The way both systems deliver sound to their ears is very different. To understand this difference, let's imagine that we are watching a movie in a theater.

You are in a scene where a helicopter flies. Now the surround sound system pushes the sound of the helicopter to the speakers above you. In Dolby Atmos headphones crack, the sound is not transmitted to a specific speaker, but to a specific point in 3D space. The sound engineer locates the sound of a moving helicopter in its corresponding 3D trajectory. Even the volume, extension, and size of the audio that comes out of the speakers change in relation to the moving object (in this case, the helicopter), just like in real life.
