us to become his characters. We were meant to live our parts.”

Also of note, the actress Gillian Hills holds a special place in cinema history for her small but pivotal roles in both Michelangelo Antonioni’s Blow Up (1966) and Stanley Kubrick’s A Clockwork Orange (1971). She was in those scenes.

There is no UFO imagery in this story (unless you factor in the saucer shape of those plates themselves) but everything about it is a cautionary tale of the power of myth and how it can force itself into the narratives of our lives. Any actual owl imagery in the story is minimal, but the archetypal mood is palpable throughout.

The Hobbit and Sword and the Stone

Author J.R.R. Tolkien made this drawing of Owlamoo to allay the fears of his eight year old son Michael, who had been having nightmares of an evil owl. This owl would perch atop high furniture and picture frames, glaring down at the boy. Tolkien said, “I tried to draw Owlamoo from his descriptions, which seemed to rob it of terror.” He created this highly stylized owl in 1928, nine years before the publication of The Hobbit in 1937. Any abduction researcher would take keen interest when a child tells of nightmares involving glaring owls, the implication being that this might be some sort of screen memory for an alien bedroom visitation.

Drawing by author J.R.R. Tolkien from 1928

Owls get mentioned only a few times in The Hobbit. When Bilbo Baggins was spying on the Trolls he was to “...hoot twice like a barn-owl and once like a screech-owl...” as a way to signal the Dwarves. For an author so deeply steeped in magic and myth the owl is, for the most part, absent from any of Tolkien’s books.[\[52\]](#)

The owl plays a much bigger role in a counterpart work of English fantasy. T. H. White published The Sword and the Stone in 1938, initially as a stand-alone work but eventually as the first part of a trilogy, The Once and Future King. This initial book is a fantasy re-telling of the boyhood of King Arthur under the tutelage of the wizard Merlin.

White’s novel features a talking owl, Archimedes, as Merlin’s side-kick. The name Archimedes is an overt nod to the ancient Greek mathematician physicist, engineer, inventor, and astronomer. The wizard and his owl represent two separate lines of ancient wisdom traditions. Merlin as the master of esoteric magic and Archimedes as Greek rationalism. The imagery of the wizard and his little owl is wonderful in its symbolism. It perfectly personifies the western cultural idea of the wise owl.

Walt Disney later adapted White’s story to an animated film, releasing it on Christmas Day 1963. An apt date, given that it’s the story of a boy who performs a miracle and is later crowned a king.

Both Tolkien and White present a wizard with a long white beard and a tall pointed hat, and both authors use legend and fantasy to define something idealized in the English character. These two enduring works emerged right on the heels of each other—The Hobbit in 1937, The Sword and the Stone in 1938. One year later, in 1939, England would be at war with Germany. Neither work is a harbinger of doom (like the folklore of the owl), and neither is propaganda, but each seems more a glorified call to define what is best within its home culture.

Also, White's The Once and Future King was the inspiration for the Broadway musical Camelot, as well as Monty Python and the Holy Grail.

Harry Potter

Harry Potter, the young orphaned wizard, is the main character in a series of seven best-selling fantasy novels. Like Merlin in The Sword and the Stone, young Harry has an owl as a companion. Hedwig, a snowy owl, was gifted to him on his eleventh birthday, and she delivers his mail. So, the most popular series of books in the history of publication features an owl as messenger, the centerpiece of owl mythology. This is a perfect example of ancient myths emerging right now, overtly into our mass consciousness.

Now maybe you shouldn't read too much into this, but the author of the Harry Potter series, J.K. Rowling, has the letters o-w-l embedded right into her name. This little coincidence is more of an insight into the way my quirky mind works than any evidence of the supernatural.

The owl, even in its fictionalized form, whether storybook or Hollywood, seems to play the same role, that of delivering a message from the great beyond. The owl as a messenger is both a metaphoric fable and a literal truth. Yes, truth is a strong word, but this feels accurate because of the wealth of first-hand accounts I've received from sincere people. I have heard enough owl experiences that I now see this as a certainty, but what it all might mean still remains a mystery.

The UFO is both a fable and a truth. It is a fable in our Hollywood depictions, and a truth in the abundance of evidence accumulated over the decades and centuries. Both aspects, fable and truth, are vying for a place in our collective psyches. Pop culture has become our modern myth maker and, for good or for bad, we absorb its output.

Chapter 14: Owls and Conspiracy

Hotdog stand

A little hotdog stand sits right in the middle of the Pentagon's central courtyard. It was lovingly dubbed Cafe Ground Zero by its patronage because the Soviets were rumored to be using this building as the targeting location for their missiles. The Russians supposedly scrutinized satellite imagery of the courtyard and deduced that top military brass were entering this small building each day at exactly the same time. Thus they aimed their nuclear missiles at what must be the site of super-secret strategy meetings. Little did they know that this was merely the place where admirals and generals would congregate for lunch. Although this makes for a nice story, it has never been substantiated, and it is most probably a bit of modern folklore.

Connecting the outermost points of a pentagram (the five pointed star) creates a pentagon. The five-sided shape of the pentagon shows up within the pentagram. Both these symbols are rich in ancient myth and meaning. The upright pentagram, in some traditions, represents the five wounds of Christ. The inverted pentagram has a much more sinister lore, being associated with witchcraft and Satan worship. The hotdog stand, like the massive building that surrounds it, is pentagon shaped. So it's a pentagon within a pentagon.

Sitting atop the the five-sided cafe is a wooden owl. According to government sources, the reason for the owl is to ward off birds. This owl is perched atop a pole in the exact center of the headquarters of the United States Department of Defense. Conspiracy theorists, read into this what you will.

As an aside—as if it were even necessary to add—the US government has a strict policy of denial when it comes to the reality of UFOs. The problem is there are a whole lot of people who have had dramatic sightings of strange things in the sky. These folks have had the firsthand experience of seeing something jaw-dropping, but which our government states does not exist.

Assuming their eyes aren't lying to them, then officialdom is. The very next thing to ask is, what else are they lying about? Once that door is open, all sorts of paranoid conjecture comes tumbling out. Some of it is nutty, and some of it is well-grounded in credible research. The UFO witness is well-primed to drink from the deep well of conspiratorial craziness. Add internet access to the mix and you'll find the rabbit hole is bottomless.

I am absolutely certain that conspiracies of all sorts have been carried out against the public. This includes layers of disinformation surrounding the UFO reality. The conspiracy subculture blurs with UFO research, and these two avenues of thought can feed off each other in ways that produce a kind of madness. At the same time, some of the stories—even the most outlandish—might be true.

The Capitol building

The Capitol building in Washington, D.C. is situated at the center of a series of roads and open parks. When viewed from above, the symmetrical design looks very much like an owl, and an angry one at that. The Capitol building itself is positioned at about this owl's heart.

The original street design and locations of the major monuments of Washington D.C. were created by French-born civil engineer, Pierre Charles L'Enfant. These plans included the site of the Capitol, the White House, and The Grand Avenue, now known as The National Mall. These plans were later added to and revised by both George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. This meddling infuriated L'Enfant's pride, and he was prone to passionate outbursts (he was French, after all). It is difficult to know who actually takes credit for the owl outline around the Capital, but it seems that these three men were all involved. Both Washington and L'Enfant were Freemasons, but whether Jefferson was a member of this fraternal order has never been conclusively answered.

As an emblem of wisdom, the owl would be a perfectly logical symbol for the epicenter of the American system of government, so there might be nothing at all conspiratorial in this imagery. On the other hand, there is a definite connection in all this to ancient Rome and the goddess Minerva—the counterpart of Athena and who is closely connected to the owl.

We get the word capitol from the Capitolium, the main temple of ancient Rome, seated on the Capitoline Hill. This monumental site was dedicated to the Supreme Capitoline Triad, and there is a marble sculpture in Palestrina Italy of these three deities seated side by side. In the center is Jupiter, the king of the gods. He is seated with an eagle, a masculine symbol of power and the sky. To his left is Queen Juno, his wife and sister, the goddess of sky and stars with a peacock at her side. The tail feathers of the peacock symbolize the vault of heaven and the eyes of the stars.

And to Jupiter's right is his virgin daughter, Minerva. Like Athena in Athens, she has a companion little owl, a feminine symbol of wisdom and the night.

Bohemian Grove

When I tell people I am working on a book about owls, one of the first things they'll say is, "You mean like the big owl at Bohemian Grove?"

No other item in this book has presented me with as much wildly divergent information as this huge stone figure. Yes, it seems there is a big owl there, but I have found no connection to UFOs. However, there is certainly plenty of conspiratorial speculation connected to it.

Bohemian Grove is a secluded retreat on the coastline of Northern California, taking up a little over four square miles of glorious Redwood forest. This exclusive site belongs to a private men's club in San Francisco, known as the Bohemian Club. Each year, for two weeks in mid-July, the Bohemian Grove hosts an exclusive gathering of some of the most powerful men in the world.

Dr. Glenn Seaborg, both a Bohemian Grove member as well as a Manhattan Project scientist, described the Grove as the place, "where all the important people in the United States decide an agenda for our country for the following year."[\[53\]](#)

Within this closed-off haven for the super elite is a 45-foot tall stone shaped like an owl. This much is well known and on the public record.

Learning what actually goes on at this annual outing in the woods is trickier to answer. Rumor and speculation run wild. On one end of the continuum, the meetings are attended by a bunch of wealthy power brokers who make merry in a very private setting. On the other end of this continuum are dark tales of pagan worship, occult rituals, and human sacrifice—all while plotting global domination. Wherever the truth lies here, a consistent thread in all accounts (benign or incendiary) is that there is a lot of heavy drinking going on during those two weeks.

The San Francisco club house is adorned with an owl emblem on the outside, and its letterhead also features an owl. There is even a bar across the street from the club called The White Owl. All this imagery can easily be traced back to Athena and wisdom. But the more conspiracy minded see the darker side of the owl lore as their secret meaning.

The club emblem is an owl with the motto Weaving Spiders Come Not Here. This comes from Greek mythology. Arachne was a mortal woman who boasted that her weaving skill was greater than that of Athena. A contest took place, and Arachne's weaving was filled with imagery depicting ways that the gods had misled and abused mortals. Athena, also the goddess of wisdom and crafts, saw that Arachne's creation was not only mocking the gods, but it was far more beautiful than her own. Enraged, Athena turned Arachne into a spider. The scientific term for spiders, arachnids, goes back to the myth of Arachne.

This giant stone owl (although some reports describe it made of cement) is commonly known as Moloch, named after a god of the Canaanites, an evil deity that required the sacrifice of human children. But the ancient literature presents Moloch as a bull, and not an owl. No easy answers, but since the Bohemian Club is shrouded under so many layers of secrecy, it is easy to assume the worst. Given the state of the world today, many of these assumptions might be true.

Giant stone owl at Bohemain Grove.

Hadron Collider

The $6.5 billion Large Hadron Collider, located on the border of France and Switzerland, had an emergency in November 2009. The entire 17-mile long underground particle collider, designed to peer into the secrets of the universe, went into emergency shutdown because the electrical systems were overheating.

There is an outdoor picnic area for the staff, and it seems that a bird swooped down, grabbed a piece of French bread from physicists enjoying their lunch, and then flew over the external electrical system. It then dropped the bread on a compensating capacitor, right where the main electricity supply enters the collider. This caused a short circuit, triggering failsafe devices to shut down part of the elaborate cooling system of the gigantic atom smasher. Whatever happened, I'm impressed by the accuracy of that bit of baguette.

A spokesman for CERN, the European Organization for Nuclear Research, said normal service was restored after a few hours. They also stated that "the bird escaped unharmed, but lost its bread."

The bird is believed to be an owl.

The question arises, did an owl terminate an experiment that would have ripped a hole in the fabric of reality? It might be that the entirety of humanity was saved from a sucking vortex of doom, all thanks to a benevolent owl. Some reports say the bird was a pigeon (the proper name would be rock dove) and the dove is an equally mythic bird, the totem of peace. And a piece of bread is symbolic of the body of Christ.

Summary

Mythology can be dismissed as nothing more than old books filled with even older stories. Yet it can also be seen as something that is alive and evolving, like nuisance weeds growing out of the cracks in our sidewalks. Myth is so ever-present that for the most part it is invisible. Our ancient myths blur with our modern pop culture, the roots tracing back to the first spark of humanity.

The present day UFO myth is just as vital and tangible as the lightning thrown down from the heavens by Zeus. Our movies and comic books, alongside well-footnoted volumes about UFO abduction, are nurturing something. A story is being kept alive. We are being told, over and over, that there is more to all of this than we dare imagine.

PART IV OWLS AS SIGNPOSTS

Chapter 15: Owls Get Mixed up with Aliens and UFOs

The intuitive mind is a sacred gift and the rational mind is a faithful servant. We have created a society that honors the servant and has forgotten the gift.

It might be easy to equate an owl with a flying saucer in purely speculative ways. Both owls and UFOs are described as flying with an eerie silence, as well as an unnatural smoothness of motion. It's also easy to connect the owl and the gray alien, as both project a menacing aura, and both have big eyes. Owls, aliens, and UFOs all seem to want to get mistaken for each other. When digging into the accounts, these overlapping connections become a mystifying jumble.

Owl on the roof

I've talked with a woman named Jujuolui at several different UFO conferences over the years, and she is very open about her contact experiences. She also tells of having a lot of owl encounters and feels certain these are part of her interactions with the gray aliens and their craft. Some of these owls seem like screen memories, where they take on some of the visual characteristics of the grays.

Jujuolui told me how she awoke one night to the sounds of a hooting owl. Waking up in the middle of night is unusual for her, unless there is some contact event unfolding. Her thought was that this wasn't an owl, but instead an alien being on her roof making this hooting noise.

She was compelled to get out of bed, go outside and take a picture of what she assumed was a gray alien. She told me, "If it were a normal owl, I would not have done this, I would have ignored it and kept sleeping!"

Jujuolui and she clearly felt she was being told to point and click her camera in the direction of the house. It was pitch black outside and she took a picture with the bright flash. When she looked at the image on the back of her digital camera, there was a big owl perched on the corner of the roof. She was told to take another picture, and she thought, "Surely if this was an owl it wouldn't stay so close to me for another picture, especially after the first flash of the camera! I took a picture again, sure enough, there it was!" That owl on the roof was positioned directly above her bed.

The photo is obviously of a real owl, but I cannot dismiss her feelings of being compelled to go out into the night with her camera. Was this feeling somehow projected into her from an outside source? If so, what would be the purpose? She left her house thinking she was going to take a picture of an alien being, but instead got a picture of an owl. She told me the house was the site of a tremendous amount of experiences, mostly with the gray beings. She says they are like a second family to her.

Witness describes an owl person

An experiencer using the pseudonym Joe was interviewed by author Linda Zimmermann for her 2013 book, In the Night Sky. This witness uses the phrase “owl person” to describe the four-foot tall being that would stand at the foot of his bed as he lay there, paralyzed and unable to scream.

...this “owl person” terrified him. It just stared at him with those frighteningly big eyes, and the next thing he knew it was morning.

These encounters went on month after month, sometimes only once a week, sometimes two nights in a row, but always in the same manner... the terrifying owl eyes that stared at him from the foot of the bed. Then five or six hours would pass as if it was only a second, and he would wake up and it would be morning. He knew these were not dreams, but how could this be reality?

...The awful stress of these encounters wore Joe down to the point where he thought he was going to lose his mind.

The witness was asked to draw a sketch of this owl person, and what he drew looks very much like the quintessential gray alien from countless other reports. What seems telling is that he equated this unknown visitor to an owl. There was no screen memory, he was clearly seeing an alien being, but needing some context, he called it an owl. Joe also described being stared at from his bedroom window by something with huge squirrel-like eyes. This disturbing “squirrel person” would have had to have been about four feet tall to peer into his window.

Zimmermann noted that:

... just for the record the squirrel person did not have fur or a bushy tail... I also have to state that the ‘owl person’ did not have feathers, wings, or a beak, and he only used that term because of the round head and relatively large eyes. Trust me, if someone told me they were literally seeing four-foot tall squirrels and owls, their story would not make it into this book![\[54\]](#)

Well, beyond squirrels, plenty of four-foot tall owl stories have made it into this book! So many that I could only share a small percentage of these very compelling reports.

Owl head bobbing

Contactee Peter Maxwell Slattery describes an emotional reaction while watching a youtube video showing a group of baby owls. He got so freaked out that he couldn’t watch it. These little owlets moved their heads in an odd bobbing manner and it brought up unnerving memories. Peter tells of seeing gray aliens in full consciousness, and he says they have distinct motion to their heads. He described watching a gray peering around the edge of a doorway (something I’ve heard several experiencers describe) and it was bobbing its head in the same unsettling way as the owlets. Unlike any other bird, owls have uniquely fluid neck movements, and this adds to their mystique.

Peter tried to mimic these motions to me on a video skype call, tilting his head toward one shoulder and then the other, but he couldn’t match the odd motions of both the owls and the grays. I watched his gestures, and also his expressions of frustration as he tried to act out something that obviously bothered him. Also of note, I looked at the time counter for our video call right as Peter was describing this unsettling head bobbing, it read 1:23:45. This has been a highly synchronistic number for me, making me pay close attention. Not too long after having this talk with Peter, I actually saw a set of three baby owls looking down at me from a nest near my home. I was very aware that these fuzzy owlets were making the same bobbing motion that Peter had described. I couldn't help but be struck by the eerie way they moved their heads, giving me a visual insight to the many accounts that I've heard over the years.

Lucretia Heart and an owl in flight

Earlier in this book, abductee Lucretia Heart told of watching a gray alien morph into an owl in full daylight. She has another owl story that happened in her backyard at twilight. Lucretia saw something next to a tree which seemed whitish-gray and curiously large. It looked to be about four feet tall, but she thought it might be something smaller, perched upon the back of a lawn chair or perhaps in a very low tree limb. In the dim blue light of dusk, it looked like a person standing there two acres away, but she couldn't be sure. She turned her head for just a moment and when she looked back, that gray form was silently skimming above the tall grass, heading roughly towards her. She was instantly seized with panic.

What she was seeing was a smoothly gliding gray form, its big head about four feet off the ground, streaking across the field at about the speed of someone running fast. She was freaked out, and it took her a moment to realize what she was seeing was a big owl flying across her yard, its belly skimming the top of the tall grass, creating the illusion of legs below the grass line.

What set her off was the imagery of something she had seen before. Gray aliens will sometimes move around without walking, instead they will smoothly float just a little bit above the ground, as if on an invisible hovercraft. This is rarely talked about within the literature, but witnesses describe this weird gliding motion as terribly distressing.

It took a long time for her panic reaction to subside—the emotional trigger had tapped into something deep. She has seen aliens moving in this way during multiple experiences. At one point, she saw a gray being gliding smoothly over lumpy uneven terrain, but its movement was smooth and level. She later went back to where she had seen this entity skimming above the ground, she followed the path it had traveled, and there was a wide abrupt ditch that it had zipped across. If it were running, it would have needed to step down and then back up again, but her memory is of a velvety smooth motion without any dip at the point of the ditch.

She is pretty sure she's seen this same owl on many occasions in and around her yard. She's gotten a good look at it, and it's a great gray, the tallest species of owl in the world. She estimates the size at about two feet from head to toe, with an amazingly large wingspan. She notes that even though the owl is speckled gray in daylight, at night it appears as a ghostly white.

Lucretia tried hard to explain the eeriness of seeing this owl, the whole vibe of which was extremely odd. This is something that gets repeated a lot, pretty much anyone who sees an owl in the wild says the same thing, which is they are struck by an otherworldly vibe. Owls fly so smoothly and so silently that the observer is left with a weird sense of awe. I have experienced this same reverent emotion many times.

It's striking that Lucretia saw a great gray owl and, for a moment, thought it was a gray alien. The deeper I immerse myself into these murky waters, the more I see a curious blurring between the owl and the alien, something I can't ignore. It feels like they are innately paired together, something that goes beyond their obvious resemblance but plays out in their unsettling presence. Seeing either has an almost mystical power.

Looking for an owl and finding a UFO

I spoke to a woman at length about a conjoined owl and UFO experience. She is a successful academic who has asked to remain anonymous. Her sighting happened on a Friday evening. There had been some drama leading up to this event. Earlier that day, she had been appointed to a rather prestigious position at a respected university. Her focus has been religious studies, so I took note that this sighting happened on August 15th, a date celebrated by the Catholic Church as the Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This day commemorates the death of Mary and her bodily assumption into Heaven. It is the most important of all Marian feasts and a Holy Day of Obligation, and this woman attended a mass in celebration earlier that same day. (As an aside, I know two women who had what they both call their awakening experience on August 15th, and both accounts involve UFOs.)

That evening, she sat with her husband, margarita in hand, looking out over the ocean. She was as much celebrating her new position as unwinding after a long and emotional day. They were sitting together on a dock, enjoying a beautiful evening, when she heard the hooting of an owl. She was surprised that there would be an owl so close to the ocean, so she scanned the trees behind her, saw nothing, and then looked up to the sky. There she saw something unusual directly above her. It wasn't yet dark, so she could see it clearly. It looked like a silvery shiny object, high in the heavens.

At first, she didn't tell her very rational husband, she just watched it for about two minutes as it made odd maneuvers across the sky. Finally she asked her husband, "What's that?" Then they watched the object together for about ten minutes. He was genuinely perplexed. He is a no-nonsense engineer type, and he said, "Well, it's not traveling in any kind of linear trajectory."

Later she found articles in the local paper, as well as a local television news report, that described people seeing a silvery disc-shaped UFO that same evening and during the rest of the weekend. Curiously, she didn't remember the hooting owl in the days right after the sighting. It was early the next week, when she received an article from a colleague at another university. The text described some of the experiences of Whitley Strieber from his book Communion. It was while this woman was reading about Whitley's odd owl sighting on a snowy windowsill that she heard a ping from her computer. It was me, sending her a Facebook message asking if I could talk with her by phone. It was while reading the article about a UFO abductee seeing an owl—and me contacting her that at the same time—that she suddenly remembered that her sighting of a silvery object in the evening sky was foreshadowed by the hooting of an owl. What seems so interesting is on that evening on the dock, she was actually looking for an owl when she saw a UFO instead.

Budd Hopkins's kitchen

Pioneering abduction researcher Budd Hopkins had a framed photo of a group of owls on his kitchen wall. These were common barn owls, perhaps the spookiest looking of any owl. These white faced birds look eerily like the image of the big eyed gray alien that has permeated our popular culture. I was with Budd at his home in 2008 when he pointed to that picture, commenting on how weird that those owls looked. Then he said to me, I don't know what is going on in those minds, I don't understand what they're thinking.[\[55\]](#)

Years later, I saw a video documentary that included Budd, showing him going through a collection of drawings made by UFO abductees. He was standing alongside a cabinet of flat files and, one by one, he was holding the illustrations up for the camera. He got to a particularly creepy painting of a group of spindly gray aliens all standing together. He points to the big black eyes and says, “The terror comes from the fact that when people look at them, they don’t know what is going on in those minds, they don’t understand what they’re thinking.”[\[56\]](#)

John Keel and Mothman research

During 1966 and 1967, Point Pleasant, West Virginia, was the epicenter of strange reports of a giant winged creature. These sightings came to be known as Mothman, and this frightening episode seemed to culminate in the December 1967 collapse of the Silver Bridge into the Ohio River, a tragedy that claimed 46 lives. Some have speculated that these phantom sightings were a harbinger of the bridge collapse event, as if the power of the disaster had somehow manifested a sinister apparition.

There was a wealth of paranormal strangeness that surrounded these events, including UFOs, all of which was documented in John Keel’s 1975 book, The Mothman Prophecies. One thing that was reported over and over by the locals was that Mothman displayed a special delight in pursuing automobiles, a habit that is definitely not bird-like, but more consistent with UFOs. The Mothman itself was dismissed by many skeptics as nothing more than a big owl. Here is an excerpt from Keel’s book:

In late December 1966 a rare arctic snow owl was shot by a farmer in Gallipolis Ferry, West Virginia. This was two feet tall and had a five foot wingspan. “Mothman” witnesses converged on the farmer for a look at the owl and all of them declared that it in no way resembled what they had seen.

In July 1967 another rare bird turned up. This one was a turkey vulture and stood a foot tall. It was found by a group of boys near New Haven, West Virginia. Again, the “Mothman” witnesses looked and shook their heads.

We do suspect that a few alleged “Mothman” witnesses did mistake owls for “Mothman.” While driving through the TNT Area late one night in November 1967, we were startled ourselves when a huge owl suddenly flapped into the air next to the road. It was so big that it was carrying a full-grown rabbit in its talons. Perhaps if a similar owl suddenly fluttered in front of a car filled with teenagers they might mistake it for something larger and more dramatic.[\[57\]](#)

I received an account from a man who had a sighting of an orange orb along with approximately two hours of missing time. Within a month of this event, while driving at night, he saw the prototypical four-foot tall owl standing in the middle of the road. He was relatively close to the Mothman sightings along the Ohio River, but this was 43 years later.

The owl flew off without incident, but its enormous size made him curious. This sighting plays out as a probable screen memory, but he didn't know about that at the time. He did a little research and found a few reported sightings of giant owls up and down the Ohio River Valley. This sightings might imply a possible cryptid, an animal whose existence is disputed or unsubstantiated, like Sasquatch or the Loch Ness Monster. He considered that the Mothman events surrounding Point Pleasant could all trace back to people seeing an as-yet undiscovered species of giant owl living in the forests of Ohio. He reasoned that what he saw could easily be mistaken for a wide eyed, winged humanoid. So, we have a UFO witness with missing time, pondering that the ubiquitous four-foot tall owl could be the source of the Mothman lore.

There are more examples of skeptics using the owl as a convenient scapegoat for an outright dismissal of anything unusual. The Flatwoods Monster (also known as the Braxton County Monster) from 1952 was shrugged off as a bunch of confused witnesses seeing a great gray owl. The 1955 Kelly–Hopkinsville encounter where two families saw odd lights in the sky and weird entities in rural Kentucky were blamed on nothing more than people seeing owls. These are two classic cases from the beginning of the modern era of the UFO. Both accounts have flying craft seen by multiple witnesses in conjunction with entities on the ground, something quite unusual during those early years of UFO accounts. It seems that in the case of Point Pleasant and elsewhere, the skeptics are eager to use owls as a stand-in for aliens.

The Owlman

Much like Point Pleasant, Cornwall England has had its own reports of a man-sized flying creature with glowing red eyes. All of these unsettling encounters are clustered near the tiny sea-side village of Mawnan Smith, specifically around the 13th Century St Mawnan Church, about a mile outside the village.

This ominous creature has become known as the Owlman, with the initial sighting on Easter weekend in April 1976. The eyewitnesses were a pair of sisters, nine year-old Vicky and twelve year-old June, who were in the area on holiday with their family. The sisters were alone when they saw a large winged creature hovering above the Mawnan church tower. The terrified girls ran back to their father and described what they had seen. It was obvious that his daughters had experienced something terribly distressing, and he ended their vacation short and immediately returned home. The father would not allow either of his daughters to be interviewed. He did, however, provide a local researcher with a drawing of the creature made by June.

June 17th 1976

Two months later, on July 3, two 14 year-old girls were camping together in the trees near the Mawnan church. They heard a hissing sound and saw a figure that looked like an owl as big as a man, with pointed ears and red eyes. One of the girls, Sally Chapman, later wrote of her sighting as an adult:

I wanted to run but couldn't. It was EVIL, intensely so. When it moved ... its arms or wings or whatever went out and it just rose through the trees. Straight up through the evergreens, it didn't flap, it didn't make a sound.[\[58\]](#)

Sightings of this owl-like humanoid continued on the following day when it was described as silvery gray. There were more sightings two years later, in June and August of 1978, all within the vicinity of the church. In later years, other odd UFOs have been reported, each time seen from the grounds of the Mawnan church. Twice, these were described as a "block of light," either pulsating blue-white (in 2003) or as rectangular orange-red (in 1996).

A woman contacted researcher Nick Redfern with a profound account that deepens the mystery around this seemingly haunted location. It happened just after 11:00 p.m. in 1998 while driving home after visiting a friend in Mawnan Smith. She had barely left the little village when she saw something appear just off the road. It was about the size of a large beach-ball and glowing bright orange. The next thing she knew, she was somehow parked on the shoulder, only to realize that she had two hours of time that couldn't be accounted for.

While emerging from her disorientation, she saw a huge owl-like creature with somewhat human qualities. It was hovering in the air at a height of around fifteen feet. Like Sally Chapman's account from 1976, the creature was not moving its wings to keep aloft.

This account initially reads like a textbook contact account, where the missing time would imply an abduction event. The addition of the Owlman make the mystery even more complex, implying that this giant winged creature is somehow connected with the UFO phenomenon. It might be that the Owlman is nothing more than a screen memory, just another owl display projected into the minds of the observers. The question would be: Why are all these strange sightings clustered in such a defined area? One answer would be that the entirety of the UFO mystery is not what it seems.

These Owlman reports are bizarre in ways that go way beyond just a big owl. The consistency that the creature took flight simply by spreading its wings and then floating upward is positively eerie. This is similar to what I have heard in other odd sightings. One abductee wrote me about approaching something he thought initially was a crouched man in darkened parking lot. When he got closer, however, it appeared as more of a shadow figure. His mind said owl, but he knew that wasn't what he was seeing. It spread its wings and lifted upwards, and he felt a pressure like nothing he had ever felt before, as if standing on the side of a highway and being pushed back by the force of a passing semi-truck. Then he "watched as it seemed to float away."[\[59\]](#)

The Owlman sightings of Cornwall are markedly similar to the Mothman flap from Point Pleasant West Virginia in 1967. Reports from both events describe the creature as exuding an atmosphere of absolute menace. I have corresponded with a man who had what he feels is more of a Mothman sighting near Norwich, England. He told me that "the event was dripping in dread." In the aftermath of seeing this being, his life came unraveled. I will also say that this man has shared enough with me, including a UFO sighting, that I would consider him one of the maybe people.

Metal object says it's an owl

I heard from a woman who described a very odd nighttime event that happened when she was about five years old. She was awake and lying in bed alone in her room when she saw a metal object zip down from the sky and clamp itself onto the outside of her window. She tried to scream for her mother when a voice spoke in her head, “Do not be afraid, I am only a friendly owl.”

She knew it was no owl, but all the fear left when she heard those words. She stayed still in the bed and stared at it. She was looking at a round lens on a curved metal stalk. The lens was peering at her through the window, when suddenly three shutters closed and re-opened, as if it blinked. She was curious and got out of bed and moved towards the window, but it detached itself and zoomed back into the sky at incredible speed.

Witness sketch from an event in 1957

This woman has shared enough of her life experiences that I see her as one more of the maybe people. She leads a very devout spiritual life as well as being dedicated to the protection of nesting sea bird habitats. She is a very compassionate woman, and I am seeing this as a pattern.

In this case, we have a weird metal eye speaking telepathically, telling a frightened little girl it is an owl. I have spoken to a lot of people who have seen an owl staring in at them through their windows, often at highly charged moments. They assume these are real owls, but could they instead be seeing a flying metal eye that uses some form of mind control to screen itself as an owl? This report seems so odd, but perhaps it is commonplace and the alien's psychic projection technology wasn't working that night.

Beeping UFOs

Lindy Tucker is both a UFO researcher and witness. Over the years she has heard a set of odd metallic beeping sounds, and most of these unsettling noises have happened simultaneously with sightings of unknown flying objects. Lindy first heard these beeping sounds in her own backyard, in Orton, Ontario.

She first saw odd lights in the sky on March 3, 1975, but heard no sound in association with this sighting. These sightings reoccurred over the following months, and it was on April 26 that she first heard a loud penetrating beeping. These noises became an ongoing event, and on the evening of June 14, 1975 she made an audio recording of this beeping right outside her home. Over the years she has collected other recordings made by UFO witnesses, and these all have what seems to be the same beeping noise. It is these sounds that have been the focus of Lindy's research.

Almost a decade before Lindy taped these noises in her backyard, the U.S. Air Force analyzed a set of very similar beeping recordings, and their findings were published in the now famous Condon Report of 1968. They concluded that these sounds were being produced by a Northern saw-whet owl, a bird that is barely seven inches tall. These adorable little owls make a repeated tooting whistle sound, and this can be surprisingly loud, given their small size. I have listened to recordings of the saw-whet owl and the beeping UFO sounds back-to-back, and they are obviously quite similar. When listening closely, the owl has a flute-like quality to its whistling, while the UFO sounds seem more mechanized. This is my non-scientific take when comparing the two.

A detailed investigation of five UFO related beeping recordings was conducted by tenured Aerospace Professor Ronald Stearman at the University of Texas at Austin. At that time, Stearman had access to some of the most sophisticated audio analytic equipment on any American campus. The outcome of these studies showed that the sounds from each of the UFO recordings are remarkably similar. These were compared to the more easily obtained sounds of a saw-whet owl, which were also very similar to each other. When carefully examined, the owl and UFO beeping had incompatible audio signatures. After an extensive analysis of the acoustics, Stearman ruled out the Air Force's saw-whet owl explanation.

The fact that the Air Force would attempt to dismiss sounds of a UFO by blaming them on an owl was enough to get my attention, but there is more. Lindy's 1975 recording of this beeping sound also includes the unmistakable call of a great horned owl! Along with some crickets, there is a low steady hooting that overlaps the metallic beeping. I have long been hoping to find a photograph or video that shows both an owl and UFO in the same frame. This visual corroboration has eluded me, but I am instead confronted with this recording. A friend of mine (also an abductee with a few odd owl experiences) thought it sounded like the owl and UFO were talking to each other.

This 1975 audio was recorded right in Lindy's own backyard. She was there along with fellow researcher Chris Purton, then a Professor of Astronomy at York University in Toronto. This is one more Chris that shows up with a direct connection to owls and UFOs. This recording and others can be heard online at Lindy's website, Beeping UFOs.[\[60\]](#)

Witnesses report that the UFO beeping sounds can be unusually loud, much louder than what a tiny owl could produce. These sounds have also been heard broadcasting over AM, FM, CB, long wave, and short wave radios, all in the proximity of a UFO sighting. Unusual electrical failures have been reported too, things like car radios and engines, flashlights, hearing aids, indoor lighting, and tape recorders have either faltered or shut off entirely, seemingly as a result of these beeping sounds.

Lindy has a recording from a New Hampshire family who tried using their video camcorder to record a huge, triangular-shaped craft that flew over their house in the spring of 1992. Unfortunately, for some unknown reason, the video was entirely black. The audio on the tape, however, has these same steady beeping noises.

These sounds aren't always connected with UFO sightings, but are most often heard in "flap" areas at times of high activity. Witnesses will leave their homes in search of the sound, which might have no visible source. Sometimes these folks will feel an inexplicable fear and quickly run back inside because they can't stand it. Some witnesses have reported that this beeping can be extremely loud, and that they can feel the sounds penetrating their chest. All these unusual effects are something a little saw-whet owl probably couldn't quite muster.

Lindy described a striking event that points to something deeper going on than just some noises made by a UFO. She had written up a report in 1994 titled "Tracing Sound to UFO Encounters" for the MUFON UFO Journal. This article detailed both her research and personal experiences, but the paper copy had been misplaced and she was frantically searching to send it off to meet the deadline. It was the middle of the day as she dug through her cluttered desk for her copy of the report. It took some searching but she eventually found it—and at the exact moment her fingertips touched the paper the beeping noises started outside her home. All the windows were open, and the sound was loud and steady. This precise timing and significance of the beeping was not lost on Lindy.

Whatever is happening, it is in some way intertwined with us and with our consciousness. Accounts like this, including the cameo role of a hooting great horned owl, defy any simple explanation.[\[61\]](#)

Helping a wounded owl

Kenneth Arnold was unwittingly responsible for the term flying saucer when he described what he saw to reporters in the summer of 1947. His sighting kicked off a media frenzy and ushered in the modern era of the UFO that forever changed popular consciousness. What folks might not know is that Kenneth Arnold had a pet owl!

Arnold built a cage for his daughter Kim so she could raise an injured great horned owl that had fallen from its nest. It just seems fascinating that this key player in UFO history would have an owl living at his home. Reflecting back, Kim says she thought it was really incredible that her father would actually let her keep such a wild creature. She described the cage he built as an expression of his character, something truly wonderful.

Helping an injured owl shows up in a more recent case. On the evening of February 17, 2013, in the foothills of North Carolina, a young couple and their three-month-old child were driving home from a birthday party. The sun was down and they were in their neighborhood when they saw a slow-moving triangle-shaped object just above the height of the nearby houses.

The husband, Daniel (a pseudonym) pulled off the road and watched the craft from a distance. They were parked and watched in amazement. Then it flew right above their car and just stayed positioned there for at least two minutes. At that point, his wife freaked out, screaming and praying while holding their crying baby.

Daniel raced home to drop off his wife and child and get his video camera, but by the time he came back out of his house, it was gone. He described the triangle-shaped craft as having three white lights, one in each corner, and a larger red light in the center. He guessed it was hovering 15 feet above his car—so low he could have hit it with a football, and each side of the triangle was about 25 feet long.

The next night he heard an owl in his yard, something he hadn't ever noticed before. It was there hooting again for the next three nights. Some months after this, Daniel and his wife were driving on a busy highway when they saw an owl in the ditch right along the side of the road. Daniel was worried it was injured and might stumble into traffic, they pulled over. Daniel took off his hoodie and used it to wrap up the bird. He said the owl didn't struggle, but acted totally calm and let him carry it to the car. His wife drove the few minutes to their home while the owl was sitting on the floorboard at Daniel's feet.

They unwrapped the owl in their driveway and it simply stood there looking at them. It was a big handsome barred owl. After a few minutes, it opened its wings and calmly flew to a tree branch in their next-door-neighbor's yard. It stayed on that branch for three days, staring at them.

On February 19, 2014, Daniel again heard an owl hooting in his yard. He checked the date and realized this was exactly one year to the day that he had heard the same hooting after the triangle sighting. As before, the owl stayed in his yard for three days.

Daniel spoke to me about how unsettling all this has been, not just the initial sighting, but what followed after with the owls. Since seeing the triangle, he's had recurring dreams that he has been chosen. When I asked what changed since his experience, he said that his Christian faith has become stronger. He also shared something I have heard a lot, the fears of a parent that their child might have some deeper involvement with the phenomenon. This is the one thing that I find most challenging: how can I offer any solace to a parent with these kinds of worries? The emotions are powerful, and my heart is heavy that I am unable to give any meaningful advice.

Daniel works with animals. He trains dogs, and this is another thing I see as a pattern with folks with these types of experiences. It's a sort of sympathetic calling. Many seem to work or volunteer at animal shelters, train horses, or rescue abandoned pets.

Like Kim Arnold, Daniel came to the aid of a wounded owl. I have collected a handful of similar stories where people with some connection to the UFO lore will rescue an owl. It might be an up-close sighting or out-and-out contact. All these accounts have the feel of a children's fable where helping an animal in need is a test, and their simple act of kindness will later turn out to be more important than they've ever imagined.

Summary

The owl, directly or indirectly, gets woven into these reports in ways that seem scripted, as if they are meant to be fleeting clues to something deeper.

Owls are signposts along the path, but a signpost isn't very interesting on its own, it's just a stick of wood pounded in the ground with something attached at the top. But what's on the sign might be significant. It's the message on the sign that needs to be acknowledged. "Bridge Out" or "Danger Ahead" might be very important. The challenge is to separate the owl (or the UFO for that matter) from the message, and then to interpret any vital meaning.

Chapter 16: Owls and Shamanism

David Weatherly

David Weatherly is an author and paranormal researcher. When I asked him have you ever had any odd owl experiences, he shared a story with me that exemplifies the weirdness of this stuff. He told me about going to interview a witness named Joan. She was a young mother who had been having ongoing UFO sightings around her home, and this was his first visit to meet her.

David pulled his truck into the driveway just as the sun was setting. He describes shutting off the engine and, while still in the driver's seat, putting a set of fresh batteries in a small voice recorder in his lap.

Here's what he told me:

As I was looking down to do this, I heard a heavy thud and felt a slight shake as though something had fallen on the vehicle.

Looking up quickly, I was shocked to see an owl perched on the hood. It turned its head and looked directly at me. I recognized the species, a great horned owl. This one was at least a foot tall. It looked at me for a moment, turned its head and looked forward down the street then repeated this movement. It never made a sound and after a moment, it launched into the air.

It was an unusual incident and I wasn't sure what had caused the owl to land on my vehicle moments after I had turned the engine off. I didn't mention this incident to Joan when I went in to conduct the interview.

Sitting in Joan's kitchen, I listened quietly as she began to give me details of her UFO sightings. Like many people who report repeated encounters, Joan had experienced some odd things in her life. On two occasions, she had experienced missing time. Lapses in her routine that she simply couldn't explain and didn't have any clear memory of.

Once she had told me about her sightings, I brought up her children. Joan had two kids (a daughter age 12 and a son age 7). Her daughter had not mentioned anything unusual since the UFO activity had begun. Her son however, had started to talk about lights in the sky and the little men. He had also developed an imaginary friend. A common thing for young children to do, but the timing was rather curious.

As I sat talking to Joan, her son came in to the kitchen. He calmly reported to his mother, "It's at my window again Mommy."

Joan assured him that "it" was already gone.

She excused herself for a moment and walked with her son to his room. When she returned to the kitchen, she explained that a large owl had started coming to her son's window and perching on the sill outside.

David asked Joan if she had ever seen the owl herself, she said she hadn't but her daughter had witnessed it on few occasions. Her neighbor had also told her that he had seen a large owl in her yard a couple of times. When David pressed her for more details, she said that the owl had started to appear right around the time of her first UFO sighting.

I spoke with David for a recorded interview in July of 2012. During this back-and-forth dialog we spoke about his research into the unknown, and about how there is an overlapping between UFO events and a wide range of other paranormal experiences. David also told me that he had had a near-death experience in his youth. When I heard that, an alarm bell went off in my head, and I blurted out, "Wait, are you a shaman?"

Without any hesitation, he answered: "Yes, I am."

David went on to explain that starting in his childhood, he had studied shamanic and magical traditions with elders from numerous cultures including Tibet, Native America, Europe, and Africa. Even though we had met a few times, I knew none of this history while I was conducting this formal interview with him.

This shamanism thing keeps showing up in ways that point to a some deeper message that is trying to emerge. David's story embodies so much of this mystery. It just feels so meaningful that an owl would land on the hood of a shaman's truck and looks directly at him at the moment he arrives at a home where UFO contact had been happening.

Nobody volunteers to be the village shaman. Instead, they are chosen by the elders. In most cultures, the role is thrust on a youth who shows signs of higher psychic or spiritual capacity. Many anthropologists paint shamanic initiation rites as something brutal, a ceremony to shatter the recruit's fragile sense of reality. This might be through a metaphoric death and rebirth ritual, and only afterwards will the young shaman then take on the role of intermediary between worlds. I have heard some researchers declare that you cannot become a shaman unless you've had an actual near-death experience. This would mean there would have already been a literal crossing over into another world by the young initiate. When David told me he had a near-death experience in his youth, I immediately saw this as part of his initiation, the literal transformation from young boy to young shaman.

Here is an edited excerpt from our three-hour long interview:

Mike: So here's my final question, if I had to ask a shaman any question, it would be this: What is the meaning of all the owls? I see a lot of owls, I mean, more than other people, and at prescient moments. And I don't think they are UFO screen memories, I think these are real owls.

David: So what you are saying is you do not feel like they are a screen memory.

Mike: No, they are real owls.

David: When you look at totem animals, you'll find slightly different interpretations depending on the cultural background, but you also find some commonalities. Now, the owl in a lot of North American mythologies is symbolic of death and all the things associated with that, like the other-world and the spirit world.

It's also a very feminine energy, and it's often associated with people who have psychic or mediumship abilities. It's a night totem, so it's associated with the moon and lunar energy. I'm just talking in generalities, there are differences when you look at more western cultures.

What's your cultural heritage?

Mike: My father was Scottish, both my grandparents on his side were born in Scotland. The lineage is Scottish as far as we can trace it back. My mother was born in Denmark, and her ancestry is all Danish.

David: Oh, now that's cool. The owl in shamanic definition is pretty interesting. If you take the crow, you'll find very similar definitions and interpretations in America and in Europe. The same is true for other animals like the deer.

But the owl is curious, the interpretations are very different on the two continents. Things that are associated with it in North America are a bit more ominous. A lot of Native American tribes think it's a bad omen if you see an owl, meaning someone is going to die. Some of the native mythology, for instance in the South Western tribes like the Apache have a whole owl-man monster that exists in their creation myth.

But if you go to Europe and look at the owl it's a bit more noble and it's often associated with the goddess of wisdom [Athena], and it's more associated with the ability to be clairvoyant. And it's often symbolic of being aware of your surroundings. So I would say that with your background the owls would fall into that category for you.

Now you can take all these things that I've said and sit with it and derive your own interpretation. But I would certainly say that anytime you see one, you really need to pay attention on multiple levels.

Mike: (laughing) Sorry, I didn't mean to laugh.

David: And pay attention to what's going on at the moment when you spot it, what's happening that day. But also what's going on in your life at the time.

I need to point out that David's advice was just exactly what I had been doing at the time. When researching not only owl sightings, but UFOs and synchronicities, I have been asking witnesses the same questions I was asking myself, what was happening that day and in the moments leading up to the experience? So I find it very reassuring that David was telling me the same thing, confirming the way I have been framing my own research.

Mike: That's funny you said that, because you said 'pay attention' and I was literally getting ready to reply, and I had just written down 'pay attention' on this piece of paper in front of me.

David: (laughs)

Mike: So that's what I've come away with. I don't have a good answer, the only answer I do have is pay attention.

At this point I share a story from 2009 where I saw five owls all at one time in Montana, this happened along with my friend Peter, told later in this book. Then the conversation continues:

David: Those kind of things make it very clear that this is a very defined and connected totem for you... and that is what you need to look at and be conscious of in those moments. Chronicle those things because they are valuable, you'll see patterns emerge and you'll see greater levels of understanding develop from those experiences.

Mike: When you say chronicle them, that's interesting because I have been, and it's been in the form of this blog. I really take the blog seriously, it's not hidden away in a diary. I am publicly declaring it and it gives it a different resonance. It feels like I am doing an experiment, I have to take this seriously and I am trying to be as honest as I can be on this blog.

David: (Laughing) You are following the shamanic process. It's sort of akin to the shaman sitting down and telling the village stories.

When he said that to me—you are following the shamanic process—it felt like a bell ringing in my head, like I had just solved a puzzle on a game show and won the grand prize. I am not exaggerating. His reply was the answer I had been desperately seeking. David and I concluded the taped interview and later continued the back-and-forth exchange on a facebook chat box:

Mike: During the recorded interview I thought you said: “the owls are a shamanic initiation” But what you really said was: “you are following the shamanic process.”

David: During taping, I didn't outright say you were going through a shamanic initiation because that's a very personal thing. I didn't know if you would want it shared. But essentially it's the same thing. Following the shamanic process does by nature lead to initiatory experiences.

Mike: The thing is, the answer that all my owl sightings would be a shamanic initiation just feels exactly right!

David: The important thing is the message you heard and how much it resonated with you.

Mike: Well, the message (a shamanic initiation) resonated absolutely perfectly at a soul level! I trust that means something.

In pretty much every one of my audio interviews, I have asked each guest the same two questions. The first would be about my own experiences, I'll ask: What's up with all the owls? The other question is: How do you define the role of the shaman?

During that recorded interview, David answered both of these questions in one fell swoop, in a deeply personal way. He told me that the owl is both a path and a shamanic initiation. He was very clear that I am on that path, and it is my own initiation.

I had been asking everyone what the owls meant and none of their answers rang true, but when David told me that it could be a shamanic initiation, that answer came with a clear psychic knowing. Am I being initiated? I was never dragged away by the village elders to take part in any ritual. Or was I? Could there be buried memories of an abduction that might fit into this shamanic framework? The UFO mystery has certainly played a role in my life and it has ushered in a whole new set of ideas. I now have a completely altered view of reality and of my own consciousness.

Spiritual awakening is as good a term as any for what I've experienced, but what does that mean and where do I go with it?

As stated previously, one of the questions I'll ask a witness is: What was going on in your life leading up to the sighting? Then I'll follow that with: What has changed since the sighting? I've heard a few witnesses say that before seeing a UFO their life had been going poorly, they had been feeling stuck and confused. Now, it would be perfect if the next thing they said was that after their sighting that they had become unstuck and saw things clearly, but I haven't heard that reply yet. What I have heard with consistency is that the sighting forced them to look much deeper at the meaning of reality itself. They'll start mediating, begin reading spiritual books, or take college courses in advanced physics. It is very common that they'll quit their job and begin an entirely new life, working to help people with a new dedication to these more mystical ideals. It is also pretty common that they'll write a book.

I need to add one more amazing event tied to me and David Weatherly. During the editing process for the original 2013 essay Owls and the UFO Abductee, I asked David to review the text. I had written a lot about shamanism and I wanted his input to make sure my description wasn't out of line. I sent him a document of my work-in-progress, and a few days later he sent me this:

I think you'll find it interesting to know that I actually read your piece last night just as the sun was going down. I have a window right by my desk. I'd say I was about halfway through the piece when I noticed a bird flying by out of the corner of my eye. I watched it fly in an arc away from the window and then back around. It landed on a tree nearby and that's when I got a clear look at what it was, an owl! First one I've ever seen here at my house [where I've lived for over 20 years].

So, a shaman sees an owl while fact checking the ideas of a UFO abductee on shamanism and owls. This is the same shaman who had an owl land on the hood of his truck and stare into his eyes when he arrived at the home of a family having UFO experiences.

As I proceed forward in this research, I keep on bumping into this shamanism stuff and seeing that it's intertwined with the deeper mystery of both owls and UFOs. The presence of the owl seems intimately related to the role of the shaman. The owl has large eyes that allow it to see in the dark.

That ability to peer into the darkness is a metaphor for the mission of the shaman. We are all confronted with the darkness and the fears behind its curtain. It is the shaman's responsibility to access that hidden realm and come back with a message.

The role of the shaman

The late mythologist Joseph Campbell saw the role of the shaman as something vitally important within ancient societies, but our modern culture is adrift without it. He pointed out that one of the markings of the young shaman was a psychological break from reality. The shaman is the person, male or female, who in his late childhood or early youth has an overwhelming psychological experience that turns him totally inward. It's a kind of schizophrenic crack-up. The whole unconscious opens up, and the shaman falls into it. This shaman experience has been described many, many times. It occurs all the way from Siberia right through the Americas down to Tierra del Fuego.[\[62\]](#)

In our modern world, we simply can't tolerate the idea of a child falling into their own deeper selves. It is never considered that this turn inward could prove vitally important to the greater community. The idea of a shaman sickness is well understood in indigenous cultures, but westerners have no reference point and treat it as mental illness. Beyond the emotional collapse, a potential shaman might be recognized by the village elders because of powerful visionary experiences. These might be the appearance of an animal guide that is identified within the tribe's shamanic mythology. This is very often an owl.

It's easy to imagine a frightened tribesman in a jungle village telling of an owl taking him on a vision quest. But what about a traumatized insurance salesman in Ohio telling of aliens taking him onboard a flying saucer? The question is, are these the same stories? And the follow up would be, will these initiates someday play a similar role?

We need shamans

Joe Lewels, Ph.D., is the author of two books that had a big impact on how I think about UFOs: The God Hypothesis and Rulers of the Earth. He has been doing abduction research for decades. I contacted him specifically to ask about shamanism. He had spent time with Harvard Psychologist, Dr. John Mack, and they traveled together throughout Mexico talking to shamans about their connections with other realms. Dr. Mack was doing research for his 1999 book, Passport to the Cosmos, where he argued that direct UFO contact could be compared to a shamanic initiation (more on Mack's work later in this chapter).

After his years of research, Joe now frames alien abduction as something deeply spiritual. I asked him if he had any UFO contact experiences, he said he had asked himself that same question many times, and feels strongly that he hasn't.

Here is an excerpt from my conversation with Joe. He was articulating what I have been feeling.

I see what's called the alien abduction phenomenon, and I don't like that term... let's say experiences with non-human intelligence... and the people who are having these experiences are, many times rather unwillingly, being dragged into a shamanic apprenticeship. The people having these experiences are being taught how to heal, their consciousness is being elevated, they are being given opportunities to help people. Many of them will leave their jobs and then become Reiki masters and massage therapists and hypnotherapists. All of these can be seen as forms of shamanic activity...

We need shamans, and if society doesn't provide it, the universe will.

I have been speaking with all kinds of people who tell of UFO contact and beyond what Joe listed. A lot of them are channelers, dowsers, psychic mediums, animal communicators, energy healers, and past life regressionists—or they've written a book with a focus on expanded consciousness. It seems that the UFO occupants are trying to influence humanity by seeding our population with shamans, or at least people with certain shamanic skills.

My first Reiki session

One thing I see with a remarkable consistency within this pool of UFO experiencers is that a lot of them are practicing Reiki masters. Reiki is an ancient Japanese technique for stress reduction, relaxation and healing. The practitioner will use their hands to connect to an unseen energy within the patients body.

The word Reiki is made of two Japanese words, Rei which means God's Wisdom or the Higher Power and Ki which is life force energy. The outcome from this kind of treatment can be as simple as feelings of peace and well being, while other times people experience miraculous healings.

I had my first Reiki session in 2013 with a woman in my hometown. At the end, she told me, "Well, what I'm getting is that you are having a Kundalini Awakening.” In its simplest definition, this would be a more eastern way of saying spiritual awakening.

As we talked, I asked if she ever had any odd owl experiences. She said, “Not really, except for what happened last night while I was out for a walk, that was pretty intense.” This got my attention, and I said I needed to hear what happened. She explained that the night before, a huge owl had led her down a path. It flew ahead of her, stopping several times on tree branches waiting for her to catch up.

I calmly told her, “That was me. That owl was all about this, us here right now.”

She thought for a moment and agreed. Later that night she contacted me to tell me about seeing another big owl perched on a nearby fence post. It watched her as she walked by. This happened on the evening of the same day we’d had our session together.

So, my local Reiki practitioner had seen two big owls, two nights in a row, with my Reiki session sandwiched in the middle. I asked her if she thought she might be a UFO abductee, and she said no.

Stanislav Grof

Stanislav Grof is a psychiatrist and one of the initial investigators in the field of transpersonal psychology. He was at the forefront of LSD research in the 1960s as well as playing a pivotal role in the pioneering research of non-ordinary states of consciousness. He developed holotropic breathwork after LSD use was criminalized in the late 1960s. This is a disciplined breathing technique used to induce a mystical state. Grof has stated that the dreamlike imagery in these altered states, what he called holotropic states, often contains solutions to the pressing questions of the mind. These solutions very often come in the form of a non-ordinary experience, and sometimes they even include owls. Grof wrote:

Synchronistic events are particularly frequent in the lives of people who experience holotropic states of consciousness in their meditation, psychedelic sessions, experiential psychotherapy, or spontaneous psycho-spiritual crises. Transpersonal and perinatal experiences are often associated with extraordinary coincidences....

Similarly, when we have a powerful experience of a shamanic type that involves an animal spirit guide, this animal can suddenly keep appearing in our life in various forms with a frequency that is beyond any reasonable probability. In one of our six-day training modules, a participating psychologist experienced in her holotropic breathwork session a powerful shamanic sequence in which an owl played an important role as her power animal and spirit guide. That same day, she returned from a walk in the forest with remnants of an owl. When she was driving home after the module had ended, she noticed by the side of the road a large wounded bird. She stopped the car and came closer; it was a large owl with a broken wing. The owl allowed her to pick him up and take him to the car without showing any signs of resistance. She took care of the bird until he was able to fly and return to his natural environment.[\[63\]](#)

Finding a wounded owl, actually picking it up and healing it has the feel of a fable spoken by an elder around the campfire. This owl emerged during a time of deep self-examination using techniques to induce a non-ordinary state of consciousness. It feels like dream symbolism had manifested in the real world for some experiential purpose. This could be a clue, an archetype, a metaphor—or perhaps a gateway lesson to the role of the shaman.

An abductee's experience aboard an alien craft is consistently described as something beyond normal waking consciousness. These people will struggle to articulate the utter strangeness of their experience, as if some aspect of their mind has been altered. Or, it might be reality itself that's been altered, much like descriptions of the Oz-Factor.

The near-death experience

The near-death experience (NDE) can be seen as yet another non-ordinary state of consciousness. The hospital patient on the operating table who momentarily slips beyond the confines of life will come back telling a story with a long list of similarities described in other accounts. These include: entering a white realm, meeting dead relatives, experiencing oneness, communication through telepathy, and a feeling of timelessness.

A set of divergent narratives are at play, and they seem to parallel certain mystical traditions. Like being abducted from your bedroom by aliens, “going into the light” has become part of our modern folklore. There is also a pattern to what happens in the aftermath of these defining events. Things like a sense of renewed life purpose, changes in spiritual ideas, a sense of mission in life, a total shift in life direction, a new environmental awareness, emotional difficulties, psychic experiences, and weird synchronicities. UFO abduction, near-death experiences, and shamanic initiation all include these points, as if the source is the same thing.

The UFO abductee, near-death experiencer and shamanic initiate will struggle trying to describe what has happened to them in their journeys. They'll say that mere words can't explain the magnitude of what they've experienced. It seems they're trying to explain a different dimension, something well beyond the normal physical plane we call reality. These events aren't being described as something hallucinatory, but as something entirely real, as if it is more real than real. It's as if this physical realm we occupy is the illusion, and that other realm is the real world.

Dr. Suzanne Gordon is a near-death experience researcher, who, curiously enough, has had her own NDE, psychic experiences and a very intense close-up UFO sighting. She has spoken to hundreds of people who have had the NDE, only to return to this physical realm and succumb to a sort of metaphysical anguish. She refers to this suffering as the trauma of enlightenment.

I know more than a few folks who've had the one-two-punch of both UFO abduction and the NDE. (Jacquelin Smith's story as an example, told later in this book). These people are either deeply empathic, outright psychic, or most often both. There is an unmistakable pattern where these double-whammy people are now working as therapists, energy healers, or psychic mediums. They've dedicated their lives to helping others. Like the shaman, they have lived the role of the owl.

A flying saucer is simply a craft that can take someone to another realm. But so is the magic mushroom, shamanic initiation, and even death. There are people who have traveled on these elusive craft, traversing across ethereal barriers into other realms and returning with a message. This is the mythology of the owl, the messenger.

These messengers are here, right now, among us. They are playing the vital role of the shaman, a role that has been with us throughout the ages, but their stage is no longer the campfire at the center of the village, where they would have once been respected. It's now happening in therapist offices and on massage tables. This good work goes on despite being ignored (or scorned) by the majority in our modern society. Yet, I sense a change in the recent history; little by little, a fading away of the ridicule. What was once considered the lunatic fringe of energy healers and psychic mediums is steadily becoming commonplace.

I sense a similar growing acceptance among the general public concerning accounts of UFO abduction. In decades past, these claims were met with vicious contempt, but this is less true today. While strong skepticism certainly remains, it doesn't seem to have the venom of just a few years ago.

Dr. John Mack was a Pulitzer Prize-winning professor of psychiatry at Harvard Medical School, his research with Dr. Joe Lewells was noted earlier in this chapter. Dr. Mack wrote two books on the alien contact experience, the first was Abduction (1994), an account of his years working as a clinician with UFO experiencers. In his final book, Passport to the Cosmos (1999), Dr. Mack compares and contrasts the initiation rites of the shaman to what is being reported by UFO abductees. I read Passport to the Cosmos when it came out and it had a really powerful impact on the way I frame the more challenging aspects of this mystery. This book mentions owls a lot, either in the context of the screen memory of the abductee or as the totem animal of the shaman.

As part of his research Dr. Mack sought out traditional shamans to better understand the phenomenon. He asked specifically about the skinny gray entities and the UFO contact experience, and all these shamans gave a similar answer: “We know about this, this is commonplace in our lives, and we know about these beings, we’ve had the experiences.”

Dr. Mack spoke with Native American medicine man Sequoyah Trueblood, who lives on the Kahnawake reservation in Canada. He asked him, “Well, Sequoyah, you’ve known 150 medicine men or so in your life. How many of them have had these kinds of encounter experiences?”

Sequoyah, replied, “All of them.”

That’s a bold statement and the implications are staggering. I contacted Sequoyah Trueblood to verify what he said, and he confirmed it as correct. He spoke in a calm way, detached from the rigid constraints of the modern UFO abduction researcher. He told me that medicine men and shamans all over the world are in communication with beings from other realms and other dimensions. It seems too simplistic to say that they are all UFO abductees, but more that they have all interacted with these beings on a deep level. These relationships certainly involve what we know as the classic gray aliens from the present day abduction lore, but also nature elementals and the spirits of ancestors.

He said, “When you carry that pipe you can no longer hold judgement. You have opened a door to let these beings in from their other realms. When you are open, these things happen.”

Sequoyah explained that the word shaman comes from saman, a term used by the indigenous Buryat people in Siberia. In their language it means a person who lives in two worlds at the same time. This could also be said of the UFO contactee.

Author Sarangerel studied shamanism with the Buryat and wrote that the, “Owl is believed to be a patron of shamans.”

I need to add that my phone conversation with Sequoia came within minutes of me seeing a beautiful barred owl in a tree near my home. When I told him this, he said that it didn’t surprise him in the slightest.[\[64\]](#)

The first experiencer support group

I spoke at length with a woman named Elizabeth about her lifelong UFO contact experiences. Like so many others, she has had some powerful owl events as well.

She tells of driving down a rural road with her father when she was about 15 or 16 years old. They drove past a barn at twilight and saw a set of large birds swirling around near the roofline. They stopped and got out of the car in hopes of identifying the birds and it soon became obvious they were looking at owls. At that point the owls came over to look at them, she and her father both got down, lying together on their backs in a low trench and looking up at the sky. They counted twelve owls, and they flew above them for about 20 minutes. One by one they would swoop down low and glide just over them. Her father took photos and later identified them as barred owls by their wing markings. This happened over 30 years ago and I could hear the elation in Elizabeth’s voice as she described the sensation of these owls all lining up and silently passing over her and her father, one after another, like planes in a flight pattern over an airport.

Elizabeth tells of having a strong ability to communicate with animals, and this seems to play out in her many owl sightings. Her dad is a biologist and skilled naturalist, and she followed in his footsteps. She made it very clear to me that her father was also an abductee.

Elizabeth was living in the Boston area in 1989 when five gray aliens appeared in her bedroom at night. She called this her awakening experience, and it lead her to contact Budd Hopkins in New York, who put her in touch with Dr. John Mack. She started working together with Dr. Mack in 1990.

She went to the very first experiencers support meeting at John Mack’s home. This would have been very similar to any other support group, like alcoholics anonymous, where people sit together in a circle and share their experiences with the hope of finding some solace in the companionship. Elizabeth was intimidated by one of the members of this group, a man who was big and awkward and gave her the initial impression of being scary.

When the meeting ended, she left with a small crew of attendees that had car pooled together. As they were pulling out of Dr. Mack's driveway they all asked each other what they thought of the meet up. Elizabeth commented about the big scary guy, "Well, I don't want to be a member of any club he's a part of."

At that moment an almost impossibly large snowy owl flew above their car. It was low and close, coming from behind and flying right out in front of them. Elizabeth was amazed at the size—the wingspan seemed to be as wide as the car itself. It flew in front of them on a quiet tree lined street all lit up by the car headlights. They watched this giant white bird lead their way for what seemed like a very long time before it turned off into the tall trees alongside the street.

Everyone in the car felt the same thing, that owl was meant to fly down the road in front of them. One person even said that she thought, "The owl was trying to tell us that we were on the right path."

So, after the very first experiencer group meeting at the home of Dr. John Mack, a car full of abductees is guided down a road by a giant white owl. I can't help but get the feeling that this owl was sitting on the roof of Dr. Mack's house, patiently waiting for this moment to make its dramatic appearance. Elizabeth has never seen an owl that large before or since.

She continued with the support group, and eventually found a deep connection with that big scary guy. He became one of Elizabeth's closest and dearest friends.

Many of the reports in this book describe folks seeing white owls. There are really only two species that would match that description, the barn owl and the snowy owl. Both have a wide ranges spanning over huge sections of the globe. The snowy owl spends the summer in the far northern latitudes, and migrates south in the winter. The barn owl is a fairly common bird on every continent, but neither of these birds are truly white. The snowy owl is speckled with small black dots, and the barn owl has pale tan wings and back. The underside of their wings and bellies are almost pure white in both species. If these owls are illuminated in flight by car headlights they can appear ghostly white.

Within many of the world's shamanic traditions, especially the Native American lore, the white owl has a deeper spiritual role than other owls. If one sees a white owl, then it is thought to be delivering an inward message. The communication isn't meant for anything worldly—it is a message for the soul.

Like so many others who have had these experiences, Elizabeth is a practicing Reiki master. She is also a spirit medium, psychic healer, and an animal communicator. She feels that her skill as an animal communicator has somehow played a part in her many owl sightings.

When asked about her psychic abilities, she feels that this all traces back to her contact experiences. Pretty much all her communication with the UFO occupants has been telepathic, and this has somehow influenced the workings of her inner-mind. She says that when you interact with these alien beings using psychic means, the doors of consciousness get blown wide open. This allows all kinds of other things to rush in through that wide open gateway.

Another experiencer, Kim Carlsberg, addressed these same issues by saying: “Once you’re opened up, you’re opened up to everything.”

Would it be accurate to declare Elizabeth a shaman? That’s tricky to answer, but like so many others, she certainly seems to be filling the shamanic role with her many clairvoyant skills. She feels her contact experiences are the source for these skills, and she has been using them to help people, a pattern seen in a lot of experiencers.

I get the fleeting sense that the UFO occupants are looking down at Earth from their viewscreens and seeing we are in a heap of trouble. Instead of downloading scientists and politicians with the pragmatic solutions to all our global problems, they are instead planting the seeds for a new crop of shamans. Or, the UFO occupants might be part of a team of entities that are hidden from our normal perception, and they have been working together since the dawn of man to create shamans. Both these scenarios are overly simplistic, but something is interacting with these people and—against all kinds of societal pressures—they are following a shamanic path.

Chapter 17: Mushrooms and Meditation

The vision quest

I am friends with a woman named Artemesia (a pseudonym), and like so many in this research, she has had a lot of very similar experiences to my own. Even though we've never met, we've spent a lot of time on the phone, and the timelines of our lives overlap to the point of absurdity. In fall of 1999, she and her boyfriend Chris went on a vision quest in Yellowstone National Park. This involved taking psychedelic mushrooms with the formal intention that it served a spiritual purpose, so this wasn't just two nature-lovers getting stoned for kicks.

They had spent over half the day in an altered state, and they had strayed away from any trails when the sun went down. They were wandering around one of the thermal areas of the park when they started heading back to the safety of their car, but soon realized they were lost in the dark, thermal fog, mud, and a tangle of fallen trees. They struggled to find a way back and finally entered a meadow of easier travel only to see an unusual grouping of big boulders in this open area. Artemesia sensed something was wrong, and she got out her headlamp, turned it on and saw lots of eyes shining back at her. She heard grunts and realized she and Chris had wandered into a field of buffalo. She writes:

I turned off the light right away so as not to piss them off, and just as I did so a huge, and I mean huge owl swept down out of a nearby snaggy dead looking lodgepole and buzzed right over our heads, actually knocking off my friend Chris's hat with either its wing beat wind or by its actual talons, we weren't sure which. But it was close. I was really freaked out. We had to backtrack and do more log walking over thermal bog in total darkness with no headlamps to get to 'safe' ground, away from the bison.

We discussed it all later, and the owl, though it was only one small feature in the whole afternoon of visions and adventure, stood out as highly significant for both of us. At the time I wondered if it really was an owl, if it was sent to warn us, or if it might have been something else. It was easy to think like that due to the 'vision quest' context that already encompassed the whole event.

The use of psychedelic drugs might make a pragmatic researcher throw this report in the trash, but I'm not so quick to dismiss. The story seems to hold some clues. The fact that she and Chris were consciously setting out to have a 'vision quest' seems relevant. I feel that this kind of seeking can be seen as a ritual act with a real power. Especially when, in a moment of real danger, an owl knocks someone's hat right off their head! Could this owl have saved their lives?

I was told another story where a life might have been saved by an owl. A man named Kevin was driving at night on a lonely highway in the desert, fighting to stay awake. The window was open to keep him from falling asleep, but it wasn't working. Right as he was nodding off, he saw what the thought was an upright log in the middle of the road, and then wings flapping. Kevin was suddenly jolted awake when the wing of an owl slapped him in the face through the open window.

Back to Artemesia. At the time of this experience, she was unaware of any UFO events in her life. Since then she has seen what can only be described as alien beings, while at the same time receiving telepathic communication. This happened in a full waking state and was not retrieved during hypnosis. This experience (among others) has forced her to recognize her own direct contact experiences.

This same woman had another very interesting owl experience, again with a guy named Chris. Two different owl events, two different guys named Chris. This is one more example (or two more, really) of owl stories that involve someone named Chris. This odd pattern was noted earlier in Chapter 6, on Owls and Synchronicity.

The shamanic journey

Mushrooms play an important role in the life of Shonagh Home. She is a practicing shaman, and she has also had an intense set of owl experiences, both visionary as well as literal. Her story of awakening and transformation is covered in depth in Chapter 9, which features “back-to-back” reports.

Like any shaman, she ritually travels into a non-ordinary state of consciousness. These realms are called by many names, but they take the observer out of the normal and into a place where the rules of reality no longer apply. Shonagh uses high doses of psilocybin mushrooms in sacred ceremonies to step beyond the veil, and she has been guided by a giant white owl in her most important journeys. She sees the owl, along with the mushroom medicine, as a powerful ally in her shamanic work.

Although she's seen a UFO, Shonagh says she has never had any abduction experiences, but these medicine journeys, along with some of the events in her waking life, closely parallel what I've heard from UFO abductees. Would this make her one of the maybe people? Well, maybe.

I've heard from another shaman who tells of interacting with beings from UFOs in non-ordinary reality. But he also says: “I'm sure I've never been abducted, I think I would know. A shamanic person is able to remember and process extreme spiritual experiences without going insane, swimming in waters of consciousness where a ‘normal’ person would drown. If you want to take someone away, do strange things to them and bring them home with amnesia, a shaman is the wrong person to choose!”

He is implying that if a shaman gets abducted by aliens, they would have the transcendental skills to break through the missing time and access those hidden experiences, and that might be true. That said, I have also spoken to other shamans who are very open about their UFO contact experiences. They describe a similar conflicting narrative of both trauma and ecstasy, including missing time, a story told by so many others.

There is an obvious transformative power to UFO contact, but experiencing an intense synchronicity can also produce its own jolt to the system. The heightened state that you access when experiencing a profound synchronicity could be just as valid. Perhaps more so, because your experience is spontaneous. UFO contact, mushroom trip, or synchronicity all have the power to change someone. There are a host of other non-ordinary states that can transform, including the near-death experience, trauma, out of body experiences, and deep meditation.

Owl in the circle

Melanie is one more of these maybe people. Even though her experiences hint at UFO contact, she states she is not an abductee. She’s had a lot of very strange life events, and this unusual owl experience when she was 22 is a typical example. She took mushrooms with a group of friends. The mood was both recreational and sacred. It was at night in a forest, and they were sitting together in a circle, all fully in the psychedelic throes of the hallucinogen. She told me a great horned owl landed in the circle of tripping friends and then just stood there. Her description was that it was well over three feet tall, which is impossibly large for any owl. Here again we have the overlapping of people on mushrooms and a very bizarre owl experience.[\[65\]](#)

Are the non-ordinary states of consciousness created by mushrooms similar to the distorted reality described by UFO abductees? Could owls be attracted to some weird vibe produced by these trippy states? Does someone in the throes of a hallucinatory ritual give off some subtle glow that can be seen by an owl? Is the seeker manifesting the owl? There is a shorthand to both the UFO and the entheogenic medicines—they are said to open a window or doorway to another realm. Psychedelic visions, owls, UFOs and shamanic initiation are all overlapping and blending together, making any one interpretation nearly impossible. What can be said is that these people, either reluctant or willing, end up transformed by their experiences.

Lauren's story of spiritual transformation

I received an email from a woman name Lauren who had found the owl essay on my site. She wrote (italics my own):

I stopped reading the essay because I just have to tell my owl story too, and I feel overwhelmed with emotion. I experienced the owl after ingesting a lot of psychedelic mushrooms, psilocybin. What it felt like was that an owl had flown into my brain. I don't know how else to describe it. It lasted for several hours and the owl was largely the only vision I experienced during that particular trip. I was inside my house, lying on the floor.

At this time in my life, I was addicted to alcohol, pills and anything that would get me high. After this experience with the owl and several more trips on psilocybin, I stopped taking all drugs and drinking. I'm still sober four years later.

The owl has appeared at other times in my life since then—a real owl, in my yard. And also in my dreams.

In a follow-up email Lauren shared more:

I was in a very dark place in my life when mushrooms and consequently owls entered into the picture... The owl I saw during that first trip was flying and it seemed to fly into my head, and I emerged later, a changed person... Some would say that the owl and the other visions that followed were some part of my unconscious mind, but no, the owl was something outside of me, some power that came to me and helped me. I am sure of that.

She was very clear that the mushrooms, along with the owl imagery, had saved her life. She also described other mushroom trips where what seemed to be a flying saucer made of a clear substance landed in her room. Another time she had the impression that a huge saucer was landing just out her window. Afterwards, she was left with a feeling of love coming from the whole experience, and she wondered if she went on the saucer with them. This trippy imagery could be dismissed as nothing more than the psychedelic effects of the drugs, but it's the mythic symbolism that fascinates me.

She repeated that before these experiences, she had absolutely no interest in owls or UFOs, let alone God or spirituality. Whatever happened not only ended her drinking, but left her convinced that there is a spiritual reality to life.

I continue to occasionally see owls (real ones!), and they always make an appearance on an auspicious occasion... And just a few days ago, on Halloween, as I was thinking of writing to you, I saw one sitting on a telephone wire, and he looked right at me. It seems to me that owls look directly at you in a way that no other bird does.

... The UFO experiences I've had gave me that impression that maybe flying saucers are a vehicle, literally and metaphorically, that God uses to communicate with us.

By that definition, the flying saucer would be God's messenger, and that's the same role played by the owl.

I contacted Lauren to review the text I had written, the account you've just read. She emailed her reply saying I'd captured her experience accurately and gave me permission to share her story. At that point it had been almost five months since either of us had exchanged any emails. Then she added this:

Also, two days before I received your email, a barred owl appeared in my yard. It flew by just a few feet in front of me and landed in a tree. I watched it for a while... I see owls so infrequently that it always seems like such an event, and such a blessing.[\[66\]](#)

I am at the point where I no longer see this as simply coincidence. To me, this is a form of confirmation, and it keeps me moving forward. Every spiritual seeker is following their own path, and the tools they use along the way have their own ecstasies—as well as dangers. Those owls, both real and psychedelic, are appearing in Lauren's journey in a way that replicates the traditions of our ancient past. Her experiences are feeding me and my own need for a deeper knowing.

The UFO encounter that changed Bill Hicks

“I have had seven balls of light come off a UFO, lead me on their ship, explain to me telepathically we are all one and there's no such thing as death...”

That line was delivered by the late Bill Hicks in 1991 as part of his stand-up comedy routine. The first question would be, was that a joke? And the next question would be, was that line true? The UFO experience happened to Hicks, along with his childhood friend Kevin Booth, on the day of the Harmonic Convergence in 1987. At the time they were tripping heavily on psychedelic mushrooms.

Having corresponded at length with Kevin, I feel certain neither he nor Bill were physically abducted at the hands of alien beings. Nonetheless, the power of this mystical event had a huge impact on both their lives.

Bill Hicks died of cancer in February 1994 at the age of 32. His role as a comedian was something far more forceful than just a guy on stage telling jokes. It was as if he were pleading with the audience to live a life without fear. He had an intense stage presence, was sweaty, and seemed uncomfortable in his own skin. He smoked and made jokes about it—I'm a heavy smoker. I go through two lighters a day. He was brilliant in his direct attack on consumerism and pop culture. It is easy to say a comedian is “dangerous,” but this is the perfect word for how he confronted his audience with the darkest underbelly of America, and at the same time imploring for a deeper spirituality.

Kevin wrote a book about his lifelong friendship with Bill Hicks, called Agent of Evolution. This book has the word “Evolution” right in its title, and some of that traces back to this mushroom and UFO experience. Kevin wrote:

I think Bill always thought he could get somewhere else. This was the moment it was proved to him. It's easy to point out the obvious: You took five grams of mushrooms, of course you are going to see spaceships and all kinds of other shit that doesn't exist. That's why they call them hallucinogens. They cause hallucinations.

That's a valid argument. But we were taking hallucinogens to help boost consciousness. It was more like a key opening a door. The door was there without the drugs. What the mushrooms would do is they would allow two or more people to get in sync and open the door together and walk through it together and experience what's in the next room together.

They purposely chose the day of the Harmonic Convergence because “everyone else around the world was all supposed to be logging on to the same metaphysical chat room at the same time. It was part of the mental telepathy.” They sat together outside on Kevin's family ranch in Texas, treating the event as a sacred ritual.

Kevin explained: “We took five grams. Five grams of dried mushrooms is a lot. If you wanted to punch a hole through the fabric of space-time, five grams is good. But don't try it yourself... unless you are ready and willing to cross the threshold.”

What unfolded was a shared UFO experience. Kevin describes something ridiculous, like something from a bad science fiction movie. The inside of the ship was like a conch shell. They walked together down a spiraling ramp through a hallway of light and then toward a circle of light. It was here that they met lustrous glowing beings.

Bill and I were both in the ship. He was asking questions like: “Why are you here? Why is this happening?” I remember coming out with explanations of time travel and a firm belief that the barriers to time travel and communication were all inside your mind. Basically anything was possible. These beings were bridging the gap between belief and non-belief. Between love and hate.

At the time I was thinking that my head conjured up this image just for me to see, then Bill indicated to me he had seen and experienced the exact same thing.

After that we realized that we were able to communicate completely telepathically.

Bill had taken mushrooms two times before a performance. The first time he felt he had more than just the ability to make people laugh while tripping, he thought he was able to read the collective mind of the audience. This was powerful, but the “telepathy” experience with the UFO was way more intense. He took mushrooms before another performance, but this time it was horrible and he never did it again.

Back to the psychedelic experience onboard the ship:

This was very specific. For the first time ever, Bill and I were able to say things and hear each other back, able to ask questions and get answers. We had a perfectly normal conversation without either one opening our mouths. We were perfectly in sync. It was like a miracle. We communicated like this for a while. Neither of us saying anything...

It went from being the two of us being able to communicate with each other, to us being dialed into a network where now we were in open communication with hundreds, thousands, maybe millions of minds at the same time. There was something identifiable in it, like we could trace where the voices were coming from and who they were. Everybody was sharing this moment because they wanted to. It seemed as real as the words on this page. It was freeing. And it was unbelievable. We just laid on the floor and stayed tapped into whatever we had tapped into.

Bill changed after taking those mushrooms. Kevin stated, “...the UFO experience during the harmonic convergence had an extremely powerful impression on Bill that lasted throughout his short life. It’s as if a heavy burden had been lifted from him and everything he had always believed but couldn’t prove had been affirmed and he could move on with confidence to the next phase of his life.”

Kevin wrote: “... the spaceship, that was the most important thing that ever happened to Bill. He saw the ‘source of light that exists in all of us.’ Later he said, ‘God, I hope that was just the first of many things just like that.’”

Bill would talk about the UFO experience during his stand-up routine. Kevin wrote: “I think the crowds were confused by it. Was it a metaphor? Was it a joke? Where was the punchline? But the first time he talked about it during a show, I was proud and amazed but also a little bit embarrassed.”

The works of ethnobotanist and psychonaut Terence McKenna fascinated Bill, and he would often quote him from stage when he described this UFO experience. Said McKenna: “If you take mushrooms you’re climbing on board a starship manned by every shaman who ever did it in front of you, and this is quite a crew, and they’ve really pulled some stunts over the millennia, and it's all there, the tapes, to be played." So when Bill talked about mushrooms and evolving and UFOs he wasn't joking.

In June 1993, Bill was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer that had spread to his liver. After being told by Bill of the seriousness of his illness, Kevin became obsessed with the hope a miracle was going to happen. It was during this time that Kevin spoke with Bill by phone. They talked about an upcoming planetary alignment that month, another Harmonic Convergence. Bill wanted to do something together for it, but he was too sick. Instead, Kevin took mushrooms and walked along a creek near his home.

It was on that hiking trail that Kevin did something he would normally never do: he prayed out loud, "Please God, give me some sort of sign to let me know if Bill is going to survive this." At that exact moment a large owl landed on a branch and started hooting. It was right up close, directly in front of Kevin. This was during full daylight, and the owl just sat there, staring right at him. Later that day, he spoke to Bill over the phone. Kevin told him about this owl experience, and he just went silent like it was bad news.

Later that night, Kevin spoke to a mutual friend and described seeing the owl. He was told of the owl folklore, that it could be seen as a bad omen, a harbinger of death. He realized that Bill had been very aware of the owl's symbolic meaning during their call.

Kevin told me: "Being the logical minded person I like to think of myself, I didn't make a big deal out of it. Literally the next day, again in broad daylight, right by my house, another owl sat down directly in front of me and this time the hair on the back of my neck stood up."

After that, he had another owl incident at his family ranch. He never told Bill about these follow up owl experiences.

In one of his final phone conversations with Bill, Kevin described another UFO experience that happened while on mushrooms. It happened above Red River New Mexico in the Sangre de Cristo Mountains. He was with his girlfriend and they were hiking at night with his two big wolf dogs.

I don't know why I did this, but I had an entire ritual planned out that included eating the local trout at a specific time—followed by eating the mushrooms—and then all of us hiked up a long dark snow covered trail to the top of a mountain where there was a plateau we would frequent while skiing, but never at night.

The UFO encounter with Bill on... the harmonic convergence was a very comforting, happy spiritual experience. The encounter on the mountain that night was something totally different. It was scary, physical and left us wanting to run for our lives. All I can recollect was a loud harsh sound—almost like a military aircraft. Bright lights and it was if the ground fell out from under our feet.

The next thing Kevin remembers was waking up and thinking that the only reason they weren't abducted was that his extremely badass wolf dogs acted as protectors. He felt that whatever happened that night was mental and physical and was there for a different reason than the earlier encounter with Bill.

My girlfriend and I did not speak one word for almost an hour and ran down the snow covered mountain trail in total darkness. Once we saw the lights of the city we stopped and just like the time with Bill—we both had the same recollection. At this time I stopped and prayed and asked if Bill would survive. I know it sounds like cheap New Age bullshit, but I visualized a giant crystal talking to me—almost like a cheap Star Trek prop—but it said: “Bill is going to die, but that nothing was going to change—everything would be the same and that all of the negativity surrounding his death was all my fears and ego and the fears and egos of others.” When I returned to Austin I told Bill about the UFO experience, but this was only days before he passed and it was as if he was beyond the point of UFOs having any meaning. It was as if he was halfway through the looking glass.

I asked Kevin a question that might be more suited for UFO abductees. I wanted to know if Bill felt a sense of mission, and he replied:

There is no question that Bill was a man on a mission. He believed that since all people are connected by one consciousness it was important to raise that one consciousness... Bill's ultimate expectation was that once mankind could raise its vibration to a higher level we could as one leave the planet and pursue the stars.

One more thing to note. I had sent Kevin a short set of questions, and it was nighttime when he opened the email. He saw an owl out his window as he was answering those questions—he even got a picture.

Owl seen by Kevin Booth while answering questions.

An Owl in Brendan's living room

I've been in contact with a man named Brendan who has had a lot of very odd owl experiences. He shared a couple of stories in his first email to me, and this one caught my attention.

One morning I got up, made my coffee and wandered sleepily into the living room. Imagine my surprise when something huge flew over my head. I made a hasty retreat and closed the door. I then slowly peeked in and saw a barn owl sitting on the window ledge. All the windows were closed so it must have come down the chimney. I opened a window, left the room and it made its own way out. I felt honored to see a barn owl up close in daylight but this was not to be the only time.

Here is one more odd experience, it starts while walking his dog through the woods near his home on a beautiful foggy day. He writes:

After a while, a deer walked out in front of us on the path. I decided to turn around and go back, so that the deer could go on her way in peace. When I got home, I put my dog in the kitchen and then a voice inside me said, walk to the top of the field, so I did. I just started walking blindly through the mist until I found myself standing in front of a tree at the end of the field. In the tree was the barn owl. It looked at me and then jumped onto the ground in front of me. Imagine the scene, a man alone in a misty field standing under a tree with an owl! For about a minute I had the incredible privilege of locking eyes with a wild barn owl and then it flew silently away. This was definitely a spiritual event but its implications are not yet clear to me.

These events happened, along with some other owl sightings, right after what he calls his Kundalini Awakening. Beyond his owl experiences, he has described dreams that sound suspiciously like UFO abduction memories. I asked Brendan if he thought he was a UFO abductee, and he said no. Then I asked if he was a shaman, and he was very cautious how he answered. He implied it wasn't for him to say, that this title must be awarded by his community. That said, he has a long list of textbook experiences that point to a shamanic awakening; this includes a time of spiritual sickness, bonding with a spirit entity, a kundalini awakening and unmistakable visits from power animals.

He wrote me recently about his pull to take the entheogenic mushroom, amanita muscaria. He treated the occasion as a sacred shamanic ceremony, and felt that the spirit of the mushroom was incredibly communicative both before, during and after. He wrote to me:

The night before I took it I had powerful dreams. I was shown a UFO sitting in a forest. A woman came to me, pointed at it and said emphatically, THIS is the advanced meditation!

Owls and meditation

I've received a few accounts of an owl showing up right after meditation. One was shared by a man named Christopher (yet another one), who at the time was 22 years old and living on the Big Island in Hawaii. This was the very first time that he ever tried a sitting meditation. After about 20 minutes, he stood up feeling very peaceful. Then he walked out onto the front porch and saw a white owl flying in swooping circles. It landed in a palm tree right next to the house and sat there. He sensed the owl was looking at him.

He said, "I had never meditated before and I had never seen an owl before." It was right at that time in his life that he went on, what he calls, an underworld journey and got the first inkling that there were at least two things going on at once.

He felt blasted out beyond the ordinary singular sense of himself and reality, and something was showing him that there is indeed a parallel hidden experience. This was frightening to him, seeing a simultaneous reality alongside that other hum-drum Judeo-Christian program that was running the show. This all felt like it showed up in one shot, the white owl, his first meditation, and his awakening experience.

This story, like others, seems to tell of a shamanic initiation. Christopher was offered a glimpse beyond the normal pale framework of reality, with the owl showing up as a marker, punctuating the deeper meaning.

I heard from another man, who told me about a similar experience after meditating alone in the middle of a field, something he loves to do. After his time in meditation, he felt moved to say these words aloud, “My work, it’s for my own upliftment and that of this planet, if you are in alignment with this upliftment, you are more than welcome to manifest yourselves, your mentoring will be truly appreciated. If you are not in alignment with this upliftment, please do not come around, you are not welcome!”

Right after saying that, he saw a small group of crows flying in circles and diving as if they were attacking something on the ground.

It wasn’t too far away so he started walking towards the commotion to see what was happening. When he got closer, he saw it was a big snowy owl. He could see the owl’s eyes staring at him and completely ignoring the crows. When he got closer from it, the owl took off, flying off to his side but staring at him the whole time. It landed again and he got a lovely set of photos.

We’re always with you

Below is an email I received in 2013 from a man named George Poirier, it is posted in its entirety. Although there are no UFOs, this is a perfect example of the mystical that seems connected with the owl. It hits a check-list of points that have been recurring in my own life, as well as in this research. The shaman’s path, initiation, life changes, messages from the beyond, and the thinning of the veils.

I’m 64 years old, and have had unusual shamanic experiences since I was a small child. Many of my childhood experiences included different types of animals. I don’t recall any of them being owls.

At age 40 I began to go through multiple initiation events that changed my life profoundly. After 20 years as an entrepreneur, I became a Mind/Body healer.

In 2002 my partner and I moved to the Blue Ridge mountains in Western North Carolina. From almost the day we arrived we were besieged with owls. They appeared at all hours of the day and night. My partner and I are both very sensitive and felt that the veil where we lived was very thin.

After much discussion I thought that the owls were conveying a message about the power of silence. My partner thought that the message was about being aware of “who” was watching from the other side. We both agreed that the owl medicine had to do with the ability to see behind the veil. From 2002 to 2006 those owls never let up.

In 2007 we left to move to Georgia. The very day we were leaving, I was driving home from running an errand, when an owl flew right at my windshield forcing me to a complete stop. It perched on a tree to my right and the telepathic message was we’re always with you.

On April 13th 2006 I facilitated a breathwork session with an old client and friend. The next morning he suffered a heart attack and died. The next day a huge great horned owl perched ten yards from our back fence during the day and stayed there for several days. Maybe my friend came to say goodbye.

I don't know what all this means beyond what I detailed here to you. I don't recall any abduction experiences.

This single email chronicles a lot. Owls shows up along with a live change to do healing work. The owls symbolize seeing beyond the veil and death. Although George never describes himself as a shaman, his work certainly fits that role. And even though he shrugs off having had any abduction experiences, he does describe the same kind of spiritual awakening that seems to go hand in hand with UFO contact. When an abductee has a profound owl event, is there some heightened vibe that attracts this mysterious bird? It would seem that both the enlightened initiate and the UFO abductee might share this same spark.

So, is it the abduction event that attracts the owls, or the follow up enlightenment? All this owl stuff might not be related to UFOs at all, but instead to a heightened spiritual openness.

Chapter 18: Manifesting Owls

The echo chamber

This book had its genesis in a long format essay which was posted on my blog on the morning of July 3, 2013. After it went up online, I sent out a bunch of notices to folks through Facebook, letting some of my friends and contacts know that there was a new post on my blog. This essay was a big deal for me, it was hard work, and I was proud of how it turned out. What I didn't expect was the immediate response, not so much from the folks reading it, but from the owls themselves. It felt like I was putting myself out there with some bold ideas, and a mysterious echo was bouncing back.

At 8:37 p.m., the same day the owl essay was posted, I got an email from my sister. She lives on the east coast and knows only a little bit about my research into owls, synchronicities, and UFOs. Her email was short and a little bit panicky. She had just heard a friend of the family share a story from his college days. She wrote:

...he had an experience where there were owls involved and he is missing a couple of hours...
OMG call me!

At 9:09 that same night I got this message through Facebook:

I totally just SAW the owl. I went outside and called my BF on the phone (Shawn, the ufologist) and no joke I saw the Owl... It was off in the distance in a big tree but I saw it fly up into the tree and could see it sitting on a branch ... I was telling Shawn, "OMG I just read Mike's essay!"

This came from Adrienne Dumas. Her owl and UFO experiences were featured in the very essay that was posted earlier that morning. Curiously, she was talking with her boyfriend Shawn when she saw an owl. He's had his own powerful sighting of a giant triangular craft, and is now immersed in the study of UFOs.[\[67\]](#)

Owls two nights in a row

A day later, on the morning of Friday July 5, I saw a grainy picture of an owl perched on a power line, it showed up on my facebook page. It was a camera-phone image taken at night from a friend of mine, Melissa, and she's had a lot of UFO contact experiences. It was posted earlier that same morning at 2:59 AM east coast time. She wrote:

I can't explain it, about 15 minutes ago while in my car this huge owl came right over my windshield. It talked to me... hooted ... then did a shrill two part cry and flew away. WTF?

Early in the morning on the next day, Saturday July 6, I saw another very similar grainy picture of an owl from Melissa. This one was also taken at night and it showed an owl on a wooden dock. The image was titled: Second one. Second night in a row.

I contacted Melissa to hear the story behind these two back-to-back owl sightings. She had read my owl essay on Tuesday July 4, and then she went to visit a friend named Laura around midnight that same day. They hadn't seen each other in a while, and they talked until close to three in the morning. Melissa needed to unload about the challenges of her ongoing visitor encounters. Laura was a good listening ear, having seen UFOs with her father when she was younger.

Their heart-to-heart went late into the night. It was one of those conversations that got really deep. They talked about aliens and animal spirit guides—especially birds. Laura explained how she had lived a life full of synchronous hawk experiences. Laura’s father had Native American lineage and he would always tell her that animals will choose you, and these will be your spirit totems. Melissa replied that she loved birds, and if she had to choose her own totem, it would be an owl. She said this shortly before her owl sighting.

The streets were empty as Melissa was driving home, when an owl suddenly swooped down out of the darkness and passed close to the windshield. It scared her, she jammed on the brakes, and watched it float up and land on a power line. She rolled down her window and got a photo. She felt amazing as she drove off—nothing like this had ever happened to her before, and she saw the experience as a gift. Minutes later, she posted the grainy image on Facebook.

The next night, she drove with her fiancé to one of her favorite spots, a quiet road that ended at a lake. They parked in front of a wooden dock talking about their lives and how fitting into society could be so hard. They hadn’t been there long when Melissa looked up and saw a big owl right in front of the car. It was perched on the wooden railing of the dock. They were both surprised because it wasn’t there when they pulled up, and they hadn’t seen it land. How could they have not noticed it until right then?

Melissa told her fiancé she had just seen an owl the previous night. Then it swooped down off the railing toward their headlights, as if it were picking something up right in front of the car.

There are elements in this story that feel choreographed for maximum impact. It was just before the first owl sighting that Melissa’s friend Laura had told her that her spirit totem would choose her, and less than an hour later it showed up on a power line. The follow up sighting feels like the script writer of reality needed two exclamation marks to punctuate the storyline.

Owls had already played a role in Melissa’s life leading up to this two day event. It was seven years earlier, in 2006, that she suddenly became obsessed with owls, buying little figurines, nick-nacks and pictures. This was right at the time when her UFO contact experiences kicked into high gear. Curiously, 2006 was the start of my own obsession with owls, as well as a profound increase in synchronicities.

People seeing owls in connection to me

Like Melissa and Adrienne, I’ve had a lot of people contact me and tell of seeing owls, real owls, in connection to their reading my online essay about owls and UFOs. Beyond just the essay, plenty of folks have told me they've seen or heard an owl right as they are listening to one of my podcasts, or while watching one of my presentations on the internet.

This has been showing up as an undeniable pattern, and you'll read a bunch more examples peppered throughout this book. My very first thought when I hear about these echoing accounts is to wonder if the reader is an abductee, and I make a point of asking. What I'm finding is that a lot of these folks, but not all, will answer yes and then describe a lifetime of UFO contact experiences. Others will say they aren't abductees but still share some extremely odd stories, putting them more into the maybe category. The remainder might have no UFO events in their lives, but they very much come across as spiritual seekers.

I've spoken on the phone to a lot of experiencers, both as part of my research and also where we simply share stories. It has happened more than once that they will call me the next morning to tell me they either heard or saw an owl shortly after hanging up the phone. I'm amazed at how normal all this now feels to me. Maybe I shouldn't, but at this point I have come to expect it.

The blog has been a chronicle of my own challenges and inner turmoil, and I've been trying to describe these experiences and emotions honestly. There are folks out there who identify with what I've been saying, and then reach out to me. I've received a lot of emails that begin with a line like this, I was trying to decide whether or not I should contact you when I saw an owl land on a branch just outside my window. How does anyone process this kind of strangeness?

At this point I really don't need to see any more owls. I'm already convinced there is something going on. What is amazing is that so many other people are having these owl experiences in connection to me. It's this deeper layer of synchro-weirdness that forces me to pay very close attention to my own path. I have a responsibility to this research, to my own experience and especially to all the others who are dealing with something similar. I've found no conclusive answers, only more questions—and a deep knowing that something is pulling on the puppet strings of our reality.

Lauren and a Halloween owl

A woman named Lauren contacted me by email in December of 2013 with a long list of curious owl sightings. One of these happened in 2009 while sitting in her yard; she had a baby barred owl fly down from a tree and land right at her feet. She got down on the ground, crawled right up to the little owl, and said hello.

Another happened in 2010 on, of all nights, Halloween. Lauren's kids were putting their costumes on when a barred owl landed on a branch close to a window, and the whole family watched it for about ten minutes. She intuitively felt like it was the same owl she had seen as a baby, now all grown up, and it was telling her goodbye. She hadn't seen any owls since that night, but that changed with this next account.

The day before sending me the email, she had heard me being interviewed on an audio podcast. That lead her to print out my online essay on owls and read it that night. She wrote about what happened the next morning:

I was home alone, and when I looked out the bathroom window I saw a big barred owl perched in a tree directly in front of me. It stared in my direction for about ten to fifteen minutes... I was floored because I'd just listened to your interview and read your essay, and then there was an owl right outside my bathroom window the following morning.

Just like Halloween three years earlier, she couldn't help but wonder if this was the same owl she had seen as a baby.

... I have no way to tell if it was, but it did feel familiar somehow... It was a very profound synchronicity for me—it was a moment when I felt as though what was happening was “real” and was happening for a reason. I still have no idea why these synchronicities occur, what causes them to occur, or what their intended meaning might be, if there even is any intended meaning at all.

Along with owls and synchronicity, Lauren went on to tell me a long list other odd life events, enough that I sense she would be one of the maybe people. Also, I have a handful of accounts of owls showing up on Halloween, and this seems a little bit too perfect, where the folklore matches the reality. Earlier in the book another woman, also named Lauren, saw an owl on Halloween.[\[68\]](#)

The origins of Halloween date back over 2,000 years to the ancient Celtic festival of Samhain (pronounced sow-in). This time marks the autumn harvest season and the beginning of winter, and this transition between the seasons was seen as a bridge to the realm of the dead. The Celts started their calendar on November 1st, and this final night of the year was a time when the boundary between the worlds of the living and the dead became blurred. It was believed that on this night the presence of otherworldly spirits made it easier for Druids priests to make psychic divinations. All of this ancient lore is mirrored by the mythic role of the owl. In other words, it's not just the fact that owls are seen on Halloween. The night itself and the owl have direct relevance to each other.

Here's another similar story, this one from a woman in Australia. Like the previous account, she heard me interviewed on an audio podcast, and it lead her to read my essay. Here's what happened:

Last night I read your article on owls and was very interested in the whole synchronistic phenomenon concerning the owls. In the past 20 years I have had astonishing and truly amazing experiences with synchronicity. I've been through very hard times and sometimes almost lost my usual intense belief in the Divine. It was the always perfectly timed synchronistic acts that kept me going through dark times and that restored my faith and gave me hope for a better future...

By the time I got to page 31 in your essay, I wondered if I would also have an owl experience like the people you mentioned. I was reading this sentence: "It was a beautiful night and she heard the very clear sound of two owls hooting."

At that VERY moment I heard an owl's hoot outside as I was reading (all happening at the same time)... Needless to say I was overwhelmed!!!! The owl (which I haven't heard before) kept on hooting until I finished reading your article. It stopped and I lay awake for a long time waiting to hear his call again, but he probably left to synchronistically surprise somebody else.

These two accounts from two women seeing and hearing owls in connection to my owl essay are examples of what I am getting almost daily. Both women are framing these owl experiences as outright mystical events, their letters culminating in bold statement like these things are happening for a reason and that they've restored my faith.

I've listened to a lot of people tell their owl experiences, and even though these are just stories of people seeing a bird, they almost always get described as a blessing, an honor, a gift, or an outright spiritual event. Almost all the accounts I receive have a similar mystical undercurrent. For me, the consistency of these stories represents a kind of confirmation, that these experiences go way beyond just owls and tap into something much deeper.

It's understandable that my website would attract people with a similar mindset and similar experiences. This is an emotional subject, and some readers will describe how they feel a connection to my life journey. I get a lot of feedback saying as much, and it makes me all the more committed to my role in this, whatever it might mean.

I've spoken to lifelong abductees at conferences, and asked them that same question—have you ever had any odd experiences with owls? Sometimes they’ll say never, except for the beautiful owl they saw the night before. It feels like the synchronistic power of this stuff can anticipate my question, and sometimes this power seems to present people with owls as if preparing them for connecting with me.

A dream owl with a pen

I got an email from a man whose life has an eerie parallel to my own. We are the same age and some of the key dates of each of our experiences line up with a curious symmetry. Like me, he works as a professional illustrator and our drawing style is oddly similar. While he doesn’t say it directly, what he shares certainly points to some sort of suppressed UFO contact. Like so many others, he seems to fit into that elusive maybe category. Here’s what he said in an email to me (italics my own):

I’ve been wanting to write to you for a few months, but kept chickening out. Then two nights ago I had a very vivid dream that an owl dropped a five-foot fountain pen in front of me (see drawing). I figured that was probably my subconscious or something telling me to just do it.

I have only seen three owls in my life. The first was huge, like a five-foot wingspan, and flew silently over my head at about the same time I was making a weird little 16mm movie. (The film, from 1987, featured a man’s face, wearing a white mask with large black eyes painted on it, slowly appearing at night in the bedroom window of a terrorized woman)

I don’t want to read too much into his weird little movie, but that imagery is kind of obvious. I mean, isn’t it?

The second was when I was driving with my son about three months ago. The owl flew in front of our car and alighted onto a neighbor’s chimney. I had been listening to your podcast just before.

And the third was four days ago when I was looking out the back window and pondering writing to you and an owl suddenly landed on the telephone wires behind our house. I feel stupid writing this, it seems like just goofy coincidence, but, what the heck, there it is.

I no longer believe that there is such thing as a “goofy coincidence” even though they have been piling up around me.

Diana in the driveway

Here's another odd set of events that came from a reader of my blog. Like everything in this chapter, it also includes me. On August 4, 2012, I had my photograph taken sitting near a great horned owl. I was at an event where a local raptor rescue center was taking part in a community fundraiser. The ornithologists from the center had a series of birds on display in a big open barn. There was a golden eagle, a falcon and a great horned owl. This owl had been rescued after someone found it with an injured left wing. It was nursed back to health but was unable to fly, so it couldn't be released back into the wild. Now its life involved living at the raptor center and occasionally being shown at elementary schools and other public events like the one on that day.

the author and his little buddy

In the photograph you can clearly see that the owl's wing hangs awkwardly at its side. I posted this photo on my blog and facebook the same day it was taken.

Four days later, I got a letter from a woman named Diana. That morning she was in her house trying to transfer one of my audio interviews onto her iPod, but the download was going really slowly. She went outside to take the trash to the curb and saw what she thought was a bundle of something in the driveway, when she got closer she realized it was an injured owl. The poor creature could barely move because of an open wound under its right wing. The owl would flop onto its back and as it struggled to get upright, she saw the wing twisting awkwardly. There was almost nothing holding it in place.

She got a dog carrier, and after some struggles got the bird into the container using a rake. She went back into the house to search out a local veterinarian's office that was affiliated with wildlife rescue. After that, she transferred the podcast to her MP3 player. She put the dog carrier with the injured owl in the car with her and drove to the vet. Here's the weird part—during the drive both she and the owl were listening to my voice.

The similarities between her story and my photo are positively bizarre. Both stories feature a wildlife rescue, a great horned owl with an injured wing, and both owls got to listen to my voice. She was also clear that she had not seen the photograph of me and the injured owl before contacting me with her experience. She told me what episode she was listening to, and it involved me and the guest, Lorin Cutts, talking about owls and how they interact with UFO abductees! Very much like me, Lorin has had a long list of extremely strange owl experiences.

I can't ignore the fact that the woman who shared this story was named Diana. In Roman mythology, the goddess Diana was associated with wild animals and woodlands, and she had the power to talk to animals.

People finding wounded owls show up a few times in these accounts. There is the story, discussed in Chapter 9 of this book, from an abductee named Leslie about an owl plopping itself in front of her on the sidewalk, as if it were demanding to be rescued.

I gave my first-ever presentation about this stuff on the stage at the annual International UFO Congress in February of 2014. The next day, I heard from more than one person that the night after my talk there was an owl perched on a tall light pole in the parking lot of the conference center.

I've had people see owls right before calling me on the phone or right after. Same goes for emails, same goes for watching a talk of mine on youtube or DVD. I've had more than one person tell me they saw an owl fly across their windshield while driving and listening to one of my podcasts.

People are seeing owls in ways that seem to be directly connected to me. I fully realize that there are plenty of owls out there, and it isn't really all that unusual to see them every now and again. Yes, sometimes an owl is just an owl, and there is no deeper meaning. But there seems to be a difference in how some of these sightings play out, as if an owl is truly punctuating the moment for dramatic effect.

Seeing giant red UFO eyes

It gets even stranger. I received an email from a man who saw something a little harder to dismiss than an owl. Daniel (a pseudonym) was at his desk early in the morning just before sunrise. He was watching the youtube video of my 2014 presentation on owls and UFOs while at the same time checking his email. He scrolled way down “as if drawn to do so” to find an unopened message that he didn’t remember receiving. At the bottom of that email was a logo with an owl, and he thought this was a funny synchronicity.

It was at this point that Daniel felt compelled to contact me. He began writing an email at the same time my video presentation was playing. Just as he typed the word owl, he looked out the window to see something shocking. There were two large red lights hovering just beyond the trees in his yard, maybe 100 yards away. Daniel said these lights “looked like giant eyes.”

He slowly walked up close to the window to see two more red lights about eight feet below the ones he first noticed. There were now four lights high off the street beyond the trees with the misty white glow that seemed to be radiating toward him. These were positioned as a sort of square, and he sensed some sort of dimensional void in the center.

Daniel tried to take a picture, but just as he was turning the camera on the lights slowly and silently moved off and disappeared. He ran downstairs and was shaking as he told his wife what had just happened. He went back upstairs and looked out the window but there was nothing. At this point his yard was starting to light up with the approaching dawn. He took a picture from the same position he had seen the red lights, and when he looked at the photo there was a ghostly image of a face within the faint glow of sunlight and the pattern of tree branches. I’ve examined this image and even at a glance it doesn’t take much to see the face of a gray alien or a human skull in the photo. Now this could be easily dismissed as nothing more than seeing a face in the clouds, but it gets even stranger.

Daniel had paused the youtube video before running downstairs to his wife, and the frozen image on the screen was something I had drawn and it looked eerily similar to the face that emerged from the photo in his yard. The paused image was an illustration depicting one of my own experiences. In 2009, I was diagnosed with a slight cataract in the lens of my right eye. This tiny growth created a very clear image that only I could see, and it looked like the face of a gray alien or a human skull. I write a lot more about this near the end of this book, in what I call my confirmation event.

In short, Daniel sees what can only be described as a UFO just as he types the word owl. This happens while watching me give a presentation on UFOs and owls. Then he sees the impression of a gray alien's face in a photo taken out the window, a face that matches something I had drawn.

After all that, Daniel writes: "I'm freaked out now. I've never seen anything like this before, and that's not why I was contacting you." He wanted to tell me of metaphysical experiences and some challenging dream-related things that had invaded his life. He painted a dark picture to the lead-up to seeing the red lights out his window. Daniel ended his initial email telling me his middle name is Christopher.

Owls and spiritual awakening

What follows is one more example of the metaphysical power of these events. A man who works in the social sciences contacted me with a notable story. His name is John and he described a lifelong curiosity about the subject of UFOs. In recent months, however, this interest had become an obsession. His inquiry had always stayed close to the nuts and bolts stuff, and avoided anything related to consciousness. In his online searching, he kept coming across a youtube video, the same one noted by Daniel in the previous account. It is a 110 minute long presentation I had given in the UK in 2014. The talk was titled Owls, Synchronicity and the UFO Abductee. John wrote to me:

Before I watched the video, I thought that I wouldn't like it because of the subject matter. However, once I was done watching it, I honestly felt very moved. The idea that synchronicities were special and meaningful was something that I hadn't heard before, but it struck me and resonated. I had experienced them so much more in the last several years. So much so, that I couldn't ignore them and actually felt like I could almost predict them.

Right after he was done watching the video, the phone rang. It was a dear friend named Jamie. Although they hadn't spoken with each other in months, she felt compelled to call him that night at that moment. During their conversation, he told her about the presentation that he had just watched. Jamie then recounted an experience she had while driving in a rural area with her parents while she was still a teenager. They came upon something big, hovering less than 15 feet over the center of the road. Nobody in the car said anything, and simply sat there staring. She described the craft as an elongated triangle, almost almond-shaped. She likened the color to something iridescent, like the surface of a soap bubble reflecting light. They all watched for a few minutes, and the next thing she remembered was being at their destination. This was about 20 minutes traveling time, but it was an hour later. She said that it took a while before anyone could say anything, and all they could do was ask each other what the heck was that? They didn't talk about it after that.

Jamie had never before told John about any of this. John said:

Soon after she told me, I felt compelled to ask her about owls. I simply asked her, "Do you ever see owls?" She said, "Oh yeah, I used to have an owl sit on my window sill all the time, it stared at me and sometimes really scared the crap out of me." She explained that it had been quite a long time since she's seen any owls.

We went on to have a deep conversation that night about these topics, and I was feeling quite jazzed about the whole thing when we got off the phone. About a half hour later, she texted me and simply said, "OMG!!!!" I knew exactly what had happened, and she confirmed that after our previous phone conversation, an owl had landed on her window sill and was looking at her through the window. Strangely, I wasn't shocked and felt like it was just supposed to have happened, almost as if we made it happen. So amazing!

I've now been completely transformed in my understanding of this whole phenomenon and actually have begun to question if I've been an abductee myself. I've had some very unexplainable things happen that lead me to believe that something strange has been happening my whole life. I recently told a friend that the most amazing thing of all this is that the "scientist" in me was simply searching for answers about the phenomenon, but instead what I've found is a spiritual awakening.

John went on to thank me in a way that left me feeling quite humbled. I recognize my responsibility to share what happens along this path, because there are others out there who are confronting this same mystery.

John watched a video of me talking about my personal experiences with owls and it triggered a set of events that transformed his ideas about reality itself. He said: "I feel compelled to explore my consciousness and to pay very close attention to synchronicity." This one email sums up so much of what has been unfolding as I proceed forward—a blurring of owls, synchronicity, and UFOs, and it all culminates in a spiritual awakening.

Summary

There have been times during this research when I was wallowing in doubt about the reality of this owl stuff. These connections seemed too tenuous and too easy to dismiss. But all these accounts of owls showing up for other people in conjunction to me was different, it feels like a very real form of proof. It told me that I was on to something, and that I needed to keep pulling on that golden thread and dig even deeper.

Chapter 19: Owls and Death

Anne Strieber sees a connection

In the follow-up to the 1987 publication of Communion, Whitley Strieber received what he estimates to be a quarter of a million letters from readers. That book, specifically its jarring cover image of the bald gray alien with the huge black eyes, acted as a trigger to people all over the world. There was an emotional need to share what had happened to them, and in that era before email they wrote out their experiences on paper. At a certain point, the post office began coming to his home with big canvas bags brimming with letters, each with someone's deeply personal accounts.

Anne Strieber, Whitley's wife, took on the role of reading and categorizing these letters. She would sit at her desk, day after day, year after year, patiently trying to make sense of this outpouring of stories that define what we now call alien abduction. Within these letters was a repeating pattern of people interacting with their dead friends and relatives while in the presence of the aliens.

Anne had a large chalkboard next to her desk where she would make notes, and there came a day when she wrote, "This has something to do with death." This simple statement became one of the most important realizations for this husband and wife team as they grappled with the mystery of contact.

Whitley wrote this in his 2012 book Solving the Communion Enigma:

It does have something to do with death. In fact, it has to do with the next state in the evolution of this species, which involves a leap ahead into a completely new relationship with ourselves, in which mysteries like death take on an entirely new meaning.[\[69\]](#)

This same statement could be made about owls. All across the globe and all across the ages they have been connected to mysteries of death, either as an omen preceding someone dying, or as a sign of the departed after their passing. A young Native American told me that three owls had shown up around his family's home the night his brother died. He saw these sentinels as three generations of owls: a youth, an adult, and an elder. This symbolic appearance of owls at the moment of a tribe member's death was well understood by everyone on the reservation.

My mother and an owl story

I held my mother's hand as she slipped peacefully away from this life. My sister was on the opposite side of the bed, holding her other hand as she took her last breath. She had been unconscious for several days after having an aneurysm in her brain, and during that time she was in a hospice room at an assisted living facility in North Carolina. It was early in the morning when it happened, and all of us, my brother, my sister, and myself felt a sense of relief that her suffering was over. She had been slowly succumbing to the terrible effects of Alzheimer's, and she spent her final years confused and frightened.

The rest of that day was a blur of trying to sleep, and trying to make sense of the busy requirements that followed. I was staying at my sister's home and that evening my only two siblings, my older brother and sister, were all sitting together side-by-side on a big couch on my sister's backyard deck. We were joined by one of her closest friends, Ruthie, who lived across the street. She was sitting directly opposite from us. It was a warm calm summer evening and the mood was somber but pleasant.

Ruthie is very Southern and very proper. There came a point where she took a deep breath and then formally addressed all of us, me and my two siblings, all facing her on the couch.

She spoke with calm seriousness, "I need to tell you that I know there is an afterlife, I absolutely know this. I know because of an experience I had with an owl."

Right then my sister flinched, she was visibly reacting to Ruthie's statement. My sister exclaimed, "Oh my god, What? An owl?"

My brother, sitting on the other side, gave me this look as if I'd somehow put Ruthie up to this. Both of them were well aware of my owl research and neither of them quite understood what I was doing. I was 50 years old and right then I still felt like the quirky little brother.

My immediate reaction was, oh this again. Ruthie obviously saw our odd reactions, and I spoke up to explain, "Okay, this is very strange. You don't know this but I have been doing research on owls and how they play a role in mythology and folklore, including things like death and UFOs. But, please, I want to hear what happened."

Ruthie explained that a few years earlier, after her father had died, she was in a terrible state of grieving. She was trying to find some solace and she would walk alone on a nature trail that winds around the neighborhood. She did this every day for about two weeks, and each day she would see an owl, which was always perched in plain view.

I didn't know owls were out during the day and especially that one that would let me get so close without flying away. I came to feel like he was my owl.

There came a day when I was out on that trail, just like all those days before, and a hooting made me look up, and he was sitting on a very low branch just staring at me. He wasn't flying off, and I knew this was a special event. I knew that The Lord had let Daddy send me a message that all was well. I feel so fortunate that such a beautiful bird was chosen as the messenger.

The message came as a feeling—a confirmation that Daddy was at peace. I didn't see the owl again after that day, and I felt certain that I had received my message.

Hearing Ruthie's story, I felt a deep connection with her and what I feel is a powerful truth. She didn't need to convince me of anything, I was fully immersed in a sense of knowing, and this was extremely helpful in my own time of grieving.

I had been spending the previous days either at my sister's home or at the hospice care room. One of us, either my brother, sister or myself, was always by our mother's side. During these days, I would get up early each morning and drink coffee with my sister at her kitchen table. I would check my email and then read aloud the daily owl stories I was receiving from people. My sister seemed fascinated, but at the same time baffled. These accounts were filled with dreams, premonitions, UFOs, and death. So when Ruthie spoke of her owl, my sister was fully aware the kinds of stories I had been collecting for this book project. My brother was also aware, but I knew enough not to share too much with him. I sensed this stuff bothered him, so I had been keeping any talk of it to a minimum whenever we were together.

I can't help but feel that hearing Ruthie's beautiful owl experience was somehow staged for the benefit of my siblings. It felt as if it was orchestrated by some sympathetic force, partially to comfort us, and partially so my brother and sister would both get an insight of what I had been going through for the last few years. Owls, whether real, symbolic or in a story told by somebody else, have been continually showing up at highly charged moments in my life. When I tried to explain this to my siblings, I could tell they didn't understand. But now they had been presented with a deeply moving example, with me sitting in between them when it happened.

White owl at the cemetery gate

Christopher Bledsoe Sr. has had both UFO contact and owl experiences. Some of his unusual owl sightings are covered previously in this book. He also had an owl event that played out very similar to Ruthie's.

I met Christopher in May 2013, while I was in his home state of North Carolina. I was there for two weeks visiting my mother in the assisted living center near Charlotte. This was just two months before her death.

I hadn't yet met Christopher, I only knew him from some of the online audio interviews where he described his many experiences. His heartfelt accounts fascinated me, and I simply called him up, explained who I was, and he invited me to his home. I felt completely welcome during my two-day visit. His home was bustling with family, kids, neighbors, and dogs.

During my time there, Christopher, myself, and two other researchers walked across his back yard so he could introduce us all to his parents. His mother and father lived right next door, and this was the house where Christopher grew up, so he had lived his entire life in this one spot.

His father had been dealing with health issues and was now spending a lot of time sitting on a patio bench with an awning above it. He had a beautiful slow and sweet southern accent, and we all sat and chatted together on a calm spring afternoon. His father, like pretty much everyone in the family, had seen UFOs around these homes. He spoke about watching a shiny craft from that very spot. He pointed up at the sky and described what he had seen.

His father died peacefully in early December of that same year. Christopher wrote me to let me know of a powerful experience shared by his entire family as they were leaving the funeral ceremony. They were all together in the limousine on their way home after the church service at the cemetery. It was a cold rainy afternoon, and just as they pulled away from the grave site, Christopher's wife spotted a huge barn owl sitting on a low branch in a tree alongside the road. Everyone in the limo saw the owl—it was looking down at them, perched on the one branch on that tree that allowed for an unobstructed view, as if it wanted to be seen by everybody.

Christopher said it was an amazing thing to see such a big owl, in full daylight, in the pouring rain, at that significant moment. He said everyone in the limousine felt that this was a sign that his father was okay. He described the distinct sensation of being watched, but it wasn't a negative feeling.

Pretty much everyone in his family has had either some sort of UFO sighting, or direct contact. This means a car full of experiencers all saw an owl after a ritual ceremony for a UFO witness.

Researching the experience of death

Dr. Peter Fenwick is a neuropsychiatrist and Fellow of the Royal College of Psychiatrists, and is Britain's leading clinical authority on near-death experiences. Together with his wife Elizabeth, a counselor, they wrote about a remarkable owl event that very much ties into his research on death.

This story happened to a British woman a few months after her mother had died. The first appearance of this owl was on an April morning when she noticed a commotion in her garden. There was a flock of birds dive-bombing an owl which sat quietly on a low branch of an oak tree. She describes what took place.

When I stepped out into the garden, there was a great flapping of wings and the owl flew down and landed in front of me on the grass. It was a large tawny owl about 12 inches high. It looked up at me with big brown eyes and mewed. It seemed very tame.

During the day, every time I went outside, the owl would come down and stand in front of me. It was almost as if it was trying to say something. The big brown eyes looked so human and reminded me of my mother, also brown-haired, who had died the previous summer.

This reaction is remarkably common: someone experiencing a loss will see an owl as their departed loved one. That night, as she and her husband slept, the owl returned. Their bedroom window was open and the owl came inside and sat on the sill, behavior her husband didn't like at all.

The next morning, I opened the kitchen windows. No sooner had I opened the large window over the sink, than there was a great flurry of wings and the owl flew right into the kitchen... I opened the outside door, hoping to coax it outside, but it seemed to be quite at home in the kitchen. It flew down to the other end, and sat on the curtain rail watching me. It had a tremendous wing-span and it was remarkable that nothing was knocked over. Eventually it flew out of the window and sat on the back porch.

When we went out to the car later that morning, it came straight down and perched on the flowerpot I was carrying. As we drove out, it sat on the gatepost watching us.[\[70\]](#)

The owl returned that night to sit at their bedroom window and then the porch the next morning, but after a few days it disappeared.

Dr. Fenwick has a wealth of examples of birds showing up within his research. Dying patients will sometimes see a bird out of the corner of their eye, and then tell their loved ones, "I can see a bird, and they will take my soul when I die." He has also seen a patterns of other birds, not just owls, arriving after a death. They show up as if to comfort the surviving loved ones. Dr. Fenwick explains:

They are usually a bird that the person liked, and they somehow or another appear in the home, sometimes they come down the chimney, sometimes they come in through an open window, and the other animals [in the home] behave in a very strange way to them. These birds are not chased by the cat, and the dog doesn't bark at them. It is as if they are familiar in some way. And when the person who is bereaved comes into the room, they know that the bird is carrying the soul of the person who has just died.

Dr. Fenwick tells of a friend in Massachusetts whose husband had died. Shortly thereafter, a big snowy owl came and sat in a nearby tree outside the home of the family. During the days leading up to the funeral, this owl just sat there and watched. This owl made the local news and there were people from all over Massachusetts coming there and taking pictures. As soon as the funeral was over, however, the owl left.

These owl accounts from Dr. Fenwick closely parallel what I have been finding. I heard one story of a husband and wife who saw an owl perched on the top of the door to their house. It was sitting awkwardly there, clinging to the door frame all afternoon. Later they learned a close friend had died right at that same time. There is death symbolism of both the owl and the doorway.

My father and a mourning dove

My father died peacefully in May of 2012. He was 85 years old. This happened 14 months before my mother's passing. My Dad lived a rich and full life, but like my mom, his last few years were difficult because of challenging health issues. For me and my siblings, this was not a sad event.

After getting the phone call from my brother about dad's passing, I got on a plane and traveled to my sister's home. My parents lived in an assisted living community just a few miles down the road from my sister. As a family, we worked hard to make our father's service something uplifting and inspiring. We had a bagpiper play Scotland the Brave and Amazing Grace.

I drove to the funeral with my sister. When we arrived at the chapel, a mourning dove flew across our path, directly in front of the windshield. Right in the moment I mumbled aloud, "A dove." It was the only bird to pass that close to me in the full eight days I spent with my family, and believe me when I say I pay attention to this kind of stuff.

We parked, went into the chapel, and a few minutes later I went back to my sister's car to get something for the service. There, on top of the car parked right next my sister's van, was a mourning dove. It sat there staring at me, very close. There is no way to know, but my sense was that this was the same bird that crossed our path just minutes earlier. I spoke aloud to this dove, telling it that I was very aware of its message, and what it meant. The dove is a mythic symbol of peace. Even its name, mourning dove, was resonant in that moment.

In the New Testament, the dove shows up as a messenger at the baptism of Jesus. “And the Holy Spirit, in bodily form, descended on him like a dove. And a voice from heaven said, ‘You are my dearly loved Son, and you bring me great joy.’”[\[72\]](#)

ReNae's father and the Ashtar Command

For the most part, this research has been just me collecting a lot of owl stories, and at the onset pretty much all of these accounts were somehow tied into UFOs. I knew from the mythology that owls were associated with death, but at that point I didn't have any accounts that actually demonstrated this. There came a day when I received a heartfelt account from a fellow named David. He told of seeing an owl on a telephone pole looking down on his father-in-law's farm—this happened within hours of the man's death. This owl was perched right in the center of the property, and neither he nor his wife (who had grown up on the farm) had ever seen an owl there before. He felt that this owl was his wife's father, as a spirit symbol, looking at the farm he loved one last time before he left.

This was exactly the email I had been waiting for, an account associating the owl with death—without any of the UFO baggage. I wrote David back, thanking him for sharing. Within minutes, I received a reply:

I am reading your website for the first time and am not sure if you are connecting UFOs to owls, but an interesting feature of my wife's life is she was very psychic. She just passed away two months ago. We met years ago when she was having encounters with Ashtar, this was some alien in a spaceship. She never claimed to be an abductee, this Ashtar stuff was more of a mental thing.

I do not know if there is any relevance here but just wanted to throw that in.

So my very first account of owls and death had a direct connection to UFOs. David summed up Ashtar as “some alien in a spaceship” and that's a pretty good one-sentence definition. The Ashtar Command is a common element reported by UFO contactees and psychics, and a benevolent light-being named Ashtar is said to be the source of many channeled messages.

The material is presented with thick brush-strokes of love and light. This aspect of the phenomenon gets dismissed with contempt by most UFO researchers. Yes, it can sound flaky, but I am not so quick to judge. There is an eerie consistency within the material that comes through a divergent set of channelers. I am less focused on the content of the communications, and more intrigued that so many psychics are coming forward with such similar messages from the beyond.

I expressed my sympathy to David, explaining that my mother had died a month earlier. He directed me to his wife's close friend Diana, feeling she was better able to share ReNae's Ashtar experiences than he could. When I spoke with Diana, she not only described how ReNae had channeled the Ashtar Command, but she also told me her own fascinating owl and UFO story.

When Diana was a small girl, this would have been in the late 1940s, her father cut down a big beautiful oak tree in their yard because an owl would sit in its branches. We talked about how odd this seemed, because an owl could just move to another tree. She once asked her brother if he remembered why her father cut down that tree, and he said it was because it was close to an office used by their father, and the owl was making too much noise. This also seems odd, because an owl would really only make noise at night.

Diana then went on to explain that right on the corner in her neighborhood, about 20 yards from that oak tree with the owl, was a site where she had always known that a space ship had landed. I was a little confused and I pressed for more details. She said that every time she walked past this spot, she could clearly visualize a classic disc shaped craft—it was shiny metal and not very large. I asked if there had been talk among the neighbors about any kind of UFO landing there, and she said no, that it was just a strong knowing that she'd always had about that one spot.[\[73\]](#)

A white owl and a message

The second story I found (or that found me) of owls and death was told by a woman with the pen name Gypsy Woman. She saw a big white owl out her window right as she was jolted out of a sound sleep. It was perched on a bare branch, aligned perfectly for her to see it from her bed. The next morning, she again woke with a start, and right as she sat up the phone rang. Answering, she received the news of a family member's death. When I followed up and talked to the woman, she too had a UFO connection.

Gypsy Woman tells of seeing multiple UFOs, including a close up daylight sighting. Add to this a visit from Men In Black, a near-death experience, and psychic abilities. It's as if her lifetime of unusual experiences created an opening that morning for an owl to land on that bare branch. It could be that this owl was delivering a message, sad though it may have been, to someone with the life experiences that would allow her to receive it.

Gypsy Woman's owl story took place over two consecutive days, October 3 and 4 of 2013. I have my own owl story and it takes place over the same two consecutive days, October 3 and 4 of 2009. This unnerving experience of mine doesn't involve death, but it has lots of owls, a guy named Christian, a wildly prophetic incident and even a UFO. My two-day owl event is described in the synchronicity chapter, and it really rattled me, it's titled Stacey, owls and a psychic medium.[\[74\]](#)

Lonn Friend and his mother's passing

Lonn Friend is an author and rock and roll journalist who writes about the heavy metal scene. He also runs a rather introspective podcast series Energize. I heard an episode where he spoke about synchronicities, death, and owls. His insights and questioning were deeply heartfelt. He explored the symbolic connection between owls and that other world, the place of the departed, and how these signs had emerged in a flurry around him.[\[75\]](#)

What follows is another example of the paradox syndrome. Within Lonn's story is a cluster of overlapping events, and I recognize the power in what he shares. I was meant to connect with Lonn—that is not a sense but a knowing, and in pulling on the threads of his experience, I've unraveled emotional clues that seem tied into my own life.

Lonn's mother died on August 10th 2012 after an unsuccessful cancer surgery. His last words to her were, "Don't be afraid, you're going to the Shire." She loved Tolkien and understood the sentiment. The Shire is the home of the Hobbits, an oasis of peace within the mythical world of Middle Earth.

On the 21st of August, Lonn's aunt Esther died—he called her his Angel aunt. She didn't survive a heart valve operation in Florida. Esther was his mother's older sister, born 11 years earlier, and she died 11 days after. These dates hit home for me—my mother had died 11 days earlier than Lonn's mother, on July 31st.

My mother's death, July 31st 2013.

Lonn's aunt Esther's death, Aug 21st 2013.

These emotionally charged dates are separated by an eerily tidy 11-11, the number of days between them. This didn't feel random, and it created a palpable connection to Lonn's experiences and emotions and my own. I'll also add that August 10th is a big-deal day for me in this confusing pool of synchro-weirdness.[\[76\]](#)

On August 27, Lonn's cousin Jill, the daughter of Aunt Esther, brought her mother's ashes home to Los Angeles to be buried at Forest Lawn Cemetery alongside her parents, Lonn's grandparents. Lonn, along with his brother, was at the graveside holding his mother's ashes during the service. Later that same day there was a beautiful ceremony where Lonn scattered his mother's ashes on a plateau off in the desert. To get to the remote site, they drove up Los Robles Road, which translates to The Oaks. The hospital where Lonn's mother died was Los Robles hospital in Thousand Oaks California. The word oak was repeating.

After the service, a close friend of Lonn's, Robert Cruz, drove him back from the desert and dropped him off at his mother's apartment in Oak Park California. Lonn spent the night in his mother's home. He was awakened at around two in the morning by the gentle hooting of an owl just outside the bedroom window, it was perched in an oak tree. This was one more repeating reference to oak; Oak Park, Los Robles Hospital, Los Robles Road in the desert, and now an owl in an oak tree.

Even though it was the middle of the night, he got up and logged into Facebook, and asked about this owl. Within minutes, Robert Cruz replied and said that the cooing of a sitting owl, in Native American lore, means that the departed have crossed over safely. Robert, who is native American with strong intuitive skills, told Lonn that his mother's sister was also with her.

Shortly thereafter, Lonn went to Las Vegas with his daughter and the rest of the family for Thanksgiving dinner. On Thanksgiving Day he received a text from his cousin Jill who was now back in Florida. He replied right away and asked, "what's up?"

Jill told Lonn that she was shaking. She had been having a hard time because she missed her mother so terribly. The night before, Jill was lamenting to a close friend that she hadn't received any kind of a sign from her mother. She was desperate for some reassuring message. All her friend could do was tell her to be patient. But now, as Jill was talking to Lonn on the phone, she was staring at a little owl in her garage.

She told her cousin that she went into the garage, moved a bucket (another death metaphor) from a shelf, and right behind it stood a little owl.

Eastern screech owl in a Florida garage

Jill told Lon, “Listen to me, this owl, its staring at me. It’s still sitting on this shelf. I’ve been in Florida for 27 years and I’ve never seen an owl.” The garage hadn’t been open since the day before, so she didn’t know how it could have gotten in. She took a cell phone picture and sent it to Lonny. She was talking to the owl as if it was her mother, and she said to it, “Mom, I’m talking to Lonny on the phone!” The owl would blink as a reply. The photo shows a little eastern screech owl sitting on a cardboard box, it seems to be only about eight inches tall. Like any owl, it is vaguely menacing.

The owl appeared at 6:30 a.m. on Thanksgiving Day 2013. It was on the only shelf in the garage used by Jill, the rest of the space being her husband’s. This little owl was still there when Jill and her husband returned from a holiday dinner with family. It was later that night when she went into the garage and told the owl, “Mom, it’s okay, you can go now. I know you’re okay. Thank you for visiting me. I love you.” Only then did the owl leave.

The next day, Lonny checked into a hotel. Like most places in Las Vegas, it had a theme, stylized like an opulent French library with bookshelves lining the walls. He randomly pulled a book off a shelf, a children’s book about owls. He was in a place of awe with these recurring synchronicities; he showed the book his daughter, who simply shrugged as if she accepted the way the universe wants to communicate.

If you merely peek into the mythologies about owls, you’ll immediately see that the owl is closely connected to death. According to the Kikuyu tribe of Kenya, owls are harbingers of death—if one sees an owl or even hears its hoot, someone is going to die. This is similar to folklore from all around the world; owls as a harbinger or omen of death.

From my research, however, that is rare. It happens, but such reports are outnumbered by instances of owls appearing after someone dies. Owls will make their presence known, they’ll be conspicuous in a way that makes it impossible for the observer to miss. What is consistent is that these witnesses, in the moment of grieving, won’t describe what they see as an owl, but as their departed loved one. Our world can seem restrained and mechanized, but even nonspiritual people can see an owl and then immediately talk to it as if it were their parent. There is a pattern of grieving, then an owl experience, and then a sense of peace.

Talking to owls

I have a funny story that happened while at a doctor’s office for a minor outpatient surgery. They had given me a valium right before, so I was sort of talkative during the actual procedure. I spoke (or more correctly, slurred) about my owl research. I avoided any mention of UFOs, instead saying I was writing about owl mythology, which seems honest, but avoided the loony factor of flying saucers. I told how I had been collecting reports of people seeing an owl shortly after the death of a loved one, and they will talk to the owl as if it was the departed, usually their father or mother. Jill talking to the owl in her garage is a perfect example, one of many. The doctor and the assistant humored me and asked a few questions.

Later that same day, the doctor got back to me. She explained that right after she finished up the procedure and left the room, her receptionist told a story about how her dog had just died, and right after that happened she saw an owl on her back porch. She went out and talked to the owl as if it were her dog, telling the owl how much she missed him. The receptionist chose that moment to tell her story—it emerged without any prompting from the doctor, and she explained her sense of solace at being able to talk to her dog one last time.

Chapter summary and thanks

I've received a lot of powerful stories with owls, yet only a small percentage tell of owls showing up in connection to the passing of a loved one, most often a parent. These remarkable accounts are deeply heartfelt, and it feels terrible that I can't include more of them. I am so grateful to all the people who've shared their experiences with me and I've done my best to honor the spirit of these stories.

It is as if the owl is a form of shorthand, a symbol for something below the waterline that we might be able to infer, but not know. The fact that owls show up in the context of death must mean something. The owl is reflecting the ultimate questions, why are we here? And what happens when we die?

When people return from a near-death experience, they might struggle to define their trip into that timeless realm. From their firsthand accounts, death itself parallels other experiences of crossing beyond the veil. The psychedelic mushroom, the shamanic initiation, meditation, and UFO contact; these all are realms beyond our ordinary consciousness. Visiting these regions has the power to completely transform the traveler, and the owl seems to be the totem for these perilous journeys.

PART V

OWLS AND THE DEEPER MIND

Chapter 20: Owls in Dreams

It is still true, as I predicted in 1947, that no flying saucer has ever been ‘captured’ or even ‘proved.’ ... They are unknown, the hidden world, that all of us at one time or another are aware exists, and which intrudes on our lives to make us think.[\[77\]](#)
—Ray Palmer

More real than real

Anne Strieber told of reading upwards of a quarter of a million letters which arrived at her home after the publication of her husband’s book Communion in 1987. These were heartfelt accounts sent by people describing their own contact experiences at the hands of alien visitors. She said the most common phrase in all those letters was: I had a dream that wasn’t a dream.

Anyone who has talked to someone who’s had direct UFO contact experiences will hear about their dreams, and these are often described using terms like hyper-vivid and more real than real. There are a few ways to look at this. Abductees might wake in the morning with memories of being onboard a craft and interacting with aliens. They could be remembering a real experience that took place during the night, and what is dismissed as a dream might be an accurate memory of what truly happened. These memories might play out as dream-like, but with a heightened urgency. Or these contact memories might be so bizarre, and so beyond belief, that the abductee can only frame it as a dream.

Another thought is that their dreamtime has been co-opted by some outside source, and a metaphoric drama will play out with a conspicuous meaning. It’s as if the aliens are beaming a specific story down from their flying saucer and projecting it into the sleeping mind of the experiencer. The dreamer will live out something vivid and visionary, which can be described as feeling decidedly different than any normal dream, and the whole experience can feel terribly important. These stage-managed dreams could be created by the aliens for the purpose of delivering some very specific message to the abductee, often through symbolic imagery. It might be that the UFO occupants are purposefully avoiding full waking contact, and are instead imparting information directly into the subconscious. There might be a reason for this kind of indirect transmission, as if dreamtime is a better way to receive certain messages.

Nobody truly knows why we dream, but it's something we all do every night. It's recognized that the stressful issues in our lives get reflected back at us, albeit distorted, during dreamtime, demanding our attention. Anyone dealing with either trauma or enlightenment should expect drama to well up in their dreams. If someone has truly experienced contact with an alien life form, only to have the memories of those events erased, you would have to assume that parts of that experience would be seared into the hidden corners of the mind. The dreamscape might be a sort of pressure valve, so when something can no longer remain buried it escapes the unconscious and bursts out into our dreams. If there were a message that the dreamer needed to hear, who better than the owl to play the messenger.

Andrea's dream diary

My girlfriend Andrea has had a lifetime of unusual experiences, and she also deals with profoundly vivid dreams. She told me she kept a diary where she wrote down what she felt were her most significant dreams. She printed it out and handed it to me. The very first dream account reads:

February 11, 2007

A Black Owl pulling me through the sky over a forest area by my right arm. We stopped to rest on a tree limb and the owl cuddled with me.

The remainder of that nine page dream document is a flurry of owls, UFOs and aliens all playing out in a kind of mythic theater.

Awakened by an owl

I've had more than one abductee tell me how they cringe at the sight of an owl or the sound of their hooting. Are they responding at a gut level to owls (either real or screen memories) showing up in relation to direct visitation?

I was contacted by a man named Will who has had a lifetime of encounters, and owls have played a role in these experiences. Like many others, he describes the mid-90s as a busy time with a lot of nighttime visitations. He said that his contact experiences “were often preceded or followed by the sound of owls on top of my house hooting.”[\[78\]](#)

On several occasions this noise was loud enough that he went into the yard and would shine a strong light up at the roof, and see up to three owls sitting up there, he describes these as the size of 10 year-old children. This is unusually large for any owl. He is now, understandably, apprehensive about the sound of owls at night.

I was once awoken from a very lucid and awful abduction dream by the hooting of an owl. At first I found it hard to differentiate the dream from reality. But once I got up I could clearly hear the owl hooting. When I looked out the window with a flashlight, I saw a giant owl staring at me at eye level from the neighbor’s chimney... I cannot tell if the experience was a dream or real. Perhaps this distinction doesn’t apply to me because all my dreams seem real until I begin to “surface” out of them, like coming out of deep water to the surface world.

It seems that most of my owl experiences happen after an abduction. The owls are real, in my estimation, not a screen memory. However, who knows? They simply seem drawn to my roof right after an abduction. Then they make a lot of noise, although none of the neighbors seem to notice. Such events occurred in suburban San Francisco, which is quite tightly packed with homes.

He tells of being brought out of an abduction dream by an owl. This owl is waking him up, both literally and metaphorically. What I find most intriguing is that Will clearly describes these experiences as dreamtime is blurring into reality. It is as if there is some force out there that can turn a dial and change the way we perceive our physical existence.

One of the challenges of doing this kind of research is that so many fascinating details emerge out of some of in-between world. This dream-like quality is consistently described by abductees. People are having real experiences, I am convinced of that, but it’s as if the contact itself takes place beyond our surface world, as if human consciousness is transported to and from some deeper realm.

Grizzly bear dreams

Lots of owls have been showing up in my dreams. My days have been consumed with writing and obsessing about owls, so it shouldn’t be any surprise that they’ll appear in my unconscious too. I had a funny dream where I looked down and saw my big toenail had gotten really long and instead of using a clipper, I just peeled at it with my fingers and the the piece

I picked off looked exactly like an owl in flight! No mystical insights, it's just what happens when you write a book about owls.[\[79\]](#)

On the other hand, I had another dream that hit me hard with its power. I woke up on May 15 2014 and wrote this in my blog, "I had a dream last night that was interrupted, or maybe punctuated, by the call of a great horned owl. I am writing this within minutes of getting out of bed."[\[80\]](#)

... The dream started in a bland suburban setting, and I was standing out in the driveway of a house that I assume was mine. The other homes were spaced sort of far apart, it was summer and the lawns were green. The sun was low in the sky and everything was calm. Then I saw there was a grizzly bear poking around on the lawn across the street. At first I didn't feel nervous or threatened, it was something amazing to see. Then this big thing was lumbering towards me, and I retreated into the garage.

I hurried into the house using the inside garage door, only to realize there were about six other doors all lined up. The bear came into the garage and tried to break through each door. The doors, from one to the other, got progressively more flimsy.

Suddenly I was hearing the hooting cry of an owl, steady and clear. I could hear it as this bear was pulling at this thin sheet of plywood with its claws.

It was at that point I woke up, but the hooting continued. I lay there in bed, with the pale light of dawn easing through the only window in my bedroom. I was hearing the unmistakable call of a great horned owl, and it must have been on the telephone pole right outside my window.

Let me state this clearly: A real owl woke me up right as a grizzly bear in my dream was about to rip down a door!

I was going to get up to look out the window, but the owl stopped hooting before I could muster the energy to climb out of bed. I lay awake for a long time, deeply impressed at the symbolism of the dream, and that a real owl would invade my dreamscape just as a huge bear was about to pull down the final flimsy barrier between me and it. (Bear? Barrier?)

I had lived in that cabin for over 20 years, and I've occasionally heard an owl, and very rarely seen one nearby. But starting that morning with that owl, I began hearing them right outside my bedroom window on a bunch of other occasions. This had never happened in the two decades I've called this my home.

I've wrestled with all kinds of ideas on what the owl might mean, and my favorite interpretation is that the owl plays the role of a metaphysical alarm clock. That morning a real owl went beyond metaphor and truly played that role!

This dream was awash in symbolism. Maybe the bear is the truth and the flimsy doors are the crumbling barriers between me and that truth? The owl was saying—quite literally—wake up! Bear is bare, the naked truth. Bear also means to suffer a burden. Anyway, this was sure how it felt.

Later in the day I heard from a friend who also had a grizzly bear dream that very same night. His name is Jack, he's had a lifetime of what sure seems to be UFO abduction events. This guy's dream starts in an idyllic forest where he sees a grizzly bear on the opposite side of a river, it's just sniffing around and he feels no threat. The whole scene is beautiful and majestic.

The next thing he remembers is a small house, he walks up to the side door and knocks on it. He peers through a window into the house and sees a tiny woman walking up to the door, and walking behind her is this massive grizzly bear. She opens the door and the bear comes outside, with that Jack moved behind the corner of the house. He know if he runs or panics the bear will chase him down and kill him.

He continues moving away, and the bear follows him and they both end up right in front of the garage. The bear has done nothing threatening, it is just lumbering along and sniffing around, but Jack is very aware of the danger. Then the bear looks up at him, he thinks, "Oh Fuck!" and wakes up.

There are so many elements that feel similar to my dream and his, the grizzly bear and the garage being the most obvious. The bear, along with the owl, is considered a sacred power animal in many shamanic traditions. Both Jack and myself were in agreement that our dream bears represented fear, or more correctly fear of the unknown. I sense that this lumbering fear is something deep inside, an unknown truth, and it's pursuing both of us.

Jack's dream emerged as he was planning to undergo hypnotic regression in an attempt to retrieve what might be buried UFO abduction memories. This has been, understandably, a looming stress for him.

In June of 2014 Jack traveled to California with his partner, Suzanne. Part of the reason for this trip was so he could meet with abduction researcher Yvonne Smith to explore his experiences. He sought out hypnosis in the hopes of uncovering more information concerning some odd memories from his youth. During the hour long session, he had only fleeting images of what might have been some sort of alien contact experience. He saw skinny beings, but mostly just their arms and bodies. Yvonne asked what their faces looked like but their image was somehow blocked from Jack's perception.

These impressions brought up emotions so intense that he cried.

Later that same day, Jack and Suzanne had dinner with the author Whitley Strieber and his wife, Anne. It was that very night, after Yvonne Smith's hypnosis session and dinner with the Striebers, that Jack had another symbolic dream worth noting, this time with owls. He was in some sort of a barn looking up at the rafters. There was a big owl sitting on the cross beam centered under an A-frame roofline. He got the feeling he should step back to see a wider view of the barn. It was then he saw a tiny owl lying down asleep on its side. It was on a small shelf of wood tucked under the edge of the roof.

Jack's sense was that the larger owl was telling him to let the baby owl lie there—just let it sleep. The roof was sheltering something, hiding it just below the surface. He felt it meant that those memories should stay hidden. The large owl's message wasn't a warning, but more like advice, that it might be better to leave it alone. He said he had never had an owl show up in any of his dreams before that night.

Curiously, Jack's partner Suzanne—who is also an abductee—also had her own experience of an owl in a barn. She has an eerie memory from when she was still in pre-school. She remembers being compelled to walk away from her schoolyard, and she entered a spooky old barn where she encountered an owl. It was sitting up in the rafters, and she has a clear memory of it tilting its head towards her. She isn't sure if she actually saw an owl or not, but she simply knew there was an owl in there. Later, she emerged from the barn after dark and her parents had called the police and had started an organized search for her. She is unclear what might have happened, but it seems there was missing time along with an owl, whether real or just an impression, she doesn't know.

Here is one more story involving Jack, Suzanne, and owls. She shared with me that they had both been hearing an odd high-pitched whinny sound outside their bedroom window, frequently for over a year. After some online research, Jack thought it was most likely a baby raccoon. It was over a year later that Suzanne read a web article which included various owl sounds, and upon hearing the call of the eastern screech owl, she realized that was what they had been hearing all along.

A few nights later, Suzanne heard the noise again and went outside in hopes of recording the audio on her phone. She told me, "I was going to record it to share with you, so you could hear what I've been hearing."

Suzanne clearly heard two owls communicating to each other from two adjoining trees in the neighbor's yard. As she approached one of the trees, she said, "suddenly, I saw an orange light/sphere/orb appear right where I was looking. It blinked on and blinked out, then they stopped hooting!"

She described it as if someone had shined an orange flashlight through the leaves of the tree. She said, "it was pretty high up, maybe 30 feet. It was a bright orange light, about the size of an orange." She waited a while, but never found the source of the light. After the flash, the owls remained silent.

An owl story and dream analysis

I heard an owl story from William Konkolesky, a young man who has long been aware of his role as a UFO abductee. It happened while he was a student at college, a peak time of contact activity in his life. He was walking on a path in a forested area alongside the campus. As he walked a big round brown thing dropped straight down in front of him, no more than three feet from his face. His immediate thought was that this falling ball was a beehive, but right at the level of his eyes huge wings emerged and he watched an owl glide away, following the path without flapping its wings. What baffled him was how that owl could just drop straight down.

On the surface, there's not really all that much to this story, except he was very clear that it happened at a time of intense abduction activity. To examine it superficially seems tenuous, but there are some symbolic gems. I've come to see these kinds of experiences playing out with a sort of dream logic. Instead of asking a pragmatic UFO investigator to make sense of this, it might be better to ask the gypsy fortune teller. Perhaps the skills of a dream interpreter would be more appropriate to analyze this man's owl experience. At this point, scrutinizing reality as if it were a dream has become normal for me.

The cartoon owl will often get drawn wearing a square graduation cap. So, the college setting coincides with the simplest caricature of the wise owl.

The beehive as a symbol has a lot of meanings. The Masons and the Mormons both see it as representing industry, and the roots of that interpretation trace back to ancient Rome. This is a tidy analogy because the hive itself is buzzing with industrious little honeybees all working together. The more interesting mythic beehive symbolism is that of death and rebirth. The residents of the hive seem to die off each winter and then are reborn each spring, thus the metaphor. Actually, honey bees don't die, but there is an annual dormancy of the hive, each winter the bees will all huddle together for warmth, but it appears that they have been resurrected.

UFOs (and owls) are most often described as eerily silent, but if a flying saucer does make a noise, it is sometimes described as a buzzing, like the sound from a beehive.

The forest is a symbol of the dangers young people must confront if they are to become adults. The forest represents the darkness that must be traveled symbolically to reach spiritual goals. It is a place of testing. The path itself is the life journey and the owl is the messenger from unknown realms.

So, this young man on a quest for wisdom (college), enters a place of testing and darkness (the forest), is confronted with death and rebirth (the beehive), only to see it as a messenger (the owl) leading him along his life's journey (the path). All this at a time of profound contact with aliens (again, the owl). Now, I might be way off base, but this kind of analysis can be just plain fun.

Let me add that when I spoke to Bill on the phone to ask about this experience, he had just found a little clay owl he had made as a boy. This small owl figurine struck him as relevant to his UFO experiences. He told me that he felt a curiously strong connection to this little totem, and he now uses a photo of it as a sort of logo on his website.

Summary

That owls appear in dreams should be expected. Owls have such a rich role across the world's mythic traditions you could assume it would have an equally rich place within our subconscious. Interpreting their meaning within a dream might be impossible, but when they do appear, the simplest message would be to pay attention. This is the same advice when they appear in reality, take to heart that there might be a deeper message along with an owl's presence—a clue to decipher.

Chapter 21: Highly Charged Moments

Owls and suicide

What follows are the opening lines of what might be the most important email I've ever received. The text is edited slightly to insure the author's anonymity.

I read your blog posting about owl experiences, for obvious reasons I've never shared this with ANYBODY.

In 1978, after many years of crushing teenage depression, I finally decided I had no more reason to live and was going to commit suicide. I had planned on carbon monoxide poisoning from my car at an abandoned area a few miles outside my town. I got everything together, including a long hose and pillow to lay my head. I had made up my mind, I was really going to do it.

She drove down a lonely road at night toward the turn-off she had chosen for this final act. Wet slushy snow was falling and her eyes were swollen from crying, so the car was moving slowly.

Suddenly a large snowy white owl appeared out of the darkness ahead, it was flying directly at me. I stopped and the owl came within a foot my windshield and simply hovered there, staring me right in the eye. He just hovered like this for ten seconds or so, gently using his wings to stay aloft and steady. He was floating directly in front of my face, staring right at me. Then he flew off.

I was stunned, confused and amazed... I took it as a sign to not go through with the suicide. After a good long cry, I turned around and went home.

She clearly felt the owl was sending the message to face her fears of growing up and moving on. She sensed she was being told; be patient, life will get better.

I'm now a happy grandmother and, although life has been tough, I am still here. I honestly have to thank that owl.

My first question to this woman was if she'd ever had any UFO experiences; she replied "no." She did say she's had a life of psychic premonitions, mystical flying dreams, a sense of alienation from the rest of humanity, and empathetically feeling other people's emotions. When she was six, she saw Jesus (or what she perceived to be Jesus) in the sky. This sighting unleashed such powerful emotions that she was physically knocked unconscious.

Despite the lack of any UFOs, these are exactly the kind of things that an abductee would report. She's also dealt with lifelong clinical depression, and this is another thing consistently reported by abductees.

Obviously, owls can show up in people's lives without any relation to the UFO phenomenon. They seem to be connected to extremely intense emotions and events. In many traditions, owls have an association to impending death, and much of this folklore can be dark and frightening. But this woman is very clear that an owl saved her life. Perhaps the owl sensed she was teetering on the precipice of death and it made its appearance in the hopes of tipping her back towards the living.

This book has been a complex undertaking, and at times I've been awash in doubt. Whenever I get lost (or stuck) in this uncertainty, I come back to this woman's experience, of a white owl that turned her around on the road to suicide. Her story gives me faith. Early on in this book, I said there are no one-offs, that every story here is part of a bigger pattern of accounts. This literal rescue from death is the exception, it stands alone in all the accounts I have collected.

Like this woman, I've also suffered from a lifetime of severe depression. As part of my own self-exploration, I've sat with a handful of UFO abduction researchers and spoken in depth of my memories and experiences. I've made it a point to tell them about my ongoing challenges with my depressive mood. They all nod knowingly, obviously having heard this same pattern from many others.

Clinical depression has close associations with the effects of buried trauma. Both Dr. John Mack and Budd Hopkins did a standard battery of psychological testing with the folks they've worked with—these would be people who claimed repeated abduction experience in their lives. According to these very conservative psychological evaluations, these people were deemed stable and sane, but they did show symptoms of having experienced trauma.

Hallucinations, delusions and dreams—as powerful as they might be—don't produce the same psychological indicators as trauma. These symptoms include hopelessness, anxiety, deep insecurities, low self-esteem, isolation, a disassociation from their own bodies, and difficulty with relationships. When the clinicians doing the testing found out the pool of people being tested were reporting something as unbelievable as UFO abduction, they were understandably cautious about the reality of these claims. But, they did point out that if this were the case, they were finding exactly the symptoms that they would expect if such a thing had actually been experienced.

In the cage

I had some back and forth emails with a guy who first knew me from my cartoon illustration work. He contacted me because he said we shared some experiences. He told me of his having a traumatic emotional breakdown that completely rewired his brain. Here is a short excerpt of our correspondence (italics my own):

This illness permanently altered my consciousness and opened me to all sorts of altered state type experiences like OBEs (out of body experiences), lucid dreams, abduction type events (being very cautious here) to name just a few. The first thing I did when I was well enough to return to some kind of work was volunteer at an owl sanctuary. My job was to clean out their enclosures, so I was right in there with them.

In many ways his story parallels my own. I completely understand the need to be very cautious when trying to make sense of personal experiences that imply abduction type events. Something profound had changed him, and the first thing he did as his newer self was to volunteer to work directly with owls! That's the kind of thing that gets my attention. His emotional healing involved being right inside a cage with owls.

When I asked him if he thought he was an abductee, he said no, but then went on to share some things an abductee would experience (like an expanded consciousness). He too falls into the shadowy maybe category. If he has had potentially harrowing traumatic UFO abduction experiences in his life and these memories are somehow suppressed, then having an emotional breakdown is understandable. Obviously, these anomalous events can be mind-shattering. If I talk with an abductee and they say that they've had a history of depression or severe anxiety, I tend to trust their claims all the more.

His story parallels my own struggles with clinical depression. I truly don't know the source of this malady. It could be hereditary, seasonal, or that I am just more susceptible as a creative type. My own darkest days (quite literally an emotional breakdown) came just as I started compulsively reading UFO books. Curiously, this desperate time coincides exactly with the memory of seeing five gray beings out my bedroom window (discussed at length in Chapter 3).

My first memories of what I would now call depression were in junior high school. This matches the timeline of my missing time experience in 1974. I have wondered how much to read into the timing of these events. It would be easy to connect the dots and say one thing caused the other, but I'm far too cautious to just blurt out that aliens made me depressed. Like my reader, I too entered the owl cage, immersing myself in their mythos to the point of obsession. Also just like my reader, something died in my own breakdown and something else was reborn out of the ashes. It is this newer person who is writing this book on owls, something my previous self never could have done.

Royally summoned by a white owl

A woman named Louise contacted me with a letter that began simply enough: "This is my owl story." A complex set of events were set in motion in the mid-1990s while looking out her window on a very rainy day. She suddenly knew that she needed to take her dog for a walk. She lived along the coastline, and she felt a strong knowing that she should go to a jetty stretching far out into the ocean. This was one of the regular places to walk her dog, but it was unusual because she normally wouldn't consider going outside in such harsh weather.

Louise walked with her dog in the downpour as if it were perfectly normal. When she was about halfway out along the jetty, she again knew she should start walking back towards the land.

When we walked about halfway, I suddenly saw a VERY large white owl standing at the edge of the pier just watching us, as if he were waiting for our return. Riker—my large German shepherd—instead of barking or pulling at his lead simply walked quietly beside me until we were a few feet away from this owl. He then just sat quietly by my side, as if he were in the presence of royalty. It was very strange, very surreal. We stayed that way for what I guess to be around ten minutes when the owl just up and flew away. I walked back to my car with the feeling that we had been royally summoned and I had simply complied with the request.

... I must say as well, that had I not had my dog with me I might have been tempted to doubt my experience as it was so surreal. But to have Riker sense the majesty of this bird, it was overwhelmingly clear to me that even he had recognized that something special had just occurred.

Louise described the owl as white and the size of a large sitting shepherd. She has spent years trying to find any kind of owl that looks similar, but cannot. She has seen both snowy and barn owls (her favorite) so she would have recognized those. She is resolute that what she saw was definitely an owl, yet it was tall and slender with a regal look.

She is also clear that her dog was not acting normal. He is usually eager to run and chase birds, but she felt Riker acknowledged the power of that owl. There is an aspect of this story that plays out like nothing more than a screen memory, but the depth of significance is impossible to ignore.

In our correspondence, Louise told of a twenty-year chapter of her life that was very active with both UFO sightings and abduction experiences. Like so many others, she also tells of having a lot of psychic experiences, including a time of automatic writing as a form of communication with another realm. At the time of this owl sighting, she was involved in the local UFO community with a primary focus of moving beyond the intense fear that these events generated.

Shortly after seeing that owl on the jetty, Louise experienced an unusual paralysis in her arm and was forced to go on disability. She was later told she had stage 4 cancer and given less than one year to live. “Two weeks before I was diagnosed, I had a very profound dream, which was the only thing I had to hold on to as I came very close to dying.”

She was an angel in this dream, looking down at her family. She told me, “I can only describe it as the most all-encompassing feeling of love I have ever experienced. Suddenly I heard God’s voice giving me a choice, to complete the process and become an angel, or to stay. However, if I stayed, there would be conditions.” She interpreted the message that if she chose to stay, it meant a duty to help people.

Louise had aggressive radiation treatment and surgery that brought her right to death’s door. She has since been cancer free for over 18 years.

I asked how she is doing as far as the oppressive fear relating to her abduction experiences. She answered, “How am I doing? One-hundred percent! At that time I was afraid of the dark, afraid of what I couldn’t control. Not any more.”

There are a surprising number of accounts where people tell of miraculous healings under the aegis of these alien beings. Some abductees have experienced the complete end to a serious illness directly after a UFO encounter. I asked if she thought she had received any kind of healing? “No, but the owl experience was really the start of all the big and challenging chapters of my life. As I look back, it still feels as if I had been summoned by royalty, perhaps to wish me well on a most difficult journey ahead... The whole experience for me from start to present has been a very spiritual journey, challenging indeed, but profoundly spiritual above all else.”

The owl can be seen as symbolic of something powerful, but also very difficult, the totem of the deepest inward journey.

Louise has not only survived a devastating cancer, but has also overcome her fear of the unknown. She feels that all these events are connected to her UFO experiences, but she doesn't know how. She felt that the white owl on that rainy day held court with her and her dog. She said, "I've seen owls before and since—I love seeing them—but this experience was being in the presence of something of power that I cannot explain."

Forgiveness and a winking owl

After a long winter in the cold valley I've called home, springtime means I can finally ride my bicycle to town again, and I try to do it daily. There is a bike path in front of my cabin and it leads right into the main street of my town. There's a bridge where the path crosses a creek, with a grove of cottonwoods right along that waterway.

There is a huge nest up in one of those trees, and each spring for the past few years it has been home to a family of great horned owls. I started carrying binoculars on that ride. I'll sit in the grass for a few minutes and focus on these amazing creatures. The very first day I peered through those binoculars, something funny happened. As I focused on the owl's face—it winked at me!

A few times I've seen two owls, but mostly you can only see one, with its cat-like head poking up above the big nest. I feel blessed to have this chance to see something so beautiful.

In the early evening of April 30, 2013, I was riding my bike back home from the little downtown. I had my iPod on shuffle and the sun was setting. As I approached the big owl's nest, one song faded off and I waited for the next one to start. Instead of music I heard a familiar woman's voice.

"Hi subscribers, this is Anne Strieber..."

Anne is Whitley Strieber's wife and she had been hosting a series of special audio interviews where she talked with close encounter witnesses. These podcasts are of special interest to me because Anne digs deep into the very human side of the contact experience.

Her voice came on just as I was stopping my bike next to a gap in the trees. From that spot, the big nest lined up exactly with the setting sun, making for some dramatic backlighting. This was the only good spot to get a view on the bike path. It's just a narrow opening along the scrubby bushes and aspen trees that lines up the nest. From this one place, I could see the silhouette of the owl's head and tufted ears. The way the sun was positioned, there was literally a halo around the owl. I was staring directly into a shimmering aurora with an owl at the center, and all the while listening to Anne's calm and soothing voice.

It was at this moment, as I was standing with my bike, that I realized she was interviewing me! What I was hearing was the very first in a series of audio interviews from January of 2010, and I was the very first guest.

I have a ton of stuff crammed onto my iPod, mostly music but also a lot of audio interviews. I feel like I've downloaded all of Anne's subscriber series with these close encounter witnesses. That my interview would pop up at this moment was beyond chance.

What I also realized was right at that moment Anne was having brain surgery to remove a tumor called a meningioma. Before heading to town on my bike I had read this Facebook message from Whitley: "Anne is in surgery now. There are probably about nine or ten hours to go. It is a very meticulous, exacting surgery. Pray for my wonderful girl!"

So I saw an owl backlit by the setting sun while listening to Anne's voice introducing me at the exact moment she was having a very serious operation on her brain. This was an impressive cluster of points all in alignment. I am pretty sure this was a female owl sitting on her eggs. So I was looking at an image of motherhood in this same straight line. Some of the mythology surrounding the owl is steeped in foreboding and death. But I felt none of that. Instead the experience was delightful and inspiring.

I posted this story, what you've just read, on my blog in May of 2013. This would have been within just a few day of the synchronous incident. What I didn't share on-line, I want to share here.

Just a little over a week before this event, Anne had interviewed Trish and Rob MacGregor about their book Aliens in the Backyard. During this audio interview, Anne's voice seemed awkward and faltering. At one point she spoke about Budd Hopkins and how he would treat some of the women he was working with while they were under hypnosis. Anne said that he sexually assaulted some of them during these sessions.

I did not believe what she said. To me, it sounded like bitter gossip. I had worked with Budd in 2007 and 2008 at a point when I was wrestling with my own experiences. He even performed a hypnotic regression with me, but nothing much new emerged. This took place near the end of Budd's life, when he was frail and weak. He was enormously kind to me during our time together, and I felt he treated me with a lot of respect. Budd died in August 2011.

Anyone in the UFO community knows that Budd and Whitley had a very well publicized clash. This traces back to the late 1980s when both of them, each in their own way, were the public face for the UFO abduction phenomenon. I feel I know Budd, Whitley, and Anne, at least as acquaintances. Each of these dedicated people have been very supportive of me and my experiences.

But I truly didn't know what to think of Anne's comments about Budd during that interview. I was angry, mostly because I found Budd to be so understanding in my time of very real distress. Anne's quavering voice and unusual comments seemed so unlike her, and within weeks of this interview she suffered a seizure and was in the hospital. Soon after that, she had brain surgery. In hindsight, her odd behavior was quite probably a symptom of something very dangerous happening in her brain.

Leading up to that spring evening along the bike path, I was angry and judgmental. That's how I felt in the moments before I looked up at that mother owl, backlit by the sun, and listening to Anne talking to me in her steady thoughtful voice. Right at that moment I felt a beautiful spirit of forgiveness wash over me. Listening to Anne's voice and seeing that owl, it was no longer possible to feel any anger. Some hard part of my heart just melted away. The change was powerful.

I got on my bike and rode home. I felt like I had shed something brittle, and was now a new person. Since that moment I have tried hard to live up to the power of that beautiful lesson.

I told this story among a small group of experiencers and researchers. We were all spending the weekend together as a sort of personal retreat. Something odd happened as we sat at the dining room table after our first dinner together. These folks were asking about my owl research and I could tell by their questions they didn't quite understand the depth of what I was finding. I shared this story you've just read in the hopes of articulating the emotional power of some of these experiences.

On the second night, sitting at the same dining room table, one of the women at the retreat, Rachael said, "I need to ask you about the story you told last night, about the owl and Anne Strieber. Did you notice the candle went out while you were talking?"

Another guest, Ryan, chimed in and said, "Yeah, I noticed that too."

One more guest, Jane, said she also saw it, and she was surprised because the room was so still at the moment the candle went out.

I had no idea what they were talking about. Rachael explained that when I got to the end of the story, the candle in the center of the table went out abruptly. I asked when it was, and she said, “It was kind of spooky. It was right when you spoke about letting go of anger and the feeling of forgiveness.”

Then, just as she said those words—at that very moment—the candle went out again. We were all seated at the same dining room table, and the same candle went out precisely when she said forgiveness, just as it had done the night before as I spoke that same word.

The UFO enigma seems like it can get utterly bogged down within its own weighty implications. There is so much that is complex and impenetrable, but this lovely event with the candle left all of us feeling deeply reassured. The message being delivered was gloriously simple, that of forgiveness.[\[81\]](#)

During the final editing of this book project it was announced that Anne Strieber had died peacefully with her husband Whitley by her side. Anne’s last words, spoken to her son, were “I love you.” Later, she may have whispered the word “joy.”

Chapter 22: Owls and the Unconscious

Reverse speech analysis

A UFO abductee was recorded talking about her experiences. This audio tape was then played in reverse with an attentive ear listening for anything recognizable emerging from the babble. Here is a tiny excerpt of what she said, first written as spoken forward, and then transcribed in reverse:

Forward: 'cause she remembers an orange light, right?

Reversal: Care. The owls knew it was their memory ship.

The snippet spoken forward is a question, and the reversal is an answer.

There is a nonsensical quality to the answer, but at the same time there is a sneaky wisdom. What seems telling is that an owl shows up.

Reverse Speech Analysis is a rather curious but simple investigative tool used by some of the more open minded researchers as they attempt to look into the paranormal aspects of the UFO phenomenon. This technique involves using a recording of a person talking, and then playing that audio backwards. If you listen carefully you can pull out some odd gems from this gibberish, what can emerge are surprising little phrases, and sometimes these can be quite clear.

Abduction researchers Eve Lorgen and Patricia Mason, both experiencers themselves, have worked together using reverse speech analysis as a tool to examine the recorded voices of UFO abductees. They were trying to see if any clues would emerge from these people's recorded testimonies.

Lorgen saw a curious pattern in the reverse analysis of these abductees—repeated references to owls. Beyond just owls, Lorgen was impressed that metaphors and archetypes would show up so consistently in reverse speech. The challenge was to figure out if these metaphoric clues might indicate whether or not someone is telling the truth, or whether they might be communicating something they think to be true but, in fact, may be some form of internal conflict.

Here's another example of a short bit of dialog, both forward and backwards, from a UFO abductee describing an experience.

Forward: Oh, that's interesting. Maybe he (the UFO investigator) was too embarrassed to have another woman (abductee) call or something...

Reversal: God throw off to move in with the mystery of mysteries. Teach babies to set that up.

This reversal has the kind of absurd mystical grooviness that I just love. No easy way to interpret the deeper meaning, but it sure seems to be hinting at something. It feels like a line from a poem, where much is implied but in a roundabout way.

I've listened to a lot of these little snippets, and some of the audio is warbled and indistinct, and you need to try hard to pick out what might be a hidden message. Other times you can hear very distinct dialog popping out from the droning cloud of babble, and some of these insights in the excerpts can be really impressive.

Some of the proponents of Reverse Speech Analysis will declare that what emerges from this analytical technique is a person's true unconscious thoughts as they speak. They'll argue that you can literally hear the deepest levels of the human mind as it reveals its unspoken secrets. That would be tricky to prove conclusively, but the fact remains that there are some remarkable examples of someone saying one thing in normal forward speech, and a direct contradiction shows up when it's reversed. Or, it's a metaphoric reflection, or a playful jab.

Advocates of this kind of analysis will say that it might be the ultimate truth detector. What is most interesting to me are the poetic statements that sound like clues to the real intention of the speaker. These can manifest like ironic Zen koans.

The definition of a koan is a puzzling, often paradoxical statement or question used in Zen Buddhism. It is meant as an aid to meditation, as a way to train the monks to abandon ultimate dependence on reason and to force them into gaining sudden intuitive enlightenment. This means absurdity is the path to spiritual awakening!

Played backwards, Barack Obama's campaign catch phrase, Yes we can, comes out as Thank you Satan. You don't need to listen carefully to hear this. It comes across pretty darned clear. This heavy handed example can be interpreted as nothing more than pure coincidence, while others will see it as proof that our president made a deal with the devil himself. The more challenging (and the more fun) way to look at this is to try to unravel any metaphoric meaning. What mythic symbolism is trying to make itself known?

Australian born reverse speech expert David Oates was interviewed by Lorgen in 1998 for the British magazine Alien Encounters. Oates had just had his own UFO sighting in Bonsall, California not too long before the interview, and there was a reverse speech analysis using an audio account of his own experience. He described seeing an enormous craft from his home near the coast line.

Forward: ...so I walked out of the house, I'll never forget this, it was the most incredible thing...

Reversal: They pull you with Samson's soul. Have to recognize that it was so big.

Wow, the line "They pull you with Samson's soul," sounds like a poet trying to dazzle his reader with heavy-handed eloquence. Other mythic and archetypal words show up in reverse speech. Obama thanking Satan is a perfect example. Wolves, deer, gods, and goddesses also show up, each bring their own symbolic power.

Here, a woman abductee is describing how within the alien abduction phenomena there might be some sort of deception to prevent anyone from knowing what is actually going on, something that keeps people distracted from the truth.

Forward: Part of it is truth detracting, trying to get people away from...

Reversal: My fair wolf speaking up. He passed his truth to the girl.

Patricia Mason worked with an abductee, Mary (pseudonym), and during their recorded talks Mary spoke about the eerie glow under an ultraviolet light, or black light. These lights are used in UFO research because a visible fluorescence can show up on the skin of an abductee or at the site of a contact event. When Mary heard about the use of black lights in abduction research, she went into her son's room where he had a black light set up to shine on a poster. She looked at herself in a mirror with the black light and saw an orange-pink fluorescent substance on her face. Mary then bought a better black light and found the same fluorescence on her chest and lower torso. She collected samples and had then sent off for analysis, hoping for an explanation. She did this three separate times and never got any answer.

In the first of the three examples below, Mary is talking about the glow of the black light, and trying to get any information about who was analyzing the samples of the fluorescence.

Forward: ...under the black light.

Reversal: The owl called within it.

Mary also described seeing orange balls of light in her home, they were dancing near the ceiling above her bed.

Forward: ... pretty lights ...

Reversal: The owl lead her.

Mary spoke about memories that were retrieved during hypnosis. She describes seeing a gray alien close up and how it frightened her.

Forward: ... and having this face with these two eyes ...

Reversal: See owl. Wishes you could see it. Send me back a net.

This reversal seems to reply to the spoken words about two eyes, in essence answering that it's an owl. This plays into the screen memory aspect, where the experiencer thinks they are seeing an owl, but it is something else entirely.

None of the rest of these speech reversals mention owls, but they do point to the overall weirdness tangled up in the UFO mystery. An abductee named Jody (pseudonym) was trying to explain the weird mind games that are part of the contact experience. These aliens seemed to be interrogating her, they would show her a picture of her and her brother laughing. They didn't understand and asked, "Why is this funny?"

Forward: Because it is. Look at the picture. Because it is.

Reversal: Zeta took it. First get the people. Zeta took it.

Zeta is a term used by some abductees to describe the gray aliens with the big black eyes. This title assumes their origin is the star system Zeta Reticuli.

Anne (a pseudonym) is an abductee who has devoted her life to researching UFO and paranormal phenomena. She states bluntly:

Forward: Well, I'm just obsessed. I don't even have a job now.

Reversal: White bars. They're making a mirror outside. It's in their aura.

Sometimes the curious implications of the reverse speech are obvious, and sometimes it's baffling, but there still seems to be a deeper meaning. There can be a playful aspect to these clues. Below are some examples, all taken from the recorded voices of UFO abductees.

Forward: I don't know, all I have is a weird dream memory and...

Reversal: They amend these dreams, if they make 'em, I'm learning.

Most abduction researchers will take dream imagery very seriously. As noted earlier in the chapter on dreams, buried experiences might be showing up in the form of a dream. Another thought is that the UFO occupants are co-opting dreams, stage managing our subconscious with specific narratives. It's as if they are bypassing our sentient mind with projected ideas that are meant to serve some hidden purpose.

Forward: I guess psychically, you know, the girl saw something like a reptilian (alien). Psychically with the third eye, but I didn't see it and she saw it.

Reversal: In the darkness...we seem to help the aliens.

Forward: Yeah, cause I have, uh...

Reversal: Ride on the gray.

Forward: The truth is the truth. It needs to be there, you know.

Reversal: Why in the gray deep seed. They pierced us, they pierced us, hey.

In these three reversals above we get the word aliens and gray, and these might mean the same thing.

David Oates has a lot of experience using reverse speech with people who have had UFO abduction encounters. He is adamant that this could be a very important tool when working with abductees, declaring that these techniques could be used to help confirm the reality of these experiences. Quite literally, he sees this as a form of lie detector.

Oates says an “experienced analyst can determine whether someone’s experience, say a UFO abduction experience, was real or a hallucination, or whether [what] they think happened was really some [other] issue they need to work through. You can tell by the type of language and terminology which events were real, or imagined, or a blatant lie.” These are bold statements, and I’m cautious to assert that these techniques as indisputably trustworthy. What interests me so much more is the poetic symbolism that can rise to the surface from this analysis.

Oates has looked into both the spiritual experience and its UFO connection by using reverse speech analysis, this includes his own sighting from his home in California. The UFO accounts he’s researched all seem to have an underlying theme. In every case there is an emphasis on the spiritual state of our planet. He is convinced that these UFO experiences are connected with the redemption of mankind.

As Oates puts it:

If there’s one over all theme in Reverse Speech, it’s that the human race is in a sick and sorry state spiritually. We are spiritually corrupt. And that as a race we are so far off track from where we should be on a spiritual path. And it is time for change... It is time to take the next evolutionary leap in order for us to move to the next stage of human history... And that is the over all message in reverse speech, and that is the over all message I’m getting in the whole UFO field as well.

The screech from the thieves

Whitley Strieber spoke with speech reversalist Wayne Nicholson for his radio show in 2008. A week before this interview Nicholson recorded Strieber in conversation and then searched through those tapes for any hidden messages. What the listener got to hear was a conversation where Nicholson would play segments of Whitley talking, both forward and reversed, and then the two would discuss any meaning that might be emerging from the reversal. One of these caught my attention:

Forward: She says that it was me from the future.

Reversal: The screech from the thieves.

In 1998, Strieber had spent some hours with a very unusual man, and he was saying that his wife Anne felt that it was actually himself coming back from the future. Strieber has called this man the Master of the Key, and he devoted a whole book to their meeting, titled The Key. The core of the story is a dialog between Strieber and this unusual man, it reads like a stage play where the master is delivering wisdom to the student.

Nicholson said that the screech is a reference to owls, which is a common screen memory, and Strieber quickly agreed, saying he felt the same thing. Then Nicholson questioned who or what the thieves might be.

Strieber stated, “Oh I know who the thieves are, if anyone who picks up my book Majestic you will find that the triad of three grays are called ‘the three thieves,’ there really was such a triad in my life called the three thieves. So, the screech from the thieves, that’s the visitors speaking with me in my opinion. So I think it’s a confirming reversal, and I think Annie may have a point... That’s very fascinating and very illuminating, [laughing] because if it’s me from the future I’m doin’ okay.”

I was transcribing the dialog from the audio interview with Strieber and Nicholson, what you’ve just read, and I was wondering if I should point out that Strieber laughed as he spoke about his conclusion. I mulled it over for longer than I needed to, should I or shouldn’t I? Then I thought sure, why not, I figured it would lighten up something that could be read as overly serious.

Right as I was typing the word laughing (seen in brackets above), I heard an audible ping from my computer telling me an email had just arrived.

When I checked my inbox, the message was from Wayne Nicholson, the man doing the reverse speech analysis of Whitley. I had sent him a note late the previous night asking if he could answer some questions for this book. He replies right as I’m transcribing his conversation.

So Strieber, the abductee, receives a message where owls and gray aliens are seen as one thing, and he feels this might confirm that his future self came back in time as a messenger to his present self. All this gets confirmed (at least to me) by the synchro-ping from the speech reversalist himself!

My own reverse speech analysis

It was months later before I finally spoke with Wayne. My hope was to just get a comment or two on his work doing this kind of analysis. One of the first questions asked was about owls, and he said they certainly show up in people's readings, but so do a host of other archetypal animals and symbols. I was impressed at the thoughtful way he treated this very unusual methodology. At the end of this first conversation he suggested I undergo a reverse speech session myself, and I was quick to agree.

We made a formal appointment to record my voice. He asked me questions and he just encouraged me to talk. I spoke about much of what this book covers, focusing on my own challenges dealing with these elusive issues, specifically the stuff with owls and UFOs.

A week later, after he had analyzed my speech, we had a follow up talk. Shortly before our call he sent me a list of 38 little quotes gleaned from me talking. Some of these were easy to dismiss as nothing at all, yet a few of them knocked my socks off with their clarity and power.

I had told Wayne about Anne Strieber and the winking owl, this is the previous story just before this chapter. I had been deeply conflicted as to how to tell that account. It seemed important, but I was worried that the way it was framed might come across as petty. Anne had died just three days before my voice was recorded by Wayne, and I was concerned the way it was written might be seen as disrespectful. Here is what I said.

Forward: I don't know if you knew this, but Whitley Strieber's wife Anne just died...

Reversal: The observers see the wolf.

Wayne said that the word wolf shows up a lot in reverse speech, often as an inner protector, or a symbol for personal motivation. Also, wolves will sometimes show up as a screen memory for gray aliens, and Whitley had even written the popular horror novel The Wolfen. But who are the observers? Could they be the alien entities? There is a lot going on in this little phrase making any meaning difficult to untangle.

One very personal way to read it would be that, "The observers (the aliens) see the wolf (my personal motivation)." This would directly answer my own unease about whether to include the emotionally charged story of Anne and the winking owl in the book. Another interesting reversal emerged as I spoke about Anne.

Forward: She had a seizure and that was the source of her brain malady...

Reverse: You know I'm here.

I can read this only one way. As Wayne was recording my voice, the spirit of Anne had been right here in the room with me.

Some of the other reversals seemed to be encouraging me to be bold in how I proceed forward with both the research and my own life. Here's an example.

Forward: The intensity seems like it could be too much at times. So I'm wondering...

Reversal: You're no mouse.

I was talking about being overwhelmed with the emotional intensity of these experiences. Saying I'm no mouse seems an obvious statement that I have what it takes to live up to these challenges, a call to be brave.

There are several more prescient reversals, and they seem to confirm my involvement with this elusive phenomenon. A few of these are very straightforward and will show up later in the book as I try to make sense of some of my own experiences.

Wayne is a sympathetic therapist, and I was impressed at his cautious approach. He was open to the deepest interpretations, where the subconscious seemed to impart profound philosophical messages. At the same time, he was content to see some of the reversals as just a playful nudging without getting stuck in the mystery.

During our phone conversations Wayne politely asked if he could share some of his own experiences. I replied of course, but wasn't sure what he wanted to tell me. It soon became clear that he wanted my insights from my time as a UFO researcher. I listened closely as he shared several absolutely fascinating stories. None of his accounts had hovering flying saucers or skinny aliens stopping his car on a lonely road, instead they were of a much more subtle nature. What he told me put him in that foggy gray zone without any easy answers. Like so many others, I see Wayne as one more of the maybe people.

My voice played backwards hasn't given me any answers, yet it has offered up clues and confirmations to things that I either already knew or strongly suspected. I take these little tidbits less as evidence and more as a way to deepen my own search. This is reassurance that I am on the right path, even if I feel lost. I refuse to be content with the easy answers. Instead I'm eager to dive down into the deepest waters.[\[82\]](#)

There are two more speech reversals from my session with Wayne that I need to share. These are both deeply revealing, but cannot be understood until I recount the details of my confirmation event in the last act of this book.

Chapter 23: Owls Communicate

You are not who you seem to be

Rebecca Hardcastle Wright, PhD, has had so many experiences throughout her life that she is well beyond any doubts of the reality of her own contact. She is forthright about what has happened, almost disarmingly so. In 2008 she authored a book Exoconsciousness. The title uses the Greek prefix exo meaning “outside” or “external” in relationship to our human consciousness. She is promoting the idea of a bridge-building between humanity and extraterrestrials. Along with all her other experiences, Rebecca had a very revealing owl event.

This happened when she was leaving a restaurant at a strip mall in the suburbs of Phoenix, Arizona. It was full daylight, and as she walked through the parking lot she felt powerfully drawn to look up at one of the tall industrial lights looming above her. She described her vision as being literally pulled to the top of that pole. Looking up, she was surprised to see a massive owl looking down at her.

Rebecca felt she was receiving a psychic communication coming from that owl, and the very clear message was, “You are not who you seem to be.” She also felt an all too familiar sensation, knowing she was going to have a contact experience that night—and she did.

When we spoke together, she described this owl in such an odd way that I had to ask if she thought it was a real owl. She said no, it wasn't real in the way we would understand it, she sensed it was some sort of a psychic projection. Even though she described this owl as large, it was still owl-sized, and in a place where an owl might sit, but perched atop a light pole in a suburban parking lot is hardly where you would expect an alien. This is one of many examples of how hard it can be to truly know what might be a real owl, and what might be a screen image.

Rebecca described how she was seeing an unusual number of large owls during her years in Phoenix. She wrote me, “They came to me, they hooted, there were even there during the day. I knew they were a screen. I felt the ET presence through them.” She describes this as a time of awakening, and it’s worth noting that, like the owl, the Phoenix is also a mythic bird—one that symbolizes rebirth.

What is also fascinating is that the owl spoke to Rebecca. That it happened telepathically without any sound is consistent with how almost all communication with aliens is reported. This is most often described as mind to mind, but others will say it is something deeper, as if it’s soul to soul.

I have heard a lot of stories where an owl does something that could be seen as a kind of roundabout communication, like crossing one’s path or showing up at a prescient moment. These kind of actions require the observer to interpret a deeper meaning. This could be a obvious message delivered symbolically, where the witness understands it right in the moment, or it might take some time to decipher its metaphoric meaning. More clear-cut is when an owl actually talks to the witness, but this is rare.

Owl downloads

A woman named Jessica sent me an email describing a powerful owl experience. She first explained her feelings of waking up to her own spiritual truth, something that began a couple of years earlier. This was a time of a growing awareness of emerging clairvoyant abilities. Her past seemed peppered with the kind of events that might generate psychic powers. She had also seen a very unusual triangle craft as a girl. This, and other life experiences, seem to imply some sort of UFO contact.

She wrote me to tell of one night in particular. She was lying in bed and having lucid experiences in a near-dream state. She said:

In this state the physical body is asleep but the mind is fully awake and aware, almost as if it’s a meeting place in between our world and other worlds.

Jessica then went on to describe something unusual which happened around 3:30 in the morning, a time noted with consistency for UFO contact. She had just moved around in her bed and, although sleepy, she was quite aware of being awake.

In the next moment I could see in my mind's eye, or what some have called the third eye, an owl land on a tree branch outside of the house.

In the next moment a silver blue beam of light came from the sky and was given to the owl, the owl then turned his head and then beamed the light into my third eye, my whole head was illuminated with this light. I knew without words, and without seeing any ETs, that this was extraterrestrial in nature. It was just a knowing that I received a download... I KNOW this was not a dream, I was fully aware that I was given a download. [Italics added for emphasis].

When I asked her what she received in the download, her reply was exactly what I expected, "In all honesty I don't know. I feel the answers may come when I am ready or it may forever be an unspoken thing." She said it feels like a gift and that she would be guided to an answer.

Jessica sent me this account because she wanted to know if anyone else had similar experiences. My answer was a cautious yes. Although the details of what happened to her stand alone, the vibe parallels a lot of other stories. Other accounts might not match exactly, but they feel alike in their tone, this includes how the download gets explained.

The account that follows is eerily similar to her own, and it's an incident where I was present.

My girlfriend Andrea came home on a winter's afternoon, but her normal parking spot was filled by another car, so she parked in a different place than usual, just a few yards away. She pulled in facing some woods and looked up between the dense trees to see a barred owl on a branch. If she hadn't parked in that exact spot, she never would have seen that owl. She called me from her cell, telling me to come out quick to see the owl. I grabbed my camera, ran outside, and we both stood in the cold and watched this handsome bird. It obviously knew we were there, but seemed unfazed.

Suddenly Andrea said, "Something is happening." She had locked eyes with the owl, feeling it was impossible to look away. As she stared, things started to change. She described a glowing magenta light, like an aura encompassing the owl's body. All the surroundings around this owl started to shift, as if the environment itself was somehow warping. There was a waviness, as if everything outside the center ceased to exist.

I was standing directly behind her this whole time taking photos of the owl. I am tall enough to hold the camera right above her head as Andrea described what she was seeing. From my perspective, the whole thing lasted about a minute, but Andrea felt as if time had stopped. The owl was entirely motionless for the duration their eyes were locked.

Later she compared the visual imagery to those garish paintings from India, where a halo of swirling colors surrounds the head of a Hindu deity, only it was encircling the entire owl. Alas, nothing unusual was seen in any of the pictures.

We must have been out there watching that owl for over ten minutes. It was motionless except for occasionally turning its head. At one point we looked at each other and said something like, pretty awesome, eh? When we looked back a second later, the owl was gone. We both said to each other how disappointed we were that we didn't see it fly off.

The following morning Andrea saw the owl again. It was sitting on the same branch. She called me and I hurried outside. Andrea was standing at the same spot in the driveway from the previous afternoon. Within a few seconds of me arriving we watched the owl gently drop from the branch and float off through the trees. We both felt as if the owl was letting us see it fly away, as if it heard us lamenting that we had missed seeing that the night before.

Months later I asked her if she thought this owl sighting was some form of communication. She rolled her eyes in exasperation, “Like, yeah!” She went on to explain she had received a download. I asked her what she meant by download, and she explained, almost word for word, what Jessica had answered to that same question. Andrea described the download as “a strong sense of knowingness—as if something was imparted—and this would reveal itself when the time is right.”

I pressed her for more, and she replied, “I don’t know, all I can say is that I was shaking the whole time we locked eyes, like an intense vibration that was happening within.”

The term download is woven into the lingo of the “love and light” side of the UFO continuum. It’s usually the aliens, not the owls, that will impart these mysterious messages. The implication is that this data is somehow hidden or blocked from the experiencer, but remains stored on their hard drive. Pretty much every abductee I’ve ever talked with will say I feel that I have a mission, but I don’t know what it is. Sometimes this sense of mission is so powerful that they’ll succumb to bizarre obsessions (like writing a book on owls). It’s as if all these people are anxiously waiting for some cosmic software update so they can finally run this secret program that has been pre-installed in their minds.

When Andrea first pulled into that parking spot and initially saw the owl, she was talking on the phone with a close friend. They were discussing chapter three of a book by Buddhist author Pema Chodron. Andrea realized she had that book on her shelf, but had never read it completely. The first thing she did when she got into the house was open to that chapter, aptly titled: This Very Moment Is the Perfect Teacher. She read on, and the message was exactly what she needed to hear in that moment. Also, leading up to this sighting, Andrea had been working with a local shaman who felt the owl was her spirit animal with the message to confront her fears.

On the night of June 2, 2015, Andrea and I were quietly sitting together by the fire in the living room. We were both reading, and there came a point when Andrea commented under her breath, “Oh wow.” I asked what it was, and she said, “This is so weird, this is the same thing that happened to me and the owl.”

The book was Calling on Extraterrestrials, written by UFO contactee Lisette Larkins. Andrea read some passages aloud and it described the author’s experience of locking eyes with a hawk and receiving a download. Although it wasn’t an owl, she described almost exactly the same thing that both Jessica and Andrea had experienced. The book was focused on how to contact and communicate with extraterrestrials, but it also has many personal accounts from Lisette's life.

This story that Andrea read aloud was of the author's struggle with a difficult decision. Her mood was down, and each day while walking her dog she would pass a yellow pick-up truck with the license plate that read "moping" and every time she would chide herself that she had to stop moping. There came a day when she was driving with her boyfriend and she saw a hawk sitting on top of the cab of that same yellow pick-up. She ordered her boyfriend to stop the car. She told him, "I've got to get up close. It's got a message for me." Then she got out to get a better look. She slowly approached the bird until she was standing just two feet from it.

To me, this was no ordinary hawk. As I continued to inch forward, I was able to look deeply into its eyes as I was just inches from its face. As I did so I became mesmerized by some inexplicable force. All activity around me blurred, and I knew without a doubt that I was connecting with extraterrestrial life... A message was transferred from the hawk's eyes to my own. My scalp felt as if it had been plugged into a generator.

Just like my experience with Andrea, Lisette's boyfriend was taking pictures as she stared into the eyes of the bird.

... To me, I was communicating with the higher realms, and those realms had sent me an enlightened being who had taken the form of a hawk.

I searched on line, found Lisette Larkins' contact info and sent her an email that said, in essence, we gotta talk. It was earlier that same day I had Andrea read Jessica's owl download account, and she noted the obvious similarity. This was also the night of a full moon. One detail that seems striking, Andrea's middle name is Lisette. Another little detail, when I picked up Lisette's book to transcribe the excerpt above, I found that book-mark left by Andrea featured a photograph of a snowy owl.[\[83\]](#)

It was a few weeks later, after some phone tag, that I finally spoke with Lisette Larkins. When I described Andrea's owl experience, she thought that was odd because she saw an owl on the day she received my first email. She was out by her swimming pool when an owl landed on a flag pole in her yard. She thought this was unusual because it was the middle of the day and there was a lot of commotion. Kids were yelling and splashing in the water and her dog ran to the base of the flagpole and barked up at the owl. Unperturbed by all the ruckus, this owl just sat there calmly.

Lisette was struck by the eerie similarities between Andrea's download from an owl with her own experience with the hawk. When I asked her what she thought it might mean, she said that the owl's message was, "Don't forget what you came here to do." She went on to implore the importance of meeting your soul's goal in this lifetime. This advice came from someone who tells of direct ongoing communication with alien beings.

Communion with a great horned owl

In late April of 2013, Charis Melina Brown excitedly called me to tell me she had locked eyes with an owl and it had changed her life. Just a few days earlier, she had gone for a hike in a forested area near her home with the direct intention to have a shamanic experience in nature. As Charis walked along the path she clearly felt that this would be the time when she would actually see an alien in full daylight, and this created a very potent sense of fear and excitement. Until this point, her lifetime of contact experiences came in the form of dreams, meditations, and psychic visions.

Charis is a self-proclaimed starseed, a term used to describe someone who has made some sort of soul agreement in their previous life to play an important role during their present incarnation here on earth. Starseed also implies a heightened set of spiritual and metaphysical skills, like psychic abilities and intuitive powers. I've spent a lot of time with Charis and this description seems entirely accurate.

Charis described the lead-up to seeing that owl. She had been walking for a while, and then she felt directed to go off the path. She struggled through the tangle of underbrush and then felt steered to a rock—"a specific rock, not that one over there, or any other one, this rock. I was told to sit on it." She felt she was being instructed exactly where to sit. Move a little this way, no too much, move back, turn a little that way.

It took her a while to realize that the very specific way she was situated gave her a direct line of sight through a tunnel-like opening through the bushes across from her. She was suddenly aware that a huge owl was staring directly at her, lined up directly to her eyes through that tunnel of leaves. If she were sitting just an inch or two right or left she wouldn't have been able to see the owl. It was exactly positioned in a line with her field of vision and it was looking right at her with its intense yellow eyes, not more than 50 feet away.

Charis tried to explain exactly what happened next, but much of her experience sounded so mystical that it was difficult for me to follow. It began with telepathic communication between her and the owl but seemed to morph in a transcendent multi-dimensional distorting of realities. Charis described a strong psychic connection, and she telepathically asked the owl, “Are you a faerie or an ET?”

It replied in a very exasperated tone, “Why can’t I be both. You’re both.”

Upon reflection she speculated that it might not have been an owl at all, but exactly what it said it was, some kind of alien/faerie hybrid. She feels that a lot of things we call faeries are simply ETs that have been here a lot longer than we have, and that over the millennia, they have blended into the natural world. Charis clearly stated that she experienced a direct download with this owl and it lasted for almost four hours. She describes the emotional intensity of the communication as shock, happiness, joy, gratitude, and terror.

Anticipating contact in the forest

I was told a similar story by a man named John. He had a day off from work and was going for a hike alone in the woods. Like Charis, he had a very strong feeling that he would have contact that day, literally that he might meet an ET during the hike. While driving to the park he saw a bumper sticker that said Maybe Today. It was a beautiful day for a hike, and he planned to hike to the mountain top.

As he was walking along the trail he saw a huge owl sitting on a branch staring at down him. He was spellbound.

I must have stood there having a staring contest with this owl for five minutes. Finally I realize that this owl was not going to fly away and I couldn’t just stand there all afternoon. I slowly started walking. The owl never broke his stare, slowly turning his head as I walked. When I looked back, its head had turned a full 180 degrees and it was still staring at me.

Later when John got to the top of the mountain, he saw a shining light on the other side of the valley. There were other people up there, and he heard one guy anxiously blurt out, “I don’t know what that fuckin’ light is.” The light remained stationary the whole time he was on the summit, and it didn’t look like any kind of ship. In retrospect, he truly doesn’t know what he saw, but thinks it could have been some sort of ET or inter-dimensional craft.

During his hike he saw both an owl and some sort of unidentified light, and neither flew off as he stared at them. The next morning, as John was meditating, an owl began hooting just outside his window. That owl was heard hooting every morning for the next few months.

So, both Charis and John went on a hike expecting to see an alien, but saw an owl instead.

333 and orchestrated clues

The events surrounding direct contact can be tailored in deeply personal ways, playing out as a sort of made-to-order theatrical presentation. The key plot points show up at the perfect moment in the narrative, as if directed at the individual needs of the observer. I cannot say this happens with all abductees, but it sure feels like a majority.

The phenomenon seems fully capable of reading the minds of the witness, as well as peering off into the past and out into the future. The timeline of life seems to be set up with preordained events along this path, each one carefully positioned to lead into the next as if some outside intelligence has intervened for some unknown purpose.

When I ponder my own set of experiences in this framework, I see a kind of methodical odyssey. I have been given just the bare minimum of clues, sometimes separated by decades, and this has forced me into the role of the detective, albeit an obsessive and introspective one. All this plays out as a form of deeply personal communication. Many others have been confronted with this same kind of interaction, the details matching their own distinctive quirks and persona.

An event took place along a quiet stretch of road in Canada on a winter's evening in 2003. A woman named Kaye (pseudonym) was driving home from work when she saw a triangle craft moving slowly towards her, it was still early enough to see clearly in the fading light of dusk.

She slowed to a crawl as this object passed directly over her car. She rolled down her window and looked straight up at the bottom of the craft. It was moving very slowly. The shape was a perfect equilateral triangle, and the size struck her as being oddly small, even though she estimates each edge of the craft to be about 100 feet.

Kaye said, "It was just barely over the trees. I actually could have thrown a rock up and hit it!" She described a dark gray surface on the triangle, with a white light in each of the corners. The radio was on with the volume low, but her sense was that the craft was totally silent. The craft gradually moved over her, flew away, and she kept driving.

Kaye said, “I was watching it closely. I wasn’t scared in the least, but for some reason I thought it better not to stop.” Understandably, the power of this close up sighting impacted her greatly.[\[84\]](#)

For about a year leading up to this triangle sighting above her car, she had been noticing the number 333. This began with her waking from a deep sleep and rolling over to look directly at 3:33 on her digital clock. Then Kaye was seeing the same numbers on the clock at work, on the license plates of cars in front of her, the change from purchases, or the price of a coffee and breakfast muffin.

Confronting this number everywhere was unnerving, and after months of persistently seeing 333, Kaye mentioned it to one of her co-workers. She wondered if she had somehow reset her own internal clock to repeatedly wake her up at 3:33. After that conversation, she started seeing 111, 222, 444 and 555. She felt as if some hidden intelligence were toying with her.

When Kaye acknowledged to herself that somehow it was the 333 that was most important, she was again plagued by that number. She felt very strongly that this was some sort of a clue, but couldn’t figure out any meaning. Then, oddly, right after the triangle sighting on that winter’s night, the frenetic appearance of the 333 diminished greatly.

Like so many people who have had these experiences, Kaye has a strong connection to the world of psychic phenomena. For years preceding the triangle sighting, she participated in a small group that engaged in deep trance channeling where her role was the primary note-taker. She is also dedicated to the serious study of both astrology and astronomy.

As an astrologer, Kaye used a reference book known as an ephemeris. This gives the daily positions of heavenly bodies. The sun, moon and planets are each given a numerical value listed in degrees and minutes; these numbers are used for astrology readings.

Later that same year, while browsing her ephemeris, Kaye noticed something odd. For the entirety of 2003 the number 3:33 appeared just one and only time for the Sun, the brightest and most important astrological luminary, and this fell on the very day of her triangle sighting.

This manifestation of that ever-present number had a heightened significance, but she was entirely baffled as to what it meant. She was trying to explain her quandary by showing a co-worker the 3:33 in her ephemeris. She told him that she knew it was somehow meant as a clue.

of putting the puzzle pieces together, Kaye looked at a fish aquarium in the office. She was shocked to see that the little catfish Draco had been chewing on his favorite treat, an English cucumber. She said, “It was almost like a magnet drew my eyes to the cucumber!”

The fish had eaten out the middle of the cucumber slice, so there was now a perfectly formed hole in the precise shape of an equilateral triangle. Seeing this, she realized instantly how all the clues were related and couldn’t believe that she had missed something so obvious.

Kaye had seen a three sided craft, with three lights and three points on a day that resonated 333 in the very book she uses to access the deeper meaning of celestial alignments. The implication is that the pilots of that craft must have known full well her passion for astrology, and then orchestrated her sighting on that very day with the intention of her someday finding this strange clue in the puzzle of her own life. That this realization was triggered by a slice of cucumber makes it all the more bizarre. The implication is that these cryptic clues had been purposely placed in her path for her to notice and then to solve. They were meant for her and her alone.

Kaye said, “I find it more than mildly amusing at this point that some of the clues are so out there, yet so interwoven like some puzzle tapestry, that virtually every serendipitous and bizarre thing that happens to me seems to be somehow oddly connected.”

The appearance of these orchestrated clues is a clue in itself. It all points to something purposely toying with UFO witnesses. There is a sense that we are rats in a carefully constructed maze, yet we are incapable of looking up to see the examiners peering down at us, let alone understanding their agenda. Why this is happening is unknowable, but it is happening.

While there is no owl in this account, it does show up indirectly. The catfish shares its name with Draco the Dragon, a constellation that wraps itself around Polaris, the North Star. In Greek legend, Draco was a dragon killed by the goddess Minerva and thrown into the heavens where we still see it each night. Minerva, as we know, has a companion little owl.

Also of note, the little catfish was named after Draco Malfoy from the Harry Potter books. This Hogwarts student had a Eurasian eagle owl deliver the mail for him. But, every character at the school had their own owl as messenger. So, if this is a clue, it’s a subtle one.

Channeling an owl

I spoke with a woman who is both a researcher as well as having had her own direct contact experiences. We talked together in the busy setting of a UFO conference, and I asked her for her impressions on the connection between seeing real owls and the UFO phenomenon.

She is very soft spoken and she answered thoughtfully, “I have one person I’m working with who has had a lot of owl experiences, and she feels they will arrive shortly before an abduction, or just after.”

This was early in my owl research, and she gave me the one answer that had been in the back of my mind, but until that point I hadn’t dared to consider. I replied, “Well, that means I’m totally screwed!”

She smiled and tried to reassure me, “Now don’t worry. That’s been her experience, it doesn’t mean it’s happening to you too.”

That’s the core question at the forefront of all of this: Is this happening to me? Have all the owls I’ve been seeing a foreshadowing of abduction events? The funny thing is—I’ve had that thought right in the moment while looking at real owls. I questioned if these owls were some kind of sign of my own UFO contact.

The woman I spoke with is Jacquelin Smith, and along with having UFO contact experiences, she is an author, psychic and animal communicator. Her first book from 2005 was titled, plainly enough, Animal Communication. She published a second book in 2010 that features the back and forth channeled conversations she’s had with a wide range of animals, including cats, dogs, butterflies, a giant tortoise, jellyfish and, what struck my interest, a barred owl. The book is titled Star Origins And Wisdom Of Animals: Talks With Animal Souls, and most of the transcribed conversations were not with the animals per se, but with their souls. Other conversations in the book were with star beings that were inhabiting the physical bodies of certain animals. These communications revealed the personality of the visiting spirit as well as the deeper aspects of the animal’s soul.

Jacquelin writes: “All of this could sound sci-fi, but I had so many outrageous synchronicities while writing this book, all I could do was laugh and keep writing.”

I understood this at my core. She could be quoting me because I’ve been at the receiving end of some freaky intense synchronicities while writing this book. Something is at play, and I feel urged to keep at it, no matter how far off the well-worn path these ideas lead me.

Jacquelin has always had psychic skills, an interest in metaphysics, and a deep connection with animals. When she was 27 years old, she was in a serious car accident and had a near-death experience (NDE). While she was on the other side, she was told to come back. After this life changing event, her psychic abilities blossomed, something that is commonly reported following such a profoundly transformative event.

After the accident, she felt a need to combine her psychic skills with her love of animals; she tested this in 1979.

One of my first experiences was with a Zebra. I was at a zoo and asked a particular zebra to come and stand in front of me. Within a minute, the zebra walked from the far side of the exhibit and stood in front of me. Then I heard the zebra ask, "What do you want?" I was off and running into communicating with animals.[\[85\]](#)

It was a telepathic conversation with an owl that drew me to Jacquelin's book. Her initial owl connection happened in the springtime, it unfolded on a path that she would walk daily. She would see a barred owl perched on the same branch every day. Mostly it ignored her, but there came a day when the owl looked directly into her eyes. She felt a wonderful disarming sensation zooming through her body as the owl scanned her with its big black eyes. She started a conversation, this is an edited excerpt, from her second book:

Jacquelin: Hello. I am happy to see that you are volunteering to speak with me.*

Owl: Hello. You saw beyond what humans call owl. You saw the star being aspect of me...*

Did you look through me?

When you looked into my eyes and I looked into yours, you felt my eyes penetrate through your bodies. I was scanning you. I was checking out your aura as well as your physical structure... For you, this was a close encounter with someone from outside earth's realm (smile). But remember you are not of this world either. I am from the third universe beyond the universe in which earth exists...

Why have you come to earth?

My soul agreed to be part of an experiment on earth...

Thank you. What's your mission while living as an owl?

Owls bridge the earth and sky. We are part of a much larger group of beings and our overseers who keep the inter-dimensional highways clear and open in order to be accessed and traveled by All.

Thank you. What other roles do owls play on earth?

... We are helping to lift the veil of illusion on Earth so that all beings can awaken and remember the truth that all living forms are One... Everything is energy...

Thank you. What else would you like to say about the work owls do?

One owl can cover a great distance when helping to lift veils and shift inter-dimensional energies. Owls assist with creating intersections and countless inter-dimensional highways so connections are clear and energies are integrated. This is the Creator's plan. It is Earth's desire to be shifting into higher frequencies and this takes integration of all energies... All current creations are shifting into new creations, but then again, this is always taking place.

... What messages do you have for humans? What do owls mirror to humans?

We bring the messages of seeing the bigger picture while being able to focus on the details... If you chose to look at us as a mirror, we reflect to you the part of yourself that needs to remember to look at the bigger picture of your lives as well as goals and details...

What thought would you like to leave with me tonight?

Fly above the Earth, fly beyond the Milky Way, and experience the vastness of the creative All. Be wise and open your inner eyes. See all around you the wonders of the Creator. They are you.

The voice of this owl has a similar tone to what gets shared throughout the contact literature, it fits neatly in with what other sources are saying. Many points are consistent with what is reported by UFO abductees; the mind scan, the telepathic communication, and the beings coming here from some higher dimension.

Other points are almost word for word what a UFO contactee might say about themselves; that some part of their own spirit being had made a soul agreement to come here from some far off galaxy to play an important role. This might imply a visiting soul, or some deeper part of themselves, is inhabiting their body to perform this duty here on Earth.

This back and forth dialog also parallels a lot of other channeled information. One good example would be the book Conversations with God by Neale Donald Walsch (who also had a near-death experience). Reality gets described in a similar way across a wide spectrum of channelers. They'll say things like: all living forms are one, everything is energy, the creator is within all of us and everything around us.

Like much of the larger pool of channeled material, some concepts are rather hard to follow, such as when the owl said, "I am from the third universe beyond the universe in which Earth exists." Again, this fits a pattern. I am not saying that I doubt Jacquelin's sincerity (I don't), but what I am seeing is an almost unified message seeping in from beyond the veil. I say almost unified because certain aspects of it are slightly nuanced, the message seem tailored for each source, whether it's a UFO abductee, alien, owl, angel, or God.

I spoke with Jacquelin on the phone as part of this research, and there were a few things I wanted to ask that weren't in her book. One question was answered before I even asked, and what she said didn't surprise me. She told me she was working on a third book about her own direct contact experiences with Star Beings. She avoided the term UFO abductee, choosing instead the term taken as a way to describe her experiences. I very much understand her reluctance to limit herself with the heavily loaded word abduction.

Both her near-death experience and contact with star beings could be seen as part of an initiation into the role of the shaman. I also asked Jacquelin what the word shaman meant to her, and she shied away from thinking of herself as a shaman, but she recognized her role as an animal communicator could easily be seen in that light by others.

Jacquelin's laundry list of experiences fit cleanly into what I have been finding with people who tell of alien contact. Possessing psychic skills, having a near-death experience, becoming an author who writes about her experiences, and using synchronicity as a way to direct her life path. But more than any of those points, she radiates a powerful heartfelt sense of mission. She is profoundly sensitive and devoted to her role as an animal communicator. She sees the human connections with animals as part of our overall relationship to the natural world, and quite literally to all of reality.

There was one question I wanted to ask her. This was my own selfish request, and it triggered a remarkable response.

Mike C: If you do see an owl anytime soon, and you can communicate, I would love for you to ask why are UFO abductees and contactees seeing owls more often than, let's say, Joe Normal?

Jacquelin: There are beings here from other galaxies and it's their mission to communicate with, and to open humans, and that is part of what the owls are here for.

At this point she struggled to say something. She seemed to be concentrating and even whispered "words, words..." under her breath, as if she were challenged by something so limiting. When she spoke again, it was halting and slow.

Jacquelin: They are souls who come from other galaxies, who have chosen to be in owl form.

Part of their mission is to assist with opening humans to ET contact, so you could say that they're part of the team. If someone is taken onto a craft, the owls are like the predecessors for the experience with certain humans. It might be deer for some and it might be owls for others.

I'm trying to put this into words. So, onboard there can be grays, mantis beings and reptilians, you've heard about this right?

Mike C: Oh yes.

Jacquelin: The owls are working with all of them as a team, the owls are the Earth connectors. This is what they are telling me, that they are part of the whole team, they are the initiators. The owls call the human's attention to them, they are putting out a certain frequency, and then that creates a certain energy field and that then allows for the frequency of the humans to be adjusted to then be taken onboard in a safe way. Human's need to be comfortable in that frequency, so that the person isn't just blown away. Now that does happen sometimes, but the owls are doing their best.

Yes, it can also be a screen memory, so there is not just one function. They have multiple functions for the image of the owl, and how humans think about owls. And another thing, they are saying that they are the initiators, but this is an initiation of going aboard a craft.

So I look at it in that sense, they are using the owl symbolically, but the owl is still the owl frequency, to mirror to us in an archetypal sense, because humans think of owls in a certain way, right? There is an archetypal image that is mirrored to the humans, this goes in on a subconscious level and connects with the human's genetic memory bank.

Because humans think with symbols, they are touching us on that level, and that goes back to the beginning of human kind, and how we see owls. Not only here, but in soul connections in other star systems.

Mike C: Did this come from your own research, or were you channeling? I ask because you weren't talking in generalities, you were talking to me! Everything you just said reflected my direct experience.

Jacquelin: I'm channeling, right now, this was the owls speaking, they were channeling through me. This is what the owls wanted me to tell you, the group-owl, or however you can say that. For what it's worth, I'll just say they wanted to let you know that these concepts are important to relate to humans so they better understand.

What it does is to demystify it so the fear can dissolve, which I love. So, their intention is positive, I love this, to announce initiation, that's the word they're choosing. I have heard this word in some of my experiences on different starships, the ETs have used that word with me, saying that this was an initiation for your soul's evolution.

Mike C: Those are very large grand concepts, and that's what I'm trying to do. I'm trying to take these simple stories quite literally, I mean, if someone sees an owl in the woods, I recognize that there are these big, powerful, grand things behind that.

This short channeled dialog between me and an owl, with Jacquelin as the medium, cleanly summed up the entirety of this book project. That the role of the owl would be to announce initiation is exactly what has played out in most of the experiences I've documented, especially my own.

I don't pretend to understand how channeling works. It could be that Jacquelin was using her psychic skills to tap into my own inner mind, and she merely told me what I wanted to hear. This doesn't feel like some parlor trick where the charlatan deceives me. The concepts are too complex and too cleanly tailored to my own needs. Instead, it could be that the channelled voice of the owl was really my own higher self, using Jacquelin to bring forth the answers I required. I say that only because the voice of the owl delivered precisely the message I needed, both as an author and for my own personal journey.

But more than that, I was given clues that sent me into deeper terrain. The concept of owls as an archetype was something I hadn't ever heard or even considered. This avenue of thought came from the channeled words of an owl, spoken aloud by a UFO experiencer. Thanks to Jacquelin, archetypes got its own chapter in this book. And it was this one idea, more than anything else, that cleanly summed up the central question of my inquiry, why owls?

It's not all love and light

So much of what has been reported in this book feels like it's lit up with a golden glow, as if it's all cheery and wonderful. That certainly isn't the case, and many of the people I have talked with have suffered terribly. These experiences, both with UFOs and owls, have created confusion and chaos in their lives.

Many experiencers are devastated by the out-and-out trauma that can come with these intrusions. The challenge for them is to integrate what has happened and live their lives. Some might see their experiences in a more positive light, often after a lot of deep inward contemplation. A lot of the stories I have collected reflect this perspective. Others see it as negative, and yet they still manage to integrate these bizarre experiences into their lives. No story is the same and nobody reacts the same. I have heard people tell me of being swallowed up in ecstasy, and yet there is still a very frightening aspect to this mystery.

Ben is one of the experiencers in this book, and he's seen a lot of owls in highly charged moments. He sent me a quick note in an online chat-box, "I'm not a 'hippy dippy all is new age' type person, but my sense after living with this my whole life is that it isn't harmful, it only broadens your scope of reality. But it certainly is difficult."

His statement reflects what most of the people who've shared their experiences might say.

I know what I want this to be. I would love nothing more than to find conclusive proof that all of this is benevolent, a grand unfolding for the greater glory of humanity. Perhaps that's exactly what it is, but wanting that doesn't make it so. There are enough stories of trauma that the scales keep swaying, leaving me unable to decipher any agenda behind this mystery.

We are confronting something complex that shares its secrets at a great cost.

Chapter 24: The Touch of an Owl's Wing

I gave my first public talk on owls at the annual International UFO Congress (IUFOC) in February of 2014. After stepping off stage I was mobbed with people who wanted to tell me their owl stories. I took the time to sit and listened to each of their experiences. These accounts were all fascinating, and each in their own way confirmed what I had already been finding.

A while later, just as I had the chance to catch my breath, a fellow stopped me in the hall and said he had an owl story he thought I should hear. Right in that moment I saw that this guy had a special glow about him, and I asked, "Where should we talk?" What then unfolded could be the single most powerful owl story I have ever heard.

Jonathan (pseudonym) and I went to the bar. He ordered a beer and I ordered a glass of wine. He spoke with a quiet voice and began talking about a friend who had been reading a book on the ancient folklore of the Native Americans. The book is titled The Seven Arrows.[\[86\]](#)

Jonathan's friend was reading this book during his lunch break while working for a timber scouting crew in a remote mountainous area of the Northern Rockies. He was all alone and lying on his back in the sun when he got to the part where the author describes how your spirit animal will find you. He then set the book on his chest and drifted off to sleep.

He awoke to the foul smell of something sniffing right in his face, he realized it was a big animal trying to smell his breath. He froze with his eyes closed, all he could do was hold his breath and play dead. After a little while, the loud sniffing ended and he heard heavy footsteps moving away from him. When he got up the nerve to open his eyes, he saw a huge grizzly bear lumbering off into the forest.

This man still had the book on his chest, open to the very page that described how one should find their animal spirit guide. Understandably, that man took the bear to be his animal spirit, and a short while later he gave the book to Jonathan.

Jonathan was sitting at home, deeply immersed in the book when he heard a knock at the door. It was his former roommate; he told Jonathan that he was there to get all of his things that had been stored in his garage for the last year. The catch was Jonathan needed to give him a ride, along with everything in storage, to his new home. He was eager to get his garage emptied out of his roommate's stuff, so he agreed.

Jonathan was a little annoyed because he had just gotten to the part in the book he had been told about, the point where the author describes how your spirit animal will find you, so he carried the book to his van in the hopes of reading during any free moments. He set it on the dashboard, open to the same page his friend had been reading when the grizzly bear had smelled his breath.

It was a warm summer night and the window was open as Jonathan drove. The former roommate was next to him in the passenger seat and his present roommate came along for the drive, she was sitting right behind the driver's seat. They were traveling on a desolate stretch of highway in Montana. The road wound along the edge of a lake on their left side, and there was another car following close behind them.

As Jonathan drove, he noticed something lit up at the outer edge of his headlights. It was gliding towards him from the lake side of the road and seemed like it was on a collision course for his van. He slowed down and then saw an owl fly directly into the beam of his lights. He feared hitting the owl and at the same time he was worried that the car behind him would crash into him if he stopped. This owl eased up close along the open driver's side window. It was so close that the tip of its large wing lightly stroked the side of Jonathan's face.

I sat in the bar listening to Jonathan telling his story and watched as he used his fingertips to lightly caress his left temple. He said, "It was so gentle. It felt as if I had just walked through a spider's web and my face tingled."

At this point the car behind him was now right on his bumper, and its headlights lit up the side view mirror like a spotlight. Jonathan told me:

I saw a sight I will never forget. This owl's head was only inches from my side view mirror. His huge eyes looked directly into mine as I stared back into his. It was as if I was caught up in some sort of hypnotic trance and couldn't tear my eyes away. I can't explain it but I was locked in that wise-eyed stare. He flew at the exact same speed I was driving for what seemed an eternity compressed into what I'm sure was just a few seconds. How I stayed on the road I do not know. Then we separated gracefully and he flew off into the darkness.

Then he reminded me that when all this happened the book about how to find your animal spirit guide was right in front of him on the dashboard. It was laying open to the very page, in the very same copy, that it had been on when his friend was nose to nose with a grizzly bear.

There was a lull in the conversation as I tried to make sense of what I had just heard. Then Jonathan went on to explain that he had a surgery as a boy to remove what the doctors thought was a tumor. There was a mass growing inside his skull, and it was affecting his vision in his left eye. When it was removed it proved to be something entirely different than cancer, it was a small undeveloped fetus. The doctors described "it" as a self-contained embryonic sack that had tapped into a blood supply deep within Jonathan's brain. Somehow, he had been conceived along with a twin, and he is convinced this growth in his skull would have been his sister. Her fetus was subsumed by his head while they were together in the womb.

Jonathan described how, as a young boy, he always had a helpful voice in his head. He described this as a form of psychic communications with the spirit of his unborn twin sister. It was an ever present part of his life, but after the surgery and the removal of this fetus, the voice was silent. He told me, "That marked the end of my relationship with my sister, a sister no one but me knew existed."

Jonathan has endured hardships, especially as a young boy. During his life he has had a series of out of body experiences, these happened in hospitals while under anesthesia during traumatic emergency procedures. He remembers floating up off the operating table and looking down at his own body. It was during one of these events that he heard his sister telling him, I can't die until you die. He feels she is connected to him on some deep soul level and he has since had a lifetime of profound psychic experiences. He feels she is still playing a role and using his physical body.

Then he turned slightly and touched his finger to a spot just alongside his left eyebrow. He told me, “See this scar? This is where my twin sister was removed.” He paused, then said, “And this is right where the tip of that owl’s wing caressed my temple.”

Jonathan then described the challenges he’s had dealing with these psychic abilities, and how they all trace back to his unborn twin sister. He tried to articulate his own profound sense of knowing, as well as the strange synchronicities that put him in the path of certain highly charged events, many of which involved death.

When describing the role his sister has played, he used the term psychopomp. This is an ancient Greek word, literally meaning guide of souls. A psychopomp is a spirit or deity with the responsibility of escorting newly deceased souls to the afterlife, and they are meant to play out their guiding role without any judgment.

He then told me about a deep moral decision that had been thrust upon him, and how this was tied into his sister’s presence and his own psychic knowing. He felt a responsibility to speak out about what he knew concerning a person who had recently died. Earlier that day, he had followed through with this decision, and he told certain people news they didn’t want to hear. Later that night he looked out his front door to see an enormous UFO hovering directly over the house across the street. This sighting was seen by lots of other people in the area and was reported in the local news.

It was while writing this out that I realized how Jonathan’s story so cleanly plays into the overall mythology. This soft spoken man with the owl as his spirit guide was playing the role of messenger, delivering hidden knowledge about death. Then, in direct response to doing what he felt was his responsibility, he saw a huge UFO.

About a month after we met, Jonathan shared a poem he had written. Here is an excerpt where he reflects on his unborn sister:

She hung around a short while after the doctor had her removed.
To say goodbye and tell me she loved me.
I wanted to follow but couldn’t, that path was barred.
I vowed to kill myself so I wouldn’t be left alone in my sad state but she knew things and warned me not to.
For our fates are intertwined and one is not to take their own life in this world she said
We would be together again in the end she told me as she could not truly die either til that time comes.
Where she resides now is neither in the land of the living nor in the land of the dead but somewhere in between.

Jonathan later went on to tell me a little more about the night that owl touched his temple. He said that the woman in the back seat had a perfect view of that owl as it flew alongside his van, all lit up by the car behind them, and she couldn't quit talking about it for weeks. He said:

She said it was the most spectacular thing she had ever seen. For me it was even more than that, more than I would even be able to attempt explaining til many years later.

The owl has supernatural connotations going back to the beginning of time throughout all cultures. It isn't just a Native American belief or myth. Something very deep is linked and that spirit takes no heed of race, color, creed, or religion. It's something else.

I suspect many a personal journey that no one has ever heard of has been triggered and ordained by a visit from the owl. What it all means is hard to decipher. Understanding it may be on an individual basis only, but nonetheless, the depths of this have yet to be plumbed.

I have listened carefully to what must be, at this point, many hundreds of owl stories. Each one is sacred to me, but what Jonathan shared with me in that bar is perhaps the most sacred of all. In our follow up phone calls and emails he took on the role of mentor. He was further down a similar path to my own, and he knew it.

I have spoken at length with Jonathan in person, but we've had only one phone conversation. Near the end of that emotional call, which lasted over two hours, there was a beeping on my phone. It was an incoming call from my friend Phil. After I said goodbye to Jonathan, I called Phil back. He was the bearer of tragic news—two of our closest friends and co-workers had died in an accident. Tears were shed as he told me what little he knew of their death. It was weeks later when I realized I had been talking with a man who feels an intimate connection to a psychopomp when Phil called me to share the tragic news. I am not sure how much I should read into this, but I can only hope there was a deity gently escorting my friends to the afterlife.

This book is more than just a collection of odd owl stories, it is meant to be a reflection of a mystery, something vital within the human spirit. Gathering all these owl accounts has been a kind of awakening for me, and I have become a disciple to the story. There is a deeper message folded into many of these personal narratives, well beyond just seeing an owl in the forest. It is my sincerest hope that some of these stories will someday be shared around the campfire, filling the listener with some elusive understanding, and perhaps a more heartfelt way to proceed forward with their own lives.[\[87\]](#)

Chapter 25: The Messengers

My own owl sightings

This book started with what seems like a rather simple story, I saw a bunch of owls in the mountains with a woman named Kristen. That account might be easy to dismiss compared to a lot of the other more dramatic accounts in this book, but its impact on my life has been profound. It happened in the autumn of 2006, and in the aftermath I was hit by a flood of both owl sightings and absurd coincidences. This torrent of synchro-weirdness forced me to look into my own UFO memories, and I teetered on the tightrope of denial for the next bunch of years. I was very aware something weird was manifesting in my life, but frightened by the intensity of the message.

I have seen a lot of owls since that initial event, often in highly charged moments. I could easily drone on and on with these personal experiences, and what I am sharing here in this chapter is just a mere taste of my owl sightings. Some stand out as more persuasive, and there is a fable-like flavor to much of what I've experienced. It would be completely correct to say that seeing all these owls has changed the direction of my life.

Seeing five owls with Peter

In early September 2009, I was on a seven-day trip teaching lightweight camping skills in the mountains of Southern Montana. Our little expedition had eight members and we were backpacking just outside the border of Yellowstone. There was a small pond near where our shelters were set up, but the water was green and stagnant, and the team was disappointed in its quality.

As twilight approached, a student named Peter and I collected all the empty water bottles from our teammates and left camp. We walked to a nearby spring just a few minutes down the trail. It was a lovely chance to talk with Peter. We spoke about our lives, and the curious paranormal events that seemed to flavor both of our personal experiences. I was quite open and told him that my life had been plagued with unusual owl sightings. I also tried to articulate that these owls seemed connected to UFOs.

We got back to camp with bottles full of cold clear water and the first thing we did was both laid down to watch the darkening sky. This was a little bit unusual, something I had never done before, but we both did it that evening. The scene was totally peaceful, both of us were on our backs, looking up from the edge of a small meadow surrounded by dense trees. Peter is a psychiatrist and the conversation seemed to get deeper and deeper as the sky got darker and darker.

At one point, there was a crashing noise in the trees above us, and suddenly the sky above us was filled with five owls. Yes—five owls!

They seemed big, maybe two feet from beak to tail, probably short eared owls. This flurry of owls darted and swooped above us for about 10 minutes, and we were both thunderstruck at the intensity of what we were seeing. Eventually they all flew off, and once they were gone I asked Peter what I was talking about the moment the owls appeared.

He said I was speaking about my mother.

I said, “Really?”

He said, “Yes, they appeared right when you mentioned your mother.”

That night I had a dream my mother was crying, and the image of her face was terribly sad. The next day I called her using a cell phone from high on an alpine ridge top, the only spot we could get reception. I asked how she was doing and was relieved when she said she was fine. It was two years earlier that she was diagnosed with Alzheimer’s, and her life at that time was extremely confusing and stressful. I was worried, and it was nice to hear her voice.

I make a formal plea

Just a few weeks later, I was again camping out with a different set of students. One night at dusk, a set of three owls flew around our camp and landed on trees, watching us as we cooked dinner on our little camp stoves. This was a worrisome time where I was seeing so many owls that I needed some way to filter out the ordinary ones from the more prescient ones. It was simply too much, and I was overwhelmed.

At some point in October 2009, I walked into the woods alone and made a formal pledge, literally stating out-loud that I would no longer pay attention to any owls that were out at my periphery. I live in a place where it’s pretty normal to see an owl off in the distance just sitting in a tree or on some fence post, and those didn’t count. I declared to the universe that I would only pay attention if an owl crossed my path. Basically, an owl would need to swoop down in front of me, as if it were demanding my attention. Almost immediately after this verbal proclamation, owls seemed to respond—they would appear in front of me in flight, cleanly bisecting my path.

The first overt owl “performance” happened just a few days after making my plea. I was riding my bike through my little home town at twilight. While gliding down the middle of the street I noticed an owl perched on a telephone line off to my left. As I got closer it dropped down—flying slow and smooth—and passing in front of me right at eye level. Then it gracefully floated up and landed in a pine tree on the other side of the street. I had a few more sightings like this over the rest of that month, where each time an owl would cross my path.

After that, there was pretty much nothing for almost a full year. I saw a few normal owls off on the side of the road as I was driving, but those didn’t count. Their overt performances had eased off to zero.

In September 2010, I spent several nights in a row recording and editing an audio post about the month of October 2009. This was when I had made my pledge in the woods asking owls to cross my path. That month stands alone in my life for its overwhelming load of weirdness. I was getting hit with so many synchronicities that I feared for my sanity. Speaking into a microphone and recording this podcast was emotional and time consuming. I would edit late into the night, awash in a sort of compulsion to get these experiences out.

Here’s where it gets weird. One early evening while I was riding my bike from a friend’s house to my home, and knowing full well that I was on my way to work on that heavy-handed podcast—an owl swooped down from a telephone pole and silently crossed my path right at eye level. It landing on a fence post on the other side of the lonely rural road. I was immediately aware that this was somehow linked with the podcast.

Now, here’s where it gets really weird. Two nights later, I was again riding home on my bike, this time on a totally different road. Again, and an owl swoops across my path right at eye level. Just like the previous sighting, I was on my way home to work on that heavy-handed podcast.

These two back-to-back path crossing events came after a year of almost zero owl sightings. My interpretation of these kinds of owl incidents has been either you’re on the right path or pay attention. But after having two owls cross my path while on my way to edit that audio essay about synchronicities and paranormal experiences, I was imbued with an even deeper dedication to be as honest as possible.[\[88\]](#)

An owl crosses my path

As I write out these events, I am surprised at how many of these owl sightings involve me on my bicycle. I know I have said this already, but there is a paved bike path right in front of my house that goes straight into the center of town. Here is one more bicycle story.

It was late in the afternoon in mid-October 2010 when I looked out my window and saw a woman named Carol (not her real name). She was my girlfriend from exactly a decade earlier. She was now married and she was with her three kids heading toward town on the bike path. Two of her children were on bikes and she was pushing the youngest in a jogging stroller.

I was on my way out the door when I saw her, and I hopped on my bike and quickly caught up to her and her children. I rode slowly alongside Carol and we chatted. Her only daughter (about 9 years old) was on a bike a little way in front of us. At one point, her little son said he had cold hands and she pulled out a pair of gloves for him. Right at the same time, Carol and I both realized that I had given her those gloves as a gift a decade earlier.

Without any prompting from me, she talked about all the animals she had seen during the time we were dating. I told her that recently I'd been seeing a lot of owls. Less than two minutes later, I saw an owl fly across the bike path (yes, across my path) and land on a low branch in a tree just a little way in front of us. I was the only one who saw it, and in the way the bike path turned, I caught just the briefest glimpse.

This happened near a bridge in a small stretch of cottonwoods. I whispered to the two children, neither of whom had seen it, that we needed to find the owl. We all set our bikes down and tip-toed along the bike path until we were up close to a handsome great horned owl on a low branch in a tree. It was a little less than 18 inches tall, with those cat-like tufts that look like ears, and electric bright yellow eyes. This was an amazing sighting in the daylight, and I think this is as close as I have ever been to a perched owl. I'm not exaggerating, it was probably less than 15 feet from where we stood on the bike path! It stared at us for about a minute, and then casually flew off. It felt like it had been posing for us. Everything about the experience was beautiful.

After the owl flew off, the daughter started yelling to her mother. asking over and over, "Mom, do you love Mike? Do you love Mike?" This wasn't awkward at all, it was entirely endearing.

Carol and her daughter, who was right up close to the owl in the tree, both showed up on the hiking trail the morning after my initial sighting of three owls with Kristen in 2006. This little girl held Kristen's hand four years earlier as we walked down the trail towards my car. I'll add that we all saw a big beautiful moose just off the path that morning.

An owl specialist hears my owl stories

I live near a non-profit raptor center. They take in injured, ill and orphaned birds of prey in the hopes of returning them to the wild. I recently had the chance to speak with a doctor who was working with the veterinarians and naturalists at the center. I briefly told him about the experience with Kristen and seeing three owls on two separate occasions within a few days (the story that begins this book) and then asked if he had ever heard of anything like that. He said no.

Then I told him another story of seeing five owls fly above me and my friend Peter as we were lying on our back in a meadow as we talked about metaphysical issues. I asked if he had ever heard anything like that. Again, he said no. He hinted that such things simply don't happen. Then I told him another of my experiences, and another. He looked at me with concern. As I talked, I recognized he was getting uncomfortable. As I told more of my owl sightings, he began moving away from me. It was a curious feeling to realize that an owl expert hearing my experiences was looking at me as if I were insane.

Here are the opening lines of a blog post-dated August 13, 2011:

Last night I saw a lone owl, and the experience was absolutely magical. I was in the Tetons alone, and I was sleeping out under the stars in one of the most beautiful meadows imaginable.

I travel in the mountains with very little on my back. I had checked the weather before leaving home for this single night of camping, and it said that it would be a clear night, and that means no tent and thus an even smaller pack. This was the night of the full moon, and I just needed to be out there! That night I hiked right to the point where it was getting too dark to see. I simply set my pad down on the ground and climbed into my sleeping bag. There is nothing in the world I love more than sleeping out under the stars. The full moon was rising in the east, and I watched it creep its way up above the big peaks. I was awash in awe and amazement.

I spent the next half hour or so lying in my sleeping bag with a book. I was reading The Handprint of Atlas by an author with the pen name Sesh Heri. The book is about synchronicity, UFO contact, and the alignments of important land features. Much of the book is devoted to examining ley lines on the globe and how they connect significant sites to each other, and also to points in the cosmos.

As I was reading with my headlamp, I was startled by a sudden blurry swoosh right above my head. I looked up to see a huge bird land at the very top of a nearby dead tree. The moon was full so I could clearly see the silhouette of an owl. It didn't have the cat-like ear-tufts, so I am guessing (by its size) that it was a great gray owl. I'll add that it looked way too big to be perched on the spindly little branch on that dead tree.

I sat and watched it for maybe ten minutes, and the entire time it was looking right at me in a full-body pose of scrutiny. Now here is the amazing part. From where I was lying on the ground, the tree with the owl was precisely back-lit by the full moon. The symmetry was perfect. Right in that moment, I was very aware that I was seeing something spectacular. How and why it landed on that exact tree, when I was lying in that exact spot, and the full moon was in that exact point in the sky. All this while I was reading a book on the mystical alignments points on the Earth. It felt crystal clear that something more was at play than just mere chance. I even did an illustration (above) to define what I saw and posted it on my blog.

I asked a series of questions while looking up from my sleeping bag. What are you trying to tell me? Can you communicate with me? Why are all you owls showing up in my life? Is someone watching me through your eyes? If you want to tell me something, you can give me information through my dreams? All those questions were asked out loud, addressing them directly to that owl staring down at me. Unfortunately, I didn't have any dreams that night, at least that I remember. When the owl did fly away, it scared me. It flew directly away from me, but that was impossible to tell in the dim light, so it looked like it was zooming right at me.

More about the short trip. I saw a black bear eating huckleberries while hiking into the mountains, and I saw a wolverine in the early morning sunshine on the way out. Both were a safe distance away, so there was nothing intimidating about either. Bears are rather common to see, but it's extremely rare to see a wolverine, so I felt perfectly blessed. Bear, owl, wolverine—a trio of powerful animal totems in less than 24 hours.

My confirmation event

To better understand this final story, or more correctly, set of stories, I'll need to share a few things about myself. These are important points that will give you a better idea of who I am.

I have spent a lot of time doing professional outdoor wilderness work as well as my own ambitious personal travels, starting back in the late 1980s. I've taught camping and mountaineering in all seasons, including winter, spending up to a full month traveling in some of the most remote areas of North America. My classroom for over two decades has been in pristine wilderness areas of the Rockies, Canada and Alaska.

I feel very comfortable in remote environments. I feel very comfortable in a tent. I feel very comfortable sleeping outside under the stars. I have excellent map skills, both using and creating maps. All of these are things I dearly love, and each will be part of this transformative experience.

I've been using the term paradox syndrome to describe the more complex stories. As noted earlier, these accounts play out as a tangle of messy threads with clues leading off in countless directions. This makes any easy interpretation impossible, but at the same time, it's a form of confirmation. I've come to trust these chaotic narratives, especially when an owl is involved.

This heightened complexity defines what I have come to call my confirmation event. The core of this experience happened in a cold dusty corner of Southern Utah on the night of March 10th, 2013. Until that point, I'd never really been able to say that I'd ever had any kind of direct UFO contact. I would certainly not have described myself as an abductee, to do so just didn't feel honest. The problem was, at that point in my life, I'd already had enough unusual experiences that I knew with certainty that something was going on, but I fought any implication that I might be a UFO abductee. All that changed on the night of March 10th, 2013.

It happened while traveling back home to Idaho after an annual UFO conference in Arizona. I was driving north on highway 89 through some of the most beautiful parts of Southern Utah. My plan was simply to find a secluded spot to pull off alongside the highway and sleep out under the stars. I've traveled a lot around the West and this kind of camping is normal for me. I do it partly to avoid paying for hotels, but more than that, it's something I dearly love.

I pulled into a nice spot around 9 p.m., right off Utah Highway 20 and just a few miles east of I-15. I got out of my car and walked around a little bit with a headlamp to stretch my legs. The area had low bushy junipers and these divided a series of beaten down roads and little turnouts. Plenty of people had been here before and typical of this part of the West, there was some litter and evidence of campfires. This was a cold Sunday night, so I wasn't really worried about anyone else pulling in. It was a perfect spot to sleep out. I set my thick sleeping pad down in the dirt right next to my little Subaru. Then I climbed into my big winter sleeping bag, put my head on my pillow, and it wasn't too long before I drifted off to sleep.

At some point, probably around midnight, I woke up. Given the dry desert air and the cloudless night, the stars were spectacular. I was completely at peace as I looked up at the big, glorious sky. From where I was lying, I could look up at a ridge line of rounded peaks off to the south. I noticed something odd. I saw what appeared to be a large round structure perched on a gentle saddle between two small hills. My impression was that I was looking at a round house with a row of lights situated along the outer circumference of the building. It seemed like the kind of big fancy home you might see facing the ocean in Malibu, but it was way out of place in rural Utah.

As I was lying there, I thought to myself, that looks just like a landed flying saucer. I feel like I have good intuitive skills, so if this was really a flying saucer I would know it, I should have felt some sort of internal anxiety, but I didn't. The mood was totally calm and peaceful, so after a long while of staring up at that round structure, I just rolled over and went back to sleep.

I woke up again a little later to the sound of a coyote howling somewhere right near my head. I tried to peek around the sage brush near where I was lying, but there was nothing to see. It felt like I could toss a little dog bone underhand from my sleeping bag, and this coyote could have caught it in his mouth. I've spent half my life out West and over those decades I've slept out in a lot of places just like this, and I've heard a lot of coyotes. But I had never ever heard one that close to me—it was amazing and I felt blessed. I didn't do anything but simply roll over and go back to sleep.

I woke up a third time. This time, there was a light on the ground near me just on the other side of a clump of bushes, next to where I was sleeping. It didn't seem like a car headlight, and it didn't seem like a flashlight either, just a motionless white glow. I sat up in my sleeping bag to better see what was on the other side of the bush. I even did the thing where you move your head back and forth in the hopes of getting some glimpse of what the light might be. Eventually, I just shrugged it off and laid back down and looked up at the big round structure on the hilltop. One thing that I did notice was now a single dot of light was lit up just off to the side of the structure, and it hadn't been there before. My impression was that someone had turned on a lawn light in the yard of this enormous house. I was looking up at this round structure as I fell back to sleep.

Round structure on nearby hilltop, the night of March 10th 2013

It was still dark when I woke up very early the next morning. I felt rested and tossed all my sleeping gear in the back of the car and started the drive North to Idaho. Now here is something interesting, I don't actually remember looking up on the hillside that morning. I may have—I just don't remember. The drive was uneventful, but I had a nagging question in my mind that afternoon when I arrived back to my cabin.

I got on my computer and used Google Maps to look up the location of that big round building. I quickly found the exact location of my sleeping spot, but the weird thing is that I couldn't find anything on the satellite image that would match the circular building. I am very skilled with maps and interpreting topography, and I feel confident that I zeroed in on the precise spot where the big round structure should have been, but there was nothing, no roads or buildings, just an open meadow on a hilltop. It was 1.6 miles between where I slept and the site of where the round structure should have been. This meant that the building would have been enormous.

So, I did exactly what I do in this kind of situation: I wrote a blog post about it. I shared the experience of seeing the round structure from my sleeping bag and then not being able to find any evidence of it on a satellite map. I even did a tidy illustration of how that round structure looked from where I was lying. This essay was posted online on March 12th, at 12:34 in the afternoon, something I didn't notice until days later. That time count with the number sequence 1234 is a powerful clue in its own right.

It was about a year later that I traveled back to that same sleeping spot in southern Utah. I was desperately curious to know if there was, in fact, a huge round building perched on that hilltop. I found what I already knew in my heart—that there was nothing there, just an empty ridge line dotted with small trees.

Back to the afternoon of March 12th. I was standing near my desk shortly after adding the post to my blog. Everything about the scene was perfectly ordinary, but I was suddenly hit with this odd sensation. The only way to describe it is as an instantaneous visual download. I clearly saw a map in my mind with straight yellow line running west to east with three distinct markers on it. I knew this map was southern Utah, the Four Corners area. The term psychic flash feels very accurate.

Psychic flash seen in my mind's eye

This vivid psychic download lasted barely a microsecond, but the image was seared into my mind's eye. So right then and there, I just took one step over to my desk, sat down at the computer and started creating a map. I knew very clearly what the markers on each end of the yellow line were. The western marker was the event that had just happened on March 10th along Highway 20 in Utah. The eastern marker was an event that happened back in May of 2010, right outside the town of Dolores Colorado. I'm in no way exaggerating—there was a sense of absolute knowing about these points. These two points were at each end of a 231 mile long straight line.

* * *

The story of Dolores Colorado, like so many of the experiences in this book, plays out like its own novel. I was with a close friend of mine; her name is Natascha and she had come over from her home in Germany specifically to travel and camp with me around the Four Corners area of the desert southwest. Natascha and I had met at the 2008 Laughlin UFO conference. We became very close and planned this trip together. Like so many of people in this book, I would have to put her in the maybe category. She's had a lot of very strange life experiences and some of them seem to point to UFO contact.

It was during this road trip that we pulled into the town of Cortez Colorado after spending the day exploring the ancient cliff dwellings of Mesa Verde. The brakes on my car were acting funny, so I took it to a little car repair shop just off the main street. The mechanic brought it into the back and a little while later he came out and while wiping his hands with a greasy rag, he said, "I can't you let you leave town—or you'll die."

I was obviously taken aback by his dramatic comment, but he carefully explained that the brakes were at the point of failing and that it would be very dangerous for me to drive on the highway. So legally, he wasn't allowed to let me have the car. Then he added, "and it'll be five days before the one part you need can come in." So, Natascha and I found a cheap rental car, and our plan was just to drive around the West for the next five days.

It was late in the afternoon by the time all this played out, and the hippy espresso girl at the local coffee shop pointed us to a nice place to camp out that night. We followed her directions out of Cortez, driving a few miles down the highway to the very small town of Dolores, Colorado. From there, we drove a forest service road out to a beautiful camping spot in the woods. We found a secluded spot with an old fire ring and some broken beer bottles, perfect for our one-night camping needs.

We set up our tent, then headed back into Dolores and had pizza at a local brewery. During dinner, Natascha was quite emotional. She was feeling sad and didn't know why, crying off and on while we ate. After pizza, we went back to the camp site, climbed into our small tent and quickly went to sleep. This is when things got strange.

I was suddenly jolted awake because Natascha was screaming. My instantaneous response was to bolt upright and scream with an intensity that would be hard to describe. I was screaming in fear, sure enough, but it was also a primal outburst of defense. We were both in the throes of something powerful and I don't know if it's possible to accurately explain the ferocity of this sensation. Natascha and I both tell the story the same way—we awoke into a place of overwhelming terror.

I've spent years of my life sleeping out in tents, it's an environment I'm very comfortable in, but this was different. If a grizzly bear had ripped through the tent and put its jaws around my throat, I would not have been as scared as I was in that moment. I have never in my life been frightened in a way that would come close to those moments in that tent. I've since described it as synthetic fear, this being the only way to articulate the absolute irrational intensity. It felt as if my very soul was at the precipice of being extinguished.

I switched on my headlamp, held it in my hand and asked Natascha what happened. She couldn't answer, she was nearly paralyzed in terror. I actually had the wherewithal to say, "Tell me the first thing that comes to your mind. Don't think, just tell me what happened."

She said almost nothing, simply whispering, "I saw a face."

This primal fear lasted for maybe ten minutes, and then suddenly both of us were asleep. It seems like we went from a panicky adrenaline freak-out to total unconsciousness in the snap of a finger.

The next thing I remember was floating.

I felt the very tangible elevator-up sensation while rising off the sleeping pad, a feeling that was eerily familiar. As I floated upwards, I saw a big glowing mandala figure to my left, situated in a very specific point near the door of the tent. It was a simple circle about the size of a large pizza with a lone dot in its center. This image was strangely flat, as if it was void of any dimensionality. Right in that moment I was very much reminded of a blurry cataract image that had appeared in my right eye over a year before—more on that shortly.

I continued to float up, and I passed directly through the top of the tent. It was almost like I faded through it, like a lap-dissolve in a movie, and I just entered this white realm. As I was floating, I was repeating to myself, "I need to remember this. I need to remember this. I need to remember this...” I have no memory of being onboard any kind of craft, just this totality of white light. There was nothing but an unending whiteness.

At some point my repeated chanting changed to. “Am I on a table? Am I on a table? Am I on a table?” I have absolutely no sense of being on any table, but those were the words in my head. I didn’t understand where I was. All I can say is there was a mysterious realm with a uniform white glow around me. Was I on my back, or was I upright? Was this a dream, or was this really happening?

The next thing I remember was hearing Natascha, in her German accent, saying, “Mike you’re floating!” And then—whoosh—I was back in the tent. I didn’t wake up, and I’m quite certain Natascha never said I was floating, but that’s how it plays out in my mind. Unlike the initial jolt of fear in the tent, this vivid sensation of floating up into the white realm was curiously void of any emotion, it felt neither good nor bad.

May 13th 2010, near Dolores Colorado

When we woke up the next morning it was sunny, the birds were chirping, and things seemed perfectly normal. We talked about that paralyzing fear while we were still in our sleeping bags. At that point, I didn't tell her anything about my floating up into the white realm. I simply asked Natascha, "Last night all you said was 'I saw a face.' Please, what did you see?" She replied, "I don't know. I can't describe it." I pressed her and she said, "I saw the face right there." And she pointed to the exact spot I had seen that glowing, round mandala image the night before.

I asked what it looked like, and she said, "I can't say, but the only thing that seems to match is that drawing you did, of the thing in your eye, the face in the circle from your blog."

Again, I hadn't shared the events, but she pointed to where I had seen the floating mandala, and she described it the exact same way I had—as the image in my eye.

This requires I fill the reader in on another odd story to better understand why this is all so strange. During the summer of 2008, I began noticing that lights at night looked different. Things like streetlights and the full moon had a shimmering halo around them, something I had never seen before. Later an optometrist diagnosed me with small cataracts on my right eye.

It was over a year later, in October 2009, while lying on my back in a park in Pasadena California, that I saw something bewildering that only I could see. It was a lovely afternoon, the sun was shining, and my face was pointed upwards. You know how when you lie out in the sunshine, you can see the light through your eyelids. I squinted, and opened my eyes just enough to let a tiny amount of sunlight filter in through my eyelashes. I was getting this psychedelic lens flare in my vision during this my relaxed state of concentration.

Because of the cataracts in my right eye, I was seeing these slightly distorted halo type blooms as I squinted at the sun. They appeared as doughnut or mandala shape, rather than a true circle of light. I had noticed this effect often in the previous year. But that afternoon, as I lay out in the sunshine in that park I saw, quite clearly, the image of a little face in the center of this shimmering optical effect. I could distinctly focus on it. There was a vivid rainbow of colors all warped in a halo around this perfectly-defined little face. It was distinctly skull-like, and at the same time it had that big-eyed alien look. But more than anything, it looked like me! Bald, with big eyes and sideburns too. This seemed like a weirdly personal caricature.

The little face was flawlessly symmetrical right to left, and it was framed by colorful set of swirling halos. The body looked like it was seated in the lotus position, so it took on the feel of a garishly colored painting of a Hindu deity.

About a week later, I drew this image by lying on my living room floor with a clipboard and a pencil. I faced into the sun as it shone through a window with the same squinted eyes, and again, I clearly saw the little face. The problem with all this was that there was something vivid within my own vision that only I could see. Drawing it was important because I needed to share what I was seeing. This, like most of my odd experiences, became a blog post.

It was this image, the drawing that I created of the little face within my eye, that both Natascha and I felt we saw in the tent that night.

Back to that morning with Natascha outside Dolores Colorado. When I got out of the tent and walked around hoping to find some clue as to what had happened the night before. I was literally looking for a burn mark on the ground where a flying saucer had landed. I didn't find one.

There are some other odd details with this story. Later that day when I took my shirt off, I had a scratch that started at my left shoulder and went all the way down to my belly button. This didn't make any sense, because I certainly would have remembered getting a scratch like this. When I first looked at it, there wasn't anything that unusual about it. It just looked like a thin little scratch, like maybe a single cat claw, or as if a single rose thorn had run across my skin. But when you looked at it very closely, it wasn't a scratch at all. It was a row of tiny, raised, fluid-filled blisters, all bunched together. They were so small that you couldn't see them unless you really looked. It was totally painless and healed in just a few days.

After the scratch was totally gone, both Natascha and I sort of exclaimed, "We should have taken a picture!" We both think of ourselves as UFO investigators, but it never occurred to either of us to take a photograph. We were on vacation and we were taking pictures of every cactus and sunset imaginable, but we didn't take a picture of this very unusual scratch.

We took down the tent, packed everything up, and drove to the little coffee shop on the main street of Cortez. I made a phone call to a friend of mine, Miriam Delicado, and she's had her own very profound set of UFO contact experiences. She had spent a lot of time down in the Four Corners area, so I was hoping she could help us with ideas of things to do. So I asked her, "Listen, we're stuck for five days. What do we do?"

She didn't hesitate. "Here's what you need to do," she said. "You drive down to the Navajo Reservation in Arizona and visit Canyon De Chelly." Then she told me how to find a traditional Navajo friend of hers who would lead a shamanic sweat lodge ceremony.

Both Natascha and I were excited about this plan, and we spent the next few hours driving south through the native lands in our rent-a-car. Canyon De Chelly (pronounced De-Shay) is one of the most beautiful and magical places on earth, and we spent the afternoon exploring the towering corridors of red rock with a Navajo guide. The next morning, we had a traditional sweat lodge experience with a shaman guide right near the rim of the canyon.

I was naively unaware of what I was getting myself into. It felt like I was proceeding without intention. It was more like I was being pulled toward that sweat lodge, rather than actively seeking it. The lodge itself was just a set of arched metal rebar covered in old blankets, making for a low domed tent-like structure. There was a fire pit next to the lodge for heating up a set of rocks that would be used in the ceremony. When I entered the lodge, I wore a bathing suit, and my bare chest displayed that long red scratch. There were eight of us in the dark cramped shelter, with a pit in the center for the very hot rocks.

The Navajo who led the shamanic ceremony spent the hours talking, chanting, singing, and drumming. It was mystical and playful all at the same time. I felt rooted in my own world, and simultaneously connected with something beautiful and ancient. The overriding theme was to surrender to the heat.

There were four separate sessions within the dark little lodge, each one getting progressively hotter. The final session was insanely hot, and everyone inside needed to lie down to breathe the cooler air near the dirt floor. I tried to fully surrender, not only to the heat, but to the entire ceremony. That morning in the sweat lodge was a truly beautiful experience for both me and Natascha.

That was a long set of stories to describe an experience starting with someone telling me, You can't leave town or you'll die!, and ending with a shamanic death and rebirth ceremony.

These events from May of 2010 and Dolores Colorado define the eastern point on the map I saw in my mind's eye during a psychic flash. Curiously, Natascha had studied past life regression hypnosis with the late UFO researcher Dolores Cannon. I can't help see the coincidence of the name Dolores C in connection to these events.

I used Google Maps to zoom in and I placed the marker exactly where our tent was set up on the night we woke up in terror with Natascha. You can take any two points on a map and make a nice straight line between them, that's easy. There's always going to be a perfectly straight line between two points, but the map I saw had three defined points. What I had to figure out was: what was that third point in the middle?

After thinking for a little while, I realize that something happened (again) with Natascha while we slept out under the stars, this time in March of 2011. It was along the gloriously scenic Burr Trail Road just east of the very small town of Boulder Utah. Natascha had come from Germany to attend the annual UFO conference out side of Phoenix Arizona, and she added some time onto the end of her trip so we could drive around the desert again like our previous adventures a year earlier. Just like we had done many times before, our plan was just to sleep out under the stars during this drive home to my house in Idaho after the conference. We found a perfect spot to sleep out, a sandy parking area tucked in behind some scrubby trees just off the Burr Trail Road.

When we climbed into our sleeping bags, I was tired and needed to sleep after our long day of driving, but Natascha was jet-lagged and couldn't sleep.

At some point in the night, she woke me up and said, “Mike, I can’t sleep, I need to do something.”

I said, “I’m sorry, I’m tired. Maybe take a walk. It’s a beautiful night, don’t worry, this is a totally safe environment.” She said okay, and headed out to the road and started walking east. It was a perfectly calm glorious night with the sky lit up by a trillion stars in a way that can only happen in the desert. While she was walking, I was in my sleeping bag, drifting in and out of sleep. At the same time, I was listening to the hooting of a great horned owl, somewhere in the bushes very close to me. The call of the great horned owl is very distinct and easy to recognize. I could hear it, but I couldn’t see it. It was loud and just went on and on. Hearing this owl was absolutely magical, I truly loved it.

I can’t help but recognize how similar this was to the howling coyote that was also very close to me as I slept out along highway 20 in March of 2013.

A little while later, Natascha woke me up saying, “Mike, we gotta leave!”

She explained that when she left me lying there, she was nervous but excited to take a walk alone on this amazing night. She could walk down the road without a flashlight, since the starlight was enough to allow her to see where she was going. Everything seemed so beautiful, and she felt as though all her senses were heightened, as if there was a buzz in the air—she actually said she felt like she was sparkling.

Then, off to the side of the road, she saw a light. At first, she thought it was someone with a very bright flashlight, but it was moving too smoothly and too low down near the sagebrush. After a few moments of watching, she realized it was a glowing orb of light, maybe two feet wide. She watched in amazement until it flashed, like it exploded, and then it was gone. Now she was scared, and she ran back to where I was sleeping.

After she woke me and said that we needed to leave, we hastily tossed everything in the back of the car and started driving. It was probably close to four in the morning as we left that little parking spot.

I used Google Maps and placed a little marker right where I had been sleeping under the stars along the Burr Trail Road.

What I’m going to describe next is what changed everything for me. Everything.

I clicked the little button on my computer that brought up the yellow line that I had already created on the map. I sat in amazement when I saw that thin yellow line exactly bisect where I had been lying while listening to that great horned owl.

These three locations are exactly positioned along a 231-mile-long perfectly straight line.

If I had tried to create a map like this in an era before the advent of computer-assisted mapping, I would have had to have taken a pencil and a ruler, and draw a line on the paper map. Even if I had a really big map and a really sharp pencil, that line might be miles in thickness. What I can now do with the computer on my desk is to make this line one pixel thick. Then I can zoom in on the satellite imagery, right to the open area where I had slept out under the stars, and this razor-thin line passes precisely over where I was lying in the sand.

Exact sleeping spot, March 10th 2011

Before clicking that yellow line, my life had been swallowed up in questioning and yearning. I had been denying all these onerous UFO events in my life. I knew something had been happening, but I couldn't admit what it all pointed to. Then an event happens. This one mouse-click brings up a yellow line that exactly matches where I had been listening to the hooting of a great horned owl.

That was the event, and it changed everything. I am a different person now. I had clearly seen these three events along a razor straight yellow line, I had seen it in a hyper-vivid psychic image of a map. The three points scream at me with spiritual meaning, the one to the west has a coyote, the one in the middle has an owl, and the one to the east has a shaman.

Whatever is going on—this big totality of weirdness—has presented itself in a way that was distinctly and powerfully designed for me. Creating maps is what I do, I love to make maps. Sleeping out under the stars is something I love to do. I recognize the placement of these three mystical elements along that line, including an owl right in the center. All this feels like it has been tailored exactly to the workings of my consciousness.

I cannot state this strongly enough. I was given a set of clues that only I could solve. This complex set of experiences, this paradox syndrome, was carefully orchestrated for me and me alone.

I had spent years with an endless tape loop grinding away in my head, it was repeating these things are impossible. Yet I knew something had invaded my life, but I didn't know what it was or why it was happening. I was stuck in the feeling of not knowing.

But seeing that line on the map made it impossible to cling to that former identity of not knowing. I now know. I am directly intertwined with the UFO reality.

I hate the term abductee and all its baggage. That title is way too simplistic, but that's the term we're stuck with. I use it grudgingly to define what's been going on in my life. That said, I am convinced that at the source of this mystery, there is something far more complex and far more bizarre than we dare imagine. The inadequate words abductee, experiencer, and contactee all seem flat in the face of this sweeping puzzle.

But the knowing remains.

The echoing clues

I call what happened on the night of March 10th, 2013 my confirmation event. It confirmed that something real is interacting with me and my life. It wasn't just a singular incident, but was part of a great deal more that emerged in connection to that one night under the stars. Here are a few more puzzle pieces that really hammered home the power of these experiences.

All three events took place on the new moon.

Two out of three of these events happened with my friend Natascha. I was alone on the night along Utah highway 20 where I saw the big round structure up on the hillside. That happened on the night of March 10th, and this is Natascha's birthday.

I also heard a coyote on the night of March 10th. As I said before, this wasn't just some distant yapping off in the sagebrush. It was so loud that I can't understand why I didn't see the coyote, because it felt like it was just a few yards away from my head. In the Native American lore of the desert southwest, the coyote is considered the archetypal trickster. This means a playful character that defies normal convention. They are rule breakers, jesters, and clowns—playing tricks on both humans and gods. I was lying on the ground in an area rich in these mythic traditions.

Professor Byrd Gibbens said:

Many native traditions held clowns and tricksters as essential to any contact with the sacred... Humans had to have tricksters within the most sacred ceremonies for fear that they forget the sacred comes through upset, reversal, surprise. The trickster in most native traditions is essential to creation, to birth.[\[89\]](#)

Christopher O'Brien authored a book titled, Stalking the Trickster. He argues that the idea of the trickster might be the one overriding concept for the entirety of the UFO phenomenon. I contacted him, told him about my coyote experience, and asked what he thought it might mean. He listed a few thoughts, but the first was that the coyote might indicate the end of a cycle in my life. This certainly rings true, especially in hindsight. An old part of me died that night and something new was re-born. If this howling coyote was playing a role, it might be the court jester heralding the arrival of my new life.

Two out of three of these events involved my friend Lucretia Heart feeling an urgent need to call me in the middle of the night. She woke up twice with a profound sense of concern and was compelled to dial my number. She called my home phone in a panic on the same night I remember floating in the tent. I didn't get the call because I was traveling with my cell phone. Three years later, she got up, once again well after midnight, with the intention of calling me. This was the same night I saw the big round structure on that hilltop in Utah. She said she was "freaking out" but never dialed the phone. Instead she drank a glass of wine in the hopes of quelling her jangled nerves.

We have talked on the phone a lot over the years, but she and I have never talked at night. Lucretia describes the need to call me so late as something decidedly unusual. She feels strongly that there must be some sort of telepathic link between us that created such a powerful compulsion. I agree.

I should add that Lucretia is very much a UFO experiencer, and her owl stories have been described in this book. She also has a distinct memory of seeing something eerily similar to that big round structure I saw from my sleeping bag. Her experience happened in the late autumn of 2006, seven years before my sighting. It happened in her home in Ohio while she was up late at night unable to sleep. She looked out her a window and saw a huge round "building" ringed with lights. It was positioned up on a nearby hilltop. She, like myself, thought it was a giant house, and she didn't understand why she had never noticed it before. She saw it several times throughout that night, each time she passed that window. She went to bed thinking it must have been a big vacation home that was rarely used, and now that it was autumn with the all the leaves down, this was the first time it could be seen. The following morning she looked up and there was nothing there.

Hemi-sync vision

I will very occasionally meditate, and sometimes I will listen to a guided meditation on my iPod. I like a series of audio tracks from Robert Monroe, the author of Journeys out of the Body, a first person account of out of body travel.[\[90\]](#) He started a research facility, The Monroe Institute, with the mission of exploring human consciousness.

He also pioneered a meditation technique using recorded audio called hemispheric synchronization. The process requires headphones, with a slightly different tone for each ear. To the listener, this sounds like nothing more than a calm humming. Monroe felt that this system synchronizes the two hemispheres of one's brain, and is said to help beginners more quickly achieve the meditative state. These same sounds have the potential to evoke an altered state of consciousness.

There I was, alone in my living room, sitting on my little home-made meditation stool. My eyes were closed as I listened to Robert Monroe's voice describe some simple focusing techniques with the humming hemi-sync audio in the background. This would have been the fall of 2014.

I was feeling calm and enjoying his narration, and at some point he said, "Here is a simple way to remember any part of your life experience.... Close your physical eyes and touch the fingers of your right hand gently to the center of your forehead. When you do this you will recall and remember immediately that which you consciously desire to remember..."[\[91\]](#)

Everything was so peaceful that I didn't think much about what he was saying, so there were no expectations when I touched my forehead. At the instant my fingertips made contact, I saw myself lying on the ground surrounded by five or six spindly aliens. This image was only in my mind's eye for a single second, but it was unmistakably vivid. I knew what I was seeing. It was a single snap-shot from the night of March 10th, 2013.

A clear momentary vision during meditation, 2014

I wasn't at all surprised to see this, it seemed like I was offered a gentle clue from some higher part of myself. The beings in the vision seemed to be dressed in something tight fitting and white, and were taller than what would be the typical gray aliens. I was motionless in my sleeping bag at their feet. This scene in the Utah desert was presented without any fear or anxiety—as if to reassure me.

Curiously, these Robert Monroe audio files were sent to me from Derek, the fellow who's account opened the maybe people chapter. His story was of seeing both an owl and UFO while out in the desert at night.

The momentary vision was clear, it was me on the ground surrounded by aliens. I recognize how seductive it would be to surrender to this image, to see it as a literal truth. Coming to terms with what I saw has been tricky, it might be my own mind deluding me, yet maybe it's exactly what happened.

He knows to surrender

During my reverse speech session with analyst Wayne Nicholson I spoke about the power of all the events clustered around that night under the stars in Utah. Here is what I said.

Forward: My confirmation event was lining that stuff up on the map...

Reversal: Many owls.

Wow. It doesn't get any plainer than that. My confirmation event wasn't just one thing, it was many events lining up, going way beyond just what happened in the Utah desert. The simple explanation would be that my confirmation event was "many owls" all lined up, all of them hitting me over the head with a reverberating thud.

In the earlier chapter on reverse speech, there were a lot of examples of owls showing up in the context of an abductee's spoken words. Within some of these reversals, the owls seem to play out as a synonym for the aliens themselves. So this might just as well mean many aliens.

During that same session I talked specifically about the night of March 10th 2013.

Forward: I was in Utah and it was a cold night and I had a big sleeping bag and slept out under the stars...

Reversal: He knows to surrender.

Again, this one is crystal clear. When I sleep outside, I will very often make a plea to the universe. I will state out loud that, "I am open and receptive to whatever you have to offer." Asking the universe is a little less churchy than saying God, but it's essentially the same thing—I am asking for a message. I don't do this every time I sleep outside, but I do it a lot, and I'll often get remarkable things showing up either in my dreams or within hours of waking. I don't remember if I actually made any formal plea that night, but I've done it enough over the years that lying on the ground under the stars has, for me, become an act of surrendering. This isn't something vague and fluffy, when I sleep outside I fully surrender to the stars above. I mean that sincerely.

How do we know these UFO contact experiences are real? When abduction researcher Mary Rodwell was asked that question, she replied that the people who've had these contact experiences will change as individuals. That is the evidence.

She says, "You don't change after a hallucination. You don't change after fantasies. But you do change after an experience and every single person changes after these experiences. [They change] in a multitude of ways in terms of their understanding of their own spirituality and consciousness.”[\[92\]](#)

A heap of orchestrated clues was set in my path, some were vivid psychic flashes, while others were palpable and real. These events, and all the owls, carried an ominous weight that couldn’t be denied. I have been confronted with a conflict, what Dr. John Mack called the reified metaphor, something that is presenting itself as both real and symbolic. There is an anxious tension in this contradiction. The sound of that unseen yapping coyote was vividly real—more real than real—and at the same time it was something mythical. It was an animal totem screaming for my attention, howling at the stars to make itself known. That scrappy little trickster, quite literally, woke me up.

I’ve come to see the entirety of these experiences as both real and unreal. It’s as if reality itself is acting as a metaphor, and it’s happening for some profound reason. The reason is to wake me up, to make certain that I open my eyes. I’ll also say that all these experiences, or maybe the intelligence behind them, have conspired to make me write this book. That’s a bold thing to say, but that’s how it feels. I have tried to let go and allow the deeper story to emerge. Like sleeping under the stars on a desert night, this book has been an act of surrendering.

Conclusion

—G.W.F. Hegel, Philosophy of Right (1820).

This quotation from the German philosopher Hegel implies that it’s only possible to understand an epoch, or even your own life, as it comes to an end. Without the clarity of hindsight it would be impossible to know the full philosophical meaning of a story. This book has been my own story, my own struggle to come to terms with my own experiences. It is my own epoch, and as it comes to its end I would love to offer up some tidy conclusion about owls and UFOs, but I’m just as baffled as I was at the onset of this project. I have been confronted by a genuine mystery, one that cannot be easily solved like a murder in the last pages of a detective novel. Instead, the owl and its relation to UFOs begs for exploration, because no real explanation is possible.

After all this exploration, all I've come away with is that owls are playing some role, seemingly the same as they did for our ancient ancestors, a blurry overlapping of messenger, archetype and alarm clock. If there are messages being delivered, what I am hearing is wake up, pay attention, and look within. The same could be said for UFOs.

The chapter on owls in dreams opened with a statement from pulp sci-fi publisher Ray Palmer, he said that flying saucers intrude into our lives to make us think. I would amend that to say they intrude into our lives to make us think deeply. The same could be said for owls.

Why owls?

Trying to rein in these ideas about owls has confounded me. It feels like nothing was meant to be solved. Instead, it was all thrown into my face so I would chew on it until my rational mind cracked, with the ultimate outcome of seeing reality in an entirely new way. And with that, I might act in a new way too—and hopefully a better way.

The question why owls is simple, the answer is not.

Before those owls flew above me and Kristen, I was in a place of denial about all the UFO stuff that had happened in my life. Those owls at sunset didn't grant me enlightenment or anything so grand, instead they initiated a process of crumbling. Some brittle part of me started falling away and something new has been trying to emerge.

All my life I've been instructed to believe that reality is one way, that it is well-defined and orderly, but that definition no longer fits. There is a loneliness that comes with seeing the world so fundamentally different, and what unfolded was a deep inward turn. I wallowed in my own dark night of the soul, desperately clinging to something I knew was disintegrating. It was scary and I tried my damndest to deny what had happened. This book has been a sort of memoir of the challenges along that path. I'm still not washed clean of that old self—it's there all the time. I still bristle at the term UFO abductee, but I recognize it's the only vocabulary word that fits. Although imperfect, I accept it as describing who I am.

I have changed. I now see magic in the world around me. It's woven into the fabric of everything. This might seem naive, but I see owls, UFOs, and synchronicity as an expression of this magic, all blurring together playing a similar role. These are deeply challenging ideas, but they are also seductive, and they've been tugging at my soul.

No matter how highly evolved we want to see ourselves, we're still just primitive people walking down the path at twilight. However, I sense there is a magical essence that wants to communicate with us as we move forward. If we are even a little bit aware, we'll find clues manifesting out of the mist. These messengers are always there, either whispering or screaming, but they are truly there. For reasons I don't pretend to understand, I've been bumping into owls along this path, and these owls are proof of magic.

I am different now. It was not seeing the aliens in my backyard, or the missing time, or seeing UFOs—these things didn't change me—it was the owls that pushed me off the cliff. It was the owls that forced me to look into my own experiences.

The challenge is, do I have the bravery not only to hear that message, but truly to live it.

About the Author

Mike Clelland is an avid outdoorsman, illustrator and UFO researcher. He has written extensively on the subject of alien abductions, synchronicities and owls. It was his first-hand experiences with these elusive events that have been the foundation for this research.

His website (<http://hiddenexperience.blogspot.com>) explores these events and their connections to the alien contact phenomenon. This site also features extended audio interviews with visionaries and experts examining the complexities of the overall UFO experience.

Beyond that, Mike is considered an expert in the skills of ultralight backpacking, and has authored or illustrated a series of instructional books focused on advanced outdoor techniques. He spent nearly 25 years living in the Rockies, and now lives in the Adirondacks.

These highly controversial pictures show flying saucers hovering above alpine meadows in Switzerland. The crafts themselves look somewhat goofy, ornamented with shiny metal spheres and corrugated trim. Many appear to be merely models suspended on wires. Meier reports regular contacts with human looking extraterrestrials called the Plejaren, and they gave him permission to photograph and film their “beamships” so that he could offer the world evidence for their existence. Meier’s outlandish claims are both believed and disputed by UFO skeptics and enthusiasts. That said, sometimes descriptions within UFO reports match the Meier photos.

77. Quoted in Fred Nadis, The Man From Mars, Ray Palmer’s Amazing Pulp Journey (Penguin Books, 2013), no page number. The full quote, from 1976, one year before Palmer’s death, was: “It is still true, as I predicted in 1947, that no flying saucer has ever been ‘captured’ or even ‘proved.’ They are as real as Shaver’s caves, and just as ‘psychic.’ They are unknown, the hidden world, that all of us at one time or another are aware exists, and which intrudes on our lives to make us think.”

78. As an aside, it is worth some space to explain why the 1990s was a busy time for some abductees: The late 1980’s saw the publication of Whitley Strieber’s Communion and Budd Hopkins Intruders, both from 1987. In the follow-up to these two books, there was a flood of other books and tabloid television documentaries. By the early 1990s, the public awareness of the UFO abduction phenomenon had gone from virtually zero to commonplace. This societal recognition paralleled what seems to have been a high point on the bell curve of abduction activity. I have spoken to a lot of people and they will say something to the effect of: I was getting taken a few times a week in the 80s and 90s, but it has changed, it has tapered off since then. This doesn’t mean the abduction events have gone to zero—they still seem to be happening—but the descriptions of the experiences have changed. One thought is that these are just visiting aliens visiting Earth on their metal spaceship to gather data on humans. This simple explanation is easy to grasp, but it might not be what is actually happening. It might be more than little scientists doing experiments. They could instead be following a defined program of some sort. This would mean that there is a beginning, middle, and end to their agenda. One idea has it that these UFO occupants are here to collect human genetics and create a psychically advanced hybrid race of new humans. Both men and women tell of sexual and reproductive procedures at the hands of their alien abductors. At some late time, these people are shown partially human children while onboard a craft. This might account for the busy time reported by abductees all across the globe. The aliens were rushing from bedrooms to lonely highways to complete their assignment. They had a strict timetable and job to perform. If this was happening in the 80s and 90s, there should now be a new breed of young adults out there on some mothership for some unknown purpose. Perhaps to come down to earth in the event of some global upheaval, then they can play their role in helping us mere humans to survive any dire events. There is no way to know what it all might mean, but these are avenues of speculation that are commonplace within the UFO research community.
