I liked the trouble shooting video. Very instructional. And the there were issues with the space age carbon. Love your vlogs, they help so much. Thanks Joshua.

Joshua Bardwell Why would a company approve a video containing a shout-out to a competitor? We might ask, why would a company (XHover) facilitate the production of a competitor's sponsored video? The answer is left as an exercise for the reader.

Like · Reply · Commented on by Joshua Bardwell · 4h · Edited

Chris Leroux Read again: "after being told by my staff, my wife and half the heavy hitters in this industry that I would be mad to be happy with this, and after I hear you tell me XHover was necessary to make a video for RR I paid 5k for, yeah, it's enough to change my mind, which, last I checked, is not a crime." Are we done now?

Joshua Bardwell in the interest of not spreading lies or misleading, I hope that you will set the record straight about Chad and Drew "lying" about Daniel's involvement in the video, and also about whether or not you had sufficient time to approve the video. Joshua Bardwell Ok, so you agree that you did in fact approve the video, you agree that you did have plenty of time to view the video, you agree that you did see the shout-out and thought it was okay, until other people convinced you to change your mind after the fact, and now you accuse me of lying about having received an email that you accidentally sent to yourself.

Jamie Jamison I don't want to interrupt this and I can see there is headway being made.. but the question I have is even if Daniel helped with the video it was Daniel that helped not xhover. Daniel could of been that KS as a helping hand.... But not a company. If xhover was helping with the video was that disclosed in the contract of making the video?

I can't speak for the RR guys. For myself, I didn't think the shout-out was a big deal because I don't see this industry as a zero-sum game where for one guy to win, everybody else has to lose. Xhover is a great company. Daniel is a great guy. A tiny shout-out at the end of the video, which most people are never going to see.... what's the big deal. That's my perspective.

I would also like to point out that, from a marketing perspective, the more obvious it is that the video is sponsored, the more skeptical the viewer becomes, and the less effective the video is.

Like · Reply · 2h

Joshua Bardwell I cannot speak to the exact mindset of the editor when he chose to leave in that clip. All I can say is that this type of situation, where the creative vision of the client and the producer diverge, is why the client is given final approval over the episode before it is released. You gave the approval. For you to now come back six months later and act like somebody did you wrong, and make a giant stink about it... I dunno man.

Like · Reply · 2h

Joshua Bardwell PS: My recollection is that we used Hypetrain motors because the Armattan motors you sent got smashed up making content for you at Rampage. We didn't put those motors in as an explicit attempt to plug ourselves. We just needed motors, and instead of asking you to send more motors, RR pulled them off their own shelf

EDIT: I don't actually fully remember what happened to the Armattan motors you sent with the frames. All I know is when it came time to build out the quads, we didn't have any motors.

Ryan Greene The people in this hobby are what's ruining it for me. The major manufacturers have made great products, but they turn into dicks at the drop of the hat. TBS, Armattan.

Maybe this is one thing Chinese clones manufacturers have going for them: they're soulless. They're not offended when you're dissatisfied.

Joshua Bardwell Rhys Evans I believe that the entire situation has to be considered in context of the problems with the space-grade Marmotte. This situation happened before Armattan had publicly acknowledged the problems with the carbon. But customers were posting about it all over the place. If Armattan saw a big drop in sales, it may not be fair to blame it on my videos.
