

Minecraft and the Purge are Joined at Last

Minecraft and The Purge are separate for many good reasons. While the first sandbox game definitely allows for plenty of freedom, it's a game mostly for kids which is why The Purge doesn't necessarily slot in. But the internet can't be controlled. So someone created an online video that combines both.

We're not suggesting that you don't make The Purge in Minecraft. Everyone enjoys the game in their own unique way. You can take the person who has nearly finished mining a complete Minecraft map in five years or the gamers who recreated MS Paint with Redstone. A person even built an PC, modelled after the Nintendo Wii, which manages to run Minecraft in stunning 4K. It offers something for all. However, it's one of the most bizarre and most entertaining videos we've seen.

MINECRAFT SERVER LIST

Forge Labs is a company that develops long-term challenges for games. They invited a few Minecrafters to gather and spend a week creating incredible homes and living their most enjoyable lives. After that week had ended, The Purge rules came into effect, which meant that everyone was allowed to do anything they want, but mostly crimes.

The latest video from them is barely two hours long, so it's a bit of a commitment. It's also somewhere between being extremely fascinating, deeply disturbing and a very honest glimpse of how humans could behave if things went wrong.

One of the most interesting aspects of this set of rules was the fact that players who passed away before the purge started lost one heart for all time. This meant that even though players were expected to explore ways to upgrade their equipment but it always came at a cost since death was damaging. It's a great watch and we highly recommend it for when you're working.
