While afflicted with a rare disease that causes extreme disease upon direct exposure to sunlight, three Tunisian women discover to browse life and live it to the max. In spite of their condition, the women defy all limits and expectations while chasing their dreams.

Endless examples of artworks reveal how Arab regimes tame art-- particularly television drama-- and turn it into a tool for transmitting political messages, mass mobilization, or venting social repression. This trick started years back and continues to this day. Simply put, embracing the political visions and thoughts of the Arab regimes and dominating them at the cost of drama's visual worths and describing it as "commitment" is one element behind Arab drama' regression. It is not the other way around. Nowadays such a technique is outdated for an audience that takes pleasure in having contemporary interactions and social networks.

Ramadan is a time when we assess the important things that matter. While viewing television programmes is not what everyone will consider as a mode of reflection, there are insights to be obtained from investing a couple of hours in front of the small screen throughout the holy month. The most obvious is that the present crop of dramas is ending up being progressively stagnant. With few exceptions, the complex morality tales that for a very long time were a hallmark of the Ramadan drama, are being changed by inexpensive thrills.

The season demonstrated that the freedoms won in the Arab world - and specifically Egypt, home to MENA's most significant entertainment industry - in the immediate after-effects of the 2011 uprisings are now nothing but a distant memory. Federal governments have actually extended their control over the material of popular programs, as coverage of the region's everyday truths has actually ended up being taboo, along with the long-established trinity of sex, faith and political dissent.

If you've never ever heard of "kids of the moon," then this lovely and touching film will teach you whatever you require to understand. While afflicted with an uncommon illness that triggers extreme health problem upon exposure to sunlight, three Tunisian females discover to browse life and live it to the maximum. In spite of their condition, the women defy all limits and expectations while chasing their dreams.

All of these funnies suffered one major issue - a lack of humour. Unlike 100 Faces, they had no elegance, chemistry in between entertainers, engaging storytelling, and, many important of all, substance. The laughs were required, the composing lazy, and the characterisation as thin as a razor blade.

History did not alter in between the two television series. What altered was the political relationship in between the two regimes. In both cases, the political position forced drama to reflect the nature of those relations. By that, drama was a practical tool to reveal the general political mood of this or that routine. This is how Arab regimes comprehend "dedication"! In the light of this understanding, the appeals directed to Arab drama makers need to be equated similarly. They are no more than demands to produce drama that adopts the prevailing political regimes' visions, particularly after the "Arab Spring" transformations. To put it simply, drama was become political orientation lectures played by actors to get in every house. Such was better than asking the ruling celebration's band secretaries to provide boring speeches to their couple of fans.
