Google Play, also known as the Google Play Store and formerly Android Market, is a digital distribution service that Google operates and develops. It is the official app store for certified devices running the Android operating system and its derivatives, as well as ChromeOS, and allows users to browse and download applications developed with the Android software development kit (SDK) and published through Google. Google Play also functions as a digital media store, selling music, books, movies, and television shows. Purchased content from Google Play Movies & TV and Google Play Books can be accessed via a web browser as well as the Android and iOS apps.

Applications can be downloaded for free or for a fee from Google Play. They can be downloaded directly on an Android device using the Google Play Store mobile app or by deploying the application from the Google Play website. Applications that make use of a device's hardware capabilities can be targeted to users of devices that have specific hardware components, such as a motion sensor (for motion-dependent games) or a front-facing camera (for online video calling). The Google Play Store had over 82 billion app downloads in 2016 and over 3.5 million apps published in 2017 with a purge of apps bringing it back to over 3 million. It has been the subject of numerous security issues, including malicious software.

In September 2016, Chrome OS received the Google Play Store, which included all Android apps.

Google Play announced plans in May 2021 to add a new section with privacy information for all applications in its storefront. The project, which is similar to the App Store's privacy labels, is expected to be completed in the first half of 2022. The feature will inform users about the type of information collected by each app, whether the data it stores is encrypted, and whether users can opt out of being tracked by the app.

According to Google's Developer Policy Center, "Google Play supports a variety of monetization strategies to benefit developers and users, including paid distribution, in-app products, subscriptions, and ad-based models," and developers must follow the policies in order to "ensure the best user experience." It requires developers who charge for apps and downloads on Google Play to use the Google Play payment system. Except when the purchase "is solely for physical products" or "is for digital content that may be consumed outside of the app itself," in-app purchases unlocking additional app functionality must also use the Google Play payment system (e.g. songs that can be played on other music players).

On March 6, 2012, Google Play was launched, combining Android Market, Google Music, Google Movies, and the Google eBookstore under one brand, signaling a shift in Google's digital distribution strategy. Google has expanded geographical support for each of its services following their rebranding. Since 2018, Google has gradually phased out the Play brand, rebranding Play Newsstand as Google News in 2018, Play Music as YouTube Music in 2020, and Play Movies & TV as Google TV in 2021. Play Games is expected to discontinue its mobile app in 2022 in favor of an Android emulator for Windows with the same name. Play Books will be the final standalone mobile app.

On February 13, 2009, support for paid applications was introduced for developers in the United States and the United Kingdom[91], with support expanded to an additional 29 countries on September 30, 2010. [92] The in-app billing system first appeared in March 2011. [93] Beginning in September 2014, all Google Play developers were required to include a physical address on the app's Google Play page.

Google announced in February 2017 that it would allow developers to set sales for their apps, with the original price struck out and a banner beneath informing users when the sale ends. Google also announced changes to its algorithms to promote games based on user engagement rather than downloads. Finally, Google Play had over 3.5 million Android applications by 2017. After Google removed many apps from the Google Play Store, the number of apps has returned to over 3 million. Developers in over 150 locations could distribute apps on Google Play as of 2017, though not every location supports merchant registration. Developers are paid 85% of the application price, with the remaining 15% going to distribution partners and operating fees. Developers can create sales with the original price removed and a banner beneath informing users when the sale ends. Google Play allows developers to distribute alpha or beta versions of apps to a select group of users. Select apps (as well as movies) can be pre-ordered by users.

Google Play (formerly Google Play) evolved from three distinct products: Android Market, Google Music, and Google eBookstore.

Google announced the Android Market on August 28, 2008, and it became available to users on October 22, 2008. In December 2010, Android Market added content filtering, each app's details page began showing a promotional graphic at the top, and the maximum size of an app was increased from 25 to 50 megabytes. The Google eBookstore debuted on December 6, 2010, with three million ebooks, making it "the world's largest ebook collection." Google Music, a section of the Google Play Store that sells music, was launched in November 2011. Google increased the maximum allowed size of an image in March 2012.
